More than a hundred years, however, elapsed after Alexander's conquests before Greek influence drew the inhabitants of Judæa into serious political trouble. For a long time the small province, though hemmed in by Greek cities, Gaza, Joppa, Straton's Tower (i.e. Cæsarea), and Samaria, held out against Hellenization. But at last, at the beginning of the reign of Antiochus IV. Epiphanes (B.C. 175–164), the Greek party in Jerusalem, to which most of the ruling class belonged, felt themselves strong enough to take a decided step. A certain Jason got himself appointed high priest by Antiochus for a sum of money, with permission to set up a gymnasium in Jerusalem, and to enrol its inhabitants as citizens of Antioch, i.e. to confer on them the title and privileges of these citizens. A certain Menelaus in turn intrigued against Jason, and succeeded in supplanting him as high priest. The disorders consequent upon Greek innovations and scandals in the high-priesthood led to the direct interference of Antiochus, who in B.C. 168 had undertaken an expedition against Egypt. Foiled in this expedition by the veto of the Romans, Antiochus wrathfully determined to reduce the affairs of Judæa to order. The external means used were a massacre, an enslavement, and a Syrian occupation of the citadel (ἡ ἄκρα) of Jerusalem. On these followed an attempted conversion by force of the Jewish people to heathenism. The observance of the Sabbath and of circumcision was forbidden, copies of the Law were burnt, an altar was erected to Zeus in Jerusalem, and the Jews were compelled under penalty to participate in heathen sacrifices and to eat swine's flesh (1 Mac $2^{15ff.}$, 2 Mac $6^{18ff.}$). A large party among the Jews were willing to fall in (at least outwardly) with the king's plans, a large party again (the חסידים ḥăsīdīm, Gr. Ἀσιδαῖοι) preferred to offer only passive resistance (1 Mac 2^{29-38} 7^{10-17}), but there was fortunately a third party—perhaps not large in numbers at first—led by a priestly family afterwards called 'Maccabees.' Judas 'the Maccabee' was a hero of the stamp of David. Personally brave, he was also no contemptible leader, and though he died early, he had first taught the Jewish forces to face their enemies in battle with success.

The campaigns of Judas fall into three divisions. (1) Defensive, against the Syrians. By victories at Beth-horon and at Beth-zur he repulsed the enemy advancing from the West and from the South, and was not overcome until, in B.C. 162, Lysias, accompanied by the young king Antiochus V., led an army of 120,000 men and thirty-two elephants (1 Mac 6^{30}) into Judæa. (2) Offensive-defensive in Gilead and (with his brother Simon in immediate command) in Galilee. From both these districts the Jewish 'garrisons,' with their wives and children, were withdrawn and brought into Judæa. (3) Offensive, against the Edomites and Philistines, to enlarge the borders of his tiny state.

Against the immense resources of the Syrian kingdom the courage and skilful generalship of Judas would perhaps have failed had they not been seconded by the rivalries of various claimants to the Syrian throne. In the hour of victory (B.C. 162) Lysias was forced to grant to the Jews that religious freedom, the denial of which had occasioned the five years' war. In spite of further conflicts, in the course of which Judas fell, the cause of Jewish autonomy never went back, and at last, in B.C. 153, Jonathan the brother of Judas was able to put on the sacred vestments as high priest of the Jews, acknowledged by Alexander Balas, king of Syria (1 Mac $10^{15ff.\ 59ff.}$). In B.C. 142 Simon, the brother and successor of Jonathan, forced the Syrian garrison to evacuate the citadel of Jerusalem, and in the following year the whole nation of the Jews acknowledged the great services of the Maccabæan family by declaring Simon to be 'high priest, captain, and governor' for ever (1 Mac 14^{27-47}). W. EMERY BARNES.

ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.—The tribes that had settled in the south of Pal. were from the first cut off from the northern tribes by a line of Canaanitish cities, Har-heres, Gezer, Aijalon, and Shaalbim (Jg $1^{29\ 35}$); and during the period of the judges, while there was a growing tendency among the northern tribes to coalesce under pressure of invasion, the southern tribes remained distinct. Saul never seems to have gained a paramount influence over these mountaineers of the S., who in large numbers espoused the cause of David. Though the latter, by choosing as his capital Jerus., which lay on the border-land between Benjamin and Judah, and other acts of diplomacy, succeeded in uniting for a time the northern and southern tribes, the union seems never to have been very complete, and once at least the jealousy between them nearly broke out into civil war (2 S 19^{41}–20^{2}). Solomon's policy was specially calculated to exasperate the northern tribes. While they were heavily taxed, and had forced labour imposed upon them, his own tribe seems to have been entirely exempt (1 K 4^{7-19} 5^{13-18}). The rebellion led by Jeroboam which was suppressed by Solomon, broke out in more formidable proportions under Rehoboam, who continued with even greater severity the oppressive policy of his father.

The separation, encouraged by the prophet Ahijah, who objected to Solomon's idolatrous practices (1 K 11^{29-39}), took place without serious opposition, and Jeroboam became the first king of Israel (12^{20}). His aim was to counteract the centralizing effect of the great temple at Jerus. by setting up a more popular ritual at two of the many already existing local shrines, Bethel and Dan (12[29]), where from this time J" was worshipped under the symbol of a golden calf, probably as the God of agriculture. This cult may be regarded as a reaction from that more spiritual mode of worship which, under prophetic influence, had been established at Jerusalem. The view of the editor of the Book of Kings, that Jeroboam's act was a schismatic separation from the worship of the only legal sanctuary, is the reflexion of a post-Deut. age.

The hostility between North and South continued intermittently until the political and commercial alliance between Ahab and Jehoshaphat. While the invasions of Shishak (1 K 14[25]) and Zerah (2 Ch 14[9]) weakened the power of Judah, Israel was already being hampered by the growing power of the Syrians of Damascus (1 K 20[34]). Ahab, whose father Omri was the founder of the dynasty, married Jezebel, daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Zidonians (1 K 16[31ff.]), and she introduced the worship of the Tyrian Baal and Ashtaroth, with its cruel and immoral rites. In this she was opposed with varying success by the prophets Elijah and Elisha (1 K 18 ff.), through whose influence the dynasty was eventually overthrown by Jehu, and the cult exterminated by him (2 K 9. 10).

During this period the Syrians of Damascus began to take a prominent part in the history of Israel. Were the scanty records of OT our only source of information, we should have supposed the relation between Israel and Syria to have been that of practically unbroken hostility, the treaty of Benhadad II. in 1 K 20[34] appearing as merely a compact wrung from him in a moment of danger, and broken at the first opportunity (22[1-2]). In fact, the prophetic historian had little interest in events which lay outside the horizon of Israel, and even within it he had little in those which did not directly serve his religious purpose. We find, for example, no explanation how it was that Ramoth-gilead, after the events of 1 K 22, passed into the hands of the Israelites, as we find it in 2 K 8[28] 9[1]. Again, from the variety of sources from which the history is drawn without the needful sifting and arrangement, there are some serious inconsistencies. It is difficult, for example, to reconcile 2 K 6[-3] with 6[24]. From the Assyr. inscriptions, however, we learn that in 854 Israel was a member of a very important alliance of small kingdoms centring in Damascus, which was summoned to his assistance by Irkhulini, king of Hamath, against the Assyr. king, Shalmaneser II. (see BABYLONIA, vol. i. p. 184[b]). Ahab is said to have furnished no fewer than 2000 (!) chariots and 10,000 footmen, Benhadad 1200 chariots and 10,000 footmen. Altogether 80,000 to 90,000 men were brought into the field. A great battle was fought at Karkar (Aroer). After a desperate encounter the Assyrians claim to have won the day, killing 14,000 (or according to another account 20,500), but Shalmaneser seems to have been too crippled to make any further advance. The alliance now appears to have broken up. At any rate, in the next two Assyr. campaigns against Benhadad, in 849 and 846, Ahab takes no part. Syria, from its position, was more exposed to attack than Israel, which was encouraged by this circumstance to attempt the recovery of Ramoth-gilead (1 K 22[1]). During Benhadad's reign hostilities between the two kingdoms usually took the form of guerilla warfare, bands of the Syrians continually breaking into the country and carrying off spoil. Hazael, the murderer and successor of Benhadad II., proved a far more serious enemy. At first, however, he was kept in check by Assyria. In 842 Shalmaneser invaded Syria, defeated Hazael, who was now deserted by his allies, with the loss of 1600 men, but was not successful in his attempt to take Damascus. The other small states, and Jehu among them, did not venture to resist, but sent tribute to Shalmaneser. The account of this campaign is inscribed on what is known as the Black Obelisk in the British Museum (No. 98). One of the sculptures represents Jehu paying tribute to Shalmaneser, and underneath is the following inscription :—'The tribute of Yahuah (Jehu), son of Khumri (Omri !), silver, gold, bowls of gold, vessels of gold, goblets of gold, pitchers of gold, lead, sceptres for the king's hand, (and) staves I received' (see RP v. 41). But towards the end of Jehu's reign Hazael, left unmolested by Assyria, invaded the territory of the Transjordanic tribes with such effect as to reduce them to complete submission (2 K 10[32. 33]). He afterwards invaded the South, taking Gath, and forcing even Jerus. to capitulate. In Israel itself, during the reign of Jehoahaz, the son and successor of Jehu, Hazael's successes were so great that the fighting men were reduced to the merest minimum (2 K 13[7]). The tide of fortune began to turn in the reign of his son Jehoash, who is said to have recovered from Benhadad III. all the cities taken from his father by Hazael. He also defeated an expedition sent out by Amaziah, king of Judah, and proceeded to invest Jerus., where he broke down a large part of the wall and reduced it to submission (2 K 14[13]). It was during his reign that Ramman-nirari, the warlike grandson of Shalmaneser II., defeated the feeble Mari'a, the successor of Benhadad III., and even took Damascus; but it is not certain whether the Israelites were affected by this campaign. The Syrians being thus temporarily crushed, and the Assyrians being at first too much engaged with Eastern affairs, and afterwards too much weakened by internal discords and the feebleness of their rulers to interfere, the kingdom of Isr. continued to gain strength, and reached the height of its power under Jeroboam II., who even 'recovered Damascus and Hamath' (2 K 14[28]).

With Jeroboam's death the kingdom rapidly declined. Divided by political factions, enervated by its moral corruption and social selfishness (Hos 4[11-14], Am 2[8] 4[1] 8[5. 6] etc.), it easily fell a prey to the Assyrians, who gained an accession of strength under the warlike Tiglath-pileser III. (Pul, 2 K 15[19]). With the exception of Pekah, none of the petty kings, who ruled for very short periods, have the least historical importance, except so far as by their folly or selfishness they advanced the ruin of their country. Twice Tiglath-pileser successfully invaded the North, and on both occasions probably Menahem paid tribute, thereby reducing his country to vassalage for the sake of securing his own rule, and in order to obtain money had to impose heavy taxes (2 K 15[19f.]). A spirited effort to resist Assyria was made by Pekah, who, like so many of the kings of Israel, gained his kingdom by the sword. In alliance with Rezin, king of Damascus, he invaded Judah (in 735), in order to depose Ahaz and set up the Syrian Tabeel, with a view to forming an alliance against Assyria (Is 7[1-9]). But Ahaz had already submitted, and sent tribute, to Tiglath-pileser, and in the next year the latter invaded the North and utterly defeated Rezin and other Syrian members of the alliance, capturing and spoiling no fewer than 591 Syrian cities. At the same time the Israelitish cities east of Jordan fell into his hands (2 K 15[29]), and the population was taken captive; some of the Western cities were also taken. Pekah himself was forced to take refuge in Samaria, while the rest of the country was reduced to a desert. The final effort to throw off the Assyr. yoke made by Hoshea, who adopted the fatal policy of allying himself with So (Shabaka), king of Egypt (2 K 17⁴), brought about the invasion of Israel by Shalmaneser, and the final captivity of Israel (in 721).

The most striking feature in the history of the kingdom of Israel is its want of stability. There was no one central bond, either religious or political, to unite the people and infuse a national spirit. The seat of royalty was constantly being changed —Shechem, Tirzah, Samaria. Dynasty followed dynasty; one succeeding the other by violence. The longest, that of Jehu, lasted only five generations. The king generally held his life in his hands, and often had to maintain his authority by acts of terrorism and cruelty. There was no central religious shrine to inspire a common feeling of reverence. Religious worship, if not always absolutely revolting, as in the days of Ahab and Ahaziah, was to a large extent heathenish in its methods and conceptions (Hos 4¹³ 7¹⁴ Am 4⁵ 8¹⁴), and in the declining days of the nation's history exercised no influence on its social life. At the same time the history has its elements of interest. While the Judæans, in their isolated position on the S. hills, were developing that marked national character which has distinguished them from other nations, the Isr. were constantly coming in contact with the Can. and other foreign tribes. From these they derived not merely the evils of a bad religious influence, but also many of the advantages of a higher civilization and culture. Humanly speaking there were greater possibilities in the N. than in the S. Until almost the last page of their history, from Elijah downwards, all the great prophets came from the North, or, like Amos, carried on their work there. If in the more refined worship of Solomon's temple was the germ of the stately ritual of post-exilic Judaism, we must confess that it was in the teaching of Northern prophets, such as Elijah and Hosea, that we can trace the main growth of those spiritual truths which became the precious heritage of the Jews, and through them of the Christian world.

Literature.—Apart from the historical books of OT and the works of the prophets Amos and Hosea, the most important sources of information are the monumental remains, esp. those of Assyria. Collections of these are contained in RP, Schrader, COT. The history has been thoroughly treated in Ewald's HI (Tr. 1883-1885), and those of Wellhausen, Kittel, and Reuss. On archæological questions, Nowack's Heb. Arch. 1894, is by far the best. The 'Books of Kings' in the Speaker's Commentary, though from a critical point of view behind the time, still contains much useful information. A History of the Hebrew People by Professor Kent is an excellent book, and quite up to date. The second volume appeared after this article was written.

ISRAELITE (Jn 1⁴⁷).—See Nathanael.

ISSACHAR (ישׂשכר, pointed by the Massoretes יִשָּׂשכָר* Yissākār, the second ש being ignored, but the true pointing should probably be יֵשׁ שָׂכָר; LXX Swete Ἰσσαχάρ (but Tisch. Ἰσσάχαρ), and so NT, Treg. WH; Ἰσαχάρ TR).—1. The ninth son of Jacob and the fifth of Leah, Gn 30¹⁸ 35²³ etc. The meaning of the name is uncertain. Probably it means 'there is a reward' (cf. Jer 31¹⁶, 2 Ch 15⁷); if Wellhausen's suggestion (Text der Bücher. Sam. 95), that the name should be interpreted as אִישׁ שָׂכָר, is correct, it will probably mean 'hired labourer,' though it might also be translated 'man of reward,' whatever the precise sense of that might be. In favour of the view that it means 'hired labourer' is the character given to the tribe in the Blessing of Jacob (Gn 49¹⁴· ¹⁵). Kuenen (ThT v. 292 f.) has inferred from this passage that it is to its subject condition that the tribe owes its name. Ball (SBOT Genesis, on Gn 30¹⁸) thinks it may mean 'Sokar's man,' Sokar or Seker being an Egyptian god, but perhaps is a designation of the tribal totem, meaning 'The Red' and referring to the ass (cf. Gn 49¹⁴). In Genesis a double explanation of the name is given. J accounts for it by the fact that Leah hired Jacob from Rachel with the mandrakes found by Reuben (Gn 30¹⁶). E interprets it as a reward conferred by God on Leah, because she had given Zilpah to Jacob (v.¹⁸).

* Ben-Naphtali (Baer, Gen. p. 84) points יִשָּׂשְׂכָר.

Our knowledge of the tribe is very meagre. Its territory in Palestine is of uncertain extent, for the delimitation of its boundaries in Jos 19¹⁷·⁻³ is from P (cf. Dillm. ad loc., and Moore on Jg 5¹⁵). It lay S. of Zebulun and Naphtali, and N. of Manasseh. On the E. it was bounded by the Jordan. Whether it ever reached the sea is uncertain (see Dt 33¹⁸· ¹⁹). Probably it remained an inland tribe. Its lot included nominally the very fertile plain of Esdraelon, but this was for the most part in the possession of the Canaanites. Robinson says: 'We were greatly struck with the richness and productiveness of the splendid plains, especially of Lower Galilee, including that of Esdraelon. . . . Zebulun and Issachar had the cream of Palestine' (B. R. P² iii. 160). Since the tribe is not mentioned in Jg 1, we do not know anything of the circumstances of its settlement in Palestine. Apparently both Deborah and Barak belonged to it, and in Deborah's Song (Jg 5¹⁵) it is mentioned as having taken part in the battle against Sisera. One of the judges, Tola, is said to have belonged to it (Jg 10¹· ², on the text of which see Moore's note). Baasha, who conspired against, slew, and succeeded Nadab the son of Jeroboam I., also sprang from this tribe (1 K 15²⁷). In the Blessing of Jacob (Gn 49¹⁴· ¹⁵) the tribe is taunted with its indolent preference of undisturbed enjoyment of its fruitful land to independence. The reference would be to a later period than the conflict with Sisera, in which it had taken a distinguished part. No reproach is uttered in the Blessing of Moses (Dt 33¹⁸· ¹⁹). The latter passage is obscure (see Driver's note), but it apparently refers to the possession by Zebulun and Issachar of sanctuaries to which non-Israelites ('the peoples') resorted, and to material advantages which these tribes thus secured. 'The peoples' (v.¹⁹) would probably be Phœnicians, on account of the reference to 'the abundance of the seas.'

According to P the numbers of this tribe at the first census amounted to 54,400 (Nu 1²⁹), at the second to 64,300 (26²⁵); while the Chronicler gives the number in the time of David as 145,600. Unfortunately we can attach no weight to any of these figures.

2. Mentioned in the Chronicler's list of Korahite doorkeepers as the seventh son of Obed-edom (1 Ch 26⁵).

ISSHIAH (יִשִּׁיָּה).—1. One of the heads of the tribe of Issachar, 1 Ch 7³ (AV Ishiah). 2. A Korahite who joined David at Ziklag, 1 Ch 12⁶ (AV Jesiah). 3. The son of Uzziel, 1 Ch 23²⁰ (AV Jesiah), 24²⁵. 4. A Levite, 1 Ch 24²¹. See Genealogy.

ISSHIJAH (יִשִּׁיָּה).—One of those who had married a foreign wife, Ezr 10³¹ (AV Ishijah), called in 1 Es 9³² Aseas.

ISSUE.—See Medicine.

ISTALCURUS (A Ἰστάλκουρος, B Ἰστάκαλκος) 1 Es 8⁴⁰.—'Uthi the son of Istalcurus' here stands for 'Uthai and Zabbud' in Ezr 8¹⁴ (A καὶ Ζαβούδ, B om.). The name is apparently a corruption of the form in the Kĕrê וְזַכּוּר ('and Zaccur'). See Zabbud.

ITALA VERSION.—See Versions.

ITALIAN BAND.—See Augustus' Band.

ITALY (Ἰταλία), the geog. term for the country containing the headquarters of the Rom. empire, was originally applied only to the S. part of the peninsula round the Gulf of Tarentum. It was afterwards extended to include all the country to the foot of the Alps. Jews first attained prominence in Italy after the triumph of Pompey, B.C. 62, and, under the protection of Julius Cæsar, they rapidly increased in numbers. They seem to have characteristically appropriated a quarter of the capital, and spread to other cities. Horace (Sat. I. ix. 69, 'vin' tu curtis Judæis oppedere') and Juvenal (Sat. iii. 296 and xiv. 96, 'Judaicum ediscunt jus') speak of them as a constant element in the population. In A.D. 50 an imperial edict of Claudius banished the Jews from Rome, possibly owing to riots between the latter and the Christians (Suet. Claud. xxv.) as to the claims of Christ to be the Messiah. Aquila and Priscilla are mentioned among the exiles (Ac 18^2) from I., which is apparently used as almost synonymous with Rome. See, further, Schürer, HJP II. ii. 232 ff., and the Literature cited there.

Cornelius, the first Gentile convert to Christianity, is described as a member of the Italian band or cohort (Ac 10^1), i.e. the regiment recruited in I., and consisting of native Italians, as distinguished from troops levied in the provinces. See AUGUSTUS' BAND.

I. is again mentioned as the destination of St. Paul (Ac 27^1) when he appealed to Cæsar. The ship on which the prisoners were embarked was on its way back to Adramyttium in Mysia, and would call at several ports on the coast of Asia, at one of which the centurion intended to transfer his charges to a vessel bound for Rome. This shows the existence of a considerable trade between that city and the Mediter. ports. The expression in He 13^{24} 'they of I. (οἱ ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰταλίας) salute you,' is of too uncertain meaning to decide anything as to either the destination or the place of composition of this Epistle.

Christianity was introduced into I. in early times, probably on the return of the Roman Jews who are called 'strangers from Rome' (Ac 2^{10}) to their native country after the Feast of Pentecost. The Ep. to the Romans, written about A.D. 58, points to the existence of a numerous body of Christians in that city who were partly Jews and partly Gentiles (Ro 1^{13}). C. H. PRICHARD.

ITERATE.—Sir 41^{23} 'Of iterating and speaking again, that which thou hast heard' (ἀπὸ δευτερώσεως, RV 'Of repeating'). Cf. Knox, Works, iii. 56, 'I knaw ye will say, it [the Mass] is none uther sacrifice, but the self same, save that it is iteratit and renewit'; Boyle, Works, iv. 552, 'Having wiped and cleansed away the spot, I iterated the experiment.' The mod. 'reiterate' is scarcely equivalent. J. HASTINGS.

ITHAI (אֲתַי).—A Benjamite, one of David's heroes, 1 Ch 11^{31}. In the parallel passage 2 S 23^{29}, the name is אִתַּי ITTAI (wh. see).

ITHAMAR (אִיתָמָר 'island of palms' (?)*) is known to us only from P and the Chronicler. According to these writers I. was the youngest son of Aaron by Elisheba (Ex 6^{23}, Nu 3^2 26^{60}, 1 Ch 6^3 24^1). Together with his three brothers, and Aaron their father, he was consecrated to the priesthood (Ex 28^1), but the two elder brothers Nadab and Abihu were slain for offering strange fire (Lv 10; cf. Nu 3^4 26^{61}, 1 Ch 24^2).

During the wilderness wanderings the tabernacle and its equipment, together with the Gershonites and Merarites, were under the supreme direction of Ithamar (Ex 38^{21}, Nu $4^{28.\ 33}$, 7^8). In the reign of David the families of Eleazar and I. are said to have been divided into courses in the proportion of two to one (cf. 1 Ch $24^{3.\ 4}$). The compiler of the books of Chronicles represents the high priesthood as descending in unbroken succession until the captivity in the family of Eleazar (1 Ch $6^{3\text{-}14}$). But in the earlier historical books we find the ark under the charge of Eli and his descendants, and a comparison of 1 Ch 24^3, 1 S 22^9, 14^3 would suggest that Eli belonged to the house of I. Josephus expressly states that this was the case (Ant. VIII. i. 3). See High Priest under PRIESTS AND LEVITES. W. C. ALLEN.

* See Hommel, Anc. Heb. Trad. 116; Gray, Heb. Proper Names, 246 n.

ITHIEL (אִיתִיאֵל, prob. 'with me is God').—1. A Benjamite (Neh 11^7). See GENEALOGY. 2. One of two persons to whom Agur addressed his oracular sayings, the other being Ucal (Pr 30^1). Neither LXX nor Vulg. recognizes a proper name here, and most modern commentators point differently, לְאִיתִיאֵל לְאִיתִי אֵל וְאֻכָל instead of לְאִיתִיאֵל וְאֻכָל, and tr. 'I have wearied myself, O God, I have wearied myself, O God, and am consumed.' So RVm. H. A. WHITE.

ITHLAH (יִתְלָה, B Σειλαθά, A Ἰεθλά, AV Jethlah).—A town of Dan, near Aijalon, Jos 19^{42}. The site is unknown.

ITHMAH (יִתְמָה).—A Moabite, one of David's heroes, 1 Ch 11^{46}.

ITHNAN (יִתְנָן).—A city in the Negeb of Judah (Jos 15^{23}) whose site is uncertain. It is preceded by Hazor and followed by Ziph. In the B text of the LXX it is combined with the former of these names, Ἀσοριωνάιν, and in A with the latter Ἰθναζίφ, although Luc. has Ἰθνάν, Ζείφ.

ITHRA (יִתְרָא 'abundance' (?), Ἰοθόρ). — The father of Amasa, and husband of Abigail, David's sister. He is described as an Israelite (2 S 17^{25}), but the Chronicler undoubtedly has the better reading, 'Jether the Ishmaelite' (1 Ch 2^{17} יֶתֶר הַיִּשְׁמְעֵאלִי; B Ἰοθόρ, A Ἰεθέρ), which is also given by A at 2 S 17. See JETHER.

ITHRAN (יִתְרָן).—1. Eponym of a Horite clan, Gn 36^{26}, 1 Ch 1^{41}. 2. An Asherite chief, 1 Ch 7^{37}, possibly identical with Jether of the following verse. See GENEALOGY.

ITHREAM (יִתְרְעָם 2 S 3^5; B Ἰεθεραάμ, A Ἐιεθεραάμ; 1 Ch 3^3 Ἰθαράμ, A Ἰεθράμ, Jethraam), the sixth son of David by EGLAH (wh. see), born to him at Hebron.

ITHRITE, THE (הַיִּתְרִי; B ὁ Αἰθειραῖος, ὁ Ἐθθεναῖος, ὁ Ἡθηρεί [א ὁ Ἰθηρεί], Ἰοθηρεί; A Ἐθραῖος, Τεθρίτης, Ἰεθερί), a gentilic adjective applied to the descendants of a family of Kiriath-jearim (1 Ch 2^{53}), amongst whom were two of David's guard (2 S 23^{38}, 1 Ch 11^{40} IRA and GAREB). Possibly, however, the text of 2 S 23 and 1 Ch 11 should be pointed הַיַּתִּרִי='the Jattirite' (so Thenius, Klostermann, Budde), i.e. an inhabitant of Jattir (mentioned in 1 S 30^{27} as one of David's haunts) in the hill-country of Judah (Jos 15^{48} 21^{14}). The Peshiṭta (2 S 23^{38a}, 1 Ch 11^{40} bis) reads יַתִּרִי (=of Jattir), cf. its rendering 2 S 20^{26}. J. F. STENNING.

ITS.—'Its' does not occur in AV of 1611. But in Lv 25^5 'it' was used where we should now use 'its' ('That which groweth of it owne accord of thy harvest, thou shalt not reape'), and in 1660 this was changed into 'its,' and is so printed in all modern editions. That is the only place in which even in modern edd. the word is found.

There is no doubt that about 1611 'its' had begun to struggle for recognition. But it is not once used by Spenser; and although it is found nine times in Shakespeare's First Folio (five of these in Winter's Tale), it is suspected that they were all introduced after his death. Bacon has it very rarely; Milton three times in his poetry (PL i. 254, iv. 813; Ode on Nativity, 106) and twice in his prose. By the time of Milton's death the word was established in the language.

The third pers. pron. in Anglo-Saxon was—

	Mas.	Fem.	Neut.
Nom.	hē	heo	hit
Gen.	his	hire	his

The mas. forms are still in use; the fem. were both changed early; the nom. of the neut. lost its h, but retained his as the regular form for the gen. (i.e. possessive) up to the time we have spoken of. Consequently in AV his is the usual poss. case of 'it' as well as of 'he.' Thus Gn 3^{15} 'it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel' (Tind. 'And that seed shall tread the on the heed, and thou shalt tread hit on the hele'); Lv 23^{37} 'everything upon his day'; Nu 20^{8} 'speak ye unto the rock, and it shall give forth his water'; Pr 23^{31} 'Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth his colour in the cup, when it moveth itself (1611 it selfe) aright'; 2 Es 4^{19} 'the sea also hath his place to bear his floods'; Wis 19^{20} 'The fire had power in the water, forgetting his own virtue; and the water forgat his own quenching nature.'

But when the poss. of both genders was the same there was always the risk of some confusion. Examples that need attention are, Lv 1^{15} 'And the priest shall bring it unto the altar, and wring off his (RV 'its') head, and burn it on the altar'; 1 S 6^{9} 'if it goeth up by the way of his own coast to Bethshemesh' (RV 'its own border'); 2 S 6^{17} 'And they brought in the ark of the LORD, and set it in his place' (RV 'its'); Dn 7^{9} 'I beheld till the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool: his (mas.) throne was like the fiery flame, and his (neut.) wheels (RV 'the wheels thereof') as burning fire'); Mt 6^{33} 'But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness' (i.e. 'God's righteousness; but Tind. has 'the kyngdome of heven and the rightwisnes therof,' and he is followed by Cov., Cran., and Gen.; Rhem. 'the justice of him'; Bish. as AV, which is practically the tr^{n} of Wyc. 'seke ye first the kyngdom of god and his rightfulnesse'; RV 'But seek ye first his kingdom, and his righteousness,' omitting τοῦ θεοῦ with edd.); 1 Co 15^{38} 'But God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to every seed his own body' (RV 'a body of its own').

Various methods were adopted to avoid confusion between 'his' mas. and neut. (1) The use of 'it' for the poss. is regarded as a dialectic peculiarity, belonging to the North-Western counties. Its single occurrence in AV (Lv 25^{5}) comes from the Geneva version.* Its presence in Shaks. is sometimes due to imitation of the language of childhood; thus King John II. i. 160—

> 'Go to it grandam, child:
> Give grandam kingdom, and it grandam will > Give it a plum, a cherry, and a fig.'

But this is not always the case; and examples may be quoted from other authors, as Judgement of Synode of Dort (1619), p. 9, 'Election . . . is to bee propounded with the spirit of discretion, religiously, and holily, in it place and time.' Indeed the often occurring 'it self' in AV 1611, is an example just as good as 'it own': cf. Bp. Hall, Works, ii. 79 ('Contemplations,' bk. iii.), 'Why may wee not distinguish of fire, as it is it selfe, a bodily creature, and as it is an instrument of God's justice, so working, not by any materiall vertue, or power of it owne, but by a certain height of supernaturall efficacie, to which it is exalted by the omnipotence of that supreme and righteous Judge?' (2) Occasionally the was used for 'his,' as in Robynson's tr^{n} of More's Utopia (Lumby's ed. p. 101), 'They marveile also that golde, whych of the owne nature is a thing so unprofytable, is nowe amonge all people in so hyghe estimation.' (3) Sometimes the noun was personified and the fem. her then used. This is Milton's favourite device, as in Hymn on Nativity, 140—

> 'And Hell it self will pass away,
> And leave her dolorous mansions to the peering day.'

Cf. Tindale's tr^{n} of Nu $4^{9.10}$ 'And they shall take a cloth of Iacyncte and cover the candelsticke of light and hir lampes and hir snoffers and fyre pannes and all hir oyle vessels which they occupye aboute it, and shall put apon her and on all hir instrumentes, a coverynge of taxus skynnes, and put it apon staves.' So in AV, Jon 1^{15} 'the sea ceased from her raging'; Rev 22^{2} 'the tree of life, which . . . yielded her fruit every month.' (4) Occasionally 'of it' was adopted, as Dn 7^{5} 'it had three ribs in the mouth of it, between the teeth of it.' (5) Very often the phrase was slightly turned, and 'thereof' used, as by Fuller, Pisgah Sight, p. 40, 'Twice was it [Solomon's Temple] pillaged by foreign foes, and four times by her own friends before the final destruction thereof.' But 'the most curious thing of all in the history of the word "its" is the extent to which, before its recognition as a word admissible in serious composition, even the occasion for its employment was avoided or eluded. This is very remarkable in Shakespeare. The very conception which we express by "its" probably does not occur once in his works for ten times that it is to be found in any modern writer. So that we may say the invention, or adoption, of this form has changed not only our English style, but even our manner of thinking.'—Craik, Eng. of Shaks. p. 103.

J. HASTINGS.

ITTAI ('אִתַּי, perh. 'companionable').—1. A native of Gath, whence he was banished (?) (2 S 15^{19}) with 600 followers, who with their families (v.^{22}) joined David not long (v.^{20}) before the revolt of Absalom. ('After him,' etc., in v.^{18} refers to Ittai, whose name has probably dropped out. So Wellhausen in Driver, Heb. Text of Sam. ad loc.). Ewald, following Jos. (Ant. VII. ix. 2), identifies this band with the 600 whom David commanded when an outlaw (1 S 23^{13} 25^{13} 27^{2} 30^{9}), and these, again, with the gibborim (mighty men), reading, after Thenius, in v.^{18} gibborim for Gittim. The LXX and Vulg. are cited as supporting this emendation; but the LXX here is at once conflated and defective. The genuine LXX (acc. to Wellhausen) and the Vulg. interpolation are merely explanatory of 'Cherethites—Gittites.' The gibborim of 2 S 16^{6} included the Cherethites, etc.; see also 2 S 23^{8}. David's original followers were Hebrews (1 S 22^{2}), but Ittai's 600 were Philistines (2 S 15^{18} 'from Gath,' ^{20} 'thy brethren'); on the other hand they were different from the Cherethites, etc., whose captain was Benaiah. It may be added that the phrase 'the Gittith' (titles of Ps 8. 81. 84) is rendered by Hitzig and Delitzsch 'a march of the Gittite guan[illegible].'

* The LXX is τὰ αὐτόματα ἀναβαίνοντα. In Ac 12^{10} the same Gr. word (ἥτις αὐτομάτη ἠνοίχθη [edd. ἠνοίγη] αὐτοῖς) is tr^{d} in AV 'the iron gate . . . which opened to them of his own accord.' In Luther's Bible Lv 25^{5} is von ihm selber; Ac 12^{10} von ihr selbst. The Gen. NT has in Ac 12^{10} 'which opened to them by it owne accorde.'

The scene in which we first meet Ittai (2 S 15^{19-22}) almost surpasses the parting of Naomi and her daughters-in-law as a portrayal of noble unselfishness, and of intense personal devotion. David, never so kingly as when in affliction, urges Ittai, as a stranger (נֵכְרִי), to retire from a desperate cause, bids him either engage in the service of the new king, or return home to Gath, and dismisses him with a gracious benediction. Ittai in reply, swearing by the God of Israel, affirms an undying loyalty. In the battle with Absalom, Ittai was one of David's three generals (2 S $18^{2.5.12}$). It is possible that he fell in the engagement, as we hear of him no more. Jerome (Qu. Heb. on 1 Ch 20^{2}) cites a tradition that it was not David but Ittai that took the crown off the head of the Ammonite idol Milcom, it being forbidden to a Hebrew to take, with his own hands, gold or silver from an idol. 2. 2 S 23^{29} (1 Ch 11^{31} Ithai אִתַּי) one of David's heroes. N. J. D. WHITE.

ITURÆA is the EV translation of the first term in St. Luke's description of Philip's tetrarchy (τῆς Ἰτουραίας καὶ Τραχωνίτιδος χώρας, Lk 3^{1}, AV 'Ituræa and the region of Trachonitis'). But Ramsay has shown (Expositor, 1894, ix. pp. 51 ff., 143 ff., 288 ff.) that the word is not used as a noun by any writer before Eusebius in the 4th cent. after Christ, and doubtfully even by him (so not even in Jos. Ant. XIII. xi. 3, where Niese reads Ἰτουραίους; nor in Appian, Civ. v. 7: read τὴν Ἰτουραίων). Strabo calls it τὴν Ἰτουραίων ὀρεινήν (XVI. ii. 16), and τὰ Ἀράβων μέρη καὶ τῶν Ἰτουραίων (XVI. ii. 20), and Dio Cassius, τὴν τῶν Ἰτουραίων τῶν Ἀράβων (lix. 12). Epiphanius (adv. Hæres. xix. 1) uses the adjective ἀπὸ τῆς Ναβατικῆς χώρας καὶ Ἰτουραίας, and Ramsay (op. cit. 289 n. 2) argues for the adjectival meaning of Ἰτουραῖοι even in Euseb. (Onom. ed. Lag. 268, 298), and more doubtfully in Jerome's translation. Elsewhere, in Greek and Latin authors, it is the name of the people which is given, Ἰτουραῖοι, Ituræi, Ityrei, etc. 'There remains, then, no single passage in ancient literature to justify the noun which has been forced on Luke' (Ramsay, 289), which noun, further, would render the sentence 'degenerate Greek,' 'in utter disregard of the rules of Greek expression as observed by the older classical authors' (ib. 144).

The Ituræans were well known to the Romans as a race of hardy archers, and they frequently appear in the pages of Latin writers. They fought with Cæsar in the African war (Bell. Afric. 20), and formed a bodyguard for Mark Antony when he was triumvir, rattling with their arms through the forum to the indignation of Cicero (Philipp. ii. 19, 112, xiii. 18). Virgil sings them, 'Ituræos taxi torquentur in arcus' (Georg. ii. 448), and Lucan, 'Ituræis cursus fuit inde sagittis' (Pharsal. vii. 230), 'tunc et Ituræi Medique Arabesque soluto arcu turba minax' (ib. vii. 514). In A.D. 110 there was a 'cohors I Augusta Ituræorum sagittariorum' (CIL t. iii. 868). About A.D. 255 we have the statement 'habes sagittarios Ityræos trecentos' (Vopiscus, Vita Aureliani, c. 11), and in his Gazetteer of the geographical terms of the Latin poets, Vibius Sequester (c. A.D. 500) names them as 'Ithyrei, vel Itharei, Syrii usu sagittæ periti' (ed. Hesselii, 155).

The quotations given above from Strabo, Appian, and Lucan* call them or associate them with both Arabs and Syrians; and, as Schürer points out (HJP I. ii. App. I. 'History of Chalcis, Ituræa, and Abilene,' 326), the proper names of Ituræan soldiers, mentioned in Latin inscriptions, are Syrian (cf. Münter, de Rebus Ituræorum, 1824, 8–10, 40 ff.; CIL t. iii. n. 4371; C. I. Rhenan, ed. Brambach, 1233 f.). This agrees with the position assigned to them on and about the skirts of the Lebanons; and considering the incessant drift upon these parts of nomad Arabs from the neighbouring deserts, we ought probably to see in the Ituræans the descendants of Jetur (יְטוּר) mentioned in Gn 25^{15} and 1 Ch 1^{31} as among the sons of Ishmael, i.e. as Arabian desert tribes. Eupolemus (c. B.C. 150), quoted by Eusebius (Præp. Evang. ix. 30), mentions Ituræans along with Ammonites, Moabites, Nabatæans, etc., as among the objects of David's campaigns E. of the Jordan.

Because of this semi-nomadic state and this gradual drift from the desert to the fertile parts of Syria, the exact territory of the Ituræans is difficult, if not impossible, to define. Josephus places the Ituræan kingdom in or upon the N. of Galilee in B.C. 105 (Ant. XIII. xi. 3), when Aristobulus having defeated them added a large part of their territory to Judæa. Upon an inscription of about A.D. 6 (Ephemeris Epigraphica, 1881, 537–542) Q. Æmilius Secundus relates that being sent by Quirinius 'adversus Ituræos in Libano monte castellum eorum cepi.' Dio Cassius (xlix. 32) calls Lysanias, who ruled Lebanon from Damascus to the sea with his capital at Chalcis, king of the Ituræans; and the same writer (lix. 12) and Tacitus (Ann. xii. 23) call Soemus, who was tetrarch in Lebanon (Jos. Vita, 11), their governor; while Strabo places them in Anti-Lebanon with their centre at Chalcis in the Beka'. This evidence appears to prove Schürer's conclusion, that Anti-Lebanon and the valley to the east was the centre of the Ituræans just before and at the beginning of the Christian era; and Ramsay's contention, that 'the true home of such a race is not the long-settled and well-governed land between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon,' conflicts not only with the data of classical writers, but with the constant proof of how rich lands in Syria were being overrun and occupied by nomadic tribes from the desert. It is probable, however, that the Ituræans extended their influence eastwards and south-eastwards from Anti-Lebanon. About B.C. 25 Zenodorus leased the domains of Lysanias, whom Dio Cassius (xlix. 32) calls king of the Ituræans, and Zenodorus' territory included Ulatha, Paneas, and the country round about. The question remains, whether the 'Ituræan region' extended so far as to include or overlap Trachonitis, the country around the Trachons, one of which is the modern Lejá. Ramsay maintains that, both according to St. Luke's statement and as a matter of fact, it did. But of the latter there is absolutely no evidence before Eusebius in the 4th cent., and in face of such silence his testimony about the east of the Jordan in the beginning of the 1st cent. cannot be allowed to prevail. In the absence of evidence, the following facts are all we have to go by. Names have been constantly in drift in that part of Syria, and as Philo extended over all Philip's tetrarchy the name of its eastern portion Trachonitis (Legat. ad Gaium, 41) it is possible that the adjective 'Ituræan' may likewise have been sometimes extended eastward so as to cover Trachonitis, especially as the Ituræans themselves were probably driven in that direction after the Romans took their Lebanon territory from them. At the same time, Strabo, writing after this was accomplished, still treats of Ituræa and Trachonitis as distinct. Whether, therefore, St. Luke meant by his phrase τῆς Ἰτουραίας καὶ Τραχωνίτιδος χώρας 'two distinct portions of Philip's tetrarchy or two equivalent or overlapping names for it; and whether on either of these interpretations of his words he was correct —are questions to which the geographical data of the 1st cent. supply us with no certain answer.'* Besides the literature quoted above, see the present writer's HGHL 544 ff., and Expositor, 1894, viii. 406, ix. 51 ff., 143 ff., 231 ff., 331 f.

IVORY (שֵׁן shēn, ἐλεφάντινος).—The word shēn signifies a tooth, and is freq. employed in its orig. sense in OT (Ex 21^{24}, Lv 24^{20} etc.). It is also freq. used in the sense of ivory, as being the elephant's tooth (AVm 1 K 10^{22}; see שְׁנְהַבִּים under Elephant). Once ivory is spoken of as 'horns of teeth,' קַרְנוֹת שֵׁן (Ezk 27^{15}). The word horns alludes to the shape of the tusk, but its construction with teeth shows that the Hebrews understood what ivory really was. The context always makes it clear when shēn should be rendered ivory.

In Ps 45^{8} הֵיכְלֵי שֵׁן prob. refers to palaces or chambers in them, inlaid with ivory (cf. בָּתֵּי הַשֵּׁן Am 3^{15}, and גִּית הַשֵּׁן 1 K 22^{39}). Chambers with elaborate panellings of ivory and ebony exist in Damascus and other cities of the East to-day. Tables, stands, screens, picture-frames, pipes, and many other articles, inlaid with ivory, mother-of-pearl, silver and gold, are found in the houses of well-to-do people in the East. Solomon imported large quantities of ivory (1 K 10^{22}). His throne was made of it (1 K 10^{18-20}). It was also used for making or inlaying couches (Am 6^{4}), and the benches of galleys (Ezk 27^{6}).

The Egyp. and Assyr. monuments allude to the trade in ivory, and porters bearing tusks are figured on them. Among the merchandise of Babylon (Rev 18^{12}) were vessels of ivory. It was probably brought to Pal. by the caravans ('travelling companies') of Dedanîm (Is 21^{13}), as well as the ships of Tarshish (1 K 10^{22}). The 'tower of ivory' (Ca 7^{4}) may have been a tower richly ornamented with this substance, or a figure to illustrate the whiteness of the bride's neck, as we say 'a snowy neck,' or 'an alabaster arm.'

G. E. Post.

IVVAH (עִוָּה; LXX variants are numerous, see Swete).—According to 2 K 18^{34} (wanting in B of LXX), 19^{13} (=Is 37^{13}; the name is wanting in both MT and LXX of Is 36^{19}) a city conquered by the Assyrians, named along with Sepharvaim and Hena. It is frequently identified with Avva (עַוָּא), whence, according to 2 K 17^{24}, Sargon (but see Winckler, Alttest. Untersuchungen, 100 ff.) brought colonists to Samaria. Regarding Avva no information is to be gathered from the inscriptions (Schrader, KAT^{2} 281, 384 [COT^{2} i. 273, ii. 8]). Hommel (Expos. Times, April, 1898, p. 330 f.) supports the view that Hena and Ivvah (or, as he prefers, Avvah) are not places at all, but the names of the two chief gods of the three Syrian cities, Hamath, Arpad, and Sepharvaim. (For the grounds of this conclusion and the various stages through which he holds the MT to have passed before reaching its present form in 2 K $17^{30f.}$, see the article just cited). Winckler (op. cit.), on the other hand, considers that the parallelism, not to speak of other reasons, requires in 2 K 18^{34} 19^{13} (=Is 37^{13}) one place name, which, judging from the variety of LXX readings, has been ill preserved, but may have been Avvah or Ivvah, and must have designated a city coming within the sphere of vision of the Jews—probably situated, like Sepharvaim, in Syria.

J. A. Selbie.

IVY (κίσσος, hedera).—This plant was sacred to Bacchus. The Jews were compelled, at the time of the feast of this god, to carry ivy in procession in his honour (2 Mac 6^{7}). The 'corruptible crown' (1 Co 9^{25}) of the Isthmian games was sometimes made of its leaves, at other times it was a garland of pine. The ivy, Hedera Helix, L., grows wild in Pal. and Syria, and climbs up the faces of the cliffs along the coast and to the middle zone of the mountain ranges.

IYE-ABARIM (עִיֵּי הָעֲבָרִים 'Iyim of the regions beyond,' distinguishing this place from the Iim of Jos 15^{29}).—The station following Oboth mentioned in Nu 21^{11} 33^{44} and described (21^{11}) as 'in the wilderness which is before Moab toward the sunrising,' and more briefly (33^{44}) as 'in the border of Moab.' Nothing is known as to its position beyond these indications. The versions, though affording no geographical information, are interesting in their renderings of the first word; the LXX of 21^{11} has Χαλγλεί B, with a variant Ἀχελγαί in A, and (perhaps) F, and in $33^{44.45}$ Γαί. The Syriac takes the word as עֵין 'fountain,' Targ. Onk. has מבוע as its equivalent in 21^{11} and 33^{44}, and in 33^{45}. This word is used for a ford or passage in Targ. of 1 S 13^{23} 14^{4}, and in Targ. Jon. of Gn 32^{23}. See, further, Dillm. on Nu 21^{10}.

A. T. Chapman.

IYIM (עִיִּים 'heaps' or 'ruins').—Short form of Iye-abarim in Nu 33^{45}. See Iye-abarim for renderings of the VSS.

IYYAR (אִיָּר, Ἰάρ).—See Time.

IZHAR (יִצְהָר 'fresh oil' or 'shining').—Son of Kohath the son of Levi, Ex $6^{18.21}$, Nu 3^{19} 16^{1} P, 1 Ch $6^{2.18.38}$ $23^{12.18}$; patron. Izharites, Nu 3^{27}, 1 Ch 24^{22} $26^{23.29}$.

IZLIAH (יִזְלִיאָה, AV Jezliah).—A Benjamite, head of a 'father's house,' 1 Ch 8^{18}. See Genealogy.

IZRAHIAH (יִזְרַחְיָה 'J" will arise or shine').—A chief of the tribe of Issachar, 1 Ch 7^{3}. See Genealogy.

IZRAHITES (הַיִּזְרָחִי).—Gentilic name in 1 Ch 27^{8}, but should probably be read הַיִּזְרָחִי, which is possibly another form of זַרְחִי Zerahites vv.$^{11.13}$. See Genealogy.

IZRI (יִזְרִי).—Chief of one of the Levitical choirs, 1 Ch 25^{11}, called in v.^{3} Zeri. See Genealogy.

IZZIAH (יִזִּיָּה 'J" will sprinkle'?) AV Jeziah.—One of those who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10^{25}), called in 1 Es 9^{26} Ieddias. See Genealogy.

* The identification of the name Jetur or Ituræan with the modern Jedur (i.e. Gedur) to the S. of Damascus, is philologically impossible.

J.—The symbol used by critics for the Jahwistic document. See HEXATEUCH.

JAAKAN.—See BEEROTH-BENE-JAAKAN.

JAAKOBAH (יַעֲקֹבָה).—A Simeonite prince, 1 Ch 4^{36}. See GENEALOGY.

JAALA (יַעְלָא Neh 7^{58}) or JAALAH (יַעְלָה Ezr 2^{56}).—The name of a family of the 'sons of Solomon's servants' who returned to Palestine with Zerubbabel. In 1 Es 5^{33} Jeeli. See GENEALOGY.

JAAR (יַעַר).—Usually in OT a common noun, meaning forest or wooded height, e.g. Jos 17^{15}, Hos 2^{14}. Once only as proper name, RVm of Ps 132^{6} 'We found it in the field of Jaar.' Here, according to some of the best authorities, it is a poetical name for Kiriath-jearim, 'forest town,' cf. Ps 78^{12} 'field of Zoan.' The name of this place appears in several forms, see Jos $15^{9.\ 60}$, 2 S 6^{2}, and in 1 Ch 13^{5} an account is given of the bringing up of the ark from Kiriath-jearim, where it had lain for twenty years after its restoration by the Philistines. The rendering of this obscure verse,—conjectured to be a fragment of antique song,—which was first suggested by Kühnöl, and has been adopted by Delitzsch, Perowne, and most moderns, would make it run thus: 'We heard of it (the ark) as being at Ephrathah, we found it in the field of Jaar (i.e. Kiriath-jearim).' Baethgen, however, understands the word as an appellative, 'auf waldigem Gefilde' (cf. LXX ἐν ταῖς δασέσι τοῦ δρυμοῦ, and Jerome 'in regione saltus'; so RV (text) 'in the field of the wood'), referring 'it' to the oath of David quoted in vv.$^{3-5}$, reading 'published' (הוֹדִיעָנוּ) for 'found' (מְצָאנוּ), and supposing the 'wooded field' to be a poetical designation of the country at large. Similarly Ew. (so Targ.), though he explains the 'field of the wood' of Lebanon as representing N. Palestine. However, the general drift of the reference to the ark can hardly be mistaken.

W. T. DAVISON.

JAARE-OREGIM (יַעְרֵי אֹרְגִים; BA Ἀριωργείμ, other MSS Ἀρωρί; saltus polymitarius), according to 2 S 21^{19}, a Beth-lehemite, the father of Elhanan, who slew Goliath the Gittite. It is, however, highly probable that the text is corrupt, the former part of the name being a mistake for JAIR (יַעִר for יָעִיר), while the latter half (אֹרְגִים oregim=weavers) has been accidentally repeated from the following line. This view, which is supported by the parallel passage 1 Ch 20^{5} (Kerê בֶּן יָעִיר=son of Jair; Kethibh בֶּן יָעִר), has been adopted by Thenius, Wellh., Driver, and Budde. Klostermann, following the reading of Lucian (Ἐλλανὰν υἱὸς Ἰαδδεὶν υἱοῦ τοῦ Ἐλεμί), prefers to restore 'the son of Dodai the Beth-lehemite' (בֶּן דּוֹדִי בֵּית הַלַּחְמִי, cf. 2 S 23^{24}). The rendering of the Peshiṭta (ܒܪ ܝܥܪ ܐܘܪܓܝܡ ܐܠܚܢܢ) probably points to the same text as the Hebrew (omitting Jaare), though the Arabic, which is based upon it, takes the second word (ܡܠܟ= doctus) as a proper name (Malaph). Similarly the Targum of Jonathan hardly presupposes a different text, since its rendering 'and David the son of Jesse, the weaver of the veils of the house of the sanctuary, who was of Bethlehem, slew Goliath the Gittite' (וקטל דוד בר ישי מחי פרוכית בית מקדשא דמבית לחם יהת גלית גיתאה), is an obvious attempt at harmonizing the present text with 1 S 17. Jerome seems to have read יְעַר=saltus, instead of יְעָרֵי (Jaare), and so far confirms the reading of 1 Ch 20^{5}. For a further discussion of the relation of 1 Ch 20^{5} to 1 S 17 and to 2 S 21^{19}, see SAMUEL (BOOKS OF), and ELHANAN.

J. F. STENNING.

JAARESHIAH (יַעַרְשִׁיָה, perhaps = 'J" fattens,' AV Jaresiah).—A Benjamite chief, 1 Ch 8^{27}.

JAASIEL (יַעֲשִׂיאֵל).—The 'ruler' of Benjamin, 1 Ch 27^{21}, prob. = 'J. the Mezobaite' (which see) of 11^{47}.

JAASU (יַעֲשׁוּ Ezr 10^{37} Kethibh) or JAASAI (יַעֲשַׂי Kerê, so RVm), AV Jaasau.—One of those who had married foreign wives in the time of Ezra. LXX, regardless of the meaning, rendered καὶ ἐποίησαν ('and they did'), i.e. וַיַּעֲשׂוּ for וַיַּעֲשׂ.

JAAZANIAH (יַאֲזַנְיָה 2 K 25^{23}, Ezk 8^{11}; יַאֲזַנְיָהוּ Jer 35^{3}, Ezk 11^{1}, 'J" hears.' See also JEZANIAH. LXX 4 K 25^{23}, B Ὀζονίας, A. Luc. Ἰεζονίας, Ezk 8^{11} 11^{1}, Jer 42^{3} [Heb. 35^{3}], B Ἰεχονίας).—1. A Judæan, styled 'son of the Maacathite,' one of the military commanders who came to Mizpah to give in their allegiance to Gedaliah, the governor of Judah appointed by Nebuchadrezzar (2 K 25^{23}=Jer 40^{8} Jezaniah). After Ishmael, son of Nethaniah, had murdered Gedaliah, and carried captive the Judæans who were left at Mizpah, Jaazaniah, though not mentioned by name, appears to have joined with the other captains of the forces in giving battle to Ishmael and recovering the captives (Jer $41^{11ff.}$). Probably also he was one of those who determined, against the advice of the prophet Jeremiah, to abandon the land of Judah, and to lead the remnant of the people down into Egypt (Jer 42).

2. A chieftain of the clan of the Rechabites, whose fidelity to the commands of his ancestor Jonadab was tested by the prophet Jeremiah as an example to the people of Judah (Jer 35^{3}).

3. Son of Shaphan, who appeared in Ezekiel's vision as ringleader of seventy of the elders of Israel in the practice of secret idolatry at Jerusalem (Ezk 8^{11}).

4. Son of Azzur, one of the princes of the people at Jerusalem, against whose counsels Ezekiel was commanded by J" to prophesy (Ezk $11^{1ff.}$).

C. F. BURNEY.

JAAZIAH (יַעֲזִיָהוּ).—A son of Merari, 1 Ch $24^{26.\ 27}$. The text is hopelessly corrupt. (Cf. Berth. and Oettli, ad loc.; Kittel's proposed restoration of the text and note in Haupt's Sacred Books of OT; and Kautzsch's AT, ad loc.). See GENEALOGY.

JAAZIEL (יַעֲזִיאֵל).—A Levite skilled in the use of the psaltery, 1 Ch 15^{18}, called in v.^{20} Aziel. Kittel (see note, ad loc., in Haupt's SBOT) would correct the text in both instances to עֻזִּיאֵל Uzziel.

JABAL (יָבָל, LXX A Ἰωβέλ, E Ἰωβήδ, Luc. Ἰωβήλ).—Son of Lamech by Adah, and originator of the nomadic form of life, Gn 4^{20} (J). See König in Expos. Times, May, 1898, p. 347[a]. The meaning of the name is quite uncertain; for conjectures see Dillm. ad loc. and Ball in SBOT.

JABBOK (יַבֹּק, Ἰαβόκ).—One of the principal rivers of E. Palestine, now called Wady Zerḳa from the bluish colour of its water. Its course may be indicated thus: take on a map a point 18 miles E. of the Jordan on the latitude of Nâblus, and from it draw a line 18 miles long due south. On this line as diameter, and to the E. of it, draw a semicircle; and from the N. end of its diameter (the point originally taken) draw a line inclining slightly to the S. as far as the edge of the Jordan valley (here about 5 miles from the river); and from that edge draw a line in a S.W. direction to the Jordan. The figure will give approximately the course of Wady Zerka, though in its numerous windings it continually deviates from the outline figure above indicated. In its upper semicircular portion it forms a boundary between east and west; while in its lower portion it forms a boundary between north and south. These two portions are referred to in Nu 21^{24}, where the territory of Sihon is described as extending 'from Arnon unto Jabbok, even unto the children of Ammon'; i.e. the lower portion of the Jabbok formed the N. boundary, while the upper portion formed the E. boundary of Sihon's kingdom; and the verse may be made clear by inserting 'northwards' after Jabbok and 'eastwards' after Ammon. The upper portion is referred to in Dt 2^{37}, where the border of the children of Ammon is described as 'all the side of the river Jabbok.' The river Jabbok is also mentioned as a boundary Dt 3^{16}, Jos 12^{2}, Jg $11^{13.\ 22}$.

One remarkable incident in the patriarchal narratives is connected with this river. Jacob, after sending all that he had over the stream, was left alone to wrestle with the mysterious visitor, and to prevail (Gn $32^{24f.}$ referred to in Hos 12^{4}). The Heb. word for wrestling (from the root אבק), which is used only here, is similar in sound to Jabbok, and it is intended that the name of the river should call to mind this instance of favour shown to the ancestor of the chosen race. A probable derivation of the word is from the root בקק 'pour out.' The river Jabbok is mentioned only in connexion with Jacob, and as a boundary existing at the time of Israel's appearance E. of Jordan, in the passages already noted. A. T. Chapman.

JABESH (יָבֵשׁ).—Father of Shallum, who usurped the kingdom of Israel by the assassination of king Zechariah (2 K $15^{10.\ 13.\ 14}$).

JABESH-GILEAD (יָבֵשׁ גִּלְעָד, also יָבֵשׁ or יָבִישׁ alone in 1 S $11^{1.\ 3.\ 5.\ 9.\ 10}$ $31^{12.\ 13}$, 1 Ch 10^{12}).—While the history of this East Jordan city as furnished in the Bible is meagre, it gives us vivid pictures of both tragic and tender scenes in ancient Hebrew life. In the early period of Jewish history it seems to have been prominent, and later to have fallen into insignificance. Its first appearance is when the Israelites are said to have made a raid upon it with a powerful force, put all the males and married women to death, destroyed the city, and carried off 400 virgins, who became wives to the Benjamites (Jg 21). Afterwards, when it had regained its position of importance, it was attacked by the Ammonites under Nahash, when Saul, to whom the inhabitants appealed for succour, came quickly with his army and utterly routed the enemy (1 S 11). Later, when Saul and his sons were slain in the disaster at Mount Gilboa, and their bodies were being ill-treated by the Philistine conquerors, the men of Jabesh-gilead rushed into the face of death, recovered the bodies, and saw that they were cared for in the kindest manner and buried with proper honours (1 S 31). David, when he was made king at Hebron, remembered this act, and sent special messengers with commendatory blessings to the men of Jabesh-gilead for their heroic devotion to Saul (2 S 2^{5}). Subsequently the bones of Saul and his sons were brought thence by David and buried in the territory of Benjamin (2 S 21^{12-14}).

No doubt the name Jabesh is preserved in the modern Yabis, and when on the line of this stream in the Gilead hills one is near the site of this ancient city. Robinson (BRP^{2} iii. 319 f.) suggested a place, ed-Deir, lying south of Wady Yabis; but this has no ancient ruins, and, besides, it is some distance off the main road. From researches made in this region by the present writer, a more appropriate place would seem to be Miryamin, a point north of Wady Yabis on the ancient road leading over the mountain, where there are massive ancient remains. This is about 7 miles from Pella, and corresponds to the statement of Eusebius in his Onomasticon (268. 81), our best authority in the absence of any special biblical indications as to its site (Merrill, East of the Jordan, p. 439).

JABEZ (יַעְבֵּץ).—A descendant of Judah, who was 'more honourable than his brethren.' His name is traced to the fact that his mother bare him with sorrow (עֹצֶב 'ōẓeb), 1 Ch 4^{9}. The same play upon words recurs in his prayer or vow in the expression לְבִלְתִּי עָצְבִּי 'that it be not to my sorrow,' v.^{10}. (On the correctness of MT see Kittel's note, ad loc., in Haupt's SBOT, and on the possibility of a clause having dropped out, Kautzsch, ad loc., in his AT).

JABEZ (יַעְבֵּץ).—A place inhabited by scribes, apparently in Judah, 1 Ch 2^{55}. The site is unknown.

JABIN (יָבִין 'discerning,' Ἰαβείν, Ἰαβείς).—1. King of Hazor in N. Palestine, defeated by Joshua at the Waters of Merom [Jos 11^{1-9} (JE) $^{10-15}$ (D^{2})].

2. Jabin, 'king of Canaan, that reigned in Hazor,' occurs again in Jg 4. He takes no part in the battle of the Kishon, nor is he mentioned in the ancient song (Jg 5). The introduction of Jabin and of Hazor into this narrative creates many difficulties, and the title 'king of Canaan' arouses suspicion. The probability is that two traditions relating to Jabin and Sisera have been united, and harmonized by making Sisera the captain of Jabin's host (cf. Ps $83^{9.\ 10}$, which implies the union of the two traditions). The Jabin tradition probably preserved an account of the early struggles of Naphtali and Zebulun for their territory in the north. The two clans had made Kedesh their headquarters, and successfully defeated Jabin king of Hazor, who had combined with the neighbouring Canaanites to resist the intruders. This tradition forms the basis of the battle of Merom in Jos 11, which has been generalized by the Deut. redactor, and treated as the conquest of N. Palestine by Joshua and all Israel.

JABNEEL (יַבְנְאֵל 'El causeth to build,' B Ἀεμνά, A Ἰαβνήλ, for other forms see below; in Apocr. Ἰαμνεία or -ία or -νν-, Jebneel, Jabnia, Jamnia).—1. A town on the northern border of Judah, near the sea, mentioned after Ekron, Shikkeron, and Mount Baalah (Jos 15^{11}). It is not mentioned in the lists of cities of Judah, Dan, or Simeon in the Bk. of Joshua, but in Jos 15^{46} LXX substitutes Γεμνά (B) or Ἰεμναί (A), Jabneh, for MT וְיָמָּה 'even unto the sea.' It does not appear again in the OT until 2 Ch 26^{6}, where under the name of Jabneh (יַבְנֶה, LXX B Ἀβεννήρ, A Ἰαβείς) it is captured along with Gath and Ashdod from the Philistines by king Uzziah, and its wall broken down. Josephus (Ant. v. i. 22) describes it as belonging to the tribe of Dan, in company with Gath and Ekron, and mentions it with the inland towns Marissa and Ashdod in contradistinction to the maritime towns Gaza, Joppa, and Dora (Ant. xiv. iv. 4; BJ i. vii. 7). It is spoken of (Jth 2^{28}) under the name of Jemnaan as in fear and dread of Holofernes. Under the name Jamnia (1 Mac 4^{15} 5^{58} 10^{69} 15^{40}) it is referred to as a garrison, with plains near it, Gorgias in command (Ant. xii. viii. 6). In 2 Mac $12^{8.\ 9.\ 40}$

Judas Maccabæus set fire to the haven and navy of Jamnia, so that the light of the fire was seen at Jerusalem, 240 furlongs off. Pliny (HN v. 13) speaks of the two Jamnias 'Jamnes duæ, altera intus,' and places them between Azotus and Joppa. See Reland, Pal. p. 823. Ptolemy (v. 16) speaks of the port of the Jamnites between Azotus and Joppa, and subsequently mentions Jamnia among the cities of Judæa.

In common with Ashkelon, Azotus, and Gaza, the harbour or naval arsenal of Jamnia bore the name of Majumas (Reland, p. 590 f.; Raumer, Kenrick, Phœnicia; Le Quien, Oriens Christ.). Jamnia was taken from the Syrians (c. B.C. 142) by Simon Maccabæus (Ant. XIII. vi. 7; BJ I. ii. 2), and it was restored (B.C. 63) to its inhabitants by Pompey (Ant. XIV. iv. 4); it was repaired or rebuilt (c. B.C. 57) by Gabinius (BJ I. viii. 4), and was given to the Jews by Augustus (B.C. 30). Herod bequeathed (B.C. 4) Jamnia (Ant. XVII. viii. 1) to Salome his sister, and she left it with all its toparchy to Julia the wife of Augustus Cæsar (Ant. XVIII. ii. 2; BJ II. ix. 1). Philo Judæus (de Legat. ad Gaium, Opp. vol. ii. p. 575) states that in this town, the most populous of Judæa, a Roman officer named Capito raised an altar of mud for the deification of the emperor Caligula; the Jews demolished the altar, and the incensed emperor forthwith ordered an equestrian statue of himself to be erected in the Holy of Holies at Jerusalem (c. A.D. 37). Strabo (Bk. 16, 'Syria') states that Iamneia and the settlements around were so populous that they could furnish 40,000 soldiers. The Talmud abounds with references to the learned Rabbins who frequented the school at Jamnia. Milman (Hist. of Jews) states that it contained a school of Jewish learning which obtained great authority, and whether from the rank and character of its head, or from the assemblage of many of the members of the ancient Sanhedrin, who formed a sort of community in that place, it was looked upon with great respect and veneration by the Jews who remained in Palestine. This school was subsequently suppressed by the Romans, owing to the imprudent speeches of the fiery Simon ben-Jochai. Before the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, according to Jewish tradition the Sanhedrin escaped the general wreck. Before the formation of the siege, it had followed Gamaliel, its Nasi, or Prince, to Jabneh (Jamnia; Milman, Hist. of Jews). According to tradition also, the great Gamaliel was buried in Jamnia, and his tomb was visited by Parchi in the 14th cent. In the time of Eusebius, Jamnia was but a small place of little importance. It gave a bishop to the Council of Nicæa, and had still a bishop in the time of the emperor Justinian (Epiph. adv. Hær. ii. 730).

The Crusaders found the ruins called Ibelin (A.D. 1144, William of Tyre), where they built the fortress Ibelin (corrupted from Jabneel), mistaking it for Gath, and it gave its name to the French family of d'Ibelin, one of whom, Jean, count of Jaffa and Ashkelon, restored (c. 1255) the famous code of the 'Assises of Jerusalem,' originally composed by Godfrey de Bouillon (Gibbon, ch. 58; Samut. l. iii. p. xii, c. 58). Benjamin of Tudela (c. A.D. 1163) identified Ibelin, three parasangs south of Jaffa, as the ancient Jabneh, and states that the site of the schools might still be traced there (Early Travels, p. 87). The Itin. Ant. places Jamnia 12 MP. from Diospolis (Lydda) and Joppa, 20 MP. from Ashkelon, and 36 MP. from Gaza. It was on the old road from Joppa to Ashkelon, through Jamnia and Azotus (Peutinger Tables); another road led to it from Diospolis.

The modern village of Yebnah stands on the ruins of the town of Jamnia. It occupies a strong site, 170 ft. above the sea, on an isolated rounded hill, south of the Wady Rûbîn, in the position assigned to it by the Itin. Ant., and the old road from Jaffa to Ashkelon passes by it. The houses are of mud, but there are interesting ruins of a church and also of a mosque erected by Crusaders and Saracens. The ancient Majumas or harbour of Jamnia is situated immediately south of the mouth of the Wady Rûbîn. The port seems to have been double, and entered by narrow passages as at Tyre and Jaffa. The northern bay is some 400 paces across (north and south), flanked with a rocky promontory on each side. The southern bay is larger, and on the promontory south of it are the ruins of ed-Dubbeh. A large reef is visible outside, beneath the water (SWP vol. ii. p. 269). The port would seem to be naturally better than any along the coast of Palestine south of Cæsarea. A very little trouble in clearing a passage through the reefs would probably render the Minet Rûbîn a better port than Jaffa, as the reefs are farther from the beach (Conder, PEFSt, 1875, p. 168). The harvests about Yebnah are very abundant, and the ground is of surprising fertility (Land and Book). The present writer (PEFSt, 1875, p. 181) suggests that Yebnah or Ibnah may be the modern equivalent of Libnah as well as Jabneel. Libnah was given over to the priests, the sons of Aaron (Jos 21^{13}, 1 Ch 6^{57}), within the boundary of the tribe of Judah, and has not been identified, though supposed to be near Beersheba. Both Jabneh (Jos 15^{11} B) and Libnah appear as Λεμνά in the LXX.

2. (B 'Ιεφθαμαί, A 'Ιαβνήλ, Jabnæel). It appears in Jos 19^{33} in connexion with Adami-nekeb and Lakkum as part of the northern boundary of Naphtali, Lakkum being near the Jordan. There is no clue to identifying its position. Conder (Handbook to the Bible, p. 269) gives the following identifications to the places in Jos 19^{33}:—

Heleph is probably Beit Lîf, at the edge of the higher mountains towards the west. Adami is the ruin Adain; Nekeb (the Talmudic Tziidetha, Talm. Jerus. Megillah i. 1) is the ruin Seiyâdeh; Jabneel (the Caphar Yama of the Talmud) is Yemma, 7 miles south of Tiberias in Naphtali (SWP i. p. 365). The Variorum Bible, however, gives 'Adami-hannekeb,' i.e. 'Adami in the pass.' Schwarz (p. 144) places Kefr Yamah ('the village by the sea') on the southern shore of the Sea of Galilee; and Neubauer (Géog. du Talmud, p. 225) places it between Tabor and the Sea of Galilee, thus apparently agreeing with Conder in the identification of Yemma as Jabneel. Josephus speaks of 'Ιαμνεία (Vita, 37) or 'Ιαμνίθ (BJ II. xx. 6) as a rocky fastness in Upper Galilee which he fortified, together with Meroth, Achabari, and Seph (cf. BJ II. vi. 3).

JABNEH.—See JABNEEL.

JACAN (יַעֲקָן). — A Gadite chief, 1 Ch 5^{13}, AV Jachan. See GENEALOGY.

JACHIN (יָכִין).—1. Fourth son of Simeon, Gn 46^{10}, Ex 6^{15}. In 1 Ch 4^{24} he is called Jarib (יָרִיב), but Kittel corrects this to Jachin. In Nu 26^{12} the patronymic Jachinites occurs. 2. Eponym of a priestly family, 1 Ch 9^{10}, Neh 11^{10}. See GENEALOGY.

JACHIN.—One of the brazen pillars erected in front of Solomon's temple, that on the right (looking eastward) or south of the porch, see 1 K 7^{21}, 2 Ch 3^{17}, Jer 52^{21}. See for particulars BOAZ and TEMPLE.

JACINTH (ὑάκινθος, hyacinthus), one of the foundation stones of the New Jerusalem (Rev 21^{20}), RVm 'sapphire.' The uncertainty which surrounds the real meaning of many of the precious stones named in the Bible applies also to the jacinth; this was inevitable in an age when the principles of chemistry and crystallography were unknown. According to C. W. King (Nat. Hist. of Gems, p. 167), the jacinth comes to us from the Italian giacinto, and this from the Latin hyacinthus. In mediæval times the jacinth seems to have been a gem of a yellow colour, but sometimes tinged blue or purple:—characteristics which belong to varieties of quartz, such as the cairngorm and amethyst: and it was frequently employed by the Greeks for intagli in early times, and by the Romans for cameos. According to Pliny (HN xxi. 26), 'Hyacinthus in Gallia eximiè provenit. Hoc ibi pro cocco hysginum tingitur.' The dye hysginum is usually translated 'blue.'

The modern hyacinth includes the bright-red varieties of zircon; a silicate of zirconia with a little oxide of iron. It crystallizes in the form of a square prism or octahedron, and is found at Assouân on the Nile, Auvergne, Bohemia, and other volcanic countries. Large crystals have been obtained from Siberia and Ceylon.

JACKAL.—This word is not found in the text of AV. It occurs in text of RV as the equivalent of tannîm (Is 34^{13}, Jer 9^{11} 10^{22} 49^{33} 51^{37}, Mic 1^{8}), which is tr. AV 'dragon.' We prefer in these passages the tr. wolves (see Dragon 1). In one passage (Jer 14^{6}) RV text tr. tannîm, 'jackals,' marg. 'the crocodile,' AV text 'dragons.' In two places (Is 13^{22} 34^{14}) אִיִּים 'iyyîm is wrongly tr^{d} in AV 'wild beasts of the islands,' RV 'wolves.' The word 'iyyîm, however, is etymologically equivalent to the Arab. benât-âwa, which means jackals. We think, therefore, that it should be so tr^{d} here. If our views are accepted, the first passage would read 'and the jackals ('iyyîm) shall cry in their castles, and the wolves (tannîm) in their pleasant palaces,' and the second (including latter clause of v.^{13}) 'an habitation for wolves (tannîm), a court for ostriches, and the wild beasts of the desert shall meet with the jackals ('iyyîm).'

Jackal also occurs in RVm as the equivalent of shû'âl (Jg 15^{4}, Neh 4^{3}, Ps 63^{10}, La 5^{18}), text AV and RV 'fox.' See Moore on Jg 15^{4}, and art. Fox, p. 64^{a}, where the meaning of shû'âl is more fully discussed.

JACOB (יַעֲקֹב 'supplanter' [see below]; Ιακωβ).—1. Son of Isaac and Rebekah, also called Israel, the father of the twelve patriarchs, who were the reputed ancestors of the twelve tribes of Israel. The history of Jacob is contained in parts of Gn 25^{21}–50^{13},—the narrative being chiefly JE, the passages (so far as they relate to Jacob) which belong to P being 25^{26b} $26^{34.\ 35}$ 27^{46}–28^{9} $29^{24.\ 29}$ 31^{18b} (from 'and all'), 33^{18a} 34 (partly: see below), $35^{9\text{-}13.\ 15.\ 22b\text{-}29}$ * 36 (in the main: v.$^{6\text{-}7}$ in particular belong here), $37^{1\text{-}2a}$ (to 'Jacob'), $46^{6\text{-}27}$ $47^{5\text{-}6a}$ (to 'dwell'), $^{7\text{-}11.\ 27b}$ (from 'and they'), ^{28} $48^{3\text{-}6.\ 7}$ 49^{1a} (to 'sons'), ^{28b} (from 'and blessed them'), $^{29\text{-}33}$ $50^{12.\ 13}$. As in most other places in Gn, P gives little more than a skeleton of the facts, the picturesque, lifelike narratives are almost entirely the work of J and E. J and E are here closely interwoven: the distinction between them will be noted where necessary; but in general these two narratives appear to have covered largely, when intact, the same ground, and, though exhibiting sometimes divergent traditions, to have been substantially similar in their contents.

The birth of Jacob is recounted in Gn $25^{21\text{-}26}$.

* Perhaps also fragments in $30^{1a.\ 4a.\ 9b.\ 22a}$ 35^{6}.

Isaac must be pictured as still dwelling by the well Beer-lahai-roi, near Beersheba (25^{11b}); Rebekah, like Sarah before her, was barren; but in consequence of Isaac's prayer to J″, she became fruitful. The Hebrews loved to picture the characters and fortunes of the peoples with whom they were themselves acquainted, as foreshadowed in their ancestors (cf. Gn $9^{25\text{-}27}$ 16^{12}): and in the case of the ancestors of Israel and Edom the rivalry which became such a marked feature in later generations, began even before their birth. The twin fathers of the two nations struggled together in the womb: their mother, concerned at such an ill-omened occurrence, went to inquire of J″,—we may suppose, at the sanctuary of Beersheba (21^{33} $26^{23\text{-}25}$),—and received in answer the oracular declaration, couched in poetical form:—

Two nations are in thy womb,
And two peoples even from thy bowels shall be parted asunder;*
And one people shall be stronger than the other people,
And the elder shall serve the younger.

When the time came for Rebekah to be delivered, the elder of the twins, we read, was born with the hand of the younger holding his heel,—i.e. endeavouring to hold him back, and to secure the first place for himself: so early did Jacob's characteristic nature display itself. From this circumstance, it is said, he was called Jacob (יַעֲקֹב), i.e. 'one who takes by the heel,' 'endeavours to trip up or supplant,' from עָקֵב 'a heel.'

This, at least, is the idea which the name Jacob suggested to the Hebrew ear. עקב is 'to take by the heel,' Hos $12^{3(4)}$ (with allusion to the same occurrence), 'to trip up,' 'supplant,' fig. 'to defraud,' 'deceive,' Jer $9^{3(4)}$, 'trust ye not in any brother, for every brother will utterly supplant, and every neighbour will go about with slanders'; עָקֹב Jer 17^{9} is 'deceitful,' and עֲקֻבָּה 2 K 10^{19} is 'subtilty.' It is another question whether this explanation expresses the actual meaning of the name. It has been supposed, for instance, that Jacob is really an elliptical form of Jaḳob'ēl: in this case El, 'God,' would be the subject of the verb (like Ishmā'ēl, 'God heareth,' Isrā'ēl, 'God persisteth,' Yeraḥme'ēl, 'God is compassionate'),† and the word might be explained from the Arab. 'God follows,' or (from conj. IV.) 'God rewards.'‡ In fact there is now evidence that the name is much older than the date at which, according to the Biblical narrative, Jacob must have lived: Mr. Pinches has found on contract tablets of the age of Khammurabi (c. 2300 B.C.) the personal name Ya'ḳub-ilu (analogous to Yashup-ilu, Yarbi-ilu, Yamlik-ilu, Yakbar-ilu, etc., of the same age);§ and according to Hommel (AHT 203), the contracted form Yaḳubû occurs likewise. Further, in the lists of 118 places in Palestine conquered by Thothmes III. (B.C. 1503–1449, Sayce and Petrie), which are inscribed on the pylons of the temple at Karnak, there occur (Nos. 78 and 102) the names Y-ŝa-p-'a-rą and Y-'-k-b-'â-rą. These names (the Egyp. r standing, as is well known, also for l) can be only יסף־אל Joseph-'ēl and יעקבא֯ל Jaḳob-'ēl; and we learn consequently that places bearing these names (cf. for the form the place-names Jezre'el, Jabne'ēl Jos 15^{11} ‖ = Jabneh 2 Ch 26^{6}], Yiphtaḥ'ēl Jos $19^{14.\ 27}$, Yeḳabẓe'ēl Neh 11^{25}, Yirpe'ēl Jos 18^{27}) existed in Palestine, apparently in the central part, in the 15th cent. B.C.‖ What connexion, if any, exists between these names and those of the patriarchs, may never perhaps be ascertained; but their existence at such a date in Palestine is remarkable. These facts, however, make it not improbable that (as had indeed been supposed even before their discovery ¶) names of the type Jacob, Joseph, Jephthah, etc., are elliptical forms of a more original Jaḳob'ēl, Joseph'ēl, etc. But, however that may be, to the Hebrews, as we know them, the idea which Jacob suggested, and in which it was supposed to have originated, was that of supplanter.

The boys grew up: Esau was a clever hunter, living in the open field; Jacob was a 'plain man, living in tents,' i.e. a quiet, home-loving man, pursuing the life of a shepherd among his tents

(cf. Gn 4^{20}). An incident soon occurred, which displayed the contrasted characters of the two brothers. Esau returned one day exhausted from the chase: his brother was cooking pottage, and half fainting he asked to be allowed to swallow (הַלְעִיטֵנִי נָא) a little. But Jacob saw his opportunity; and did not scruple to make the most of it. 'Sell me first thy birthright,' he said. Esau, feeling in his exhaustion that his life depended upon it, too readily consented. Jacob, however, is still not fully satisfied; and to make the compact more sure, obliges Esau to seal his promise with an oath. Thereupon he gives Esau the bread and pottage which he desired. The birthright, it need hardly be remarked, was a highly valued possession: it implied both a better position in the family, and also, ultimately, a larger inheritance, than fell to any of the other brothers (cf. 43^{33} 48^{13-20}, Dt 21^{17}). The narrator comments on the heedlessness with which Esau, thinking only of the moment, surrendered what would otherwise have been an inalienable right: the modern reader is more impressed by the avarice and selfishness shown by Jacob in taking such a mean advantage of his brother's need.

Gn 27^{1-45} relates another characteristic incident in Jacob's life, and tells the story of the artifice by which, instigated by a designing mother, he deceives his aged father, and wrests from his brother his father's blessing. The narrative, which belongs chiefly, if not entirely, to J, is told with the picturesque detail and the psychological truth which that gifted narrator habitually displays. There is no need to repeat the details here: the vivid description of Rebekah's treacherous scheme for defeating her husband's purpose, of Jacob's too willing compliance when, with his usual caution, he has once satisfied himself that he can yield it safely, of the ready falsehood with which he allays his father's suspicions, of Isaac's dismay, and Esau's bitter cry of disappointment, when the truth is discovered, will be fresh in the memory of every reader. Only two or three points may be selected for comment. The contrasted blessings of Jacob and Esau express clearly the different geographical and political conditions of the countries owned afterwards by their respective descendants. Of Jacob, his father says:

27^{b} See, the smell of my son
Is as the smell of a field which Jehovah hath blessed:
28 And God give thee of the dew of heaven,
And of the fatness of the earth,
And plenty of corn and must:
29 Let peoples serve thee,
And nations bow down to thee:
Be lord over thy brethren,
And let thy mother's sons bow down to thee:
Cursed be every one that curseth thee,
And blessed be every one that blesseth thee.

In vv.$^{27b, 28}$ the poet thinks of the fruitful fields and vineyards of Canaan, watered by copious dews (Dt 33^{28d}), and yielding in abundance 'corn and must,'—two of the three staple productions of Palestine, often mentioned together as a triad of blessings (Dt 7^{13} 11^{14} al.; cf. 33^{28c}): in v.^{29} he thinks further of the peoples of Canaan, subjugated under the Israelites, and of the neighbouring nations, Edomites, Moabites, and Ammonites,—all 'brothers,' or other near relations of Israel (Gn $19^{37f.}$),—made tributary by David (2 S 8).

The 'blessing' of Esau (vv.$^{39, 40}$) is a very qualified one. Playing on the ambiguous sense of a Hebrew preposition,—which would more naturally mean from or of in a partitive sense (as v.^{28}), but might also mean away from, if such a sense were favoured by the context,—the poet puts into the patriarch's mouth these words—

$39b$ Behold, (away) from the fatness of the earth shall be thy dwelling,
And (away) from the dew of heaven above.
40 And by thy sword shalt thou live, and thou shalt serve thy brother;
And it shall come to pass, as thou roamest about at large,*
That thou shalt break his yoke from off thy neck.

The contrast to v.^{28} is manifest. The reference is to the relatively rocky and arid territory of the Edomites, which obliged its inhabitants to find their livelihood elsewhere, by means of war and plunder. In v.^{40} the doom of subjection to Jacob is not revoked; but it is limited in duration: the time will come when, after repeated efforts,† Edom will regain its freedom. Edom revolted from Judah in the reign of Jehoram (2 K 8^{20-22}): no doubt, circumstances with which we are unacquainted,—perhaps a series of abortive efforts preceding the final success,—suggested the terms of v.^{40b}.

Jacob's treatment of his brother was followed by its natural consequences. Esau 'hated Jacob because of the blessing wherewith his father blessed him,' and only waited for his father's death in order to take vengeance on him. But his mother, Rebekah, ever watchful of the interests of her favourite son, urged him to flee forthwith to her brother Laban, in Ḥaran (across the Euphrates, on the Belikh, N.N.E. of Palestine), and to remain with him until Esau's resentment should have been dulled by time (27^{42-45}).

At this point the compiler of the Book of Genesis has inserted a passage (27^{46}–28^{9}) from P, suggesting an entirely different motive for Jacob's visit—it is not here spoken of as a flight—to Laban. Esau, the same narrator had stated previously ($26^{34f.}$), had, to his parents' great vexation, taken two 'Hittite' wives; and now Rebekah, fearful lest Jacob should do the same, mentions her apprehensions to Isaac, who thereupon charges Jacob to journey to Paddan-aram, and find there a wife among the daughters of his uncle Laban. Jacob obeys; and departs accordingly with his father's blessing.‡ It is of course true that, in itself, this representation is not inconsistent with that in 27^{42-45}: men notoriously act often under the influence of more motives than one; and Rebekah may not have mentioned to Isaac her principal motive for wishing Jacob to leave his home. But presenting, as this paragraph does, all the literary marks of a hand different from the author of 27^{1-45}, there can be no doubt that it forms part of a different representation of the current of events.

28^{10-22}§ forms the true sequel of 27^{1-45}. Jacob starts from Beersheba, on his journey to Haran. Travelling northwards through Canaan, he lights upon a spot where he passes the night. Even now the soil at Bethel is 'covered, as with gravestones, by large sheets of bare rocks, some few standing up here and there like cromlechs' (Stanley, S. and P. 219), and the hill a little to the S.E. rises to its top in terraces of stone.‖ He dreams; and in his dream the natural features of the locality shape themselves into a 'ladder,' or flight of stone steps, rising up to heaven; angels are ascending and descending upon it; and by his side ¶ (v.^{13} RVm) stands J^{7}, addressing him in words of encouragement and hope, promising him a countless posterity, who will possess the land on

* This, as Arabic shows, is the meaning of rûd, which occurs elsewhere in the OT only Jer 2^{31b}, Ps 55^{3b} (Eng. ^{2b}; RV 'am restless'), Hos 11^{12} (?); cf. פְּרִיצִים La 1^{7} 3^{19} (RVm), Is 587.

‡ Notice, in the phrasing of $28^{3, 4}$ the points of contact with previous promises or blessings in P: 'God Almighty,' as 17^{1} al.; 'make fruitful and multiply,' as 17^{20} 48^{4} (cf. $1^{22, 28}$ $9^{1, 7}$ 35^{11}); 'company of peoples,' as 35^{11} 48^{4}; 'land of thy sojournings,' as 17^{8} (cf. 36^{7} 37^{1}). 'Paddan-aram,' also (for Aram-naharaim), as regularly in P (25^{20} 31^{18} 33^{18} $35^{9, 26}$ 46^{15}).

§ 28^{10-13} seem to be from J; $28^{11, 12, 17-22}$ from E.

‖ In the PEF Mem. ii. 305, there is a view of a large 'gilgal,' or circle of stones, near Bethel.

¶ Properly, '(bending) over him.'

which he lies, and assuring him that He will be with him on his journeyings, and will bring him back in safety to the land he is leaving. The dream represents under a striking symbolism the thought that heaven and earth are connected, that an ever-present providence watches over the destinies of men, and also, in particular, that this was a place in which above others God was manifest upon earth, and which deserved pre-eminently to be termed His 'house.' As a mark of the sacredness of the spot, Jacob consecrates the boulder on which his head had rested, setting it up as a 'pillar,' and pouring oil upon the top of it: he also promises solemnly, if he returns home in safety, to make it a 'house of God,' and to pay J″ tithes of all his gains. Bethel became afterwards a famous and much-frequented sanctuary (Am 7^{13} etc.); and no doubt it was the 'pillar,' that would naturally stand beside its altar (Am 3^{14}: cf. Hos 10^{1}), and the custom of paying tithes there (Am 4^{4}), the origin of both of which was thus attributed by tradition to Jacob. The Phœnicians believed in λίθοι ἔμψυχοι (Eus. Præp. Ev. i. 10. 18); and there are many traces in antiquity of stones, esteemed as sacred, being anointed with oil (λίθοι λιπαροί), and venerated as divine (Arnob. adv. Gent. i. 39, vi. 11; Is 57^{6}: cf. vol. i. p. 278[a]; also W. R. Smith, RS[1] 109, 184–188, 214 f. [[2] 116, 201–205, 232 f.]); * and the sacred 'pillar,' or monolith, of Bethel, it is difficult not to think, must in its actual origin have been regarded similarly as a shrine or abode of the deity; but in the existing narrative the idea may possibly be that Jacob venerated it as the channel through which he received his dream.†

29^{1-14} Jacob proceeds on his journey, reaches Ḥaran, and quickly meets with his relations. In his uncle, Laban, Jacob finds, at least for a time, his match in the art of overreaching; and the narrative recounts first the engagement concluded by him with Laban, and then the ruse by which the latter succeeded in marrying first his elder daughter Leah, and so in securing Jacob's services as a shepherd, for 7 years more, in return for his younger daughter Rachel.‡ The section 29^{31}–30^{24} narrates the birth of 11 of Jacob's 12 sons, and of a daughter Dinah, alluding at the same time incidentally to the family jealousies which arose in consequence between his two wives. It is unnecessary to dwell here upon details: it will be sufficient to state that first Leah bears, in succession, Reuben, Simeon, Levi, and Judah: then Rachel's handmaid, Bilhah, bears two sons, Dan and Naphtali, in her mistress' name; next Zilpah, Leah's handmaid, bears Gad and Asher; after this, Issachar and Zebulun, as also a daughter Dinah, are born to Leah; lastly, Rachel bears Joseph. A collateral aim of the narrative, to which evidently no small importance is attached, is to explain the names borne afterwards by the corresponding tribes: the explanations (as is constantly the case in similar cases in the OT), though apparently etymological, are, however, in reality based, not upon etymologies (in our sense of the word), but upon assonances, and must not, therefore, be understood as necessarily expressing the real meaning of the names. In the case of several of the names, a double explanation is given (or alluded to), — an indication of the composite character of the narrative (v.[16] and v.[18]; v.[20a] and v.[20b]; v.[23] and v.[24]).*

Jacob, having been in Laban's service for 14 years, was now anxious to return home to his father. He accordingly begs his uncle to let him go, together with his wives and children. Laban, however, is reluctant to part with a servant who, he is obliged to own (30^{27a}), has served him well; and with feigned magnanimity invites him to name the terms on which he will remain with him. Jacob, in reply, professing to be very generous, declares his willingness to serve him for nothing, if he will agree to the following arrangement: Jacob will remove from the flocks all the parti-coloured animals, and having done this will take nothing but the animals so marked, which are born afterwards, as his wages. Laban, supposing that these would be few or none, closes eagerly with the offer; and in order to make the arrangement doubly secure, removes the spotted animals from the flock himself, gives them into the hands of his sons, and places three days' journey between himself and the flocks left with Jacob (30^{31-36}). Jacob, however, is equal to the occasion; and by means of various ingenious devices, succeeds in outwitting his not too generous uncle. (1) Jacob placed parti-coloured rods in front of the ewes at the time when they conceived, so that the latter in consequence bore parti-coloured young (vv.[37-39]).† (2) He arranged that the spotted lambs and kids thus produced should be in view of the rest of the flock, so that, when the ewes conceived, there should be a further tendency to bear spotted young (v.[40]).‡ (3) Jacob further put up the peeled rods only when the stronger sheep were about to conceive: he thus secured all the strongest animals for himself (v.[42]). The result was (v.[43]) that Jacob's possessions increased immensely.

Jacob's increasing prosperity soon arouses the envy of Laban; and he no longer views him with the same friendliness as before. Encouraged by J″ (31^{3}), Jacob resolves accordingly, without again consulting his father-in-law, to return home: he explains his position to his wives, pointing out to them Laban's arbitrary and ungrateful treatment of him; and they agree to accompany him (31^{14-16}). Here it is to be observed that the description of Laban's arrangement with Jacob, and of the manner in which its consequences were evaded by Jacob, differs from that given in ch. 30: in 31^{7-12} Jacob says that Laban had been in the habit of arbitrarily changing his wages (so 31^{41}), as seemed most likely to benefit himself, of which there is nothing in ch. 30; and further, that the effect of the change had each time§ been frustrated, not by his own ingenious contrivance (as in 30^{37-42}), but by the intervention of Providence (31^{8-9}):‖

* See, further, Tylor, Primitive Culture[3], ii. 160–167.

† It is observable that in v.[22] the title, 'house of God,' is applied to the monolith itself, not to the place marked by it. Some have seen in the passage (esp. v.[11]) an allusion to the custom of 'incubation': cf. Smend, AT Theol. 39; Holzinger, ad loc.

‡ V.[27] 'fulfil the week of this one,' i.e. the week of festivities usually accompanying a marriage (Jg 14^{12}, To 11^{19}): do not break off the usual round of wedding festivities. When they were ended, Jacob received Rachel on the understanding that he was to serve Laban for 7 years more.

* See, further, the articles on the several names. 29^{34} 'be joined'; the name 'Levi' is played on similarly in Nu $18^{2.4}$ (lāwāh, 'to join). 30^{3} 'be builded up from her': so 16^{2} of Hagar, the fig. being that of a house (cf. Ru 4^{11}, Dt 25^{9}). 30^{14-16} 'mandrakes,' or better love-apples, were supposed to possess aphrodisiac properties, and to ensure conception: hence the reason why Rachel asks for them. In v.[16] Leah 'hires' Jacob with the love-apples she had given to Rachel; in v.[18] Leah says that Issachar is the 'hire,' or payment, which she has received for having given Zilpah to Jacob,—manifestly two explanations of the name Issachar (śāchār, 'hire' or 'wages').

† The physiological principle involved is well established. According to an authority quoted by Delitzsch, cattle-breeders now, in order to secure white lambs, surround the drinking-troughs with white objects.

‡ This seems to be the meaning of v.[40] as it stands. But many modern scholars think that the words 'and set . . . of Laban' are a gloss; in which case the verse will merely state that the parti-coloured young, produced as described in v.[39], were kept by themselves, and not mixed with those of uniform colour (which would be Laban's).

§ Notice the imperfect tenses in 31^{8}.

‖ The dream (31^{10-12}) is mentioned as a notification to Jacob that the birth, by natural means (and not through Jacob's artifice), of the parti-coloured young was by God's appointment, in compensation for Laban's treatment of him (v.[12] end).

ch. 30 gives J's representation of the transactions, ch. 31 gives that of E.* Jacob takes flight while Laban is engaged in sheepshearing (cf. 1 S 25[2. 7. 11], 2 S 13[23]); he crosses the Euphrates, and directs his steps towards Gilead (31[17-22]). Rachel, at the same time, steals her father's teraphim, or household gods (cf. 1 S 19[13. 16]), as though (Ewald) to appropriate and carry with her into Canaan the good fortune of her paternal home.

Laban, upon hearing of Jacob's departure, starts in pursuit, and overtakes him in the hill-country of Gilead. The account of the meeting is told in 31[26-55]. Laban begins by expostulating with Jacob on the manner in which he has left him, and especially on the theft of his household gods, with which he charges him. Rachel, who was alone the guilty person, by a piece of woman's wit conceals the theft, and, in her turn, outwits her father: this gives Jacob the opportunity of retorting upon Laban, of reminding him of the 20 years which he had spent ungrudgingly in his service, and of reproaching him with the many attempts he had made to deprive him of his lawful earnings (vv.[26-42]). Laban, smitten by his conscience (vv.[24. 29]), and unable to reply, seeks to close the dispute by proposing a treaty of friendship. Up to this point the narrative has been clear; but from v.[46] it becomes somewhat confused, two different accounts (J and E) having, it seems, been combined together, and at the same time enlarged with additions by a redactor. The analysis is difficult, and some of the details are uncertain; but it is clear that both a 'pillar' and a heap of stones are described as erected as a witness; that two distinct agreements are entered into — one (v.[50]) that Jacob will in no way ill-treat Laban's daughters, the other (v.[52]) that neither Jacob nor Laban will pass the boundary marked by the heap of stones with hostile intent toward the other; that the heap of stones is the witness of the former agreement (vv.[48-50]), and the pillar, therefore, presumably (v.[52]) of the latter; and further, that each agreement is sealed by a common meal (v.[46]; v.[54]).† The narrative explains in addition the name 'Gilead,' which is derived, by a popular etymology, from Gal-ʿēd, 'Heap of witness.'‡ There must, it seems, have been somewhere on the N.E. frontier of Gilead, a cairn of stones, with a single boulder, standing up prominently beside it, the origin of which was popularly attributed to this compact between Laban and Jacob.§ The narrative, as it stands, explains also (v.[49]) the name Mizpah, the 'Watch-tower,' a place of uncertain situation, but no doubt some eminence in the same neighbourhood, which overlooked the broad plain of Ḥauran, and guarded the approach from the direction of Damascus.‖ It seems that the ancestors of the Israelites and the Syrians are here conceived as fixing the border between the territories occupied afterwards by their respective descendants, which was often, especially during the period of the Syrian wars, matter of bloody dispute between them.

The 'long game of well-matched wits' is thus ended; and Laban returns to Ḥaran (31[55]), while Jacob travels on towards Canaan. As he journeys, the 'angels of God' meet him, as if to welcome and congratulate him on his auspicious return; and from this circumstance the name Maḥanaim is explained ('the double camp').* Maḥanaim became afterwards an important place (2 S 2[8. 12. 29] the capital of Ishbosheth's kingdom; see also 17[24. 27], 1 K 4[14]); but its situation is not known: from the sequel of the present narrative, it must, however, have been N. of the Jabbok (now the Zerḳâ), though not much N., and within sight of the Jordan (v.[10]): in Jos 13[26. 30] it is mentioned as a place on the border between Gad and Manasseh.†

A fresh danger now threatens Jacob, the prospect of meeting again his brother Esau, who might be supposed to have still not forgotten old grudges. Jacob sends (32[3-5]) a conciliatory message to him, but learns in reply that he is coming to meet him with 400 men. He is greatly alarmed; but his powers of resource do not desert him. He divides his party into two 'camps,' in the hope that if one should be smitten by Esau, the other at least might escape; and besides this worldly precaution, he invokes in prayer the aid of God, reminding Him that it was He who had bidden him (31[3]) return to his native land, and pleading before Him the blessings which He had already bestowed upon him (v.[10]), and the promises which He had given him (v.[12]).‡ (In vv.[7. 8], it is to be observed, there is clearly a second explanation, parallel to the one in v.[2], of the name Maḥanaim§). If vv.[13b-21] be the original sequel to vv.[3-13a], the passage will describe a further precaution taken by Jacob, viz. a present of cattle, consisting of 580 head, and divided into separate droves for the purpose of making a favourable impression upon Esau, who, as drove upon drove came up, would be at once gratified and surprised to learn that each was intended for himself. But the passage from v.[13b] to v.[21] appears to proceed from the other narrator E;‖ so that the account of the present may be a parallel, and not a sequel, to the division into two 'camps' in vv.[7. 8].

There follows the account of Jacob's wrestling with the angel. His party had crossed the Jabbok (the Wâdy Zerḳâ); and he himself was left behind 'alone,'—it is difficult to say, on which side of the stream.¶ It was the eve of the greatest crisis of his life. His future welfare hung in the balance. Long ago he had taken cruel advantage of his brother: he had had to flee before his threatened vengeance; now Esau was on his way to meet him with a large retinue of attendants; and what would the issue be? In the solitude and darkness a 'strange and nameless dread' came over him: the terrible thought that God was his antagonist took possession of him; and so vividly did he realize it that he seemed to himself to be engaged in an

* Notice the frequency with which God (אֱלֹהִים), not Jahweh, occurs in this narrative (vv.[9. 11. 16. 24. 42]).

† The mark of amity and reconciliation, as is still the case among the Arabs. V.[54] speaks of a sacrifice as well.

‡ Wellh. and Dillm. assign vv.[46-50] to J, and vv.[45. 51-54] to E, treating 'Behold, this heap, and' in v.[51], 'This heap be witness, and,' and 'and this pillar' in v.[52], as glosses due to the redactor. However, יָרֵה (v.[51]) is not the word that we should expect to be used of a מַצֵּבָה: perhaps (cf. LXX here and v.[45]) we should restore, with Ball, יָרִיתִי. Kautzsch and Socin assign vv.[51. 52] to J, treating the three references to the 'pillar' in these verses as glosses. The precise determination of the analysis is not important; for, in any case, the passage describes two distinct transactions (as explained above in the text).

§ Cf. Ewald, Hist. i. 347 f., 356, who thinks even that the real meaning of the tradition is that the mountain-range of Gilead itself is the 'heap,' piled up by Laban and Jacob as a boundary between the two nationalities. So also Wellh. Hist. 325 f.

‖ It may be doubted whether the present Ḳal'at er-Rabad, a height just on the N. of the Wâdy 'Ajlun, with a commanding prospect (Merrill, Buhl, Geogr. 262), is sufficiently far to the north. It is also uncertain whether this 'Mizpah' is identical with the רָמַת הַמִּצְפֶּה of Jos 13[26] (on the N. frontier of Gad). The abrupt way in which Miẓpah is here introduced leads most critics to regard the notice respecting it as a gloss.

* The word rendered 'host' in 32[2], and 'company' in 32[7. 8. 10. 21] 33[8], properly means camp, and is usually so rendered. It is a pity that a different rendering has been adopted here.

§ Vv.[1. 2] belong to E; vv.[3-13a] to J.

‖ Notice that at v.[21b] the narrative is at exactly the same point that it had reached at v.[13a].

¶ V.[22] implies that Jacob had crossed it, v.[23] that he had not. The two verses clearly belong to different sources. If, as most critics agree, vv.[22. 24-32] belong to J, the scene of the wrestling will have been S. of the Jabbok.

actual struggle with a living man.* The struggle continued till the approach of daybreak.† But Jacob wrestled bravely: his mysterious antagonist saw that he could not prevail against him by the means which a wrestler would naturally employ; so, in order to escape before daylight, and at the same time to show that he was superior to Jacob, he sprained Jacob's thigh. But Jacob, though he can no longer wrestle with his antagonist, can still hold him: he perceives that he is more than an ordinary mortal; so he seizes the opportunity to win a blessing for himself, 'I will not let thee go, except thou bless me.' The blessing takes the form of a change of name. 'Thy name shall be called no more Jacob, but Israel; for thou hast persevered with God and with men, and hast prevailed.' The name 'Israel,' meaning (on the analogy of other names similarly formed) 'God persists (or perseveres),'‡ is interpreted as suggesting the meaning 'Perseverer with God.'§ Jacob's persevering struggle with God is just ended: of men, he has persevered against both Laban and Esau; his struggle with Laban was concluded previously; that with Esau is not yet concluded, but 'hast prevailed' is a word full of hope for the future. At the same time, as the name was to the Hebrews the symbol or expression of the nature, the change of name is significant of a moral change in the patriarch himself: he is to be no longer the Supplanter, the Crafty one, the Overreacher, but the Perseverer with God, who is worthy also to prevail.‖ The incident serves to explain further the name Penuel, 'Face of God'; 'for,' said Jacob, 'I have seen God face to face, and yet my life is preserved.'¶ The narrator deduces also from this incident the custom of not eating in animals the muscle corresponding to the one which had been strained in Jacob's thigh: it was treated as sacred through the touch of God. The site of Penuel is uncertain; but it must have been near both the Jabbok and the Jordan. As Jacob journeys from Penuel to Succoth, so Gideon, pursuing the Midianites in the contrary direction, comes first to Succoth, and afterwards 'goes up' to Penuel (Jg $8^{5.8}$); it may therefore be conjectured that it was some elevated or projecting spot, near where the Jabbok descends from the uplands into the Jordan Valley: Merrill suggests Tulūl ed-Dahab, conical hills, with ruins at their top, which rise from the Jabbok Valley, with the stream flowing between them, to a height of 250 ft.

The dreaded meeting with Esau passes off happily (33^{1-17}). Jacob prepares for the worst (vv.$^{1-3}$); but Esau shows a generous and magnanimous spirit: he receives his brother with all friendliness, and inquires with interest after his children (vv.$^{4-7}$). He at first refuses Jacob's present; but Jacob by pressure induces him to accept it, no doubt hoping thereby to purchase the continuance of his good-will in the future (vv.$^{8-11}$).* Esau afterwards offers Jacob his protection for the rest of the journey, or at least some of his people as an escort; but Jacob declines both these offers; he will lay himself under no obligation to his brother, nor will he incur any risk of a rupture in the cordial relations now established between them (vv.$^{12-16}$). Esau accordingly returns to Edom; while Jacob moves on to Succoth (the name of which is explained from the booths [סֻכּוֹת] built by him there for his cattle). The site of Succoth is not more certainly known than that of Penuel: it was on the E. of Jordan (Jg $8^{4.5}$), in the valley, perhaps (Dillm.) near the ford of ed-Dâmiyeh (on the road from es-Salt to Nâblus), a little S. of the point where the Jabbok enters the Jordan.† After crossing the Jordan, Jacob advanced into the heart of the country, to Shechem. There he encamped in front of the city, and bought the plot of ground on which his tent rested, of the native Shechemites for 100 ḳesîṭahs.‡ The purchase of this land is mentioned on account of the sequel: it was the place in which the bones of Joseph ultimately reposed (Jos 24^{32}); and it had the same interest and significance for the N. kingdom which the cave of Machpelah at Hebron (ch. 23) had for the kingdom of Judah.§

We come (ch. 34) to the somewhat remarkable narrative of the dealings of Jacob with Shechem. The chapter is plainly composite; but the criteria are in some cases ambiguous, so that critics are not fully agreed in their results. The main characteristics of the two narratives of which it is composed are, however, sufficiently clear. According to J,‖ Shechem, son of Ḥamor, having seduced Jacob's daughter, Dinah, desires to obtain her from her father and brothers in marriage: they agree, only imposing a condition the nature of which in the existing text of J is not specified, but which Ḥamor at once accedes to (vv.$^{11.12.19}$); afterwards, however, Simeon and Levi, resenting keenly Ḥamor's treatment of their sister, fall upon him, without their brothers' knowledge, slay him and his father, and rescue Dinah; their father blames them severely for making him and his family unpopular among the native Canaanites, and endangering their lives; they reply that the honour of their tribe is above all such considerations: 'Should he deal with our sister as with an harlot?' Here the transaction has a personal character: only Shechem is involved; and his aim is the personal one of securing Dinah as his wife. According to the rest of the narrative,¶ Shechem equally desires to obtain Dinah as his wife, but much wider interests are involved: the transaction assumes a national significance: Ḥamor

* In the sense of the tradition, the contest, as Dillm. remarks, is plainly an external and physical one.

† In the rare word יַאֲבֵק for wrestle, vv.$^{24.25}$, there is a play on the name Jabbok (יַבֹּק), if not an explanation of its origin, as though it meant Wrestling (-stream).

‡ Sayce's derivation (EHH 73, and elsewhere) from yāshar, 'to be upright,' 'to direct' (!), has nothing to recommend it.

§ Cf. Arab. shariya, to persist, or persevere; conj. iii. (expressing the idea of rivalry) to persist or persevere against another (viz. in contention or wrangling). The same root is contained in Seraiah, 'Jah persists.' (The root means 'to strive' (RVm) only in the sense of to exert oneself, not in that of to contend. It has no connexion with sar, 'prince,' from sārar).

‖ J from this point prefers, though not (in our existing texts) quite uniformly, Israel to Jacob as the designation of the patriarch.

¶ With allusion to the often expressed belief that no one could 'see God and live' (Ex 19^{21} 33^{20}, Jg $6^{22f.}$ 13^{22}). Notice the adversative force of the Wāw consecutive (Ges. § 111*e*).

 See Moore, Judges, 220f., 223; G. A. Smith, HGHL 585f. There was a Phœnician headland called θεοῦ πρόσωπον; and Penuel may really, like this headland, have derived its name from some physical feature presented by it.

* V.^{10} 'forasmuch as I have seen thy face, as when one seeth the face of God' (i.e. I have found it as favourable), is manifestly, as Wellh. remarks, another explanation of the name Penuel. 'To see the face' is the phrase used of one admitted to the presence-chamber of a monarch, or other ruler (Gn $43^{3.5}$, 2 S $14^{24.28}$, 2 K 25^{19}; of God, Ps 11^{7}, Job 33^{26}), and, it is implied, viewed by his superior favourably. Jacob, by using this expression, pays Esau a high compliment. 'Beiden Wendungen der Sage liegt zu Grund, dass man in Peniel den unfreundlichen Gott als freundlichen erfährt' (Dillm.).

§ As Dinah, who (31^{41} comp. with 30^{21}) must have been quite an infant when Jacob left Ḥaran, appears of marriageable age in ch. 34, Jacob (if the narrative is to be treated as consistent) must be supposed to have passed some years at Succoth (or at Shechem, before the events mentioned in ch. 34 occurred); cf. Dillm. on $30^{25f.}$ 33^{17} 34^{1}.

¶ P; or (Wellh., Cornill, Holzinger) E, amplified in parts by a writer of the school of P.

proposes what is virtually an amalgamation of the two communities, with full reciprocal rights of trade and inter-marriage (vv.$^{8-10.\ 21-23}$): the sons of Jacob generally (not merely Simeon and Levi) speak on their sister's behalf: they impose the condition (which is here circumcision) not on Shechem only, but on the whole people (vv.$^{13-18}$); and the entire city experiences their vengeance (vv.$^{25\ end.\ 27-29}$). On the possible significance of this narrative, see p. 535.

From Shechem Jacob proceeds on his way to Bethel (about 20 miles S. of Shechem), a panic terror (35^{5}) restraining the natives of the neighbourhood from pursuing him. Bethel was the spot, which, when he was starting for Ḥaran some 20 years (31^{41}) previously, had been consecrated for him by his great dream (28$^{11-22}$); and now, in anticipation of visiting it again, he bade his household and retainers put away all 'foreign gods' from among them: the 'God of Bethel' (31^{13}) had proved Himself true to His promise (28^{15}); He had led His servant safely through many trials and anxieties; and at Bethel, in fulfilment of his vow (28^{22}), he would now build an altar to Him. Later generations pointed to the terebinth at Shechem (cf. Jos 24^{26}) as marking the spot at which the idols brought from Ḥaran (cf. Gn 31^{19}, Jos 24$^{2.\ 14.\ 23}$), and the amulets,* were buried by Jacob. The erection of the altar is narrated in 35^{7} (E, as also vv.$^{1-5.\ 8}$). P (35$^{9-13.\ 15}$) describes at this point a theophany, with a renewed promise to Jacob of a numerous and royal posterity, and of the gift of the land (vv.$^{11.\ 12}$);† to the same occasion he also assigns (v.^{10}) the change of name from Jacob to Israel, which J has narrated already at Penuel (32^{28}), and the origin of the name of Bethel, which J had connected with Jacob's former visit to the place (28^{19}). The relation of the 'pillar,' which, according to v.^{14} (probably J), Jacob set up, and upon which he is said also to have poured a drink-offering and oil, to the one mentioned previously in 28^{18} (E), is not clear; the verse may relate to a different 'pillar,' it may give a different version of the origin of the same 'pillar.'‡

Leaving Bethel, Jacob continued his journey to the South. Shortly before reaching Ephrath, Rachel died in childbirth: she herself, so tradition told, called her son Ben-oni 'son of my sorrow,' but his father preferred a name of better omen, and called him Ben-jamin, 'son of the right hand.'§ On the site of her grave, Jacob erected a 'pillar,' which still bore her name in the narrator's day (35^{20}). In 1 S 10^{2} Rachel's grave is distinctly stated to have been on the (Northern) border of Benjamin, not far from Bethel (cf. v.^{3}; and see also Jer 31^{15}): unless therefore there were different traditions respecting its site, the gloss 'the same is Beth-lehem' (in spite of its repetition in 48^{7}, and in spite also of its being in agreement with other statements, as Ru 4^{11}, Mic 5^{2}) is incorrect, and there were more localities than one called Ephrath. Still pursuing his way, Jacob next rested beyond the 'tower of Eder' (or 'of the flock'),—a place, of which (in spite of Mic 4^{8}) the situation is quite uncertain. P (35^{22b-29}) brings Jacob on to Hebron (v.^{27}; cf. 37^{14} JE). There Isaac (who was last mentioned as being at Beersheba*) dies; and (according to the same source, P) Jacob and Esau meet once more for the purpose of burying him (v.^{29}; cf. 25^{9}).

The active period of Jacob's life is now over: the rest of his days is passed in quietude; and Joseph becomes the moving spirit in the patriarchal family. Joseph was his father's favourite son; his brethren envied him; his dreams of future exaltation increased their jealousy; but his father fondly wondered what these dreams might signify (37^{12}). Jacob is still at Hebron, but his flocks are at Shechem,† tended by his other sons, and he sends Joseph thither to inquire after his brethren's welfare (37$^{12-14}$). Deceived in his old age by his sons, as he had in his youth deceived his own aged father, he receives with inconsolable grief the evidence, as it seems to him, of Joseph's cruel death (37$^{31-35}$). As the famine grows severe in Canaan, he sends his sons, but without Benjamin, who now naturally takes Joseph's place as his father's favourite, to buy corn in Egypt (42$^{1-4}$): upon their inauspicious return, his distress and grief find bitter expression in the reproachful words (42^{36}), 'Me have ye bereaved of my children: Joseph is not, and Simeon is not, and ye will take Benjamin away; upon me are all these things come.' In the end, he is obliged to let Benjamin go back with his brethren into Egypt, but with characteristic prudence he sends with them a present calculated to win the favour of the great man of the land (43$^{11-13}$). The dénoûment soon follows; and ch. 45 recounts the delight with which he hears that his son is still alive, and receives the message to come and join him in Egypt (vv.$^{25-28}$). He sets forth from Hebron, journeys to Beersheba, the home of Isaac and of his own former days (27. 28^{10}), and there, when on the point of leaving for a second time the land of promise, and taking up his abode in the land of Egypt, receives a word of encouragement and promise suitable to the occasion (46$^{3.\ 4}$; cf. previously, at Bethel, 28$^{13-15}$). Israel thus 'went down into Egypt'; and a new and momentous epoch in the history of the nation was inaugurated. The list of Jacob's sons and grandchildren who accompanied him into Egypt is given by P (46$^{6-27}$).‡ Jacob meets his son Joseph in Goshen, and the wish of his heart is accomplished (46$^{29f.}$). Afterwards he is honourably received by the Pharaoh, and assigned, with his sons, a residence in the pastoral district of Goshen (47$^{1-4.\ 6b}$ [from 'in the land'] J; 47$^{5.\ 6a.\ 7-11}$ P). §

As the time drew near for Jacob to die, he made Joseph promise not to bury him in Egypt, but to lay him in the tomb of his fathers in Canaan

* This is the meaning of the 'rings' of 35^{4}.

† With v.^{11} cf. the passages cited p. 527 note ‡; and add 17^{6} ('kings').

‡ Cornill conjectures that this verse originally (without 'in the place where he spake with him') stood in close connexion with v.^{8}: in this case the 'pillar' would be a sepulchral stele (cf. v.^{20}), and the libations would be poured out as offerings to the dead (ZATW, 1891, p. 15 ff.; cf. Holzinger, Comm. p. 217).

§ Whether this is the true explanation of the name, must remain an open question. Sayce (EHH 79) agrees here with Stade (Gesch. i. 161) in thinking that the name (the 'Southerner') has really reference to the position of the territory of Benjamin on the S. of Ephraim.

* 28^{10} compared with 27$^{42-45}$: according to P (35^{28} compared with 25^{26} 26^{34}) eighty years previously, Jacob being now 120 years old! (According to JE, Jacob was but 20 years in Mesopotamia, 31^{41}; cf. p. 532^{b}).

† The author of this passage must have pictured Jacob's flocks as roaming pretty freely over the country (cf. v.^{17}, Dothan being about 15 miles N. of Shechem), if he himself was at Hebron. In view of ch. 34, the mention of their being at Shechem is remarkable; but the writer, it is possible, pictured the inhabitants of the neighbourhood as deterred by fear (cf. 35^{5}) from interfering with Jacob's possessions.

‡ On difficulties connected with the enumeration, esp. in vv.$^{26.\ 27}$, see the Commentaries.—An interesting illustration of Jacob's descent into Egypt is afforded by the representation, on a tomb at Beni-Hassan, of 37 Asiatics (Amu), bringing a present of eye-paint, and two live ibexes, to Usertesen II., of the 12th dynasty, in his 6th year (c. B.C. 2600, Petrie). The procession is a remarkable one: it comprises men, women, and children, and two asses: the men wear long richly-coloured tunics, or in some cases coloured loin-cloths, and one is playing with a plectrum on a lyre of six strings. See Wilkinson-Birch, Anc. Egyp. 1878, i. 480; Maspero, Dawn of Civilization, 468–470; or Petrie, Hist. of Egypt, i. 172–174; also Hommel, AHT 52f.

§ The sequence in vv.$^{5.\ 6}$ is better in the LXX; see the Comms., or LOT pp. 10, 16 (6 11, 17) n. The situation of Goshen, fixed approximately by tradition, has been determined definitely by the researches of M. Naville; it was the district lying between the three modern villages of Saft, Belbeis, and Tel el-Kebir, about 40 miles N.E. of Cairo.

(47^{29-31}). Ch. 48 narrates (1) how he adopted Joseph's two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim, placing them on the same level with his own children (vv.$^{3-7}$ P); and (2) how he blessed them, giving at the same time the first place to the younger, Ephraim, in view of the future pre-eminence of the tribe descended from him (vv.$^{1-2,\ 8-20}$ JE). There follows a special promise and gift, made to Joseph (vv.$^{21,\ 22}$ E). The terms of v.^{22} are remarkable, 'And I give thee one shoulder* (shĕkhem) above thy brethren, which I took out of the hand of the Amorite with my sword and with my bow.' There is manifestly here an allusion to Shechem, afterwards an important and central place in the territory of Ephraim (cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL 332–334), where also Joseph was buried (Jos 24^{32}); but nothing is said elsewhere of a conquest of Shechem by Jacob: it is evident that there is preserved here a version of Jacob's dealings with Shechem different from any which we find elsewhere.†

49^{2-27} contains the more elaborate poetical Blessing, which Jacob is said to have addressed to all his sons before his death. Throughout this Blessing what the poet really has in view are the tribes; as so often elsewhere in Genesis, the tribe is conceived as impersonated in its ancestor, and the ancestor foreshadows the character of the tribe. The poet passes the tribes in review: he singles out in each some striking feature of moral character, political state, or geographical position, for poetical amplification; and on each he pronounces some word of praise or blame, according to its deserts. The moral instability of Reuben, the disorganized social condition of Simeon and Levi, the ideal sovereignty and vine-clad territory of Judah, the maritime advantages enjoyed by Zebulun, the ignoble indifference which led Issachar to prefer ease to independence, the quick and effective attack of Dan, the warlike bravery of Gad, the richness of Asher's soil,‡ the blessings of populousness, military efficiency, climate, and soil, which, in spite of envious assailants, are showered upon Joseph, the martial skill and success of Benjamin, —these, briefly, are the features which the poet selects, and develops one after another, in varied and effective imagery. The historical and geographical conditions reflected in the poem are those of the period of the Judges, Samuel, and David; and this is the age in which the ancient tradition of the patriarch's Blessing must have received its present poetical form.

After this, we read, Jacob charged his sons to bury him in the family grave at Machpelah (49^{29-32} P: 47^{29-31} is parallel in JE), and then died (v.^{33} P). His body was embalmed, according to the Egyptian custom (50^{1-3}): a great funeral procession was organized, such as was usual in Egypt (50^{1-9}); § and he was buried in the land of Canaan, in the cave at Hebron ($50^{12,\ 13}$).‖

The chronology of Jacob's life presents serious difficulties: it is evident that the traditions (or theories) about it are inconsistent. (1) P's chronology, as often elsewhere in Gn, is entirely irreconcilable with that of JE. In ch. 27 (JE) Isaac is to all appearance upon his deathbed (cf. v.^{2}); yet according to P (25^{26} 26^{34} 35^{28}) he survived for eighty years, dying at the age of 180. Ussher, Keil, and others, arguing back from the dates given in 47^{9} 45^{6} 41^{46} 31^{41}, infer that Jacob's flight to Ḥaran took place in his 77th year: this reduces the 80 years to 43 years, though that is almost equally incredible; but it involves the fresh incongruity of supposing that thirty-seven years elapsed between Esau's marrying his Hittite wives (26^{34}), and Rebekah's expressing her fear (27^{46}) that Jacob, then aged seventy-seven, should follow his brother's example! Nor is it natural to picture Jacob seeking a wife in Ḥaran, and tending Laban's sheep, as a man 77 years old. (2) It may be doubted whether even the chronology of JE is perfectly consistent. (a) The supposition made p. 530 note § is required, as there explained, for consistency; but an unspecified sojourn of some years at either Succoth or Shechem is hardly consonant with the general tenor of the narrative of Jacob's return (31^{3}) from Ḥaran. It is true, in 37^{2} Joseph is said to be 17 years of age; but the years of Joseph's boyhood would be placed more naturally between 35^{22} and 37^{2} than at 33^{17} or 33^{19}. (b) Joseph is called (37^{3}) a son of Jacob's 'old age,' as though he were appreciably younger than his brethren: yet Zebulun and Dinah could not have been more than a year or two older (30^{20-24}); for all Jacob's children (except Benjamin) must have been born, at least according to E (see 31^{41}), between the 7th and the 16–17th years of his service with Laban (leaving, say, 4–3 years for the events narrated in 30^{25-43}). However, 37^{3} belongs very probably to the other source, J, which may have represented Joseph as born later. In P he is born when Jacob is about 90 (Gn 41^{46} [47 45^{6} E] 47^{9}).

Allusions to Jacob in subsequent parts of Scripture.—The most important are in Hosea, who already applies his history didactically:—

(1) Hos 12^{2-4} $(3-5)$:—

3 In the womb he supplanted his brother;
And in his strength he persisted with God:
4 Yea, he persisted [וַיָּשַׂר] with the angel, and prevailed;
He wept, and made supplication unto him;
At Bethel he found him, and there he spake with him.*

The allusions to the incidents recorded in Gn 25^{26} 32^{28} 28^{13-15} are palpable. Ephraim is lax, indifferent, and frivolous: the ambition shown by its ancestor Jacob to secure pre-eminence even in the womb, the persistence with which afterwards he exerted himself to win the blessing, and the tears with which he sought it,† are held up as examples for its imitation.

(2) Hos $12^{12f.}$ $(13f.)$:—

12 And Jacob fled into the field of Aram,
And Israel served for a wife,
And for a wife he kept (sheep):
13 But by a prophet did Jehovah bring Israel up out of Egypt,
And by a prophet was he kept (preserved).

For the allusions in v.^{12}, see Gn 27^{43} (cf. $35^{1,\ 7}$); $29^{18,\ 20,\ 30}$ 31^{41}. The flight, the penury, the hardships (cf. Gn 31^{38-41}) undergone by Jacob are contrasted with the deliverance of his descendants under the honourable guidance of a prophet.

In Dt 26^{5} 'An Aramæan ready to perish‡ was my father, and he went down into Egypt, and sojourned there, few in number; and he became there a nation, great, mighty, and populous,' the allusion is to Jacob's Aramæan connexions, and to his hard and perilous life as a shepherd in Aram-naharaim. Jacob is also most probably meant by 'thy first father' in Is 43^{27}. In Mal $1^{2,\ 3}$ (cited Ro 9^{13}) the reference is really national: see Gore in Studia Biblica, iii. 37 ff.; Sanday-Headlam, Romans, 245 ff.

The Character of Jacob.—Of all the characters which are sketched in any fulness in the OT, that of Jacob is the most mixed. On the one hand, he is by nature the 'supplanter': 'is he not,' exclaims Esau, 'rightly named Jacob, for he hath supplanted me these two times'? Twice he takes a mean advantage of his brother; he deceives his

* i.e. 'mountain-slope' or '-side'; cf. the use of the syn. כָּתֵף Jos $15^{8.\ 10}$ $18^{12.\ 12.\ 16.\ 18}$ (RV poorly, 'side').

† In the parts of ch. 34 which belong to J, two of Jacob's sons wreak their vengeance on individual Shechemites; but Jacob himself repudiates their deed. The present passage shows that a version must have been current according to which Jacob (i.e. Israel as a whole) conquered and took possession of Shechem. This version is allied to, and perhaps underlies, the other narrative in ch. 34, according to which the sons of Jacob (and not Simeon and Levi alone) massacred the inhabitants of Shechem; but it is not said, or even implied, in this narrative that they retained the city as their own possession. (The statement in 33^{19} that Jacob purchased a piece of land outside the city, is of course not inconsistent with his forcible conquest of the city itself afterwards). See further, Dillm., Holzinger, and Wellh. Comp. 316 ff.

aged father; even where he does not directly overreach, prudence and expediency are the determining motives of his life; his thoughts centre in himself; he is ever striving to turn circumstances to his own profit, to make the most out of every opportunity. He is a striking contrast to his brother: Esau is frank, straightforward, and generous; Jacob is scheming, ambitious, and self-seeking; by fair means or foul, he sets himself to compass his ends. On the other hand, Jacob is not destitute of good qualities. He has a deeper and more stable character than Esau: Esau is governed by the impulses of the moment, is heedless of the future, has no thought for any but present and material goods: Jacob, if he is the 'Overreacher,' is also the 'Perseverer' ('Israel'); he possesses steadiness and consistency of purpose; he does not flinch from toil and exertion,—even Laban admits that he has served him well (30^{27}); he can labour and deny himself in order to attain a far-distant goal; he has cleverness, versatility, and diplomatic ability: he thus possesses qualities which, though they may be misdirected, are nevertheless adapted to form the foundation of a sound and genuine character. And one aim of the history of Jacob, as written in the Book of Genesis, is to show how, through the discipline and spiritual experiences of life, the better elements of a character may in the end prevail, and become its determining and predominant principles.

It may be asked how a character exhibiting so many doubtful qualities should have been selected by Providence as its chosen agent, and be represented as receiving so constantly the marks of God's care and approval (28^{13-15} $31^{12b.\ 13.\ 24}$ 32^{1} etc.). The answer, no doubt, is to be found in the fact that Providence does not judge by present appearances; and that Jacob possessed qualities which, in spite of the faults, and even the grave faults, by which they were accompanied, were qualities which, when purified, and elevated, and freed from purely personal aims, could be consecrated to the service of God, and made subservient to carrying out His purposes. The turning-point in his life is the struggle at Penuel. In all his dealings hitherto, whether with Esau or Laban, he has been true to his name, he has been the Supplanter or Overreacher. His treatment of Esau was without excuse: in his dealings with Laban, craft was matched against craft; though, in judging Jacob here, it is only right to remember that Laban not only takes the first dishonest step, but is throughout the chief offender. Had Laban treated Jacob honestly and generously, there is no reason to suppose that he would have sought to overreach him. But since Laban seeks, not once only, to profit at his expense, Jacob retaliates,—and, so far as material gains are concerned, wins. But, as has just been pointed out, Jacob's character includes inconsistent elements; and the struggle at Penuel marks the triumph of the higher over the lower elements in his character. It is the critical moment of his life. He is at the point of re-entering the land which he left twenty (31^{41}) years before; he is about to meet his brother whom he had wronged and deceived; memories of the past return upon him; his conscience smites him, and he is 'greatly afraid.' But God is his real antagonist, not Esau; it is God whom his sins have offended, and who here comes to contest His right. These thoughts and fears are, as it were, materialized in his dream. He struggles with his mysterious antagonist, and, as in his struggles with Esau and Laban, strives to win: he struggles bravely; nor can his antagonist overcome him, until by a divine touch He paralyzes his natural strength. Even then Jacob's tenacity of purpose remains unimpaired; he is conscious that he has a heavenly visitant in his embrace; and he will not let Him go until he has received from Him a blessing. The moment marks a spiritual change in Jacob's character. His carnal weapons are lamed and useless,—they fail him in his contest with God; as the result of his struggle his natural self is left behind, he rises from it an altered man. A new truth is vividly brought home to him,—the valuelessness before God of the weapons in which he has hitherto trusted. The lameness which he carries away with him is, as it were, a palpable memento of the fact. And his new name symbolizes his new nature. It is true, even before this, he has not been represented as destitute of religious feeling; his prayer in 32^{10} evinces humility, thankfulness, and a sense of dependence upon God. Indeed this prayer may be said to prepare psychologically for the spiritual struggle which follows. But it is the result of this struggle that henceforth the better and higher elements in his character assert themselves more strongly than they had done before. In his dealings with Esau in ch. 33 he is politic, and makes the best of the situation; but he cannot be said to treat his brother dishonourably. His rebuke of Simeon and Levi in 34^{30}, however, shows timidity and weakness, and is not prompted by any motive higher than expediency. In his old age domestic trials overtake him: he loses Rachel; for many years he is bereaved of his favourite son; the dread of losing another son weighs heavily upon him (42^{38} 43^{14}): his character is mellowed and softened; and the picture of his closing days is that of a just and God-fearing typical Israelite, strong in faith (48^{21}), and grateful for the Providence which had 'shepherded' him through his long course of anxieties and vicissitudes, and 'redeemed him from all evil' ($48^{15f.}$).

There remains the question, how far, and in what sense, the narratives relating to Jacob are historical. In approaching this question there are some important things to be borne in mind. (1) Upon any view of the Book of Genesis, it was not committed to writing for many centuries after the events described in it occurred: we thus possess no guarantee whatever that it contains a literally exact record of the acts and sayings of the patriarchs; for it does not satisfy the primary canon of sound historical criticism, that only narratives contemporary, or nearly so, with the events narrated, and, moreover, consistent with themselves, can claim such a character. (2) It is remarkable how, in Gn, individuals and tribes seem to be placed on the same level, and to be spoken of in the same terms, and how, further, individuals seem frequently to be the impersonation of homonymous tribes. Thus Bethuel is mentioned as an individual (22^{23} 24^{15} al.), but his brothers Uz and Buz are tribes ($22^{21f.}$). Ḳeturah, again, is described as an individual (25^{1}); but her sons and grandsons are tribes (25^{2-4}). In Gn 10 nations are quite manifestly represented as individuals; and one of them, Cush, has, conversely, an individual for his son (10^{8}). So elsewhere: Machir, in Gn 50^{23} an individual, in Nu 26^{29} 'begets' (the country) Gilead; in Jg 11^{1} Gilead 'begets' Jephthah.† Again, Canaan, Japheth, and Shem, in Noah's blessing (Gn 9^{25-27}), clearly represent three groups of nations: Ishmael (16[12]) is in character the personification of the desert tribes whose descent is traced to him (25[13-15]): Esau 'is Edom' (25[30] 36[1. 8. 19]; cf. Jer 49[10]), and Edom is the name of a people. More than this, 'Jacob' and 'Israel' are themselves national names, the latter a standing one, the former a poetical synonym (Gn 49[7], even in Jacob's own mouth; Nu 23[21. 23], Dt 32[9] 33[28], Hos 10[11] 12[3], Am 7[2. 5], and frequently). Heredity is undoubtedly a true principle: children inherit the qualities of their parents; they also often experience, for good or for ill, as the case may be, the consequences of their parents' acts; but it would be extending the principle altogether unduly to suppose that the character and political condition of an entire group of peoples were really determined by a father's curse upon their ancestor (Gn 9[25]), or to imagine that the whole subsequent history of two of the Israelitish tribes was fixed in reality (49[5-7]) by an act of their ancestors, in which, after all, they were merely maintaining, by means consistent with the manners of the age, the honour of a sister. In cases such as these, we can surely have only the explanations devised either by popular imagination, or by a poet interpreting the mind of his people, for the purpose of accounting for national character, and national conditions, as they existed at a later age.

* At least according to J (30^{31-43}). According to E ($31^{4-16.\ 26-43}$), Laban arbitrarily and unfairly changes Jacob's wages; but Jacob's gains are not due to his own artifices, but to the dispositions of Providence (31^{8-12}). As the two narratives are thus derived from different sources, it follows that $31^{5b.\ 7-9.\ 12.\ 24.\ 29}$ do not express, or imply, divine approval of the artifices described in 30^{31-42}.

Admitting, however, that these principles are true, how far may they be adopted in explanation of the patriarchal narratives? Are Jacob and his twelve sons, Esau, and Laban simply the personifications of corresponding peoples, Israel and the 12 tribes, Edom, and Syria (like Hellen, with his sons, Dorus and Æolus, and his grandsons, Achæus and Ion, among the Greeks), the characteristic features of each being reflections of the circumstances and relations of the age which gave them birth (cf. Wellh. Hist. 318–325)?* An unsubstantial figure, like Canaan, might be an example of such personification; but the abundance of personal incident and detail makes such a view improbable in the case, at least, of the principal patriarchal characters. May they then represent tribes and sub-tribes? in other words, may the movements, and mutual relations, of tribes and sub-tribes have been expressed in a personal and individual form? This is Ewald's view. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob represent the successive migratory movements of Hebrew tribes from the original common home of the Hebrew and Aramæan nationalities in Aram-naharaim across the Euphrates. Jacob's father was a Hebrew already settled in Canaan: his mother was an Aramæan (Gn 25[20]); he marries two Aramæan wives: after a long contest with his uncle (and father-in-law) Laban, 'the Aramæan' (25[20] 28[5] 31[20. 24]), he ultimately comes to terms with him, returns to Canaan with great wealth, and finally gives his name to the people settled there: this means that a new and energetic branch of the Hebrew race migrated from its original home in Aram-naharaim, pushed forward into Canaan, amalgamated there with the Hebrews ('Isaac') already on the spot (becoming thereby Isaac's 'son'), and, in virtue of the superior practical abilities displayed by it, acquired ultimately supremacy over all its kin: the contest with Laban 'represents the struggle which continued, probably for centuries, between the crafty Hebrews on the opposite banks of the Euphrates, showing how in the end the southern Hebrews gained the upper hand and the northern were driven off in derision': Edom was a branch ('son') of the tribe represented by 'Isaac'; 'Jacob,' becoming fused with this tribe, is Esau's 'brother,' but at the same time his younger brother, as arriving later in Canaan,—though, as he became afterwards the more powerful nation he is described as having wrested from him his birthright: similarly, Jacob's wives and sons represent the existence of different elements in the original community, and the growth of tribal distinctions within it.* Ewald, however, holds at the same time that Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph are historical characters, prominent leaders of the nation at successive stages of its history (pp. 301, 305 f., 340, 342, 345, 382).† Again, the amount of personal incident and detail in the patriarchal narratives seems to constitute an objection to this explanation of their meaning: would the movements of tribes be represented in this veiled manner on such a large scale as would be the case if this explanation were the true one? No doubt, there are elements of truth in both these explanations: each will account reasonably for some traits in the patriarchal narratives: the question is, whether they will account for all.

The view which on the whole may be said best to satisfy the circumstances of the case is the view that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are historical persons, and that the accounts which we have of them are in outline historically true, but that their characters are idealized, and their biographies in many respects coloured by the feelings and associations of a later age. 'J,' says Mr. Ottley,‡ and his remarks are equally true of E, 'describes the age of the patriarchs as in some essential respects so closely similar to later periods, that it can only be regarded as a picture of primitive life and religion drawn in the light of a subsequent age. We have here to do with the earliest form of history—traditional folk-lore about primitive personages and events, worked up according to some preconceived design by a devout literary artist.' The basis of the narratives in Genesis is in fact popular oral tradition; and that being so, we may expect them to display the characteristics which popular oral tradition does in other cases. They may well include a substantial historical nucleus: but details may be due to the involuntary action of popular invention or imagination, operating during a long period of time; characteristic anecdotes, reflecting the feelings, and explaining the relations, of a later age may thus have become attached to the patriarchs; phraseology and expression will nearly always be ascribed rightly to the narrators who cast these traditions into their present literary shape. One very conspicuous interest in these narratives is the explanation of existing facts and institutions—the fact, for instance, that Edom, though an older nation than Israel (36[31]), was nevertheless politically its inferior, the sanctity of Bethel and its famous monolith, the names borne both by Israel itself and by its twelve tribes, the origin of the great border-cairn on Gilead, the names of places, as Bethel, Mahanaim, Penuel, Succoth, Allon-bachuth, Abel-mizraim, the custom of not eating of a particular muscle (32^{32}), the ethnological relations subsisting between Israel and its neighbours (Ishmaelite tribes, 25^{12-17}; Edom, and the racial affinities of its inhabitants, ch. 36), the characteristics of the different tribes (48^{19}; ch. 49). It may be doubted whether in all these cases we have the real historical explanations of the facts in question, and not rather explanations due to popular imagination, or suggested by current etymologies: in some cases, it will be remembered, we find duplicate and inconsistent traditions respecting the same occurrences. Wellhausen may be wrong in not allowing a more substantial historical substratum for the patriarchal narratives; but his general characterization of them is just.*

† Dillmann's view is substantially that of Ewald: recollections of tribal movements are preserved in the family histories of Genesis; Isaac and Jacob, like Lot, Ishmael, Esau, and their sons, being 'ideal personal names,' derived either from subdivisions of the nation as it existed at a later time, or from historical stages of its growth, Jacob representing a new Hebrew immigration from Mesopotamia; Abraham, however, being the personal leader of the first band of immigrants, who, according to all the Pentateuchal narrators, was the spiritual father of the entire nation (Gen.[6] 218, 219, 316 [Eng. tr. vol. ii. pp. 1–5, 190]; AT Theol. 77 f., 79–81). (Dillmann's remarks on these narratives of Genesis contain much that is suggestive and excellent, and deserve to be read in their entirety). The view of Kittel (Gesch. i. 153 [Eng. tr. i. 168 ff.]) is similar, except that he treats the patriarchs more distinctly as personal tribal chiefs, who afterwards gave their names to the tribes led by them.

It must further be allowed that the characters of the patriarchs are coloured religiously by the feelings and beliefs of a later age. In the days of the patriarchs, religion must have been in a rudimentary stage: there are traces of this in the idea, for instance, of the revelations of deity being confined to particular spots, and in the reverence paid to sacred trees or pillars; but at the same time the patriarchs often express themselves in terms suggesting much riper spiritual capacities and experiences. Here we cannot but trace the hands of the narrators, who were men penetrated by definite moral and religious ideas, and who, writing with a didactic aim, idealized to a certain extent the characters of the patriarchs, and, while not stripping them of the distinctive features with which they were traditionally invested, so filled in the outlines supplied by tradition as to present the great figures of Hebrew antiquity as spiritual types, examples, for imitation or warning, as the case might be, for successive generations.

The patriarchs are, thirdly, idealized in another direction, in common with many of the other patriarchal figures in Genesis, by being invested with the characteristics which afterwards marked the tribes descended, or reputed to be descended, from them: † indeed it is possible that sometimes even episodes of tribal life are referred back to them in the form of incidents occurring within the limits of their own families. Ishmael, for instance, in 16^{12} may be the personal son of Abraham; but if he is this, he is also something more: he impersonates the Bedawîn of the desert. So Jacob and Esau, in their contest for supremacy, are more than the twin sons of a man named Isaac: they impersonate two nations; and the later relations subsisting between these two nations plainly colour parts of the narrator's representation (esp. the terms of the Blessings). Jacob, keeping Laban's sheep, may be an individual; but when he and Laban are fixing the boundary which neither is to pass, they plainly represent two peoples. The story of Shechem and Dinah is one in which especially it may be suspected that this explanation is the correct one. Jg 9 shows how, after the conquest, Israelites and Canaanites lived in Shechem side by side; the almost complete identity of expression between Gn 33^{19} 'the sons of Ḥamor, the father of Shechem,' and Jg 9^{28} 'the men of Ḥamor, the father of Shechem' (where Shechem is clearly the place),‡ raises a legitimate doubt whether in the former passage 'Shechem' does not mean the place as well, and whether therefore in ch. 34 the same name is not a personification of the inhabitants of the place: if this view be correct, ch. 34 will mean that an Israelite clan (Dinah) had gained a footing in Shechem, and was in danger of being absorbed by the native Canaanites (the Benê Ḥamor): Simeon and Levi interposed to prevent this; * but their action was not supported by the Israelites at large ('Jacob,' 34^{30}); cf. $49^{5.6}$. Gn 49^{7}, it has even been conjectured, contains an allusion to the result: the Canaanites retaliated with such effect that these two tribes were broken up, and never afterwards recovered from the blow.† See art. SIMEON (TRIBE).

But, however that may be, it is impossible not to be impressed by the remarkable manner in which Jacob, both in the brighter and in the darker aspects of his character, is the prototype of his descendants. His doubtful qualities exactly recall that remarkable faculty of acquiring wealth and influence which the Jew possesses in such an extraordinary degree, and which, as must be admitted by his best friends, he is unfortunately apt to exercise with an exaggerated regard to self-interest. 'By Jacob's peculiar discipline of exile and suffering, a true counterpart is produced of the special faults and special gifts, known to us chiefly through his persecuted descendants in the Middle Ages. Professor Blunt has, with much ingenuity, pointed out how Jacob seems to have "learned, like maltreated animals, to have the fear of man habitually before his eyes." ‡ In Jacob we see the same timid, cautious watchfulness that we know so well, though under darker colours, through our great masters of fiction, in Shylock of Venice, and Isaac of York. But no less, in the nobler side of his career, do we have the germs of the unbroken endurance, the undying resolution, which keeps the nation alive still even in its present outcast condition, and which was the basis, in its brighter days, of the heroic zeal, long-suffering, and hope of Moses, of David, of Jeremiah, of the Maccabees, of the twelve Jewish apostles, and the first martyr, Stephen.' §

JACOB'S WELL.—The ancient records contain no account of Jacob having dug a well. The earliest mention of it occurs in Jn 4^{6} (πηγὴ τοῦ 'Ιακώβ). There, however, it is taken as matter of common belief that the well by which our Saviour conversed with the woman of Samaria was made by the patriarch. The traditions of Jew, Moslem, and Christian concur in identifying this well with that now universally known by the name Bir Ya'ḳúb, or 'Jacob's well.' The Samaritans, who have dwelt in the locality for about 2300 years, have never wavered in their conviction that this was the work of Jacob. The circumstances connected with the founding of their community would lead them to make the most of all traditional associations which their neighbourhood afforded, with the fathers of Israel. That they were tempted in some cases to invent such associations, seems all too likely; but there are elements which go to confirm this tradition. It is in itself a strong presumption in favour of this site, that the Jewish belief coincides with that of the Samaritans. Considering the strenuous opposition offered to other identifications supported by the Samaritans, we may be sure this would not have escaped had there been any ground on which to attack it. The agreement indicated in the narrative between the Jews and Samaritans in the 1st cent. may be taken to prove the existence of a tradition inherited by both from a time anterior to the great quarrel. But the tradition also afforded a reasonable explanation of the presence of the well in this particular spot, in such close proximity to plentiful streams from perennial sources. These were naturally in the hands of the people of Shechem. When Jacob pitched his camp in the plain near by, being a man of peace, he would desire to avoid all occasion for the strifes so often arising from the contentions of rival herdsmen at the springs. By digging this well, he could secure the necessary supplies, make good his own independence, and enjoy an added assurance of peace. Jacob's residence here in such conditions is the one circumstance recorded in history which satisfactorily accounts for the existence of this well.

That it was here Jesus held His memorable interview with the woman of Samaria, seems beyond dispute. Going through Samaria to Galilee, Jesus must needs pass close by this place. As one journeys northward along the base of Mt. Gerizim, skirting the fertile plain of Mukhneh, almost opposite the entrance to the pass between Ebal and Gerizim, the road bifurcates, one branch bending to westward, through the vale to Shechem, and thence by way of Sebastîyeh (Samaria) and Jenîn to Galilee. The other goes northward, across the bay of the plain where it narrows between the mountains, and again divides; one limb passing downwards to Beisân and the Sea of Galilee, the other leading straight to Jenîn. Either of these roads may still be taken. While that past Sebastîyeh is naturally the more frequented to-day, the other is more direct; and it is impossible to say which was the more popular in Christ's time. But as the well in question lies in the fork between the two, it was equally easily accessible to the traveller from either.

The well is described as being close by Sychar, 'near to the parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his son Joseph' (Gn 48[22]). If, as seems certain, this was the plot spoken of in Gn 33[19], it lay before, i.e. to the east of, the city of Shechem, where, in the plain, the patriarch had chosen his residence. It became, according to St. Stephen (Ac 7[16]), the burying-place of those that went down to Egypt; and here the bones of Joseph were laid to rest (Jos 24[32]). The modern town of Nâblus, representing the old Shechem, lies in the hollow between Ebal and Gerizim, less than 2 miles to the west, and is apparently farther distant than was the ancient city. The traditional tomb of Joseph is seen in the vale close by to the north-east; and just beyond this, to the lower slopes of Mount Ebal clings the village of 'Askar, which probably represents the town of Sychar mentioned in the narrative (see 'The Question of Sychar' in G. A. Smith's HGHL pp. 367–375). Eastward and southward stretches the rich plain which attracted Jacob and his flocks, whose whitening fields arrested the Saviour's eye, and where valuable crops are grown to-day.

Mount Gerizim throws its rugged crags steeply against the sky, immediately to the south, and, crowning the heights, just behind the Moslem Wely seen from the well's mouth, are the ruins of Justinian's fortress and the Samaritan place of sacrifice, enshrined in the sacred memories of millenniums. The dark cliffs seem almost to impend over the spot, so that it would be most natural, standing at the brink of the well, to speak of it as 'this mountain.' In these respects the situation of Bîr Ya'ḳûb exactly meets the requirements of the history.

The mouth of the well is some feet below the present surface, in the midst of a vaulted chamber, about 15 ft. square, the roof of which has fallen in. Major Anderson made a descent into the well in 1866, an account of which he gives in the Recovery of Jerusalem, p. 465. 'The mouth of the well,' he says, 'has a narrow opening, just wide enough to allow the body of a man to pass through with arms uplifted, and this narrow neck, which is about 4 ft. long, opens into the well itself, which is cylindrically shaped, and about 7 ft. 6 in. in diameter. The mouth and upper part of the well is built of masonry, and the well appears to have been sunk through a mixture of alluvial soil and limestone fragments, till a compact bed of mountain limestone was reached, having horizontal strata which could easily be worked; and the interior of the well presents the appearance of having been lined throughout with rough masonry.' The estimates of depth have varied widely, from Arculfus (A.D. 670), who gives it as about 240 ft., to Maundrell (1697), who puts it at 105 ft.; and Major Anderson, who found it to be 75 ft. No doubt it was originally much deeper than it is now. In the decay of the several buildings that have stood over it, much rubbish must have fallen into it, and the habit travellers have of dropping a stone into a pit and watching how long it takes to reach the bottom, that so they may judge of the depth, contributed to the same result. This now, however, is carefully guarded against. Some years ago the well, and ground around it, were acquired by the authorities of the Greek Church in Nâblus. A dry-stone wall surrounds the plot, which has been planted out as an orchard, the keeper being accommodated in a small hovel by the gate. Over the well itself a hut has been built, the key of which is in charge of a neighbouring priest, in whose company the well may be visited.

A succession of churches stood on this spot, as we gather from the narratives of pilgrims. The last appears to have been destroyed after the crushing defeat of the Crusaders in 1187. An excellent account of the ruins of these buildings will be found in the PEF Mem. ii. p. 174, etc. A stone was found in 1881 (see PEFSt, p. 212), which may have been the original cover of the well.

The water now usually lasts until the month of May, and sometimes later. Then it disappears until the return of the rainy season. If the well were cleaned out, doubtless it would last much longer. Maundrell found 15 ft. of water in May 1697. The supply is therefore probably derived from percolation and rainfall; and apparently it has never risen near to the surface—the woman says 'the well is deep.' This possibly suggested to Jesus the phrase 'living water' as descriptive of His truth. For 'living water' is, in the language of the East, that of the fountain or stream as contrasted with that collected in cistern or well. In Jn 4[5] the name used is indeed πηγὴ τοῦ Ἰακώβ, the well or fountain of Jacob; but in vv.[11. 12] the woman uses the strictly accurate term τὸ φρέαρ, the water-tank or cistern. For most purposes, living water is preferred; but where this is very 'hard' or 'heavy,' like that 'gushing from the very bowels of rocky (limestone) Mount Ebal,' the 'light' water that descends from heaven is greatly valued. Thus the water of Jacob's well is highly esteemed by the modern inhabitants of Nâblus and district (see letter from Dr. Bailey, a former missionary in Nâblus, PEFSt, 1897, p. 67; cf. also pp. 149, 196).* If the same were true in our Lord's time, apart altogether from the sacred associations which would lend it special attractions, it would be sufficient to account for the presence of the woman there, even if her home were on the lip of the rushing stream at 'Askar.

JADDUS (B Ἰαδδούς, A Ἰοδδούς, AV Addus), 1 Es 5[38].—A priest whose descendants were unable to trace their genealogy at the time of the return under Zerub., and were removed from the priesthood. He is there said to have married Augia, a daughter of Zorzelleus or Barzillai, and to have been called after his name. In Ezr 2[61], Neh 7[63] he is called by his adopted name Barzillai; his original name Jaddus, and the name of his wife Augia, appear only in 1 Es. See BARZILLAI, No. 1.

JADON (יָדוֹן; Εὐαράων, Ἰαερείν, Ἰαρί, Ἰαρίμ, Ἀαρών; AB𝔄 omit; Neh 3[7]).—A Meronothite, who in company with the men of Gibeon and of Mizpah took part in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem. The title Meronothite occurs again 1 Ch 27[30], but a place Meronoth is nowhere named. According to Jos. Ant. VIII. viii. 5, ix. 1, J. was the name of the man of God sent from Judah to Jeroboam (1 K 13). This tradition probably rests upon the identification of this prophet with IDDO the seer (which see).

JAEL (יָעֵל 'mountain-goat'; see on the name, Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 90) is remembered on account of one famous episode in her life, of which we have two not altogether consistent accounts—one in prose (Jg 4[4–22]), the other in poetry (Jg 5[2–31]). We shall first examine the latter, as undoubtedly the earlier version, and then consider the additional information supplied by the prose narrative.

From the Song of Deborah we learn that Deborah, a prophetess, and Barak, determined to free their countrymen from the tyranny of the kings of Canaan (5[6. 19]), which seems to have been especially felt by the tribe of Issachar (v.[15]). The leader of these kings was Sisera, and against his army the tribes of Ephraim, Benjamin, Manasseh (v.[14]), Issachar (v.[15]), Zebulun, and Naphtali sent troops, the latter two tribes being especially active (v.[18]). The decisive battle was fought 'in Taanach by the waters of Megiddo' (v.[19]), where a great storm came on and 'the stars in their courses fought against Sisera' (v.[20]). The defeated leader escaped, and is described (v.[25]) as asking for hospitality from Jael, 'the wife of Heber the Kenite' (v.[24]). She gave the thirsty man to drink of the milk which would naturally be found in the tent of a nomad chieftain, and then 'she put her hand to the peg (יָתֵד), and her right hand to the workmen's hammer; and with the hammer she smote Sisera, she smote through his head, yea, she pierced and struck through his temples. At her feet he bowed, he fell, he lay; where he bowed, there he fell down dead' (vv.[26. 27]). For this exploit she is described in Deborah's triumphal ode as 'blessed above women.'

The first question to determine is, by what instrument and in what fashion is Jael here represented as having slain Sisera? Most modern critics (Cooke, Moore, Budde, etc.) hold that the words of vv.[26. 27] indicate that Sisera was struck down as he was in the act of drinking, Jael dealing him a sudden blow, much as Saladin slew the treacherous knight in Scott's Talisman. And some identify the 'peg' with the handle of the 'workmen's hammer' mentioned in the parallel clause of v.[26]. Thus W. R. Smith held that Jael's act was 'not the murder of a sleeping man, but the use of a daring stratagem. But the word "peg" suggested a tent-peg, and so the later prose story took it, and thereby misunderstood the whole thing' (OTJC[2] 132). But it is extremely doubtful whether יָתֵד can mean anything but a 'tent-pin' (Ex 27[19]) or 'peg' (Is 22[25], Ezk 15[3]); and, further, the meaning of the verbs קָטַק (ἅπ. λεγ.) and חָלַף (see Job 20[24]) is too uncertain to entitle us to assert that there is here no hint of piercing, as contrasted with crushing, Sisera's skull. The truth is that vv.[26. 27] of ch. 5 are too obscure to admit of dogmatism as to their meaning; and it is by no means clear that they were misunderstood by the writer of the later prose narrative (4[22]), whose account is: 'Jael took a tent-pin (יָתֵד), and took an hammer in her hand, and went softly unto him, and smote the pin into his temples, and it pierced through into the ground; for he was in a deep sleep: so he swooned and died.'

The prose narrative, then, is not necessarily in contradiction with the Ode as to the manner of Sisera's death, though undoubtedly, if we had only the Ode to guide us, we should not be able to reproduce the scene described in 4[21]. The prose narrator seems to have had independent information, oral or otherwise.

There are other points of difference between chs. 4 and 5 which make it probable that the later writer has made free use of sources other than the Song. (a) As we have seen, 5[14. 15. 18] describes the uprising of many tribes; but in 4[10] Barak collects 10,000 men from Zebulun and Naphtali only. It cannot, however, be denied that these are the tribes whose prowess is most prominent in the Song (5[18]). (b) In the poem, kings of Canaan are mentioned, of whom Sisera is the leader; in 4[2] Sisera is the general of Jabin, king of Canaan (or [4[17]] of Hazor), under whose tyranny the people of Israel had been 'mightily oppressed' for twenty years (4[3]). (c) The connexion of Jabin with the Jael-Sisera story is not clear. Jabin takes no part in the action; and it is possible that he has been introduced here through a reminiscence of Jabin, king of Hazor, the head of a Canaanite confederacy, whose army Joshua defeated at the Waters of Merom (Jos 11[1-11]). (d) Jabin's city, Hazor, was in Galilee, far distant from the Kishon Valley; and Kedesh is north of Hazor. Here (4[11]) were Heber's tents,* to which Sisera fled after his defeat, having first (4[15]) abandoned his chariot with the view of escaping his pursuing enemy. But (α) it is curious that Sisera should have passed by Jabin's stronghold when seeking shelter;† and (β) it is difficult to reconcile the geographical data of the prose version with the implication that Jael's tent was not far from the battlefield.

To return to the episode of Sisera's death at the hands of Jael. The prose version makes the case against Jael blacker than the song does; for (a)

* The letter is quoted in HGHL[3] p. 676.

* In Jg 1[16] it is recorded that 'the children of the Kenite, Moses' brother-in-law,' accompanied the tribe of Judah to the north of Palestine after the conquest of the country. After some unspecified time, Heber, seemingly an important person among them, moved northward to the territory of Naphtali, and 'pitched his tent as far as the oak in Zaanannim, which is by Kedesh' (4[11]). While living there, he seems, according to 4[17], to have formed an alliance with Jabin.

† It might be urged that Sisera may have thought the tent of the women a more secure haven than Jabin's city; a defeated and discredited general might well fear to return to his master in 4[18] she invites Sisera to her tent, (b) in 4[20] his trustful reliance on her loyalty is shown by his charge to her to stand at the tent door and deny, if asked, that any one lay concealed within; and (c) in 4[21] she kills him when asleep. But, on either story, her act seems one of black and inexcusable treachery; and difficulty has been felt in reconciling the words of approval in 5[24] with the verdict of conscience. Various expedients have been devised to evade the difficulty. It has been supposed that Jael was granted a revelation from God (cf. Jg 4[9]) bidding her slay Sisera, and that her action is to be compared to Joshua's alleged pitiless extermination of the aboriginal inhabitants of Canaan, in accordance with the command recorded in Dt 7[1. 2]. But this is to read something into the narrative for which there is no scriptural warrant; Jael seems to have acted entirely on her own initiative. Mozley* gave a more plausible explanation. When Sisera was in Jael's power, he urges, she was in a dilemma; she must be treacherous to him or disloyal to Israel, for, if he got away safely, no one could tell how soon he might raise another army. Now she looked on him as an outlaw, as one who had no right to life or fair dealing, for the divine command had gone forth for the destruction of him and his host; and the idea of human personality, of the individual's private rights, was little developed in that primitive age. And thus she was justified, relatively to the morality of her time, in killing Sisera; and the commendation of 5[24] is to be interpreted in like manner as expressing the natural feelings of a semi-barbarous people. This explanation, though valuable as laying stress on the rude condition of the Hebrew conscience in the early stages of Hebrew history, is not altogether satisfactory. For Jael's act was not in accordance with contemporary morality.† It was a violation of the duty of hospitality, conspicuously sacred among her countrymen and in her age. To such a degree did Lot regard it that he was willing to purchase the safety of his guests by the honour of his daughters (Gn 19[8]). And, according to the prose narrative, Sisera was not Jael's enemy: 'There was peace between Jabin, king of Hazor, and the house of Heber the Kenite' (Jg 4[17]). Thus she must have been in danger from the advance of Barak's army, flushed with victory, in whose track her tent lay, unless she could devise some plan for propitiating the conqueror. Self-preservation suggested the way of escape, and she adopted it. 'Come and I will show thee the man whom thou seekest,' she said to Barak (4[22]).

But whether her motive was patriotic or selfish, the 'moral difficulty' of the narrative is serious only to those who do not recognize the gradual education of mankind. Jael's act was not moral according even to her own standard, and thus to compare her with Judith or with Charlotte Corday is not quite apt. The approval of Deborah's Song must be ranked with those passages in the imprecatory Psalms which breathe at times the cruel and vengeful spirit of man, rather than the Spirit of God. See DEBORAH, HEBER, JABIN, SISERA.

J. H. BERNARD.

JAGUR (יָגוּר).—A town in the extreme south of Judah, Jos 15[21]. The site is unknown.

JAH (יָהּ).—An abbreviated form of Jahweh (יְהוָה), found chiefly in proper names, but occasionally also besides. The form of the abbreviation is in accordance with analogy: the apocopation of the last syllable gave rise to yahw, and this, by the principles of the Massoretic vocalization, became yāhū (cf. tōhū from tohw, and, what is even a closer parallel, yishtaḥăweh, shortened after the wāw consecutive into yishtāhū, in pause yishtāḥū, through an intermediate form, not recognized by the Massoretes, yishtaḥw); and yāhū (יָהוּ) was afterwards shortened to yāh (יָהּ—with mappiq), and ultimately (in proper names) to yāh (יָ).

(1) Proper names, of which the second element is yāh, are very numerous in Hebrew: Mr. Gray (Studies in Heb. Proper Names, p. 284 ff.) enumerates 127 (e.g. Abijah, Uriah, Isaiah, etc.). The reader who is not conversant with Hebrew ought, however, to know that in the original the form in very many of these proper names is yāhū: on the whole, it may be said that the earlier form is yāhū, and the later form yāh (the h 'quiescing'); but there are exceptions to this rule, and sometimes both forms occur side by side in the same context.

Thus, to take a few examples (the names, in their earlier parts are written generally in their English form), we have in 1 K 1–2 Adoniyāhū, except in 1[5. 7. 18] 2[23] where we have Adoniyāh; Aḥazyāhū occurs regularly in both K and Ch, except in 2 K 1[3] 9[16. 23. 27. 29] 11[2], 2 Ch 20[35] Aḥazyāh; the same is the case with Eliyāhū (Eliyāh 2 K 1[3. 4. 8. 12], Mal 3[23], and, not of the prophet, 1 Ch 8[27], Ezr 10[21. 26]), Amazyāhū (Amazyāh 2 K 12[22] 13[12] 14[8] 15[1], Am 7[10. 12. 14], 1 Ch 4[34] 6[30]), Benayāhū (Benayāh 2 S 20[23], 1 Ch 4[36] 11[22. 31] 27[14], 2 Ch 20[14], Ezk 11[13] [v.[1] Benayāhū], Ezr 10[25. 30. 35. 43]), Yirmĕyāhū (the prophet), except 27[1] 28[5. 6. 10. 11. 12. 12. 15] 29[1], Dn 9[2], Ezr 1[1]; Yesha'yāhū (the prophet Isaiah) uniformly (including 2 Ch 26[22] 32[20. 32]); Uzziyāhū (the king), except 2 K 15[13. 30], Hos 1[1], Am 1[1], Zec 14[5]; Gedalyāhū (in 2 K 25, Jer 39–43) uniformly, except Jer 40[5. 6. 8] 41[16]; Hizkiyāhū (the king Hezekiah) uniformly, except 2 K 18[1. 10. 13. 14. 15. 16], Hos 1[1], Mic 1[1], Pr 25[1]; Athalyāhū (the queen), both K and Ch, except 2 K 11[1. 3. 13. 14], 2 Ch 22[12]; etc.: on the other hand, Uriyāh occurs everywhere, except Jer 26[20. 21. 23] (Uriyāhū); Ahiyāh is more common than Ahiyāhū (only 1 K 14[4. 5. 6. 18], 2 Ch 9[29]), occurring already in 1 S 14[3. 18], Malchiyāh than Malchiyāhū (Jer 38[6]), Micah in Jg 17–18 than Micayehū (17[1. 4]), Neriyāh (Baruch's father) in Jer than Neriyāhū (36[14. 32] 43[6]), Nethanyāh in Jer 40–41 than Nethanyāhū (40[8] 41[9]). In Ezr-Neh proper names compounded with -yah are very numerous; but the form -yāhū occurs but once (Ezr 10[41] Shelemyāhū): on the other hand, in the parts of Ch added by the compiler many of the names of Levites and others are written with -yāhū (see, e.g., 1 Ch 15[18. 21. 22. 24] 24[21-25] 25[12ff.] 26[2. 11. 14] 27[16ff.], 2 Ch 17[8] 29[12ff.]).*

(2) Outside proper names, Jah occurs only in poetry (mostly in late liturgical poetry), viz. Ex 15[2] 'My strength and a song is Jah' (cited Is 12[2], Ps 118[14]), Ex 17[16] (if the text be sound) in a poetically-worded passage of E (see RVm), Is 26[4] 'In Jah Jahweh is a rock of ages,' 38[11. 11] (Hezekiah's song), Ps 68[4. 18] 77[11] 89[8] 94[7. 12] 102[18] 115[17. 18] 118[5a. 17. 18. 19] 122[4] 130[3] 135[3. 4] 150[6a]; in three passages in which the Massoretes treat it (questionably) as part of a compound word, Jer 2[31] (text dub.), Ca 8[6], Ps 118[5b] (read prob. as RV); and in 'Hallelujah' (written in MT as one word, הַלְלוּיָהּ) 23 times (see HALLELUJAH) between Ps 104[35] and 150[6b] (always as a liturgical formula at the beginning or end of a Psalm).† It would be natural to think of the abbreviated form as first arising in connexion with proper names; but it is difficult to reconcile this view with Ex 15[2] 17[16], supposing the text of these passages to be sound, and the passages really early. The great majority of the occurrences of the word are indisputably late.

It was argued by Friedr. Delitzsch in 1881 (Paradies, pp. 158–166), in opposition to the generally accepted view, that Yah or Yahu was the original name of the God of Israel, and continued always to be the popular name; Yahweh was a later modification of Yahu, designed for the purpose of establishing a connexion with hāwāh, to be (or come to be), and so of making the name the expression of a theological truth (above, p. 199[b]). The principal grounds alleged for this opinion were the occurrence of the shorter form in all proper names, and the supposed traces of the name among Semitic nations (other than the Hebrews), who did not use the verb hāwāh, and could not consequently have formed a name from it. The same opinion has been adopted by Hommel (AHT 113 f., 115 f., 144, 145, 226), who follows Mr. Pinches * in thinking, in particular, that Yah is identical with Aï or Ya, found in an Arabian name Aï-kalabu on a contract-tablet of c. B.C. 2300, and in various Assyrian names (as Abu-Aï, Ashur-Aï, Samas-Aï) of 9–8 cent. B.C., and who, inferring from these indications the antiquity of the form, concludes that Yahweh is a later Mosaic modification of Yah, introduced for the purpose of imparting to it a new significance. Delitzsch's theory was criticized at the time by Philippi : † in view of the fact that Jahweh is the standing form of the name in the OT, and is attested independently for c. B.C. 850 by Mesha, while Jah, as shown above, is exceptional and mostly late, it is exceedingly difficult to think that the latter can be really the more original form ; while its occurrence in proper names is sufficiently accounted for by the tendency to abbreviation which would there be natural. The opinions of Pinches and Hommel have not hitherto (so far as the writer is aware) been endorsed by other Assyriologists.‡

* When yahw forms the first element of a proper name, it becomes—through an intermediate yĕhaw (cf. יְבָרְ from יְבָרֶךְ)—yĕhō, yō (as Jehoram, Joram); see Gray, p. 281 ff., who enumerates 29 names of this type; cf. p. 300 (El-yeho-'enai, 'Unto Yah are my eyes').

Among the Jewish names occurring on the cuneiform tablets of the Persian period, found recently by the Pennsylvanian Expedition at Nippur, are many of the form Gadalyāma (or -yāwa), Igdalyāma (or -yāwa), Mattanyāma (or -yāwa), i.e. Gedaliah, Igdaliah, Mattaniah, etc.§ Mr. Pinches had noted before, from the same age (PSBA, l.c. p. 14 f.), Gamaryāma (or -wa), i.e. Gemariah ; Natanayāma (or -wa), i.e. Nethaniah ; Shubunuyāma (or -wa), i.e. Shebaniah ; and others. These forms would seem to show that in the Persian age the divine element in such names was pronounced as a dissyllable ; it is strange, therefore, to find them in the books Ezr-Neh (as remarked above) all but uniformly written with -yāh. Perhaps further investigation may explain the discrepancy. S. R. Driver.

JAHATH (יַחַת, perh. for יַחְתָּה 'he [God] will snatch up').—1. A grandson of Judah, 1 Ch 4^{2}. 2. A great-grandson of Levi, 1 Ch $6^{20.\ 43}$. 3. A son of Shimei, 1 Ch 23^{10}. 4. One of the 'sons' of Shelomoth, 1 Ch 24^{22}. 5. A Merarite Levite in the time of Josiah, 2 Ch 34^{12}. JAHAZ (יַהַץ Is 15^{4}, Jer 48^{34} ; paus. and locale יָהְצָה Nu 21^{23}, Dt 2^{32} [cf. בְּיָהְצָה Jg 11^{20}] ; in Jos 13^{18} called יַהְצָה ; in 1 Ch 6^{78}, Jer 48^{21} יָהְצָה, RV Jahzah. The LXX renderings are :—Εἴσσα B Nu 21^{23} ; Ἰάσσα $B^{a}AF$ Nu 21^{23} ; B Dt 2^{32}, A Jos 13^{18}, Ἰάσα Jg 11^{20} where A has Ἰηλ, Βάσαν B Jos 13^{18}. The variations and omissions in Jos 21^{36}, 1 Ch 6^{78}, Is 15^{4}, Jer $48^{21.\ 34}$ are too complicated for reproduction).—A town at which Sihon was defeated by Israel (Nu 21^{23}, Dt 2^{32}, Jg 11^{20}). According to Tristram and Palmer, it was south of the Arnon on a site marked in maps as Muhatel el-Haj. But as Jahaz is counted among the cities of Reuben, whose southern boundary was the Arnon, a situation to the north of that river seems required. After the crossing of the Arnon, messengers were sent to Sihon from the 'wilderness of Kedemoth,' Dt 2^{26}, and he 'went out against Israel into the wilderness and came to Jahaz,' Nu 21^{23}. Jahaz is mentioned in connexion with Kedemoth, Jos 13^{18} 21^{36}. These passages indicate a position for Jahaz in the S.E. portion of Sihon's territory. Eusebius in the Onomasticon (264. 94, Lagarde, p. 267) describes Jahaz as existing in his time between Medeba and Dibon (Δηβοῦς). This assigns a more central position to Jahaz, and implies that Israel, before encountering the forces of Sihon, disregarding his refusal, had advanced some distance into his land. If for Δηβοῦς we read Ἐσβοῦς, as Reland (Pal. tom. 2, p. 825) suggests, the position of Jahaz will be farther north. Jahaz was one of the Levite cities of Reuben belonging to the children of Merari, Jos 13^{18} 21^{36} (see note in RVm), 1 Ch 6^{78}. According to the Moabite Stone (ll. 18–20), the king of Israel dwelt at Jahaz while at war with king Mesha, but was driven out, and the town was taken and added to Moabite territory. Isaiah (15^{4}) and Jeremiah ($48^{21.\ 34}$) refer to it as in the possession of Moab. The site has not yet been identified. See SEP Mem. p. 279 note, and G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 559 and note.

JAIR (יָאִיר 'he enlightens' or 'one giving light').—1. A son of Manasseh and contemporary of Moses, Nu 32^{41}, Dt 3^{14}, Jos 13^{30}, 1 K 4^{13}, 1 Ch $2^{22ff.}$. 2. One of the judges, Jg $10^{3ff.}$. According to another tradition he was the same as 1. A very ancient, probably the original, account of the conquest of Gilead is contained in Nu $32^{39.\ 41ff.}$. There can be little doubt that it describes a conquest made after the main body of Israelites were settled west of the Jordan. It has, however, got mixed up with the story of the Mosaic conquest of the lands east of Jordan. Even if there was a Jair contemporary with Moses, he could not have been literally the 'son' of Manasseh (see Driver on Dt 3^{14}), hence 'son' must in any case be interpreted in the sense of descendant. Attempts have been made unsuccessfully by Keil and others to distinguish the Jair of the Hexateuch from the Jair of Jg, as well as to harmonize the somewhat conflicting notices about the 'tent-villages' (ḥavvoth-Jair). In Jg $10^{3f.}$ Jair is said to have had 30 sons that rode on 30 ass colts, and to have 'judged' Israel 22 years. The 'tent-villages' are there given as 30, whereas in 1 Ch 2^{23}, which possibly reflects post-exilic relations (Moore), they are 23 in number. See, further, the Comm. of Dillm., Driver, and Moore on the above-cited passages, and the article Havvoth-Jair. 3. The father of Mordecai, Est 2^{5}. 4. (יָעִר; Kerê,* יָעִיר; Kethibh) Father of Elhanan, 1 Ch 20^{5}. By a scribal error this Jair is called in 2 S 21^{19} Jaare-oregim (wh. see, and cf. Driver, Text of Sam., and Budde, SBOT, ad loc.).

JAIRITE, THE (הַיָּאִרִי; B ὁ Ἰαρείν, A ὁ Ἰαειρεί; Jairites), i.e. of the family of Jair, the son of Manasseh, whose descendants lived in Gilead (Nu 32^{41} etc.). The gentilic adjective occurs only in connexion with Ira (wh. see), who is further described as 'priest unto David' (2 S 20^{26}). Many scholars, however, consider that 'Jattirite' (הַיַּתִּרִי) should be read for 'Jairite' in this passage. If this reading be adopted (cf. Pesh. ܝܬܝܪܝ) Ira might possibly be of the tribe of Levi, since Jattir was a priestly city in the hill-country of Judah (Jos 15^{48} 21^{14}, cf. 1 S 30^{27}).

JAIRUS (Ἰάειρος, the Gr. form of OT Jair).—1. The father of Mordecai (Ad. Est 11^{2}), called in Est 2^{5} Jair. 2. Eponym of a family of 'temple servants' (1 Es 5^{31}) (AV Airus, RVm Reaiah). 3. The ruler of the synagogue whose daughter was restored to life by Jesus (Mk 5^{22}, Lk 8^{41}). See next article.

JAIRUS (RV Jaïrus, Ἰάειρος, probably a transcription of OT name יָאִיר), a ruler of the synagogue, who dwelt at or near Capernaum. After Jesus had returned from Gergesa (Gadara) he was approached by Jairus, a suppliant on behalf of his daughter, aged twelve, who was lying at home at the point of death, Mk $5^{21f.}$=Lk $8^{40f.}$=Mt $9^{18f.}$. Jesus at once set out for the house of Jairus, followed by a crowd; on the way another message came, announcing the death of the child. Having arrived, Jesus entered, taking with him Peter, James, and John, and tried to quell the noisy mourning with the words 'She is not dead, but sleepeth.' This assurance being misunderstood and ridiculed, Jesus expelled the mourners; with the parents and the three disciples went into the chamber of death; took the child's hand, and restored her with the words Talitha cumi (ταλιθὰ κούμ = 'maiden, arise'). So substantially the Synoptists. According, however, to Mt, Jairus comes while Jesus is at Matthew's feast, pleading for his daughter already dead; Mt does not give the name 'Jairus,' and calls him simply ἄρχων (of course=ἀρχισυνάγωγος). All three insert into the above narrative the incident of the woman with the Issue of Blood, which took place on the way to the house of Jairus.

JAKEH (יָקֶה; so the Vulg. Vomentis).—As a proper name, father of Agur, the author of the proverbs contained in Pr 30. For modes of interpreting the verse Pr 30^{1}, see Agur.

JAKIM (יָקִים).—1. A Benjamite, 1 Ch 8^{19}. See Genealogy, VIII. 12. 2. A priest, head of the 12th course, 1 Ch 24^{12}. See Genealogy, III. 15.

JALAM (יָעְלָם).—A 'son' of Esau, Gn $36^{5.\ 14.\ 18}$, 1 Ch 1^{35}.

JALON (יָלוֹן).—A Calebite, the son of Ezrah, 1 Ch 4^{17}. See Genealogy, IV. 53.

JAMBRES.—See Jannes and Jambres.

JAMBRI.—Soon after the death of Judas Maccabæus (B.C. 161), Jonathan and his adherents sent their personal property, which was no longer safe in the wilderness of Judæa, to the friendly country of the Nabatæans. The convoy, which was under the charge of John, a brother of Jonathan, was attacked and captured by a robber tribe, the sons of Jambri, near Medaba, on the E. of Jordan, and John himself slain. To avenge his death, Jonathan and Simon crossed the Jordan and waylaid a large wedding party belonging to this tribe. Many were slain, and the survivors fled to the mountains (1 Mac 9^{35-42}, Jos. Ant. xiii. i. 2–4).

There is some uncertainty as to the true reading of the proper name, which does not occur elsewhere. Ἰαμβρείν A, Ἰαμβρί א*, Ἀμβρί א^{c} cursives; Syr. has ܐܡܒܪܝ ('Ambri). Josephus οἱ Ἀμαραίου παῖδες. 'Ambri is probably the orig. form: some have conjectured that this represents Amorites (so Grimm, Michaelis). H. A. White.

JAMES.—This name is our Eng. equivalent for the Ἰάκωβος of the Gr. Test., from which it is derived through the Italian Giacomo. It is used in NT of three different persons.

(1) James the son of Zebedee, sometimes called the Great.

(2) James the son of Alphæus.

(3) James the brother of the Lord.

1. James the son of Zebedee.—In Mk 1^{19} (Mt 4^{21}) he and his brother John are represented as mending their nets in their boat on the Sea of Galilee, and at the call of Christ leaving the boat to their father and the hired servants. They were partners with Simon and Andrew (Lk 5^{10}), who were fishing near them and were called at the same time in the words, 'Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men.' This was after John the Baptist had been cast into prison by Herod. We learn from Jn $1^{35ff.}$ that Andrew and his brother, and probably John also, were disciples of the Baptist, and had already been taught by him to see in Jesus 'the Lamb of God.' The call recorded by St. Luke (5^{1-11}) is regarded by many commentators as merely another account of the call narrated by St. Mark, but there is a great difference in the circumstances. Even the words addressed to Simon, which form the chief point of contact in the two, ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν ἀνθρώπους ἔσῃ ζωγρῶν, seem to be not so much another version of the words used by St. Mark, ποιήσω ὑμᾶς γενέσθαι ἁλιεῖς ἀνθρώπων, as a more urgent command based upon them; and there is a corresponding difference between the ἀφέντες τὰ δίκτυα, ἀφέντες τὸν πατέρα of St. Mark and the ἀφέντες τὰ πάντα of St. Luke.

* 'So LXX, Pesh. (Jerome 'filius saltus,' i.e. יער, without the plena scriptio).'—Driver, Text of Sam. 272 n^{1}.

The last call was that to the apostleship (Mt 10^{2}, Mk 3^{14}, Lk 6^{13}, Ac 1^{13}). In all four lists of the apostles, Peter, Andrew, James, and John form the first group; in Mk and Ac, James and John follow Peter; and throughout the history, especially at the Transfiguration and the Agony, we find these three preferred before the others. The fact that James always precedes John (except in Lk 9^{28}), and that John is sometimes described as the brother of James (Mk 5^{37}, Mt 17^{1}), suggests that James was the elder of the two. In Ac 12^{2} James is described as brother of John, to distinguish him from his greater namesake, the brother of the Lord. It is remarkable that he is never mentioned in the Fourth Gospel.

St. Mark tells us (3^{17}) that Jesus surnamed the two brothers Boanerges (Sons of Thunder), alluding, perhaps, to the vehemence shown in their demand that their Master should call down fire from heaven to consume the Samaritans, who refused to receive him because he was going up to Jerusalem (Lk 9^{53}); and again in their request that they might sit on his right hand and on his left hand in his kingdom (Mk 10^{37}), to which our Lord replied by the prophecy that they should drink of his cup and be baptized with his baptism.

The wife of Zebedee was Salome, as we learn from a comparison of Mt 27^{56} and Mk 15^{40}, who appears to have been a sister of the Lord's mother (see Jn 19^{25} and the article on BRETHREN OF THE LORD). James and John would thus be first cousins of Jesus, which may have been one reason why their mother urged their claim to the highest position in his kingdom. We learn from Mk 15^{41} (cf. Lk 8^{3}) that Salome was one of the women who followed Jesus in Galilee, and ministered to him of their substance. Combined with the mention of hired servants, and with St. John's intimacy with Caiaphas the high priest, this fact makes it probable that the family of Zebedee were comparatively well off.

We hear nothing of James, as distinguished from the other apostles, for some 14 years after the Crucifixion. The fact, however, that he was the first of the Twelve to suffer martyrdom, shows that he must have attracted the attention of the Jews and of Herod Agrippa by his bold uncompromising character. This Herod was son of Aristobulus, and grandson of Herod the Great and Mariamne. Herodias, who was the cause of the murder of John the Baptist, was his sister. After reigning in splendour for three years over a kingdom larger than that of his grandfather, Agrippa sought to increase his popularity still further by putting down the new Christian heresy. Shortly before the Passover of 44, he killed James with the sword, and threw Peter into prison (Ac $12^{1f.}$). The sacred writer records in the same chapter the punishment which followed (v.$^{21ff.}$, cf. Jos. Ant. XIX. viii. 2).

Eusebius (HE ii. 9) gives a quotation from the 7th book of the lost Hypotyposes of Clemens Alexandrinus, in which the latter mentions a tradition that the accuser of St. James was so much moved by his confession, that he declared himself to be a Christian, and was carried off with him to execution. On the way thither he asked forgiveness of the apostle, who, after a moment's hesitation, kissed him, saying, 'Peace be unto thee.' The same story is given in the Apostolica Historia of pseudo-Abdias (ap. Fabr. Cod. Apoc. NT), who also narrates the conversion of the magicians Hermogenes and Philetus by St. James.

The legend of Saint Iago, the patron saint of Spain, is given in Mrs. Jameson's Sacred and Legendary Art, vol. i. pp. 230-241. According to this, the gospel was first preached in Spain by St. James the Great, who afterwards returned to Judæa, and, after performing many miracles there, was finally put to death by Herod. His body was placed on board ship at Joppa and transported to Iria in the north-west of Spain under angelic guidance. The surrounding heathen were converted by the prodigies which witnessed to the power of the saint, and a church was built over his tomb. During the barbarian invasions all memory of the hallowed spot was lost till it was revealed by vision in the year 800. The body was then moved by order of Alphonso II. to the place now called Compostella (abbreviated from Jacomo Postolo), which became famous as a place of pilgrimage throughout Europe. The saint was believed to have appeared on many occasions mounted on a white horse, leading the Spanish armies to victory against their infidel foes.

The impossibilities of the story have been pointed out by Roman Catholic scholars. (1) It was a tradition of the early Church that the apostles, in accordance with a command of our Lord, did not leave Jerus. for twelve years after the Ascension (cf. the Κήρυγμα Πέτρου in Clem. Al. Strom. vi. p. 762; Apollonius in Euseb. HE v. 18 ad fin.). This is supported by what we read in Ac 8^{1}, that the apostles were still at Jerus. during the persecution in which Stephen was martyred. (2) St. Paul mentions his desire to visit Spain (Ro 15^{24}) just after he had spoken of his rule not to preach the gospel on another man's foundation. The probable date of Ro is 58 [Turner, 55–56], long after the martyrdom of St. James. (3) There is no certain mention of St. James in connexion with Spain till the 9th cent., when Notker, a monk of St. Gall, wrote: 'hujus Apostoli sacratissima ossa ad Hispanias translata in ultimis earum finibus condita celeberrima illarum gentium veneratione coluntur. Nec immerito, quia ejus corporali præsentia et doctrina atque signorum efficacia eidem populi ad Christi fidem conversi referuntur' (Martyrol. ad diem 25 Jul.). On the other hand, Innocent I. (d. 417) states that the Churches of Italy, Gaul, and Spain had all been founded by those who owed their authority to St. Peter (Ep. 25 ad Decantium); and Vincentius Fortunatus (fl. A.D. 600), speaking of the saints of different countries, makes Vincentius the chief glory of Spain ('Vincenti Hispana surgit ab arce decus,' Carm. vii. 3), as Alban of Britain, Hilary and Martin of Gaul, while the Jacobi are assigned to the Holy Land. (See the art. on JAMES by F. Meyrick in Smith, DB^{2}, and by R. Sinker in the Dict. of Chr. Antiq.; the Acta Sanctorum for July 25; Natalis Alexander, Hist. Eccl. sæcl. i. § 15; Forbes, Handbook of Spain, ch. on Santiago).

2. JAMES THE SON OF ALPHÆUS.—In the four lists of the apostles we find James, son of Alphæus, standing at the head of the 3rd group, of which the other members are Thaddæus (Mk 3^{18}), also called Lebbæus (Mt 10^{3} cod. D and AV) or Ἰούδας Ἰακώβου (Lk 6^{16}, Ac 1^{13}); Simon Zelotes (Lk 6^{15}, Ac 1^{13}), also called Σ. Καναναῖος (Mt 10^{4}, Mk 3^{18}), and Judas Iscariot. By St. Luke he is coupled with Simon, by St. Matthew and St. Mark with Thaddæus. Nothing else is told us about this James in the NT, but it is probable that he was a brother of Levi or Matthew, who is also called son of Alphæus (Mk 2^{14}). The phrase Ἰούδας Ἰακώβου means almost certainly 'the son,' not the 'brother of James.' He is usually identified with James the Little (AV 'the Less'), the brother of Joses and son of Mary, who is mentioned in Mk 15^{40}, Mt 27^{56}. This Mary is apparently called ἡ τοῦ Κλωπᾶ in Jn 19^{25}, words which some have interpreted 'the wife of Clopas,' and have in consequence identified Clopas with Alphæus. They have also understood the clause which precedes (ἡ ἀδελφὴ τῆς μητρὸς αὐτοῦ) of this Mary, instead of understanding it of Salome, and thus have identified James, son of Alphæus, with James the brother of the Lord. The extreme improbability of this hypothesis is pointed out in the art. on the BRETHREN OF THE LORD. Hegesippus (ap. Euseb. HE iii. 11) speaks of a Clopas who was brother of Joseph; if Mary was his wife, she would be aunt of the sons of Joseph, the brethren of the Lord. (The evidence as to the festival of James, son of Alphæus, being distinct from that of the brother of the Lord, is given in Sinker's article under this head in the Dict. of Chr. Antiq.).

3. JAMES THE BROTHER OF THE LORD.—See the article on the BRETHREN OF THE LORD for the proof that this James was the son of Joseph and Mary, not one of the Twelve, nor even a believer until after the Resurrection. His conversion seems to have been connected with a special appearance of the Risen Lord (1 Co 15^{7}). Of his subsequent history we gather from the Acts and the Epistles of St. Paul, that, after the Ascension, he with his brothers remained at Jerusalem in the company of the eleven apostles and Mary and the other women, waiting for the descent of the Spirit (Ac 1^{14}), and that within ten years from this time he became the head of the Church at Jerusalem. Thus in Gal $1^{18.19}$ St. Paul says that three years after his conversion, probably about A.D. 38, he went up to Jerus. and stayed with Peter fifteen days, seeing no other apostle, but only James the Lord's brother,—a statement which is quite in accordance with Ac 12^{17}, where Peter on his escape from prison (A.D. 44) is said to have gone to the house of Mary the mother of Mark, and desired that news of his escape might be sent to James and the brethren. In Gal 2^{1-10} St. Paul describes a later visit to Jerus. after an interval of fourteen years, i.e. about A.D. 51. In this visit the leaders of the Church, James, Peter, and John (Gal 2^{9}), after hearing his report of his first missionary journey, signified their approval of his work, and 'gave right hands of fellowship,' agreeing that Paul and Barnabas should preach to the Gentiles and they themselves to the circumcision. In vv.$^{11-14}$ Peter's inconsistency in regard to eating with the Gentiles at Antioch is explained by the arrival of 'certain from James.' St. Paul's second visit to Jerus. is more fully described in Ac 15^{4-29}, where James appears as president of the Council held to consider how far the Gentile Christians should be required to conform to the customs of the Jews. It is James who sums up the discussion and proposes the resolution which is carried, in the words ἐγὼ κρίνω μὴ παρενοχλεῖν τοῖς ἀπὸ τῶν ἐθνῶν ἐπιστρέφουσιν ἐπὶ τὸν θεόν, κ.τ.λ. James is seen in the same position of authority in Ac 21^{18}, when St. Paul presents himself before him on his return from his third missionary journey (A.D. 58). After joining in praise to God for the success which had attended his labours, James and the elders who are with him warn St. Paul of the strong feeling against him, which had been excited among the 'myriads of Jewish believers who were all zealous for the law,' by the report that he had taught the Jews of the Dispersion to abandon circumcision and their other customs. To counteract this impression, they recommended him to join in a Nazirite vow, which had been undertaken by four members of their community, as a proof that the report was unfounded, and that he himself walked according to the law. From 1 Co 9^{5} μὴ οὐκ ἔχομεν ἐξουσίαν ἀδελφὴν γυναῖκα περιάγειν ὡς καὶ οἱ λοιποὶ ἀπόστολοι καὶ οἱ ἀδελφοὶ τοῦ Κυρίου, it has been inferred that St. James was a married man. On his authorship of the Epistle which goes by his name, see next article.

Further particulars are supplied by Josephus, Hegesippus, the Gospel according to the Hebrews, and other apocryphal books, including in these the Clementine Homilies and Recognitions.

The Gospel according to the Hebrews, which Lightfoot speaks of as one of the earliest and most respectable of the apocryphal narratives (Gal. p. 274), is quoted by Jerome (de Vir. ill. 2) to the following effect: 'The Lord after his resurrection appeared to James, who had sworn that he would not eat bread from the hour in which he had drunk the cup of the Lord till he saw him risen from the dead. Jesus, therefore, took bread and blessed and brake it, and gave it to James the Just, and said to him, My brother, eat thy bread, for the Son of Man has risen from the dead.' There are other versions of the same story, in which the vow is dated, not from the Last Supper, but from the Crucifixion (see Nicholson's ed. of the Gospel, p. 62 f., and the Introduction to Mayor's St. James, p. xxxvii n.). Possibly, the reference to the Last Supper may have arisen from the fact that St. James shaped his vow after the Lord's words spoken at the Supper, 'I will not drink henceforth of the fruit of the vine till the kingdom of God shall come.'

Hegesippus (c. A.D. 160) is quoted by Eusebius (HE ii. 23) to the following effect: 'The charge of the Church after the Ascension devolved on James the brother of the Lord in concert with the apostles. He is distinguished from others of the same name by the title "Just," which has been applied to him from the first. He was holy from his mother's womb, drank no wine or strong drink, nor ate animal food: no razor came on his head, nor did he anoint himself with oil nor use the bath. To him only was it permitted to enter the Holy of Holies. . . . His knees became hard like a camel's, because he was always kneeling in the temple, asking forgiveness for the people. Through his exceeding righteousness he was called "Oblias," which, being interpreted, is "the defence of the people," and "Righteousness," as the prophet declared of him. Some of the seven sects of the Jews inquired of him, "What is the door of Jesus?" And he said that he was the Saviour; whereupon some believed that Jesus is the Christ. . . . Hence arose a disturbance among the Jews, fearing that all the people would look to Jesus as the Christ. They came, therefore, and . . . set James on the pinnacle of the temple and cried to him, "O thou just one to whom we all are bound to listen, tell us what is the door of Jesus." And he answered with a loud voice, "Why do ye ask me concerning Jesus the Son of Man? He is both seated in heaven on the right hand of Power, and he will come again on the clouds of heaven." And when many were convinced and gave glory at the witness of James, the same scribes and Pharisees said to each other, "We have done ill in bringing forward such a testimony to Jesus; let us go up and cast him down, that they may fear to believe him." And they cried out saying, "Alas! even the just has gone astray." And they fulfilled that which is written in Isaiah, "Let us take away the just, for he is not for our purpose." So they cast down James the Just, and they began to stone him, since he was not killed by the fall; but he kneeled down, saying, "O Lord God, my Father, I beseech thee forgive them, for they know not what they do." While they were thus stoning him, one of the priests of the sons of Rechab, of whom Jeremiah the prophet testifies, cried out, "Stop! what do ye? The just is praying for you." But one of them, who was a fuller, smote the head of the just one with his club. And so he bore his witness. And they buried him on the spot, and his monument still stands by the side of the temple with the inscription, "He hath been a true witness both to Jews and Greeks that Jesus is the Christ." And immediately Vespasian commenced the siege.'

Lightfoot has pointed out the many improbabilities in this narrative, and conjectures that it may have been taken by Hegesippus from the Ebionite Ἀναβαθμοὶ Ἰακώβου, of which we find traces in the Clementine Recognitions. In the Recognitions, as in Hegesippus, we read that James refuted the Jewish sects, and that he was hurled down from the temple by his persecutors. Lightfoot thinks that there may be truth in the statement that James was an ascetic and a Nazirite, and, we may add, in the respect entertained for him even by his unbelieving countrymen. The account of the death, however, which is given by Jos. (Ant. XX. ix. 1) is far more likely to be historical. 'During the interval between the death of Festus (prob. in the year 62) and the arrival of his successor Albinus, the high priest Ananus the younger, being of a rash and daring spirit, and inclined like the Sadducees in general to severity in punishing, brought to trial James the brother of Jesus, who is called the Christ, and some others before the court of the Sanhedrin, and, having charged them with breaking the laws, delivered them over to be stoned. The better class of citizens and those who were versed in the laws were indignant at this, and made complaints both to king Agrippa and to Albinus, on the ground that Ananus had no right to summon the Sanhedrin without the consent of the procurator; and Agrippa in consequence removed him from the high priesthood.' Origen (Cels. i. c. 47) and Euseb. (HE ii. 23) also cite Josephus as ascribing the miseries of the siege to the divine vengeance for the murder of James; but this does not occur in his extant writings.

Clement of Alexandria (ap. Euseb. HE ii. 1) says that Peter and James and John, who were most honoured by the Lord, chose James the Just to be bishop of Jerus. after the Ascension, and that the Lord imparted his esoteric teaching (τὴν γνῶσιν) to James the Just and Peter and John after his resurrection, and again that this was imparted by them to the other apostles, and by the latter to the Seventy.

In the Clementine Homilies (written early in the 3rd cent.) James is represented, in the letter addressed to him by Clement, as the chief ruler of the Church at large, Κλήμης Ἰακώβῳ τῷ κυρίῳ καὶ ἐπισκόπων ἐπισκόπῳ, διέποντι δὲ τὴν <ἐν> Ἱερουσαλὴμ ἁγίαν Ἑβραίων ἐκκλησίαν καὶ τὰς πανταχῆ θεοῦ προνοίᾳ ἱδρυθείσας, κ.τ.λ.

Eusebius (HE vii. 19) reports that his episcopal chair was still shown at Jerus. at the time when he wrote.

Besides the canonical Epistle of St. James, his name is attached to the apocr. Protevangelium Jacobi and the so-called Liturgy of St. James. See Dict. Chr. Antiq. p. 1019 f., art. 'Liturgy,' and Dict. of Chr. Biog. under 'Gospels, Apocryphal,' p. 701 f. J. B. MAYOR.

JAMES, THE GENERAL EPISTLE OF.—i. AUTHORSHIP.—The writer describes himself (1[1]) as 'James, a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ.' As the name was very common, and the description one which is applicable to all Christians, it is evident that he must have been distinguished from others who bore the same name by position or otherwise, so as to justify him in addressing the Twelve Tribes of the Dispersion with the tone of authority which is so marked a feature of the Epistle. This inference receives support from the Ep. of Jude, the writer of which styles himself 'brother of James,' evidently assuming that his brother's name would carry weight with those to whom he writes.

The Epistle itself is strongly contrasted, not only with Ro and Gal, against which some have supposed it to be directed, but also with 1 P, which, in some points, it closely resembles. In style it reminds one now of Pr, now of the stern denunciations of the prophets, now of the parables in the Gospels. It has scarcely any direct reference to Christ, who is indeed named only twice. In commending the duty of patience (5[7-11]) the writer refers to the example of the husbandman, and to Job and the prophets of the OT: if he alludes to our Lord at all, he does so only obscurely in the words 'ye killed the just; he doth not resist you'; while St. Peter, on the contrary, dwells exclusively on the example of Christ (1 P 2[19-24] 4[12-14]). In urging the duty of prayer, reference is made, not (as in He 5[7]) to the promises or prayers of Christ, but to the prayer of Elijah; the exhortation to kindness, and the warning against evil-speaking in ch. 3, are based, not on the example of Christ and the thought of our common brotherhood in him (as in 1 P 2[23], Ro 12[5], Eph 4[25]), but on the parables of nature, on the fact that man was created in the image of God, and on general reasoning; and again (in 4[11]) speaking evil of a brother is condemned as putting a slight on the law, not as causing pain to Christ. No mention is made of the crucifixion or resurrection, or of the doctrines of the incarnation and atonement. To a careless reader the tone seems scarcely to rise above that of the OT; Christian ideas are still clothed in Jewish forms. Thus the law, called for the sake of distinction 'the law of liberty' or 'the royal law,' seems to stand in place of the gospel, or even of Christ himself (2[8-13] 4[11]); the love of the world is condemned in the language of the OT as adultery against God. This contrast rises to its highest pitch in treating of the relation between faith and works (2[14-26]). While St. Paul writes (Ro 3[28]) 'We reckon, therefore, that a man is justified by faith without the works of the law,' the language of St. James is (2[24]) 'Ye see then that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only.' And while the case of Abraham is cited in Ro 4[3. 13. 16] in proof of the doctrine of justification by faith, and the case of Rahab is cited for the same purpose in He 11[31], St. James makes use of both to prove that man is justified by works (2[25]). Speaking generally, we may say that this Epistle has a more Jewish cast than any other writing of the NT, and that the author must have been one who would be more in sympathy with the Judaizing party, and more likely to exercise an influence over them, than any of the three great leaders, Peter, Paul, or John.

Comparing what is said of James the brother of the Lord in the preceding article, we find in him one who exactly fulfils the conditions required in the writer of the Epistle; and if we examine the speech attributed to him in Ac 15 and the circular letter there given, which was probably drawn up by him, we find in these a remarkable similarity to the language of the Epistle. That St. Luke has recorded the actual words of the speaker, either in the original language or in a translation, seems probable from his use of the form 'Symeon' (v.[14]), which is not found elsewhere in Ac, as well as from the resemblances, noticed by Alford (vol. iv. Prologomena), between 1 P and the speeches ascribed to him in the Ac. It is surely a remarkable coincidence that, out of 230 words contained in the speech and circular, so many should reappear in our Epistle, written on a totally different subject.

They are as follows: (1) the epistolary salutation χαίρειν (Ja 1[1], Ac 15[23]) found in only one other passage of the NT, the letter of Lysias to Felix (Ac 23[26]); (2) the curious phrase, borrowed from the LXX, which occurs in NT only in Ac 15[17] ἐφ' οὓς ἐπικέκληται τὸ ὄνομά μου ἐπ' αὐτούς, and Ja 2[7] τὸ καλὸν ὄνομα τὸ ἐπικληθὲν ἐφ' ὑμᾶς; (3) ἀκούσατε ἀδελφοί μου found in Ja 2[5] alone in the Epistles, compared with ἄνδρες ἀδελφοὶ ἀκούσατέ μου in Ac 15[13]; (4) ἐτισκέπτεσθαι Ja 1[27], Ac 15[14]; (5) ἐπιστρέφειν Ja 5[19. 20], Ac 15[19]; (6) τηρεῖν and διατηρεῖν, Ja 1[27] ἄσπιλον ἑαυτὸν τηρεῖν ἀπὸ τοῦ κόσμου, Ac 15[29] ἐξ ὧν διατηροῦντες ἑαυτοὺς εὖ πράξετε; (7) ἀγαπητός occurs in Ac only in 15[25] σὺν τοῖς ἀγαπητοῖς Βαρνάβᾳ καὶ Παύλῳ, while ἀδελφοί μου ἀγαπητοί is found three times in our Epistle; (8) the pregnant use of the word ὄνομα in Ja 5[10] ἐλάλησαν ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι Κυρίου, v.[14] ἀλείψαντες ἔλαίῳ ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι, 2[7] τὸ καλὸν ὄνομα, and in Ac 15[14] λαβεῖν ἐξ ἐθνῶν Λαὸν τῷ ὀνόματι αὐτοῦ, v.[26] ὑπὲρ τοῦ ὀνόματος τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰ. Χ.; (9) perhaps we may compare also the use of δαπανάω in Ac 21[24], probably spoken by St. James (δαπάνησον ἐπ' αὐτοῖς), with our Epistle 4[3] ἵνα ἐν ταῖς ἡδοναῖς ὑμῶν δαπανήσητε, and the occurrence of ἀγνίζω in the same verse with its occurrence in Ja 4[8].

An objection may be raised to the identification of the writer of the Epistle with the brother of our Lord on the ground that no claim is made to this title in either of the Epistles which go by the name of the brothers James and Jude. If they were really brothers of the Lord, would they not have laid stress on the authority derived from this relationship, just as St. Paul lays stress on his apostleship? But what was Christ's own teaching on the matter? When his mother and brothers sought on one occasion to use the authority which they assumed that their kinship gave them, they were met by the words, 'Who is my mother or my brethren?' And he stretched out his hands to his disciples and said, 'Behold my mother and my brethren.' St. Paul expresses the same idea of the disappearance of the earthly relationship in the higher spiritual union by which all the members of the body are joined to the Head, in the words 'though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now know we him so no more' (2 Co 5[16]). Surely it is only what was to be expected that James and Jude would shrink from claiming another name than that of 'servant' to express the relation in which they stood to their risen Lord, after having failed to acknowledge him as their Master in the days of his humiliation.

So far the evidence seems to show that the writer of the Epistle was James the Just, the brother of the Lord. Let us see what further light this fact, if it be one, will throw upon the Epistle. The word 'just,' which is also used of his father Joseph, implies one who not only observes but loves the law; and we may be sure that the reverence for the law, which is so marked a feature of the Epistle, was learnt in the well-ordered home of Nazareth. There, too, he may have acquired, with the full sanction of his parents (who would gladly devote the eldest-born of Joseph in such marked way to the future service of the Messiah), those strict ascetic habits which tradition ascribes to him. But the constant intercourse with him who was full of grace and truth in childhood as in manhood, must have prepared James to find in the Ten Commandments no mere outward regulations, but an inner law of liberty and love written in the heart. That deep interest in the mysteries of the kingdom, that earnest search after truth which led the child Jesus to remain behind in the temple, must surely have had its effect upon his brother. Whatever means of instruction were within reach of the home at Nazareth would, we may feel sure, have been eagerly taken advantage of by all its inmates. While, therefore, accepting the view which seems to be best supported, that Jesus and his brothers usually spoke Aramaic, we are not bound to suppose that, with towns like Sepphoris and Tiberias in their immediate vicinity, with Ptolemais, Scythopolis, and Gadara at no great distance, they remained ignorant of Greek. In the eyes of the scribes they might 'never have learnt letters,' since they had not attended the rabbinical schools of Jerusalem; but the ordinary education of Jewish children, and the Sabbath readings in the synagogue, would give a sufficient start to enable any intelligent boy to carry on his studies for himself; while the example of Solomon and the teaching of the 'sapiential' books, with which the writer of the Epistle was intimately acquainted, held up the pursuit of knowledge and wisdom as the highest duty of man.

There are other characteristics of our Epistle which find their best explanation in the supposition that the writer was the son of Joseph and Mary. The use of parables was common among Jewish teachers, and especially common in Galilee (cf. Neubauer in Studia Biblica, i. p. 52); but it was carried to an unusual length by our Lord, both in his preaching to the multitude, of which it is said 'without a parable spake he not unto them,' and in his ordinary conversation, which constantly ran into a parabolic or figurative form to the great bewilderment of his disciples, as when he bid them 'Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees.' One distinctive feature of our Lord's use of parables is that there is nothing forced either in the figure or in the application: natural phenomena and the varied circumstances of human life are watched with an observant eye and a sympathetic and loving heart, and the spiritual analogies which they suggest are seen to flow naturally from them. Such a habit of mind could not have been acquired after manhood. The love of nature, the sympathy in all human interests, the readiness to find 'sermons in stones and good in everything,' must have characterized the child Jesus, and coloured all his intercourse with his fellows from his earliest years. It is interesting therefore to find the same fondness for figurative speech in the Epistles of his two brothers, St. James and St. Jude.

Another marked feature of our Epistle is the close connexion between it and the Sermon on the Mount, in which our Lord laid down the principles of the kingdom which he came to establish upon earth. It must suffice to refer here to the general harmony between the two as to the spiritual view of the law (Ja 1^{26} $2^{8.\ 12.\ 13}$, Mt 5^{17-44}), the blessings of adversity (Ja $1^{2.\ 3}$ 2^{5} $5^{7.\ 8.\ 11}$, Mt 5^{3-12}), the dangers and the uncertainty of wealth (Ja $1^{10.\ 11}$ $2^{6.\ 7}$ $4^{4.\ 6.\ 13-16}$ 5^{1-6}, Mt $6^{19-21.\ 24-34}$), the futility of a mere profession of religion (Ja $1^{26.\ 27}$, Mt 6^{1-7}), the contrast between saying and doing (Ja 1^{22-25} 2^{14-26} $3^{13.\ 18}$, Mt 7^{15-27}), the true nature of prayer (Ja 1^{5-8} 4^{3} $5^{13.\ 18}$, Mt 6^{6-13}), the incompatibility between the love of the world and the love of God (Ja 2^{5} 3^{6} 4^{4-8}, Mt 6^{24}), the need to forgive others if we would be forgiven ourselves (Ja $2^{12.\ 13}$, Mt $6^{14.\ 15}$), the tree known by its fruits (Ja $3^{11.\ 12}$, Mt 7^{16-20}), the interdiction of oaths (Ja 5^{12}, Mt 5^{34-37}) and of censoriousness (Ja $4^{11.\ 12}$, Mt 7^{1-5}), the praise of singleness of aim (Ja 1^{8} 4^{8}, Mt $6^{22.\ 23}$). Nor are these reminiscences confined to the Sermon on the Mount, or to our Lord's words as reported by St. Matthew; there is much to remind us both of St. Luke and St. John. It is worthy of note that, close as is the connexion of sentiment and even of language in many of these passages, it never amounts to actual quotation, but is rather the reminiscence of thoughts often uttered by the original speaker and sinking into the heart of the hearer, who reproduces them in his own manner.

It may be asked, if St. James was thus deeply influenced by his Brother's teaching, how are we to explain the fact that at one period of his life 'he did not believe on him'? Perhaps we may gather from the Epistle that the writer would have found a difficulty in some of the sayings of Christ. 'Before Abraham was, I am'; 'Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, ye have no life in you,'—these must have been 'hard sayings' to the brother of Jesus even more than to strangers. This state of mind was doubtless combined with an intense love and reverence for the elder Brother, and was perhaps not incompatible with the belief in Christ's mission as a preacher of righteousness, and a willingness to accept him as the anointed King of the Jewish people; but it might easily lead to an anxious solicitude as to his sanity and the prudence of the measures which he took for extending the number of his adherents (See the subject more fully treated in Mayor's Introduction to St. James, ch. i. on the Author, ch. iv. on its relation to other Books of NT).

ii. CANONICITY. — Eusebius in a well-known passage (HE iii. 25) distinguishes between the disputed and the undisputed books which made up the NT, and were publicly read in the church at the time when he wrote (l.c. iii. 31), i.e. in A.D. 314 (see Lightfoot in Dict. of Chr. Biog. ii. p. 323). Together they contain all the books included in our present Canon and no others; those which were disputed, though generally known, being the Epistle which goes under the name of James and that of Jude, as well as the 2nd of Peter and the so-called 2nd and 3rd of John. The Apoc. he had before doubtfully classed among the undisputed, but questions whether it should not rather be classed with the spurious, like the Revelation of Peter. Elsewhere he says (ii. 23), 'The first of the Epistles styled Catholic is said to be by James the Lord's brother, which is held by some to be spurious. Certainly not many old writers have mentioned it, as neither have they the Epistle of Jude.' His own practice, however, betrays no suspicion of its genuineness, as in one passage he quotes James as Scripture (Comm. in Psalm. p. 648, Montf.), and in another quotes Ja 5^{13} as spoken by the holy apostle (ib. p. 247).

The same doubt as to the canonicity of the Epistle is shown by its omission from some of the early versions and catalogues of sacred books, e.g. the Muratorian Fragment (of which Westcott says that it may be regarded as 'a summary of the opinion of the Western Church on the Canon shortly after the middle of the 2nd cent.'), and the Cheltenham list, which is supposed to have been written in Africa about the year 359. On the other hand, it was generally recognized in the East, being included in the Peshitta, which omits 2 P, 2 and 3 Jn, Jude, and Rev. The Pesh. used to be ascribed to the 2nd cent., and is probably not later than the 3rd, but the date is still in dispute. Ja is also found in the lists given by Origen (Hom. in Jos. vii. 1), Cyril of Jerusalem, Athanasius, Gregory of Nazianzus, and others, and was finally ratified by the Third Council of Carthage in 397. Its late reception in the West may probably be explained by the fact that it was addressed to Jews of the Eastern (?) Dispersion, that it did not profess to be written by an apostle, and that it appeared to contradict the teaching of the great Apostle to the Gentiles.

Origen (d. 253) is apparently the first who cites the Epistle as Scripture, and as written by St. James; see Comm. in Joh. xix. 6; in Rom. iv. 1, 8, ix. 24; Hom. in. Ex. iii. 3, viii. 4; in Lv. ii. 4, xiii. 3; Sel. in Ps. 31. 5, 37. 24, 118. 153; Comm. in Prov. (Mai, Nov. Bibl. vii. 51); but Clement of Alexandria (d. 220) is said by Eusebius (HE vi. 14) to have included in his Outlines (ἐν ταῖς Ὑποτυπώσεσι) short explanations of all the sacred books, μηδὲ τὰς ἀντιλεγομένας παρελθών, τὴν Ἰούδα λέγω καὶ τὰς λοιπὰς καθολικὰς ἐπιστολὰς τήν τε Βαρνάβα καὶ τὴν Πέτρου λεγομένην ἀποκάλυψιν. Cassiodorus (Inst. div. lit. 8) limits this by saying that Clement commented on the canonical Epistles, i.e. on 1 P, 1 and 2 Jn, and Ja. The notes on the first three, and on Jude, but not on Ja, are still extant in a Latin translation, and some have doubted whether the reading in Cassiodorus should not be altered accordingly; see, however, Zahn, Neutest. Kan. i. 322, Forschungen, iii. 153; Sanday in Stud. Bibl. iii. 248.

iii. DATE.—If we are right in our view of the authorship of the Epistle, it must have been written not later than A.D. 62. This view, however, although approved by the great majority of scholars and divines up to the end of last century, is regarded with suspicion by some modern scholars. We will give briefly their conclusions, and then state the reasons for believing that it was written between A.D. 40 and 50. Von Soden, in the Introduction to his Handkommentar (1890), allows that in thought and expression there is considerable resemblance between our Epistle and the writings of Clement of Rome, and especially of Hermas, but considers that there is no reason to suppose any literary connexion. They resemble one another simply because they were produced under the same conditions. No trace of our Epistle is to be found in the 2nd cent. Nothing in the letter suggests Jewish readers. The title may be genuine because Christians had learnt to regard themselves as strangers and pilgrims. It was probably written for Christians generally, in the reign of Domitian. W. Brückner, in his Chronolog. Reihenfolge d. N.T. Briefe (Haarlem, 1890), considers that it cannot be assigned to an earlier date than A.D. 150, as it borrows from 1 P, which was written during the persecution of Trajan. The Judaizing tone implies a late stage of doctrinal development, inasmuch as it attacks Paulinism as the seed of an existing Gnosticism. The true address reveals itself in the phrase 'your synagogue' (2^2), by which we are to understand a little conventicle of Essene Christians at Rome. The phrase 'Diaspora' denotes similar scattered conventicles, in which alone the true Israel, the poor, are to be found. By 'the rich' is meant Christians outside the conventicle. Pfleiderer, in his Urchristenthum (1887), regards the Epistle as representing the catholicized Paulinism of the latter half of the 2nd cent. He thinks it is an abbreviation of the Shepherd of Hermas. The polemic is not directed against St. Paul, but against the later Gnostics who appealed to his authority. There is nothing Judaistic in the writer's tone; he simply enforces the truths of practical Christianity as understood by the Catholic Church. The latest writer on the subject is F. Spitta (Zur Geschichte u. Litteratur des Urchristenthums, vol. ii. 1896), who, while allowing the references to our Epistle in St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, avoids the reproach of coming to a commonplace conclusion by starting the theory that it is a Christian adaptation of a Jewish book, written before the Christian era.* He draws this conclusion from the considerations stated in the earlier part of this article, and explains away the resemblance to the Sermon on the Mount by quoting parallels from the Apocrypha and other Jewish writings.

There is certainly much more to be said for this theory than for those which have been just described. Postponing its examination for the present, we proceed to state the grounds (independently of what has been already said under the head of authorship and canonicity) for believing that the Epistle was written before A.D. 50. In the present writer's Introduction to St. James, ch. ii., will be found proof that it was known to Irenæus, Theophilus, Justin Martyr, the writer of the Ep. to Diognetus, Ignatius, Polycarp, and, above all, Hermas, in the 2nd cent.; that it was known to Clement of Rome, to Barnabas, to the authors of the Didaché and the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs during the 1st cent. We can, however, afford to dispense with these witnesses, if it can be proved that it was known to more than one of the writers of the NT; and if we are not mistaken, it has been shown in the above Introduction (ch. iv.) that traces of its influence may be seen in the Epistles of St. John, in the Ep. to the Hebrews, in those to Timothy, above all in the 1st Epistle of St. Peter, and in St. Paul's Epistles to the Romans and Galatians.

Our space will not allow us to deal with more than the last two, merely premising (1) that if the Epistle of James was written by the Lord's brother, it must probably have been written before the year 51 [Turner, 49], the date of the Apostolic Council, as otherwise it must have contained some reference to the question, which was then agitating the Diaspora, as to the admission of Gentiles into the Church; (2) that if such an Epistle were in existence, containing phrases which could be turned against the doctrine of justification by faith, it was likely to be eagerly made use of by Judaizers, and would thus be brought under St. Paul's notice. It has been remarked that the words 'whosoever shall keep the law and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all' ($Ja\ 2^{10}$), might easily be twisted so as to represent St. James as insisting on the observance of the whole Mosaic code, and that this may possibly be alluded to in the words ($Ac\ 15^{24}$), 'We have heard that certain which went out from us troubled you, saying, Ye must be circumcised and keep the law, to whom we gave no such commandment.' On the other hand, there is less likelihood of St. Paul's

* The same view is taken by L. Massebieau in an article entitled 'L'Épître de Jacques, est-elle l'œuvre d'un Chrétien?' which appeared in the Revue de l'histoire des religions, Paris, 1895.

Epistles, addressed to distant Churches, and dealing so much with personal questions, having been brought under the notice of St. James.

The main points of connexion between the Epistles are Ro 2^{13} οὐ γὰρ οἱ ἀκροαταὶ νόμου δίκαιοι παρὰ τῷ θεῷ, ἀλλ' οἱ ποιηταὶ νόμου δικαιωθήσονται, compared with Ja 1^{22} γίνεσθε ποιηταὶ λόγου καὶ μὴ ἀκροαταὶ μόνον, and Ja 4^{11} ποιητὴς νόμου (the only other place in NT where this phrase occurs); the phrase παραβάτης νόμου, occurring only in Ro $2^{25.\ 27}$ and Ja 2^{11}; Ro 7^{23} βλέπω ἕτερον νόμον ἐν τοῖς μέλεσίν μου ἀντιστρατευόμενον τῷ νόμῳ τοῦ νοός μου, compared with Ja 4^{1} πόθεν πόλεμοι; οὐκ ἐντεῦθεν ἐκ τῶν ἡδονῶν ὑμῶν τῶν στρατευομένων ἐν τοῖς μέλεσιν ὑμῶν; Ro 14^{4} σὺ τίς εἶ ὁ κρίνων ἀλλότριον οἰκέτην; τῷ ἰδίῳ κυρίῳ στήκει ἢ πίπτει, compared with Ja 4^{11} εἷς ἐστιν νομοθέτης καὶ κριτής, σὺ δὲ τίς εἶ ὁ κρίνων τὸν πλησίον; Ro 5^{3-5} καυχώμεθα ἐν ταῖς θλίψεσιν, εἰδότες ὅτι ἡ θλῖψις ὑπομονὴν κατεργάζεται, ἡ δὲ ὑπομονὴ δοκιμήν, ἡ δὲ δοκιμὴ ἐλπίδα, ἡ δὲ ἐλπὶς οὐ καταισχύνει, ὅτι ἡ ἀγάπη τοῦ θεοῦ ἐκκέχυται, compared with Ja 1^{2-4} πᾶσαν χαρὰν ἡγήσασθε ὅταν πειρασμοῖς περιπέσητε ποικίλοις, γινώσκοντες ὅτι τὸ δοκίμιον ὑμῶν τῆς πίστεως κατεργάζεται ὑπομονήν, ἡ δὲ ὑπομονὴ ἔργον τέλειον ἐχέτω ἵνα ἦτε τέλειοι; v.^{9} καυχάσθω δὲ ὁ ἀδελφὸς ὁ ταπεινός, κ.τ.λ. In these and other cases of resemblance it is easier to suppose that St. Paul works up a hint received from St. James, than that St. James omits points of interest and value which he found ready to his hand.

The crucial test, however, of the relation between the two is to be found in the controversy as to faith and works. St. James had said over and over again that 'faith without works is dead' (2^{17} etc.), his intention being (as is plain from v.^{14}, and the illustration in vv.$^{15.\ 16}$ of a philanthropy which is limited to words, as well as from the whole tone and argument of the Epistle), not to depreciate faith, which is with him, not less than with St. Paul, the very foundation of the Christian life (see $1^{3.\ 6}$ 2^{1} 5^{15}), but to insist that faith, like love, is valueless if it has no effect on the life. St. Paul himself does the same in 1 Th 1^{3}, Gal 5^{6}, 1 Co 13^{2}, Ro 2^{6-20} and elsewhere; but in arguing against his Judaizing antagonists, who denied salvation to the Gentiles unless they were circumcised, and in all other respects 'performed the works of the law,' he had maintained that it was impossible for men to be justified by these works, and that it was by faith alone that even the Jews and Abraham himself must be justified. He is therefore compelled to challenge the phrase of St. James, ἡ πίστις χωρὶς τῶν ἔργων ἀργή ἐστιν, νεκρά ἐστιν, by a direct contradiction, λογιζόμεθα γὰρ δικαιοῦσθαι πίστει ἄνθρωπον χωρὶς ἔργων νόμου, in support of which he appeals to the confession of the Psalmist (Ps 14. 143^{2}; see Ro 3^{10-20}, Gal 3^{10}) that 'by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified.' If St. James wrote after St. Paul, must he not, with these passages before him, have either attempted to meet the arguments, if he dissented; or if he agreed with them (as he certainly does in $2^{10.\ 11}$ 3^{2}), would he not have avoided the use of phrases such as χωρὶς τῶν ἔργων, which were liable to be misunderstood alike by the followers and the opponents of the Apostle to the Gentiles?

St. Paul goes on to argue that the blessings promised to Abraham and all the families of the earth in him, and the covenant made with Abraham and his seed, are anterior to, and irrespective of, the law; that the Scripture expressly attributes to Abraham a righteousness, not of works, but of faith, and states generally that 'the just shall live by faith.' To these arguments no reference is made by St. James, except to the familiar quotation, ἐπίστευσεν Ἀβραὰμ τῷ θεῷ καὶ ἐλογίσθη αὐτῷ εἰς δικαιοσύνην ($2^{21.\ 22}$), which was probably in common use among the Jews, to prove that orthodoxy of doctrine sufficed for salvation. His answer to the text so used is that Abraham's faith proved itself by action when he offered Isaac on the altar: if he had not acted thus, he would not have been accounted righteous, or called the friend of God. It is interesting to observe how St. Paul deals with this statement, to which he distinctly refers in Ro 4^{2}. St. James had said, Ἀβραὰμ ὁ πατὴρ ἡμῶν οὐκ ἐξ ἔργων ἐδικαιώθη; St. Paul replies, εἰ γὰρ ἐξ ἔργων ἐδικαιώθη, ἔχει καύχημα; but this, as he proceeds to show, is inconsistent with the phrase 'reckoned for righteousness,' which implies an act of free grace on the part of God, not a strict legal obligation of wages earned for work done. His second answer is to replace the quotation in its original context (Ro 4^{16-22}) as spoken of the birth, not the sacrifice of Isaac. Abraham's faith in the promised birth was a settled trust in God, a long-continued hoping against hope; it was this posture of mind, not any immediate action consequent upon it, which was reckoned to him for righteousness. All this is most apposite in reference to the argument of St. James, and the use which might be made of it by Judaizers. But put the case the other way: suppose St. James to have written after St. Paul; and how inconceivable is it that he should have made no attempt to guard his position against such an extremely formidable attack! Again, if St. James was really opposed to St. Paul, and desired to maintain that man was saved, not by grace, but by obedience to the law of Moses, which was incumbent alike on Gentile and on Jew, why has he never uttered a syllable on the subject, but confined himself to the task of proving that a faith which bears no fruit is a dead faith? See this more fully developed by Spitta, l.c. 202–225.

We have seen, then, (1) that the resemblance between the two Epistles is such that it can only be explained by supposing one of them to have been written with a knowledge of the other; (2) that a close comparison shows that, where there is a resemblance, the statement in St. James is in general more elementary, less exact and developed, than that in St. Paul; (3) that, in the controversy on faith and works in particular, St. Paul is evidently anxious to guard against misunderstanding by carefully defining terms which are used by St. James in a vague general sense: thus, while the latter uses πίστις indefinitely, at one time of genuine Christian trust ($1^{3.\ 6}$ $2^{1.\ 5}$ etc.), at another of an empty profession (2^{14-26}), St. Paul begins his discussion by twice defining it as 'faith in Christ' (Ro $3^{22.\ 26}$); while St. James had used the ambiguous word ἔργον with similar vagueness, St. Paul distinguishes between the ἔργα νόμου (Ro $3^{20.\ 28}$ 9^{32}) and the ἔργον πίστεως (1 Th 1^{3}, 2 Th 1^{11}), 'faith working through love' (Gal 5^{6}). There is a still more careful limitation in Gal 2^{16}, where St. James' declaration, ἐξ ἔργων δικαιοῦται ἄνθρωπος καὶ οὐκ ἐκ πίστεως μόνον, is qualified, not merely as to the principal terms ἔργον and πίστις, but also as to the extent of opposition, by the use of the hypothetical ἐὰν μή, and as to the kind of causation attributed to faith, διά being substituted for ἐκ in the words οὐ δικαιοῦται ἄνθρωπος ἐξ ἔργων νόμου, ἐὰν μὴ διὰ πίστεως Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ; (4) that, whereas the argument of St. James has no reference to St. Paul or to the arguments used by him, St. Paul turns aside, in the most skilful and delicate way, whatever in the argument of St. James might be made use of by Judaizers, while at the same time he reaffirms in more guarded language the truths which both apostles held in common. Nothing could be more courteous and nothing more effective. On the other hand, if we imagine St. James to be answering St. Paul, we should have to charge him with discourtesy in addition to an entire misapprehension of the situation.

It remains now to show, in opposition to Spitta, that our Epistle was written after A.D. 40. If it was written by the brother of the Lord, this is about the earliest date which would allow time for his authority to establish itself, as it evidently had done when the letter was written, and also for the growth of a Church of the Diaspora with the experiences described. The hypothesis, however, which we have to meet is that it is a Jewish writing of the 1st cent. B.C., interpolated and adopted by a Christian, in the same way as the Didaché, the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, the Sibylline Books, and the Fourth Book of Ezra were interpolated. All that is required to restore it to its original form is, to omit the words τοῦ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ in 1^1, and ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ in 2^1, a change which greatly simplifies the construction of τῆς δόξης in the latter passages, leaving the familiar phrase τὴν πίστιν τοῦ Κυρίου τῆς δόξης, examples of which are quoted from the Bk. of Enoch (Spitta, p. iv).

The first thing which strikes us is that a Christian editor would not have been satisfied with such a slight revision. We may possibly explain the absence of any reference to Christ among the examples of patience given in $5^{10.\ 11}$, on the ground that, before the existence of our Gospels, the Jews of the Dispersion would be less familiar with the story of our Lord, than they were with the OT Scriptures which were 'read in the synagogues every Sabbath day.' But this consideration was hardly likely to occur to a Christian (of the 1st cent.? No date is suggested by Spitta) who was desirous to adapt a Jewish book for the service of the Church. (2) We must remember that the general Judaic tone is explained and indeed required by the hypothesis that the author is the brother of the Lord, which is commended to us on so many other grounds. It is his office to interpret Christianity to the Jews. He represents and he addresses the many thousands who believe and are zealous for the law. He is the authority whom St. Paul's opponents profess to follow. Tradition even goes so far as to describe the unbelieving Jews as still doubting at the end of his life, whether they might not look to him for a declaration against Christianity (see quotation from Hegesippus in the art. on JAMES). (3) There is the fact of the resemblance of the language of the Epistle to that used by St. James in the Acts. (4) There is the fact of the extraordinary resemblance between the Epistle and our Lord's discourses, especially the Sermon on the Mount. Spitta labours to show that both borrow from older Jewish writings. Even if this were so, it would be far more probable that one of the two borrowed indirectly, taking these sayings straight from the other, than that they should both have collected them independently from a variety of obscure sources. But it is mere perversity to put forward such vague parallels as are adduced from rabbinical writings on the subject of oaths, for instance, or the perishable treasures of earth, by way of accounting for the exact resemblance existing between Ja 5^{12} and Mt 5^{34-37}, Ja $5^{2.\ 3}$ and Mt 6^{19}. Indeed this is true of almost all the resemblances which have been pointed out by the commentators. (5) The Epistle contains many phrases which bear a recognized Christian stamp, even though it may be possible to find some approach to them in pre-Christian documents. Such are ἀδελφοί μου ἀγαπητοί ($1^{16.\ 19}$ 2^5), ἡ παρουσία τοῦ κυρίου ($5^{7.\ 8}$), τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους τῆς ἐκκλησίας (5^{14}), προσευξάσθωσαν ἐπ' αὐτὸν ἀλείψαντες ἐλαίῳ ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι (5^{14}), κληρονόμους τῆς βασιλείας ἧς ἐπηγγείλατο (2^5), βουληθεὶς ἀπεκύησεν ἡμᾶς λόγῳ ἀληθείας, εἰς τὸ εἶναι ἡμᾶς ἀπαρχήν τινα τῶν αὐτοῦ κτισμάτων (1^{18}), νόμον τέλειον τὸν τῆς ἐλευθερίας (1^{25}), suggesting a contrasted law of bondage, of the letter as opposed to the spirit. (6) But the characteristic quality, after all, is to be found, not in particular phrases or occasional reminiscences of our Lord's teaching, but in the identity of spirit between our Epistle and the Sermon on the Mount, which is so striking as to warrant the assertion that, if the former is not Christian, then neither is the latter. (7) Spitta does not suggest that the name 'James' is an addition by the supposed Christian editor. We have seen how exactly the Epistle agrees with all that we know of James the brother of the Lord; but if this is to be considered a part of the original pre-Christian document, where is the author to be found who combines in himself so many remarkable characteristics? We arrive at the same result by comparing it with the Jewish Apoc. writings, such as Ps-Sol. Where do we find an approach in any of these to the teaching of our Epistle as summed up in the section on its contents which follows?

iv. CONTENTS.—The design of the Epistle is on the one hand to encourage the believing Jews of the Dispersion, to whom it is addressed, to bear their trials patiently, and on the other hand to warn them against certain errors of doctrine and practice.

i. Of Trial (1^{1-18}).—(a) Trial is sent to perfect the Christian character. That it may have this effect wisdom is needed; and this wisdom is given in answer to believing prayer (1^{2-6}). A warning against doublemindedness. The believer should recognize the greatness of his calling, and not allow himself to be either elated or depressed by outward circumstances (1^{7-11}). (b) Patient endurance of trial leads to the crown of life promised to all that love God (1^{12}). (c) Though outward trial is appointed by God for our good, we must not imagine that the inner weakness which is brought to light by trial is from God. God is perfect goodness, and only sends what is good. The disposition to misuse God's appointments comes from man's own lusts, which, if yielded to, lead to death as their natural consequence (1^{13-15}). (d) So far from God's tempting man to evil, it is only by his will, through the regenerating power of his word, that we are raised to that new and higher life which shall eventually penetrate and renew the whole creation (1^{16-18}).

ii. How we should receive the Word (1^{19-27}).—(a) As humble listeners, not as excited speakers (1^{19-21}). (b) Nor is it enough to listen to the word; we must carry it out in action (1^{22-24}). (c) Blessing comes to him alone who patiently studies the word, and frames his life in accordance with the law of liberty embodied therein (1^{25}). (d) Ritual observance is of no avail unless it helps us to rule the tongue, and practise brotherly kindness and unworldliness (1^{26-27}).

iii. Warning against Respect of Persons (2^{1-13}).—(a) Courtesy to the rich, if combined with discourtesy to the poor, is a sign of weakness of faith, and proves that we are not whole-hearted in the service of him who is the sole glory of believers (2^{1-4}). (b) The poor have more title to our respect than the rich, since they are more often rich in faith and heirs of the kingdom; while it is the rich who maltreat the brethren, and blaspheme the name of Christ (2^{5-7}). (c) If it is from obedience to the royal law of love that we show courtesy to the rich, it is well; but if we do this only from respect of persons, it is a breach of the law, and a defiance of the Lawgiver, no less than murder and adultery (2^{8-11}). (d) Remember that we shall all be tried by the law of liberty, which looks to the heart, and not to the outward action only. It is the merciful who obtain mercy ($2^{12.\ 13}$).

iv. Belief and Practice (2^{14-26}).—(a) A mere profession of faith without corresponding action is of no avail (2^{14}). As may be seen in the parallel case of benevolence, when it does not go beyond words (2^{15-17}). Without action we have no evidence of the existence of faith (2^{18}). The orthodox belief of the Jew is shared by the demons, and only increases their misery (2^{19}). (b) True faith, such as that of Abraham and Rahab, necessarily embodies itself in action (2^{20-26}).

v. Warnings with respect to the use of the Tongue (3^{1-12}).—(a) Great responsibility of the office of teacher (3^1). (b) Difficulty and importance of controlling the tongue (3^{2-8}). (c) Inconsistency of supposing that we can offer acceptable praise to God as long as we speak evil of man, who is made in the image of God (3^{9-12}).

vi. True and false Wisdom (3^{13-18}).—(a) The wisdom which comes from God is simple and straightforward, full of kindness and all good fruits ($3^{13.\ 17.\ 18}$). (b) If there is a wisdom which does not conduce to peace, but is accompanied by bitterness and jealousy, it is not from above, but is earthly, carnal, devilish (3^{14-16}).

vii. Warning against Quarrelsomeness and Worldliness (4^{1-17}).—(a) The cause of quarrels is that each man seeks to gratify his own selfish impulses, and to snatch his neighbour's portion of worldly good ($4^{1.\ 2}$). (b) No satisfaction can be thus obtained. Even our prayers can give us no satisfaction if they are infected with this worldly spirit (4[3]). (c) God demands the service of the whole heart, and will reveal himself to none but those who yield up their wills to his (4[1-6]). (d) Therefore resist the devil, who is the prince of this world, and turn to God in humble repentance (4[7-10]). (e) Cease to find fault with others. Those who condemn their neighbours condemn the law itself, and usurp the office of him, the Lord of life and death, who alone has the power and right to judge (4[11. 12]). (f) Worldliness is also shown in the confident laying-out of plans of life without reference to God (4[13-17]).

viii. Denunciations and Encouragements (5[1-11]).—(a) Woe to those who have been heaping up money and living in luxury on the very eve of judgment. Woe especially to those who have ground down the poor and murdered the innocent (5[1-6]). (b) Let the brethren bear their sufferings patiently, knowing that the Lord is at hand, and that he will make all things turn out for their good. Let them imitate Job and the prophets, and so inherit the blessings pronounced on those who endure (5[6-11]).

ix. Miscellaneous Precepts (5[12-20]).—(a) Swear not (5[12]). (b) Let all your feelings of joy and sorrow be sanctified and controlled by religion (5[13]). (c) In sickness let the elders be called in to pray and anoint the sick with a view to his recovery (5[14. 15]). (d) Confess your sins to one another, and pray for one another with all earnestness (5[16-18]). (e) The blessing on one who wins back a sinner from the error of his ways (5[19. 20]).

The doctrinal basis of St. James' practical teaching may perhaps be stated as follows:—Man was created in the image of God (3[9]), the All-good (1[13. 17]); but he has fallen into sin by yielding to his lower impulses against his sense of right (1[14. 15] 4[1-3. 17]), and the natural consequence of sin is death, bodily and spiritual (1[15] 5[3. 5. 20]). Not only is man liable to sin, but as a matter of fact we all sin, and that frequently (3[2]). God of his free bounty has provided a means by which we may conquer sin; he has begotten us anew through his word sown in our hearts (1[18. 21]). Our salvation depends on the way in which we receive the word (1[21]). If we have a steadfast faith in God's goodness (1[5. 7. 13 21]); if we read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest the word, so as to make it the guiding principle of our life, the law of liberty by which all our words and actions are regulated (1[25] 2[12]), bearing its natural fruit in compassion and love towards our fellow-men (1[27] 2[8. 15. 16]), then our souls are saved from death, we are made inheritors of the kingdom promised to those who love God (1[12. 25] 2[5]). But the training by which we are prepared for this crown of life is not pleasant to the natural man. It involves trial and endurance (1[2-4. 12]); it involves constant watchfulness and self-control and prayer for heavenly wisdom, in order that we may resist the temptations of the world, the flesh, and the devil (1[26] 3[2-8. 15]). Thus faith is exercised; we are enabled to see things as God sees them (2[1. 5]), to rise above the temporal to the eternal (1[9-11]), to be not simply patient, but to rejoice in affliction (1[2] 5[7. 8. 10. 11]) and exult in the hope set before us (1[9. 12]), until at last we grow up to the full stature of a Christian (1[4] 3[2]), wise with that wisdom which comes from above, the wisdom which is steadfast, unpretending, gentle, considerate, affectionate, full of mercy and good fruits, the parent of righteousness and peace (3[17. 18]). But there are many who choose the friendship of the world instead of the friendship of God, so vexing his Holy Spirit and yielding themselves to the power of the devil; yet even then he does not leave them to themselves, but gives more grace, hedging in their ways in the present and warning them of judgment to come (4[4-6] 5[1-8]). If they humble themselves under his hand, and repent truly of their sins, he will lift them up; if they draw nigh to him, he will draw nigh to them (4[7-10]). Here, too, we may be helpful to one another by mutual confession and by prayer for one another. Great is the power of prayer prompted by the Spirit of God (5[15-20]).

J. B. MAYOR.

JAMIN (יָמִין).—1. A son of Simeon, Gn 46[10], Ex 6[15], Nu 26[12], 1 Ch 4[24]. The gentilic name Jaminites (הַיָּמִינִי) occurs in Nu 26[12]. See GENEALOGY, II. 1. 2. A Judahite, 1 Ch 2[27]. See GENEALOGY, IV. 7. 3. A priest (?, or Levite) who took part in the promulgating of the law, Neh 8[7].

JAMLECH (יַמְלֵךְ).—A Simeonite chief, 1 Ch 4[34].

JAMNIA (Ἰαμνία, Ἰαμνεία, Ἰαννεία), 1 Mac 4[15] 5[58] 10[69] 15[40], 2 Mac 12[8. 9. 40]. — The later name of JABNEEL (wh. see).

Jamnites (οἱ Ἰαμνῖται, Jamnitæ), gentilic name, 2 Mac 12[9]; cf. οἱ ἐν Ἰαμνίᾳ, 12[8].

JANAI (יַעְנַי, perhaps for יַעֲנֶה 'J" answers').—A Gadite chief, 1 Ch 5[12], AV Jaanai.

JANGLING.—In 1 Ti 1[6] ματαιολογία is tr[d] in AV 'vain jangling,' after Tind. and most VSS; RV 'vain talking,' which is near the Rhem. NT 'vaine talke.' This is the only occurrence of the word in bibl. Greek, but ματαιολόγος occurs in Tit 1[10], EV 'vain talker.' The Eng. word 'jangle' (of Low Germ. origin; Skeat compares Lat. gannire, to yelp) was occasionally used in 1611 in the sense (still common) of 'quarrel,' but more frequently in the sense of 'chatter,' and that is its meaning here. Chaucer (Persones Tale) says, 'Jangling is whan man speketh to moche before folk, and clappeth as a mille, and taketh no kepe what he seith'; and in the same Tale, 'A philosophre seyde, whan men axed him how that men sholde plese the peple; and he answerde, "do many gode werkes, and speke few jangles."' J. HASTINGS.

JANIM (יָנִים Kethibh; AV Janum, following Kerê יָנוּם).—A town in the mountains of Hebron, near Beth-tappuah, Jos 15[53]. The site is uncertain.

JANNAI (AV Janna, TR Ἰαννά; Lach., Tisch., Treg., WH Ἰανναί).—An ancestor of Jesus, Lk 3[24].

JANNES AND JAMBRES (Ἰαννῆς καὶ Ἰαμβρῆς).—The traditional names of the two Egyp. magicians, who by their enchantments imitated the signs which Moses showed before Pharaoh. In Scripture the names occur only in 2 Ti 3[8] 'As Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses, so do these also withstand the truth.' The allusions to them elsewhere are numerous and widespread, though full of anachronisms and contradictions. J. and J. are said to have been the sons of Balaam (Sohar 90. 2) or his young men (Jerus. Targ. Nu 22[22]); and yet they were in the court of Pharaoh, and so interpreted a dream of the king as to forebode the birth of Moses, and cause the oppression (ib. Ex 1[15]). They are mentioned by name as opposing Moses (ib. Ex 7[11]), but were so awed by Moses' later signs as to become proselytes, and leave Egypt with 'the mixed multitude' (Yalkut Reubeni 81. 2). They instigated Aaron to make the golden calf (Tikkunim 106. 4), and yet came with Balaam from Pethor when he visited the camp of Balak (Jerus. Targ. Nu 22[22]). As to their death, there are diverse accounts. They were drowned in the Red Sea, or put to death after the incident of the golden calf, or during the slaughter of Phinehas. Their names occur also in the Gospel of Nicodemus (ch. 5), where Nicodemus warns Pilate by the example of J. and J. not to condemn Jesus; in the Acts of Paul and Peter, where Paul makes use of J. and J., to warn Nero against Simon's deceptions (Lipsius, Apocr. Apostelgesch. ii. 302), and in Constitut. Apostol. viii. 1, where J. and J. are paralleled with Annas and Caiaphas; while Palladius (c. A.D. 420) narrates that Macarius visited their tomb (Schürer, HJP II. iii. 150). In Gentile circles we find the Roman writers Pliny (Hist. Nat. xxx. 2) and Apuleius (Apolog. c. 90) mentioning Moses and Jannes among the famous magicians of antiquity; and a Gr. philosopher Numenius (2nd cent. A.D.), quoted by Eusebius (Præp. Evang. ix. 8), speaks of J. and J. as Egyp. ἱερογραμματεῖς. The early date of the tradition and its wide spread prove Levy in error in contending that J. and J. are John the Baptist and Jesus (Chald. Wört. 337).

In 2 Ti 3[8] there is a various reading Μαμβρῆς; and it is interesting to find Mamre, מַמְרֵי or מַמְרָא, in Jewish circles also. The spelling יוחני ומַמְרָא is found in Midrash Vayyosha' (i.e. from Ex 14[30]), and also in Yalkut Shimeoni and the Talmudic tractate Menachoth 85*a* (quoted in Aruch).

It is probable that Jannes, otherwise spelt יונוס or יוחני, is a corruption of Ἰωάννης = יוֹחָנָן: with a side allusion, however, to Aram. יגי 'he who misleads'; and that Jambres is from יַמְרִי, ptcp. מָרַר 'he who opposes.' The insertion of β into the Yamre and Mamre recalls Μαμβρή (Gn 13[18]) and 'Αμβράμ (Ex 6[18]) in LXX. Schöttgen gives other spellings of the names in Jewish writings.

LITERATURE.—Schöttgen (Hor. Heb.) and Wetstein (Nov. Test.) on 2 Ti 3[8]; Schürer HJP II. iii. 149 ff.; Buxtorf, Chald. Lex. s. יוחנא, and the Bible Lexicons. J. T. MARSHALL.

JANNES AND JAMBRES, BOOK OF.—An apocryphon not yet discovered. It is twice mentioned by Origen. On Mt 27[8] Origen says that St. Paul, in 2 Ti 3[8], does not quote 'from public writings, but from a sacred book, which is entitled The Book of Jannes and Mambres.' (The form Mambres is found in Codd. F G and Itala of 2 Ti 3[8], and in many Latin authors. The Jews also knew the form יַמְבְּרִי). On Mt 23[37] Origen adduces 2 Ti 3[8] as an instance in which an apocr. writing is quoted in Scripture. The same work is probably intended in the Decretum Gelasii, under the title Pœnitentia Jamnis et Mambræ. Whether St. Paul really read the work, or, as Theodoret opines, gathered his information from the unwritten teaching of the Jews, we can but conjecture. There are two points slightly in favour of Origen—(1) The fact that the Gentiles, Pliny, Apuleius, and Numenius knew of J. and J., seems to point to a written source; and since Pliny died A.D. 79, the work was probably in existence before 2 Ti was written. (2) The fact that Pal. Targ. gives the Gr. form of the names יניס וימבריס, seems to imply that here, as in the case of Eldad and Modad (which see), the Targumist is quoting from a written source. It is probable, then, that we have here to do, not with an oral tradition, but with a definite apocryphal work.

LITERATURE.—Schürer, HJP II. iii. 149 ff.; Zöckler, Apokr. d. AT, 424; Fabricius, Codex pseudepigr. VT, i. 813–825.
J. T. MARSHALL.

JANOAH.—1. (יָנוֹחַ). A town in the northern mountains of Naphtali, near Kedesh, 2 K 15[29]. It is the modern Yanûh. See SWP vol. i. sheet ii. 2. (יָנוֹחָה, AV Janohah). A place on the border of Ephraim, east of Taanath-shiloh, Jos 16[6. 7]. In the 4th cent. A.D. (Onomasticon, s.v. 'Jano') it was known as lying in Akrabattine (the region of 'Akrabeh in the hills east of Shechem), 12 Roman miles east of Neapolis (Shechem), or where the present Yânûn now stands, with the supposed tomb of Nun. See SWP vol. ii. sheet xii. (cf. Robinson, BRP iii. 297; Guérin, Samarie, ii. 6; Buhl, GAP 178). C. R. CONDER.

JAPHETH (יֶפֶת, Ἰάφεθ).—The name of one of the sons of Noah, and the ancestor of a number of tribes (esp. Gn 10[2–4]).

1. In the article HAM we have seen reasons for adopting the opinion according to which the three sons of Noah originally represented a division of the inhabitants of Palestine, but which part of the population was represented by Japheth is not clear: Wellhausen (JDTh xxi. 403) conjectured the Philistines; Budde (Urgesch. 338 ff.), the Phœnicians; but the words in the blessing of Noah (Gn 9[27]), 'God make room (so perhaps literally) for Japheth to dwell in the tents of Shem,' would seem to imply a closer relationship than that of neighbouring nations, and one more resembling that of castes of tribes forming a single state, like the Ramnes and Tities in Rome, or the Brahmins and Kshattriyas of Hindustan. Of the name 'Japheth,' however, with any such denotation there is no trace. The text of Gn offers no etymology for the name, but only an assonance with Aram. פתה 'to be wide'; and though a name derived from this root would perhaps have a parallel in the Nabatæan אפתו, there are other Semitic roots from which the name could with equal probability be derived; the etymology which has found most favour is from the Hebrew יפה 'to be beautiful,' whence the Arabic-speaking Jews make it the equivalent of 'Al-Hasan'; and this, though not free from grammatical difficulty, is accepted by some modern authorities.

2. As the name of one of the founders of the human race, it is natural to compare Japheth with Iapetos, a personage who appears in Homer (Il. viii. 479) as a giant, and in Hesiod as the father of Prometheus; while in a passage of Berosus, quoted on the very questionable authority of Moses of Chorene (ed. Florival, i. 30), a Chaldæan cosmogony makes an Iapetos joint founder of the human family with two others whom Moses not unnaturally identifies with Ham and Shem.* The only value of this notice is that we learn from it who first compared the Greek and Hebrew legends. The identification is etymologically possible (Lagarde, Gesammelte Abhandlungen, 256), but not certainly correct, since the Greek language offers a sufficiently good derivation for the name of the giant Iapetos (Ebeling, Lexicon Homericum, s.v.), and the original import of the biblical Japheth is not obviously connected with the giant: if the two names are in reality traceable to the same source, the latter is more probably Semitic than Greek, but it may very well be neither.

3. Many attempts have been made, both in ancient (Jos. Ant. I. vi. 1; Talm. Bab., Yoma, f. 10*a*; Talm. Jer., Megillah, p. 19; for other Rabbinic references see Neubauer, Géog. du Talm. 421 ff.) and in modern times (see Lagarde, l.c., and esp. Lenormant, Orig. de l'Hist.[2] 1882) to identify the tribes derived from Japheth, of which Madai or Media, Javan or Ionia, and of Javan's sons Citium and Tarshish are familiar, and perhaps Meshech and Tubal may be said to be known; while the remaining names occur either in this table only (Tiras, Riphath) or chiefly besides in Ezk (esp. chs. 27. 38) and Jer (Ashkenaz). The omission of the name of Persia, which is known to Ezekiel (27[10] 38[5]), seems to give us a terminus ad quem for the composition of the list, while the fact that Magog occupies the second place shows that it can be little earlier than Ezekiel's time. The names of the grandsons may represent the results of more extended knowledge than that expressed in the names of the sons; but it is unlikely that the table in any form was derived from an official source; the names which it contains belong to distant nations, known to the Israelites of Ezekiel's time chiefly by hearsay, though several of them had by that date acquired some political importance. The writer who made them descendants of Japheth would seem to have already adopted the interpretation of Gn 9[27] which appears in the Targ. Onk., and Talm. Bab. l.c., according to which it is God, not Japheth, who is to dwell in the tents of Shem. The first clause, 'God make room for Japheth,' when the room was no longer confined to Palestine, would be a ground for counting among Japheth's descendants the barbarians who peopled the unknown north and the islands of the unexplored sea.

D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

JAPHETH (Ἰάφεθ).—A region whose identity is uncertain, mentioned in Jth 2[25]. Holofernes 'came unto the borders of Japheth, which were toward the south, over against Arabia.'

JAPHIA (יָפִיעַ; B Ἰεφθά, A, Luc. Ἰαφαίε;

* The modern Armenian poet Pakratuni (Haig, i. p. 17) rather ingeniously thinks of 'earthly' and 'heavenly' names. The Armenian form of the name in Moses is Japetosthé, whereon Pictet (Origines Indo-Européennes, i. 627) based some inferences, accepted by Lenormant, l.c. II. i. 191.

Japhia).—1. King of Lachish, who, together with the kings of Hebron, Jarmuth, and Eglon, joined Adoni-zedek, king of Jerusalem, in attacking the Gibeonites after the latter had made a treaty with the Israelites. The five 'kings of the Amorites' were routed by Joshua at Beth-horon, and fled to the cave at Makkedah, where they were slain at Joshua's command (Jos $10^{3ff.}$).

2. (B Ἰεφίες, Ἰανοῦε, Ἰανουού; A Ἀφίε, Ἰαφίε; Luc. Νάφεθ, Ἀχικάμ, Ἰαβέγ) One of David's sons born at Jerusalem; the list is given three times (2 S $5^{14b\text{-}16}$, 1 Ch $3^{5\text{-}8}$ $14^{4\text{-}7}$). J. F. STENNING.

JAPHIA (יָפִיעַ).—A town on the south border of Zebulun, Jos 19^{12}. It is probably the modern Yâfa, near the foot of the Nazareth hills. See SWP vol. i. sheet v. (cf. Robinson, BRP[2] ii. 343 f.).

JAPHLET (יָפְלֵט).—The eponym of an Asherite family, 1 Ch $7^{32f.}$. See GENEALOGY.

JAPHLETITES (יַפְלֵטִי).—The name of an unidentified tribe mentioned in stating the boundaries of the children of Joseph, Jos 16^{3} (see Dillmann's note).

JARAH (יְעָרָה).—A descendant of Saul, 1 Ch 9^{42}. In 8^{36} he is called Jehoaddah, and Kittel (in SBOT) would substitute יְהוֹעַדָּה for יְעָרָה (so Siegfried-Stade and [doubtfully] Oxf. Heb. Lex.; and Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 283, n. 14).

JAREB (יָרֵב, Ἰαρείμ, Ἰαρείβ) is twice employed by Hosea (5^{13} 10^{6}) as a designation of the king of Assyria. Various opinions have been expressed as to whether it is a proper name or a descriptive epithet. AV, which, like RV, has 'king J.' in the text, offers in the marg. the alternative renderings 'the king of J.' or 'the king that should plead,' while RVm gives 'a king that should contend.' Sayce (HCM 417) conjectures that J. may have been the natal name of the usurper who seized the throne of Assyria after the death of Shalmaneser IV. in Dec. B.C. 723, and who is known to history as Sargon II. It was natural that he should assume the name of one of the most illustrious of the early Bab. monarchs (Sargon I.), just as his two predecessors, who were also usurpers, exchanged their original names (Pul and Ululâ) for those of earlier Assyr. kings (Tiglath-pileser and Shalmaneser). What appears to be a fatal objection to Sayce's theory, is that we seem compelled by internal evidence of the strongest character to assign the whole of Hos 4–14 to a date prior even to the deportation of the inhabitants of Gilead by Tiglath-pileser (734), whereas, if J. is to be identified with Sargon, we should have to bring down the date of some at least of these chaps. to about B.C. 722, the year when Samaria fell. Others (like AVm, RVm), connecting J. (יָרֵב) with רִיב=strive, render, e.g., 'the warlike king' (W. R. Smith), 'a hostile king' (Gesenius), 'king Combat' (Farrar), 'Kampfhahn' (Guthe in Kautzsch's AT). Reuss, deriving J. from the same root רִיב, makes it=Lat. patronus, a title which he holds to be fairly applicable to a king whose assistance had been invoked by Ephraim and Judah (2 K 15^{19} 16^{7}). Schrader's identification of 'the combatant king' with Assurdân (c. 755) lacks probability, as is pointed out by Whitehouse, who agrees with Nowack that J. is Tiglath-pileser III. (745–728). A very attractive explanation of the name is offered by McCurdy, who considers that J. is a participial adjective from the root רבב meaning 'to be great.' Jareb would thus answer to the familiar title of Assyr. monarchs, 'the great king' (Hist. Proph. and Mon. i. 415). W. Max Müller (ZATW, 1897, p. 334) obtains the same meaning by dividing the words מלכי רב instead of מלך ירב. So also Cheyne (Expositor, Nov. 1897, p. 364; cf. Expos. Times, ix. [1898] pp. 364, 428). See further, Nowack, Kl. Proph. ad loc.; Neubauer, Zeitschr. f. Assyr. iii. 103; Hommel, Gesch. Bab.-Assyr. 680; Schrader, COT[2] ii. 136. J. A. SELBIE.

JARED (יֶרֶד, pausal form יָרֶד, LXX Ἰάρεδ, NT Ἰάρετ).—The father of Enoch, Gn $5^{15.\ 16.\ 18.\ 19.\ 20}$, 1 Ch 1^{2}, Lk 3^{37}. See further, JERED.

JARHA (יַרְחָע).—An Egyptian slave who married the daughter of his master Sheshan, 1 Ch $2^{34f.}$ See GENEALOGY.

JARIB (יָרִיב).—1. The eponym of a Simeonite family, 1 Ch 4^{24}=Jachin of Gn 46^{10}, Ex 6^{15}, Nu 26^{12}. 2. One of the 'chief men' who were sent by Ezra to Casiphia in search of Levites, Ezr 8^{16}. He is called in 1 Es 8^{44} Joribus. 3. A priest who had married a foreign wife, Ezr 10^{18}. He is called in 1 Es 9^{19} Joribus.

JARIMOTH (A Ἰαριμώθ, B -ει-), 1 Es 9^{28}.—In Ezr 10^{27} JEREMOTH.

JARMUTH (יַרְמוּת).—1. A town in the W. of Judah. In Jos 10 (JE) its king, Piram, joined the Canaanite league against the Gibeonites, and suffered death along with his confederates at Makkedah—all of which argues a place of considerable importance. (Cf. Jos 12^{11} D[2]). According to Jos 15^{35} (P) it was situated in the Shephelah, and belonged to the tribe of Judah, which tribe on its return re-peopled the town (Neh 11^{29}).

The site is upon the present Jebel Yarmuk, a hill, the slopes of which still show the marks of old retaining walls, and are covered with the ruins of buildings. The summit is crowned by the foundations of a wall, the early acropolis of the place. Guérin (Judée, ii. 371 ff.) states that the ruins lie 'three good hours from Beit Djibrin, the ancient Eleutheropolis, on the road to Jerusalem.' The town will then be identical with the Ἱερμοῦς or Jermus of the Onomasticon, which Eusebius and Jerome agree in placing 10 miles from Eleutheropolis on the way to Jerusalem. And the Ἰαβεῖς or Jarimuth of the Onom. may be the same place, repeated with an error in the text (see Guérin, ad loc.). Though the site is not within the Shephelah, it immediately commands it.

2. A city in Issachar, belonging to the Gershonite Levites (Jos 21^{29}). Probably we should read רָמֹת Remeth: for (1) in the duplicate list (1 Ch 6^{73}) the name is Ramoth, in the tribal list of cities (Jos 19^{21}) Remeth appears; (2) in Jos 21^{29} the LXX reads Ῥεμμάθ B, Ἱερμώθ A; and in 19^{21} Ῥέμμας B, Ῥαμάθ A.

The place has not been identified. Guérin (Galilée, i. 129 ff.) conjectures Kaukab el-Haoua, a height between Scythopolis and Tiberias, which the Crusaders named Belvoir. The only reason is that Ramah or Remeth means height (!). Conder (PEF Mem. 1881, p. 201) suggests Rameh N. of Samaria, near which tradition places Issachar's grave. A. C. WELCH.

JAROAH (יָרוֹחָה).—A Gadite chief, 1 Ch 5^{14}. The text is doubtful (cf. Kittel in SBOT).

JASAELUS (Ἀσάηλος, AV Jasael), 1 Es 9^{30}.—In Ezr 10^{29} SHEAL.

JASHAR, BOOK OF (AV Jasher, סֵפֶר הַיָּשָׁר; LXX 2 S 1^{18} βιβλίον τοῦ εὐθοῦς; Vulg. libro justorum; Syr. Jos 10^{13} 'book of hymns or praises,' ܐܠܦ ܕܫܒ̈ܚ̈ܬܐ, 2 S 1^{18} 'book of Ashir,' ܐܫܪ; Targ. סִפְרָא דְאוֹרַיְתָא, 'book of the law').—According to MT, this document was the source of the lines,

> 'Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon;
> And thou, Moon, in the valley of Aijalon.
> And the sun stood still, and the moon stayed,
> Until the nation had avenged themselves of their enemies' (Jos $10^{12.\ 13}$); and of David's Lament over Saul and Jonathan, 2 S 1^{17-27}. LXX of Jos omits the reference to the Bk. of Jashar. But probably the original text of 1 K $8^{12.\ 13}$ stated that the lines,

> 'J" hath said that he would dwell in the thick darkness.
> I have surely built thee an house of habitation,
> A place for thee to dwell in for ever,'

were taken from this book. LXX makes our 1 K $8^{12.\ 13}$ the close of 8^{53}, apparently following a somewhat different text, and adds οὐκ ἰδοὺ αὕτη γέγραπται ἐν βιβλίῳ τῆς ᾠδῆς. The last three words represent סֵפֶר הַשִּׁיר, which is probably a corruption, by the transposition of two letters, of סֵפֶר הַיָּשָׁר.

Nothing further is known of this document. Syr. of Jos and S, and LXX of 1 K 8^{53}, suggest that יָשָׁר in Jos and S may be a corruption of שִׁיר 'song'; but this view has met with little if any support. The data are too scanty and obscure to determine either the character of the book or the meaning of its title. As the passages quoted are ancient poems on great events, especially battles, probably the book was a collection of such poems. Some other OT poems may be from this collection. The Targ. 'book of the law' represents a rabbinical theory that the Bk. of Jashar was the Pentateuch or part of it. Donaldson, in his Jashar: fragmenta archetypa carminum Hebraicorum, published at London in 1854, attempted a reconstruction of the book, and assigned to it a large number of passages from OT; but his views met with no acceptance.

The date of the collection is obviously later than the time of David, and probably older than B.C. 800—the references to Jashar are assigned to J^1 (Budde, Samuel, etc.).

MT points יָשָׁר as the ordinary יָשָׁר 'upright,' and it is so understood by LXX, Vulg. etc. If so, it may be taken as 'hero,' or collectively 'heroes,' courage and warlike prowess being the virtues most admired in primitive times; Ilgen notices the title Hamasa, 'warlike virtue,' 'valour,' given to a section of an Arabic anthology, containing poems in praise of heroic deeds. Or 'the hero' may be Israel, whose name is based on a root similar to יָשָׁר, and who is sometimes called יְשֻׁרוּן Jeshurun (which see), Dt 32^{15} $33^{5.\ 26}$, Is 44^{2}. Or יָשָׁר may be the initial word of the book, possibly to be read as yāshîr 'sang,' as in אָז יָשִׁיר Ex 15^{1}, Nu 21^{17}.

There are two rabbinical works with the title 'Book of Jashar,' a moral treatise by R. Shabbatai Carmuz Levita, A.D. 1394, contained in a MS in the Vatican; and a treatise on the laws of the Jews by R. Thom, d. 1171, first printed in Italy A.D. 1544. There is also an anonymous historical narrative, with the same title, containing the Pent., Jg., and Jos with additions; accepted by some Jews as the Bk. of Jashar; probably the work of a Spanish Jew of the 13th cent. It is said to have first appeared at Naples, and was first printed at Venice in 1625. In 1674 a German version of this work, with additions, was published at Frankfort-on-Main by R. Jacob. In 1751 a Bristol type-founder published a forgery professing to be an English translation of the Bk. of Jashar, with a preface by Alcuin. It was reprinted in 1827 with a forged attestation by Wyclif.

JASHEN (הַיָּשֵׁן, Ἀσάν, Jasen).—The sons of Jashen (בְּנֵי יָשֵׁן) are mentioned in the list of David's heroes given in 2 S 23^{32}. In the parallel list (1 Ch 11^{34}) they appear as the sons of Hashem (הָשֵׁם), who is further described as the Gizonite (הַגִּזֹנִי) (wh. see). The name Gizon, however, does not occur elsewhere, and it seems probable that the true form of the gentilic adjective has been preserved by Lucian (2 S Ἰεσσαὶ ὁ Γουνύ; 1 Ch Εἱρασαὶ ὁ Γουνί), viz. 'the Gunite' (הַגּוּנִי), or member of the Naphtalite family of Guni (Nu 26^{48}); so Driver, Budde, Klostermann. It is further generally admitted by most scholars that the word בְּנֵי ('sons of') has crept into the text both of 2 S and 1 Ch by dittography from the preceding הַשַּׁעַלְבֹנִי ('the Shaalbonite'): Lucian omits it in both passages. Hashem (1 Ch), though supported by the LXX (2 S Ἀσάν; 1 Ch A υἱοὶ Ἀσάμ ὁ Γωννί), must, in view of Lucian's text, be rejected in favour of Jashen. For 'the sons of Jashen' (2 S 23^{32}) we should therefore read 'Jashen the Gunite.' See further, Driver, Notes on the Books of Sam. p. 283.

JASHOBEAM (יָשָׁבְעָם).—One of David's mighty men, 1 Ch 11^{11} 12^{6} 27^{2}. There is reason to believe that his real name was Ishbosheth, i.e. Eshbaal. See JOSHEB-BASSHEBETH.

JASHUB (יָשׁוּב 'he returns').—1. Issachar's fourth son, Nu 26^{24} P, 1 Ch 7^{1}, called in Gn 46^{13} Iob (wh. see): patron. Jashubites, Nu 26^{24}. 2. A returned exile who married a foreigner, Ezr 10^{29}.

JASHUBI-LEHEM (יָשֻׁבִי לָחֶם).—The eponym of a Judahite family, 1 Ch 4^{22}. The text is manifestly corrupt. LXX gives καὶ ἀπέστρεψεν αὐτούς, Luc. καὶ ἐπέστρεψαν ἑαυτοῖς. Kittel (in SBOT) reads וַיָּשֻׁבוּ בֵית לָחֶם 'and they returned to Bethlehem,' remarking that the LXX and Vulg. (et qui reversi sunt in Lahem) rightly recognize the verb שׁוּב, לחם must stand for לְ בֵּית, and the last two letters of MT ישבו may be a trace of the בית. Even so, the meaning of the passage is obscure.

JASON (Ἰάσων).—A common Gr. name, not unfrequently used by Hel. Jews, or by Palestinians who were favourable to Hellenizing influences. In some cases it was adopted as the equivalent of Joshua or Jesus (Ἰησοῦς); cf. Jos. Ant. XII. v. 1.

1. J. THE SON OF ELEAZAR, one of the envoys sent by Judas Maccabæus to conclude a treaty with Rome (B.C. 161). The Greek name suggests that he belonged to the more liberal party among the Jews (Stanley), 1 Mac 8^{17}, Jos. Ant. XII. x. 6.

2. J. THE FATHER OF ANTIPATER, who was sent as an ambassador by Jonathan, in B.C. 144, to renew the former treaty with the Romans (1 Mac 12^{16} 14^{22}, Jos. Ant. XIII. v. 8). This Jason is perhaps the same as No. 1.

3. J. OF CYRENE, a Jewish writer, who composed five books on the history of the Maccabees and the wars of the Jews against Antiochus Epiphanes and his successor Eupator. Of this work our Second Book of the Maccabees is an abridgment (ἐπιτομή), and from the epitomizer's preface our whole knowledge of J. is derived. The date at which he lived can be determined only by internal evidence. Comparing the epitome with 1 Mac, which deals in the main with the same period of history, we find numerous discrepancies not only in important details, but sometimes even in the order of events; and it cannot be doubted that on the whole the simpler narrative of 1 Mac is to be preferred. At the same time 2 Mac supplies us with many additional particulars, which there is no reason to doubt. The writer seems to have been specially well informed upon the earlier troubles which led to the Maccabæan rising. J. clearly had at his disposal valuable contemporary information; but if this was not written but oral, and frequently not received at first hand, it is easy to account for the numerous inaccuracies and legendary additions which are to be found in his work. The narrative of 2 Mac extends to B.C. 160; and J. probably wrote not long after that date. His name and place of residence imply that he was a Hellenist; the ornate and rhetorical style of the work is characteristic of the later Gr. writers; and from internal evidence it seems clear that the orig. work of J. was written in Greek. Cf. Schürer, HJP II. iii. 211–215; Zöckler on 2 Mac, Einl. 2.

4. J. THE HIGH PRIEST, the son of Simon II., and brother of Onias III., was the leader of the Hellenizing party among the Jews. His orig. name was Jesus or Joshua (Jos. Ant. XII. v. 1). On the accession of Antiochus Epiphanes, he induced the king, by means of a large present of money, to expel Onias from the high priesthood, and to confer the office upon himself (2 Mac 4^{7-17}, 4 Mac 4^{15-20}. Josephus, l.c., seems to be mistaken when he asserts that J. became high priest on the death of his brother, and also when he states that the next pretender, Menelaus, was a brother of J.). J. further procured from Antiochus permission to erect a gymnasium and 'ephebeion' in Jerus., and obtained for the inhabitants the title and privileges of 'citizens of Antioch.' Through J.'s influence Gr. customs were largely adopted among all classes of the Jews; and to the sacred games, which were celebrated at Tyre every four years in honour of Hercules, he sent a Jewish deputation with a large sum of money. This money, however, at the request of the envoys themselves, was expended on building galleys and not on sacrifices (2 Mac 4^{18-20}). For three years (B.C. 174–171) J. continued in power, then he was supplanted by his own envoy to Antiochus, Menelaus, who gained the office of high priest by offering a still larger bribe (ib. 4^{23-26}). J. took refuge among the Ammonites; but the next year, on the occasion of a false report of the death of Antiochus in Egypt, he suddenly attacked Jerus. with a large force, and, becoming master of the city, drove his rival to take refuge in the citadel. On the advance of Antiochus, J. fled once more to the Ammonites, and subsequently to Egypt. Afterwards, relying on the fabled connexion between the Spartans and Jews (cf. 1 Mac 12^{7}), he retired to Sparta, and there died 'in a strange land,' 'nor had he any funeral at all, or place in the sepulchre of his fathers' (2 Mac 5^{1-10}).

JASON (Ἰάσων). — During St. Paul's visit to Thessalonica, he was the guest of one Jason. When the Jews caused a disturbance, they attacked Jason's house, and, failing to find the apostle, they took Jason and the brethren before the politarchs. The magistrates received security (τὸ ἱκανόν) from Jason and the others, and then dismissed them. The brethren immediately sent Paul and Silas away to Berœa (Ac $17^{5ff.}$). The nature of the security is not mentioned. According to Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 231), it was a security to prevent the cause of the disturbance, Paul, from coming to Thessalonica. This put a chasm between the apostles and the Thessalonians, and hence he speaks (1 Th 2^{18}) of Satan hindering him (διότι ἠθελήσαμεν ἐλθεῖν πρὸς ὑμᾶς, ἐγὼ μὲν Παῦλος καὶ ἅπαξ καὶ δίς, καὶ ἐνέκοψεν ἡμᾶς ὁ Σατανᾶς). This explanation is ingenious, but will perhaps hardly explain the ἅπαξ καὶ δίς.

In Ro 16^{21} the apostle sends greetings from Timothy, Lucius, Jason, and Sosipater, his kinsmen. This was very probably the same as the Jason of Thessalonica,—an identification made rather more probable by the possibility of Sosipater being the Sopater of Berœa (Ac 20^{4}). He would then be a Jew (οἱ συγγενεῖς μου). It was natural that St. Paul should lodge with a fellow-countryman, and Jason was a favourite name for Jews to assume whose Hebrew name was Joshua (Jesus); cf. Jos. Ant. XII. v. 1: ὁ μὲν οὖν Ἰησοῦς Ἰάσονα ἑαυτὸν μετωνόμασεν· ὁ δὲ Ὀνίας ἐκλήθη Μενέλαος. Jason did not apparently accompany St. Paul to Jerusalem (Ac 20^{4}), and therefore presumably remained at Thessalonica.

JATTIR (יַתִּיר and יָתִר).—A town of Judah in the southern mountains, noticed with Socoh and Debir, a Levitical city, Jos 15^{48} 21^{14}, 1 Ch 6^{42} [Eng.^{57}]. It was one of the cities to whose elders David sent of the spoil from Ziklag, 1 S 30^{27}. It appears to have been far south, since it is noticed in the latter passage with Aroer. The most probable site is the ruin 'Attîr, N.E. of Beersheba, on a hill spur close to the southern desert.

JAVAN (יָוָן, Ἰωνάν, Ἕλλάς, Ἕλληνες, Javan, Græcia, Græci).—A son of Japheth and father of Elishah, Tarshish, Kittim, and Dodanim (the last a textual error for Rodanim, i.e. Rhodes) (Gn $10^{2.4}$). In Is 66^{19} (cf. Jl 3^{6}) Javan is associated with the Gr. islands, and in Ezk 27^{13} with the traders of Tubal and Meshech, while in Dn 8^{21} 10^{20} 11^{2} it denotes the Macedonian empire. J., in fact, is the Greek Ἰάων, 'Ionian,' and its position in Gn 10^{2} shows that it must there mean Cyprus (in which Kition [Kittim] was situated), called mat Yavnâ, Yânan, and Yânana, 'the land of the Ionians,' in the inscriptions of Sargon and Sennacherib. In the Bab. transcripts of the inscriptions of Darius Hystaspis, Yâvanu represents the Ionians of Asia Minor; and when, in B.C. 711, the people of Ashdod revolted from Assyria and deposed their lawful king, they put on the throne in his place a certain Yavanu or 'Greek.' Gaza was also called Iônê, and the sea between Philistia and Egypt was known as 'Ionian' (Steph. Byz. s.v. Ἰόνιον). In the Egyp. hieroglyphs Ha-nibu or Ui-nivu is rendered by Uinin or 'Ionians' in demotic, and the Mediterranean is termed the 'circle of the Ha-nibu' as early as the pyramid-texts of the 6th dynasty. One of the Tel el-Amarna tablets (B.C. 1400) speaks of a Yivana or 'Ionian' in the land of Tyre, and W. Max Müller (Asien und Europa, p. 370) has pointed out that the name of one of the allies of the Hittites in their struggle with Ramses II. must be read Yevana, 'Ionians.'

A. H. SAYCE.

JAVAN (יָוָן), mentioned by Ezekiel (27^{19}) among places that traded with Tyre, but distinct from Javan = Ionia, which occurs in v.^{13}. See preceding article. The verse in which it is found commences וָדָן יָוָן מְאוּזָל, and the third of these words is probably to be interpreted 'from Uzal,' a place in Arabia (Gn 10^{27}); but it is not clear whether Uzal is to be regarded as the factory whence 'Wĕdān and Jāvān' exported goods to Tyre, or whether 'from Uzal' is an epithet of 'Javan' intended to distinguish this Javan from the other. Of the modern authorities who regard the consonants of the text as correct, Smend thinks Javan may be the name of an Arab tribe, or of a locality in the neighbourhood of Uzal (Ṣan'ā); while Glaser (Skizze, ii. 428–436) is inclined to interpret יָוָן as 'Greeks,' supposing a Greek colony in Arabia to be signified, but seems to prefer to identify it with Yayn, a place mentioned by Hamdāni (ed. Müller, p. 171, l. 10) as belonging together with Waddān to the territory of Juhaynah, and indeed immediately after Ḥarrat an-Nār in the neighbourhood of Medinah (see Doughty's map). The situation of this Yayn can be fixed with some accuracy from the notice in Al-Bekri (ed. Wüstenfeld, p. 859, etc.); but although the LXX rendering (οἶνον) would seem to favour the reading יַיִן in Ezk, and the proximity of Waddān seems to support Glaser's identification, the fact that there is no evidence of this Yayn having ever been a place of importance, or connected with the trade in iron and spices, or connected with Uzal, renders it impossible to attach any scientific value to the identification.

The majority of modern critics regard the consonants as corrupt (Stade, Briggs, Cornill; cf. Oxf. Heb. Lex. s. עָנָן); and in Cornill's edition ארנבן is substituted for the consonants of the text, on the authority of a wine-list of Nebuchadnezzar (Delitzsch, Assyrische Lesestücke, 1875, p. 63), in which a country of that name (A-ra-na-ba-nun) is mentioned with two others which bear some resemblances to places named in v.[18] as sending wine to Tyre. Though striking parallels to Ezekiel are found in the cuneiform inscriptions (D. H. Müller, Ezechiel-studien, 1895, pp. 56–62), the legitimacy of such a correction seems questionable.

JAZER (יַעְזֵר, יַעְזִיר, Ἰαζήρ; AV of Nu 21[32] 32[35] Jaazer; meaning of name uncertain).—A town E. of the Jordan, in Gilead, and belonging to the tribe of Gad (Jos 13[25], 1 Ch 26[31]).* The indications given in the Onomasticon by Eusebius and Jerome, viz. 10 (or 8) miles W. of Philadelphia and 15 N. of Heshbon, are approximately correct. It was a Levitical city (Jos 21[39]), was evidently a place of more than usual importance, and is mentioned in various connexions. The 'villages' or daughter towns of J. are spoken of in Nu 21[32], showing that the district was thickly inhabited, and that neighbouring places were grouped about it as their political head. It was chosen as one of the stations of David's census officers (2 S 24[5]), and, seven centuries after the conquest of the country under Moses, it was famous for its vineyards and fruitful fields (Is 16[8-10], Jer 48[32]).† Jazer is mentioned also in connexion with the wars of the Maccabees, having been, according to Josephus (Ant. XII. viii. 1), captured and burnt by Judas Maccabæus, after the latter had inflicted a crushing defeat upon the Ammonites under Timotheus.

When the Hebrews reached Heshbon, they discovered, lying not far to the north of it, an extensive and fertile region which they speak of as 'the land of Jazer' (Nu 32[1]). Against this a special expedition (Nu 21[32]) was fitted out by Moses (1) because of its own importance, and (2) because it lay in the line of march to the conquest of Bashan. This region at once attracted the attention of the Hebrews, and the contrast between its broad and fertile expanse and the desert which they had left made them feel that they had reached a paradise. 'It is not to be wondered at that the two and a half tribes were perfectly willing to stay on this side of the Jordan. Judæa has no land to compare with it, neither has Samaria, except in very limited portions. The surface of the country is slightly rolling and comparatively free from stone. Here common Arab trails broaden out into fine roads. Here are wide pasture lands and luxuriant fields of wheat and barley, and the ignorant Bedawin who own the soil point with pride to the green acres that are spread out beneath the sun.'

Jazer, now called Khurbet Sar, has extensive remains of antiquity, but those above ground are chiefly of the Roman period. It possesses a curious tower formed of massive blocks of unhewn stone, which could have been put into position only at the cost of immense labour. Sar is about three thousand four hundred feet above the sea-level, and in the wide view to the W. and S. the Dead Sea is embraced. On the south, Wady esh-Shita begins to descend rapidly towards the Jordan Valley, and in the opposite direction not far from the ruins are two large ponds, near to but entirely distinct from each other, peculiar and attractive objects in the landscape. The great plateau about this ancient ruin has for generations been the battle-ground of the Arab tribes in that region, and quantities of skulls are piled under the fallen arches of a once magnificent building (Merrill, East of the Jordan, pp. 405, 485).

JAZIZ (יָזִיז).—A Hagrite who was 'over the flocks' of king David, 1 Ch 27[31]. See Genealogy.

JE.—The symbol used by biblical critics for the combination in one whole of the Jahwistic and Elohistic documents. See Hexateuch.

JEALOUSY.—There is no more striking example of the anthropomorphic way of speaking of God characteristic of OT than the frequent ascription to Him of jealousy, associated as that idea is in our minds with an evil meaning. 'I am a jealous God' (אֵל קַנָּא Ex 20[5] 34[14], Dt 4[24] 5[9], Jos 24[19], Nah 1[2]). Two things may help to remove the feeling of strangeness. The phrase is probably taken from the marriage relation which is so often used in OT to describe the relation between J" and the people of Israel (Is 54[5] 62[5], Hos 2[19] etc.). Again, although the word is now generally used in a bad sense, it has a good side, as in the case of the marriage relation in question; and it is only in this sense, of course, that it is used in the present connexion. Just as jealousy in husband or wife is the energetic assertion of an exclusive right, so God asserts and vindicates His claim on those who belong to Him alone. The use of the figure is much bolder and more picturesque than the bare assertion of right would be. If God is the husband and Israel the wife, then idolatry and wickedness of every kind are spiritual adultery. Israel is often represented as thus provoking God to jealousy (Dt 32[16], 1 K 14[22] etc.). The phraseology occurs with special frequency in Ezk (5[13] 16[38. 42] 23[25] 36[5. 6] 38[19] 39[25]); but it is found in other prophets also (Is passim, Jl 2[18], Zeph 1[18], Zec 1[14] 8[2], Hos 2[2. 16]).

On the other hand, the term is used to denote passionate concern in man for God's honour, as in the case of Phinehas (Nu 25[11. 13]), Elijah (1 K 19[10]), Jehu (2 K 10[16]; cf. Ps 119[139]). So Jn 2[17] 'The zeal (ζῆλος) of thine house' (Ps 69[9]); 'a zeal for God' (Ro 10[2]); 'I am jealous . . . with a godly jealousy' (2 Co 11[2]). Cf. ὁ καναναῖος = ὁ ζηλωτής, Lk 6[15].

The law of the jealousy offering is found in Nu 5[11-31]. The rite was in the nature of an appeal to God, who was called upon to decide the question of the innocence or guilt of the sus Jeberechiah (יְבַרְכְיָהוּ 'J" blesseth,' generally abbreviated בְּרַכְיָה or בְּרֶכְיָהוּ, Berechiah, which see).—The father of Zechariah, a friend of Isaiah, Is 8^{2}.

Jebus, Jebusi, Jebusite (יְבוּס, Ιεβους; יְבוּסִי, Ιεβουσαῖος -οι, Ιεβουσαι Jos 18^{16}, Ιεβουσειν Jg 19^{11b}).—Jĕbūs occurs only in Jg 19^{10} ('Jebus, the same is Jerusalem'), v.^{11}, and in 1 Ch $11^{4.\ 5}$, a passage which the Chronicler has so expanded from 2 S 5^{6} as to introduce the name into it twice (in v.^{4} adding, 'the same is Jebus,' and in v.^{5} 'the inhabitants of Jebus'), each time, obviously, as an intentional archaism. On the strength of these passages, it used commonly to be said that Jebus was the old name of Jerusalem; but the Tel el-Amarna tablets have shown this view to be erroneous; the city is there called regularly Urusalim.* It seems that, the inhabitants being known as 'Jebusites,' it was inferred incorrectly that 'Jebus' was the name of their city; but more usually, even in early times, it is spoken of as 'Jerusalem' (Jg $1^{7.\ 21}$, Jos 15^{63}, 2 S 5^{6}).

Jebusite† was the name of the local tribe which, in the first centuries of Israel's occupation of Canaan, held Jerusalem, until its citadel, 'the stronghold of Zion,' was captured under David, being called afterwards, from this circumstance, 'the city of David' (2 S 5^{6-9}; cf. 1 K 2^{10} 11^{43} etc.). Allusions to the Israelites' inability to expel the Jebusites from their stronghold are found in Jos 15^{63}, Jg 1^{21}; and in Jg 19^{10-12} it is described as a city of 'foreigners.' Zion was the S. part of the easternmost‡ of the two hills, on which Jerusalem was situated; and this accordingly was the site of the old Jebusite fortress. From its position it admitted of being strongly fortified: on the E. it overhung the Kidron valley, the bottom of which was some 700–800 ft. below; on the S. its sides sloped down more gradually to even a greater depth; on the W. the Tyropœon valley—not, as now, filled up with débris—was some 300 ft. below it; only on the N. was the approach easier, though even here, according to Guthe's excavations, there was a natural barrier, consisting of a depression in the rock, some 30–50 yards wide, and 12 deep. The area thus indicated would include, moreover, the one natural spring in Jerusalem, Gihon.§ The situation of this stronghold thus readily explains its long resistance to the Israelites. In the end, however, in spite of the taunting words in which its inhabitants defied their assailants to enter it, it was taken by David (2 S 5^{6-9}), —if an addition found only in the text of 1 Ch 11^{6} is to be trusted, through the prowess of Joab; and received the name which perpetuated to after-ages the memory of the monarch's success. The position of the Jebusite stronghold is further alluded to in Jos 15^{8} 18^{16}, where it is said that the (North) border of Judah and the (South) border of Benjamin passed along the valley of the son of Hinnom (whether this be the valley on the S. or the S.E. of Zion) to the south shoulder—i.e. the projecting mountain-side—of the Jebusite,—in exact agreement with the situation as defined above; it lay thus, according to these passages (P), just within the territory of Benjamin. This position of Jerusalem, so close to the border-line separating the two tribes, explains the variation observable between Jos 15^{63} ('the Jebusites dwell with the children of Judah in Jerusalem to this day') and Jg 1^{21} ('the Jebusites dwell with the children of Benjamin in Jerusalem to this day'); see Jerusalem. Of the earlier history of Jerusalem, it will be sufficient here to say that its king, Adoni-zedek, is described as being defeated and slain by the Israelites (Jos $10^{23.\ 26}$; cf. 12^{10}); but nothing is said here about the city being taken: the statement in Jg 1^{8} that the children of Judah took it and burnt it, can be reconciled with v.^{21} (Jos 15^{63}) only by very artificial suppositions; and the verse is in all probability a gloss, due to a misunderstanding of v.^{7b} (see Moore, ad loc.).

The only Jebusite mentioned expressly by name is Araunah, the owner of the threshing-floor on the top of 'Zion,' which was bought by David for the purpose of building an altar to J" (2 S $24^{16.\ 18.\ 25}$; cf. 1 Ch $21^{15.\ 18.\ 26.\ 28}$ 22^{1}, 2 Ch 3^{1}); but it is reasonable to suppose that Adoni-zedek (Jos 10^{1} etc.), if not Adoni-bezek as well (Jg 1^{5}; see v.^{7} end, and cf. Moore), was Jebusite likewise. How, or when, the Jebusites obtained possession of their stronghold, we do not know: in the Tel el-Amarna letters (c. B.C. 1400), Abdichêba is ruler of 'the land (or district) of the city of Jerusalem'; but, though allusion is made to the political action taken by the 'city' and 'country' governed by Abdichêba, the name of the inhabitants is not stated. Nor do our data enable us to determine with certainty the racial affinities of the Jebusites; though their position, and the Semitic name Adoni-zedek ('Zedek is my lord'), would lead naturally to the inference that they were a sub-tribe of the Canaanites. In Jos 10^{5} (cf. vv.$^{1.\ 3.\ 12}$) Adoni-zedek is called a 'king of the Amorites'; but, in view of the manner in which 'Amorite' is used in E (like 'Canaanite' in J) as a general designation of the pre-Israelitish inhabitants of Canaan, no conclusion can be drawn from the statement as to the distinctive nationality of his subjects: there were at least no Amorites S. of Phœnicia in the age of the Tel el-Amarna letters.*

The Jebusites are frequently mentioned in the rhetorical enumerations of the nations of Canaan, whom the Israelites were to dispossess (or had dispossessed), as Gn 15^{21}, Ex $3^{8.\ 17}$ 13^{5}, Jos 11^{3} (cf. Nu 13^{29}); in these lists, perhaps on account of their being numerically the smallest, they hold nearly always the last place. The buildings of David on the 'Millo' (2 S 5^{9}), and still more the temple and palaces constructed by Solomon, must have greatly altered the appearance of Zion; and few of its former Jebusite possessors can have remained there. The narrative of 2 S 24 shows, however, that David treated his conquered foes with consideration. According to 1 K $9^{20f.}$, the Jebusites, with other Canaanite races, were reduced by Solomon to serfdom, and made liable to forced service (לָמַס עֹבֵד). In Zec 9^{7}, where the future

JEDIDAH (יְדִידָה 'darling'; B Ἰεδεία, A Ἐδιδά).—Daughter of Adaiah of Bozkath, and mother of Josiah, king of Judah (2 K 22[1]).

JEDIDIAH (יְדִידְיָה 'beloved of J"'; cf. Sab. ודאל; B Ἰδεδεί, A Ἐιεδιδιά).—The name given to Solomon by the prophet Nathan, 2 S 12[25] 'for the LORD'S sake' (בַּעֲבוּר יהוה). See SOLOMON.

JEDUTHUN (יְדוּתוּן [in Kethîbh of Ps 39[1] 77[1], Neh 11[17], 1 Ch 16[38] יְדִיתוּן], LXX Ἰδιθούν, Ἰδιθώμ, etc.).—The eponym of one of the three guilds which, acc. to the Chronicler, conducted the musical service of the temple from the time of David downwards. The name does not occur in the books of Sam. or Kings or in any pre-exilic document. Not only so, but the earliest of the post-exilic writers know of only the Asaphites as singers (Neh 7[44], Ezr 2[41]). There is indeed mention in Neh 11[17] of descendants of J. who discharged this function, but in this passage we have not the original memoirs of Nehemiah, and the reference is wanting in the LXX. The Chronicler makes J. like Asaph, a contemporary of David, and gives him the title of 'the king's seer' (2 Ch 35[15]). While in 1 Ch 16[41f.] 25[1f.] etc. the three guilds of temple musicians are named after Heman, Asaph, and Jeduthun, there are other passages where the third name in the list is Ethan (1 Ch 6[44] 15[17] etc.). The two names are often assumed to be alternative designations of one and the same singer. It may be so, but there are circumstances which render this explanation less satisfactory than it appears at first sight. Reasonable doubts have even been expressed whether J. was originally a proper name at all. The word occurs in the title of three psalms (39. 62. 77). In the first of these (unless לְ be a scribal error for עַל) לִידוּתוּן may be in apposition with לַמְנַצֵּחַ (giving the sense of 'to the chief musician, namely to J.'), but in Ps 62 and 77 the reading is עַל־יְדוּתוּן (LXX ὑπὲρ Ἰδιθούν) 'upon J.' (which, after the analogy of similar expressions in the headings of the Pss, most probably means 'upon an instrument named J.'), or as in RV 'after the manner of J.' (where the last word would be the name of a tune or the opening word of a song). The whole subject of Heb. musical terms is so involved in obscurity that it is impossible to reach any certain conclusion. Seeing that the Sept. translators found many of these terms unintelligible, there is nothing improbable in the supposition that the Chronicler writing about the same date (c. B.C. 250) adopted an interpretation which took J. for a proper name, and that he transformed it, like the more familiar Heman and Ethan (which see), into the eponym of a Levitical choir. JEHIZKIAH (יְחִזְקִיָּהוּ 'J" strengtheneth'). — An Ephraimite, in the time of Ahaz and Pekah, who supported the prophet Oded in opposing the bringing of Judæan captives to Samaria, 2 Ch 28[12ff.].

JEHOADDAH (יְהוֹעַדָּה, possibly 'J" hath deposed or hath numbered').—A descendant of Saul, 1 Ch 8[36]. See JARAH.

JEHOADDAN (יְהוֹעַדָּן 2 Chr 25[1] and, as vocalized, 2 K 14[2]. The consonants of the text in 2 K 14[2] give the form Jehoaddin [so RV] (יְהוֹעַדִּין).—A lady of Jerusalem, mother of Amaziah king of Judah.

JEHOAHAZ (יְהוֹאָחָז, or Joahaz יוֹאָחָז 2 K 14[1], 2 Ch 34[8] 36[2. 4] 'J" hath grasped').—1. King of Israel, son of Jehu. His reign of seventeen years necessitates in 2 K 13[1] the reading 'one and twentieth' (Jos. Ant. IX. viii. 5), or in v.[10] 'thirty-ninth' (Aldine LXX, and Thenius). The inroads of Hazael of Damascus, which Jehu could not resist (2 K 10[32]), crushed Jehoahaz. The straits to which he was reduced by the Syrians (2 K 13[7. 22] 14[26. 27]) led by the young prince Benhadad (13[3. 24]) imply that the terrible anticipations of Elisha (2 K 8[12]) were being realized. These calamities were accompanied by a revival of the Asherah worship of Ahab (13[6], cf. 1 K 16[33]). Nevertheless, at the king's prayer, J" promised Israel 'a saviour' (cf. Jg 3[9] etc.), a promise not fulfilled in this reign (as Jos. Ant. IX. viii. 5, see v.[22]), but in the victories of Joash and Jeroboam II. (2 K 13[25] 14[27]), unless we suppose an allusion to the Assyrian king Rammân-nirâri who captured and plundered Damascus about this time (see Schrader, COT i. 207).

2. King of Judah (Joachaz or Jeconias, 1 Es 1[34]; Zarakes, 1 Es 1[38], see QPB). The name Shallum, found in Jer 22[11], 1 Ch 3[15], may possibly be significant, 'to whom it is requited' (Keil), or may contain an allusion to the unfortunate king of Israel, 2 K 15[13] (Bertheau), but more probably it was his original name, exchanged on his accession for one of better omen. He was the third son of Josiah (2 K 23[31. 36] 24[18]), his position in 1 Ch 3[15] being due to his insignificance. Although a bad man, ἀσεβὴς καὶ μιαρὸς τὸν τρόπον, 'impious and impure' (Jos. Ant. X. v. 2), he must have been a popular prince, since the people made him king in preference to his elder brother. He was anointed—a ceremony specified only in the case of a new dynasty or a disputed succession. Even the prophets Jeremiah (22[10-12]) and Ezekiel (19[2-4]) speak of him with sympathy and regret. After his victory at Megiddo it is likely that Necho resumed his march on the Euphrates, and sent a detachment to Jerusalem to bring J. to Riblah, whence he was carried a prisoner to Egypt when Necho returned, after having reduced Syria west of the Euphrates. 2 Ch 36[3] might imply that Necho visited Jerusalem in person when deposing Jehoahaz. This is unlikely; but he probably did so on his return journey (see Rawlinson's note on Herodotus, ii. 159).

3. = AHAZIAH of Judah, 2 Ch 21[17] 25[23].

JEHOASH or JOASH (יְהוֹאָשׁ, יוֹאָשׁ, יֹאשׁ 2 Ch 24[1] 'J" is strong,' or 'J" hath bestowed'*).—1. King of Judah (2 K 11. 12, 2 Ch 22[10]–24). A year-old infant when hidden by his aunt in a lumber-room of the palace (RVm, Jos. Ant. IX. vii. 1) from his unnatural grandmother, J. was but seven when placed on the throne of his ancestors (see ATHALIAH and JEHOIADA). It is sufficient here to observe that the significance of his coronation, as the revival of David's line, was emphasized, not only by the employment of David's dedicated armoury, but by a ceremonial of which there is no previous record, the investiture of the king with the royal insignia, 'the crown and the bracelets' (so Wellh. reading הצערות instead of העדות 'testimony,' cf. 2 S 1[10]; Jerome [Qu. Heb. on 2 Ch 23[11]] says 'phylacteries are meant, on which were written the ten commandments'). The covenant was renewed, not only between God and the nation, but between the people and the king (Ch omits), and, moreover, Jehoiada took steps to secure the continuance of the Davidic stock (2 Ch 24[3]). The death of Athaliah was followed by a reaction against the Baal worship which she had fostered; and the temple, which had been 'broken up' during her reign (2 Ch 24[7]), naturally became the object of the young king's pious care. The account in Kings of the raising of money for this purpose seems to have presented great difficulties to the Chronicler. At this period the commutation of sacrifices by a money payment appears to have been common (2 K 12[16]), and the money was paid to the priests directly, to each man by his patrons ('acquaintance'). The king directed that the priests should see to the necessary repairs, and should devote to this purpose (α) the money paid for the redemption of personal vows (Lv 27[2]), and (β) all voluntary offerings in coin. [Ch substitutes the half shekel tax of Ex 30[13-16], while AV and RVm of 2 K 12[4], supported by Targ., Rashi, etc., imply that this was a third source of revenue]. The priests [Ch 'Levites'], however, with Jehoiada at their head, ignored the king's order; possibly from poverty, as the temple was then only one of many sanctuaries (2 K 12[3]). At last, in the 23rd year of the reign, the business was, with their consent, taken out of their hands. Jehoiada [Ch 'the king'] placed a money chest 'beside the altar' (so Josephus) [Ch 'without at the gate'], into which the priests that kept the door (cf. 22[4] 25[18]) [Ch 'all the princes and all the people'] cast the proper monies. The money was counted by the king's scribe and the high priest [Ch 'chief priest's officer'], and according to Kings was devoted solely to the repair of the fabric, whereas Ch asserts that 'of the rest were made vessels for the house of the Lord,' thus directly contradicting 2 K 12[13]. The Chronicler now records the criminal weakness of J. in yielding to the idolatrous tendencies of the princes, and his base ingratitude as shown in the murder of Zechariah, the son of those to whom he owed his life and crown. There is nothing of this in Kings. There is indeed in 2 K 12[2] a hint at a deterioration in J.'s character after the death of Jehoiada (denied by Ewald, who renders 'wherein' 'because,' HI iv. 137 n. 1); but, on the other hand, he is ranked in 2 K with Amaziah (14[3]), Uzziah (15[3]), and Jotham (15[34]) as one who 'did right in the eyes of the Lord, yet not like David'; the shortcoming in each case being apparently that 'the high places were not taken away.' However, the reference to the murder of Zechariah in Mt 23[35], Lk 11[51], seems to guarantee that the story is not inserted merely to give a moral reason for the calamities of Jehoash. The Syrian invasion which followed [Ch immediately] is naturally represented in Ch as a special judgment on J. and the guilty princes, whereas in Kings it is implied that Hazael (not mentioned in Ch) did not actually take Jerusalem, but was bought off by an immense bribe. In any case the invasion was a severe national humiliation, which must have caused much discontent, and this found vent in the murder of J. by two of his servants in the fortress on Mt. Zion. The Chronicler heightens the infamy of his end by adding that he was 'in great diseases,' that they 'slew him on his bed,' that he was not buried in the royal sepulchres, and that the mothers of the assassins were of the two accursed nations of Moab and Ammon (see Dt 23^3). Jerome (Qu. Heb., ad loc.) notes that 'this is said to emphasize the wickedness of the Israelites who were unwilling to avenge God's priest.'

* See on this name and on 'Josiah' a paper by Hommel in Expos. Times, viii. (1897) p. 562.

2. King of Israel, son of Jehoahaz. The brief epitome of his reign (2 K 13^{10-13}) merely adds to the inevitable condemnation of his national worship an allusion to his defeat of Judah. But we derive a much more favourable impression of him from the close of the Acts of Elisha (2 K 13^{14-25}), and from the history of Amaziah of Judah, 2 K 14^{8-16} (=2 Ch 25^{17-24}), where the formula of conclusion is repeated from $13^{12.\ 13}$. In J. was partially fulfilled (13^{25}) the promise ($13^{4.\ 5}$) of a saviour from Syria, a promise repeated in the double symbolical prophecy of Elisha to the somewhat irresponsive king (13^{18}); and when we remember the abject condition into which Israel had fallen in the previous reign, it will be evident that J. must have been one of the greatest rulers of the northern kingdom. The hiring by Amaziah of Judah of 100,000 soldiers of Israel, during this reign (2 Ch 25^6), would indicate that all fear of Syria had been taken away. 'His might' was shown also in the thoroughness with which he followed up his victory at Bethshemesh, by breaking down the wall of Jerusalem on the weakest side. His natural disposition seems to have been good (so Jos. Ant. IX. viii. 6). There was a wholeheartedness in the burst of grief over the dying prophet; there was a pious recognition of the true source of Israel's strength in the words (13^{14}) which re-echoed Elisha's own apostrophe to the ascending Elijah (2^{12}); and even the sarcastic fable in which he replied to Amaziah's gratuitous challenge was dictated not more by pride than by magnanimity.

JEHOHANAN (יְהוֹחָנָן 'J" hath been gracious').—1. 1 Ch 26^3 a Korahite doorkeeper in David's time. 2. 2 Ch 17^{15} one of Jehoshaphat's five captains. Possibly father of Ishmael, who held a similar post at the accession of Jehoash, 2 Ch 23^1. 3. Ezr 10^6 (JONAS, 1 Es 9^1; JOHANAN, Neh $12^{22.\ 23}$; JONATHAN, Neh 12^{11}) high priest. He is called son of Eliashib Ezr 10^6, Neh 12^{23}, but was probably his grandson, Joiada being his father (Neh $12^{11.\ 22}$). His high priesthood is noted as an epoch until which the heads of the Levitical families were registered in 'the book of the Chronicles' (Neh 12^{23}); hence presumably down to the close of the 5th cent. B.C. (H. E. Ryle, in loc.). 4. Ezr 10^{28} (=JOANNES, 1 Es 9^{29}) an Israelite, one of those who 'had taken strange wives.' 5. Neh 6^{18}, son of Tobiah the Ammonite, Nehemiah's adversary. 6. Neh 12^{13} a priest, representative of the course of Amariah, in the days of Joiakim. 7. Neh 12^{42} a priest present at the dedication of the walls.

JEHOIACHIN (יְהוֹיָכִין 8 times, יְהוֹיָכִן Jer 52^{31}, יוֹיָכִין Ezk 1^2; Jeconiah יְכָנְיָה 5 times, יְכוֹנְיָה Jer 27^{20} [Kethîbh], יְכָנְיָהוּ Jer 24^1; Coniah כָּנְיָהוּ Jer $22^{24.\ 28}$ 37^1; 'J" appointeth'; called Joakim, 1 Es 1^{43}; Jechonias, Bar $1^{3.\ 9}$; Jechoniah, Mt $1^{11.\ 12}$).—King of Judah, son of Jehoiakim. Ewald conjectures that his original name was Coniah, exchanged for Jehoiachin on his accession; Keil more probably ascribes the variation to 'popular twisting and contracting of the longer name.' He reigned three months; the additional 10 days given in 2 Ch 36^9 1 Es 1^{44} being probably due to the accidental shifting in the text of 'ten' from his age at accession, which in Ch is eight instead of eighteen. Both readings are found in 1 Es 1^{43}. Upon J., as upon Louis XVI. of France, descended the full force of the divine vengeance incurred by previous generations. In another age he might have been 'the signet upon J"'s right hand' (Jer 22^{24}). He was scarcely on the throne when the Chaldæan forces, which had been ravaging Judæa, were joined by Nebuchadnezzar himself, and closed around Jerusalem, and J. surrendered at discretion. Jos. (Ant. X. vii. 1) asserts that Nebuchadnezzar had made J. king, after slaying his father; and that almost immediately afterwards, fearing that he might prove disloyal, he returned to depose him. This is both intrinsically unlikely, and is quite unsupported by the biblical narrative. From the prominent position given to the queen-mother Nehushta in 2 K 24^8, Jer 13^{18} 22^{26} 29^2, it is reasonable to infer that she exercised more than ordinary influence, and it was possibly at her suggestion that J. capitulated. Jos. (Ant. X. vii. 1) attributes it to 'his gentle and just disposition; he did not desire to see the city endangered on his account' (cf. Ant. X. xi. 2); and in BJ VI. ii. 1 he describes how at the last siege he himself appealed to John of Giscala to 'follow the example of J. who . . . did undergo a voluntary captivity . . . that he might not deliver up this sanctuary to the enemy, and see the house of God in flames; wherefore among all the Jews a sacred discourse celebrates him, and memory for ever flowing fresh hands him down immortal to posterity.' Among moderns, Ewald also takes a favourable view of his character, influenced by the theory that J. is the royal exile of Ps 84^9, and therefore author of that Ps, as well as of Pss 42. 43. But such a view seems irreconcilable with the tone of Jer 22^{24-30}, as well as with the unqualified condemnation in 2 K 24^9, 2 Ch 36^9, 1 Es 1^{44}. The favourable language of Jer 24^{5-7} refers to the captives generally. On the other hand, in Ezk 19^{5-9} the life of Jehoiakim and the fate of his son are fused into one ideal picture; and justly, for J. had no distinct political existence. The arm of Babylon raised to strike his father fell on him, and fulfilled the prophecy against Jehoiakim (Jer 36^{30}), 'He shall have none to sit upon the throne of David.' Conversely in Mt 1^{11} the two reigns are included under 'Jechoniah,' the less important name being chosen as marking more distinctly the epoch of the Captivity (cf. 1 Ch 3^{16}, 2 Ch 36^{10}, where Zedekiah is brother of J.). It is not merely a confusion arising from the identification of the names in LXX and Josephus.

With the fall of Jerusalem, B.C. 597, the Captivity began. Captives had been taken from the country before this, Jer 13^{19}, and possibly still earlier (Dn 1^3, Berosus in Jos. c. Apion, i. 19), but this marks an epoch, and from it Ezekiel dates his prophecies ('our captivity,' Ezk 40^1). The flower of the nation and the treasures of the temple were carried off to Babylon. By a comparison of 2 K 24^{14-16} with Jer 52^{28} (LXX om. Jer 52^{28-30}) we may infer that the captives included 7000 'men of might,' 3023 of the upper classes (Jos. Ant. X. vi. 3), and 1000 craftsmen. The king himself is styled emphatically 'the captive' (1 Ch 3^{17} RV), and seems to have been kept in rigorous imprisonment for 37 years. Evil-Merodach began his reign with an act of gracious clemency by releasing J., now about 55 years old. The historian (2 K 25^{27-30}, Jer 52^{31-34}) dwells with evident pleasure on the marks of respect thenceforth shown to the captive prince, in whose person the Jewish exiles felt their nation honoured. The long imprisonment of J. proves, if that were necessary, the unhistorical character of the notices of him in Bar $1^{3ff.}$ and in the History of Susanna, assuming that Hippolytus and others are right in identifying him with Joakim, Susanna's husband.

Needless difficulty has been raised over the question of J.'s children (implied 1 Ch 3^{17}, Bar 1^4, Mt 1^{12}). Whatever be the truth as to the parentage of Shealtiel, the very prophecy which is alleged to prove his childlessness (Jer 22^{28-30}) mentions his seed twice. Like Ezk 21^{26}, it is a declaration of the abrogation of the temporal power of David's line. It explains in what sense he was to be 'childless' (LXX ἐκκήρυκτον, 'proscribed'), 'for no man of his seed shall prosper,' words surely unmeaning if he had no seed at all. According to the Mishna (Middôth 2), one of the 13 gates of the court of the priests, on the north side, was called the gate of Jeconiah, because he went out by it when going into captivity.

JEHOIADA (יְהוֹיָדָע 'J" knoweth').—1. Father of the famous Benaiah, captain of David's bodyguard, who is scarcely ever mentioned without the addition of his father's name. J. was a native of Kabzeel ($2\,S\,23^{20}$, $1\,Ch\,11^{22}$), 'a town of Judah in the South' (Jos 15^{21}). In $1\,Ch\,27^{5}$ AV we read: 'Benaiah the son of J., a chief priest.' Stanley (Jewish Ch. Lect. 36) deduces from this that in David's time there were three rival high priests, namely, Zadok, Abiathar, and J. However, in RV ('the priest, chief') 'chief' refers to Benaiah (so Targ.) as in v.^{3}, and 'the priest' may be referred directly to Benaiah (so LXX, Vulg., Jos. Ant. VII. xii. 4, B. ὁ ἱερεὺς τῷ γένει) or to J. (so Targ.). The latter is supported by $1\,Ch\,12^{27}$, where, among those who came to David to Hebron, is 'J. the leader of the house of Aaron' (tribe of Levi, Jos. Ant. VII. ii. 2). It is not a serious objection that Kabzeel is not reckoned among the priestly cities in Jos 21. RVm of $1\,Ch\,27^{5}$ 'chief minister' is certainly wrong, being based on the Chronicler's alterations of the text in $2\,S\,8^{18}\,20^{26}$, where the term כֹּהֵן is applied to persons who, in his estimation, were not qualified to exercise priestly functions. In $1\,Ch\,27^{34}$ among David's counsellors is reckoned 'J. son of Benaiah,' but we should probably read with Bertheau and Graf, 'Benaiah son of J.' 2. High priest (the first who is so styled $2\,K\,12^{10}$) in the reigns of Ahaziah, Athaliah, and Jehoash. His marriage with the princess Jehosheba—the only recorded instance of such a union—possibly conferred on J. a status which enabled him the better to carry out his designs. The careful way in which the deposition of Athaliah was planned, and the promptitude and thoroughness with which it was carried out, coupled with the historical importance of the revolution thus effected, mark J. as perhaps the most eminent of Aaron's successors, not excepting Eli. Like Eli he was virtually king, for his influence, which was necessarily paramount during the minority of Jehoash, was naturally exercised ($2\,K\,12^{2}$, $2\,Ch\,24^{2}$) until his death, which must have been quite late in the reign ($2\,K\,12^{6}$). In the time of the Captivity (Jer 29^{26}) he is alluded to as the model of a zealous ecclesiastical ruler. One circumstance there is which may seem to modify this conception of him. He was not as eager about the restoration of the temple fabric as was the king; in fact he received a rebuke for his slackness ($2\,K\,12^{7}$, $2\,Ch\,24^{6}$). Josephus (Ant. IX. viii. 2) attributes the high priest's supineness to his consciousness of the unpopularity of the proposed tax, but more probably it was due to the impossibility of reforming a close corporation, such as that of the temple priests, even by such a chief as J.; especially when the numerous local sanctuaries, still thought legal, diminished their revenues. Acc. to $2\,Ch\,24^{15.\ 16}$ J. lived to the age of 130, and received the unique distinction of burial in the royal sepulchres, 'because he had done good in Israel, both toward God and toward his house.' See Athaliah, Jehoash.

JEHOIAKIM (יְהוֹיָקִים, יְהוֹיָקִם, יוֹיָקִים 'J" raiseth up'; Joakim, $1\,Es\,1^{37.\ 38.\ 39}$. See QPB, Bar 1^{3}). — King of Judah, second son of Josiah ($1\,Ch\,3^{15}$). The circumstances under which this prince succeeded to the throne were the first and most significant indication of the long period of ignominious subjection ushered in by the defeat of Josiah by Necho at Megiddo, B.C. 609 or 610. Necho emphasized the new condition of things by deposing the popular Jehoahaz in favour of his elder brother, at the same time imposing on the latter a new name, Jehoiakim, in place of Eliakim. The substitution of the sacred title Jah for the ambiguous El was probably suggested by the young prince himself; yet the change of name was, none the less, a token of vassalage (cf. $2\,K\,24^{17}$). The direct history of this reign is briefly summed up in $2\,K\,23^{34}$–25^{7}, $2\,Ch\,36^{4-8}$; but considerable light is thrown upon it by the writings of the contemporary prophets Jeremiah and Habakkuk (see Jer 7–9. 10^{17-25} 14–17^{18} 18–20. 22^{13-19} 25. 26. 35. 36. 45–46^{12} 47. 49).

At no previous epoch was Judah in a more helpless condition of religious and moral decay. The one visible result of Josiah's reformation was that the temple and the Law were regarded as a palladium, and that the Levitical worship was accurately observed (Jer $7^{4.\ 21}$ 8^{8} 18^{18}). But with the death of the good king all the old abominable idolatries returned in full force, and under the highest patronage, both of the king and the princes, who from this time forward take a large share of the government. Baal and Ashtoreth were worshipped in the very precincts of the temple; the valley of Hinnom was again hideous with the infant sacrifices to Molech; and from the city-roofs incense went up to all the host of heaven. Cruelty, corruption, and oppression flourished unchecked, for the people had 'in their viciousness grown hard.' They felt and averred 'there is no hope.' Of such a nation Jehoiakim was the representative man. In the terrible denunciation (Jer 22^{13-19}) he is charged with covetousness, the shedding of innocent blood, oppression, and violence. All that is recorded of him bears this out. He erected by forced labour (cf. Hab 2^{9-11}) a spacious palace 'cieled with cedar and painted with vermilion,' thus (Jer 22^{15}) vying with Ahaz (B$\aleph$, cf. $2\,K\,16^{11}$) or Ahab (A, cf. $1\,K\,22^{39}$). He relentlessly pursued and murdered, with marks of indignity, the prophet Uriah who had denounced him (Jer 26^{20}). A similar fate was well-nigh shared by Jeremiah and Baruch (Jer 36^{26}). He cut and burnt with his own hands a roll of divine words, similar to that the recitation of which caused Josiah to rend his garments (Jer 36^{22}); and, as an instance of his covetousness, $2\,K\,23^{35}$ specially notes that he satisfied the demands of his suzerain (LXX, v.^{33}, 100 talents of gold, Syriac and Arabic 10 [so also certain Greek cursives and the Complutensian]) by a general taxation of his subjects, not, as had been customary, from the treasuries of the palace or the temple. Jos. (Ant. X. v. 2) well sums up his character as 'unjust and malignant; neither holy towards God nor forbearing towards man.' Ezk 19^{5-9}, in which the career of Jehoiakim and the fate of his son seem combined in an ideal picture, has no reference to his moral qualities, unless we adopt the RVm of v.^{7}, which implies a charge of lasciviousness, irrelevant here, though probably true in fact.

Two matters in connexion with this reign require special mention—(a) the invasion of Nebuchadnezzar, and (b) the end of Jehoiakim.

(a) The pretensions of Egypt to the empire of Syria were finally crushed by Nebuchadnezzar at the battle of Carchemish, B.C. 605 ($2\,K\,24^{7}$). This battle took place in the fourth year of Jehoiakim (Jer 25^{1} 46^{2}), and opened up Syria to the Chaldæans. However, they had not yet attacked Judæa in Jehoiakim's fifth year (Jer $36^{9.\ 29}$

'eighth' BN, 'fifth' AQ). The fast then proclaimed by the whole nation in the 9th month was possibly in view of their approach, which yet was not so certain that one could safely predict it. Carchemish is on the Euphrates, and there were many important places, e.g. Tyre, to be reduced before the Chaldæans could reach Jerusalem. This being so, it is evident that there was no siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar in Jehoiakim's third year as stated in Dn 1^1. (Seder Olam 25 understands this of the third year of his rebellion.) The date assigned in Daniel is due to a mistaken impression (Dn 9^2) that Jeremiah had predicted a 70 years' duration for the captivity of Judah (2 Ch $36^{21.\ 22}$=Ezr 1^1 follows Daniel); but the 70 years of Jer 25^{11} 29^{10} RV refer to the duration of Babylonian supremacy, beginning from the victory at Carchemish. Moreover, Ezekiel (1^2 40^1) reckons the captivity of Judah to begin with that of Jehoiachin, B.C. 597. When Nebuchadnezzar at last appeared before Jerusalem, it is likely enough that he carried off some captives (Berosus in Jos. Ant. X. xi. 1; Dn 1^3) and some of the temple vessels (2 Ch 36^7, Dn 1^2). It is certain that J. submitted to him, but rebelled after three years, incited by the Egyptians (Josephus). Jer 47^1 possibly refers to this. Nebuchadnezzar, who had returned to Babylon, did not at first think it necessary to quell this revolt in person, but sent (2 K 24^2, cf. Jer 49^1, Ezk 25^{3-6}, Zeph 2^8) some of his own troops, assisted by bands of the surrounding nations, to harry Judæa, not arriving himself until after the accession of Jehoiachin (2 K 24^{11}). To this interval Jer 35 probably belongs. Now J. reigned eleven years, and at least a year must be allowed to elapse between his revolt and his death, so that the first Chaldæan invasion may be dated in his 6th or 7th year. Jos. (Ant. X. vi. 1) places it in the 8th year of J., thus making Judæa independent of Egypt and Babylon alike for four years; but this is at variance with his authority Berosus, and leaves no time for the events of 2 K 24^2.

(b) The death of Jehoiakim is veiled in obscurity. According to the prophecy (Jer $22^{18.\ 19}$ 36^{30}), his dead body lay unburied outside the walls of Jerusalem; and this is confirmed by 2 K 24^6, which is silent as to his burial. Jos. (Ant. X. vi. 3) says that Nebuchadnezzar, when admitted without resistance into Jerusalem by J., slew him, and 'commanded him to be thrown before the walls without any burial,' and took 3000 captives, including Ezekiel (cf. Jer 52^{28}); but Nebuchadnezzar did not arrive until after J.'s death. We may conjecture that J. was killed in a sally (Keil), or more probably assassinated by his indignant subjects. The LXX of 2 Ch 36^8, which is here very strange, says that he was buried in the garden of Uzza (cf. 2 K $21^{18.\ 26}$). The idea that he was brought captive to Babylon rests on 2 Ch 36^6, which is either a false inference from Dn 1^2, or refers to an unfulfilled intention of Nebuchadnezzar's on his first invasion, or to Ezk $19^{8.\ 9}$, which, as we have seen, refers to Jehoiachin, although the preceding details refer to his father. Jerome (Qu. Heb. 2 Ch 36^8) explains 'that which was found in him' (1 Es 1^{42} 'his uncleanness and impiety') to refer to heathenish marks (forbidden Lv 19^{28}) discovered on his dead body. See CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH, vol. i. p. 538b. The legend mentioned by Thenius on 2 K 24^1 (Stanley, Jewish Ch. 40), that the name of the demon Chodonazer was found on his skin, is merely due to a MS confusion of this note with that on 2 Ch 36^{10}, where Jerome explains the name Nabu-chodonosor. JEHOIARIB (יְהוֹיָרִיב 1 Ch 9^{10} 24^7, elsewhere Joiarib, יוֹיָרִיב 'J" pleadeth'; called in 1 Mac 2^1 Joarib [which see]).—The name of one of the twenty-four courses of priests; first in David's time (1 Ch 24^7), but seventeenth in the time of Zerubbabel (Neh 12^6) and of the high priest Joiakim (Neh 12^{19}). The name is omitted, probably by accident, in the list of the priests that 'sealed to the covenant' (Neh 10). The clan is mentioned among those that dwelt in Jerusalem in the time of Nehemiah (11^{10}), where read 'Jedaiah and Joiarib' as in the corresponding list 1 Ch 9^{10} (so Cappellus and H. E. Ryle). The Maccabees belonged to this clan (1 Mac 2^1; Jos. Ant. XII. vi. 1), and also Josephus (Life 1). The Babylonian Talmud substitutes 'Joiarib' for 'Harim' in Ezr 2^{39}=Neh 7^{42}.

JEHONADAB (יְהוֹנָדָב or Jonadab יוֹנָדָב 'he whom J" has impelled'; cf. Nedabiah and Nadab).—1. Son of Shimeah, David's brother, and the friend of Amnon the son of David. He is described as 'a very subtil man' (אִישׁ חָכָם מְאֹד), and he employed his ingenuity in aiding Amnon to carry out his intrigue against his half-sister Tamar (2 S $13^{3ff.}$). When, at the assassination of Amnon, an exaggerated report reached the ear of David to the effect that Absalom had slain all the king's sons, Jonadab was the first to grasp the true state of affairs, and to allay the king's distress by his prompt report of the safety of the royal princes (2 S $13^{30ff.}$). Both AV and RV give his name uniformly as Jonadab, although in v.5 the MT has יְהוֹנָדָב Jehonadab. 2. Son of Rechab, of the clan of the Kenites (1 Ch 2^{55}), and formulator of the rules which bound his descendants, the Rechabites, to retain a nomadic life, living in tents and abstaining from the pursuit of agriculture, and especially from the cultivation of the vine and the use of its produce (Jer 35; see RECHABITES). Jehonadab flourished at the time when Jehu, having seized the throne of the Northern Kingdom, was undertaking the extirpation from Israel of the foreign worship of Ba'al-melkart. He appears to have been thoroughly in sympathy with the measures adopted by Jehu for the vindication of the religion of J", and he exhibited his sympathy by giving his hand to the new king, and accompanying him in his chariot to witness the final destruction of the family of Ahab at Samaria, and the ruse by which the worshippers of Ba'al were entrapped and put to death (2 K $10^{15.\ 23}$). Both AV and RV have Jonadab in all the passages of Jer, although that is the reading of MT (יוֹנָדָב) only in $35^{6.\ 10.\ 19}$.

C. F. BURNEY.

JEHONATHAN (יְהוֹנָתָן 'J" has given').—A more exact rendering of the name usually represented in English as Jonathan. In RV this form occurs twice. 1. 2 Ch 17^8. One of the Levites sent out by Jehoshaphat with the book of the law to teach the people in the cities of Judah. 2. Neh 12^{18}. The head of the priestly family of Shemaiah in the days of Joiakim the son of Jeshua. Here the longer form serves to distinguish this name from the shorter Jonathan=יוֹנָתָן in vv.$^{11.\ 14}$. In AV Jehonathan is found also in 1 Ch 27^{25} of the son of Uzziah, who was over certain treasuries or storehouses in the time of David (RV Jonathan). H. A. WHITE.

JEHORAM or JORAM (יְהוֹרָם, יוֹרָם 'J" is exalted'). RV retains Joram for Jehoram, 2 K 9^{15-24}.

1. King of Israel. He was second son of Ahab, and succeeded his brother Ahaziah, 2 K 3^1 (on the interpolated date in 2 K 1^{17} see AHAZIAH, No. 1). The compiler of Kings evidently intended to refer to him all the notices of the king of Israel which occur in the Acts of Elisha; but as Elisha survived J. 43 years, it is possible that in some cases at least other kings were originally intended (so

Ewald, HI iv. 87). Terrified probably by his brother's fate, he began his reign by putting away the pillar of Baal that Ahab had made; but it is evident from 2 K 9^{22} 10^{18-27} that the foreign cult was still continued in the country, through the influence of Jezebel, and with the connivance of J. himself, whose secret disloyalty is severely exposed by Elisha (2 K $3^{13.\ 14}$). Consistently with this, a tone of profane sarcasm, and of scarcely veiled antagonism, may be detected in his use of the sacred name J″ (2 K $3^{10.\ 13}$ $6^{27.\ 33}$, where read with Ewald 'king' מלך for 'messenger' (מלאך), a tone re-echoed by his courtiers (7^{2}). Immediately on his accession J. took steps to suppress the revolt of Mesha, which was now a matter of two years' standing. He obtained the aid of his father's ally, the compliant Jehoshaphat, who may have desired to chastise Moab for their invasion of Judah (2 Ch 20). J. was entertained at Jerusalem (Jos. Ant. IX. iii. 1). The route chosen at the suggestion of the king of Judah, though not the most direct from Samaria, had the triple advantage of securing the co-operation and loyalty of Edom, avoiding the hostile Syrian and Ammonite territory, and attacking Moab from an unexpected quarter. The expedition was barren of result. Before Moab was reached, the army would have perished from thirst but for the miracle wrought through Elisha in deference to Jehoshaphat. The Moabites were routed, but were not subdued. The desperate man who 'gave his firstborn for his transgression' on the wall of Kirhareseth succeeded thereby in disheartening the besiegers, who, it is obscurely hinted, felt that the wrath of God was roused against themselves, the indirect authors of so unnatural a deed, and the allies retired, having failed to realize any lasting advantage. Assuming that 2 K 4–8^{15} belong to this reign, the following matters of public importance may be gleaned from them. Elisha claims to have interest with the king and the captain of the host (4^{13}). He gives information to the king of the secret plans of the Syrians (6^{9-12}). A Syrian army penetrates to Dothan, and is led by Elisha to Samaria. He dissuades the king from an ungenerous impulse to kill them, and so procures a temporary cessation of the Syrian incursions (6^{13-23}). Benhadad in person besieges Samaria; the inhabitants are reduced to the horrible straits foretold Lv 26^{29}, Dt 28^{53}, and a second time the power of J″ is vindicated by Elisha and the siege raised (6^{24-7}). This invasion may have occurred during the seven years' famine foretold by Elisha 8^{1} (alluded to 4^{38}). The visit of Naaman (5^{5-8}) should probably be placed after this (compare 5^{27} 8^{4}). Notwithstanding these constant attacks from Syria, J. seems to have been a vigorous monarch (δραστήριος, Jos. Ant. IX. ii. 2). On the death of Benhadad he deemed the opportunity a favourable one to renew the attempt to recover Ramoth-gilead at which Ahab had fallen. Ahaziah of Judah helped him ($8^{28.\ 29}$), and the town was taken (9^{14}), but in the attack J. received arrow wounds (Jos.) which necessitated his return to Jezreel, the army remaining to hold the town (9^{1-14}). No long time elapsed when Jehu was seen approaching Jezreel. The mysterious non-return of his messengers excited the curiosity of the sick man. With all his mother's vigour he roused himself, and sallied forth eager to hear what strange news the captain of the host might be bringing. The brutal reply of Jehu to his inquiry left no doubt as to his intentions, and the king had barely time to warn his royal kinsman of his danger when he fell, pierced by the arrow of Jehu, on the fatal field of Naboth. The curse of Elijah (1 K 21^{19}) was beginning to find fulfilment.

2. King of Judah, son of Jehoshaphat. The history of his reign is contained in 2 K 8^{16-24}, 2 Ch 21. It opens with a chronological difficulty. He is said in 2 K 8^{16} to have begun to reign in the fifth year of Jehoram of Israel. A comparison of 1 K 22^{42} and 2 K 3^{1} implies that this would be two years before the death of Jehoshaphat. This accounts for the insertion 'Jehoshaphat being then king of Judah,' the spuriousness of which is strongly vouched (see QPB). The interpolation in 2 K 1^{17} is discussed under AHAZIAH i. Those who maintain the genuineness of these notes of time are obliged to suppose that he was twice made viceroy by Jehoshaphat, i.e. in the 17th and 23rd years of that king's reign. The marriage of J. with the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel had probably seemed to Jehoshaphat a masterly stroke of conciliatory policy. In the event, however, it had the most disastrous effect on Judah. The strong character of Athaliah easily influenced for evil both her husband and son (2 K $8^{18.\ 27}$), and, as before in the case of Abijam (1 K 15^{4}), nothing but the divine promise to David saved the favoured tribe from the ruin naturally consequent on corruption and idolatry. The most important event in this reign, and the only one recorded in Kings, is the fulfilment of Gn 27^{40} in the final revolt of Edom, which had been, more or less, a dependency of Judah since David's time (2 S 8^{14}). The narrative (8^{21}) of Jehoram's attempt to recover Edom is obscure and probably corrupt. For 'to Zair' צעיר, which is otherwise unknown, Vulg. has 'to Seir,' Seira = שעיר (B Σειώρ, A om.). Grätz conjectured 'Zoar' צער, but Zoar is in Moab. 2 Ch 21^{9} substitutes 'with his captains' עם־שריו. The rest of the verse seems to imply that J. was surrounded by the Edomites by night, and cut his way through, but with loss and discomfiture (see QPB). At the same time, in a different quarter, the South-West, Libnah revolted, possibly in connexion with the Philistine invasion (2 Ch $21^{16.\ 17}$). The Chronicler, mindful of the fact that Libnah was a priestly city (Jos 21^{13}), assigns as the cause 'because he had forsaken the Lord, the God of his fathers.' The town was not permanently lost (see 2 K 19^{8}). We learn from 2 Ch 21^{2-4} that on his accession J. put to death amongst others his six brethren, to whom their father had given great gifts and fenced cities (cf. 2 Ch 11^{23}). The defection to idolatry, which is implied in Kings, is detailed in 2 Ch 21^{11}, where he appears as a religious persecutor. This is followed by a denunciatory letter from Elijah vv.$^{12-15}$, a joint invasion by the Philistines and Arabians, who, if they did not actually capture Jerusalem (so Keil), sacked the palace, and carried off all his sons but one, vv.$^{16.\ 17}$. The narrative concludes with his miserable and unregretted death, dishonourable burial, and exclusion from the royal sepulchres (contrast 2 K 8^{24}). A serious chronological difficulty is involved in the mention of Elijah's letter to Jehoram. But for this statement, one would naturally infer that Elijah's translation had taken place in the reign of Jehoshaphat. (a) It is narrated immediately after the death of Ahaziah, and so Seder Olam, xvii. 45, places it in the second year of Ahaziah of Israel. (b) Elisha began to exercise prophetical functions under Jehoshaphat, 2 K 3. He does not seem to have done so before his master's departure, 2 K $2^{9.\ 15}$. (c) 2 K 3^{11} obviously means that Elijah was no longer on earth. In reply it may be urged that there is no note of time in 2 K 2, and that it is placed in its present position merely to complete the history of Elijah. This seems more plausible than the suggestion of Kimchi, adopted by Keil, that the Lord had revealed to Elijah, before his translation, J.'s wickedness, and that then Elijah wrote this letter, which was to be sent to the king at the proper time; just as Elijah himself anointed Hazael and Jehu by Elisha's instrumentality (see AVm). Kennicott cuts the knot by conjecturing 'Elisha' for 'Elijah' in 2 Ch 21[12].

3. A priest, one of the commission appointed by Jehoshaphat to teach the Law, 2 Ch 17[8].

JEHOSHABEATH.—See Jehosheba.

JEHOSHAPHAT (יְהוֹשָׁפָט 'J" hath judged'). 1. King of Judah, son of Asa. This reign marks a new departure in the mutual relations of Judah and Israel. Hitherto there had been a standing feud between the two kingdoms (1 K 14[30] 15[7. 16]), but 'J. made peace with the king of Israel' (1 K 22[44]). The immediate object of this policy was doubtless to enable the whole Hebrew race, hitherto weakened by internecine wars, to co-operate against their common enemies. Possibly, also, J. cherished a hope that the marriage of his heir Jehoram with Athaliah the daughter of Ahab, by which the political alliance was now cemented, might, in the future, lead to a peaceful re-establishment of the kingdom of David and Solomon. The actual result, however, of this alliance with the house of Omri brought to J. little credit in his relations with foreign powers; while at home, in the following reigns, it led to a recrudescence of Baal worship, and indirectly to the almost total extinction of the royal family of Judah (2 K 11[1], cf. 2 Ch 21[4. 17]). There is little told directly of J. in Kings (1 K 22[41-50]). He completed the extirpation of the Canaanitish abominations begun by Asa, 1 K 15[12]. Edom was so completely subject to him that although it had a king (2 K 3 passim), yet he was merely a nominee ('deputy' נִצָּב) of the king of Judah. Hence, when Edom revolted in the next reign (2 K 8[20]), it is significantly said they 'made a king over themselves.' Edom being thus a vassal state, J. had access to the seaport of Ezion-geber, and attempted to revive Solomon's trade with Ophir (cf. 1 K 9[26]); but the fleet was wrecked when starting on the first voyage, and J. was so disheartened that he declined to enter into partnership with Ahaziah of Israel in order to renew the attempt. In 2 Ch 20[35ff.] the good king's misfortune is represented as a punishment for his having made a commercial alliance with Ahaziah; and the destination of the ships is not Ophir, but Tarshish. Both here and in 2 Ch 9[21] the Chronicler misunderstands the term 'ships of Tarshish.' Whatever else we know from Kings about J. is found in the history of Israel. To the strong-willed monarchs of Omri's line J. serves as a foil. They profited by the alliance with Judah. When Ahab desires to recover Ramoth-gilead, or Jehoram Moab, J. is ready with his set formula of acquiescence (1 K 22[4], 2 K 3[7]). He is extremely scrupulous to inquire of a prophet of J", and is not satisfied with an oracle which purports to come from Adonai (1 K 22[5-7], 2 K 3[11]); yet he seems quite unaffected when his ally is denounced, whether by Micaiah or Elisha. He is even persuaded to risk his own life to save that of Ahab (1 K 22[30]). From the Chronicler (2 Ch 17–20) we learn much more respecting J.'s internal administration of Judah. J. begins his reign with defensive measures against Israel (17[1. 2]). His early piety is rewarded, like that of David (1 Ch 29[28]) and Solomon (2 Ch 1[12]), with 'riches and honour in abundance' (17[5] 18[1]). He then sends a commission, consisting of princes, Levites, and priests, to teach 'the book of the law of the Lord' in the cities of Judah. Godliness at home is followed by peace abroad. The Philistines and Arabians, so troublesome to Jehoram (21[16]), bring tribute. J. raises a standing army, twice as large as that of Asa (2 Ch 14[8]), of over 1,160,000 men (17[14-18]). Ewald thinks that this incredible number refers to the entire male population, but see 17[19]. The Chronicler then (ch. 18), contrary to the plan of his work, gives a long extract from the history of Israel—Ahab's expedition to Ramoth-gilead—because of the share J. took in it. There are few variations of any interest except the needless addition in v.[31] 'and the Lord helped,' etc. It was surely by J.'s accent, when he 'cried out,' that the Syrian captains 'saw that he was not the king of Israel.' On his return, J. is rebuked for 'helping the wicked' by the prophet Jehu (cf. 2 Ch 15[2] 16[7]). He then provides for the better administration of justice by appointing local judges in every fenced city (19[5]), and two courts of appeal, ecclesiastical and civil, in Jerusalem, v.[8], consisting of Levites, priests, and leading nobles, presided over respectively by the high priest and 'the ruler of the house of Judah' (cf. Dt 1[17] 16[18] 17[8]). The Chronicler does not relate J.'s campaign with Jehoram of Israel against Moab (2 K 3, see Jehoram 1), but he gives in ch. 20 an account of a more complete deliverance from Moab, Edom, and Ammon. In this story there are two difficulties. (a) The inhabitants of Mt. Seir, vv.[10. 22] (in v.[1] read with Targ. 'Edomites' for 'Ammonites,' see RVm), are here joined with Moab against Judah, whereas in 2 K 3 they not only join their suzerain J. in his attack on Moab, but are the bitterest enemies of that people (2 K 3[26]). (b) The abject terror of J. at this crisis (see esp. vv.[3. 12]) is quite unaccountable, if he really possessed a tithe of the army described in 17[14ff.]. On the other hand, Ewald (HI iv. 56 n. 2) fairly argues that 'the valley of Jehoshaphat' (Jl 3[2. 12]), which he identifies with the Wady Bereikut (=Beracah), implies some great victory of that king. He dates this event at the beginning of J.'s reign, and thereby accounts for the complete subjugation of Edom, implied in Kings. The prayer of J. on this occasion has a remarkable reference to Solomon's prayer 1 K 8[33. 37], and to Dt 2[4. 9. 19], just as the speech of Jahaziel has to Ex 14[13. 14]. 2. The recorder or chronicler in the reigns of David (2 S 8[16] 20[24], 1 Ch 18[15]) and Solomon (1 K 4[3]). 3. One of Solomon's twelve commissariat officers, 1 K 4[17]. 4. Father of Jehu king of Israel, 2 K 9[2. 14].

JEHOSHAPHAT, VALLEY OF (עֵמֶק יְהוֹשָׁפָט, κοιλὰς Ἰωσαφάτ, Vallis Josaphat).—This valley ('ĕmeḳ)* is mentioned under the name of 'Jehoshaphat' only by the prophet Joel (3 [Heb. 4][2. 12]). The circumstances related by the prophet concerning the 'day of the Lord' are matters of theological controversy which it would be outside the scope of this article to enter into, but the imagery rests upon a geographical basis whatever may be the symbolical import.

Some commentators have supposed that the name is only an imaginary one due to its significance, 'J" judgeth' (Orelli in Strack u. Zöckler, Kgf. Komm. on Joel, l.c.; Michaelis, Bibel für Ungelehrten, Remarks on Joel). The name may have been used with reference to the remarkable victory of king Jehoshaphat over the united forces of the heathen of several nations (2 Ch 20[16ff.]), children of Ammon, Moab, and Mount Seir, which resulted to him in a bloodless victory over his enemies, and his triumphant return from the valley of Blessing.

There is no record in the Bible or Josephus as to the valley separating the temple mount from Olivet being called the valley of Jehoshaphat; but early in the 4th cent. it is called so, and the name has continued among Christians, Jews, and subsequently Moslems, up to the present day. The unknown Pilgrim of Bordeaux (A.D. 333) says, 'For one going to the gate which is on the east, that he may ascend the Mount of Olives, there is the valley which is called Jehoshaphat' (Itin. Hieros.). Eusebius and Jerome (A.D. 330–400) give the same account (OS[2] 272. 89; 145. 13). Eucherius (427–440) says, 'Near the wall of Jerusalem, or of the temple, on the east, is Geennon or the valley of Jehoshaphat' (Ant. Mart. xvii.; see also Reland, Pal. p. 356). Theodorus (c. 530), speaking of Jerusalem, says, 'There is the valley of Josaphat. There the Lord will judge the just and the sinful.' Arculf (c. 680) speaks of the brook Cedron in the valley of Jehoshaphat (Early Travels, p. 4). Willibald (721), Bernard (867), Saewulf (1102), Maundeville (1322), and Maundrell (1697) all mention the valley of Jehoshaphat as lying between Jerusalem and Olivet (Early Travels, p. 469). Theodoricus (1172) states that 'torrens Cedron et vallis Josaphat' lies between Moriah and Olivet. John of Würzburg (c. 1213) says, 'Prope juxta Jerusalem, sub Salamonis regia in accubitu in valle Josaphat natatoria Siloam.' The author of Citez de Jherusalem (1187) states that the valley of Josaphat is to the east, between Olivet and Mount Zion. See further, art. KIDRON (THE BROOK).

* On the possibility that this term could be applied to the valley of the Kidron (elsewhere always called naḥal, 'torrent-valley,' 'wady'), see Driver's note on Jl 3[2].

According to modern Jewish tradition, the valley between the temple mount and Olivet is the valley of Jehoshaphat, and the dearest wish of the Jew is to find a grave there (Briggs, Heathen and Holy Lands, p. 290). Benjamin of Tudela (A.D. 1170) calls this valley Jehosaphat. Some of the Rabbins have taught that it is necessary to be buried in the Holy Land to obtain a share in the resurrection preceding the Messiah's reign on earth, and that the bodies of the righteous, wherever else buried, have to roll back again under ground to Palestine (J. Nicholaus, de Sepult. Heb.).

The 'Aven Shetyeh appears to have been a portion of rock projecting three fingers' breadth above the floor of the Holy of Holies, covering a cavity which was regarded as the mouth of the 'abyss,' reverenced as the centre and foundation of the world, and having the ineffable name of God inscribed upon it. Rabbi Schwartz (Das Heilige Land) identifies this stone with the Sakhrah. It is impossible not to suspect that these Jewish traditions are the origin of the sacredness which the Mohammedans have attached to the Sakhrah (PEFSt, 1875–76).

In the tract Middôth, Rabbi Elieser ben-Jacob said concerning the Water-gate, 'Through it the water proceeded out, and in future it will issue from under the threshold.' The Talmud teaches that there was a canal which brought water to the sanctuary from the fountain of Etam (Jerus. Yoma, iii. fol. 41 at Maim Baith Hammukdash, v. 15). Rashi thinks Etam may have been the same as Nephtoah (Jos 15[9]). The Moslems have a description of 'the day of the Lord' which was probably given by Mohammed as one of the first of his revelations, from which the following verses are extracted (Koran, 81):—

'In the name of the all-merciful God a day shall come when the sun shall be shrouded and the stars shall fall from the heavens.

'When the water of the ocean shall boil, and the souls of the dead again be united to their bodies.

'When the heavens will pass away like a scroll, and hell will burn fiercely, and the joys of paradise will be made manifest.

'On that day shall every soul make known that which it hath performed.'

The day of resurrection will be preceded by signs and portents in heaven and earth, wars and tumults, a universal decay of faith, the advent of Antichrist, the issuing forth of Gog and Magog to desolate the world. Every human being will then be put upon his trial as to the manner in which he has employed his faculties, and the good and evil actions of his life. The whole assembled multitude will have to follow Mohammed across the bridge al-Sirât, as fine as the edge of a scimitar, which crosses the gulf of Jehennam or hell. Jehennam is a region fraught with all kinds of horrors (W. Irving, Life of Mahomet). The bridge al-Sirât that will be extended on the day of judgment between heaven and hell is to start from Jerusalem, and the pilgrim is shown a column, built horizontally into the wall [of the Haram esh-Sherîf], which is to form its first pier. The holy rock [of the H. esh-Sherif] is one of the rocks of paradise; it stands on a palm tree, beneath which flows one of the rivers of paradise. The Sakhrah is the centre of the world, and on the day of resurrection the angel Israfîl will stand upon it to blow the last trump; beneath it is the source of every drop of sweet water that flows on the face of the earth (Besant and Palmer, Jerusalem). The column called et-Tarik (de Saulcy) or al-Sirât (Ali Bey, Merj ed-Dîn, BFS part ii.) juts out from the east wall of the Haram esh-Sherîf, overhanging the valley of the Kîdron (Gehennam, Jehoshaphat), and on it may be seen devout Moslems in the early morning practising the first step into paradise.

The Moslem names for the valley between the Haram esh-Sherîf and Mount Olivet are Wâdy Jahannum, W. Sitti Maryam (from 'the tomb of the Virgin'), W. Jûshafat or Shafat (Seetzen), W. Jehôshâfât (Robinson), W. el-Jos.

In addition to this valley parting Jerusalem from Olivet being called Jehoshaphat, the name also occurs in or adjacent to the valley. In the time of Arculf (c. 680) the tower of Jehoshaphat was shown in the valley near the church of St. Mary. In the time of Maundrell (c. 1697) the present so-called tomb of Jehoshaphat went by the same name (Early Travels, p. 468). In Citez de Jherusalem (c. 1187) there is the street of Josafas, leading through the Josafas gate (present St. Stephen's gate) into the valley of Jehoshaphat. John of Würzburg (c. 1213) also speaks of the gates of Josafat leading into the valley of Jehoshaphat, and of the monument of king Josaphat 'from which the valley was named.'

JEHOSHEBA (יְהוֹשֶׁבַע 2 K 11[2], Jehoshabeath, יְהוֹשַׁבְעַת 2 Ch 22[11] 'J" is an oath.' Stanley, Jewish Ch., Lect. 35, compares the variants Elisheba and Ἐλισαβέτ). — She was daughter of Jehoram of Judah, but not of Athaliah, according to Jos. (Ant. IX. vii. 1; Jerome, Qu. Heb. on 2 Ch 21[17]). On the death of her half-brother Ahaziah, she was instrumental in preserving the Davidic stock by concealing the infant Jehoash in a lumber-room of the palace (RVm). She seems to have had apartments in 'the house of the Lord,' i.e. in the temple precincts; and, according to the Chronicler, was wife of Jehoiada. This is the only recorded instance of the intermarriage of a high priest with a princess of the royal house, but probably it was no very extraordinary distinction (cf. 1 K 4[11.15]). See ATHALIAH, JEHOASH, JEHOIADA.

N. J. D. WHITE.

JEHOSHUA, JEHOSHUAH.—The AV has followed the Geneva Bible in spelling Joshua's name once (Nu 13[16]) Jehoshua. In 1 Ch 7[27] the translators of AV have again followed the Gen. Bible, but have added an h by inadvertence, giving the unique and wrong form Jehoshuah. RV has restored Joshua in both places.

JEHOVAH.—See GOD, p. 199ᵃ.

JEHOVAH-JIREH (יהוה יִרְאֶה).—In Gn 22[14] the name given to the place at which Abraham sacrificed the ram instead of his son. The name means 'J" seeth,' i.e. (cf. 16[12] 'Thou art a God of seeing'; also Ex 3[7], Ps 35[22] etc.) sees the needs of His servants, and relieves them accordingly; but there is, no doubt, an allusion at the same time to the sense which the same verb has in v.[8] 'God will see for himself (i.e. look out, provide; so 1 S 16[1. 17]) the lamb for a burnt-offering.' A difficulty, however, arises in connexion with the following explanatory clause, which is partly ambiguous, and partly does not correspond, as it would be expected to do, with the name to which it is attached: 'so that it is said to-day, בְּהַר יהוה יֵרָאֶה "in the mount of J" יֵרָאֶה."' The 'mount of J"' is a designation of the Temple-hill (Is 2[3] 30[29], Ps 24[3]), and the tense of 'is said' shows that the reference is to something that was said habitually (cf. Gn 10[9b]), so that there is little doubt that the clause preserves some proverb in connexion with the Temple. If the clause stood by itself, it would be most naturally rendered 'In the mount of J" one is seen (appears),' i.e. men, people, appear,—the reference being to the custom of visiting the Temple at pilgrimages ('appear,' as Ex 23[17], 1 S 1[22], Ps 84[7]); but this rendering could only be adopted upon the supposition that the connexion with the preceding clause was of a purely verbal nature. Other renderings are 'in the mount of J" it is seen' * (i.e. provided), or 'he [J"] is seen (appears),' or (Ew., Del., Keil, Dillm., Kautzsch-Socin) 'in the mount (where) J" appears' (the sentence in this case being incomplete, as 10[9b]).† It is objected to the first of these renderings that the Niph. of רָאָה does not occur in the sense of 'be provided'; but if 'see' can be used absolutely (41[33]) in the sense of 'look out,' it does not seem impossible that 'be seen' might be used similarly; still, it is true that, if the proverb had once an independent existence, this would not be a natural or obvious sense for the verb to have. In the two other renderings, the connexion of the proverb with the name 'Jehovah-jireh' depends upon the double sense of the word 'see': J" 'sees' the needs of those who come to worship before Him on Zion, and then 'is seen,' i.e. reveals Himself to them by answering their prayers, and supplying their wants: His 'seeing,' in other words, takes practical effect in a 'being seen.'‡ On the whole, unless the first suggestion made above be adopted, this may be said to be the best explanation of the passage.

With changes of the punctuation, other renderings become possible, though the general sense remains the same: as 'In the mountain (בָּהָר) J" appeareth'§ (cf. LXX, ἐν τῷ ὄρει Κύριος ὤφθη); 'In the mountain J" seeth or will see' (בָּהָר יְ יִרְאֶה: so Pesh. and Vulg., assimilating the verb to that in clause α). The two clauses might also be assimilated by vocalizing the second element of the name yērā'eh, 'is seen' (appeareth), in place of yir'eh, 'seeth' (so Strack). S. R. DRIVER.

* The tense (as in 'J" seeth') expressing what is habitual. The futures of AV, RV are (as often) misleading.

† This last rend., though of course possible formally (Ges.-K. § 155*l*; Dav. § 25), is not, perhaps, in view of the order יהוה יראה, very probable (בהר יראה יהוה is what would be expected): see, however, though only after עַד—which is often used without a rel., and may thus have more readily expressed the sense of 'the time (when)'—Ps 48, Mic 5[2].

‡ Cf. Delitzsch: 'Er sah drein, in dem er sich zu sehn gab d.i. thatsächlich eingriff.'

§ So Stade, Gesch. i. 450, who supposes the proverb to have been framed originally with reference to mountains in general, as the places where J" was anciently worshipped, and which were often marked by theophanies.

JEHOVAH-NISSI (יהוה נִסִּי 'J" is my banner').—The name given by Moses to the altar he erected after the defeat of Amalek, Ex 17[15] (E). The LXX (Κύριος καταφυγή μου) implies a derivation of the name from the root נוּס 'flee,' the Vulg. (Dominus exaltatio mea) from נָשָׂא 'lift up.' Onkelos paraphrases, 'he prayed before God who had done miracles (נִיסִין) before him'; Rashi, 'God has done us here a miracle' (נֵס). There can be little doubt, however, that נֵס here='banner,' God being considered the centre or rallying-point of the army of Israel, and the name of God as their battle-cry (cf. Ps 20[7f.]). The interpretation of v.[16] (כִּי־יָד עַל־כֵּס יָהּ) is somewhat doubtful. Many critics read נֵס for כֵּס (=כִּסֵּא 'throne'), but this appears neither to be necessary nor to yield a suitable sense. The meaning is probably either 'J" hath sworn' (EV), or 'I (Moses) swear' (with hand uplifted to J"s throne). See Dillmann and Kalisch, ad loc. J. A. SELBIE.

JEHOVAH-SHALOM (יהוה שָׁלוֹם; LXX εἰρήνη Κυρίου and Vulg. Domini pax imply Heb. reading יְהוָה שָׁלוֹם).—The name given by Gideon to the altar he erected in Ophrah, Jg 6[24]. The name means 'J" is peace' (i.e. well-disposed), in allusion to J"s words in v.[23] 'Peace be unto thee.' There appears to be no necessity to take the second noun as genitive '(altar of) J" of peace,' as in יהוה צְבָאוֹת. Rather is the name 'Jehovah-shalom' to be compared with such names as 'Jehovah-jireh,' 'Jehovah-nissi,' 'Jehovah-shammah,' in all of which J" is the subject. See Moore, Judges, ad loc. J. A. SELBIE.

JEHOVAH-SHAMMAH (יהוה שָׁמָּה 'J" is there'; Κύριος ἐκεῖ).—The name to be given to the restored and glorified Jerusalem, Ezk 48[35] (cf. Is 60[14-22] 62[2], Rev 21[2f.]). 'The prophet beheld the LORD forsake His temple (ch. 11), and he beheld Him again enter it (ch. 43); now He abides in it among His people for ever. The covenant ran that He should be their God and they His people; this is perfectly fulfilled in His presence among them. The end in view from the beginning has been reached' (Davidson). J. A. SELBIE.

JEHOVAH-TSIDKENU (יהוה צִדְקֵנוּ 'J" is our righteousness,' or 'J" our righteousness,' Jer 23[6] 33[16]).—In both passages (which are in fact the same prophecy repeated, the latter being not found in LXX, and perhaps the insertion of a reviser) it is the title of the Branch, the perfectly Righteous King, who is to rule over the people on their return from the Captivity. If Jer 33[14-26] is genuine, 33[17] implies that the prophet has in his mind not one single king, but a succession of kings, who would fulfil the theocratic idea. If the first tr. of the words given above is right, this will mean that under the rule of the Branch men will fully realize the righteousness of J"; if the second, the title of J" must be understood as applied to the king as God's vicegerent upon earth (cf. Is 9[6]). To suppose that either passage definitely predicts the God Incarnate is to credit the prophets with the kind of foresight which our knowledge of their writings otherwise does not justify (cf. Driver, Sermons on OT, 204 ff.). F. H. WOODS.

JEHOZABAD (יְהוֹזָבָד 'J" hath bestowed,' cf. זְבַדְיָה and זַבְדִּיאֵל).—1. One of the servants of king Joash who conspired against his master and joined in his assassination, 2 K 12[21]=2 Ch 24[26]. 2. A Benjamite chief, one of Jehoshaphat's 'men of war,' 2 Ch 17[18]. 3. The eponym of a Levitical family, 1 Ch 26[4] See GENEALOGY.

JEHOZADAK (יְהוֹצָדָק 'J" is righteous,' cf. Zedekiah צִדְקִיָּהוּ), the father of Joshua the high priest (1 Ch $6^{14.15}$ [Heb. $5^{40.41}$], also in RV of Hag $1^{1.12.14}$ $2^{2.4}$, Zec 6^{11}, where LXX has 'Ιωσεδέκ and AV Josedech). The name is shortened to Jozadak (יוֹצָדָק) in Ezr $3^{2.8}$ 5^{2} 10^{18}, Neh 12^{26}. It appears as Josedek (AV Josedec) in 1 Es $5^{5.48.56}$ 6^{2} 9^{19}, Sir 49^{12}. See GENEALOGY.

JEHU (for form and meaning of the name see next article). — 1. A prophet of the Northern Kingdom who predicted the downfall and destruction of the dynasty of Baasha (1 K $16^{1-7.12}$). The Chronicler introduces him as denouncing Jehoshaphat for his alliance with Ahab (2 Ch 19^{2}; cf. the way in which Jehu's father Hanani reproves Asa, 2 Ch 16^{7}). 'The words of Jehu the son of Hanani, which are taken up into the Book of the Kings of Israel' is cited by the Chronicler (2 Ch 20^{34}) as an authority for the reign of Jehoshaphat. See art. CHRONICLES, vol. i. p. 394ᵃ f. 2. The king of Israel who destroyed the dynasty of Omri. See next article. 3. A Judahite, the son of Obed (1 Ch 2^{38}). 4. A Simeonite prince (1 Ch 4^{35}). While A of the LXX and Luc. have 'Ιηού, B must have [mis?] read הוּא instead of יֵהוּא, for it has οὗτος. 5. One of David's heroes (1 Ch 12^{3}).

JEHU (Heb. יֵהוּא, Assyr. Ja-u-a, Syriac ܝܗܘ, Arab. Jâhû, LXX B Εἰού, A often 'Ιηού, Luc. 'Ιού. The derivation is very uncertain. Some would regard it as an abbreviation of יְהוֹהוּא 'Jahweh is he,' just as יְהוֹשׁוּעַ = יְשׁוּעַ. As a parallel, comp. [אֲלִיהוּ]אָ).—Jehu was son of Jehoshaphat, son of Nimshi, but he is not infrequently designated simply ben-Nimshi. From his own testimony (2 K $9^{25.26}$) we learn that he witnessed, in company with Bidkar, the judicial murder of Naboth. He evidently held, in conjunction with Bidkar, an important position in Ahab's bodyguard,* and the sentence of doom pronounced by Elijah on the house of Ahab must on that memorable occasion have been carefully treasured in his memory. This raises an interesting question. Was Jehu personally known to Elijah? This seems to be suggested by 1 K 19^{16}. But it is quite evident that the Elijah narrative in this chapter proceeds from a different hand from that which recorded the episodes in 2 K 8. 9, and the redactor has omitted from the Elijah section the fulfilment of the divine commands (1 K 19^{15-18}), though the injunctions themselves still remain. On this subject see Thenius' remarks at the end of his commentary on 1 K 19; Stade, Gesch. p. 540, footnote; and Kittel, Gesch. der Heb. ii. 184 [Eng. tr. ii. 214].

It is not, however, our purpose to enter into the complex features of the narrative dealing with the reign of Jehu (2 K 9. 10), since this department belongs to the literary features of 1 K and 2 K (see art. KINGS (BOOKS OF)). This subject has been ably investigated by Stade in ZATW, 1885, p. 275 ff. It is acknowledged by critics that the section 2 K 9^{1}–10^{27} descriptive of Jehu's revolution comes from the same hand as 1 K 20. 22, 2 K 3 (Cornill), to which may be added 6^{24}–7^{20} (Driver, *LOT*⁶ p. 195; Kittel, Gesch. ii. p. 186 [Eng. tr. ii. 216]). Kittel also agrees with Stade in attributing 10^{12-16} to a later source, a view which appears to the present writer well founded. Wellhausen further endeavours to disintegrate 10^{19-27} on the ground of inconsistencies (*Isr. u. Jüd. Gesch*². p. 77, footnote), but his arguments are not convincing.

Jehu ben-Nimshi rose to power on the crest of a wave of insurrectionary feeling fomented in the prophetic circles by the great personal influence of Elisha. Indeed it may even be true that he had already been designated as the earthly instrument of divine vengeance on the house of Omri by Elijah, and that Elisha had been commissioned by his illustrious predecessor to carry out the divine behest of 1 K 19^{16}. The vivid and dramatic narrative in chs. 9. 10 makes it clear that the causes which led to the popular discontent against the house of Omri were not so much connected with the introduction of the Phœnician Baal and Ashtoreth worship, but rather with the high-handed judicial murder of Naboth (see AHAB, JEZEBEL, and NABOTH). Towards Phœnicia Israel had for centuries felt a traditional friendship. It began with the days of David and Solomon. In language the two were closely akin. They exchanged their commodities, and the bond which linked them was called by the 8th cent. prophet Amos 'a covenant of brethren' (Am 1^{9}, but see Driver's note, ad loc.), a fact well illustrated by the beautiful episode of Elijah and the widow of the Phœnician town of Zarephath (1 K 17^{9-24}).

Jehu was the commanding officer in the army of Jehoram, which was conducting operations against the Syrian army under Hazael at the important fortress of Ramoth-gilead, a bone of contention since the days of Ahab, and now held by Israel. The severe wounds sustained by king Jehoram necessitated his retirement to Jezreel. This was the opportunity of which Elisha and the party of insurrection availed themselves. One of the 'sons of the prophets' was despatched by Elisha to Ramoth-gilead with a flask of oil and a commission to take Jehu from the group of officers which surrounded him into an inner chamber, anoint him there, and instantly withdraw in flight. These instructions were faithfully carried out. On Jehu's return to the officers' quarters, he was eagerly interrogated as to the meaning of this mysterious visit from the frenzied * prophetic messenger. On learning the truth, his fellow-officers tore their mantles from their shoulders and spread them as a carpet for their commander on the bare steps,† and proclaimed him as king with a loud flourish of trumpets. The lightning rapidity of the following movements of Jehu, and the murderous energy with which he crushed every opposition, overwhelm the reader. He immediately proceeded to Jezreel at the head of a picked cavalcade, riding with Bidkar in his chariot. The invalided king Jehoram was at that time receiving a visit from his kinsman Ahaziah king of Judah, at his royal residence. The cavalcade is descried at a distance by the watchman near the palace gates, who informs the king (cf. 2 S 18^{24}). At the command of Jehoram, who feels uneasy at the news, a horseman is sent to make the inquiry, 'Is it peace?' The question was purposely ambiguous, and might be regarded as an inquiry respecting the progress of the campaign at the seat of war. But Jehu, with brutal frankness, at once makes his purpose clear, and compels the king's emissary to join his retinue. This strange proceeding is observed in Jezreel, and arouses suspicion. Both the kings at once proceed in their chariots, accompanied by their

* Bidkar and Jehu rode in a chariot along with others in pairs. So the Hebrew (רֹכְבִים צְמָדִים) should be interpreted. There was something exceptional in this. Usually three rode in a Hebrew chariot, as we find among the Hittites. See article CHARIOT by the present writer in Black's Bible Encyclopædia.

* The familiar ancient association of prophecy and madness is indicated in the Heb. מְשֻׁגָּע (cf. Jer 29^{26}), but it would be an error to regard it as a scornful epithet on the basis of Hos 9^{7} (cf. 1 S $21^{14ff.}$). In classical Arabic the verb is employed of speech or writing in the special form of prophetic rhythmic prose.

military staff, to confront the bold insurgent. The two cavalcades met at the ill-omened spot—the field of Naboth, ever associated with Ahab's high-handed injustice consummated by treachery and murder. Jehu was quick to seize the advantage afforded him by these familiar recollections, and, as Jehoram's heart failed him and he turned, immediately discharged an arrow * with his full strength, that laid the king of Israel low. As he beheld the fallen son of Ahab, he recalled the words uttered by Elijah on that memorable spot many years before. With characteristic energy Jehu did not allow the opportunity of striking down a possible foe to escape him, and Ahaziah of Judah, who had fled at the sight of his kinsman's terrible fate, was immediately pursued on the road which he took to Beth-haggan. At a place called the Ascent of Gûr,† near Ible'am, he was overtaken and mortally wounded, and ultimately escaped to die at Megiddo.

As Jehu entered Jezreel at the head of his retinue, he was greeted by Jezebel as she sat with her attendants at the window in the stately queen's apartment in the upper storey of the royal palace. The splendid courage of the queen-dowager did not forsake her in that terrible hour of doom. Surrounded by Phœnician luxury, with elaborate head-dress and eyelids painted with stibium, she hurled her angry defiance at the victorious insurgent. To Jehu's previous reminiscence of a well-known episode she retorts with another, as she flings the taunt, 'Is it peace, O Zimri, his master's murderer?' meaning, 'Is there to be peace between me and such a traitor as you with your brief tenancy of power?' The narrator who portrays the lurid facts sheds no ray of chivalry on Jehu's relentless ferocity. The queen at his bidding is flung by the attendant eunuchs from the lofty upper window into the courtyard below, close to his chariot wheels, and suffers instant death. Jehu feasts within the palace in cold-blooded indifference until the thought of the yet unburied queen prompts the command that the 'accursed' (קְאֻרֻרָה) should receive the rights of sepulture due to her dignity and rank. This, however, the carrion kites and scavenger dogs had by this time rendered superfluous.

But the career of assassination was not yet ended, and, without Macbeth's remorse, Jehu felt himself 'young in deed,' and could say without compunction—

> 'I am in blood
> Stepped in so far that should I wade no more > Returning were as tedious as go o'er.'—Macbeth, III. iv. 137.

The seventy sons and grandsons of the royal harem of Ahab still inhabited Samaria, and they undoubtedly constituted a possible source of danger and disaffection. An artfully worded despatch to the elders in Samaria [?],‡ challenging them to set up one of these royal princes as a rival king, produced the desired effect. The palace-commander, the commander of the city, and the guardians of the sons of Ahab trembled for their own lives, and complied with Jehu's second request. They procured the death of all the royal princes, and sent their heads in baskets to Jezreel. This work of destruction was supplemented according to the section (vv.[12-16]) by a still further holocaust of 42 princes of the line of David, kinsmen of Ahaziah.* This pendant to the narrative probably belongs to a later source. Yet the following verse (v.[17]) clearly shows that further deeds of blood were perpetrated.

The final scene of butchery was enacted in the great temple of the Phœnician Baal, erected by Ahab in Samaria, where, under pretext of zeal for the worship of the god, a large crowd of his devotees were gathered together and then slaughtered by an armed band of eighty men who were posted at the entrance to guard the exit. The Baal 'pillars' (mazzēbôth) were brought forth and destroyed by fire (2 K 10[26]).

It is not quite clear what was the religious significance of this destruction of the Baal temple in Samaria and of its devotees. Doubtless Wellhausen is right in saying (Isr. u. Jüd. Gesch.[2] p. 77) that Jehu was essentially a soldier, and his aims were political rather than religious. Yet he posed as a religious zealot, and some meaning must have been ascribed to his destruction of the Baal worshippers. It is more difficult to ascertain the precise significance of this act when we remember that Jehoram, Ahab's son (note that the name of Jahweh is expressed in this royal name), is distinctly stated to have withdrawn the specific Tyrian Baal worship from Samaria, which had been instituted by Ahab under the influence of Jezebel (2 K 3[2]). Yet it is quite obvious that this act of Jehoram did not touch the old local Canaanitish Baal worship which still prevailed in the high places of Israel, and too much stress should certainly not be placed on this act of suppression, which appears to have been only temporary or partial in character. This is the view taken by Prof. Peake, the writer of the article BAAL in the first volume of this Dictionary. Accordingly, we may regard the murderous policy of Jehu as simply directed to a drastic suppression of the Phœnician form of Baal worship. This view is supported by the following considerations: (1) The annihilation of Baal worship by Jehu took place in Samaria, the capital and residence of the Omri dynasty, where the Phœnician Baal had his special shrine (1 K 16[32]). We nowhere read of the suppression of Baal cults generally in the high places. (2) The extinction of Canaanitish Baal worship, if it had ever taken place, could not have been effectual or permanent, since in the 8th cent. the writings of the prophet Hosea reveal the wide prevalence of local Baal cults in the Northern Kingdom. (3) The worship of the golden calf of Jeroboam I. still survived, as we infer from 2 K 10[29]. This verse and the language of v.[31] lead us to the conclusion that the words, 'And Jehu destroyed the Baal from Israel' (v.[28]), can refer only to the specific cult introduced by Jezebel perhaps characterized by gross licentiousness. (4) That Jehu wrought no real religious reformation is shown by the neutral tone of the writer of chs. 9. 10, while the strong reprobation of Hos 1[4] faithfully reflects not only the prophetic but the popular verdict on the character and career of this monarch.

The policy pursued by Jehu towards the dynasty of Omri, and the murder of the Phœnician queen as well as the overthrow of the Phœnician worship, at once shattered the close bonds of an alliance which the dynasty of Omri had found of considerable value to Israel, and which it had taken the utmost pains to consolidate. Ahab, as we have already seen (art. AHAB), had abandoned the friendship of Syria after the disastrous battle of Ḳarkar (854). He had formed a pretty shrewd estimate of the rising power of the Assyrian empire under Shalmaneser II., and thought it wiser to have its ruler as his friend rather than his foe. The further attacks made by the Assyrians upon the Aramæan kingdom of Benhadad (Dadidri) in the years 849, 846, and 842 only made this policy of friendship with Assyria more necessary for Israel; and Jehu, weakened by his break with Phœnicia and by the hostility of Judah, was driven by the force of events to adopt the same policy of subservience to the Assyrian monarch. The black obelisk of Shalmaneser, in a brief statement that runs in clearly legible characters of cuneiform between the graphic figures of its reliefs, records the important statement: 'Tribute of Jehu, son of Omri —objects of silver and gold—bars of silver, bars of gold, a golden bowl, a golden ladle, golden goblets, golden pitchers, bars of lead—a staff for the hand of a king, shafts of spears . . . these I received.' *

Another inscription (COT[2] p. 200; III. Rawl. 5, No. 6, 40–65) places this event in a clearer light. We there learn that the Tyrians and Sidonians followed the same policy as Jehu. Jehu was forced to adopt this attitude at the commencement of his reign (842 B.C.), because in that year Shalmaneser II. made another invasion of Syria and attacked Hazael of Damascus. It was terribly disastrous for the young Syrian king. He lost 16,000 men and more than 1000 chariots. To save his life he fled to Damascus, whither he was pursued and then besieged. The Assyrians ravaged and laid his territory waste as far as the Haurân range and even the frontiers of Lebanon. This terrible overthrow of the year 842 was followed by another invasion three years later, in which Syria made little resistance. This at any rate is the inference which may be drawn from the long annalistic inscription taken from the obelisk of Nimrud,† lines 102–104: 'In the 21st year of my reign (i.e. 839) I crossed the Euphrates for the 21st time and marched against the towns [maḥazâni) of Hazael of Damascus. Four of his towns I conquered, and received the tribute of the Tyrians, Sidonians, and Byblians.'

While the humiliations inflicted by Assyria upon the Aramæan kingdom continued, the policy of vassalage to Nineveh pursued by Jehu brought him security, and Israel was safe from aggression from his powerful northern foe, Syria. But the tide was soon to turn. After 839 B.C. we read of no more attacks upon the Syrian kingdom from the shores of the Euphrates for more than 30 years. Meanwhile Syria, with wonderful inherent energy and recuperative power, began once more to show itself able to take the offensive. We learn this from the brief notice which closes the biblical record of Jehu's reign (2 K 10[32]): 'During that time J" began to cut off (the territories of) Israel, and Hazael smote them in all the borders of Israel,' and in the following verse this is explained as meaning that Israel suffered severe losses of territory along the whole of his eastern dominion on the other side of Jordan. Probably Hazael annexed these territories to his own—the harbinger of further humiliations in store for the dynasty of Jehu, until the tide again turned in favour of Israel under Jeroboam II.‡

JEOPARD, JEOPARDY.—The verb to 'jeopard,' is the 'deliverer' referred to in 2 K 13[5], and this is a chronological datum of considerable value. See the present writer's remarks in Schrader, COT[2] ii. p. 324.

that is, hazard. is derived from the subst. 'jeopardy,' peril, hazard; and that is a corruption of the Old French jeu parti, lit. a divided game (Low Lat. jocus partitus), i.e. a game in which the chances are even. Chaucer (Troilus, ii. 465) has—

'For myn estat now lyth in jupartye,
And eek myn emes [=uncle's] lyf lyth in balaunce';

and (ii. 772)—

'Sholde I now love and putte in jupartye
My sikernesse, and thrallen libertee?'

Tindale in Prol. to Leviticus says, 'They that be dead, yf they dyed in the faith which that sacrament preacheth, they be saffe and are past all jeopardye,' where the word has assumed its modern spelling. The verb occurs often in Tindale and other writers of that time, as Knox, Works, iii. 213, 'Why will ye jeoparde to loise eternall life?'; Tind. Works, i. 173, 'Whosoever casteth not this aforehand, I must jeopard life, goods, honour, worship (and all that there is, for Christ's sake), deceiveth himself'; Elyot, Governour, ii. 263, 'I name that Audacitie whiche is an excessife and inordinate truste to escape all daungers, and causeth a man to do suche actes as are nat to be jeoparded': and Dn 3[28] Cov. 'that have altered the kynges commaundement and joperde their bodies therupon.'

Jeopardy occurs in AV, 2 S 23[17] 'is not this the blood of the men that went in jeopardy of their lives?' (בְּנַפְשֹׁתָם, lit., as RVm, 'that went with their lives'; but the ב is [as Driver] the Beth pretii, 'at the cost or risk of their lives'; W. R. Smith [RS[2] 230], 'the blood of the men that fetched it in jeopardy of their lives'); 1 Ch 11[19 bis] 'Shall I drink the blood of these men that have put their lives in jeopardy? for with the jeopardy of their lives they brought it' (AVm and RVm 'with their lives'); 12[19] 'He will fall to his master Saul to the jeopardy of our heads' (בְּרָאשֵׁינוּ, AVm 'on our heads,' but it is the Beth pretii, as before); 1 Mac 6[44] 'Eleazar also . . . put himself in jeopardy, to the end he might deliver his people' (ἔδωκεν ἑαυτόν, RV 'gave himself'); Lk 8[23] 'there came down a storm of wind on the lake; and they were filled with water and were in jeopardy' (ἐκινδύνευον); 1 Co 15[30] 'And why stand we in jeopardy every hour?' (κινδυνεύομεν); and in the Preface to AV 1611, 'Yea, why did the Catholicks (meaning Popish Romanists) alwayes go in jeopardie for refusing to go to heare it [the English translation of the Bible]?'

The verb is rarer, Jg 5[18] 'Zebulun and Naphtali were a people that jeoparded their lives unto the death in the high places of the field' (חֵרְפוּ נַפְשָׁם לָמוּת, lit. 'that despised its life to death,' AVm 'exposed to reproach,' Moore, 'that recklessly exposed itself to death');* 2 Mac 11[7] 'Then Maccabeus himself first of all took weapons, exhorting the other that they would jeopard themselves together with him to help their brethren' (διακινδυνεύοντας); 14[38] 'he [Razis] did boldly jeopard his body and life with all vehemency for the religion of the Jews' (παραβεβλημένος).

JEPHTHAH (יִפְתָּח 'he,' i.e. prob. J″, 'will open'; cf. פְּתַחְיָה Ezr 10[23] etc., יִפְתַּחְאֵל town in Zebulun, Jos 19[14]; יִפְתָּח also name of a town in Judah, Jos 15[43]; Ἰεφθά).—Judge, and conqueror of the Ammonites (Jg 10[6]–12[7]; cf. 1 S 12[11]). The narrative has an unusually long introduction 10[6-18] (cf. 2[11]–3[6. 7-10] 6[7-10] [D[2]]); it is based, however, on what was probably a shorter introduction in the manner of E (vv.[6b. 8. 15. 16]). The particulars in 10[17. 18] are derived from ch. 11 (cf. 8[33-35] from ch. 9), and come from D[2]. Apparently, this long introduction was intended to include the Philistine as well as the Ammonite oppression (10[7]). The main interest of the story of Jephthah clearly lies, not in his personal history or defeat of the Ammonites, but in his vow and its fulfilment, and the origin of an Israelite custom.

Of the antecedents of Jephthah little is known beyond the fact that he was a Gileadite warrior, the son of a harlot. He was driven out of his home by the 'elders of Gilead' (11[7]), and became the captain of a band of freebooters in the land of Tob in E. Syria (cf. 1 S 22[1f.], 2 S 10[6. 8]).* The Ammonite invasion made it necessary for the Israelites east of Jordan to find a leader; and there was nothing for it but to appeal to the outlawed Jephthah to come to the rescue. The elders of Gilead begged him to be their leader; and, after expressing surprise that such a request should be made to him, Jephthah agreed, on the condition that he should become their chief when the Ammonites were defeated. A solemn compact was made accordingly, and Jephthah was appointed leader by popular acclamation (11[4-11a]). At this moment, it would seem, when Jephthah was at Mizpah of Gilead, he went to the holy place or altar, and there, 'before J″,' registered a vow to sacrifice whomsoever should be the first to meet him when he returned victorious (vv.[31. 11b]).† That he had a human victim in his mind is clear from the language which he used.‡

The long account of the negotiations between Jephthah and the king of the Ammonites (11[12-28]) with regard to Israel's rights of possession in Gilead, is regarded by most critics as a late interpolation, compiled from JE's narrative in Nu 20. 21, in some places word for word; cf. vv.[17-22. 26] with Nu 20[14. 17] 21[4. 13. 21-24. 25]. The remarkable thing about this section is, that although Jephthah is arguing with Ammonites, yet the language which he is made to use refers entirely to Moabites. The Ammonites complain that Israel had seized their land between Arnon and Jabbok; Jephthah replies that the district was taken from Sihon king of the Amorites, and not from Moab (!). Moab never fought against Israel (but see Jos 24[9]), why should Ammon? Even Chemosh, god of the Moabites, is referred to as having given the Ammonites their territory. An extraordinary misunderstanding thus runs through the whole passage.§

A brief description of the defeat of the Ammonites is all that is given (v.[32f.]). The course of the battle cannot be determined exactly, but it probably went in a direction E. of Rabbah (see Jos 13[25] Aroer), into the territory of the Ammonites.‖ Jephthah returns in triumph to his home at Mizpah; the first person who comes to meet him is his only daughter, accompanied by a chorus of women (cf. Ex 15[20f.], 1 S 18[6f.]). The overwhelming grief of the father, the noble self-surrender of the daughter, and her courageous resignation to her fate, are told with admirable skill and reserve. 'He did to her what he had vowed to do.' It

* See Moore in loc. for refff. to the use of the verb; and G. A. Smith in Expos. 4th Ser. vii. 168, and in HGHL 422, for illustration of the character described.

* 11[1b. 2] are not part of the original story. V.[1b] is modelled on the genealogical forms of P and Ch; v.[2] is best explained as due to a misunderstanding of v.[7].

† The sequel of v.[31] is 11[b]; the text has been disordered by the long interpolation, 12-28.

‡ 'Whosoever cometh forth,' 'from the doors of my house,' 'I will offer him up': these expressions are inapplicable to an animal.

§ Perhaps the interpolation was made at some moment when the Israelites wanted to assert their title to Gilead. Moore suggests such an occasion as the intrusion of the Ammonites at the beginning of the 6th cent. (Jer 49[1-5]).

‖ V.[29] mentions various movements, the reason for which is not clear. Jephthah's object could not have been to raise the tribes; for the people are all assembled in v.[11a]. In 11[b] Jephthah is still at Mizpah; he is still there in [30], and thence sets out in due course in [32]. V.[29] is, in fact, an attempt to pick up the thread of the narrative after the long interpolation, 12-28 (Moore).

became henceforth a custom in Israel to celebrate the tragedy of Jephthah's daughter by four days' mourning every year.*

That such sacrifices were possible in Israel may be gathered from 1 S 14[24f. 45] 15[33], 2 S 21[6. 9]; cf. Ezk 20[26] with Ex 22[28], Mic 6[7]. In times of desperation or religious degradation they became more frequent (Jer 7[31], 2 K 16[3] 17[17] 21[6], Ps 106[37f.] etc. See Schultz, OT Theol. i. 191; Dillmann, Genesis[6], 289 f.; Nowack, Heb. Arch. ii. 205 f.; Ottley, BL, 1897, 176 f.).

The narrative goes on to describe a severe conflict between Jephthah and the tribe of Ephraim, who, with characteristic arrogance (8[1f.]), complained that they had not been invited to take part in the war. After expostulating with them, Jephthah collected his Gileadite forces, which had been dispersed when the war was ended, and went to battle. He held the Jordan fords against them; every fugitive who attempted to cross was required to pronounce the test-word Shibboleth ('flood'); and if he betrayed his Ephraimite origin by pronouncing it Sibboleth, he was put to death.†

The historical character of this narrative has been questioned by Wellh. (Composition, 229), who treats it as a mere replica of 8[1-3]. His arguments, however, are not conclusive; the episode at the Jordan fords is too original to be imaginary; and the majority of modern critics support the genuineness of these verses. It is probable that the numbers in v.[6] are exaggerated; but this does not condemn the whole story.‡ The narrative of Jephthah is brought to a close with the formula which is used of the minor judges (10[2-5] 12[10. 12. 15]).§

The account of Jephthah's home and settled life at Mizpah (11[34ff.]) does not seem to agree with his outlawry in 11[3ff.]. The confusion of the Ammonites and Moabites in 11[12-28] is also remarkable. Accordingly, Budde (Commentary on Judges, 1897), following an unpublished treatise by Holzinger, attempts to work out a double narrative, as in the case of Gideon. He postulates a Moabite document, and assigns it to E, and an Ammonite document, J. The suggestion is ingenious, but the data are hardly distinctive enough. The contradictions in the accounts of Jephthah's antecedents are not irreconcilable; while, with regard to the interpolation (11[12-28]), the explanation above satisfies the case.

JEPHUNNEH (יְפֻנֶּה).—1. The father of Caleb (Nu 13[6]). 2. A son of Jether an Asherite (1 Ch 7[38]).

JERAH (יָרַח), son of Joktan, Gn 10[26] (1 Ch 1[20]). The Arabic geographers knew of places named Yurākh and Yarāh in Yemen and Ḥijaz respectively (Yāḳūt and Hamdāni); and the geographer Yāḳūt quotes from Al-Ṣulaiḥi (a usurper who obtained control of Yemen in the 11th cent., and was well versed in S. Arabian geography), a verse in which Warākh is mentioned as a place of importance: 'What excuse have I, now I am lord of Warākh, for failing to meet the foe?' There are several references to Warākh in Hamdāni's 'Description of Arabia,' from which its site can be accurately fixed. It is possible that the name may be ancient, and that the Jerah of Gn may refer to it. Most commentators, however, have preferred to regard Jerah (Heb. 'moon' or 'month') as a translation of some Arabic name; but the conjectures based on this supposition by Bochart, J. D. Michaelis, and more recently Glaser (Skizze, ii. 425), seem devoid of probability. D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

JERAHMEEL (יְרַחְמְאֵל 'may God have compassion'; B Ἰραμεήλ, Ἰερεμεήλ, Ἰερεμαήλ, Ῥαμεήλ; A Ἰερεμεήλ, Ἰερεμήλ; Jerameel).—1. According to 1 Ch 2[9] the firstborn son of Hezron, the son of Perez, the son of Judah. His descendants, of whom a list is given (vv.[25-33]), lived on the extreme S. border of Judah in what was technically called 'the Negeb of the Jerahmeelites' (1 S 27[10] 30[29]; see Driver, in loc., and G. A. Smith, HGHL pp. 278–286). They appear to have been an Amalekite or Edomite clan, which was afterwards absorbed by Judah.

2. The son of Kish, a Merarite Levite of the house of Mahli. Jerahmeel appears as the only representative of this branch of the house of Merari at the time when David is said to have organized the temple service (1 Ch 23[21] 24[29]).

3. The king's son (RV, AVm; 'the son of Hammelech' AV, RVm) i.e. of the royal blood, who together with two other officers was commanded by king Jehoiakim 'to take Baruch the scribe and Jeremiah the prophet' after the burning of the roll (Jer 36[26]). J. F. STENNING.

JERECHU (Ἰέρεχος, B[a] -ειχ-, AV Jerechus), 1 Es 5[22].—In Ezr 2[34], Neh 7[36] JERICHO.

JERED (יֶרֶד. It is the same name which is given in Gn 5[15. 16. 18. 20], 1 Ch 1[2] as Jared).—A Judahite, the 'father' of Gedor, 1 Ch 4[18].

JEREMAI (יִרְמַי).—A Jew of the family of Hashum who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10[33]).

JEREMIAH.—Seven or eight men of this name besides the prophet (see next art.) are mentioned in OT. The Heb. is always יִרְמְיָה or יִרְמְיָהוּ. 1. A warrior of the tribe of Gad, fifth in reputation (1 Ch 12[10]) of those who joined David in 'the hold in the wilderness' in the neighbourhood either of Adullam or of En-gedi, most probably of the latter. 2. The tenth in reputation (1 Ch 12[13]) of the same Gadite band. 3. A bowman and slinger of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Ch 12[4]), who joined David during his occupation of the frontier city of Ziklag. 4. The head of a family in the eastern section of the tribe of Manasseh (1 Ch 5[24]). He was probably one of the Jews carried into captivity by Tiglath-pileser, and settled by him on the Armenian frontier (1 Ch 5[26], 2 K 15[29]). 5. A Jew of Libnah, whose daughter, Hamutal or Hamital, was one of the wives of Josiah, and mother of Jehoahaz (2 K 23[31]) and Zedekiah (2 K 24[18], Jer 52[1]). In the last two passages the mother's name is given as Hamital, חמיטל; but a textual error is more probable than that Josiah married two sisters, both daughters of Jeremiah. The latter's place of residence (Jos 21[13], 1 Ch 6[57]), and his relations with the king, as well as the respectful way in which he is in each instance referred to as a well-known man, make it likely that he was a priest of great influence, and possibly also one of the principal instigators or agents of Josiah in the ritual restoration of his reign. 6. The son of Habazziniah and father of Jaazaniah, who appears to have been the head of the Rechabites (Jer 35[3]) in the time of the prophet Jeremiah.

* See W. R. Smith, RS 395.

† Two historical parallels are quoted by the commentators: the 'Sicilian Vespers,' Mar. 31, 1282, when the French were made to betray themselves by their pronunciation of ceci e ciceri; and again, during the revolt against the French in Flanders, May 25, 1302, when no one was allowed to pass out of the gates who could not pronounce scilt ende friend!

‡ In 12[2a] a verb must be supplied after וּבְנֵי עַמּוֹן, LXX (A) ἐταπείνωσαν μέ, i.e. עִנּוּנִי 'afflicted me.' In v.[4] the sentence from כִּי אָמְרוּ 'because they said' to the end does not make sense. The words, 'because they said, Ye are fugitives of Ephraim,' must come from v.[5]; the rest of the sentence is a gloss. The entire half-verse is om. in some MSS of LXX; in Syro-Hex. it is asterisked.

§ The closing words of 12[7] cannot be right. LXX (A) ἐν τῇ πόλει αὐτοῦ Γαλαάδ, Vulg. in civitate sua Galaad. Studer conjectures בְּמִצְפָּה גִּלְעָד 11[29], suggested by ἐν τῇ πόλει αὐτοῦ ἐν Σαφὶ Γ', the reading of some cursive MSS; cf. Moore, ad loc.

7. A priest who in B.C. 536 came back to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel and Jeshua (Neh 12^{1}). His name was given to one of the twenty-two courses or 'fathers'-houses,' into which were divided the four families of priests (Ezr 2^{36-39}, Neh 7^{39-42}) that returned on that occasion. It is not possible to say with certainty to which of these families Jeremiah belonged; but if the lists are parallel, he may have been a member of that of Jedaiah, with which also the high priest Jeshua was connected. The course is mentioned again (Neh 12^{13}) in the priesthood (B.C. 499–463) of Joiakim, Jeshua's son and successor, when its head is said to have been Hananiah. 8. A priest who in the name of his course, with other princes and representatives of the people, sealed in B.C. 444 Nehemiah's great covenant (Neh 10^{2}). He (or his course) was also appointed to join the right-hand procession at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 12^{34}). It is possible that in both of these cases the name is used to denote the official head of a priestly course rather than an individual in his own person. In the former, fifteen of the twenty-one names are identical with those in the lists of Neh 12^{2-7} and Neh 12^{11-20}; and hence there is ground for the assumption that the name is used in this instance as the official designation of a class. But in the latter the forms of expression are slightly in favour of the opposite conclusion, Neh 12^{35} referring specifically to the priests' sons, whilst there is an antecedent probability that the procession would consist of selected representatives only. That, moreover, the name of Jeremiah should recur in different generations of the same family, is not forbidden by known Jewish usage. In the days of Joiakim, Hananiah was the head of the course of Jeremiah (Neh 12^{12}); but Joiakim died some sixteen years before the dedication of the wall, and in the interval it is not unlikely that the headship of the course of Jeremiah had passed into the hands of a man who bore the great family name. And if this Jeremiah was a person and not a class, lapse of time is fatal to his assumed identification with the previous one (No. 7).

i. LIFE OF THE PROPHET.—Jeremiah (יִרְמְיָה, shorter form יִרְמְיָהוּ 'whom J" casts,' i.e. possibly, as Ges. suggests, 'appoints' Dn 7^{9}, Ἰερεμίας, Jeremias) was born of a priestly family in Anathoth, now 'Anâta, a small town, an hour or an hour and a quarter N.E. of Jerusalem (Is 10^{30}), and prophesied from the 13th year of Josiah till after the Captivity, a period of more than 40 years (B.C. 626–586). Though he had spoken as a prophet for five years when Josiah promulgated the Book of the Law and introduced his Reform, Jeremiah appears to have had no hand in these transactions; but from the death of Josiah till his own death in Egypt he was a prominent figure in all the history of that tragic period. Almost alone he had to expose the immoralities, the self-deception founded on superficial reforms, and the fanatical confidence in the protection of J" who dwelt in His temple, by which all classes were carried away. His conviction, constantly declared, that the Lord had determined to destroy the temple and nation, exposed him to cruel insults from the temple priests (20^{2}, cf. 37^{13}); and he was on many occasions in danger of his life, from his townsmen of Anathoth (11^{21}), the priests and prophets of the temple ($26^{8.9}$), the arbitrary and vindictive king Jehoiakim ($36^{19.26}$), and the military of the day (38^{4}). The strife in which he was involved, so alien to his nature, wearied him: he longed for a lodge in the wilderness (9^{2}), mourned the perpetual conflicts in which his life was passed (15^{10}), cursed in despair the day of his birth (20^{14}), and vowed to have done with the word of the Lord, which isolated him from all that was human,—but in vain: His word was in his heart like a fire shut up in his bones, and he must declare it (20^{9}). Yet even in that degenerate day his life extorted a certain homage: the better conscience of men was on his side (26^{17-19}); the Ethiopian slave was moved with pity for his distress (38^{7}); king Zedekiah heard him gladly, and did what he could to mitigate his sufferings ($37^{20f.}$ 38^{10}); the Chaldæans treated him with consideration ($40^{1ff.}$), and even the wretched exiles insisted on dragging him with them as a kind of fetish to Egypt ($43^{6ff.}$).

Jeremiah appears to have been called to the prophetic office young, though the word 'child' (נַעַר 1^{6}), which he employs of himself, may chiefly express his sense of insufficiency for the task set before him. There is no reason to suppose his father Hilkiah identical with the chief priest of that name who discovered the Book of the Law in the temple (2 K 22^{8}). His father may rather have been a descendant of Abiathar, whom Solomon banished to Anathoth (1 K 2^{26}); and if so, traditions of the days of David and the early monarchy, and the great part their ancestor then played, would be cherished in the family and give it a sense of dignity even in its decline, and they would be the food on which the mind of the child Jeremiah was nourished. The family owned land in Anathoth (32^{8}), and though, in later times at least, living mainly in Jerusalem, the prophet continued to frequent his native village ($11^{18ff.}$ $37^{11ff.}$, cf. 29^{27} where he is contemptuously called 'the Anathothite'). His prophetic ministry was probably begun here. As he was not consulted by Josiah and the priests regarding the newly-found Book of the Law (2 K $22^{12ff.}$), he may have been little known in the capital, unless indeed we suppose that owing to the violence of his denunciations the authorities preferred to seek the advice of some more moderate counsellors. There is no ground for supposing the dialogue 1^{4-10} coloured by the prophet's subsequent experience. No man became a prophet suddenly; the decisive event, named his 'call,' was but the climax of many prior movements of mind leading up to it. Jeremiah felt himself 'predestinated' to be a prophet ($1^{4f.}$). The idea may cover much belonging to the past, the godly house out of which he came with its traditions, many movements in his own mind little attended to at the time but remembered now, and the nation's whole history of which he was the child. It is no denial of the reality of the divine voice speaking to him when we look at the dialogue as a conflict in his own mind, in which thought was invalidated by opposite thought, and suggestion and resolution met by counter suggestion and irresolution. The conflict already reveals the duality in his consciousness characteristic of his whole life. God and man wrestle within him no less than they do in St. Paul. The impulses to stand forth as a prophet, awakened by the signs of the times, he calls God; the reluctances and all the considerations that support them are himself. And when the impulses prove the stronger, it is a victory of God and a defeat of himself—'O Lord, thou didst induce me, and I was induced; thou art stronger than I' (20^{7}).

The words, 'See, I have set thee over the nations,' indicate a change of view from that of the earlier prophets, though Jeremiah was perhaps not conscious of the change ($28^{7ff.}$). Israel is no more to be a people that dwells alone (Nu 23^{9}), the stream of its history is to flow into and colour that of the history of the nations. If prophecy now begins to concern itself with the nations, it is because J″ concerns Himself with them. The consciousness of one God has created the consciousness of one world and one mankind. Jeremiah's presentiments at this time are expressed in the two symbols 1^{11-19}: First, the symbol of the almond tree, meaning that J″ is 'wakeful' in regard to His word and purposes, and will speedily execute them; and second, the seething caldron with its mouth towards the south, indicating that the North is about to pour its desolating forces over the land. The substance of his prophetic speeches under Josiah is given in chs. 2–6. These chs. reflect chiefly his teaching before the Reform, but contain allusions to the people's mind later, and his judgment on it (2^{35} $3^{4.5}$ $4^{3f.}$). The two main thoughts running through the chs. are, first, his verdict on the people's history; it has been one long course of unfaithfulness to J″ (2^{1}–4^{4}); and, secondly, his unchangeable conviction that the issue of such a history must be the destruction of the nation (4^{5}–6^{30}). His thoughts run greatly on the same lines with those of Hosea. Israel was true to J″ in the wilderness,—and with a sorrowful reminiscence J″ recalls the time, 'I remember the kindness of thy youth, thy bridal love, how thou didst follow me in the wilderness' (2^{2}),—but apostatized and became unfaithful on entering Canaan; and this unfaithfulness has continued and become aggravated. Under the name of 'whoredom' Jeremiah includes not only the service of deities nominally different from J″, but the debased service of J″ at the high places, with images and other Canaanite usages. This judgment of Jeremiah has not only ideal or absolute truth, to the effect that the popular worship showed no consciousness of the true being of J″, it has historical truth also; for no doubt the Canaanites absorbed into Israel carried over much of their religious practice as well as their places of worship into the nation. Even the Arabs were conscious that images were a later innovation in their religion. How profound Jeremiah's conception of the true religion of J″ was, and how absolute he felt the contrast between it and the popular religion to be, appears from the figure in which he describes the one and the other: 'They have forsaken the fountain of living water, to hew out for themselves broken cisterns that can hold no water.'

The circumstances of Jeremiah's ministry at this time are not told, but some things give us a glimpse into them. The people reclaim against his judgment on their religion, saying that it is not true, and that, if there was any truth in it, the evil had been amended. That is, they claim that their service is in their intention a service of J″, 'How canst thou say, I have not gone after the baals?' (2^{23}); and that such evils as the 'high places' had been done away (2^{35} $3^{4.5}$). Their claim that they meant to serve J″ was no doubt just; it was their conception of Him that was at fault, and the modes of giving this conception expression. But both the conception and the modes of expressing it had been inherited by them, and they were unable to see that the prophet's charges were just. As to the other point, Josiah's removal of the 'high places' must have seemed good to Jeremiah, and possibly he noped something from the Reform at first, but even in Josiah's days he had ceased to cherish any illusions in regard to it. The worship was altered, the Being worshipped remained the same; men had changed their customs, they were unchanged in their mind. The work was superficial, a casting of seed into the old field rank with thorns; they must plough deeper—'Circumcise the foreskins of your heart' ($4^{3.4}$). Jeremiah is not mentioned in connexion with Josiah's reform, nor indeed is he once named in the Book of Kings, but some scholars interpret Jer 11^{1-8} as meaning that he undertook an itinerant mission round 'the cities of Judah' to recommend acceptance of the Book of Deuteronomy. The idea is most improbable. The prophet's 'amen' (v.^{5}) expresses acquiescence in the words of J″, 'Cursed be the man that heareth not the words of this covenant,' not obedience to a command (vv.$^{2.6}$; cf. 28^{6}). Jeremiah may have sought to impress on men the general idea of Dt, that of the covenant between J″ and Israel, for this was his own idea in another form, but a formal championship of Dt would have been very unlike him. The expression 'cities of Judah and streets of Jerusalem' is not to be pressed to imply a circuit of the cities any more than of the streets. When Jeremiah spoke anywhere, he spoke in the cities of Judah and the streets of Jerusalem, for his words went out to all the land (26^{2}), just as when he spoke in Tahpanhes he addressed the dwellers in Pathros, or Upper Egypt (44^{15} etc.). The phrase 'cities of Judah and streets of Jerusalem' means the country and the capital (7^{34} 11^{13}; cf. 4^{5}). The other feeling prominent in the prophet's mind at this time is the imminent destruction of the people by a foe from the north (4^{5}–6^{30}). This 'foe' might be a creation of his moral presentiment, and assigned to the 'north' as the cloudy region of mystery where storms gather and descend upon the world of men, but such descriptions as that in $5^{15ff.}$ seem to imply an actual people known to the time. It is usually thought that the Scythians are meant. The pathos and depth of these chs. (2–6) are not surpassed by anything in Scripture. Two things in them may be referred to—first, the prophet's profound sense of the national sin, and his presentiment of the desolations which moral evil must work in the earth. In a strange passage ($4^{23ff.}$) he fancies himself to have outlived the judgment, and to be treading on the ashes of the extinct world. He is the last man, alone amidst the silence of death: 'I beheld the earth, and, lo, it was waste and void; and the heavens, and they had no light. I beheld, and, lo, there was no man, and all the birds of the heavens were fled.' And second, his agitation at the thought of the doom hanging over his people: 'My bowels, my bowels! I am pained at my heart; my heart is disquieted in me; I cannot hold my peace, because my soul hath heard the sound of the trumpet, the alarm of war' ($4^{19ff.}$). Other passages reveal his compassion for the people, as 4^{31} 6^{22-26} $10^{19ff.}$.

Thirteen years after his reform Josiah ventured to oppose Necho the king of Egypt, and fell at Megiddo. His servants carried his body in a chariot to Jerusalem, where he was buried, and the people of the land raised his son Jehoahaz to the throne. The prince, induced or compelled to repair to Necho's headquarters at Riblah, was thrown into fetters, and after a reign of three months carried to Egypt, where he died. Jeremiah makes a pathetic reference to his father Josiah and him: 'Weep ye not for the dead, neither bemoan him; but weep sore for him that goeth away: for he shall return no more, nor see his native land' (22^{10}). In another passage he contrasts Josiah with Jehoiakim ($22^{13ff.}$), but he makes no other reference to the pious king; the statement of 2 Ch 35^{25} that Jeremiah 'lamented for Josiah' seems founded on the tradition that he was the author of Lamentations. Jehoiakim, whom Necho raised to the throne, was the ideal of a bad ruler. Frivolous and superficial in regard to the highest things of life, despotic in temper, and brutal in the measures he used to rid himself of those who crossed his humours (Jer 26^{20-24}), he became the detestation of all serious-minded men. Jeremiah probably reflects the common sentiment regarding him when he says, 'They shall not lament him, saying, Ah my brother! Ah lord! or, Ah his glory! He shall be buried with the burial of an ass, dragged and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem' ($22^{18.\ 19}$). It was easy to be a prophet under Josiah, but in Jehoiakim Manasseh had come to life again. The early years of this reign were the period of the prophet's conflicts. The conflict was twofold: external persecution, from the priests and prophets because of his threats against the temple, for to blaspheme the temple was to blaspheme Him that dwelt therein, and was worthy of death (chs. 7. 26); from his townsmen of Anathoth ($11^{18ff.}$); from the people (18^{18}); and from Pashhur the overseer of the temple, who struck Jeremiah and put him in the stocks (ch. 20). But these external trials reflected themselves in a tumult of contending emotions in his own breast, forming one of the strangest episodes in religious history (11^{1}–12^{6} 14–20).

Meanwhile the hand of 'God who hideth himself' was operating in the north in unexpected events, which seemed again to bring the prophet's early anticipations near. These anticipations indeed seemed to have failed. The wind from the desert which was to wither up the land, whose hot breath he had already felt upon his face (4^{11}), appeared to have been arrested. The storm-cloud of Scythian invasion, like other storms, followed the line of the sea, leaving Jerusalem unscathed, and was dissipated on the borders of Egypt. But in 607 Nineveh fell, and Babylon became heir of all the countries washed by the Mediterranean, the realm which had just been added by Necho to his dominions. A conflict between the rivals could not long be deferred. In 605-4 the two armies met near Carchemish, where Nebuchadnezzar inflicted a decisive defeat on Necho, and Judah exchanged the yoke of Egypt for that of Babylon. Carchemish was an epoch in Jeremiah's life. It was his justification in the eyes of others, for his foe from the north was seen to be no spectre; perhaps it made him feel more deeply himself than ever he had felt before how truly his prophetic presentiments were of God. God had set His seal on his past, and it was this reinvigorated assurance that his prophecies were the word of God that made him commit them to writing and lay them before the people, as is told in ch. 36. Carchemish was to Jeremiah what the appeal of Ahaz to Tiglath-pileser was to Isaiah: like a flash of lightning in the darkness, it lighted up to him the whole line of God's purposes on to the end. He foresaw his past anticipations passing into history. The conviction seized his mind that it was the will of J" that all nations should serve the king of Babylon; to refuse his yoke, whether for Israel or another people, was to resist the decree of God. But the strangest and most unaccountable of all his presentiments or certainties was his reading beforehand the line of God's government of the world for two generations (ch. 25).

Jehoiakim observed his oath of allegiance to Nebuchadnezzar for three years, when he refused his yearly tribute, an act equivalent to a declaration of independence. By and by the Babylonian armies were put in motion, but, by the time they sat before Jerusalem, Jehoiakim had been removed by death, and his successor Jehoiachin, after a reign of 100 days, was compelled to surrender. He was carried to Babylon, where he lay in prison seven and thirty years, till he was released by the son of Nebuchadnezzar (2 K $25^{27ff.}$) His fate awoke the liveliest sorrow in his people's minds (Jer 28^{4}), and the prophet had to crush their hopes of his return in the most peremptory manner ($22^{24ff.}$ 13^{18}). Zedekiah, who succeeded him on the throne, was a prince of good intentions, but weak and irresolute. He frequently consulted Jeremiah, and would have listened to his counsels had not terror of the stronger wills around him deterred him. With the first captivity under Jehoiachin and the accession of Zedekiah the period of Jeremiah's conflicts was over. God had conquered him, and he acquiesced in His will. He no more intercedes for the people, but bends his whole energies to induce them to yield to the decree of God, and subject themselves to the king of Babylon. This was his attitude both before the siege (chs. 27–29) and during it (21^{1-10} 37. 38). This attitude exposed him to many hardships—he was arrested, beaten, and flung into a dungeon and left to die; but the hardships no more, as in the days of Jehoiakim, reflect themselves in a conflict in his own heart. Like one whose vital energies have exhausted themselves in a struggle with sickness, he lies in quietness, calmly awaiting the end. He awaits it with the more composure that he sees beyond the end (chs. 30–33). After a siege of a year and a half the city fell, and the Chaldæans appointed Gedaliah as their viceroy over the people whom they left in the land. Jeremiah had been found in the city and doomed along with the rest of the inhabitants to deportation, and in company of a band of exiles had been carried north to Ramah. The part he had played in the siege, however, became known to the Chaldæans, and orders came from the highest quarters to show him consideration, and allow him his choice to go to Babylon or remain at home. He chose to remain in the land, and repaired to Gedaliah at Mizpah. When, after a rule of no more than two months, the governor was assassinated, the men of war, with Johanan, son of Kareah, at their head, resolved to flee to Egypt to escape the dreaded vengeance of the Chaldæans. Jeremiah earnestly sought to dissuade them from their purpose, but in vain, and he and Baruch were carried down with them. It was the last and the bitterest cup he had to drink. Failure was written over his life. He had preached repentance to his people, and they would not repent. He counselled submission to Babylon, and they refused to submit. He besought them to abide in the land, and become the seed of a new nation serving the Lord, and they answered by dragging him with them to Egypt. Over the people and their history, and over his hopes, the inscription might be read, 'A full end.' Nothing is known of the manner of his death, though a tradition says that he died at the hands of his own people.

Like many of the world's greatest children, Jeremiah was little esteemed in his life, but when dead his spirit breathed out upon men, and they felt its beauty and greatness. The oppressed people saw for ages in his sufferings a type of itself, and drew from his constancy courage to endure and be true. Imagery from the scenes of his life and echoes of his words fill many of the psalms, the authors of which were like him in his sorrows, and strove to be like him in his faith. From being of no account as a prophet he came to be considered the greatest of them all, and was spoken of as 'the prophet' (cf. Mt 16^{14}, Jn 1^{21} 6^{14} 7^{40}); and it was told of him how in after-days he appeared in visions to those contending for the faith like an angel from heaven strengthening them (2 Mac $15^{13ff.}$).

ii. THE BOOK OF JEREMIAH.—In ch. 36 it is stated that in the 4th year of Jehoiakim (605–4), no doubt after the battle of Carchemish in which Egypt was defeated by Nebuchadnezzar, Jeremiah was commanded to write all the words which J" had spoken to him against Israel and Judah and all the nations from the 13th year of Josiah till that time. He dictated his prophecies to Baruch, who read the roll next year in the temple in the hearing of the people assembled from all parts of the country at a fast. This roll was brought to Jehoiakim, who cut it in pieces and threw it into the grate. Jeremiah dictated the contents of the roll anew to Baruch, and added many like words (or, 'as many words more'). The added words might consist in some measure of new oracles, but in the main would be a fuller recapitulation of former prophecies. Now (1) it is natural to suppose that this second roll forms the earlier part of our present book, though how far into the book it extends is difficult to say. It was, however, only one of the elements out of which the present book was compiled, and it is not certain how far the compiler or redactor of the book maintained the original order of the roll. Some passages may have been transferred in order to unite them with later passages of a similar nature, e.g. $22^{10\text{-}12.\ 13ff.}$ with $22^{24ff.}$. Some parts of ch. 25 certainly belonged to the first roll ($25^{9.\ 10}$ with 36^{29}) and also to the second; the passage, however, was removed from its original place (possibly to form an introduction to a series of prophecies against the nations), and is now redactional and greatly glossed. (2) Baruch's statement, that he wrote from the prophet's mouth, need not absolutely exclude the use of some written notes by Jeremiah, though the command to 'write' his prophecies seems to imply that nothing had hitherto been published. Being dictated mainly from memory, prophecies extending over three and twenty years cannot have been reproduced exactly as they were spoken. It was the purpose of the prophet to preserve and lay before the people a compend of his ideas and teaching, his judgment upon the past history of the people and on their present condition, and his convictions regarding the inevitable issues in the future, without much regard to the circumstances in which the ideas had been originally expressed. Hence these early chapters are fragmentary and without connexion; passages in the same chapter may belong to different situations. The headings and dates are editorial, or at least secondary, and were not contained in Baruch's roll. This is evident from the indefiniteness of some of them, e.g. 3^{6} 'in the days of Josiah,' and from the similarity of those in the earlier to those in the later part of the book (cf. the identical forms, 7^{1} 34^{1} 35^{1} 40^{1} 44^{1} and 14^{1} with 46^{1} 47^{1} 49^{34}). Being dictated more than 20 years after they were spoken, the earliest passages may to some extent be coloured by later reflection. On the other hand, as it was the prophet's purpose to give a compend of the principles of his teaching, the fact that some sententious passages stand isolated, e.g. $9^{23.\ 24}$ $16^{19ff.}$ $17^{5ff.}$ $17^{12ff.}$, is no evidence that they are not original. (3) The parts of the book belonging to a date subsequent to the 5th year of Jehoiakim are very confused, and the order in which they stand is in many cases inexplicable. There are passages, e.g. chs. 24. 27, which seem to come from the prophet's own hand, but most of his sayings after this time are enclosed in historical settings. These historical elements are not from the prophet's own hand, though from whose hand they come is uncertain. Naturally, there is no absolute guarantee that the prophet's words enclosed in the historical frames are exact reproductions of the language used by him. Of course Jeremiah may have preserved jottings, or some contemporary, such as Baruch, may have done so, and these may have been at the compiler's disposal; or, in some cases the prophet's words may already have been set in the historical frame when they came into the compiler's hand; and in other instances, as it was obviously his intention to give as complete a biography of Jeremiah as possible, he may have relied on those who were contemporaries of the prophet and preserved in their memories both the scenes and the words spoken by him. There would be a number of such persons alive in the second half of the exile. At all events the histories are well informed and trustworthy, though some obscurities may suggest that they were not written till some time after the events which they describe (26^{8} with 26^{16}), and that they are not all from the same hand ($39^{14ff.}$ with $40^{1ff.}$). In some cases where the narrative begins by speaking of 'Jeremiah the prophet,' and then introduces him speaking directly, there may be room for supposing that the narrator dramatizes the information at his command. The passage $42^{7\text{-}22}$, both on account of its rather debased style and its other peculiarities, is probably a free construction from the hand of the historian; and in some other passages the accumulation of phrases characteristic of the prophet is in excess of what would be natural from himself, and suggests the work of a compiler very familiar with his peculiarities. Though it is impossible to say when or by whom the histories were composed, or do more than hazard very precarious conjectures in explanation of the place occupied by some of them in the book (e.g. 26. 36. 35), it is generally clear to what situations in the prophet's life they refer and what oracles they illustrate, and thus when they are disposed in their proper places the book may be read with a certain consecutiveness.

1. The reign of Josiah.—To Josiah's reign belong chs. 1–6, mainly to the time before his Reform. The date 1^{2} belongs to ch. 1; 1^{3} is a later insertion, meant probably to apply to the whole book (2 K 25^{8}). Chs. 2–6 are a compend of many oracles, but may be considered as two discourses, 2^{1}–4^{4} and 4^{5}–6^{30}, the first giving the prophet's verdict on the people's history from the beginning, and the second announcing the inevitable issue of such a history. $3^{6ff.}$, where Judah is contrasted with Israel, is rightly assigned to the reign of Josiah, for the idea that such a contrast could be of the date of chs. 30. 31 (Ew., Kuen.) is altogether improbable. $3^{14\text{-}18}$ appear to be later than $3^{6\text{-}13}$; certainly vv.$^{17.\ 18}$ are so, for v.^{18} implies the exile of Judah. But the reference to Zion while Judah was still there (v.^{14}) is unnatural, and mention of the 'ark' when Israel is spoken to is without meaning, and suggests that ark and temple were no more. The question whether $3^{19ff.}$ be the secution of $3^{1\text{-}5}$ or of $3^{6\text{-}13}$ is difficult. Formally, either connexion is suitable. $3^{1\text{-}5}$ seems the continuation of ch. 2 and refers to 'Israel' as a whole, though Judah may be alluded to in v.$^{4f.}$; but Judah does not seem spoken of under the name 'Israel,' except when the general idea of the whole family is in the prophet's mind. If $3^{19ff.}$ follow $3^{1\text{-}5}$, the passage continues as in ch. 2 to refer to the whole family of Israel. Some things are in favour of this, e.g. the gracious design of God, v.^{19}, most naturally refers to the whole family; the designation 'the lovely land' more probably describes Canaan as a whole than either half of it; and $4^{1.\ 2}$, if original, recall the promises made to Israel in its unity. On the other hand, 'children of Israel' (v.^{21}) rather suggests Israel of the north, and $4^{3.\ 4}$, which have no connexion with $4^{5ff.}$, might be the natural conclusion to $3^{1\text{-}5}$. At all events $3^{19ff.}$ are not spoken of Judah alone, but refer either to Israel as a whole or to Israel of the north, continuing $3^{6\text{-}13}$. The words 'her sister,' vv.$^{7.\ 8.\ 10}$, are wanting in LXX, cf. Ezk 23^{11}. $17^{19\text{-}27}$ on the Sabbath, which might be after the Reform, are usually considered a later insertion.

2. The reign of Jehoiakim.—(1.) In ch. 7 Jeremiah threatens the temple with the fate of Shiloh. The historical commentary ch. 26, itself of later date, refers the discourse to the beginning of Jehoiakim's reign. Indeed it might naturally be placed immediately after the death of Josiah. The people's trust in the temple, which occasioned Jeremiah's threat, implies a feeling of danger, but the danger was over when Jehoiakim was raised by Necho to the throne. Neither is there any allusion to the king in ch. 26, it is the priests who arraign Jeremiah. The story of Uriah ($26^{20ff.}$) is an addition to illustrate the danger of Jeremiah; the incident itself may have been later, though early in the reign of Jehoiakim, for only when Egypt and Israel were friendly would extradition of the prophet have been granted. (2.) The brief oracle on Jehoahaz (Shallum) and Josiah, $22^{10\text{-}12}$, is of the same period. (3.) 7^{29}–8^{3} is an oracle against Tophet. Ch. 19 probably supplies the historical situation. The incidents, though before the 4th year of Jehoiakim, are later than $7^{1\text{-}28}$. (4.) Chs. 7–10 as a whole (apart from $10^{1\text{-}16}$) appear to belong to the same period, though there is much that is obscure in them.

The presentiment of a foe from the north (8^{16} $10^{17\text{-}22}$), the vision of an invasion and siege ($8^{14\text{ff.}}$), the agitation of the prophet at the prospect of the approaching calamity ($8^{18\text{ff.}}$), and his call to the mourning women to prepare a lamentation ($9^{17\text{ff.}}$), are strange in the early years of Jehoiakim, and recall the situation in chs. 5. 6. Hence some scholars have assigned chs. 7–10 to Josiah's reign; but parts, e.g. $7^{1\text{ff.}}$, are certainly later. The whole at any rate appears earlier than the 4th year of Jehoiakim, for after this Jeremiah always names 'the king of Babylon.' (5.) 11^{1}–12^{6} also appear to be of this period. $11^{1\text{-}8}$ are very obscure. Vv.$^{9\text{-}17}$, charging Judah with 'conspiracy,' that is, defection from the Covenant, belong to the time of Jehoiakim, and the commands in vv.$^{6\text{-}8}$ are referred by Giesebrecht to the same period, though they have usually been thought to refer to Dt and Josiah's Reform. The plot of the people of Anathoth against Jeremiah's life (11^{18}–12^{6}) would hardly be occasioned by his action in connexion with Josiah's Reform, but be owing to his charge of 'conspiracy' at a later time. His complaints $12^{1\text{-}6}$ also suggest this period of his history. (6.) Chs. 18–20. Ch. 18 appears now connected with the historical passage 19^{1}–20^{6}. Ch. 18 teaches that God's dealing with men is moral, that He treats them as their moral conduct permits Him to do; it is only a secondary inference from this that prophecy is conditional, threats and promises being alike revocable according to men's actions. If ch. 19 gave the situation of 7^{29}–8^{3}, ch. 18 might belong to about the same time. On account of the speech in Tophet, repeated in the temple ($19^{14\text{ff.}}$), Pashhur put Jeremiah for a night in the stocks. If Jeremiah's inability to go to the temple (36^{5}) were due to Pashhur's action, the incidents and oracles 18^{1}–20^{18} would belong to the eve of the 4th year of Jehoiakim, though the narrative was not written till later. In $20^{1\text{ff.}}$, however, Pashhur is threatened with deportation to Babylon, and it would be necessary to assume (Kuen.) that the later narrator had reported Jeremiah's words somewhat generally. (7.) There is little in chs. 14–15, referring to a drought, or in 16^{1}–17^{18} to suggest a date, whether before or after the 4th year of Jehoiakim. Such passages as 15^{10} might suggest that the prophet was free to go about among the people, before he had to go into hiding for fear of arrest (36^{26}), and $16^{1\text{ff.}}$ might seem to reflect an early rather than a late date in his life. The idea that 17^{11} refers to Jehoiakim, and $17^{5\text{-}10}$ to his premeditated revolt (Kuen.), seems far-fetched. ($15^{11\text{-}14}$ appear to refer to the people, and are misplaced; $16^{14.15}$ though in LXX is an obvious insertion). (8.) According to ch. 36, Baruch wrote a second roll in the 5th year of Jehoiakim containing additions. This roll would thus include chs. 1–6, 7–10 (except $10^{1\text{-}16}$), 11^{1}–12^{6}, probably 14–15, 16^{1}–17^{18} ($22^{10\text{ff.}}$? $22^{13\text{ff.}}$?), the genuine portions of 25, and probably 45, the short promise to Baruch. Whether 18 and $20^{7\text{ff.}}$ also stood in the roll may be uncertain, as the passages are now enclosed in a historical setting of a later date. (9.) To a later time in the reign of Jehoiakim belong $12^{7\text{-}17}$, which appear to reflect the situation after his revolt (2 K $24^{1\text{ff.}}$). Ch. 35 also narrates an incident in connexion with the Rechabites probably of the same time. (10.) Ch. 13, describing a symbolical action with Jeremiah's girdle, is usually assigned to the short reign of Jehoiachin, on account of the allusion to him and his mother in v.$^{18\text{f.}}$. There is nothing in the other parts of the chapter to suggest this situation; but if Perath (v.^{4}) be the Euphrates, the date would in any case be later than the 4th year of Jehoiakim and Carchemish.

3. Reign of Zedekiah (597–586).—(1.) To the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah belongs ch. 24, the vision of the two baskets of figs, the good representing the exiles of 597, the bad the people left at home. (2.) Chs. 21–23 contain a collection of fragments belonging to very different dates on the leading classes in Judah, the kings 21^{11}–23^{8}, and the prophets $23^{9\text{-}40}$. Whether some of these fragments stood in the original roll may be uncertain; the present collection cannot have been made before the time of Zedekiah ($22^{24\text{ff.}}$), probably not before the Exile ($23^{33\text{ff.}}$). (3.) To the 4th year of Zedekiah (28^{1}) belong chs. 27–29 (27^{1} is a mistaken gloss, wanting in LXX), containing the prophet's opposition to the projected confederacy against Babylon (27), his conflict with Hananiah over the duration of the Exile (28), and his letter to the exiles (29). These three chapters have certain peculiarities in common: (1) The LXX text is shorter, particularly in 27; (2) certain differences of spelling appear, e.g. Yirmeyah for Yirmeyahu, and so in similar names, and Nebuchad*n*ezzar (for -rezzar). The peculiarities (2) are lost in Gr.; in LXX the name Nebuch. occurs only once (27^{6}). In explanation of these peculiarities it has been suggested that chs. 27–29 may have circulated separately and been glossed; but as LXX shows that the glosses were introduced after the redaction of the book, it must also be supposed that at a late date the genuine text was collated with one of these glossed rolls of 27–29, and supplemented from it,—an intricate hypothesis. The rest of the book (except 46–51) belongs to the time of the siege and later. (4.) $21^{1\text{-}10}$ the prophet's reply to the message of Zedekiah at the beginning of the siege. The passage has been united to $21^{11\text{ff.}}$, the common subject being the kings of Judah. (5.) Ch. 37, containing Jeremiah's reply to another message from Zedekiah, is later, belonging to the time when the siege was raised by the appearance of the Egyptians. Ch. 34, relating to the manumission of bondservants and their reduction to slavery again, is of the same date. When the siege was raised Jeremiah attempted to go to Anathoth, but was arrested and flung into a dungeon ($37^{15\text{ff.}}$). Zedekiah released him, and placed him in the court of the guard, where he remained till the city fell (38^{28}). In this place it appears he could speak to the people ($38^{1\text{ff.}}$), and persons from the outside had access to him (ch. 32). On account of his disheartening speeches to the people and soldiery, the officers had him let down into a cistern, from which he was liberated by Ebed-melech (ch. 38), who receives the promise $39^{15\text{ff.}}$. To the time after his rescue by Ebed-melech belongs his interview with Zedekiah $38^{14\text{ff.}}$*; but whether the incident of the purchase of the field at Anathoth (ch. 32) took place before or after his rescue is uncertain. To the time of his detention in the court of the guard belongs ch. 33, somewhat later than 32 ('the second time' 33^{1}), and probably chs. 30. 31, referring to the Restoration of Judah and Israel. $33^{14\text{-}26}$ are not yet in LXX, and undoubtedly the chapters are otherwise greatly glossed, though much in ch. 31 is original. Possibly the chs. 30–33 formed a separate collection (30^{2}), and the subject was one that invited expansion. Usually Jeremiah employs the terms 'Israel,' 'Ephraim' (twice house of Jacob 24^{5} 52^{0}); it is only in these chapters that the simple name 'Jacob' occurs ($30^{7.10.18}$ $31^{7.11}$ 33^{26}), for 10^{16} (51^{19}) is not original, and 10^{25} is doubtful. The phrase 'my servant Jacob' $30^{10.11}$ (=$46^{27.28}$) and much else reflects the language and ideas of Is 40 ff. (6.) 38^{28b} (RV) $39^{3.14}$–44 narrate the events subsequent to the fall of the city, and the history of Jeremiah in Egypt ($39^{1.2}$ seem out of place, and vv.$^{4\text{-}13}$ are wanting in LXX).

(7.) Chs. 46–51, prophecies against the nations. There are three questions connected with these prophecies: (1) their genuineness in whole (Driver, and in the main Kuen.), or in part (Gies., Corn.), or not at all (Stade, Wellh., Smend, Schwally); (2) the time in the prophet's life to which they belong if genuine or partially so; and (3) their original position in the book. (1) Chs. 50. 51 (apart from $51^{59\text{ff.}}$) are almost universally recognized to be of a later date than Jeremiah, and by another writer. With regard to 46–49 it may be urged in favour of their genuineness, in whole or in part, (a) that Jeremiah was conscious of being a prophet to the nations ($1^{5.10}$ $18^{9\text{ff.}}$ $27^{2\text{ff.}}$); and (b) that he is commanded to write his prophecies 'against all the nations' (36^{2}). It is doubtful, however, if such language as 36^{2} implies the existence of prophecies formally devoted to particular nations: it might be satisfied by such passages as 1–6 $9^{24\text{f.}}$ $12^{14\text{-}17}$, and particularly by $25^{9\text{ff.}}$, and the enumeration (so far as original) of nations in $25^{15\text{-}26}$. Jeremiah's own statement regarding former prophets, that they prophesied against many countries and against great kingdoms (28^{8}), forbids us to press the words of 36^{2}. If a genuine nucleus existed in 46–49 this would explain the later amplification, and how though amplified the prophecies continued to be ascribed to Jeremiah. On the other hand, the figure of giving the nations to drink of the fury of J", and the enumeration of peoples in $25^{15\text{ff.}}$, might have suggested to some writer or writers the composition of the prophecies to give body to the idea of Jeremiah (cf. the relation of $51^{59\text{ff.}}$ to chs. 50. 51). Such lengthy oracles against peoples which, with the exception of Egypt, had no significance to Jeremiah or to the time, are little probable from him. Ch. $46^{1\text{-}12}$ is later than Carchemish, but such an exercise on a past event is scarcely to be expected from Jeremiah. $46^{13\text{-}28}$ might be a prophecy by Jeremiah in Egypt, though, of course, also it might be an expansion by another writer of some of his incidental threats against that country ($43^{10\text{ff.}}$); v.^{26b} reminds of Ezk, and vv.$^{27.28}$ are a repetition of $30^{10.11}$. It is wholly improbable that Jeremiah should have excerpted Is 15. 16, as has been done in the prophecy on Moab ($48^{29\text{-}38}$), and equally incredible that he should have copied Obadiah, or, as the case may be, a prophecy which is the basis of Obadiah, as has been done in the prophecy on Edom ($49^{7\text{ff.}}$). If Is 15. 16 were brought down in their present form to the post-exilic time (Duhm), the problem in regard to them would perhaps be the same as that in regard to Obadiah; but such a date has not been established. And it may be said in general that the current impression that Jeremiah is accustomed to cite or use his predecessors has little evidence in its favour. A nucleus of genuine elements in 46–49 is probably the most that can be assumed; whether the expansions be due to one hand or several may be difficult to say. Some peculiarities are common to the chs., e.g. הָמְגָה intrans. or with obj. unexpressed, $46^{5.21}$ (parallel to נוּס), 47^{3}, 48^{39} (obj. expressed), 49^{24} (parallel to נוּס), cf. 49^{8}, but see particularly Nah 2^{9}; the phrase חֶרֶב יְיָ֫נָה 46^{16} 50^{16}, cf. 25^{38} (so read). The purpose of the words, 'Here endeth the judgment of Moab' 48^{47} is obscure, cf. 51^{64} (both passages are wanting in LXX). It is curious that all the promises to the nations of restitution (46^{26} 48^{47} $49^{6.39}$) are wanting in LXX. (2) The date of the foreign prophecies, if genuine, would be after Carchemish; whether any parts of them stood in Baruch's roll cannot be ascertained. The prophecy on Elam is assigned to the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah (49^{34}). (3) On the original place of chs. 46–49 in the book see next section (iii.). (8.) Finally, ch. 52 is a historical extract, identical with 2 K 24^{18}–25^{30}, with the omission of 2 K $25^{22\text{-}26}$. Ch. $52^{28\text{-}30}$ are not yet in LXX.†

iii. Hebrew and Greek Texts.—The differences between the Heb. and Gr. texts are greater in the Book of Jer than they are in any other book, even Job. (1) The Gr. text is much shorter than the Heb.—according to the calculation of

* Unless the reference to the 'house of Jonathan' (38^{26}) might imply that the interview took place after his first deliverance from the dungeon ($37^{18\text{-}21}$).

Graf by about 2700 words, or one-eighth of the book. (2) In Heb. the prophecies against the nations stand at the end of the book (chs. 46–51), in the Gr. they are inserted between 25^{13} and 25^{15} (v.^{14} being wanting), and they are given in a different order from the Hebrew. Much in (1) was due to the Heb. MS on which the translator worked, which differed materially from our present Massoretic text. The difference (2) must be spoken of with less certainty: the place given to the prophecies against the nations may have been suggested by the translator's interpretation of 25^{13}, and the order in which they stand may reflect something of the political situation of the time. But (3) a multitude of differences have arisen through the defective work of the translator himself, who was anything but equal to his task. The differences between the two texts were formerly explained by the hypothesis of two recensions—a shorter one, probably from the hand of Jeremiah himself, which circulated in Egypt; and a longer one, the work of Baruch or others, which became the basis of the MT. But the general identity of the two texts, and the fact that some of the latest elements of the book are found in LXX, show that such a hypothesis is both unnecessary and false. Both texts reflect the same archetype; but this archetype underwent a gradual process of expansion, and the process is reflected at an earlier stage (not necessarily an earlier date) in the MS or MSS at the basis of LXX, and at a more advanced stage in those at the basis of the MT.

(1) Comparative value of the texts.—In estimating the relative value of the Heb. and Gr. texts, one must compare them, first, in those parts of the book present in both texts; secondly, in regard to those parts present in Heb. but wanting in Gr.; comparison in regard to a third class of passages, those present in Gr. but wanting in Heb., though it might be interesting, is of less importance. That is, the comparative estimate must be in regard both to quality and quantity. Speaking generally, the MT is qualitatively greatly superior to the Gr.; but, on the other hand, quantitatively the Gr. is nearer the original text. This judgment is general, admitting many exceptions,—that is, cases where the quality of the Gr. text is better, and its readings more original than the Heb., e.g. 2^{20} 4^{28} 11^{15} 16^{7} 23^{33} 41^{9} 46^{22}, and many more; and also cases where, in regard to quantity, Heb. is to be preferred, the omissions in LXX being due to faults in the translator's MS, to his own oversight, or to his tendency to scamp and abridge. Every individual case of difference must be examined before a judgment can be pronounced. In regard to such large passages as 33^{14-26} 39^{4-13}, and even many minor ones, e.g. in chs. 25. 27–29, judgment will readily be given in favour of LXX, in which they are wanting; but there is a multitude of other cases in which a decision is difficult. Of the four synonyms for 'destroy' 1^{10}, LXX has only three; and again in 18^{7}, where three of the synonyms occur, LXX has only two. The exclamation, 'temple of the Lord' 7^{4}, stands in Heb. thrice, in LXX twice; so 'O earth' 22^{29}, only twice in LXX. The words 'of hosts' in the divine name are said to be wanting 56 times (2^{19} 6^{8} etc.), the parenthetical 'saith the Lord' 64 times, and in 'Jeremiah the prophet' the title prophet is usually absent. Now, when it is considered that LXX shows an undoubted tendency to abridgment, while the ideal of later Heb. style was fulness and roundness of phraseology, the two considerations puzzle the judgment and hold it in suspense. The title the prophet is probably in many cases a Heb. addition, the want of the synonym a Gr. abbreviation. It would not be just to charge the LXX translator with arbitrary omission on a large scale. There are over 30 passages which are repeated in the book (some twice), and LXX contains all the repetitions with the exception of 7, and these 7, it is safe to say, were not in the translator's MS. (For list of repeated passages see Driver, p. 276 f.; Kuen. § 58^{11}; and for those wanting in LXX, Kuen. § 58^{12}).

(2) Original place of chs. 46 ff.—It is quite evident that prophecies of the compass of chs. 46–49 as they now exist could not have been contained in Baruch's roll. If only a genuine nucleus of them existed they might have followed ch. 25 in its original form and position, though the amplification of them would be more intelligible if they had existed in a separate form. If the prophecies were extant in their present compass when the book was redacted, we might suppose that, according to the analogy of Is and Ezk, they would be placed in the middle of the book after ch. 25. And this would have been their natural place, following the symbol in $25^{15ff.}$ and the enumeration of nations in 25^{18-26}, the nations named being in the main those to which the prophecies refer. The supposition that this was the original place of 46–49 is at least plausible, if nothing more. When the extensive passage chs. 50. 51 was introduced into the book at a later time, chs. 46 ff. were connected with it and transferred to the end of the book. The place of chs. 46–51 in LXX between 25^{13} and 25^{15} is quite unnatural, for the chapters should certainly have followed and not preceded the enumeration of nations in 25^{15-26} to which they refer. It is probable that 46–51 occupied a place at the end of the book, as in Heb., even in the MS used by the LXX translator. Simultaneously with the reception of chs. 50. 51 or in consequence of it, various glosses were introduced, e.g. 25^{12b-14}, or at least v.$^{12ff.}$ (50^{1b}; cf. 51^{60b}). In 25^{13} 'even all that is written in this book, which Jeremiah prophesied against all the nations,' LXX translator took the last clause to be independent, rendering, That which Jeremiah prophesied against the nations. The words thus became a title, and chs. 46 ff. were transferred from their former place and made to follow it. Neither is the order of the prophecies in LXX original; the order in Heb. corresponds in the main to that of the nations enumerated in 25^{15-26}, and has all the marks of originality.

The translator from Heb. had many difficulties to contend with: the text had no vowels; the letters do not appear to have been divided (in all cases at least) into words; the vowel letters were sparsely written, and thus the plur. and sing. forms of the verb were identical; MSS were badly written, similar letters like d and r being often confused; there were contractions liable to be misunderstood; Heb. was a dead language, the living Shemitic tongue being Aramaic; and much else. The translator of Jer shows the usual faults of the Gr. version in an aggravated form. (a) He divides words wrongly (5^{6} 8^{18} 9^{5} 20^{9} 22^{20} 31^{8} 46^{15}). (b) He vocalizes wrongly ($2^{23.\ 34}$ 3^{1} 10^{20} 31^{13}). (c) When letters like d and r are confused in his MS, he has not sufficient knowledge to perceive the error (2^{16} 3^{15} 15^{12} 31^{5} 49^{22}). (d) He renders proper names as appellatives and vice versâ, 8^{7} 21^{13} 31^{21} $46^{16.\ 25}$ $49^{13.\ 28.\ 30}$ 51^{27} (46^{16} 50^{16} חֶרֶב, חַיְלָה, μάχαιρα ἑλληνική). (e) His knowledge of the language is very deficient: an archaic suffix puzzles him (בְּלָה is read בָּלָה 8^{6} 15^{10} 20^{7}); much in the Heb. vocabulary is unfamiliar to him (קְנוֹר מְקֻבִּיב is rendered differently each time that it occurs, and generally referred to the root gûr, 'to sojourn'); and in syntax he supposes an adj. may stand before its noun (22^{30} 46^{15}?). (f) He makes arbitrary changes in person and number to a greater extent than usual in LXX (23^{0} $3^{18.\ 20}$ 4^{17} 6^{7} 7^{28} 8^{18} etc.). (g) He is loose and hasty and without a sense of responsibility, often thinking it enough to give an average or approximate rendering of the original ($7^{1ff.}$). If he has wrongly put a sense on a word which will not harmonize with the rest of the verse he modifies the other words, or, if they be wholly intractable, omits them (2^{16} $4^{11.\ 12}$ 5^{26} 8^{18}). In 29^{25-29} the sense is entirely missed. (h) It is scarcely due to purpose, but rather to his easy-going style of operation, that when a passage is repeated verbatim, his rendering of it in the second instance differs much from that in the first. (i) He shares the curious fancy of LXX translators for rendering by a word similar in sound to the Heb. (95 תֹּךְ בְּתוֹךְ (sic) τόκος ἐπὶ τόκῳ, 31[21] תמרורים τιμωρίαν (48[31]? 51[27]?). Whether in 46[15] חָרַף (נִסְחָף) was rendered Ἄπις is rather uncertain).

iv. REDACTION OF THE BOOK.—In the absence of all direct information, anything better than a more or less plausible hypothesis concerning the redaction of the book is not attainable. Perhaps three stages in its history can be traced. (1) The second roll of Baruch, belonging to the 5th year of Jehoiakim. There is every reason to suppose that this roll has in the main been preserved in the early part of the book. The contents of the roll were chs. 1–6. 7–10 (except 10[1-16]), 11[1]–12[6], probably 14. 15. 16[1]–17[18], 25 in its original form, possibly 45; whether 18. 20[7ff.] belonged to the roll may be uncertain; and the same must be said of 22[10ff.] and of any parts of 46–49 that may be supposed genuine. The roll, however, was in some cases broken up, and some parts certainly belonging to it (ch. 25) are now found after elements of a much later date, while elements of a later date appear inserted before or among parts belonging to it (12[7ff.]). The roll was only one of the elements used in the redaction of the book, and it was not regarded as inviolable. We should hardly be right if we regarded our present book as a growth, the roll being the fundamental writing to which other prophecies were added as they successively came into existence, or if we supposed a series of successive redactions (Kautzsch, Abriss, p. 75; cf. Driver, p. 270). The present order of the contents of the book forbids such suppositions, e.g. 21[11]–23[8] as a collection is later than the fall of the city, while ch. 24 is of the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah; chs. 30–33 as a collection also belongs to the Exile, while ch. 35 is of the reign of Jehoiakim. Such a shuffling of the contents, supposing them to have had originally a historical order, is quite improbable.

(2) The second stage was the actual redaction of the book. At some time, possibly not a great many years after the prophet's death, some person or persons undertook the work of gathering together all the fragments of his oracles and furnishing as complete a biography of him as possible. The biographical interest was perhaps the predominant one. All the available materials, the original roll and other existing sources, were used, and probably the compiler himself, either from his own knowledge or by inquiry, was able also to make considerable contributions. But how much belongs to sources ready to the compiler's hand, and how much is due to himself, it is impossible to discover. As has been already said, Jeremiah may have preserved jottings of his speeches, or some contemporary such as Baruch may have done so, and these may have lain before the editor; or, in a number of cases the prophet's words may already have been set in a historical frame when they came into the compiler's hand. There appears to be something like collections in the book, e.g. chs. 18–20. 21–23. 27–29. 30–33, and the like, and some of these may have arisen at the hands of different persons during the Exile. There is nothing more likely than that a number of the historical passages, with the prophet's words enclosed in them, may be from the hand of Baruch, who continued with the prophet after the fall of the city and accompanied him to Egypt. But some of the narratives are probably due to other persons and some to the compiler. The various headings are from the hand of the compiler, but the inference from the identity of the heading in chs. 34. 35. 40. 44, that these historical passages are also the work of the compiler (Kuen.), is scarcely cogent, for the same heading has been given to chs. 7 ff., which the compiler certainly did not write. From the promiscuous way in which such historical narratives as chs. 26. 36. 35 have been placed in the book, it may perhaps be inferred that these passages came as distinct and complete compositions into the redactor's hand. However much in the book may be due to Baruch, everything shows that he was not the editor. The date of the redaction cannot be strictly fixed. The reverence manifested for the prophet is no criterion of date, for this reverence, beginning after his death, continued to increase. Kuenen has suggested the second half of the Exile. The passage 2 K 25[23-26] appears to be dependent on the fuller narrative, Jer 40[7ff.], and this fact would imply that the Book of Jer was in existence before the Book of Kings was closed, about the end of the Exile (on the other hand, 39[1b. 2. 4-13] taken from 2 K 25 is a later interpolation). There is perhaps nothing in the Book of Jer which necessitates a later date, such passages as 10[1-16] and chs. 50. 51 having been introduced into the book after its redaction. There is no doubt much in chs. 46–49 that might be of the post-exilic period. The complexion of chs. 30–33 might also imply a lower date than the Exile, but the want of 33[14-26] in LXX shows that the amplification of these chs. went on after the book had been compiled. The redaction took place in Babylon or Palestine, not in Egypt.

(3) This Book of Jer thus edited is the archetype both of the Heb. and Greek. But this book underwent modifications, some passages being added and some amplifications of the text being introduced. This process of enlargement forms the third stage in the history of the book. (a) Some additions and insertions penetrated into all the MSS, e.g. chs. 50. 51. 52, 10[1-16] (except vv.[6-8. 10]), 16[14. 15] 17[19-27], and much more. (b) From others the MSS at the basis of LXX remained free, e.g. 33[14-26] 39[4-13], and much else, particularly in chs. 25. 27–29. This latter fact does not imply with certainty that all the additions in MT are later than LXX translation, because contemporary MSS may have had different histories even in the same country (treatment of MSS being so free), and particularly if circulating in different countries. The differences between the Heb. and Gr. might certainly be easier explained if we could suppose the MS or MSS on which LXX is founded carried early to Egypt. Egyptian Jews would probably occupy themselves less with the original text than those in Babylon or Palestine, and thus the MSS, even if transcribed, would more retain their primitive form. Amplifications of the text and interpolations really reflect the moods of religious life and hope, and this life was fuller in Palestine than in Egypt.

v. LITERARY STYLE. — The literary style of Jeremiah can scarcely be spoken of, because, strictly speaking, we have no literature from him. The narrative pieces in the book are not from his own hand; and even when fragments of his speeches are reported in these narratives, they have in many cases passed through the narrator's mind, and may have been somewhat modified. The presence of some or many characteristic phrases of Jeremiah in the reports is not proof of their literal fidelity. And in any case such reports are mere compends, in regard to which the question of style can hardly be raised. The only parts of the book on which a judgment in respect of style can be formed are the chapters dictated to Baruch, chs. 1–17, and any other passages which appear to come directly from Jeremiah's own hand. Even the dictated passages are mere outlines and skeletons; the prophet's object was to preserve and present to others the matter, the religious contents of his oracles,—he was little solicitous about the form. No doubt something of Jeremiah's literary manner will be reflected in these fragments, but they represent very inadequately what he was capable of as a writer. We have no literature from Jeremiah in the sense in which we have literature from Isaiah. The flowers of Jeremiah's diction and thought have reached us only after being cut and pressed; the bloom and fragrance yet remaining with them suggest faintly what they were when fresh. The monotonousness and repetition, both of ideas and language, of which writers complain, are owing in good degree to the fact that, in dictating his outline, it was the prophet's purpose to impress strongly certain great ideas, and the same ideas naturally carry with them the same language, though it will always remain a question how many of the repetitions are due to himself. The literary remains of Jeremiah differ from the writings of Isaiah in being formally less perfect: the poetical rhythm is not so regular, losing itself often in elevated prose. Yet even formally there is much true poetical parallelism, and there are many examples of the Ḳinah or Elegy, artistically beautiful and full of pathos, e.g. $9^{20.\ 21}$ $13^{18f.\ 20f.}$ $18^{14ff.}$ $22^{6ff.}$. The language of Jeremiah wants the condensed energy of that of the earlier prophets. He belonged to a later literary age, and the progress of language is always towards analysis, gaining in lucidity, but losing in compression. Much of the power of the earlier prophets arises from the fact that their age was a creative one, and they project their religious conceptions with an energy and completeness that can never again be imitated. Jeremiah is their heir, their principles already run in his blood, and what in them was intellectual power is transmuted in him into spiritual life. So far as style can be spoken of in Jeremiah, his style perfectly reflects all the articulations of thought and all the hues of emotion of his mind. He was a nature characterized by simplicity, reality, pathos, tenderness, and a strange piety, but subject to his emotions, which were liable to rise into passions. His mind was set on a minor key, and his temper elegiac. And to all this his language is true. Could sadness be expressed in sadder words than these, 'The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and we are not saved'? His phrases haunt the ear: 'Before your feet stumble on the dark mountains.' 'Is there no balm in Gilead?' 'A voice was heard in Ramah.' 'If thou hast run with the footmen and they have wearied thee.' 'Surely I have heard Ephraim bemoaning himself.' 'Return, ye backsliding children.' The quaint simplicity of his words to God provokes a smile: 'O Lord, wherefore are all they happy that deal very treacherously?' Usually his address is lofty and touching: 'O the hope of Israel, the saviour thereof in time of trouble, why shouldst thou be as a stranger in the land?' ($14^{8f.}$ 16^{19} $17^{12ff.}$). In sombre realism he has no match among the prophets; witness such terrible passages as $15^{1ff.}$ $4^{23ff.}$ (cf. the symbol $25^{15ff.}$, and such descriptions as $5^{15ff.}$ 9^{17-22}). He was sent to be the prophet of doom and death, and his soul revolted against the task. He gloats over life, its human activities ($32^{43ff.}$), its sounds and mirth and all its music (7^{34} 16^{9}); and he recoils from death, and shudders as he sees the shadow enter in at the windows, and feels the awful silence, when there is no sound of a mill and no shimmer of a candle. There is one peculiarity which gives a charm to his style, a certain unconscious dramatizing, when, after describing a situation, he makes those involved in it speak directly, without the word 'saying,' e.g. 2^{25} 3^{22} $4^{19.\ 31}$ $6^{4.\ 5.\ 24}$ 9^{11-18} 10^{19} 11^{19} $12^{4.\ 5}$ 14^{17} 15^{15} 17^{12}.

Jeremiah's language has some marks of the later style: words in -ûth are not infrequent, and he begins to Aramaize; cases occur of vav cop. with perf., and the hê of direction is otiose (113). Certain phrases and expressions are often repeated: e.g. to break the yoke and burst the bands (2^{20} 5^{5}); to turn the back and not the face (2^{27} 18^{17}); to receive correction (2^{30} 5^{3} 7^{28}); to come into mind (עלה על לב 3^{16} 7^{31} 19^{5}); the evil of your doings (4^{4} 21^{12} $23^{2.\ 22}$); great destruction (שֶׁבֶר 4^{6} 6^{1} 14^{17}); the refrain, shall I not visit for these things? etc. ($5^{9.\ 29}$ 9^{9}); heal the hurt slightly (6^{14} 8^{11}); the phrase, rising up early, and sending, speaking, etc. (חַשְׁכֵּם $7^{13.\ 25}$ 26^{5} 29^{19}); to incline the ear ($7^{24.\ 26}$ 11^{8} 17^{23}); the voice of mirth and gladness, etc. (7^{34} 16^{9} 25^{10}); at the time that I visit them (6^{15} 8^{12} 11^{23} 23^{12}); terror round about (6^{25} $20^{3.\ 10}$); over which my name has been called ($7^{10.\ 11.\ 14.\ 30}$); the sword, the famine, and the pestilence (with a variety of order, 14^{12} 15^{3} 21^{7}); and others. See Driver's full list, p. 275. It is doubtful if to make a full end (כָּלָה עשׂה) ought to be reckoned; it seems extraneous in 4^{27} $5^{10.\ 18}$ (30^{11}=46^{28}). Neither should the contorted syntax 14^{1} 46^{1} 47^{1} 49^{34} be ascribed to Jeremiah. Peculiar are חָסִיר used of God (31^{2}); נוֹאָשׁ hopeless! in the mouth of the people (2^{25} 18^{12}); קְצוּצֵי פֵּאָה shorn on the temples (9^{25} [Eng.^{26}] 25^{23}); יְנָאֲפוּ נָאֹם (23^{31}); חַלְלֵי יי slain of J" (25^{33}); the hiph. of חלם dream (29^{8}); the phrase הַפִּיל תְּחִנָּה present supplication (38^{26} 42^{9}, Qal 36^{7} 37^{20} 42^{2}, cf. Dn 9^{20}).

vi. Some Religious Ideas.—The Book of Jer does not so much teach religious truths as present a religious personality. Prophecy had already taught its truths, its last effort was to reveal itself in a life. But though the truths in Jeremiah are old, they all appear in him with an impress of personality which gives them novelty. He is not to be read for doctrines in their general form on God and the people, but for the nuances which his mind gives them. Though he might not be aware of it, we can perceive that all his thoughts are coloured by the religious relation to God of which he was himself conscious.

(1) Sin.—In his earliest time it is the sin of the people that occupies his mind, their unfaithfulness to J". They followed Him in the wilderness, but on entering Canaan they went far away from Him. Every class became untrue to the idea of its relation to Him. It is this change that seems inexplicable to the prophet. He sets it in all possible lights: 'What evil did your fathers find in me?' (2^{5}). He contrasts the fidelity of the nations to their gods, which yet are no gods (2^{11}). At a later time he contrasts the fidelity of men even to the injunctions of their ancestor, such as the Rechabites (35^{14}). The instinct which guides the migrations of the stork is strangely unerring; the instinct of man's heart, which should direct it to God, as strangely errs (8^{7}, cf. 2^{32} $18^{13ff.}$). We understand Jeremiah's wonder at the change only when we hear him say what to his mind God is: 'They have forsaken the fountain of living water.' Isaiah crushed himself and crushed created man to the ground with his awful Ḳadosh; his word was true, but Jeremiah's 'the fountain of living water' seems to come nearer the fulness of truth. The words at any rate suggest the immediateness of the relation of man to God in religion. And it is this that Jeremiah insists upon, as Hosea and Isaiah had done before him. His charge is the unreality of men's religion; it is not with their real selves that they serve J", and it is not J" in His true being that they serve. Already in Josiah's days Jeremiah perceived how illusory his Reform was. Indeed it was doubtful if it had not made the condition of things worse. Men thought that when they worshipped at Jerusalem, and multiplied offerings there, they had done what J" desired. It was a lie which was half a truth, and therefore the harder to fight. It is not certain that Jeremiah thought the lawbook altogether a good. People prided themselves on it, it was wisdom to have it;

they thought the possession of it put them right with God (8[8. 9]). Pharisaism and Deuteronomy came into the world the same day. The lawbook little satisfied the prophetic idealism. Jeremiah seeks to draw men's minds away from all that was external—sacrifices, temple, ark, and lawbook—to that which was inward and real. People spoke much of reform; he would have used another word: 'Break up the fallow ground, and sow not among thorns'; 'Circumcise yourselves to the Lord, and take away the foreskins of your heart' (4[4]); 'O Jerusalem, wash thine heart from wickedness' (4[14]). Sin is 'the stubbornness of the evil heart' (7[24] 5[23]). It is the heart that is good or ill. Man is the heart of man. Jeremiah probably has no general doctrine of human nature or its condition, though he perhaps expresses what is technically called habit when he says, 'The heart is deceitful above all things, and it is desperately sick; who can know it?' (17[9]). If not from nature, by practice men become incapable of good: 'Can the Ethiopian change his skin? then may ye also do good that are inured to do evil' (13[23], cf. 7[28] 8[4ff.]). Momentarily awoke by the prophet's appeals, the people become conscious of their inability, exclaiming, 'It is hopeless' (2[25] 18[12]). And more generally, 'It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps' (10[23]). Sin is individually universal; a man cannot be found in the streets of Jerusalem (5[1], cf. 8[6. 10]). No providences in God's hand can reform them; the furnace will not purify them; they have been tried, and they are found reprobate silver (6[27ff.]). Only the creative hand of God can change them; He will give them another heart, and put His law in their inward parts (24[7] 31[31ff.]). Though Jeremiah, like Hosea, begins by considering the people as a moral personality, and never loses hold of the idea of the nation (31[16. 28. 31-34]), his thoughts just referred to are virtually individualism.

(2) God.—In his doctrine of God Jeremiah agrees with his predecessors, but with a significant nuance of his own. J″ is God alone, the gods of the nations are no gods (2[11] 16[19ff.]), and the Gentiles shall yet confess it. J″ rules among the nations, giving them all to drink of the wine of His cup, and putting the world and all that dwell in it into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar (25[15ff.] 27[14ff.]). Like all later prophets, Jeremiah sees His power and Godhead manifested in nature: 'Are there any among the vanities of the heathen that can cause rain? or can the heavens give showers?' (14[22] 5[24]), particularly in that perpetual wonder the restraint of the raging sea (5[22]). These are external things. It is in that which He is to His people and His servants that J″ is truly revealed, e.g. in His gracious designs with Israel: 'I thought how I shall put thee among the children! ye shall call me my Father' (3[19]), and in the joy which His service brings: 'Thy words were found and I did eat them, they were the joy and rejoicing of mine heart' (15[16]). It is in the passages where Jeremiah intercedes for himself or the people that he realizes most fully what J″ is, 14[7ff. 19ff.] 17[12ff.], or when he gives a definition of what religion is: 'Let him that glorieth glory in this, that he knoweth me, that I am the Lord which exercise loving-kindness, judgment, and righteousness in the earth, for in these things I delight' (9[24]). But the conception of God receives a new shade in Jeremiah. His definition of man as the heart of man leads to a corresponding definition of God: J″ is He who trieth the heart and the reins (11[20] 17[10] 20[12]). This definition is just the reflexion of Jeremiah's own experience. He does not infer that J″ searches the heart from any general doctrine he holds of the divine omniscience; he reasons the other way: Because J″ tries the heart, He is omniscient, 'Can any hide himself in secret places that I shall not see him?' (23[23. 24]). Positively, Jeremiah expresses his idea of religion when he says, 'Blessed is the man that trusteth in the Lord, whose hope the Lord is' (17[5ff.]). The principle of religion is faith.

(3) The Future.—Jeremiah's first and continued conviction is that the nation is doomed to destruction. There is something inexplicable to us in this certainty. It might seem mediated by his profound sense of the national sin (4[14. 22ff.]), just as he was assured that his fellow prophets were false because of their ethical shallowness, and their healing the hurt of the people slightly (23[17] 28[8]). But then this difference of ethical standard between him and other prophets is equally inexplicable. His judgment, both of the prophets and the people, seems the unconscious reflection of his own religious relation to God. But he does not analyze; he knows his consciousness, and it is given directly by God. In his earliest days Judah seems to him a mass of perdition; a man could not be found in the streets of Jerusalem (5[1]); the furnace had failed to separate silver from lead—there was no silver (6[27ff.]). Yet it was impossible that God should make a full end of His people (ch. 32); and his hopes seem for the time placed on Israel of the North. Backsliding Israel was justified above treacherous Judah. And in the name of J″ he proclaims to the north, 'Return, ye backsliding children, and I will heal your backslidings' (3[14. 22]); and his prophetic ear catches a voice from the bare heights, the weeping and the supplications of the children of Israel, 'Behold, we come unto thee, thou art the Lord our God' (3[21]). With the first captivity of 597 the prophet's judgment on Judah seems softened; there was hope for the nation in the captives, and he predicts their restitution: J″ will give them an heart to know Him (24[6ff.]). And, finally, during the last times of the siege, when the destruction of the nation was at hand, he embraces both Judah and Israel in his promise of restoration (chs. 30–33). All antagonisms between him and the people were now over; his human feeling had ceased to struggle against the irrevocable decree of God, and he looked forward with composure to the city's fall. His composure and certainty of the future were but the reflexion of his own experience, as in the case of all OT saints (Job 19[25ff.], Ps 73[23ff.]). The relation to God of which he is conscious is indissoluble; it outlives all forms of national existence. Indeed, from Hosea downwards the prophets become more and more indifferent to the form of a state, their ideal is that of a community with a right mind towards God. Jeremiah does not place reliance on the purifying trials of the Exile; his hope is in the creative hand of God, who will give the people a heart to know Him (24[7]), and write His law in their inward parts (31[31]). The true shepherd whom He will raise up to lead them shall be called Jehovah Ṣidḳēnu, 'the Lord is our righteousness' (23[5ff.]).

(4) Jeremiah's Piety. — There were pious men before Jeremiah, but the long drawn out struggle of his life revealed piety more than ever before. Very different judgments have been passed on his natural character. The lachrymose nature traditionally ascribed to him is based partly on the idea that he was the writer of the Lamentations, and partly on his own references to his tears. A different view is expressed by Darmesteter (Les Prophètes, 67), who says: 'During his 40 years of prophesying he preaches, he acts, he curses: he weeps little.' The contrasts revealed in his life have been epigrammatically expressed by calling him a figure 'cast in brass, dissolving in tears.' Probably his fundamental human characteristic was weakness. In those passages where he speaks of himself as a wall of brass against his opponents.

and where J″ promises him victory over them, we see not a sense of strength but a feeling of weakness. They reflect what he feels he must be, but is conscious he is not, what J″ will do for him, though it is not done. Isaiah was strong in himself; the divine strength came to him unconsciously as he threw himself into action, and was not distinguishable from his own. But Jeremiah was conscious, introspective, distinguishing between himself and God. The strength he had was from without, hence it was fluctuating and convulsive. In moments of conflict he was strong. When dragged before the princes it was given him what to speak (26$^{12ff.}$). He could run with the footmen, or even like Elijah with the chariots, and not be wearied; but when the conflict was passed and he took his life and history with him into hours of stillness and solitude, the tide of divine strength receded, and he was weakness itself.

On the one hand, he had let himself be induced to be a prophet. J″ had revealed His mind to him, His verdict on the people, and His purpose, and he had entered into His mind, and stood on His side. But this looking at people and things, as might be said, from the standpoint of J″ isolated him; he neither borrowed nor lent, married nor was a father, rejoiced with the joyful nor sorrowed with the sorrowing (16$^{1ff.}$). Besides isolating him, it brought persecution upon him. He felt the hardness of J″'s service. Gladly would he have laid his office at His feet. He would have been thankful had he never known the truth. He cursed the day of his birth, because his fellowship with J″ isolated him from all other fellowship, and crushed down all that was human in him. For, on the other hand, he profoundly sympathized with the people. He was an Israelite indeed. Israel in him struggled against its doom. The dumb mind of the people found a voice in him. He interceded for it, and his intercession was just the resistance of his human heart to the idea of the nation's destruction. He palliated its offences, saying it was misled by the prophets (14^{13}). He expressed its better self in the confessions which he put into its mouth (14$^{7-9}$ 14$^{19ff.}$ 10$^{23.\ 24}$). He wept over it (9^{1} 13^{17} 14^{17}). He was told, it is enough! He was in the cruellest dilemma. If he pleaded for the people it was to be false to J″, to be false to his own convictions of truth, false to what he knew to be the irrevocable will of God. On the other hand, to threaten, above all to threaten with zeal for God, was treason against his own heart and against his people. Thus both God and men seemed to reject him. But his repulse by men drove him to God, and his repulse by God made him press closer to Him. And thus his life became a fellowship with God, his thoughts and feelings a dialogue between him and God.

A. B. DAVIDSON.

JEREMIAS ('Ιερεμίας), 1 Es 9^{34}.—One of the sons of Baani who put away his 'strange' wife. The name corresponds to Jeremai in Ezr 10^{33}, who is mentioned among the sons of Hashum; it has been inserted out of its right place in 1 Es.

JEREMIEL.—The name of the archangel who is introduced in 2 Es 4^{35} as answering the questions of the righteous dead. AV has Uriel, the same name as that of the angel who was sent to instruct Esdras, 2 Es 4^{1} 5^{20} 10^{-8}.

JEREMOTH (יְרִימוֹת, יְרֵמוֹת).—1. 2. Two Benjamites, 1 Ch 7^{8} 8^{14}. 3. 4. Two Levites, 1 Ch 23^{23} 25^{22}, the latter called in 24^{30} Jerimoth. 5. A Naphtalite, 1 Ch 27^{19}. 6. 7. 8. Three of those who had married foreign wives, Ezr 10$^{26.\ 27.\ 29}$. In the last instance Kerê has וְרָמוֹת 'and Ramoth' (so AV). See GENEALOGY.

JEREMY.—The form in which the name of the prophet Jeremiah appears in both AV and RV of 1 Es 1$^{28.\ 32.\ 47.\ 57}$ 2^{1}, 2 Es 2^{18}, as well as in AV of 2 Mac 2$^{1.\ 5.\ 7}$, Mt 2^{17} 27^{9}. In the last three passages RV has Jeremiah. The form Jeremy is used also in both AV and RV in the title of the Epistle ascribed to the prophet in Bar 6^{1}.

JEREMY, EPISTLE OF.—A brief apocr. composition purporting to have been written by Jeremiah to the Jews who were about to be led, or had been led (so Syr. and 7 Gr. cursives), into Babylon (cf. Jer 29 [36]^{3}). The author forewarns them that the captivity, which is a visitation for sin, will continue for seven generations; and his serious purpose is to secure that in exile they may not be so impressed by gorgeous idolatrous ceremonial as to fall into apostasy. To effect this, he gives, in popular style, a detailed exposure of the stupidity of idolatry, which is partly an amplification of Jer 10$^{1-16}$, Is 44$^{9-19}$, but which also manifests an intimate acquaintance with many inane and vicious heathen practices.

There is a decided lack of logical sequence in the thoughts, but the vanity of idolatry is emphasized by a sort of refrain, ten times repeated at irregular intervals, and though in every case intentionally varied as to verbal expression, yet always conveying the one meaning. 'This shows that idols are not gods, therefore fear them not.' The thoughts are decidedly forceful, and will perhaps gain in cogency if we arrange them a little more logically, thus:—I. Idols need to be manufactured. They are made by a carpenter, acc. to his wish (45) [verses from RV throughout], covered with gold and silver (8), and decked with garments (11). II. They are devoid of perception. They cannot speak (8), see (19), hear howlings of priests (32), or hear prayer (41). III. They have no powers of self-conservation. They cannot wipe the dust from their face (13) or eyes (17), or the rust from their ornaments (24), nor can they feel the smoke (21). They cannot eat (27). They are powerless against theft from their person (10. 33. 57), against war (48. 56), and fire (55). They cannot rise when they have fallen, or straighten themselves when awry (27). They cannot save their garments from moths (12), or their wooden interior from decay (20). IV. They are impotent for the discharge of their functions as gods. They bear a sceptre, but cannot rule (14); a sword and axe, but cannot kill (15). They cannot give wealth (35), or rain (53); much less can they show signs (67) and restore the blind (37) or the dumb (41). They cannot set up one king and put down another (34. 53. 56. 66), or deliver from injustice and death (36), or even give long life to those who made them (46). V. They are indifferent to ethical qualities. They requite neither good nor evil (34). They punish not the perjurer (35), or even the priest who robs his god to feed his lust (11). They do not redress wrong (54), or show mercy to the widow and the fatherless (38); nay, they sanction systematic prostitution (43). VI. They are thus the least useful of all things. A cup, a door, a pillar has its use (59), and so have the sun and moon (60), lightning and wind (61), clouds (62) and fire (63); 'yea, even the beasts are better than they' (68). Then, with rare irony, the author compares an idol to a 'scarecrow' (70); impotent to protect, but deluding the imagination; and, in conclusion, says, 'Better is the man that is just and has no idols, but (adds Syr.) waits on the Lord God,' than the most sumptuous idolater.

Authorship.—The evidence that it was not written by Jeremiah is threefold. (1) It was manifestly composed in Greek. There are a few Hebraisms, as, e.g., the imitation of infin. absol. in ἀφομοιωθέντες ἀφομοιωθῆτε (v.^{4}), and the repeated use of fut. for pres. freq., but they are such as are inseparable from Hellenistic Greek. (2) The style is quite below that of a prophet of Israel. The mind of the writer is saturated with the Bk. of Jer (cf. Jer 5^{24} with v.^{6}, 10^{3} with v.^{45}, 10^{8} with v.^{4}, 22^{28} with v.^{17}, 48^{37} with v.^{51}), but the style is inferior. As Ewald says, 'He only succeeds in writing like a speaker who proves and exhausts his subject from every point of view; he shows not the remotest movement towards prophetic flight.' (HI v. 479). (3)

The statement that the captivity should continue 'seven generations,' points away from Jeremiah towards one who deplored the long exile, and wished to believe it of divine appointment.

We believe the Ep. to have been written before 2 Mac. We cannot think as do Fritzsche, Schürer, Gifford, and others, that when 2 Mac 2^2 says that 'Jeremiah charged the exiles not . . . to be led astray in their minds when they saw images of gold and silver and the adornment thereof,' there is no allusion to our Epistle. The further vagaries as to the altar and the ark (2 Mac 2^{4-6}) are not said to be 'in the same writing,' as AV (so Gifford), but ἐν τῇ γραφῇ, i.e. 'in' what the writer considered 'Scripture,' 'the records' of v.[1]. The most probable supposition is, that the author lived in Egypt in the 1st cent. B.C., and that, deeply concerned lest his brethren should be led astray by the imposing ritual of idolatry, and feeling that additional force would be given to his warnings if he put them into the mouth of Jeremiah, he wrote his diatribe on the idolatry of Egypt as if it were intended for Babylon. He may have lived in Babylon in his youth, and there gained his acquaintance with the deification of prostitution ([43]), to which Herodotus also testifies as occurring in the temple of Beltis (i. 199); but v.[19] as clearly corresponds with Hdt.'s description (ii. 62) of the 'feast of lights' at Sais. The slightly inflated style of the Ep. is thoroughly Alexandrian. The fondness for assonance and for long compound words may be illustrated from περιάργυροι, περίχρυσοι, περιελοῦνται, περικείμενοι ([56f.]) and ἐξαποσταλέν, ἄνωθεν, ἐξαναλῶσαι ([66]).

Canonicity.—Our Ep. is included in the Gr. canon, and is found in all Gr. codices of OT, except the cursives 70, 96, 229. In Syr.-Hex. it follows La, and this claims to have been tr[d] from Origen's Hexapla. Indeed, Origen (inadvertently, as we think) places it in the list of the Heb. canon (cf. Eusebius, HE vi. 25). The uncials A B Q exhibit the same order as Syr.-Hex., as do also all the patristic lists that refer to it (see BARUCH). In Lat., Syr., and some edd. of LXX, Ep. Jer is found as Bar 6; and this is followed in Luther's Bible and other 16th cent. edd. as well as in AV and RV. Its canonicity was not called in question in the Christian Church before Jerome, who called it ψευδεπίγραφος (Prol. in Jer.). Theodoret passed it by; and also Hilary, though in his Prol. in Ps. 15 he has enumerated it in the Canon; but Tertullian quotes, as from Jer, v.[4], about the carrying of gods on men's shoulders (Scorp. c. 8); and Cyprian (On the Lord's Prayer, c. 5) quotes v.[6] as the suggestion of the Holy Spirit to Jeremiah, 'In the heart, O God, ought we to worship thee.'

The Text and Versions.—The Ep. is found entire in the Gr. uncials A B Q, while Γ contains 7*b*–24*a*. The differences between these MSS are comparatively unimportant. (See Swete, OT in Gr. 379–384; and, for description of MSS, vii.–xi.). There are about 20 Gr. cursives, some of whose various readings are given by Ceriani. Speaking generally, these cursives divide themselves into two classes. One half are thought by Field to represent the Lucianic recension (Origen's Hex., Proleg. c. ix.), the other half are often found in agreement with Q.

The Syriac is a very free rendering of Greek. An arrangement and tr. of the VSS in στίχοι, in parallel columns, discloses that in little more than one-third of the lines does Syr. accurately represent Gr., though the last 12 verses are almost a verbatim tr[n]. Some of the more important variations are: 'Seventy years' ([3]) for 'seven generations'; 'An axe in his left' ([15]); 'As a man condemned by the king, so are their arms extended; [thus Walton, but Lag. 'courts'], 'Their heart is foolish and erring' ([20]); 'ravens' for 'birds' ([22]); 'eagerly eat' for ταριχεύουσι ([28]); 'stones of demons in the mountains' ([38]); 'before the gate,' in place of τὸν Βῆλον ([41]); 'They are not like crows which fly in the air' (54). The only important omission is that of the 'door' and the 'pillar' in v.[59].

The Syro-Hexaplar, given in Ceriani's Mon. Sacr. et Prof. i. 1, is in the main a slavishly literal tr[n] of the text of B, often in defiance of Syr. idiom; as in vv.[31. 45]. Its variations are few. We may mention, 'swallows and other birds' ([22]), so [88]; 'weakness' for 'shame' ([26]), so [88]; 'in their temples the priests sit' ([31]), as if καθίζουσι, with Q and its cursives; 'nor rescue the wronged' ([54]), as if ἀδικούμενον, with A and the Lucianic cursives; and 'to devastate the mountains' ([63]), as if ἐξερημῶσαι, with Q and its cursives.

The Vulg. also adheres closely to Gr. text. Its chief deviations are in vv.[8-11. 20. 41. 54], where it despairs of Gr. and makes a sense of its own. It also reads 'exquiram' ([7]) for ἐκζητῶν; 'as a dead man carried to a grave' for ὡς ἐπὶ θαν. ἀπ. ([17]): 'decerpentes' for ταριχεύουσι ([27]), so Syr.: 'olive stones' for 'bran' ([43]), and 'gloriabatur' for κεχρήσεται ([59]).

The etym. and meaning are doubtful, although Gesenius (Thes.) gives the latter as 'place of fragrance,' from root רֵיחַ, while Sayce (EHH 250) makes it = 'city of the moon-god' (yārēaḥ). LXX Ἰεριχώ, indeclinable, both with and without fem. art.; NT Ἰερειχώ, once (Lk 19^1) with fem. art.; Vulg. Jericho, indecl.; Arab. er-Riha or Riha].—An important city in the Jordan Valley situated over against Nebo (Dt 32^{49}), and called the City of Palm Trees (Dt 34^3). It was the first city to oppose the progress of the children of Israel after they had crossed the Jordan. It had its wall (Jos 2^{15}), and its gate, which was closed at dusk (2^5). Like all the Can. cities of the time, it was ruled over by a king (2^3). The wealth of the place is inferred from the description of the spoil taken: vessels of brass and of iron are mentioned, and from the silver and gold Achan was able to sequester 200 shekels of silver and a wedge of gold of 50 shekels weight, as well as a goodly Babylonish garment (7^{21}). We find no such rich record of spoil in the accounts of the capture of the other cities in this campaign. While the children of Israel were still encamped at Shittim on the other side of Jordan, Joshua sent two spies to investigate the state of the country as far as J. ($2^{1ff.}$). Arrived at that place, they lodged at a house on the town wall, belonging to one Rahab, a prostitute. Their errand was suspected, and news was brought to the king, who sent messengers to Rahab's house to demand that she give up the spies. In the meantime she had hidden them under the stalks of flax which were laid out on the roof to dry, and when the messengers arrived she declared that the spies had left the city at dusk, and she sent the men off on a false chase as far as the fords of the Jordan. Returning to the spies on the roof, she told them of the terror Joshua's approach had inspired, and begged that, in return for her kindness to them, they would agree to save her and her family alive in the coming troubles. This they swore to do, on condition that she preserved secrecy. That her house might be recognized she tied a scarlet thread in her window, from which she let them down with a rope, advising them to hide in the mountains. There they escaped (probably hiding in the cavern-pierced cliffs of Quarantania), and remained for three days, till their pursuers had come back. Then returning to Joshua, they gave a report which greatly encouraged the leader.

After crossing the Jordan, the Isr. encamped in the 'east border of J.' at Gilgal (Jos 4^{19}), celebrating the passover in the 'plains of J.' This solemn ceremony was doubtless held in full view of the city. While near J., Joshua saw the Captain of the Lord's Host (5[13]). From his speech before his death we gather that a preliminary skirmish preceded the siege, for he says, 'Ye came unto J., and the men of J. fought against you' (24[11]). The siege itself was extremely strict: 'none went out and none came in' (6[1ff.]). Joshua having received his commands from the Lord, delivered them to the people. They were to encompass the city once a day for six days, and on the seventh day seven times. The order of march was as follows: first came the armed men, then seven priests with trumpets of rams' horns; immediately behind the priests was borne the ark of the Covenant; and then followed the rear. The first day, having encompassed the city in silence, they returned to lodge in the camp. This was repeated for five days. On the seventh they rose very early and marched around the city seven times, but on the seventh time, when the priests blew with their trumpets, Joshua said to the people, 'Shout, for the Lord hath given you the city.' As they shouted, the wall fell down flat before them, and the people at once entered the city on every side, 'each man straight before him, and they took the city.' By special command of Joshua, Rahab and her family were saved from the general slaughter of man and beast that ensued, according to the promise she had received from the spies. Her family continued to live on in Israel, and the name Rahab occurs in the genealogy of our Lord (Mt 1[5]) as the mother of Boaz. J. was burned and everything in it, except the silver and gold, and the vessels of brass and iron, which were reserved for the treasury of the Lord's house. The disobedience of Achan to the Lord's command, that the people should reserve nothing for themselves, resulted in a terrible punishment. The defeat of the Israelites at Ai was ascribed to the fact that the accursed thing was touched. By a process of elimination the crime was traced to Achan, and he and all his family were stoned with stones and burned with fire (Jos 7[1ff.]).

Some of the Mohammedans of the country give a distorted account of the taking of J., confusing it with another scene in Joshua's life. It is said that a great Imam tried to take the city, but so difficult was the task of demolishing the walls that the work was not completed when darkness compelled the besiegers to stop. In the morning the walls had sprung up again, and the siege had to be recommenced. This went on for several days, when finally the Imam caused the sun to stand still, and thus, the day being lengthened, the destruction of the city was completed. This may not represent an early local tradition, as the plains were covered with monasteries when the Arabs took the land, and the Mohammedans very probably confused the various Biblical accounts they heard from the monks.

Not only was J. utterly destroyed, but Joshua pronounced a solemn curse on the man who should rebuild it, prophesying misfortune to his children: 'He shall lay the foundations thereof in his firstborn, and in his youngest shall he set up the gates of it' (Jos 6[26]). In 1 K 16[34] we are told how this curse fell upon Hiel the Bethelite, who in the days of Ahab rebuilt the city. We infer that between these two periods the site was unoccupied, but that it continued to be known by its old name is proved by the facts that in the partition of the land J. was assigned to Benjamin (Jos 18[21]), and that David's messengers, after being maltreated by the Ammonites, were told to 'tarry in J. till your beards be grown' (2 S 10[5], 1 Ch 19[5]). Notwithstanding the fulfilment of the curse, the city became again inhabited, for, on the complaint of the 'men of the city' that the water was naught and the ground barren, Elisha healed the waters by casting salt in the spring (2 K 2[19]). There was also a settlement of the sons of the prophets at the place, who had at their command fifty strong men, whom they sent on a vain search for Elijah, when he had been carried up into heaven from the other side of Jordan (2[16]). After this the place is mentioned several times. When Pekah, king of Israel, made his raid on the southern kingdom, taking many captives, these were released by order of the prophet Oded, and taken to J., 'the city of palm trees' (2 Ch 28[15]). Zedekiah, fleeing from Jerus. before the forces of Nebuch., was taken in the plains of J. (2 K 25[5], Jer 39[5]). In the list of returned captives (Ezr 2[34]–Neh 7[36]) the children of J. are put down at 345. These restored exiles evidently took up their abode on the old site, for in Neh 3[2] we read that the 'men of Jericho' had their share in rebuilding the walls of Jerus. Later on it was fortified by the Syrian general Bacchides (1 Mac 9[50]).

In the time of our Lord, J. had become an important place, owing to the partiality shown by the Herodian family to the city. Josephus describes the place with enthusiasm (Wars, IV. viii. 2–3). The city lay 150 stadia from Jerus. and 60 from the Jordan. It was situated in a plain, divided in the middle by the river, and flanked on either side by high mountains, of which the western range overhung the town. Palm trees abounded in the plain, those near the Jordan being the richest. In summer the climate was so hot that no one cared to come near it, but in winter the air was so mild that the inhabitants went about with linen clothing when snow covered the rest of Judea. He speaks at length of a fountain which was situated near the old city taken by Joshua, and which was healed by Elisha. He claims unusual powers of irrigation for these waters, which had only to flow lightly over the soil to make it fruitful, and which watered a plain 70 furlongs long by 20 broad, fertilizing gardens thickly set with trees, which produced balsam and myrobalanum. The palm trees were of many kinds, one yielding an excellent honey. Such was the luxuriance and rarity of the vegetation that the author declares the place might well be pronounced divine, and challenges a comparison with any other climate in the whole earth. Strabo (xvi. 2) likens the plain surrounded by mountains to a theatre, and corroborates Josephus' account of its fertility, declaring that the revenues from the balsam (from which medicine was extracted for the head and eyes) and from other plants was great.

When Pompey visited Pal. and endeavoured to clear the land of robbers, he destroyed two of their strongholds, Threx and Taurus, which commanded the approach to J. (ib.). After Jerus. was taken by Pompey, Gabinius, the Rom. general, divided the country into five parts, making J. one of the seats of Assembly (Jos. Wars, I. viii. 5). When Herod was appointed at Rome to be king of the Jews, and before he was installed in Jerus., his allies plundered J., finding the houses full of all sorts of good things (Wars, I. xv. 6). Later he farmed from Cleopatra the revenues of the regions about the city, which had been granted her by Antony (Ant. XV. iv. 2), and fortified above the town a citadel, a building fine and strong, which he called Cypros in honour of his mother, and built a city to the north of J., which he named Phasaelis after his brother (Wars, I. xxi. 9). J. was important enough to have its amphitheatre, for we read that from this place Salome announced to the assembled soldiers the news of the death of Herod, which had taken place in the city, though he had given orders that he should be buried at Herodium (Wars, I. xxxiii. 8). After his death, his ex-slave Simon, aspiring to make himself king, burned down the royal palace (Ant. XVII. x. 6), but this was magnificently rebuilt by Archelaus, who also accomplished important work in irrigating the plain (Ant. XVII. xiii. 1). In the time of Josephus (Wars, III. iii. 5) Judæa was divided into eleven parts, of which Jerus. was the chief, and one of which was Jericho. When Vespasian approached J. the citizens fled to the mountains (Wars, IV. viii. 2). He erected a citadel in the place, and set a garrison (ib. IV. ix. 1). Whether Josephus refers to the destruction of J. or Gerasa in this section is not clear, but we have the statement of Jerome that, at the time when Jerusalem was taken, J. was captured and destroyed on account of the perfidy of its citizens (Onomasticon).

J., however, still preserved its magnificence when our Lord visited it. His baptism in the Jordan occurred not far off. The hill of Quarantania, to the immediate west of the city, is pointed out as the traditional site of the Temptation. At the end of His ministry, when He was on His way from Galilee to Jerus., He passed through J., and there healed a blind man (Mk 10^{46} [name given Bartimæus], Lk 18^{35}), or acc. to Mt $20^{29ff.}$ two blind men. At this same time He visited the house of Zacchæus the publican, whose eagerness to see the Lord had led him to climb a sycomore tree, as he was short of stature. The account of his conversion is one of the most graphic in the gospel history (Lk $19^{1ff.}$). Travellers to-day between Jerus. and J. have to be accompanied by an escort, to prevent their 'falling among thieves,' who have infested this route both before and ever since the Good Samaritan came to the relief of the man in the parable (Lk 10^{30}).

We are told by Jerome (Onom.) that after its destruction by the Romans, J. was rebuilt a third time, but he does not say when. That the place was inhabited in the time of Origen we infer from the fact of his discovery of some valuable biblical MSS there (Eus. Eccl. Hist. vi. 16). This third city existed in Jerome's day as well as the ruins of the other two. It became an Episcopal See, and its bishops begin to be mentioned in A.D. 325; the last reference is to Gregorius, who was present at the Synod of Jerus. A.D. 536. The sacred sites began to be pointed out early in the 4th cent. The Bordeaux Pilgrim (A.D. 333) was shown the sycomore tree of Zacchæus on the right of the road leading to the town from the west. A mile and a half from the town was pointed out the site of the old city taken by Joshua, close to the fountain of Elisha, immediately above which was the house of Rahab. Justinian restored a hospice in J., and a church of the Mother of God (Procopius, de Ædif. 5. 9). Theodosius (A.D. 530) visited the fountain of Elisha, which he places 2 miles from the town, and in this latter was shown the house of Rahab, the site evidently having been shifted since the time of the Bordeaux Pilgrim. Antoninus Martyr (A.D. 570) found the walls of the town overthrown by an earthquake. The house of Rahab was still standing, and had been converted into a hospice and oratory, probably the work of Justinian referred to above. At the time of Arculf's visit (A.D. 670) the town was in ruins; only the house of Rahab was standing, but roofless. The Venerable Bede (A.D. 720) describes a similar state of things. Hence the town was in a ruinous condition for at least a century and a half, but by the end of the 6th cent. many churches and monasteries had sprung up on the surrounding plains. Besides the church at Gilgal, Arculf speaks of one on the spot where Christ was supposed to have left His garments at the time of His baptism, and of the monastery of St. John, also near the Jordan. Establishments were dedicated to St. Panteleemon, St. Calamon, St. Chrysostom, St. Eustochium, and others. At the time of the Crusaders many of these were repaired and others constructed. Under the Arabs the town again rose to importance, as is proved by the many references of the Mohammedan geographers beginning in the 9th cent. (see Palestine under the Moslems, by Guy Le Strange). Ya'kubi (A.D. 874) speaks of Riha as the capital of the Ghôr, the cleft of the Lower Jordan. Mukaddasi (A.D. 985) says that this city possessed many villages in the plain, which produced much indigo, and many palm and banana trees. Edrisi (A.D. 1154) mentions Ariha, Beisan, and Amta as the finest of the cities of the valley of the Ghôr. When the Crusaders conquered the land, the plain of J. was granted to the Holy Sepulchre, but in A.D. 1111 Arnulfus, the Patriarch of Jerusalem, was blamed for assigning to his niece this district, with its annual revenues, which amounted to 5000 pieces of gold (William of Tyre, xi. 15). Later it again fell into ecclesiastical hands, as it was assigned in A.D. 1138 to a convent at Bethany (ib. xv. 26). But by the 13th cent. the town itself had sunk to small dimensions. The square tower which may be seen to-day near the modern village of er-Riha was found by Willebrand (A.D. 1211) in a ruinous condition. Brocardus (A.D. 1230) says that the wretched town had scarcely eight houses, and that all the monuments of the sacred places were destroyed. Ricaldus, writing about the same time, calls the place 'quasi deserta.' However, the plains were at this time richly cultivated. According to the Moslem Yakut (A.D. 1225) the finest sugar of the Ghôr was made at J.; palm trees and bananas abounded. Jaques de Vitry (cap. 53) also refers to the fields of sugar-cane. The ruins to the west of 'Ain es-Sultan, with the connecting aqueducts, appear to date from the Crusading period.

The modern er-Riha is a miserable village, containing about 300 swarthy inhabitants, possibly the descendants of the puny race called by Arculf Canaanites, who dwelt in his time on the plain. The rich patches of barley and wheat, with the gardens of the ecclesiastical establishments, give a hint of the possibilities of fertility which were so amply realized in former days. The level of the village is 900 ft. below the Mediter., and the flora and fauna of the plain differ largely from those of the rest of Pal., some species not being found nearer than the Asiatic and African tropics. A dozen isolated palms represent the splendid groves of the past. The Zakkûm (Balanites Ægyptiaica), identified by some with the Myrobalanum of Josephus, still abounds; also the acacia, and trees of the Zizyphus species, called in Arabic Sidr or Dom. A handsome Russian hospice now stands near the ruined tower mentioned by Willebrand, and there is a small Greek church. Two good hotels accommodate travellers, who may now make the journey from Jerus. by carriage-road, and continue their drive over the plain to the Jordan and the Dead Sea. J. contains only a few plots of freehold, as in recent times it has become the private property of the Sultan, together with many other parts of the Jordan Valley.

All authorities are agreed that the site of the Can. city is at Tell es-Sultan, above 'Ain es-Sultan (Elisha's fountain), one and a half miles from modern Jericho. As we have seen, Josephus places the old city near the fountain, and so does the Bordeaux Pilgrim, who gives the distance from the J. of his day as one and a half miles as above, which distance would do equally well if we identify the latter with the ruins near the pass to be mentioned later. Theodosius makes the distance 2 miles. This mound is 1200 ft. long from N. to S., and the larger part of its area is 50 ft. in height, measured above the fountain at the E., but not so high on the western side, as the original ground slopes from W. to E. Rising from the top of the mound along its edges are four superimposed mounds, the highest being some 90 ft. above the fountain. Near the base of the mound, above the spring, a hollow has been recently scooped out, revealing an ancient mud-brick wall in situ. The pottery found strewn over the mound belongs, as a rule, to pre-Roman times, and some pre-Israelitish ware occurs. The superimposed mounds may indicate later fortifications, but the accumulation of 50 ft. of débris below them, by analogy with the excavated mounds of Hissarlik and Tell el-Hesy (see LACHISH), probably represents the alternate growth and decay of the town for several centuries. Hence systematic excavations through the base of the mound would doubtless bring to light the remains of the pre-Israelitish city. On natural grounds, the place, with its abundant supply of water, would have been chosen by the first builders. From one and a half to two miles west of modern J., on the south bank of the Wady el-Kelt, near the mouth of the pass, there are abundant remains of a city. An unobservant traveller might not notice them, as the houses are ruined down to the soil, but the ground-plans remain, and often the four sides of a room are quite plain. A large pool, called Birket Músa, is in the neighbourhood. The character of the pottery with which these ruins are strewn indicates the Roman site. This identification is favoured by the probable identification of the site of Beit Jubr, a ruined fort on the south side of the Jerus. road, commanding the ascent from the J. plain, with the fort Cypros, which Herod built above J.; as well as by the fact that the aqueducts in the Wady el-Ḳelt, two of which were constructed to bring water to this site, appear to be Rom. work (PEF Mem. vol. iii. p. 173). Similar ruins north of 'Ain es-Sultan suggest that Roman Jericho may have been very extensive, occupying both sites, with detached villas between, as there are signs of building at many points in the intervening fields. The settlement of the Crusaders seems to have been at the modern er-Riha, about 2 miles from the pass. In the vicinity of J. the remains of five old monastic establishments may be visited. In the precipices of Ḳuruntul (Quarantania) there are hermits' caves, with chapels adorned with frescoes. The monastery of St. John, near the traditional place of baptism, built by Justinian, and rebuilt by the Crusaders, has again been restored, but traces of the old work remain. The identification of Ḳusr el-Hajlah is not sure. Tell Mogheifir probably represents the ancient St. Eustochium, mentioned by Willibald in A.D. 721 as being in the middle of the plain. At Khurbet el-Mifjir, north-east of 'Ain es-Sultan, are the ruins of a splendid monastic establishment. Most picturesque of all is the convent of Elijah, clinging to the crags above the Wady el-Kelt. This has been recently restored, but some of the old frescoes remain. Further down in the valley the cliffs immediately above the stream are pierced with hermits' caves, which can be approached only by ladders. They are still inhabited, but their nicely painted wooden doors produce an incongruous effect in the midst of the wild surroundings. F. J. BLISS.

JERIEL (יְרִיאֵל for יְרוּאֵל 'founded of El,' cf. יְרִיָּה).—A chief of Issachar, 1 Ch 7^{2}. See GENEALOGY.

JERIJAH, 1 Ch 26^{31}.—See JERIAH.

JERIMOTH (יְרִימוֹת).—1. 2. Two Benjamites, 1 Ch 7^{7} 12^{5}. 3. 4. 5. Three Levites, 1 Ch 24^{30} (called in 25^{22} Jeremoth) 25^{4}, 2 Ch 31^{13}. 6. A son of David and father of Rehoboam's wife, 2 Ch 11^{18}. See GENEALOGY.

JERIOTH (יְרִיעוֹת) occurs in a genealogy in 1 Ch 2^{18}, where the only thing that is certain is that MT is corrupt (see Kittel's note in SBOT). It is possible that we ought to read with Wellhausen בַּת־יְרִיחוֹ 'daughter of Jerioth' for אֶת־יְרִיחוֹ. See, further, GENEALOGY, IV. 35 a, note.

JEROBOAM (יָרָבְעָם prob. 'may he plead the people's cause,' Ἱεροβοάμ).—1. 1 K $11^{26\text{-}40}$ 12^{1}–14^{20}, 2 Ch $10^{2\text{ff.}}$ $11^{14\text{-}16}$ 12^{15} 13, son of Nebat and Zeruah, an Ephraimite of Zeredah, first king of Israel after the disruption, reigned 22 years, B.C. 937–915. Jeroboam's career began early in Solomon's reign (cf. 1 K 11^{27} with 9^{15} 3^{1}); the king, recognizing the young man's abilities, appointed him commissioner for the house of Joseph. He used his position to plot against his master; and, when Solomon sought to kill him, was forced to flee to Egypt.* In the LXX there are two accounts of the way in which Jeroboam became king. The first agrees substantially with the Hebrew, when the contradictions of the text of 1 K 12 (cf. vv.$^{2, 3}$ with ^{20}) are removed.† As soon as Jeroboam heard of the death of Solomon, he returned from Egypt; he did not attend the conference between Rehoboam and the people at Shechem, but he kept within reach, and came when he was sent for. The other account in LXX B is inserted at 12^{24}. It covers the same ground as the first, but with considerable additions and variations. On hearing of Solomon's death, Jeroboam returned from Egypt, where he had found a patron in Shishak and an Egyptian princess for a wife, 12^{24e},* mustered his tribe at Shechem, and so gave the immediate occasion for the revolt. The most important divergence, however, between the two Greek accounts is found in the prophecies which promise Jeroboam the leadership of the ten tribes. In the first we have the prophecy of Ahijah delivered to Jeroboam at Jerusalem in the time of Solomon; in the second a similar prophecy is put into the mouth of Shemaiah at Shechem in the time of Rehoboam. Both accounts are clearly translated from Heb. originals, which must have existed when the LXX translation was made. The Heb. text was not fixed, and the tradition was fluctuating; we cannot feel certain as to what was the actual course of events. With regard to Ahijah a similar uncertainty exists. The prophecy in 1 K $11^{29\text{-}39}$ appears to be an interpolation, for it interrupts the account of Jeroboam's rebellion, which is expected after v.^{28} and implied by v.^{40}. It could not have been Ahijah's prophecy which aroused Solomon's suspicions, for it was a private communication, addressed to Jeroboam alone, as is expressly stated; no third party was aware of it.† We find, then, two different traditions of Jeroboam's accession to the sovereignty; the correct history of it must remain uncertain.

The revolt which led to the division of the kingdom and the elevation of Jeroboam was a revolt against the government of Solomon and the heavy burdens which it laid upon the people. Solomon's conception of the state was in fact alien to the national feelings. The free, democratic spirit of old Israel, which could welcome a king chosen by the people, had not become reconciled to a hereditary monarchy, especially when Solomon's heir proved to be out of sympathy with the popular demand for a less despotic government. And the tribal instinct was still strong; it had not yet surrendered to the idea of a united nation. Jealousy of the new preponderance of Judah must have been felt in the powerful tribe of Ephraim; the real strength of Israel lay in the north; neither geographical nor social conditions were in favour of Jerusalem being the centre of all Israel. Hence the revolt came to a head at Shechem, and the instigator of the democratic movement was an Ephraimite who became chieftain of the ten tribes by the free choice of the people The historian sees in this reverse for Judah a judgment on the sins of Solomon.

But Jeroboam not merely adopted the line of democratic leader appointed by popular choice, he came forward as the patron of the popular religion and the ancient sanctuaries. He quickly realized that it was necessary for his position to establish a strong counter-attraction to the new temple at Jerusalem. Accordingly he made successful efforts to revive the popularity of the venerable holy places at Bethel and Dan, and provided them with golden images of J" in the form of a steer or bull, in addition to the altar, asherah, and sacred stone (2 K 23^{15}), which were there already. He also instituted a new priesthood and a popular

* The account of the rebellion, hinted at in 1 K 11^{26}, is not given as we should expect after v.^{28}. It is noticeable that while the compiler views this and other rebellions as punishments for Solomon's unfaithfulness (vv.$^{9\text{-}13}$), yet they occurred early in the reign, i.e. before the sins which occasioned them.

† 1 K 12^{2} is to be placed before v.^{1}, so that 'heard of it' refers to Solomon's death, 11^{43}; a slight change in the Heb. v.^{2b} gives the sense 'and J. returned from Egypt'; omit v.^{3a} and 'Jeroboam and' in v.^{12a}. Thus the narrative is brought into agreement with v.^{20}.

* LXX, Swete's edition.

† Note also that, in the Hebrew, Ahijah of the second prophecy $14^{1\text{-}16}$ is clearly connected with Ahijah of the first prophecy, while the Greek introduces him as a new person. LXX B places this second prophecy in an impossible place, before the assembly at Shechem, $12^{24h\text{-}n}$. See, further, W. R. Smith, OTJC^{2} 117 ff.

festival on the model of the feasts at Jerusalem.* The popular religion saw no offence in this form of worship (cf. Ex 32^{1-6}); and the employment of non-Levites as priests would not have appeared so irregular then as it would have done in later times. But there can be no doubt that Jeroboam's action marked a serious retrogression when compared with the higher religious level which had been reached at Jerusalem. For the sake of political security Jeroboam deliberately sacrificed the higher religious interests of Israel; and there can be no doubt that the sacred writer, who, whatever his merits as a historian may be, possessed a keen religious insight into the events of the past, was fully justified in his unsparing verdict upon Jeroboam as the man 'who made Israel to sin' (1 K 12^{30} 13^{34}, 2 K $17^{21f.}$).†

The narrative 1 K 13^{1-32}, which contains a prophetic denunciation of the altar at Bethel, belongs to a much later time, when the names of 'the man of God from Judah' and of 'the old prophet' were forgotten. Some critics think that it is founded upon 2 K 23^{15-20}; others, that the latter passage, apparently foreign to the context where it stands, was added by the same hand which inserted the story here. The next narrative connected with Jeroboam, the second prophecy of Ahijah, delivered to the queen 14^{1-18}, contains old material which has been treated by the compiler in his characteristic style. The language of Ahijah is cast into much the same form as similar prophecies delivered to Israelite kings.‡

With regard to Jeroboam's external relations, the only information we have is that there was constant war between him and Rehoboam and his successor (1 K 14^{30} § 15^{7b}, cf. 2 Ch 13). At first, no doubt, Jeroboam would have had a considerable struggle to maintain himself against his rival. But no decisive victory or success on Jeroboam's side is recorded; he seems even to have retired from Shechem to Penuel beyond the Jordan (12^{25}). When the Pharaoh Shishak made a plundering expedition into Judah he certainly did not spare the territory of his former protégé, as appears from his triumphal inscription at Karnak;‖ but we are not told that Jeroboam made any attempt at resistance. Perhaps he was more of a politician than a warrior. He had successfully managed a revolt, but he did not succeed in establishing a dynasty. If the revolt was part of the divine plan (1 K 12^{15}), Jeroboam himself proved unequal to the greatness of his opportunity; and, so far from advancing the higher interests of his people, did not rise above the popular standards, and bequeathed to posterity the reputation of an apostate and a succession of endless revolutions.

2. Jeroboam II., king of Israel for 41 years, 790–749 B.C., son of Joash, and fourth ruler of the dynasty of Jehu. Under him N. Israel reached its highest point of prosperity and splendour. For years Israel had been suffering at the hands of Syria; but the tide turned at last, and Joash recovered from Benhadad ten cities which his father had lost (2 K 13^{25}). Syria had also been greatly reduced by the campaigns of the Assyrian kings, Shalmaneser III. (782–772) and Assurdan III. (772–750); so that Jeroboam was able to recover the old limits of the Davidic kingdom 'from the entering in of Hamath unto the sea of the Arabah.' That he was able to establish his rule in the S.E. implies that he must have reduced the Moabites to submission. The meagre statement of 2 K 14^{25} is the only definite piece of information which the historical books give us. The complete picture of the times of Jeroboam must be drawn from the materials furnished by the prophecies of Amos. The nation was enjoying the fruits of Jeroboam's successes. Confident of J''s patronage, Israel was at last free to devote itself to the ease and pleasures of a period of unwonted peace. Wealth increased, and with it went luxury and self-indulgence (Am 3^{15} 5^{11} $6^{7.\ 8.\ 11}$). Religious worship was celebrated with the greatest splendour and popularity, both at the royal sanctuary of Bethel (7^{13}) and at Gilgal and Beersheba (4^{4} 5^{5} 8^{14}). But along with all this material prosperity went a deep-seated moral corruption, which it was the prophet's chief concern to denounce. Oppression of the poorer classes by the rich, justice sold and perverted, immorality openly practised, rapacity and greed of gain, were the sins which Amos marks as characteristic of the time. He foretells the impending judgment. The Assyrian was not far off; the only barrier between him and Israel, Damascus, had been removed; J'' will summon this nation to afflict Israel, and they will be carried captive beyond Damascus (6^{14} 5^{27}).

JEROHAM (יְרֹחָם).—1. The father of Elkanah and grandfather of Samuel, 1 S 1^{1}. While LXX A has Ἱεροάμ, B has Ἱερεμεήλ, i.e. Jerahmeel, and the latter may be correct (Driver, Text of Sam. p. 3). In the genealogy of Samuel as given by the Chronicler, while MT has uniformly יְרֹחָם, the LXX has in 1 Ch 6^{27} A Ἱεροβοάμ, B Ἰδαέρ, and in 6^{34} A Ἱερεάμ, B Ἀαάλ. 2. A Benjamite family name, 1 Ch 8^{27} 9^{8}. 3. A priestly family, 1 Ch 9^{12}, Neh 11^{12}. 4. 'Sons of Jeroham' were amongst David's heroes, 1 Ch 12^{7}. 5. A Danite chief, 1 Ch 27^{22}. 6. The father of Azariah, a captain who helped Jehoiada in his measures for the overthrow of Athaliah, 2 Ch 23^{1}.

JERUBBAAL (יְרֻבַּעַל, Ἀρβάαλ, Ἰαρβάλ, Ἰεαροβάαλ, Ἰεροβάαλ).—A name given to Gideon, Jg 6^{32} 7^{1} $8^{29.\ 35}$ $9^{1.\ 2.\ 5.\ 16.\ 19.\ 24.\ 28.\ 57}$. It is = 'Baal strives,' Baal being a name for J'', as in Ishbaal, Meribbaal; it cannot = 'one who strives with Baal,' as Jg 6^{32} would suggest (LXX δικαστήριον τοῦ B.). Perhaps Jerubbaal should be written Jerubaal (יְרֻבָּעַל from יָרָה not רִיב) = 'Baal, i.e. J'', founds,' cf. Jeruel, Jeremiah: so Wellh., Budde, Moore. This name was altered to Jerubbesheth (יְרֻבֶּשֶׁת;—besheth = 'shame') when Baal could no longer be used of J'' without offence, 2 S 11^{21} (LXX Ἱεροβοὰμ υἱοῦ Νήρ, Luc. Ἱεροβοάλ); cf. Ishbosheth, Mephibosheth. See art. GIDEON.

JERUBBESHETH.—See JERUBBAAL.

JERUEL (יְרוּאֵל 'founded of El').—That part of the wilderness of Judæa facing the W. shore of the Dead Sea below En-gedi (see EN-GEDI). It was here, according to the narrative of 2 Ch 20^{16}, that in the time of Jehoshaphat there assembled a great host of the children of Moab, Ammon, and other trans-Jordanic tribes, who had swept across the plain at the S. of the Dead Sea, and were encamped at the foot of the lofty cliffs of Ziz (or Haziz). This spot was near the mouth of one of

* 12^{31} and 13^{33b} seem to have formed one sentence, of which 12^{31} has preserved the more original end. This sentence was broken up by the insertion of $12^{33.\ 32a}$. Note tautology in $12^{32.\ 33}$; the latter verse forms an introduction to the following narrative. 13^{33} seems to have been adapted out of older materials to suit the preceding account, which it clearly implies. See Lv 23^{33-36} P; and Dillmann, Levit.[2] p. 583.

† The phrase is constantly repeated, 1 K 14^{16} $15^{26.\ 30.\ 34}$ 16^{26} 22^{52}, 2 K 3^{3} $10^{29.\ 31}$ $13^{2.\ 6}$ 14^{24} $15^{9.\ 18.\ 24.\ 28}$ 23^{15}. The compiler, who regards past history from the point of view of Dt, looked upon Jeroboam as the founder of a schism which violated the first principle of the Dt. Code, the law of the one sanctuary.

‡ Cf. 1 K 16^{1-4} 21^{20b-22} 21^{24}, 2 K 9^{7-10}. Note the anachronism, 14^{9} 'all that were before thee' (Jeroboam); Tirzah, v.[17], does not seem to have become a royal residence till later, 15^{21}.

§ This is contradicted by 12^{21-24}, of doubtful authority. The exaggeration of the numbers and the unhesitating submission to a prophet point to later redaction.

I. Names.—The name Jerus. first occurs in Jos (10^{1} 15^{63}; when the inhabitants are called Jebusites, cf. Jg 19^{10}, 2 S 5^{6}). Various trs. of the name have been proposed, some depending on the later and longer form, and on its pointing as if a dual; but these discussions are superseded by the discovery of letters from an early ruler of Jerus. (Tel el-Amarna collection), which show not only that the name existed before the Heb. conquest of Pal., but also that its meaning (as spelt U-ru-sa-lim and URU-sa-lim) is 'city of Salim,' or 'city of peace,' which agrees with the rendering by Gesenius, 'abode of peace.' The suggestion of Sayce (Academy, 7th Feb. 1891, HCM 177, EHH 28) that Salim is the name of a deity is unsupported: the sign for deity is not used as a prefix to the name, and the word Sa-lim is elsewhere found in the Tel el-Amarna letters with the meaning of 'peace.'* It is by no means improbable that the Jewish tradition, which places the Salem (properly Shalem) of Melchizedek at Jerus. (Gn 14^{18}, see Jos. Ant. I. x. 2; Wars, VI. x. 1), and the King's Vale (Gn 14^{17}, Jos. Ant. VII. xi. 3) two furlongs distant, may be correct; and the monumental spelling favours the view that the city may have been first called Salem only; but it is not doubtful that it was called Jerus. as early as the time of Joshua. It may also have been called Jebus (but see Moore on Jg $19^{10.\ 11}$, cf. the Jebusite, Jos 18^{28}). In Ps 76^{2} we read, 'In Salem was his covert (see Jer 25^{38}), and his lair (fig. of lion) in Zion.' The explanation in the Mishna (Zebaḥim xiv. 8), which connects Salem with Shiloh, together with other suggestions (see Midrash Bereshith Rabba, ch. 89), are too fanciful to need notice. In the Talm. the later and longer form of the name Jerusalem is used, and the city is also called Beth 'Olamim (בית עולמים) 'the house of Ages' (Tosephta, Tohoroth, ch. 1).

The Roman name, given by Hadrian after A.D. 135 to the restored city, was Ælia Capitolina, and this appeared on coins of the early Khalifs of Damascus in the Arab. form Ailia. Its survival to the 10th cent. is noticed by Eutychius, and it was known to Jerome, and appears in the lists of Synods as late as A.D. 536. This name was derived from that of Ælius Hadrianus himself, combined with that of Jupiter Capitolinus, whose statue Hadrian erected on the ruined site of the Temple. In the 10th to 13th cents. the city was called Beit el-Mukuddas, 'The Holy House' (see Sam. Chronicle, el-Mukaddasi, and el-Edrisi). The modern name is el-Kuds esh-Sherîf, 'The holy (city), the noble (town),' and in common speech el-Kuds only. On some of the Hasmonæan coins the longer spelling of the name Jerusalem occurs. The native Christians, as well as the Jews, still use the old name in the Arab. form Yerusalim.

II. Natural Site.—Jerus. stood on the site occupied by the present town, though at its greatest it extended farther to N. and S. The geogr. position (taken at the Dome of the present Cathedral of the Holy Sepulchre) is 31° 46′ 45″ N. lat., 35° 13′ 25″ long. E. of Greenwich. The town stood on spurs extending S.E. from the main watershed of Pal., and still presents almost the appearance of sliding downhill towards the Kidron ravine on the S.E. This ravine (now called Wâdy en-Nâr, 'Valley of Fire') is one of the main drains of the country, and is formed by the junction of three head valleys, the longest on the E. being the Kidron proper, running due south, west of Olivet; the second, which itself had two branches, passed through the city S.E.; the third, running S. and turning E., is the Valley of Hinnom. The summit of Olivet is 2641 ft. above the Mediter., and the valleys at their junction have a level of about 2000 ft. above the same. Thus Jerus. was defended, on the E., S., and S.W., by natural fosses 500 ft. deep, and was naturally weak only on the N. and N.W., from which quarters it has always been attacked in the various sieges recorded in history. In considering the natural site it is, however, important to remember the geological character of the region, and the changes which have been due to artificial alterations—the levelling of hills and the cutting of scarps, ditches, reservoirs, and aqueducts, together with the filling up of the valleys by ruins, or with a particular purpose. The present features, though somewhat obscured by these circumstances, are, however, distinguishable in ancient accounts of the site, and the careful measurement of rock levels, in all parts of the city, now enables us to speak with certainty as to the original conditions. The strata dip down S.E. from the watershed, with an average inclination of 10° or 12°. The highest beds, called locally Nâri and Kakûli, are found on the summit and slopes of Olivet. The Nâri is identified with the nummulitic beds found on Gerizim and Carmel, which belong to the Middle Eocene period. The Kakûli is a soft white limestone with bands of flint or chert, and containing marine shells as fossils, with ammonites and other distinctive genera of the Upper Chalk. The E. cliffs of the Kidron Valley, below this white chalk, are formed by the Mezzeh—a hard silicious limestone with bands of flint and fossils. This, with the underlying beds, belongs to the period of the Lower Chalk. The Mezzeh also appears in the Sacred Rock (es-Sakhrah), on the summit of the Temple Plateau, W. of the Kidron; in the cliff of Antonia to the N.; and in the cliff of the traditional Calvary, as well as in that N. of the city at the so-called 'Jeremiah's Grotto.' Under the Mezzeh is a deep bed of fine white limestone, very suitable for building stone, and hardening by exposure. It is locally known as Meleki, and in it are excavated the great reservoirs of the Temple Area, and the ancient quarries under the city N.W. of the Temple. Beneath the Meleki again is a hard dolomitic limestone, of white colour streaked with pink, which appears on the watershed surface W. of the city, and which is called the 'Santa Croce' marble, being found near the Convent of the Cross. The alternation of these hard and soft beds accounts for the existence of cliffs and slopes, and for the water supply of the city, which is deficient on the W., the water sinking down through the Meleki bed, and only appearing in the Kidron ravine to the E., where the dolomitic limestone is near the surface. The natural drainage of the watershed is collected in this ravine, and no springs occur near the city at any higher level. The thickness of the various beds differs in different parts, the Mezzeh 'tailing off' to the N.W.

* Sayce's view is controverted by Zimmern (Zeitschr. f. Assyr. 1891, p. 263) and Jastrow (Journ. Bib. Lit. xi. [1892], p. 105).

The rock is visible on the present surface on the N. and N.W., near the watershed, and in the N.W. part of the Temple Area. In the valley beds it is hidden by an accumulation of rubbish, which within the city has a depth in some cases of 40 or 50 feet. The level of the surface of the rock has in these parts been traced in mines, in wells and cisterns, and in sinking foundations for houses. About 150 such measurements have been carefully recorded, of which 40 are in the Temple Area and the rest within the ancient city, being fortunately most numerous in the most important parts. On the ridge S. of the Temple 30 such observations were made during the mining operations.* In some cases the rock is visible in great cisterns for a considerable distance, in others its absence is proved by the existence of masonry walls. Thus, although it is probable that a certain amount of earth covered the valley beds from the first, it is known that, in parts where a shingle of stones covers the rock, the filling up of the valleys has been caused by the frequent demolition of buildings during the various destructions of the city.

By the light of such observations it is easy to recover the original features now obscured by the ruins. The eastern spur, on which the Temple stood, was flanked by the Kidron on the E., and by a narrow valley on the W., having its head near the present Damascus Gate. This ridge was artificially cut across, at an early period, N. of the Temple Area, where its level was 2460 ft. above the sea; and a second scarp, facing S. and about 25 ft. high, was made, leaving a block of rock, on which the present Turkish Barracks stand, and a small flat plateau within, which rose gradually to a natural knoll, now known as the Sakhrah or Sacred 'Rock.' From this point the plateau narrows into a ridge, which falls gradually S. from a level of 2440 ft. to about 2130 ft. at the junction of the W. valley with the Kidron at Siloam. West again of the narrow western valley, now filled up to a depth of some 40 ft., the main site of the city itself was cut in two by a broad, deep recess, with steep slopes to N. and S., having its head at a narrow neck of land which rises to about 2500 ft. above the sea, and divides this central valley or recess from the upper part of the Hinnom Valley W. of the city. The great recess has its bed under the modern 'Street of David' (which runs down from the W. or Jaffa Gate towards the Temple), opening out into the narrow valley already noticed W. of the Temple hill. This broad, deep recess is now also partially filled in, to a depth of 50 ft., with rubbish, and its great breadth and the steepness of its slopes were hardly suspected until proved by the examination of the rock in various large cisterns in its bed, hidden under the modern surface, and discovered about 1872 during the German excavations in the precincts of the old Hospital of the Knights of St. John.

The central recess or valley thus divides the site of Jerus. into a S. and N. quarter. The S., which is generally allowed to be the 'Upper City' of Josephus, is a flat hill, measuring about 1000 yds. N. and S. by 600 yds. E. and W. On the N. it had a very steep slope, with a precipice on the N.E.; on other sides the slopes were also steep, and the plateau, which has an average elevation of 2500 ft. above the sea, thus stands 500 ft. above the valley beds on the S.E. The N. quarter was less extensive, and for the most part lower than the S. It was formed by a spur from the main watershed, and connected with the S. by the narrow neck or isthmus already noticed, towards the W. of the city. The N. spur appears to have risen into an isolated knoll of small area, which is now shown as the traditional site of Calvary, the summit being about 2490 ft. above the sea. In speaking of the topography of the city it will, however, be shown that the outline of the N. spur was changed in the 2nd cent. B.C. by cutting down the E. part of the N. ridge, near the narrow valley which divided it from the Temple, and which was then filled up. The later Herodian period witnessed an extension of Jerus. beyond this N. quarter, and the hill N. of the Temple (separated off by the artificial ditch as noticed above) was then occupied, and protected by another scarp 20 ft. high, running E. and W., and now supporting the modern city wall in the N.E. quarter. The part of the hill so included in the city (and which Josephus calls Bezetha) rose to about 2520 ft. above the sea close to the N. scarp, and to 2470 ft. on the S., opposite the rock of the Barracks from which the fosse separated it. The city also extended, on the N.W., over the flat ground beyond the knoll of the traditional Calvary, rising gradually to the watershed of Judæa, 2580 ft. above the sea. It would appear that from an early period the flat head of the narrow central valley was flanked by cliffs, the northern of which (at Jeremiah's Grotto outside the modern Damascus Gate) formed a remarkable isolated knoll, 2570 ft. above the sea, which is now regarded by many as the true site of Calvary. The N. ditch was probably in part natural, for in the cliff under the modern city wall, E. of the Damascus Gate, is the entrance to the great quarries under the city, where the Meleki beds were cut out for the Temple masonry. That these quarries existed early, and were not merely hewn for the building of Herod's Temple, has been shown by M. Clermont-Ganneau's discovery of a rudely cut sketch of a cherub, or man-bull, in the ancient Heb. or Phœn. style, attributable to a period earlier than that of Herod, and carved on the rock wall of the quarry.

The natural water supply of Jerus. is deficient, and was very early supplemented by the cutting of rain-water tanks and aqueducts. The only natural spring was in a cave on the W. side of the Kidron, S. of the Temple Area. It is remarkable for its intermittent flow, due to a natural syphon leading from a subterranean basin in the rock. The water collected by the valleys from the rocky watershed, and sinking, as above explained, down to the impervious dolomite beds beneath the hill spurs, also bursts out in winter at the junction of the three valleys, and flows in a clear rapid stream towards the Dead Sea. But this overflow is due to the sinking of a deep shaft at the well now called Bîr Eyûb ('Job's' or 'Joab's' [see below] well), which reaches down 125 ft. The well is connected with an ancient aqueduct, 70 to 90 ft. below the present surface, on the W. side of the Kidron Valley, and reached by stairways. Although unfinished, this aqueduct must have assisted in collecting the waters to the Bîr Eyûb.* The water of the upper spring was also early diverted through an aqueduct to the Pool of Siloam, as will be explained later. In the earliest period of the history of Jerus. it is possible that the bed of the Kidron, then much deeper than it now is,—in consequence of the accumulation of rubbish,—was occupied by a stream flowing on the surface from the upper cave spring, S. of the Temple. Water also found its way down the narrow ravine W. of the Temple hill, and is there still found in the subterranean cave of the Hammâm esh-Shefa, or 'healing-bath,' under the W. wall of the present Ḥaram enclosure. The shaft of the modern well is 86 ft. deep, the lower part having been apparently made in the

Rom. period. The rocky chamber and passage at the bottom extend 128 ft., but no ancient notice of this reservoir has been discovered with any certainty. The water supply, both here and at the Bîr Eyûb, failed in the winter of 1864–1865, being dependent on the rainfall of a comparatively small area, near the watershed N. of the city. The various artificial reservoirs which supplied the city will be described later. We have no information as to any works which may have been carried out by the Jebusites before David fixed his capital in Jerusalem. The spring in the Kidron Valley existed then, and it is possible that the supply in the Hammâm esh-Shŝfa was also available, and much nearer to the surface. In Neh (as noticed later) the 'Dragon Spring' is mentioned W. of Jerus.; but if a natural supply of water is to be understood, it would seem to be now dried up, as there is no known spring on this side of the city. Jos. calls this place the 'Serpents' Pool' (BJ v. iii. 2).

III. HISTORY.—In accordance with Jewish tradition (Jos. Ant. I. x. 2, VII. xi. 3; Wars, VI. x. 1), Jerus. may be supposed to have been a city (SALEM ?) in the time of Abraham (Gn 14^{18}, where see the cautious note of Dillmann), whose king, Melchizedek, was priest of God Most High (Êl Elyōn). The city is next noticed as the capital of a Canaanite king at the time of the Heb. conquest (Jos 10^{5}). The inhabitants were Jebusites; and although its king was killed (Jos 10^{26}), yet Jerus. was not attacked until later (Jg 1^{8} [?]), and remained a Jebusite town, and 'city of the stranger' (Jg $19^{10\text{-}12}$), in the time of the Judges. The discovery of letters from the early governor of Jerus. to Amenophis (c. B.C. 1480–1440), in the Tel el-Amarna collection, gives us some additional light on the history of the city. It is clear from various references that an Egyptian resident, supported by an Egyptian garrison, was there established at a time when all the Philistine towns (including Gezer) were also held by Egypt. But this garrison was withdrawn in consequence of the general rebellion of Pal. and Syria against Egypt, and the king of Jerus. reported that, in consequence, all the country had rebelled to the Khabiri (see HEBREWS), who had occupied Aijalon, Lachish, Gezer, Ashkelon, and Zorah, his own position being perilous in consequence. It is clear, therefore, that Jerus. was already a royal Canaanite city before the Heb. conquest under Joshua.

The boundary line of Judah was so drawn as to leave Jerus. in the lot of Benjamin (Jos 15^{7}, cf. 18^{28}, both P; in 15^{63} [JE] Jerus. belongs to Judah); the border ran from En-rogel (in the Kidron) along the Valley of Hinnom S. of Jerusalem. The city was attacked by Judah (Jos 15^{63}; in Jg 1^{21} Benjamin has possibly been substituted for Judah; Jg 1^{8} is a very doubtful passage, see Moore's note), who, however, did not succeed in driving out the original Jebusites. The choice of Jerus. as a capital, in David's time, was probably due to its being already an important town, in a position more central than Hebron, and less exposed to incursion from the plains than Shechem. David's men scaled the 'gutter,'* or 'water-channel' (zinnōr, παραξίφιδι), and took the 'mountain fort of Zion,' or 'citadel' (Ἄκρα), which Josephus identifies with the Upper Agora of his own time (Wars, V. iv. 1). The mockery of David by the Jebusites shows that Jerus. was considered a strong fortress (2 S $5^{5\text{-}9}$). The occupation of the citadel did not lead to the expulsion of the Jebusites, for at a later period David appears to have been friendly with Araunah the Jebusite. Jerus. at the time of this conquest (about B.C. 1000) included not only the fort of the upper city, but also a quarter called Millo (2 S 5^{9}), which the LXX renders Ἄκρα. Josephus states that David joined the lower city (τὴν κάτω πόλιν) to the citadel (τὴν Ἄκραν), surrounding both with walls (see 1 Ch $11^{4\text{-}8}$), and established himself in the citadel, calling it (or else Jerus. generally) the city of David. The ark was soon after brought to the city of David, and 'placed in the tent that David had pitched for it' (2 S $6^{12\text{-}17}$, 1 Ch 13^{13} 15^{25}–16^{3}). The site of the Temple was afterwards chosen at the 'threshing-floor of Araunah the Jebusite' (2 S 24^{18}, 1 Ch $21^{18\text{-}28}$), which site was bought for fifty shekels of silver (about £9), or, according to the later account (1 Ch 21^{25}), for 600 shekels of gold. Preparations for the building were made by David, and the Temple was begun by Solomon in the month of Ziv (latter part of April), in the 4th year of his reign (about B.C. 965), and finished in the month Bul (Oct.), seven years later (1 K $6^{1\text{-}38}$). The ark was finally removed out of the city of David into the Temple (1 K $8^{1\text{-}8}$), at the feast of consecration in the seventh month, Ethanim (September). The royal palace of hewn stone and cedar was not finished till later (1 K $7^{1\text{-}12}$), and two bronze pillars were cast for the Temple, with a 'sea' or large reservoir, and other vessels (1 K $7^{13\text{-}51}$). The Temple, which in plan and adornment resembled those in Babylon, described in a later age in the records of Nebuch., was provided with an altar court with walls and cedar beams (1 K 6^{36}); but the dimensions of this court are not noticed. It is stated that the 'inner' or altar court was separated from other outer courts (2 Ch $23^{5\text{-}8}$). The royal palace appears (as will be shown in dealing with Topography) to have stood near the Temple on the S., and it was not in the city of David (1 K 9^{24}, cf. 7^{8}). Solomon also built the wall of Jerus., and 'shut in the ravine [?; RV 'repaired the breach'; Heb. סָגַר אֶת־פֶּרֶץ] of the city of David' (1 K 9^{15} 11^{27}). Jerus. was enlarged by the building of the Temple and Palace beyond the bounds of the city of David.

After the revolt of Israel from Rehoboam, Jerus. was attacked by Shishak, king of Egypt (about B.C. 935), when the gold shields made by Solomon fell a prey, with all the treasures of the Temple and of the Palace. We possess a monumental record in which Shishak (Sheshonk) gives the names of 133 cities in Pal. subdued during this campaign, and the last name Iura . . ., though unfortunately half-defaced, may perhaps represent Jerusalem. Another attack on the city (about B.C. 850) is recorded (2 Ch 21^{16}) in the reign of Jehoram, when the Phil. and Arabs near Egypt sacked the 'king's house.' After the revolution of Jehu, and murder of Ahaziah, king of Judah, at Jezreel, Athaliah, who had usurped the throne of her grandson, was slain at the entrance of the palace, probably about B.C. 842 (2 K 11^{16}, 2 Ch 23^{15}); and about B.C. 786 Jehoash of Israel marched on Jerus. from the W. plain, and broke down 400 cubits of the wall on the W., carrying off once more the treasures of the Temple and of the Palace (2 K $14^{13.\ 14}$, 2 Ch 25^{23}). The incursion of Ramman-nirari from Assyria (about B.C. 803) into N. Israel and to Damascus, no doubt accounts for the strengthening of Jerus. by Uzziah (2 Ch $26^{9.\ 15}$), when towers were built on the W., on that part of the wall broken down some twenty years before. The city was protected by engines of war, similar to those shown in Assyr. pictures. Jotham (about B.C. 742–736) also strengthened J. by building the 'higher gate' of the Temple, and a wall on Ophel, S. of the same (2 K 15^{35}, 2 Ch 27^{3}). The conquests of Tiglath-pileser in Syria were then causing anxiety in Judah. Ahaz, the next king, was tributary to this Assyr. conqueror (about B.C. 734), and before that date he was attacked by the enemies of

* On the various explanations that have been offered of the very obscure passage 2 S 5^{8}, see Driver, ad loc.

Tiglath-pileser,—Rezin of Damascus and Pekah of Samaria,—who, however, failed to take Jerus. (2 K 16^5). The fall of Samaria to Sargon alarmed Hezekiah, son of Ahaz, and the great improvements—from a military point of view—which were carried out in Jerus., in the water supply of SILOAM (which see), may have been begun by Ahaz at the time of the fall of Damascus in B.C. 732 (Is 8^6). The advance of Sennacherib rendered it necessary to prepare for attack about B.C. 701 (Is 22^{11}), and the aqueduct from Gihon to Siloam was probably complete when the Assyr. came to Jerus. (2 K 20^{20}, 2 Ch 32^{30}). The account which we possess of this attack in the records of Sennacherib harmonizes with that found in the Bible (2 K 18^{13}–19^{37}, 2 Ch 32^{9-23}, Is 36. 37). Sennacherib records (see Schrader, KAT^{2}) that he invaded Philistia in B.C. 701, and defeated the Egyptians at Altaka; that he set up new tributary rulers in Ekron and Ashdod; and 'captured forty-six cities' of Judah, shutting up Hezekiah in Jerus., like 'a bird in a cage.' He speaks of the riches sent to Nineveh from Jerus., but is silent regarding the disaster that overtook his army on the Egyptian frontier, drove back the Assyr. beyond the Euphrates, and saved Jerus. for a century. The alliance with Egypt (see Is 36^6) prevented any danger from Egypt to Hezekiah's capital, but that with Babylon (Is 39) was less useful, since Merodach-baladan was defeated by Sennacherib in B.C. 696. Manasseh (acceding probably about B.C. 695) was tributary to Esarhaddon and Assurbanipal, according to their inscriptions, and the former attacked Egypt in 680, and finally took Memphis (Nah 3^8) in B.C. 670. The carrying of Manasseh to Babylon (2 Ch 33^{11}) appears to have occurred under Assurbanipal (see Jos. Ant. X. iii. 2) after B.C. 668, and this king is known to have restored Babylon as his southern capital. The further fortification of Jerus. by a wall on Ophel, outside the original city of David, and extending to the Fish Gate on the N. of Jerus., was effected apparently after his restoration. Amon, the successor of Manasseh, reigned only two years, and the rule of Josiah coincided with the last years of Assyr. empire, witnessing the terrible Scythian raid which swept down to the borders of Egypt. The Law was discovered in the Temple, and a great reformation effected in B.C. 621 (2 K 22, 2 Ch 34); but in B.C. 609 Necho marched to the aid of the Babylonians and Umman-manda (see Davidson, Nahum, note at end), who combined against Nineveh, and Josiah, endeavouring to stop his advance, was slain at Megiddo (2 K 23^{29}). The allies soon quarrelled over the spoils; and the defeat of Necho at Carchemish left Pal. an easy prey to Nebuch. of Babylon, the new master of W. Asia. In B.C. 597 Jerus. was taken and despoiled (2 K $24^{11\text{-}15}$), and Jehoiachin carried to Babylon. In B.C. 586 Nebuch. again attacked Zedekiah, who fled 'by the way to the Arabah' (2 K 25^4), or from the S.E. side of the city. On the 7th of Ab the city was entered by the Babylonians, and on the 9th (about 1st Aug.), according to the Mishnic traditions (Taanith iv. 7), the ancient Temple of Solomon was destroyed, with the Palace and all the chief buildings of Jerusalem. The walls were broken down. The treasures of the city had already been taken in the first raid; the sacred vessels were now carried away (2 K 25^{13}, 2 Ch 36^{18}), and the ark itself was probably removed, since Nebuchadnezzar's practice in other cases was to carry off all objects of veneration belonging to defeated peoples. Many of the chief men of Judah had followed Jehoiachin into captivity, and the rest now followed Zedekiah, leaving only the 'poor of the land as vinedressers and husbandmen' under a Babylonian ruler of Palestine (2 K 25^{12}).

The history of the ruined city remains a blank until Cyrus arose and wrested the empire from Nabonidus, the last Babylonian king. The Jews, like the Phœn., were content to remain subject to the tolerant Aryan race which ruled from India to Egypt. The Temple was refounded at Jerusalem (Ezr 3^{12}), and was completed twenty years later (Ezr 6^{15}). The return of Ezra to Jerus., and the establishment of the Law, may be referred to the reign of Artaxerxes I. (B.C. 458); see ZERUBBABEL. Acc. to Jos. (Ant. XI. vii. 1), Bagoses, a general of Artaxerxes II., profaned the Temple, and laid a tax on the sacrifices. The restoration of Jerus. by Nehemiah (Neh 3) was merely a rebuilding of the ancient wall found in ruins; but this account is the most complete that we possess of the ancient topography of the city.

The battle of Issus and taking of Tyre laid Pal. at the feet of Alexander the Great, and about B.C. 332 he visited Jerus., according to Jos. (Ant. XI. viii. 4). The city suffered, after his death, from the long struggle between the Ptolemies in Egypt and the Seleucidæ in Antioch. Ptol. Soter, son of Lagus, entered Jerus. on the Sabbath in B.C. 305 (Ant. XII. i. 1), and Antiochus III. (called the Great) took the city from the Egyp. in B.C. 219 (Ant. XII. iii. 3). The influence of Greek art and customs began to spread over Pal. under the Seleucidæ, and when Antiochus IV. (Epiphanes) visited Jerus. in B.C. 172, there appears to have been a gymnasium (perhaps the Xystus, W. of the Temple), built by the Hellenists in the Holy City (1 Mac 1^{14}, 2 Mac $4^{9\text{-}12}$, Jos. Ant. XII. v. 1). Two years later, Antiochus, defeated in Egypt, entered Jerus. unopposed, in a Sabbatic year (1 Mac 1^{20}, Ant. XII. v. 3). The Jews, for more than three centuries and a half, had been peaceful subjects of Pers. and Gr. overlords, but the growth of Gr. influence alarmed the pious, and the tyranny of Epiphanes bred a desperate spirit of revolt. In B.C. 168 Apollonius, the Gr. general, was sent to Jerus. by Antiochus, with orders to suppress the national religion. On the 15th of Chislev he desecrated the Temple by sacrifice of swine,—probably in honour of Ashtoreth and Tammuz, to whom swine were sacrificed in this age in Cyprus and Phœnicia,—and an image of a boar is said to have been erected in Jerus. (1 Mac 1^{47}, Ant. XII. v. 4). The Gr. garrison was placed in a newly erected citadel on Akra, which—as will be shown later—is identified by Jos. with the Lower City. This citadel dominated the Temple, and during the revolt of Judas Maccabæus its garrison held out even after the defeat of three Gr. armies sent against the patriotic leader. In B.C. 165, after the second defeat of the Greeks, Judas and his followers restored the half-ruinous and neglected Temple, erecting a new altar in place of that desecrated by Apollonius. The 'Feast of Lights,' on the 25th of Chislev, still commemorates this restoration (1 Mac 4^{52}, Ant. XII. vii. 7). Two years later, however, Antiochus V. (Eupator) retook Jerus., and overthrew the walls of the city and of the Temple (1 Mac 6^{62}, Ant. XII. ix. 5). After the defeat and death of Judas at Elasa, following soon after his victory at Adasa over Bacchides the desecrator of the Temple, a period of misfortune for the Hasmonæan house followed; but under the skilful management of Jonathan, the brother of Judas, the national cause prospered. In B.C. 143 Jonathan built a wall in the middle of Jerus. to separate the Akra citadel from the Upper Market or Agora (1 Mac 12^{36}, Ant. XIII. vi. 7). His successor Simon, the wisest and most prosperous of these famous brethren, finally took the Akra citadel on the 23rd of Ziv in B.C. 139, and partly levelled the mountain on which it had stood—a labour lasting three years (1 Mac 14^{36}, Ant. XIII. vi. 7; on the historical reliability of this statement see Schürer, HJP I. i. 262, note 14). John Hyrcanus, his son, who, being at Gazara, escaped the massacre at Dok, was besieged in B.C. 134 in Jerus. by Antiochus Sidetes, and is said by Jos. to have opened the tombs of the kings, and taken treasure thence (Ant. XIII. viii. 4). After his successful rule the quarrels of the Hasmonæans brought further trouble on the city, and the Romans, having under Pompey conquered Armenia to the Caucasus and to the borders of Persia, began to interfere in the affairs of Palestine. An alliance with Rome was one of the latest acts of Judas Maccabæus, and had been renewed later. The country had been at peace during the greater part of the reign of Alexander Jannæus, and the Gr. influence (as witnessed by his coins) had been steadily reasserting its power. After the death of Alexandra-Salome, the able widow of Alexander Jannæus, a war of succession broke out between her sons. Hyrcanus II., aided by Aretas (Harith) the Arab king of Petra, besieged Aristobulus II. in Jerus. in B.C. 65; but Scaurus, one of Pompey's generals, ordered him to raise the siege (Ant. XIV. ii. 1). In B.C. 63 Pompey himself besieged Jerus., to put an end to the increasing anarchy. Aristobulus was removed, the walls were demolished, and the bridge leading to the Temple was thrown down. Pompey is said to have entered the Holy of Holies itself. The city was made tributary to Rome (Ant. XIV. iv. 4; Wars, I. vii. 1). The subjection of Pal. was, however, not yet complete. In B.C. 55 Crassus, before his defeat in Parthia, again pillaged the Temple (Ant. XIV. vii. 1), and in B.C. 47 the Hasmon. rule came to an end; Antipater the Idumæan, in recognition of his services on the borders of Egypt, was made ruler of Pal. by Julius Cæsar the year after the battle of Pharsalia. Four years later his famous son, Herod the Great, became joint ruler with Phasael, and in B.C. 40 became Procurator of Judæa, by order of the Senate. He was then driven from Jerus. by the invasion of the Parthians, under their prince Pacorus, who re-established the Hasmon. Antigonus (Wars, I. xiii. 13). In B.C. 37 Herod, assisted by Sosius the Rom. governor of Syria, took the city from Antigonus (Ant. XIV. xvi. 2), and a period of strong rule and peace followed. In B.C. 24 Herod built his palace in Jerus., on the W. side of the upper city—the old Hasmonæan palace being on the E., near the Temple bridge. He also restored the citadel Baris or Antonia, N. of the Temple, and celebrated games in a new theatre in the city (Ant. XV. viii. 1–5, ix. 1). Later in his reign, in B.C. 19, Herod began to replace the ancient Temple enclosure by a new and much larger structure, and this work was finished in B.C. 11 (Ant. XV. xi. 3, 6). The death of Herod, in the year of the Nativity (B.C. 4), was signalized by the destruction of the golden eagle erected over the Temple porch (Wars, I. xxxiii. 3, 8). The history of Jerus. under Herod's successors, and under the procurators, is almost a blank. In A.D. 35 Pontius Pilate was recalled, in consequence of the riots caused by appropriating the Corban to the purpose of making an aqueduct from near Bethlehem to the Temple (Ant. XVIII. iii. 2). Agrippa the tetrarch, grandson of Herod the Great, began the building of a new wall on the N. side of the city, about ten years after the Crucifixion (A.D. 41–44), and Jerus. appears to have grown much larger during the Rom. period (Ant. XIX. vii. 2, viii. 2). King Agrippa, son of the last, built a palace in the upper city (Ant. XX. viii. 11), about A.D. 56, and the Temple courts were completed in A.D. 64 (Ant. XX. ix. 7). The Jewish discontent, gradually increasing since the time of Agrippa's death, led to revolt against the incompetent procurator Gessius Florus in A.D. 66, and during the riots the palaces and Antonia were burnt (Ant. XX. xi. 1; Wars, II. xvii. 6). Cestius Gallus, president of Syria, besieged Jerus. in consequence, and took the third wall on the N., but retreated in panic (Wars, II. xix. 1–9), and Vespasian was called to re-establish Rom. power in Palestine. The campaign was slow and systematic, and not until all the country to the N. had been subdued, and Jericho and the plains of Joppa reconquered, did the Rom. army advance to the attack of Jerus., a task left to Titus in consequence of Vespasian's becoming emperor. The great siege in A.D. 70 was perhaps the most terrible ever undergone by the city, and the full account by Jos. illustrates the topography of Jerus. at the time of its greatest extension and strength.

The great siege lasted 143 days, from the 14th Abib, when the Romans encamped on Scopus (Wars, V. xiii. 7) until the final conflagration on the 8th of Elul (Wars, VI. viii. 5). The dates of the principal events may be briefly given.

,, 9	105	The gate Moked is undermined (Taanith iv. 9). The Rom. soldiers set fire to the Temple by night (Wars, VI. iv. 5). The city is plundered, the lower city burnt, the family of Izates submits (Wars, VI. vi. 3, 4).
,, 20	116	Banks raised against the upper city on N.W. and N.E. (Wars, VI. viii. 1).
Elul 7	133	Banks finished after 18 days (Wars, VI. viii. 4).
,, 8	134	Final conflagration and conquest of the city (Wars, VI. viii. 5).

The first day of the siege (23rd Abib) corresponded in A.D. 70 to the 9th April. That lunar months must be supposed is shown by Jos. (Wars, VI. viii. 1, 9). The final fall of Jerus. took place in the hottest part of the year, on 4th September. The terrible sufferings of the besieged from famine, thirst, and disease were thus intensified by the season. It is unnecessary to enter into detail as to these sufferings, or as to the various factions whose conflicts added to the general misery. The Idumæans, introduced by one faction to support themselves, thought only of plunder; and concerted action against the Romans was rendered difficult. The numbers of the besieged are stated by Tacitus at 600,000 (Hist. v. 13); the estimate of over a million by Jos. is incredible (Wars, II. xiv. 3, v. vi. 1, xiii. 7, VI. ix. 3). The ordinary population cannot have exceeded 30,000 at most; but in consequence of the Passover, and of the Idumæans being admitted, the city must have been densely crowded. The Jewish system perished in blood and fire, and the few survivors were made victims of the circus games at Cæsarea, or led captive to Rome, where, on the Arch of Titus, the golden candlestick, the table of shewbread, and the silver trumpets from the Temple (but not the ark, which never stood in the Temple after the time of Nebuch.), are shown as spoils of this great victory.

In order to understand the topography of Jerus., and to distinguish its later remains, it is necessary briefly to follow the history from A.D. 70 down to the present day. After the capture of the upper city, the walls of the city and of the Temple were thrown down, with the exception of the royal towers and part of the W. wall (Wars, VII. i. 1), which remained as the fortress of the legion left in charge. Jerus. has no history for sixty years after its destruction, but an inscription of the time of Trajan (A.D. 117) appears to record the worship there of Serapis by a veteran who may even have been present with Titus. In A.D. 130 Hadrian visited Jerus., and in A.D. 134 occurred the desperate rebellion of the Jews under Bar Cochba and Rabbi Akiba. They were expelled from Jerus. by Julius Severus (Dion Cassius, lxix. 13), and according to later statements (Talm. Jer. Taanith iv. and Jerome, Comm. on Zec 8^{19}) T. Annius Rufus ploughed up the foundations of the Temple. In the following year they were massacred at Bether (Bittir) close to Jerus. on the W. In A.D. 136 Hadrian rebuilt the city, and called it Ælia Capitolina. He dedicated the Temple site to Jupiter Capitolinus, and decreed the exclusion of the Jews from Jerus.—a decree which, though perhaps not always enforced, was still in existence in the time of Constantine (Dion Cassius, lxix. 12; Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. iv. 6). The city of Hadrian appears to have been smaller than that of the time of Titus, since the S. part of the upper city was outside the wall in the 4th cent. A.D. In A.D. 130 Hadrian found only a few houses and seven synagogues (see Biblia Sacra, pp. 393–455). Only one of these was standing in the 4th cent. (Bordeaux Pilgrim). Hadrian appears to have repaired the walls (Orosius, Hist. xv., written about A.D. 416), and, according to the Paschal Chronicle (which is, however, a late authority), the new buildings included 'the two markets' (δημόσια), a theatre, a mint, a tricameron, a tetranymphon, and a dodekapylon, formerly called anabathmoi (In Ann. 3 Æl. Hadr.). Eusebius (Life of Constantine, iii. 36) speaks of a temple of Venus erected in the city, at the site of the subsequent Church of the Holy Sepulchre. This was afterwards (see Petellus in A.D. 1151–1157) attributed to Hadrian. Jerome (Epist. 49) speaks of a marble statue of Venus 'on the rock of the Cross,' and Eusebius connects her worship with the dark cave (μυχόν) under this rock. A coin of Antoninus Pius represents Venus in a tetrastyle temple with the legend C.A.C., and later coins of Aurelius and Severus have the same reverse with the legend Col. Æl. Cap. It seems clear that either Hadrian or the Antonines erected this Venus temple in the N. quarter of Jerus., when it was rebuilt as a pagan city. A coin of Hadrian, struck in Jerus., shows a temple which may be the same. Jerome also informs us (Comm. Is 2^{8} and Mt 24^{15}) that equestrian statues of Hadrian were placed on the site of the Holy of Holies, together with an idol of Jove. These were still standing in A.D. 333 (Bordeaux Pilgrim), and an inscription on a stone now built upside down into the S. wall of the Temple enclosure bears the name of Hadrian, and probably belonged to one of these statues. The head of a small statue was picked up by a peasant, in the road N. of the Damascus Gate, in 1873. It is crowned with laurel, and the Rom. eagle appears on the front of the crown. The features resemble those of known statues of Hadrian, and the head may have belonged to one of the above statues.

A cohort was stationed at Jerus. to prevent the Jews entering the city (Sulpic. Severus, Hist. Sac. ii. 25), and the decree still held in A.D. 312 (Eusebius, Theophania). But in A.D. 333 (Bordeaux Pilgrim) we find the Jews allowed annually to visit the 'pierced stone,' which was near Hadrian's statue in the Temple. They anointed the stone, lamented over it, and tore their garments. It apparently represented the site of the Temple, over which no building is mentioned, and is usually identified with the Sakhrah or sacred 'rock,' still remarkable for the shaft which pierces down to the cave beneath from the surface of the rock. Jerome also speaks (Comm. Ezk 1^{15}) of the Jews entering Jerus. to wail, in his own time. He says that for fifty years (or until A.D. 130) Jerus. remained laid even with the ground, and lost its former name (Comm. Ezk 51); but under Hadrian it regained the position of an ordinary provincial capital.

We hear no more of its history for nearly two centuries, until the establishment of Christianity by Constantine; but, in the tombs on Olivet, stone boxes have been found (osteophagi) belonging to the 2nd, 3rd, and 4th cents. A.D., which held the bones of Jews and Jewish Christians there collected close to the Valley of Judgment. The traditional tomb of St. Pelagia (noticed from the 4th cent. down) contains also an early Gr. text—'Courage Domitela, none is immortal'—which may (as compared with others in Bashan) belong to the 2nd or 3rd cent. A.D. Pilgrimages began to be customary in the latter cent., when Alexander, a bishop of Cappadocia, visited Jerus.; and a female pilgrim is noticed by Cyprian. In A.D. 315 Eusebius speaks of pilgrims coming from all parts of the world to witness the fulfilment of prophecy, and to worship on the Mount of Olives (where the footprints of Christ were shown), which appears to have been the only sacred station then known. Our first account of the city under its new conditions is that of the Bordeaux Pilgrim, who arrived while the new cathedral of the Holy Sepulchre (or 'Church of the Anastasis') was being built by Constantine's order in A.D. 333. As regards the recognition of the site, we have no statement in earlier authors to show that the true locality was preserved by tradition. The legend of Helena's miraculous discovery of the Cross is unnoticed by contemporary writers, though in A.D. 326 the mother of Constantine visited Bethlehem and Olivet. The Cross itself is only noticed by St. Cyril twenty years after the great Basilica was built, and in A.D. 383 by Jerome (Epit. Paulæ, 5). Eusebius gives what purports to be Constantine's letter to Macarius (Chron. Ann. 359) ordering the erection of the new buildings which he elsewhere fully describes (Life of Constantine, bk. III. chs. 34–39). There is no doubt that the sites described are the same still shown, but the letter to Macarius speaks of them as 'long hidden under the earth'; and Eusebius says that the Venus temple was first destroyed, and 'beyond all hope' the sacred tomb was found under the mound then cleared away. There is no doubt that an ancient Jewish tomb (now called that of Nicodemus) was discovered, and that the traditional Holy Sepulchre (a tomb of the Gr. and Rom. type) is rock-cut; the surrounding rock is said to have been cut away to leave the monument isolated in the flat surrounding space.

What is lacking is any evidence that the sites are genuine. The story of the finding of the Cross is first told by Rufinus in A.D. 410, and by Theodoret about A.D. 440. The 4th cent. was an uncritical age, and many of the sites shown to pilgrims were impossible—such as that of Rephidim in Moab (St. Sylvia), of Job's Stone in Bashan, and of the Transfiguration on Olivet—a blunder of the Bordeaux Pilgrim, who also makes David to have met Goliath near Jezreel. The situation of the sites which Constantine honoured awakened apparently some suspicions from an early age. Eusebius (Life of Constantine, iii. 33) speaks of the new Jerus. rising round the Basilica opposite the old Jerus. in ruins; and mediæval writers all explain that the extension of the city, which in the 4th cent. A.D. surrounded the Venus temple, was due to Hadrian. A careful consideration of the topography and military considerations tend, however,—as will be seen later,—to show that these sites were equally within the city at the time of the Crucifixion. The case for the traditional sites, which have remained unchanged for fifteen centuries, is thus very weak. The buildings erected by Constantine have perished, but it is generally agreed by Willis, de Vogüé, and Prof. Hayter Lewis, that they consisted of a hemispherical building, continued eastwards by a great basilica, with a court or atrium on its E., and an entrance (propylœa) with pillars. This was, in fact, a building similar to that erected by Constantine at Bethlehem, where the original pillars of the basilica are still standing. The great leaden roof was gilded, the sacred cave was surrounded with columns, the cloisters had galleries above; the walls were adorned with sculpture (and possibly with mosaics), and, on the S. apparently, was the great tank—still traceable—in which (Cyril, Catech. Lect.) the neophytes were baptized at Easter, by total immersion, according to the usual rite. The details of the description are not very clear, but it is certain that the building was large and magnificent, and that it embraced not only the Holy Sepulchre in its open court surrounded by the hemisphere, but also the rock of the supposed Mount Calvary to the S.E. with the cave beneath. A site which had once been a pagan temple was thus (as in other cases at Tyre, Cæsarea, Gerasa, etc.) converted into a Christian shrine, but the strange festival of the Holy Fire (first noticed in the 9th cent.) seems to have perpetuated the pagan fire-feasts of earlier days—perhaps once celebrated at the same spot. In like manner the cave at Bethlehem had, according to Jerome, been sacred to Adonis before the grove was cut down, and the church built by Constantine over its site.

In A.D. 335 a synod was held at Jerus. and the Church of the Anastasis was consecrated (Euseb. Life of Const. iv. 43–47). On the temporary reversion of the state to paganism, Julian is said to have attempted to rebuild the Temple (Socrates, Hist. Eccles. iii. 20), but was deterred by what would seem to have been an explosion of fire damp, in A.D. 362. About A.D. 450 the empress Eudoxia, widow of Theodosius II., retired to Jerus., where she died in A.D. 461. She built a Church of St. Stephen, of which only a few fragments have been found N. of the city, and restored the walls, enclosing the Pool of Siloam within their circuit (Evagrius, Hist. Eccles. i. 22). During this period the Council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451) made Jerus. a patriarchate independent of Cæsarea. Short descriptions of the city (by Eucherius and Theodosius) belong to the 5th and 6th cents., and the number of sacred sites shown to pilgrims steadily increased; but the genuineness of these traditions is always doubtful.

About A.D. 532 Justinian erected important works in Jerus., including the Church of the Virgin—usually supposed to have stood on the site of the present Aksa Mosque, the pillars of which have Byzantine capitals which may belong to this age—together with a hospital to the W. of the Temple enclosure, and a Church of St Sophia, which Antony of Piacenza (about A.D. 600) places at the Prætorium, distinguishing it from St. Mary. It is also placed 'in' the Prætorium by Theodosius (or Theodorus, A.D. 530), and the Prætorium was always shown by Christian tradition N. of the Temple at the site of Antonia, and near the Twin Pools in the fosse to the N. The remains of a small church in the modern barracks are believed by de Vogüé to represent St. Sophia. The Temple Area itself, as described in the 4th, 5th, and 6th cents., was in ruins, and no building stood on the site of the Holy House. The S.E. corner of the enclosure stood up as a ruined 'pinnacle' to which pilgrims refer. Even after the great Church of St. Mary was built, Antony of Piacenza speaks of the 'ruins of Solomon's Temple,' and these ruins are noticed by Eucherius (about A.D. 427–440) and by Arculf (A.D. 680). We have no account of any buildings in this area before the time of Justinian, but the description by Procopius (de Ædificiis Justiniani, bk. v. ch. 6) shows that his work was extensive. Unfortunately, the account is not very clear: cloisters (στοαί) are noticed, which may have run on the outer walls of the enclosure—except, as he says, on the E. The present Golden Gate, on the E. wall of the enclosure, is architecturally Byzantine work, and may have been built in the 6th cent. (as compared with buildings in N. Syria); it is unnoticed by early writers, and apparently first mentioned by Sæwulf early in the 12th cent. The hospital attached to St. Mary is said (Antony of Piacenza) to have held from 3000 to 5000 beds. Procopius speaks of two hospices (ξενῶνες),—one for pilgrims and one for the sick,—but it is not clear where they stood.

The buildings so erected by the two great emperors, Constantine and Justinian, suffered from the attack of Chosroes II. of Persia, who, aided by 24,000 Jews, is said (Paschal Chron. A.D. 614) to have destroyed the Church of the Anastasis, taking the patriarch Zacharias and the Holy Cross to Persia. Immediately after, Modestus, the vice-patriarch, is said to have begun the restoration of the church (Life of St. John Eleemon in Acta Sanct. ii. p. 500). In A.D. 629 Heraclius made peace with Siroes, son of Chosroes, and entered Jerus. in triumph through the Golden Gate (Paschal Chron.) on the 14th Sept. This victory of Christendom was, however, shortly to be followed by the triumph of Islam. It was in the same year that Mohammed destroyed the idols of Mecca, and in A.D. 637 Khalif Omar appeared before Jerusalem. The Christians resisted for some time (four months according to Theoph., Chronograph, or two years according to Arab writers). The earliest accounts (including that of Eutychius, A.D. 870) are not contemporary, but all writers seem to agree that Omar's conquest was unstained by blood. He proclaimed security for life and property on payment of tribute, and allowed the existing churches to stand, though no new ones might be built. He erected a wooden mosque W. of the Sakhrah (Arculf, A.D. 680, and Jelâl ed-Dîn, A.D. 1470), and purified the Rock itself. According to Eutychius (Annals, written not later than A.D. 940), the Christians had built nothing on the site of the Temple thus accepted by Islam.

The Ommiyah dynasty of Khalifs being established at Damascus, 'Abd el-Melek, the 10th Khalif (according to all Arab authorities, see Guy le Strange, Pal. under the Moslems), erected a Kubbeh or 'Dome' over the Sacred Rock in A.D. 688. The small 'Dome of the Chain' to the E. is said to have been the model of this building, which originally consisted of a drum supported on arches, and on pillars torn from some earlier Byzantine building, with an outer arcade—octagonal, and adorned with glass mosaics. These still remain, and the Kufic text above this outer arcade still preserves the date of building, A.H. 72. Under these Khalifs, and under the great Abbaside dynasty of Baghdad, the relationship of Islam and Christendom was friendly, and Harûn el-Rashid is said to have sent the keys of Jerus., with other presents, to Charlemagne, who erected in Jerus., E. of the Holy Sepulchre, chapels, and a hospice for Lat. pilgrims (Bernard, Itin.), towards the close of the 8th cent. A.D. The buildings on the site of Constantine's Church of the Anastasis, which Modestus erected as already noticed, and of which Arculf drew a rough plan on a wax tablet for the abbot of Iona, appear to have been small separate chapels. The Holy Sepulchre was enclosed in a round church. Calvary was covered by a separate building, and a third to the E. replaced the Basilica of Constantine. On the S. was a chapel of St. Mary, and N. of Calvary a chapel of the 'Prison of Christ.' In the early part of the 9th cent. the patriarch Thomas restored the dome over the round church (Eutychius, Ann. A.D. 813–833), and these buildings remained uninjured during the rule of the Abbasides.

But in A.D. 969 Jerus. fell under the power of the Shia'h Khalif of Egypt, Mue'z (see Gibbon, ch. lii.), and in A.D. 1010 Hakem, the crazy and fanatical Egyp. Khalif, ordered the destruction of the chapels by fire (Will. Tyre, i. 4). Through the influence of the Byzantine emperor, Constantine Monomachus, they were restored in A.D. 1048 by the patriarch Nicephorus, but the new buildings, which existed when the Crusaders took Jerus., were small and poor (Will. Tyre, i. 6, viii. 3). They were similar to those of Modestus, but included a chapel of St. Mary N. of the Sepulchre, and three chapels of St. John, Holy Trinity, and St. James (which still remain), to the S. The cave under the site of Constantine's Basilica, which is covered by a dome resting on clumsy Byzantine pillars, dating perhaps from the time of Modestus, was shown as the 'Chapel of St. Helena,' and as the place where the Cross was miraculously discovered.

The history of the Temple enclosure is traced during this earlier Moslem age by inscriptions, and by the later Arab histories. In A.D. 728 a cupola was erected over the Aksa Mosque (Justinian's Church of St. Mary), and this building was injured by earthquake about A.D. 758–775, but restored soon after by the Khalif el-Mahdi. In A.D. 831 the Khalif el-Mamûn restored the Dome of the Rock, and apparently enclosed it in the present octagonal outer wall. The beautiful bronze gates of this wall bear the above date (A.H. 216). The beams on the old roof resting on the wall also bear a date answering to A.D. 913. In A.D. 1016 an earthquake partly destroyed the dome, and the mosaics were repaired in A.D. 1027 as stated in their inscriptions. The present wood-work of the dome was erected in A.D. 1022. In A.D. 1060 the roof of the Aksa fell and was repaired.

The decreasing power of the Arab race, and the rise of the Seljuk Turks, led to the attack on Jerus. by Isar el-Atsis, a Turcoman general, who drove out the Egyptians in A.D. 1077, when 3000 of the inhabitants are said to have been slain (Will. of Tyre, i. 6). The cruelty of the Turkish rulers was the immediate cause of the first Crusade, when reported by Peter the Hermit after his visit to Jerus. in A.D. 1094. The number of pilgrims had been steadily increasing since about A.D. 1000, when the Amalfi merchants founded the hospice of St. John Eleemon, on the site apparently of that of Charlemagne. While the great contest raged round Antioch, the Egyptians took advantage of the absence of Turkish forces in the N., and seized Jerus. in 1098, expelling the Turcomans after a siege of 40 days. They then rebuilt the walls a few months before the army of Godfrey appeared from the plains (Will. Tyre, vii. 19). The Crusaders encamped on the N. and W., and subsequently extended on the S.W. After forty days of desperate struggle, the city fell on 15th July 1099 (Will. Tyre, viii. 5), and a terrible massacre followed. No sooner was the feudal system established in Pal. than extensive building operations began. About A.D. 1103 a new cathedral to cover the chapels of Nicephorus—already described—was commenced (Sæwulf, Itin.; Will. Tyre, viii. 3), and by A.D. 1140 the Church of St. Mary the Great was built S. of the cathedral. In A.D. 1136 the new buildings in the Temple Area, and the new decorations of the Dome of the Rock, then called Templum Domini, were finished after 20 years of work, a chapter of canons having been established in A.D. 1112 (Will. Tyre, viii. 3). The city increased in prosperity for half a cent., and was filled with churches and palaces, many of which remain almost intact. For eighty years it was never besieged, and its walls fell into decay, until the increasing dangers of the Lat. kingdom led to their being renewed in A.D. 1177 (Will. Tyre, xxi. 25). But, after the fatal defeat at Hattîn, the Franks in Jerus. were besieged by Saladin, and surrendered, escaping any massacre, in A.D. 1187. Saladin reconverted the Temple enclosure into a Haram or 'sacred' Moslem sanctuary, and two years later restored and regilt the Dome of the Rock, as shown by an inscription in the dome itself. In A.D. 1192 he repaired the city walls to oppose Richard Lion Heart, and from his time downwards the Egyp. and Turkish rulers have added constantly new buildings in the area, with minarets, stained-glass windows, and other details, which it is impossible here to notice fully.

The main building periods of Jerus., after A.D. 70, have been described at some length, in order to explain the present conditions of Jerus. archæology, and to distinguish the works of later ages. In A.D. 1219 the city walls were dismantled by order of the Sultan of Damascus, and ten years later Frederic II., emperor of Germany, received Jerus. by treaty from the Sultan of Egypt. In spite of the conditions of this treaty, the Christians, in A.D. 1239, began to rebuild the walls, when Daûd Emir of Kerak fell upon them, massacred many, and demolished the walls and the citadel. Yet in 1243 Jerus. was again restored, without conditions, to Christendom by the Sultan of Damascus, and its walls repaired. In the following year the Kharezmian Tartars—foes of Islam and Christendom alike—seized Jerus., massacred the population, and rifled the tombs of the Lat. kings near the foot of Calvary. In 1247 they were driven N. by the Sultan of Egypt, and Jerus. remained subject to Egypt for 270 years, until the Ottoman Sultan Selim I. conquered Syria in A.D. 1517. Inscriptions on the walls show that the present ramparts are due to Suleimân the Magnificent in A.D. 1542. The line differs somewhat from that of the 12th cent. on the N.W. and S.

Jerus. under the Turks remained without a history, and hardly increased at all in size, until some 30 years ago. The Church of the Holy Sepulchre was partly destroyed by fire in A.D. 1808, but most of its present structures, including the bell tower, the choir, and the chapels, remain as they were in the 12th cent. In 1825 there was a revolt against Turkish rule in the city. In 1832 it was taken by Mohammed Ali from Egypt. In 1834 the peasantry entered by the drains, and shut up the garrison in the capital for a week. They were relieved by Ibrahim Pasha on the 6th of June. In 1840 Jerus. was restored to the Turks by Europe. The Anglican bishopric was founded two years later. In 1850 the riots of Gr. and Lat. clergy preceded the Crimean War. In recent years there has been a steady influx of Jewish inhabitants, so that a population of about 20,000 souls in 1872 has risen to about 50,000 at the present time. New quarters have sprung up outside the walls, on W., N., and S., and a railway from Jaffa has just recently been completed. The main cause of this rapid development, which has led to much misery and poverty in the city, was the persecution of the Jews in Russia under the late Tzar.

IV. TOPOGRAPHY.—From the preceding account of the history it will be seen that, in treating of the topography of Jerus., we have to bear in mind various changes due to human agency throughout a period of nearly 4000 years; and that in studying the Antiquities we have to separate the work of Romans, Byzantines, Arabs, Crusaders, Egyptians, and Turks from the older remains of the semi-Greek period, of the Hebrews, or of the Canaanites. We have, in like manner, to distinguish later traditions from the true topography of the earliest writers, and monkish sites from those of the Bible. Our only real authorities are the OT for the earlier periods, and Josephus for the condition of the city just before the great destruction, which he witnessed in A.D. 70. In the Mishna we have, however (Tract Middoth), a valuable account of Herod's temple, written about A.D. 150 at Tiberias, by men who were able to visit the ruins, and to hear the remembrances of rabbis who had survived the siege. The accounts given by Jos. were, on the other hand, penned far away in Rome,—that in the Wars about A.D. 72, and the Antiquities as late as A.D. 93.

The long controversies which have raged as to most of the features of the ancient city have been silenced by the survey of Jerus. in 1864 by Sir C. W. Wilson, by de Vogüé's careful study of the Temple site in 1860–1863, and by the celebrated excavations of Sir C. Warren (1867–1870); and the differences of opinion now existing are few and comparatively unimportant. The principal discrepancies which will be found on the most recent maps concern three points only—(1) the position of the 'City of David,' (2) the position of 'Akra,' (3) the size and exact position of the Temple. The first two may here be briefly considered. The third will be noticed in treating of the Temple Area.

As regards the extent of the city at the time of David's siege, we read that 'David took the stronghold of Zion, the same is the city of David,' and 'dwelt in the fort, and called it the city of David; and David built round about from Millo (Akra in LXX) and inwards' (2 S $5^{7.9}$). Jos. (Ant. VII. iii. 1) explains that, having crossed the ravine, David seized the citadel (Ἄκραν) 'and settled himself in Jerus., which he called David's own city': he adds, 'But David having also surrounded the lower city (τὴν κάτω πόλιν) and joined the citadel (τὴν Ἄκραν), to it made them one body.' In another passage he says that the upper city of his own time was called by David the fort (φρούριον), 'but by us the Upper Agora' (ἡ ἄνω ἀγορά), and that the other hill, called Akra (Ἄκρα), supported the lower city (τὴν κάτω πόλιν) (Wars, V. iv. 1). From these passages it is clear that Jos. considered the city in David's time to have coincided with the upper and lower city of his own days; and he describes the old wall surrounding the upper city (Wars, V. iv. 2) as having been built by David and Solomon. He agrees with the LXX in identifying Millo (that part of the city which was not the fort) with the quarter called Akra by the Greeks, though he also uses the word (with the article, however) of the fort itself. He regards the term 'city of David' as equivalent to Jerus. as it existed in David's time. He never uses the term Zion, which (see ZION) is in no part of the OT identified with any particular quarter of the city, though in the 1st cent. B.C. the author of 1 Mac appears to apply this name esp. to the Temple hill. The site of the upper city, or Upper Agora, is by general consent identified with the principal S.W. hill of Jerus., which Christian writers from the 4th cent. A.D. downwards call Zion. It is also not disputed that the lower city lay to the N. of this hill, which commanded the whole town, and was indeed the only hill on which a strong military situation could be found. The meaning of the word Millo is doubtful (it is usually rendered 'rampart' or 'filling'), and the site is not clearly indicated in the OT, but there is no reason to doubt that Jos. is right in identifying it with the lower city of his own time. It appears clear, then, that the Temple hill was not included in Jerusalem. It was the site of a threshing-floor, and such floors are always found outside towns and villages in Palestine. When the Temple was built, and the quarter of the Nethinim arose on Ophel ('the swell'),—a name applied later to the lower and narrower spur of the same hill S. of the Temple,—walls were of necessity extended to include this new quarter. The 'city of David' thus became a term applying to the old main quarters of Jerus., which alone existed in David's age, or perhaps esp. to the stronghold of Zion or upper city.

It has, however, been supposed by some recent writers (e.g. W. R. Smith, C. Wilson, Stade, Sayce, Buhl)* that the term 'city of David' should be applied to the spur S. of the Temple, the name Ophel not applying to the whole spur. It is clear, however (Neh $3^{26.27}$, Wars, V. iv. 2), that Ophel was a place with houses, and the spur in question presents an area of only a few acres, the crest being lower than the summits of the other hills, and unfitted for the erection of a citadel. The theory rests partly on a passage which, as rendered in AV, would make the aqueduct from Gihon run 'to the W. side of the city of David,' under Ophel (2 Ch 32^{30}). The true rendering (as given by Keil and others) may be, however, 'westwards to the city of David,' which agrees with the supposition that the latter term applies to the upper city. It is sometimes also urged that the tombs of the kings buried 'in the city of David' were on Ophel—a question to be considered later. The indications found in other passages seem to show that no part of the Temple ridge was within the city of David. In 1 K 8^{1} we find the ark described as brought up to the Temple 'out of the city of David' (so 2 Ch 5^{2}). In Neh 3^{15} the 'stairs that go down from the city of David' are noticed with Siloam. In 2 Ch 32^{5} 'the Millo' is placed 'in the city of David,' and it was not on the Temple ridge. In 2 Ch 33^{14} we read that Manasseh built 'an outer wall westwards to the city of David, as far as Gihon in the ravine.' It appears therefore that the topography shown in most recent maps is correct, and that the city of David included the fortress (מְצוּדָה) of the upper city, and the quarter called Millo, or the lower city to the N. Solomon also fortified 'the Millo' (1 K 9^{24}), and 'shut in the ravine (?; RV 'repaired the breach'; Heb. סָגַר אֶת־פֶּרֶץ) of the city of David his father' (1 K 11^{27}); and after the building of his own palace he brought his Egyp. queen to her palace 'out of the city of David' (1 K 9^{24}). Subsequent notices of Millo (2 K 12^{20}, 2 Ch 32^{5}) do not throw much more light on the subject, though Silla, noticed in the first of these, may be connected with the 'causeway' of another passage (1 Ch 26^{16}), and with the stairs from the city of David, if the word (see SILLA) means 'steps.' The causeway in question was W. of the Temple. As regards the water supply of Jerus. at this time the Gihon spring (now called the Virgin's Fountain) was at some distance from the upper city; but it is possible that the great reservoir (now called Hammâm el-Batrak, 'the Patriarch's Pool,' and by others Hezekiah's Pool), which stands immediately N. of the upper city, was already in existence within the walls. It is very probably the 'upper pool'

(Is 36[2]) which, in Hezekiah's time, had a conduit, and was situated near a 'highway.' It was here that the Assyr. appeared before Jerus. in B.C. 701, and Jos. tells us (Wars, V. vii. 2) that the 'camp of the Assyr.' was on the N.W. side of the old city, which was the natural quarter whence they would have approached from Philistia. The pool in question is called by him Amygdalon, and a conduit entering the city on this side is also noticed by him. An aqueduct still leads from the Birket Mamilla outside Jerus. on the W. to the Patriarch's Pool. This upper pool may have formed the chief supply of water within Jerus. as early as David's time.

As regards the royal palace of Solomon and of the later kings, we learn that it took thirteen years to build (1 K 7[1-12]). 'For he built the house of the forest of Lebanon: the length thereof was 100 cubits, and the breadth thereof 50 cubits, and the height thereof 30 cubits.' The pillars were of cedar with rafters above. It had a porch 50 cubits wide and 30 cubits long at one end, in which was the ivory throne of judgment. A Ḥarîm or women's house appears to have been attached; courts existed both within and outside, and the 'great court' (v.[12]) seems to have been connected with the Temple itself. In later times we read of the king's high house by the court of the guard (Neh 3[25], see 12[39]), as being immediately south of the Temple, and the King's Gate was in the same vicinity (1 Ch 9[18]), being probably the high gate of the king's house (2 Ch 23[20]), and the gate of the guard near the king's house, which adjoined the Temple (2 K 11[19]). Solomon's palace was outside the city of David (1 K 9[24], 2 Ch 8[11]), and the Horse Gate was by the king's house outside the Temple, being the way by which the horses came to the king's house (2 K 11[16], 2 Ch 23[15]). This gate was on Ophel S. of the Temple (Neh 3[28], see Jer 31[40], Jos. Ant. IX. vii. 2, 3). It is clear that Ezk refers to the palace as being divided from the Temple only by a wall (Ezk 43[8]), and there is a general agreement that the palace stood south of the Temple. It seems to have still existed after the Captivity,—probably in ruins,—but disappeared when the royal cloister of Herod's enlarged Temple enclosure was built, and it is not noticed by Jos. in his account of the Jerus. of his own time.

The fortification of the Ophel spur, south of the Temple, was begun by Jotham (2 Ch 27[3]), for Uzziah is only said to have strengthened the W. wall (2 Ch 26[9. 15]), and it was completed by Manasseh (33[14]). This wall existed no doubt, therefore, in Hezekiah's time, but was rendered more formidable by his successor. It is described in the latter passage as extending from the city of David to Gihon in the ravine, and as stretching to the Fish Gate on the N. side of the city. Ophel and the Temple were thus included, about B.C. 800, in the fortified circuit. As regards Gihon, it is to be noted that it is described as 'in the torrent-valley' (naḥal), a term which appears to apply exclusively to the Kidron Valley, the valley of Ben Hinnom being always denoted by another word (gai). Thus when Solomon was taken down to Gihon (1 K 1[33. 38]) he was in full view of the faction supporting Adonijah on the cliff of Zoheleth (now Zuhweileh) on the opposite side of the Kidron. The term Gihon ('bursting forth') indicates a natural spring, such as is found only at the so-called Virgin's Pool or 'Ain Umm ed-Deraj ('spring of the mother of steps') under the E. slope of Ophel. In the Bk. of Jos (15[7] 18[16]) this spring is called En-rogel, usually rendered 'Fuller's Spring,' and sometimes connected with the Fuller's Field (Is 36[2]),* but the true meaning is perhaps the 'spring of the water channel.' Hezekiah was the first to connect this spring with the Pool of Siloam by the aqueduct still existing (2 K 20[20], Is 22[11], 2 Ch 32[4. 30]), although it would seem that the 'ditch (or basin) between the two walls' had, according to Is, been already made for the waters of an older pool in the time of Ahaz. In the last-quoted passage Hezekiah's great work is described fully, and, as tr. more correctly than in the AV, may read 'stopped the upper spring of Gihon and brought it straight underground, westwards, to the city of David.' In 2 Ch 32[4] we read that when preparing for the Assyr. attack Hezekiah 'stopped the watercourse that ran (or overflowed) through the midst of the land' (or 'earth'; the LXX read πόλις, 'city'), in order to prevent the Assyrians from getting water. It seems probable that the sudden flow of the Gihon spring (which occurs intermittently) had formerly made a stream, flowing down the Kidron Valley (the bed of which was then much deeper), and that by means of the aqueduct the water was diverted to the Siloam pool, close to the city walls. The Gihon spring now rises in a cave reached by a descent of many steps, but the earth in front of the cave may have been first piled up by Hezekiah, and some natural outlet must at first have existed. The actual line of the old wall near Siloam is unknown, but in the account of the flight of Zedekiah we read of the 'way of the gate between the two walls, which is by the king's garden' (2 K 25[4], Jer 39[4]), this gate leading to the Arabah or Jordan Valley. Jos. understands a 'fortified ditch' on the side nearest to Jericho (Ant. X. viii. 2), and the king's garden (belonging no doubt to the palace) was close to Siloam (Neh 3[15]). Hence the wall of Jotham and Manasseh appears to have passed near Siloam. Gihon is called by Jos. 'Solomon's Pool' (Wars, V. iv. 1), and placed close to Ophel.

The general topography of Jerus., before its destruction by Nebuch., thus appears to be clear; but the site of the tombs of the kings is still controverted. Fifteen kings are said in the OT to have been buried in the 'city of David,' though Josephus only says 'in Jerusalem.' These were David, Solomon, Rehoboam, Abijah, Asa, Jehoshaphat, Joram, Ahaziah, Joash, Amaziah, Azariah, Jotham, Ahaz, Hezekiah, and Josiah. The monument was known in the time of John Hyrcanus (Ant. VII. xv. 3) and of Herod (XVI. vii. 1), both of whom sought treasure in it. It appears to have been known in the time of the apostles (Ac 2[29]), but Josephus unfortunately does not describe its position. According to the Mishna (Parah iii. 2, see Tosephta, Baba Bathra, ch. 1), the only tombs in Jerus. were those of the family of David and of the prophetess Huldah. Certain unworthy kings were, however, buried elsewhere. Manasseh was buried 'in the garden of his own house in the garden of Uzza' (2 K 21[18]), and Amon was buried in the same place (v.[26]). They are not said to have been buried in the city of David (see Ant. IX. x. 4, X. iii. 2), and, if the garden of Uzza was the same as the king's garden, it lay not far from the palace, and near Siloam, as above explained. This may account for the notice of the 'sepulchres of David' (Neh 3[16]) near Siloam, if the term 'city of David' is to be strictly applied only to the older city. It is possible that all the kings were buried in this 'burying-place' (2 Ch 26[23]), but it is remarkable that one ancient tomb is known in the lower city — that now called the tomb of Nicodemus immediately W. of the traditional Holy Sepulchre. Jos. gives a remarkable account of the tombs of the kings (Ant. VII. xv. 3) which might apply to this existing tomb, with three Kukim or tunnel graves at the far end, and three on each side, thus accommodating nine bodies. A hole in the floor leads to other Kukim below, to the left of the entrance. It might, therefore, have sufficed for the kings buried in the city of David if—which cannot now be determined on account of a wall foundation—there were six Kukim in the lower tier. It is not impossible that this monument may be the real tomb of the kings, but it is also possible that all were buried near Siloam within the city walls; and future excavation may reveal the 'sepulchres of David' near Siloam.

* In the Mishna, Sheḳalim viii. 1, it is stated that the upper market-place was occupied by pagan fullers.

The most complete account of the topography of Jerus. in the Bible is found in the Bk. of Neh, which relates his survey of the ruined walls, and details his restoration of the ancient circuit. In the first passage (Neh 2^{13-15}) he describes how he went out by the gate of the valley (gai), W. of Jerus., 'E. of the Dragon Spring,' which seems to be the Serpents' Pool of Jos. (τῶν ὄφεων κολυμβήθρα), W. of the city (Wars, v. iii. 2), the site being, however, unknown; and passing S. by the Dung Gate he reached the 'Gate of the Spring,' and the King's Pool (probably Siloam). Then, going up N. by the 'torrent-valley' (Kidron), and finding the road blocked with ruins, he returned to the Valley Gate. In the second passage (Neh 3^{1-32}) the whole course of the wall is described from N. of the Temple, W., S., E., and N., to the starting-point. The names of the gates, and other details, agree with the scattered notices of earlier passages, and must be considered in order. The Sheep Gate, repaired by the priests (cf. Neh 12^{39}), is generally allowed to have been on the N. of the Temple. The towers Hananel and Meah appear to have belonged to the 'fortress' (birah, an Aram. word, Assyr. biratu) of 'the house' or Temple (Neh 2^{8}), which was apparently the later Baris on the site of Antonia (see 1 Ch 29^{19}, Jos. Ant. XVIII. iv. 3, Wars, I. iii. 3, v. 4; Mishna, Middoth i. 9, Tamid iv. 1, Zebaḥim xii. 3). These two towers are again noticed (Neh 12^{39}) in the same position, and Hananel (Jer 31^{38}) marked the opposite extreme (on the east) of the breadth of the city measured from the Corner Gate. The Fish Gate (2 Ch 33^{14}, Neh 3^{3} 12^{39}, Zeph 1^{10}) was probably the entrance by which men of Tyre brought fish to Jerus. (Neh 13^{16}), and is generally supposed to have been on the N. wall. The Old Gate or gate of the old (city) was probably in the city of David, the wall of Manasseh extending to the Fish Gate (2 Ch 33^{14}), in connexion with which a place called the 'second' (city or quarter) is noticed (הַמִּשְׁנֶה, Zeph 1^{10}); it is also noticed in the time of Josiah (2 K 22^{14}, AV wrongly 'college'). It is not impossible that Jos. refers to this quarter, in one passage, when speaking of the 'other city' (ἄλλην πόλιν, Ant. XV. xi. 5). These indications would seem to place the Fish Gate at the head of the narrow valley which bounds the Temple on the W. E. of this valley was the 'second quarter,' walled in by Manasseh, and W. of it was the old city of David. Next to the Old Gate is noticed (Neh 3^{8} 12^{38}) the Broad Wall, probably in the weakest part of the city on the N.W., and in this vicinity a gate called the Gate of Ephraim (2 K 14^{13}, 2 Ch 25^{23}, Neh 8^{16} 12^{39}) is noticed, about 400 cubits from the Corner Gate: inside this gate and the Water Gate there was a 'broad place' (Neh 8^{16} AV 'street'), where booths could be erected, and the Gate of Ephraim was between the Broad Wall and the Old Gate. The description applies to the flat ground immediately N. of the N.W. corner of the upper city.* Beyond the Broad Wall was the Tower of Furnaces (Neh 3^{11}) near the Gate of the Valley which probably led out to the Valley of Hinnom, to which this term (gai) seems to be generally confined (see 2 Ch 26^{9}, Neh 2^{13}). The Tower of Furnaces may be one of those built by Uzziah at the Valley Gate, and at the Corner Gate, and his towers thus seem to have occupied the site of the later 'Royal Towers' (Wars, II. xvii. 6) at the N.W. corner of the upper city. The Corner Gate (2 K 14^{13}, 2 Ch 25^{23} 26^{9}, Jer 31^{38}, Zec 14^{10}) was apparently the same as the 'first' (or 'principal') gate, and was clearly on the W. of the city, where the principal road from the plains reached Jerusalem. The Dung Gate was 1000 cubits from the Valley Gate (Neh 2^{13} 3^{14} 12^{31}), and is perhaps the same as the Harsith Gate near the Valley of Hinnom (Jer 19^{2}), sometimes rendered Gate of Potsherds. The dunghills of the city must have been in this neighbourhood. The place called Bethso by Jos. (Wars, v. iv. 2) is sometimes explained to mean Beth zoah, 'house of dung,' and would be in the same vicinity, on the W. side of the upper city. The Gate of the Spring (Neh 2^{14} 3^{15} 12^{37}) may have led to Siloam, with which it is noticed, and was apparently near the S.E. slope of the upper city. It is probably the gate by which Zedekiah fled (2 K 25^{4}, Jer 39^{4}), and is noticed in connexion with the wall of the Pool of Siloah, and with the king's garden, and the stairs from the city of David. The next points on the wall were 'over against' the sepulchres of David, and at the 'Tower of Heroes' (gibborim), and the 'turning of the wall' (Neh $3^{16.19}$). On Ophel was the 'Projecting Tower' near the Water Gate, and apparently close to the ancient palace by the 'Court of the Guard' (Neh $3^{25.26}$). The Water Gate would lead to the Gihon spring—probably by the rocky shaft which runs up to the surface of the hill, at the back of the cave in which the Gihon wells up. Between this and the Temple the ruins of a great projecting tower still exist on the old wall. The Horse Gate leading to the palace was close to the Temple, and from it the priests repaired the wall (2 K 11^{16}, 2 Ch 23^{15}, Neh 3^{28}, Jer 31^{40}). The palace is again noticed as the 'House of David' (Neh 12^{37}). On the E. wall of the Temple were two gates called Gate of Benjamin (Jer 20^{2}, Zec 14^{10}) and Gate of the Guard (2 K $11^{6.19}$ [הַשֹּׁעֵר אַחַר הָרָצִים], Neh 12^{39} [ש׳ הַמַּטָּרָה]). One of these may have been the Upper Gate (2 K 15^{35}, 2 Ch 23^{20}), noticed with Ophel, and one the Gate of Ham-miphkad (Neh 3^{31}). The description of the circuit closes at the N.E. corner of the Temple, and at the Sheep Gate whence it commences. There is, as shown, nothing which indicates discrepancy between this formal account and the earlier incidental notices of the city before the Captivity, or any difficulty in tracing the approximate line of the walls. The city so described occupied about 200 acres, and it is spoken of as extensive in Nehemiah's time (Neh 7^{4}). The suggestion once made, that Jerus. before the Captivity occupied only the E. Temple hill, has found few supporters, and it would reduce the city to the impossible area of some 10 acres, not including the Temple. The upper city and lower city are clearly supposed by Jos. to have existed in the time of David and Solomon, and the measurements of 400 and 1000 cubits, above noticed, cannot be reconciled with a view which would make Solomon's capital smaller than any of the modern village hamlets of Palestine. Ancient cities like Tyre and Cæsarea occupied an area of more than 100 acres, as did Rabbath Ammon; and Jerus. was at least as important as any of these.*

* Other places in Jerus. noticed in OT include the Temple Gate Sur (2 K 11^{6}; in 2 Ch 23^{5} 'gate of the foundation' [הַיְסוֹד] should prob. be 'gate Sur' [סוּר]), the New Gate—apparently the higher (or inner) Temple Gate (Jer 26^{10} 36^{10}), the graves of the common people (Jer 26^{23} 31^{40}) apparently in the Kidron Valley, the Prison or 'Guard' (Jer $37^{15.}$ [בֵּית הָאֲסוּר] ^{21} 38^{6} [חֲצַר הַמַּטָּרָה]), the Baker's Street (37^{21}); the Third Entry (or Chief Entry) of the Temple (38^{14}), the King's wine-presses (probably near the king's

We must next consider the topography of the Greek age, when the Hasmonæans carried out important works at Jerus., and the position of the Gr. citadel or Akra, which threatened the Temple. The Greeks are said to have fortified the city of David for themselves to lie in wait against the Temple (1 Mac 1^{33}), to which the term Zion seems to be applied by this writer (1 Mac $4^{36.\ 60}$ 7^{32}): the Gr. tower was by (παρά) the Temple (1 Mac 9^{52} 13^{52}), and they issued from the city of David to the Temple (14^{36}). Since the Temple hill was not in the city of David, it would seem that the tower in question was not on the Temple hill. Josephus, in relating the history of this period, calls the tower 'the Akra,'—a term which, as before noticed, he applies to citadels both in the upper and in the lower city. He, however, places the Gr. fortress in the lower city, which was then high, overlooking (ὑπερκειμένη) the Temple (Ant. XII. v. 4). From this citadel Nicanor came down to (εἰς) the Temple (XII. x. 5), and the citadel lay over (ἐπέκειτο) the Temple (XII. ix. 3). In another place he says that the Akra was no other than the lower city (Wars, V. vi. 1), and this apparent contradiction is explained in the passage which relates how Simon, brother of Judas Maccabæus, took the Gr. citadel, and levelled the hill on which it stood, so that the Temple might be higher than it (ὑψηλότερον ᾖ τὸ ἱερόν), a work which occupied three years (Ant. XIII. vi. 6). The tower (ἡ Ἄκρα) of 1 Mac is thus identified by Jos. with Akra, afterwards the lower city. He distinctly explains this in another passage (Wars, V. iv. 1), where he says that the Temple ridge (λόφος) was naturally lower than the Akra, and separated from it by a broad valley (φάραγγι), which the Hasmonæans filled up in order to join the city to the Temple, and demolished the tower so that the Temple might be higher than it. Before the destruction of the Gr. tower Jonathan built a wall in the middle of the city (1 Mac 12^{36}, Ant. XIII. v. 11), which divided the Jews from the Greeks. It seems clear that such a wall—which may have run along the N. face of the hill of the upper city—could not have affected a citadel on the Temple hill. Some recent writers have supposed this citadel to have stood N. of the Temple, where Baris—the later Antonia—was subsequently built by the Hasmonæans (Ant. XV. xi. 4), this view being supported by the Eng. tr. (Ant. XII. ix. 3), which makes the Akra 'adjoin' the Temple,—an incorrect rendering. It is clear that if the site of the Akra was levelled it cannot have been the same high rock still existing, on which—by general consent—Baris or Antonia is held to have been built, apparently by John Hyrcanus (Ant. XVIII. iv. 3), though, as already shown, towers there probably existed in Nehemiah's time and earlier. Most modern plans (including the Ord. Surv. of Jerus., which shows Akra W. of the Temple) agree in placing the lower city N. of the upper and W. of the Temple. The valley W. of the Temple may thus conveniently be termed in future the Hasmonæan Valley, which they filled in with the soil from the Akra hill when it was lowered.

From the Hasmonæan period we pass on to consider Jerus. as it existed under Herod the Great, and at the time of the great siege by Titus; and here the accounts given by Jos. are easily understood, and accord with the earlier topography of OT. Tacitus gives us a short description (Hist. v. 11. 12), in which he states that Jerus. occupied two hills, with great walls with flanking portions, and crags with towers 60 ft. above the crags, or 120 ft. high when on the flat ground. There were other walls under the royal palace, and the tower of Antonia was particularly conspicuous. There was a fountain of water which ran perpetually, and the mountains were hollowed beneath, and pools and cisterns made for rain water. This brief notice agrees with the more detailed account by Josephus. He states (Wars, v. iv. 1, 2) that Jerus. had three walls on the only side (the N.) on which it was not defended by impassable valleys. It was founded on two hills facing (ἀντιπρόσωπος) each other, and these were divided by a valley in which the houses ended (κατέληγον) on either side (ἐπάλληλοι). The hill which supported (on the S.W.) the upper city (τὴν ἄνω πόλιν ἔχων) was by far the highest and largest. It was the fortress (φρούριον) of David, and the Upper Agora of the time of Josephus. The other hill (to the N.W.) was called Akra (not the Akra), and was gibbous (ἀμφίκυρτος) in shape. Over against (ἀντικρύ) this was a third ridge (λόφος), naturally lower than Akra, and separated from it by the broad valley filled in by the Hasmonæans. The valley dividing the upper and lower city was called Tyropœon ('of the cheesemakers'), and reached to Siloam. This is clearly the deep, broad valley, or recess, described under the head 'Natural Site,' which falls E., on the N. side of the upper city, and joining the Hasmonæan Valley runs down to meet the Kidron at Siloam. The original city stood on the two hills, and the third to the E. was the Temple ridge. In another passage (Ant. XV. xi. 5) Jos. says that the city was placed opposite the Temple like a theatre, girt with a deep valley (that of Hinnom) on the S. Opposite Antonia was a fourth hill called Bezetha (which Jos. renders 'the new city'), separated from that citadel by a deep fosse. It is not impossible that this word is the Aram. Bezatha (בזאתא [?]), 'division.' (Schürer, HJP I. ii. 239 n., thinks it is בית זיתא 'place of olives'). It was the N. part of the Temple ridge divided off by the still existing rock-cut fosse. Jos. next describes the walls, of which the first was attributed to David and Solomon, and later kings. The First Wall ran E. from the tower Hippicus to the Xystus, under the W. wall of the Temple, and this N. face of the wall seems to be the same wall in the middle of the city built by the Hasmonæans. Hippicus stood at the N.W. angle, and was one of three royal towers (Wars, II. xvii. 1), the other two being Phasaelus and Mariamne. They stood close to Herod's palace in the upper city (Wars, I. xxi. 1, II. xvii. 6, V. iv. 4, VI. viii. 1), and varied in height, though apparently, according to Tacitus (Hist. v. 11), the tops of the towers were on a level. This was due to the varying height of the rock basis, and these towers possibly correspond with the three main towers of the modern citadel, that which is popularly known as Hippicus being the largest, and corresponding to Phasaelus, the largest royal tower. Phasaelus had an outer 'cloister,' and the great 'Tower of David' is still distinguished by an outer walk round it, at the top of the scarp of the main ditch. From Hippicus the old wall, on the W. side of the upper city, ran S. to Bethso (already noticed as perhaps meaning the 'House of Dung'), which lay where the dunghills of the city are still placed. It passed a gate called the Gate of the Essenes, and its S. face extended to Siloam, where it bent, and evidently left the pool outside, since the Romans drew water at Siloam before the city was taken (Wars, v. ix. 4). On the E. it passed by Solomon's Pool (prob. Gihon), and reached to Ophel, where it joined the E. cloister of the Temple. The Tyropœon Valley, garden, Zec 14^{10}), 'the suburbs' (parbarim)* close to the Temple (2 K 23^{11}), and the middle city (2 K 20^{4}) or middle court (MSS and all versions). The site of the Middle Gate (Jer 39^{3}) is unknown. The gate Shallecheth (1 Ch 26^{16}) was by a causeway W. of the Temple.

* Perhaps 'colonnade.' The word (פַּרְבָּר in 1 Ch 26^{18}, פַּרְוָרִים in 2 K 23^{11}) is apparently Persian, and means properly something lighted, namely, by the sun.

as already explained, was divided from the upper Hinnom Valley by a narrow neck of land, close to the royal towers. It is remarkable that in this valley of 'Cheesemakers' there is still a street where fresh cheeses are sold, and the modern features of the city generally—the fortress of Antonia, the castle at the royal towers, the Temple itself, the situation even of the dunghills outside the wall—retain to the present day the same character as in the time of Josephus. The main market of Jerus. is placed just where the Upper Agora of Herodian times, and of Nehemiah's age, must have existed. The Second Wall is more briefly described. It started from a gate called Gennath (prob. the 'garden' gate of the palace), which was in the first wall, and circling round (κυκλούμενον) enclosed the N. part only (τὸ προσάρκτιον κλίμα μόνον) reaching to Antonia. It thus defended Akra or the lower city. It is clearly probable that this wall was built on high ground, and more likely to have crossed the neck of high land already noticed than to have dived down into the Tyropœon, more than 100 ft. below the ground outside it. But if it went 'in a curve,' and started from this point near Phasaelus, it must have also enclosed, or run close to, the high knoll now shown as Calvary. What is known of the rock in this part indicates the existence of a broad trench, W. and N. of the knoll in question, which may have been the fosse of the second wall which, joining Antonia—the modern barracks—at its N.W. angle, was also protected by the Bezetha fosse, which is traceable W. of Antonia. The discovery of part of an ancient wall N. of the royal towers will be noticed under the heading 'Antiquities.

The Third Wall of Jerus. had no existence till after the Crucifixion, being that of Agrippa (Ant. XIX. vii. 2; Wars, V. iv. 2). It ran from Hippicus to a great octagonal tower called Psephinus, at its N.W. corner—a place whence a wide view was obtained, and consequently on very high ground. Thence it ran E. to the Women's Towers, opposite the tomb of Helena, widow of the king of Adiabene, which was 3 furlongs from Jerus. (Ant. XX. iv. 3), and acc. to Pausanias had a rolling stone at its entrance (Græciæ Descript. viii. 16). Jerome states that it lay E. of the great N. road (Epit. Paulæ), and these indications point to the conspicuous monument in Gr.-Jewish style, with a rolling stone at the door, which is now called the 'Tomb of the Kings.' If the measurement is correct, the third wall must have run farther N. than the present N. wall of Jerusalem. Some suppose it to have followed the present line throughout, placing Psephinus—in accordance with mediæval tradition—at the castle of the Pisans (Kal'at Jalûd), a ruined 12th cent. castle near the N.W. corner of modern Jerusalem. Robinson, however, found traces of an ancient wall running N.W., in continuation of the present wall, towards the high ground on the watershed near the present Russian cathedral, where probably Psephinus stood.

Jos. says that the third wall stretched a long way (μηκυνόμενον) by the royal caverns, after passing the point opposite Helena's monument, and here it must have stood on the same scarp occupied by the modern wall, E. of the Damascus Gate, in which scarp is the entrance to these caverns or quarries under the city. It then bent (prob. at the existing N.E. angle, which has a rock scarp and fosse), and from the corner tower (still extant), near the Monument of the Fuller (γναφέως), it ran to meet the old wall (apparently of the Temple) by the Kidron Valley. This general description offers no great difficulties, and the only points in dispute are the exact line of the second wall, and of the third wall towards the W. As regards the first point, it should be further noticed that Jos. describes a great pool called Amygdalon, where the 10th and 15th Legions encamped in attacking the upper city on the N.W. (Wars, V. xi. 4). The name seems to mean 'almond pool, but perhaps stands for Ham-migdalon, 'Pool of the Great Tower,' from its proximity to Phasaelus. It is usually identified with the existing Hammâm el-Batrak, the 'upper pool' already noticed. This pool is not mentioned till after the taking of the second wall, and seems to have lain inside its circuit, which agrees with the course of the wall generally advocated. Those who regard the traditional Calvary as the true site seek to trace the second wall on the lower ground, S. and E. of the Calvary knoll, in which case it is almost impossible so to draw its lines as to allow of its both running 'in a circle,' and also avoiding the deep broad Tyropœon, which has its head close to the E. side of the pool Amygdalon. If the second wall ran close to the knoll, the third wall cannot have coincided, on the N.W., with the present city wall, which is too close to the line so traced. The whole question is thus mainly influenced by opinion as to the site of Calvary.

In concluding this account of the topography about A.D. 70, various places noticed by Jos. may be briefly mentioned. On the N., 7 furlongs from the city, was Scopus (Wars, II. xix. 7, v. 3), near the present village Sha'fat, a high ridge commanding a view of Jerusalem. Close to Antonia was the pool Struthius (Wars, V. xi. 4), prob. the later Piscina Interior, recently discovered W. of the Church of St. Anne. E. of the Kidron, on Olivet, was a place called the Rock of the Dovecots (τῆς περιστερεῶνος), and just N. of the village of Siloam is a quarry with remains resembling a dovecot (Wars, V. xii. 2; see Ord. Survey Notes, p. 64). On the S. was the tomb of Ananus, which is possibly the Gr.-Jewish tomb in the cliff S. of the Hinnom Valley, close to its junction with the Kidron, now known as the 'retreat of the apostles,' and used—as is shown by remains of frescoes—as a chapel in the Middle Ages. W. of Jerus. were 'Herod's monuments,' near the Serpent Pool (Wars, V. iii. 2, vii. 2, xii. 2). The exact site is unknown, but a fine Gr.-Jewish masonry tomb has recently been discovered W. of the Upper Hinnom Valley, opposite the upper city. These places are noted as points on the wall of circumvallation, made by Titus after the third wall was taken. It ran along the E. slope of the Kidron, and outside the Hinnom Valley. On the N.W. it passed the camp of the Assyr., which was outside the second wall (Wars, V. xii. 2). Within the city there was a theatre, in an unknown position (Ant. XV. viii. 1), and the palace of the Hasmonæans (Ant. XX. viii. 11; Wars, II. xvi. 3) overlooked the W. cloister of the Temple, near the great bridge, and stood apparently on the cliff at the N.E. corner of the upper city. Other palaces of Agrippa, of Bernice, and of Helena are noticed (Wars, II. xvii. 6, IV. xix. 11, VI. vi. 1–3): the first may have been Herod's palace, but that of Helena (and of Monobasus her husband) was in the lower city, as were apparently the Council house and the archives (Wars, VI. vi. 3). The Xystus, or gymnasium, built by the high priest Jason (1 Mac 1^{14}; Ant. XII. v. 1), was near the great bridge, in the valley W. of the Temple (Wars, II. xvi. 2, 3, V. iv. 1, VI. iii. 2, viii. 1). The Hippodrome S. of the Temple may be the same as Herod's theatre (Wars, I. xxxiii. 6, II. iii. 1). Jos. also speaks of secret passages near the royal towers and Herod's palace (Wars, VI. viii. 1), and such a passage still exists leading from the site of this palace underground towards the Temple hill. The city and Temple were supplied with water by Pilate's aqueduct, 200 furlongs long, from Etham ('Ain 'Atân) S. of Bethlehem, and from 'Ain Kueizîba still farther S. It still brings water along the S. slope of the upper city to the Temple enclosure (Ant. XVIII. iii. 2; see Talm. Bab. Joma 31*a*).

The places noticed in NT in or near Jerus.—Bethesda, Gethsemane, and Calvary—have been separately treated. Bethesda was very probably the same as Gihon. Calvary cannot be located with certainty, but is now regarded by many as the knoll N. of the Damascus Gate, which was outside the third wall, at the so-called 'Jeremiah's Grotto.' See, further, art. GOLGOTHA. The Judgment Hall of Pilate (Jn 18^{28}) appears to have been distinct from Herod's palace (Lk 23^{7}), and was probably in Antonia. The Pavement (λιθόστρωτον), called Gabbatha (wh. see) in Aram., was in this hall (Jn 19^{13}), and Jos. uses this term in speaking of the Temple pavement (Wars, VI. i. 8). The site of the high priest's palace (Mt 26^{58}, Mk 14^{54}, Lk 22^{54}, Jn 18^{15}) was probably also near the Temple.

Talmudic notices of Jerus. (see Neubauer, Géog. Talm. s.v.) are of little value, unless from the Mishna. An ancient rose garden is said to have existed (Talm. Bab. Baba Ḳamma 82*a*). All tombs and tanneries were outside the town (Mishna, Baba Bathra, ii. 9), but ancient tombs were suspected to exist under the surface (Parah iii. 2), and foundations were consequently not dug deep (Baba Ḳamma vii. end). Only the royal tombs and that of Huldah were allowed within the walls (Tosephta, Baba Bathra, ch. i.). The upper and lower markets are noticed (Tosephta, Sanhed. ch. 14), and there were two places called Betzain (בצין), an upper and a lower, in Jerusalem. The lower dated from Ezra's age, the upper was included in Jerus. by a later king, and lay on the 'weak' (that is, the N.) side (Talm. Jer. Sanhed. v.; Tosephta, Sanhed. ch. 3; Talm. Bab. Shebuoth 16*a*; Megillath Taanith, ch. 6). This word seems to mean a 'cutting' or 'fosse,' and the upper Betza may be the Bezetha fosse. A place called Beth Mamila is also noticed (Talm. Bab. Erubin 51*b*, Sanhed. 24*a*; Bereshith Rabba, ch. 51), the name of which may survive at the Birket Mamilla, W. of the city. The 'market of fatteners' and the 'wool market' were towards the N. (Mishna, Erubin x. 9; see Jos., Wars, v. viii. 1, where the wool, cloth, and braziers' markets are placed just inside the second wall); and the pagan fullers occupied the upper market (Mishna, Shekalim viii. 1). The Stone of Proclamation (Mishna, Taanith iii. 8), where lost property was cried, seems to have been in the lower city. The tomb of Kalba Shebuya—a rich man of the time of the great siege (Talm. Bab. Gittin 56*a*)—is placed by modern Jewish tradition at the tomb of Helena of Adiabene. The tomb of the Sanhedrin (popularly of the judges) and that of Simon the Just are also shown by the Jews N. of the city. They are Gr.-Jewish monuments.

Space will not allow of any account of the later Roman, Byzantine, Arab, Norman, or recent topography of Jerusalem. The important points have been noticed in speaking of the history. The obliteration of the older ruins in later times must be carefully held in view in considering existing remains, and the mediæval traditions often confuse a topography which is only to be studied in the Bible and in Josephus.

V. ANTIQUITIES.—The existing antiquities dating before A.D. 70 include the remains of the city walls, towers, pools, aqueducts, and tombs, together with the foundations of the temple walls, its bridges and gates, and the site of Antonia with its outer fosse. The extant inscriptions are few. Many of these ruins have been brought to light by excavation since 1867. They are mingled with later remains, such as the Ecce Homo Arch,—probably erected by Hadrian or his successors,—the work of Constantine and Justinian, the wall of Eudoxia, and the numerous churches and chapels of Byzant. and 12th cent. origin; while the Temple Area is covered with the buildings of the Khalifs succeeding 'Abd el-Melek. The remains of Walls, as yet known, belong chiefly to the first wall. Its N. face followed the steep slopes and cliffs which are shown, by observations of the rock in house foundations, to have formed the N. side of the hill of the upper city. The royal towers still present, in their lower courses, the large drafted masonry of Herod's age, which occurs also in the Temple walls; but a later sloping scarp was added outside the walks which surround the so-called Tower of David (prob. Phasaelus), by the Crusaders. At the Protestant cemetery, south of the present S.W. angle of the Turkish wall, a rock scarp, with projecting rock bases for towers, was explored in 1874–5. It has recently (1894–6) been traced eastwards, and it is generally allowed to represent the S.W. angle of the ancient wall. Dr. Bliss has traced a wall thence to Siloam—where it was explored by Dr. Guthe in 1881—enclosing the pool. The character of the masonry is that distinctive of the Byzantine age, and the wall appears to be that built by Eudoxia (about B.C. 450), which enclosed Siloam. The pool, as shown above, was outside the walls in A.D. 70. Under this wall, however, in parts, on the S. slope of the upper city, Dr. Bliss has found remains of an older wall generally of rougher masonry. In one part the Byzantine wall is not carried to the rock, but rests on rubbish under which the old wall was hidden. A gate towards the west of the south face of the upper city wall belongs to the older period, but was renewed in the later times. This seems to answer to the gate of the Essenes noticed by Jos., and it is possibly the Dung Gate of Neh. in Bethso. The point where the old wall crossed the Tyropœon above Siloam is still unknown, but on Ophel Sir C. Warren discovered a fine rampart under the surface, running S. from the S.E. corner of the Haram enclosure for 70 ft., and then S.W. for 700 ft., with a great tower near this end, 80 ft. face and 20 ft. projection. The upper part of the wall is of masonry like that of the modern S. wall of Jerus., but this appears to have been re-used. The first 20 ft. from the foundations present a rough rubble of moderate dimensions, not unlike the masonry of the old wall found by Dr. Bliss. This is founded, not on rock, but on red virgin soil. The rock was traced farther S. on Ophel by Dr. Guthe in 1881, and the masonry then found was of Byzantine character. Although the older wall thus traced in parts, from the gate of the Essenes to the E. cloister of the Temple, does not usually present in situ the fine masonry of the Herodian age, it is possible that the rude foundations may belong to Nehemiah's age, the wall erected on them having been used up by later builders in the present city wall and in the upper part of the Temple ramparts. As regards the second wall, it is impossible to trace it under the houses of the modern city; but in 1883 a wall of masonry like that of the royal towers was found, running N. on the neck of high land W. of the Amygdalon Pool. This is probably part of the second wall. The third wall was still traceable outside the city when Dr. Robinson visited Jerus. half a cent. ago (BRP^{2} i. 315), but the only remains of its course now traceable are the scarp E. of the Damascus Gate, and possibly the remains of a tower on a rocky knoll N. of the gate and W. of the main N. road, where the Women's Towers appear to have marked an angle in the wall. There are some fine stones in the side of a tank farther N., which may have belonged to the third wall, but they are not apparently in situ. It will, however, be seen that exploration has now shown us approximately the course of the first wall, and the starting-point of the second on the W., while remains of the third can also be laid down on the map from measurements and angles taken by Dr. Robinson. The points still requiring study on the ground affect the farther course of the second wall, and the point at which the first wall crossed the Tyropœon Valley. A fine flight of broad steps discovered close to Siloam on the north may mark the position of the 'stairs from the city of David' in the Tyropœon.

The various Pools of ancient Jerus. have been described, and it is only necessary to add that the great pool in the Hinnom Valley, now called Birket es-Sultân, did not exist till the 12th cent., though called in the 14th 'The lower pool of Gihon.' The wall of its dam bears an inscription of A.D. 1537. In the 12th cent. it was built by the Germans, and is called 'the German Lake' and the 'New Cistern' (Citez de Jherusalem after A.D. 1187, and Theodoric A.D. 1172; Cartulary of Holy Sep. Nos. 169, 170). In addition to Pilate's Aqueduct on the S. there was a conduit to the royal towers (Jos. Wars, v. vii. 2), perhaps the older conduit of the upper pool. Such a conduit still enters the city from the Birket Mamilla on the W. An aqueduct has also been found on the W. slope of Bezetha leading to the fosse N. of Antonia. It seems to have collected rain water from the rocks N. of the city to fill the fosse. It is continued through the rock of Antonia, in a narrow passage to which Jos. alludes, in connexion with Strato's Tower and Antonia (Ant. XIII. xi. 2; Wars, I. iii. 4), and it is now closed at the end by the Ḥaram wall, inside which, not far off, is a large cistern to which the passage—if used as an aqueduct—may have led. It would seem to have been cut before the time of Herod, perhaps by the Hasmonæans, and to have existed—as did the Antonia fosse—in the time of Pompey. It may, however, have served as a secret exit from a window in the Ḥaram wall, which has been found above the passage. The oldest Jerus. aqueduct is, however, probably that of Hezekiah, leading from Gihon to Siloam. The inscription found near its mouth in 1881 is cut on the rock wall of the tunnel, and records in ancient Heb. letters the fact that the tunnel was begun from both ends, the parties meeting in the middle, and that it was 1200 cubits long. The length as chained is 1658 ft. long, giving a cubit of 16 in. The point of junction was determined by the surveyors near the centre. The course of this tunnel is very winding, and the level appears to have been lowered near the mouth to obtain a proper flow. The aqueduct branches out of a passage at the back of the Gihon pool, leading to a shaft with steps reaching up to the surface of the Ophel hill at the probable site of the Water Gate. (As to the questions that have been raised regarding the date of this inscription see the Literature cited in art. HEZEKIAH, p. 377[a], footnote).

The existing Tombs of the city include the monument of Helena already noticed, in an under chamber of which de Saulcy discovered a sarcophagus bearing an Aram. inscription, with the name of 'queen Sarah,' and early Rom. coins. Sarah may have been the native name of Helena. The monuments of Herod have also been noticed, and the tomb of Ananus (Wars, v. xii. 2). On the E. side of the Kidron are four fine monuments in Gr.-Jewish style, not unlike that of the Petra tombs. The most northerly (now called Absalom's Tomb) has a masonry cupola, and is possibly the tomb of Alex. Jannæus (Wars, v. xii. 2), which lay in this direction. The so-called Tomb of St. James is a true Jewish chamber, with an outer Doric porch bearing, in early square Heb., the names of priests of the Bene Hezir family, and probably cut about A.D. 50. The other two monuments to the S. are uninscribed, but of the same period. The Tombs of the Judges (so called) belong to the Rom. period, and near them is a broken tomb with a fragment of Aram. inscription of about the 1st cent. A.D. Immediately W. of the knoll of Jeremiah's Grotto (the possible site of Calvary) are remains of a Jewish tomb, with an additional chamber in the Gr. style. There is a large cemetery near, with Christian tombs of the Byzantine and Crusaders' ages, interspersed with some which bear mediæval Jewish texts. The tombs S. of the Hinnom Valley are also Byzantine, bearing texts which connect them with the Church of St. Sion on the hill of the upper city hard by. The so-called Tomb of Simon the Just, N. of Jerus., is also a Greek tomb.

Before describing the remains of the Temple and of Antonia, a word may be added as to Inscriptions discovered at Jerusalem. The majority of these are Byzantine Greek-Christian texts and tombstones of Crusaders. An inscription of Hadrian is built upside down into the S. wall of the Temple. Another of the time of Trajan (dating A.D. 117), found in the upper city, records the worship of Serapis at Jerusalem. The osteophagi on Olivet bear Gr. names, and in one case a Heb. text is marked with a cross, as though belonging to a Jewish Christian. They date probably from the 2nd to the 4th cent. A.D. Later Jews have also cut their names on the Temple walls, but the only Jewish texts previous to A.D. 70 are those above mentioned on the tombs, the Siloam Text, probably written about B.C. 702,* and the boundary stone of the Temple enclosure, with Gr. inscription excluding strangers.

The great Ḥaram enclosure at J. presents, at its foundations, magnificent drafted masonry of Gr. character, on the S., W., and E. The dressing of the stones is found nowhere else except at Hebron, and on the arch of the Tyropœon Bridge, but in general character this masonry resembles that of the royal towers, and of the palace of Hyrcanus, built in A.D. 176 at Tyrus in Gilead. The stones average 3½ ft. in height, but on the S. wall a 'master course' 7 ft. high runs W. for 600 ft. from the S.E. angle. The longest stones measure 24 and 39 ft. The whole of this masonry is dressed smooth on face and draft, excepting at the base of the W. wall for 20 ft., under an ancient pavement near the Tyropœon Bridge, and on the E. wall N. of the Golden Gate, where the head of a cross valley exists inside the wall. Probably, in these cases, the rough-faced stones were never visible above the surface. On the E. wall, at the base, are masons' marks in red paint, and two or three Phœn. letters which have forms of a late period. The Tyropœon Bridge, crossing to the upper city from the W. wall close to the S., consisted of two spans. Beneath the old pavement under the bridge an older voussoir has been found, lying in a rock aqueduct, and evidently belonging to an older bridge. The N. side of the Ḥaram is partly bounded by the great block of rock on which the citadel of Antonia stood, and east of this the N. wall presents none of the original masonry, but is built in the later Rom. or Byzant. style. Nor is there any angle in the old E. wall at this point. The smooth masonry which occurs above the drafted was built later than the time of Hadrian,—probably by Justinian,—and the upper part of the rampart is Arab work. The original drafted

* This Siloam inscription, now removed and preserved in fragments in the Stamboul Museum, must not be confused with an illegible text in Phœn. characters (now in the Brit. Mus.) found in the village of Siloam. The words Beth Baal have been read on the latter, and it may indicate the situation of one of Solomon's temples on Olivet.

masonry is attributed by de Vogüé to Herod the Great—an opinion very generally accepted; and no remains of earlier work in the Ḥaram are known. The enclosure is an oblong, with right angles on the S.W. and N.E. The S.E. angle measures 92½°. The S. wall is 922 ft. long, the N. 1042 ft., the W. 1601 ft., and the E. 1042 ft. The area included is about 35 acres. The Tyropœon Bridge appears to be of the same age with the ancient wall, and the older voussoir may have belonged to the bridge broken down by Pompey (Jos. Ant. XIV. iv. 2; Wars, I. vii. 2). In the S. wall there are two ancient gates, which answer to the two Huldah Gates of the Mishna (Middoth i. 3): they appear to have been originally both double, with two inner passages having a total width of 40 ft. (30 cubits), the roofs supported by great columns, and presenting flat domes. The domes of the W. gate remain intact, presenting a semi-classic design of coffer pattern, intertwined with a vine in low relief. This work is attributed by Ferguson the architect to the time of Herod. The lintels of the entrances were formed by huge blocks 18 ft. span. The E. gate (now called the Triple Gate) was altered later,—probably by Justinian,—and the passages leading N. from these gates seem probably also to belong to this later period. The vaults in the S.E. corner of the Ḥaram are also later restorations, but remains of a more ancient vaulting are found, by an ancient window, on the E. wall in these vaults.

On the W. there were four entrances to the enclosure, the S. being at the Tyropœon Bridge. The next is a subterranean gate with a passage leading up from the level of the valley. The third was connected with a causeway which appears to be ancient, but which is not noticed by Josephus. The last, to the N., is now converted into a cistern, but the original passage pierced the wall, and belonged to a gate on or near the level of the valley. These gates seem therefore to answer to the Parbar or 'suburb' gates of the Mishna, and to the four entrances noticed by Jos., on the W. side of the Temple (Ant. XV. xi. 5), of which the first led to the royal S. cloister, the second to the suburb (προάστειον), the third also to the suburb, and the fourth to the 'other city,' by a descent of steps into the valley.

Within the Ḥaram there are no known remains of the ancient Temple, except the great rock-cut vaults and cisterns, of which the largest towards the S.—called the Great Sea—is supported on rock pillars, and capable of holding three million gallons. On the N. the scarp of Antonia rises 30 ft. above the flat rock surface of the inner court, and the block of rock measures 140 ft. N. and S. by 350 ft. E. and W. The fosse to the N. was converted later (before A.D. 333) into a 'twin pool,' by walls and vaulted roofs, and this is identified in the 4th cent. A.D. with Bethesda. In A.D. 70, however, the twin pools had probably no existence. On the W. Ḥaram wall the present writer, in 1873, discovered, close to Antonia, the existence of projecting piers of the ancient masonry above the level of the inner court, resembling those which adorn the wall of the Hebron Ḥaram, which consists of masonry like that of the Jerus. enclosure. In other parts the wall does not reach this level, but it appears probable that the same arrangement existed, at the same level, on the other faces of the enclosure. These remains, together with 40 observations of the level of the rock surface, visible in tanks or vaults, or at the foot of the wall, are the only antiquities known to remain which enable us to understand the area and position of the Temple enclosure, and of Antonia as restored by Herod the Great.

VI. THE TEMPLE ENCLOSURE.—Solomon's Temple (1 K 6, 2 Ch 3; Ant. VIII. iii.) was 60 cubits long E. and W., 20 broad, and 30 high (the cubit, as measured at Siloam, and on the masonry of the Jerus. Ḥaram and Galilæan synagogues, being about 16 in.). Its porch to the E. was 20 cubits broad and 10 cubits deep. The chambers, on N., S., and W., were built with a wall set back in steps, so that the interiors in the third storey were 7 cubits wide, in the second 6 cubits, in the first 5 cubits. The thickness of the walls is not stated. The roofs were of cedar, and the interior gilded with designs similar to the Bab. bas-reliefs of cherubs guarding palm trees. The whole structure and style, in short, seems to have resembled the art of Phœnicia and Chaldæa rather than that of Egypt. The Temple appears to have had an inner priests' court, with bronze altar, and an outer court, but no measurements of these are given.* In the later account (2 Ch 3^4) the height is given as 120 cubits (LXX 20 cubits), and Jos. believed that Solomon's Temple was 60 cubits higher than the later restoration by Zerub. (Ant. XV. xi. 3). It is possible that the porch may have formed a lofty pylon higher than the Holy House itself. It is not clear whether the two bronze pillars, Jachin and Boaz, each 23 cubits high (1 K 7^{15-21}), supported the lintel of the pylon gate, or whether they stood outside as stelæ (the word 'in' may be rendered 'for,' v.^{21}). Jos. gives the area of Solomon's enclosure at 4 furlongs (Ant. XV. xi. 3), and places the E. cloister close to a deep valley (Ant. XX. ix. 7), stating that Sol. built the E. wall, to which later kings added others (Wars, V. v. 1). But it is not clear how these details could be known when he wrote, since he states that Herod 'took away the ancient foundations' (Ant. XV. xi. 3), and built the cloisters 'from the foundation,' and enclosed 'double the area' (Wars, I. xxi. 1). He understands the Temple itself to have had an upper storey, and gives the number of chambers as 30 in all (Ant. VIII. iii. 2); but these accounts of a building destroyed nearly seven centuries before his time are of less value than his description of buildings which he had himself seen.

There is, however, little doubt that the Holy House occupied the same site, and was of the same length and breadth, in the time of Herod and of Solomon. Jos. says that Zerub. placed the altar 'in the same place where it had formerly been built' (Ant. XI. iv. 1); and as to the situation of this building, he says that 'at first the topmost plateau (τὸ ἀνωτάτω χθαμαλόν) barely sufficed for the Holy House and the altar' (Wars, V. v. 1, see Ant. VIII. iii. 9), whence it appears that the highest part of the ridge was the site selected. Herod, though he altered the enclosure, did not touch the Temple itself, which was restored by the priests. In the Mishna it is stated that the east door of the Holy House was directly opposite the summit of Olivet (Midd. ii. 4; Parah iii. 9, iv. 2; see Ezk 43^{12}). As regards the general description of the third Temple, the account given by Jos. agrees with the careful details of the Mishna (Middoth), but his measurements are unreliable—as in other cases at Cæsarea, Samaria, Masada, etc.—and often contradictory. He makes the altar 20 cubits square (c. Apion. i. 22), or elsewhere 50 cubits (Wars, V. v. 6), and the valleys 300 to 400 cubits deep (Ant. VIII. iii. 9; Wars, V. v. 1), the real depth not exceeding 160 ft. He speaks of stones 40 cubits long and 6 cubits

* There appears to have been a 'causeway' or ascent by steps to the Temple (1 Ch 26^{16}), perhaps the same described by Jos. (Ant. XV. xi. 5) towards the N. part of the W. wall; but as regards the 'ascent' (עֲלִיָּתוֹ) in the time of Sol. (1 K 10^5, עֲלִיָּתוֹ in 2 Ch 9^4), LXX., Vulg., Pesh. render in K (according to the regular sense of עֲלָה) and read in Ch, 'the burnt-offerings which he offered,' and Jos. follows this reading (Ant. VIII. vi. 5). See ASCENT.

high (Ant. XX. ix. 7; Wars, V. v. 1), a greatly exaggerated estimate. When, therefore, he gives the circumference of the third Temple as 4 furlongs* (Ant. XV. xi. 3), or, including Antonia, 6 furlongs (Wars, VI. v. 4), we must remember that he was writing in Rome, and merely estimated the lengths. Measured along the extant walls, the area, including Antonia, is about 8 furlongs in all.

Following the description of Jos., some authorities suppose that Herod's Temple occupied a square of 600 ft. side, in the S.W. part of the Ḥaram. The objections to this view are briefly: 1st, that in this case the Temple cannot have stood on the 'topmost plateau'; 2nd, that the area noticed in the Mishna (500 cubits square) is larger; 3rd, that there are no remains of any walls, to E. and N., at the required distances, and no break in the S. wall 600 ft. from the S.W. angle; 4th, that the Ophel wall joined the 'E. cloister,' and has been discovered abutting on the E. wall of the Ḥaram; 5th, that the existing outer gates agree with the descriptions only if the Temple Area is supposed to coincide with the present boundaries of the Ḥaram; 6th, that unless placed on the topmost plateau, the Temple—surrounded by courts at various levels—must have required foundations 30 to 100 ft. deep to reach the known levels of the rock. The masonry was too heavy to have been simply founded on earth. These objections have never been answered, and in our present state of knowledge it seems safer to depend on the general statements of Jos. than on his measurements, which are hard to reconcile with his incidental remarks.

In order to study this question by the light of recent exploration it is necessary to fix the position of Antonia, that of each angle of the Temple enclosure, and the position of the 'topmost plateau' opposite the summit of Olivet. Antonia is described (Wars, V. v. 8) as standing at the corner of the N. and W. cloisters, on a rock 50 cubits high, scarped on all sides: it had four corner towers, and a large inner space with courts, baths, and places for camps. A ditch and valley protected the towers outside in the time of Pompey (Ant. XIV. iv. 2). Strabo speaks of this ditch as 60 ft. deep and 250 ft. broad (see Wars, I. vii. 3, V. iv. 2). Cloisters joined Antonia to the Temple (Wars, II. xvi. 5, 6), and the rock hid the Temple on the N. (Wars, V. v. 8), looking down on the courts (Wars, V. ix. 2, VI. i. 5, ii. 5, 9): when it was taken, immediate access was obtained to the flat courts and to the inner Temple (Wars, VI. iii. 7). The area of Antonia seems to have formed a projection on the N.W., so that when it was destroyed the Temple enclosure itself became a quadrangle (τετράγωνον, Wars, VI. v. 4). There is only one existing site which answers to such a description—namely, the block of rock already described at the N.W. angle of the present Ḥaram. This rock overlooks all the interior, and rises 20 ft. higher than the Sakhrah or holy 'rock,' which is the highest point within the Ḥaram. The outer fosse is also traceable, separating this site from Bezetha. The rock thus supporting the modern barracks is therefore identified, on all recent plans, with Antonia—the older Baris or Birah of the time of the Hasmonæans and of Nehemiah. It follows that the W. wall throughout may be regarded as belonging to the enclosure of Antonia and of the Temple in the time of Herod. The S.W. angle is generally agreed to be that of Herod's Temple; and as regards the S.E., Jos. (Wars, V. iv. 2) clearly states that the Ophel wall joined the 'E. cloister' of the Temple, so that all the E. wall appears also to belong to the time of Herod, since the junction with the Ophel wall has been determined by excavation. The N.E. angle remains in doubt; for, as above noticed, the N. wall, east of the Antonia rock, is not of the same masonry with the others, while the cisterns inside this part of the Ḥaram are not rock-cut, but are built of masonry very late in character. It seems probable that this part of the area is modern, and that the old N. wall of the Temple ran E. and W. on the line of the present N. wall of the platform, where remains of ancient buttresses have been found. The N.E. part of the Ḥaram is crossed by a valley, running into the Kidron, which has been filled in with earth, but which, in A.D. 70, may have bounded the Temple on the N., and the inner court of Antonia on the E. A gate called Tadi led, by an underground passage, out of the Temple on this side.

As regards the 'topmost plateau,' the rock below Antonia, on the S., is visible over a considerable area at a level about 2430 ft. above the Mediterranean. It has been artificially cut down to form a flat surface. Farther S.E. it rises, in the Sakhrah itself, to a height of 2440 ft., but under the platform which surrounds the Sakhrah its height nowhere exceeds 2432 ft. About twenty observations have been made, which concur in showing a flat plateau at this level, occupying the central part of the Ḥaram. The slope to the W. is very steep, the rock falling to an average level of 2350 ft. at the base of the W. outer wall. The slope to the E. is also steep, though not equal to that on the W. On the S. the plateau narrows to a long spur, which sinks towards Siloam. It is evident that a building surrounded by terraced courts, at various lower levels, can well be fitted to the ground only if its highest floor level is placed on the highest part of the plateau now ascertained to exist, as above described. If, moreover, a line be drawn E., at right angles to the W. wall of the Ḥaram, and through the Sakhrah rock, it will be found to cut the summit of Olivet immediately N. of the present Church of the Ascension. If, on the other hand, the Temple be placed farther to the S.W. (as proposed by those who accept the measurements given by Jos.), not only can no line be so drawn, but the Temple is made to stand on the narrower and lower part of the spur, and its foundations would rest on the steep W. slopes, here falling 90 ft. below the crest of the spur. These various considerations seem, therefore, all to point to the vicinity of the Sakhrah as marking the site of the Holy House itself.

Placed in such a position, it will be found that the levels of the courts, as described in the Mishna and by Jos., agree throughout with the actual levels. In no part does the rock rise or fall so as to render it necessary to suppose foundations of more than 2 or 3 ft. The Sakhrah itself may be that 'stone of foundation' (Eben hash-Shĕthîyah) which supported the Holy of Holies, and was said to be the foundation of the world (Mishna, Joma v. 3, Tamid i. 1) sealing the mouth of the abyss—a legend which still attaches to the Sakhrah and its cave. Under the altar there was no hollow place (Talm. Bab. Zebaḥim 58*a*), and its position would agree with a part of the Ḥaram where there are no vaults. The gate Tadi or 'hiding' (Middoth i. 3) was reached by an underground passage from the N. side of the inner cloister, and remains of such a passage exist N. of the Sakhrah. On the S. side was the Chamber of the Draw-well, and on this side there is an existing tank in the required position. The Altar Court was 6 cubits lower than the floor of the Temple (or at a level of about 2432 ft. above the Mediter.),

* If Herod's Temple enclosure was double that of Sol., it is manifestly impossible that both measured four furlongs in circumference (see references in text.)

and the great Court of the Women, farther E., was again 7½ cubits lower (or about 2422 ft. above the same datum), but on the S. and N. the Altar Court was only 5 cubits above the outer level, which would therefore be about 2426 ft. above the datum—these levels depending on the number of steps, each half a cubit high, noticed in the Mishna (Middoth) and by Jos. (Wars, v. v.). On applying the plan to the ground it is found that, in each case, the levels so obtained agree exactly with the actual levels, as shown by the present author in 1879 (Conder's Handbook to the Bible, last chapter).

The details given in the Mishna (Middoth) suffice to enable us to draw a block plan of Herod's Temple. The exact arrangements of the gateways and cloisters can only be conjectured, but the enclosure, which is said to have been 500 cubits square, surrounded the inner courts, which no Gentile might enter. The Priests' Court, which surrounded the Holy House, and included the great altar to its east, measured 135 cubits N. and S. by 137 E. and W. On the E. was the great gate Nicanor, leading to the 'Court of the Women,' which was 135 cubits square. Between this and the Court of the Priests a narrow platform (11 cubits wide), having beneath it (Midd. ii. 6) chambers opening into the 'Women's Court,' was called the 'Court of Isr.,' and reserved for men only, who formed a representative congregation of Israel. The women were confined to galleries in the Women's Court, which was the general meeting-place of the Jews. Immediately outside these courts a fence (soreg) surrounded the Temple, and inscriptions in Gr. (one of which has been recovered) forbade any Gentile to enter on pain of death. The Holy House itself (hekal) included a porch (aula) and the Holy of Holies. The latter was 20 cubits square, and the Holy Place 40 cubits long by 20 broad (as in Solomon's Temple). The porch was 100 cubits broad N. and S., and the total length of the building was 100 cubits E. and W., the breadth of the main part being 70 cubits, including the chambers to N., S., and E., and the outer gallery (impluvium) beyond them on N. and S. The height of the porch was 100 cubits, and that of the main building 45 cubits with a flat roof. A second storey appears to have existed, above the Holy Place and Holy of Holies, its roof 100 cubits from the ground. The great gate of the porch was 20 cubits broad and 40 cubits high, and over it were five oak beams to which apparently the golden vine was nailed. There were apparently two veils—one to the outer gate, one to the doorway of the Holy Place, and these were annually renewed. The surrounding chambers, in three storeys, numbered 38 in all. A stairway in the impluvium, on the N., led to the roofs. Twelve steps led down, on the E., to the Priests' Court. In this stood the altar, of rubble and mortar, 32 cubits square at the foundation, which was 1 cubit high. The main part above was 30 cubits square and 5 cubits high; the hearth was 28 cubits square; the total height of the altar was 10 cubits, with four 'horns' at the angles. The sloping ascent on the S. was 16 cubits broad and 32 cubits long, leading to the foot of the hearth. The Court of the Priests had three gates to the N. and three to the S. The E. gate on the N. was called Nitzotz, and had an exhedra, the N.W. gate Moked had four chambers at the sides, where the Temple guard of priests kept watch. An underground passage led N. to Tadi, the gate near Antonia, and also to the latrines. On the S. the W. gate was named Aptinas, or, otherwise, the Water Gate, the two others being the Gate of the Offering and the Gate of Flaming. On the E. 15 steps led down from the great gate Nicanor to the Women's Court. These gates were flanked by chambers,—those for salt, for the high priest's bath and for washing, being on the N.; those for wood, for the drawwell and the 'Chamber of Hewn Stone' where the Sanhedrin sat, being on the S. of the Priests' Court. The four chambers of Moked were for the lamb of the daily sacrifice (on S.W.), for the shewbread (on S.E.), for the stones of the old altar taken down by Judas Maccabæus (on N.E.), and for washing, with a descent to the north passage. In the corners of the Women's Court were four chambers,—that of the Nazirites on S.E., that where the wood for the altar was kept on N.E., that of the lepers on N.W., and that for oil on the S.W. The two chambers flanking Nicanor were for the vestment keeper and the pancake maker. Musical instruments were kept in the chambers under the narrow walk called the 'Court of Isr.,' which was divided from the Priests' Court by a railing, near which was a pulpit whence they addressed the people. The Court of Isr. was apparently 2½ cubits lower than the level of the Priests' Court. The soreg was reached by three gates, on the N., S., and E. of the Women's Court, and was a lattice-work fence. The limit of 500 cubits square was marked by the khel ('rampart' or 'terrace'), which was 10 cubits wide, and reached apparently by other steps (Wars, v. v. 2). The gates of the outer walls (or 'Mountain of the House'), namely, the two Huldah Gates on the S., the Parbar Gates and Kipunos ('descent') on the W., with Tadi on the N., have been already noticed. On the E. was the gate Shushan, the position of which is doubtful. The outer cloisters, along the rampart walls, were double except on the S., where the royal cloister is described by Jos. as having three walks, with 162 pillars, each about 6 ft. in diameter (Ant. xv. xi. 5). The walks were 30 ft., 45 ft., and 30 ft. wide, and this measurement (in Gr. ft.) agrees closely with the width and position of the existing Tyropœon Bridge, which has a breadth of 50 ft., and an arch 41 ft. 6 in. span. The pillars as described are of about the size of those still standing in the vaulted chamber of the Double (or W. Huldah) Gate, and the epistylia would have been about 22 ft.—the cloister stretching to the present S.E. angle of the Haram. This gives a very natural intercolumniation of 2½ diameters. The pillars were 27 ft. high according to Josephus. These details, taken—except when otherwise stated—from the Tract Middoth of the Mishna, agree with the more general description by Jos., except in some cases as regards measurements, where the account of the Rabbis—some of whom had seen the Temple standing, and had been able to measure its ruins—is to be preferred to one written in Italy. No difficulty is found in understanding this account, or in fitting plan and section to the ground, if the Temple is placed opposite the summit of Olivet, on the 'topmost plateau' of the hill.

VII. MODERN JERUSALEM. — Within the last twenty years Jerus. has so largely increased in size and population, on account of Jewish and European settlers building houses outside the walls, that the most recent plans give little idea of the city. The Mount of Olives is covered with houses, and a considerable suburb has sprung up N. of the Damascus Gate. On the W. the Jewish cottages stretch more than a mile from the Jaffa Gate (in the W. wall), and many villas, standing in gardens, reach from W. of the Russian hospice to the vicinity of Birket Mamilla. On the S other houses, and a German settlement, stand on the high ground S. of the Hinnom Valley. On the S.W. is the railway station. The population has increased from 20,000 souls (including Chris tians, Moslems, and 8000 Jews) to between 40,000 and 50,000 souls, the Jews having increased to about 30,000 in all. In 1838 there were only 3000 Jews in the city. It is beyond the present purpose to describe the modern city (see Baedeker's Guide), but the above-mentioned changes are too remarkable to pass unnoticed.

LITERATURE.—The lit. of the subject would form a vol. by itself, but the progress of scientific study has rendered obsolete most of the works written before A.D. 1838. The generally accepted views as to the topography, which have been given above, are substantially in accord with the conclusions of Dr. E. Robinson (BRP, 1838 and 1852, 2nd ed. 3 vols. 1856). The work of Sir C. Warren, and of the present writer, down to 1883, is detailed in the Jerus. vol. of SWP. The later explorations, to 1898, are detailed in PEFSt, 1883–98, and in Bliss and Dickie's Excavations at Jerusalem, 1898. The Ord. Surv. Notes by Sir C. W. Wilson, 1865, give valuable accounts of the antiquities then known. The works of de Vogüé (Eglises de la Terre Sainte, 1860, and Le Temple de Jerus. 1863) are standard authorities for the later periods. The Byzant. and 12th cent. topography is to be studied in the series issued by the Pal. Pilgrims Texts Soc., esp. in the valuable tract, dating after A.D. 1187, called La Citez de Jherusalem. It is also discussed in SWP. The views advocated by Sir C. W. Wilson are detailed in Smith's DB[2]. The modern city is fully described by Dr. A. Socin in Baedeker's Handbook to Pal. and Syria.

Without reference to these leading works the student will be unable to obtain correct information as to the views of the chief authorities, and the extant buildings; but familiarity with these, and with Jos. and the Mishna, will be found sufficient, without reference to obsolete theories or to popular works. A valuable and exhaustive paper on the Talm. accounts of the Temple has been published by the PEF in 1886, representing the labours of Dr. T. Chaplin for many years in Jerus. itself. The architectural history of the Haram, by the present author, is detailed in Tent Work in Pal., and the full details of the Temple in Conder's Handbook to the Bible, 1879. Recent discoveries have not, in any instance, upset the conclusions therein urged, and in some cases they have afforded unexpected support to those conclusions, as shown in this brief account of the Holy City. C. R. CONDER.

JERUSHA (יְרוּשָׁא 2 K 15^{33}=JERUSHAH יְרוּשָׁה 2 Ch 27^{1}, 'possession' or 'possessed').—Mother of Jotham king of Judah. Her father's name is given as Zadok.

JESHAIAH (יְשַׁעְיָה, יְשַׁעְיָהוּ 'salvation of J"').—1. A grandson of Zerubbabel, 1 Ch 3^{21}. 2. One of the sons of Jeduthun, 1 Ch $25^{3.15}$. 3. A Levite, the ancestor of one of David's treasurers, 1 Ch 26^{25}. 4. The chief of the Bĕnê-Elam who returned with Ezra, Ezr 8^{7}. 5. Chief of the Merarites in time of Ezra, Ezr 8^{19}. 6. A Benjamite, Neh 11^{7}. See GENEALOGY.

JESHANAH (יְשָׁנָה).—A town, named along with Bethel, taken from Jeroboam by Abijah, 2 Ch 13^{19}. It is probably the modern 'Ain Sinia, a village with a spring, about 3¼ miles north of Bethel. See SWP vol. ii. sheet xiv. In 1 S 7^{12} we ought also (so Wellh., Driver, Klosterm., Kittel, Budde) to read Jeshanah for MT Shen (שֵׁן). See SHEN. Probably the same place is meant by the Isanas (ἡ Ἰσάνας) of Josephus (Ant. XIV. xv. 12), where Herod the Great defeated the troops of Antigonus. C. R. CONDER.

JESHARELAH.—See ASHARELAH.

JESHEBEAB (יֶשֵׁבְאָב).—A Levite, the head of the 14th course, 1 Ch 24^{13}. B of the LXX strangely enough omits the name, although thereby the whole number of courses is reduced to twenty-three. A has Ἰσβάαλ, Vulg. Isbaab. Kittel (see SBOT, ad loc.) thinks that aversion to a name compounded with -baal accounts for its elimination in B. See also Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 24.

JESHER (יֶשֶׁר 'uprightness').—A son of Caleb, 1 Ch 2^{18}. The LXX Ἰωάσαρ would lead us to expect an o in the first syllable (cf. notes of Kittel in SBOT, and Baer).

JESHIMON.—This word occurs with def. art. (הַיְשִׁימֹן) in Nu 21^{20} 23^{28}, 1 S $23^{19.24}$ $26^{1.3}$ 'Jeshimon' AV, 'desert' RV in all. A similar variation is found in the renderings of LXX and Vulgate. The latter translates by desertum and solitudo except in 1 S 23^{24}, where it has Jeshimon. The LXX renders it in Samuel by τοῦ Ἰεσσαιμού (Ἐλεσσ... is a variant in A), but in Numbers by ἔρημος with the def. article. The Targums have בית ישימן in Numbers (בית ישימות Nu 23^{28} Targ. Jon.), but in Samuel ישימן; Syr. has אשימן throughout. The word also occurs in 7 places in parallelism with midhbar, which always in these passages has the def. art. (except in Dt 32^{10}), while jeshimon is without it. In Dt 32^{10}, Ps 68^{7} 78^{40} 106^{14} the word is used of the land through which the children of Israel passed on their way to Canaan, and there may be an indirect allusion to it in the other three places, Ps 107^{4}, Is $43^{19.20}$. RV deviates from its uniform rendering of this word by 'desert' in Dt 32^{10}, Ps 68^{7}, where with AV it has 'wilderness.' Though in these passages no distinction between midhbar and jeshimon is drawn, yet there is a difference in meaning; midhbar * is strictly a place where cattle are driven (comp. the German 'Trift' and 'treiben'), the uncultivated region where pasturage (though scanty in parts) may be found; jeshimon is the desolate waste without water or vegetation.

Some particular region of this character seems indicated both in Numbers and Samuel, and, as in 1 S 23^{24} 26^{2} Ziph and Maon (places identified as being a few miles to the south of Hebron) are mentioned as being in its vicinity, a tract of land to the west of the Dead Sea seems here indicated. The eastern slopes of Judah are called (Jos 15^{61}) the wilderness, and, though the cities there mentioned show that the land was not entirely uninhabited, the fewness of them (compare the number six with the numbers of cities in other parts of Judah) is evidence of its barrenness. Though containing some fertile spots (as En-gedi), the region as a whole may well be called Jeshimon, for to its character as a desolate waste many travellers bear witness. (For the descriptions of Robinson and other travellers, see Ritter, Comp. Geog. of Pal. iii. 108 ff.; and cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL p. 312). The traveller descending these slopes from the cities of the hill-country first passes through the pasture ground (the midhbar) in the neighbourhood of Ziph and Maon (the wilderness of Maon, 1 S 23^{24}, of Ziph, 26^{2}), and at length reaches the desolate waste (Jeshimon) by the Dead Sea. This tract of land may be referred to in Numbers, as it would be visible from the highlands of Eastern Palestine, but Dillmann takes Jeshimon to be that part of the Arabah to the N. of the Dead Sea and E. of the Jordan, in which Beth-jeshimoth (the only place bearing a similar name) is situate. (See his Comm. on Nu 21^{20}; and cf. art. BETH-JESHIMOTH).

From the words of 1 S 23^{24} 'the wilderness of Maon, in the Arabah, on the south of the desert' (Jeshimon), it seems that the term Arabah, which 'is applied to at least a portion of the great valley which stretches from the Gulf of Akabah into the Jordanic basin' (see art. ARABAH, vol. i. p. 130[a]), here includes that portion of the valley in which the Dead Sea is situated. A. T. CHAPMAN.

JESHISHAI (יְשִׁישַׁי 'old,' 'venerable'?). — The eponym of a Gadite family, 1 Ch 5^{14}. See GENEALOGY.

* AV renders this word generally by 'wilderness,' but in 12 places has 'desert.' RV has altered these into 'wilderness except in Dt 32^{10}, Job 24^{5}. Ex $19^{1.2}$ is an instance of AV being misleading in some words of frequent occurrence (see Revisers' Preface). The reader of AV would suppose that the original of 'desert' in v.[2] was different from that of 'wilderness' in vv.[1.2]; but midhbar is the Heb. equivalent of both, which is indicated by the change to 'wilderness' in RV.

JESHOHAIAH (יְשׁוֹחָיָה).—The eponym of a Simeonite family, 1 Ch 4[36]. See GENEALOGY.

JESHUA (יֵשׁוּעַ 'J" is salvation' or 'J" is opulence' [see Oxf. Heb. Lex.], Ἰησοῦς), another form of Joshua, is used of—1. Joshua the son of Nun once only (Neh 8[17]). 2. The head of the ninth course of priests (1 Ch 24[11]). AV has Jeshuah. 3. A Levite in the time of Hezekiah, who had to do with the distribution of the free-will offerings (2 Ch 31[15]). 4. A man of the house of Pahath-moab whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2[6] Ἰησοῦε, Neh 7[11]). This J. is perhaps identical with No. 2 above. 5. A Levitical house or its successive heads in the times of Zerub., Ezra, and Nehemiah. J. is mentioned in connexion with the building of the temple (Ezr 3[9]), the explanation of the law to the people (Neh 8[7], cf. 9[4f.]), and the sealing of the covenant (10[9]). Cf. also Ezr 2[40] 8[33], Neh 7[43] 12[8. 24] Ἰησού. 6. The high priest who along with Zerub. headed the first band of exiles that returned. In Ezr and Neh he is called Jeshua (יֵשׁוּעַ), in Hag and Zec Joshua (יְהוֹשֻׁעַ). His grandfather Seraiah, who was high priest at the time of the capture of Jerus., was executed at Riblah by Nebuch., and his father Jehozadak carried captive to Babylon, where J. was probably born (2 K 25[18ff.], 1 Ch 6[15]; see, however, Kosters, Het herstel v. Isr. 48 f.). On the arrival of the caravan at Jerus., J. naturally took a leading part in the erection of the altar of burnt-offering and the laying of the foundations of the temple (Ezr 3[2ff.]), in Hag and Zec he is frequently coupled with Zerub. after these prophets had begun to stimulate the people to undertake building operations in earnest (Hag 1[1. 12. 14], Zec 3[1ff.] 6[10. 11]); he supplies a figure to the imagery of the latter prophet (Zec 3[1ff.]), and even receives a crown at his hands (6[10f.]). He is eulogized in Sir 49[12]. For further details see ZECHARIAH, ZERUBBABEL, and refer to the Literature at the end of the latter article. J. A. SELBIE.

JESHUA (יֵשׁוּעַ).—A town in the south of Judah, Neh 11[26]. The site is possibly at the ruin Sa'wi west of Tell 'Arad and south of 'Attîr, as Beersheba is mentioned with it. See PEF Mem. iii. 409 f. Jeshua of Neh 11[26] appears to correspond to Shema (wh. see) of Jos 15[26] 19[8] (?). See Dillm. ad loc. C. R. CONDER.

JESHURUN (יְשֻׁרוּן) occurs four times in OT as a designation for Israel (Dt 32[15] 33[5. 26], Is 44[2]). Gesenius at one time held that יְשֻׁרוּן was a shorter form of יִשְׂרָאֵלוּן (Cod. Gr., Ven. Ἰσραελίσκος), a dimin. of יִשְׂרָאֵל (Israel), while at the same time there might be an allusion to the idea of rectitude or uprightness contained in the root יָשָׁר. Latterly he adopted a derivation simply from this last root, making J. = the righteous little people. The same derivation is accepted by Reuss and Cornill, the latter of whom (with Cheyne) finds light thrown upon the meaning of J. by the references in OT to the 'Book of Jashar,' where Jashar ('the upright') may be a name for Israel. (Cf. Nu 23[10] 'Let me die the death of the righteous,' in which יְשָׁרִים 'righteous' seems to allude to יִשְׂרָאֵל of the preceding clause). The Sept. in all the four passages cited above, renders J. by ἠγαπημένος ('beloved'). Jerome has dilectus in Dt 32[15], but elsewhere rectissimus, corresponding to εὐθύς or εὐθύτατος of Aq. Symm. and Theod., who manifestly connect J. with the root יָשָׁר. Delitzsch (Is.[5] ii. 189) admits that יְשֻׁרוּן is a secondary form of יָשָׁר, but declines to regard it as a diminutive, because a 'diminutive of affection corresponds little to the language of divine love' (sic). In spite of this dictum, Schultz' explanation of J. as 'a pet name from יָשָׁר' seems a peculiarly happy one (OT Theol. ii. 29 n.). Driver (Dt 32[15]) agrees with Dillmann that J. is a poetical title of Israel, pointing allusively to יִשְׂרָאֵל but derived from יָשָׁר, and accordingly designating the nation under its ideal character (cf. Ex 19[6], Dt 14[2] etc.) as 'the upright one.' J. A. SELBIE.

JESIAS (B Ἐσίας, A Ἰεσσίας, AV Josias), 1 Es 8[33]. —In Ezr 8[7] JESHAIAH.

JESIMIEL (יְשִׁמְאֵל).—The eponym of a Simeonite family, 1 Ch 4[36]. See GENEALOGY.

JESSE יִשַׁי (etym. and meaning doubtful; perh. 'wealthy,' √יש, Ges., but see Oxf. Heb. Lex.; Ἰεσσαί). —Father of David. As grandson of the wealthy Boaz (Ru 4[17. 22], 1 Ch 2[12], Mt 1[5], Lk 3[32]), it is natural to suppose that he was one of the elders of Bethlehem (1 S 16[4]); but the biblical narrative is not clear on this point. He is called 'the Bethlehemite,' 1 S 16[1. 18] 17[58], and 'the Ephrathite of Bethlehem-Judah,' 1 S 17[12]. We cannot draw any safe inference as to his position from the fact that his youngest son kept the sheep, or from the simple present of farm produce which he sends, now to the king (1 S 16[20]), now to the captain (1 S 17[18]). The Targ. on 2 S 21[19] calls him 'a weaver of the veil of the house of the sanctuary,' but that is merely an attempt to explain 'Jaare-oregim.' When first introduced into the history (1 S 17[12], on the various explanations of which see Wellh. and Driver) he is 'an old man,' 'stricken in years among men,' and he probably did not live to witness the royal dignity of the lad whom he had once thought too insignificant to share in the sacrificial feast (1 S 16[11]). In 1 S 20[29] David mentions his brother as superintending the family sacrifice. This may be due to the great age of Jesse, but it is also possible that we have here a survival of the custom according to which the eldest son was the family priest. We last hear of Jesse alive in 1 S 22[3. 4], when David, mindful of his ancestress Ruth, entrusts his parents to the care of the king of Moab. A Jewish tradition states that the Moabites killed them, but 1 S 22[4] implies that they rejoined David when he left the cave of Adullam.

There are two slight difficulties connected with Jesse's family. (α) According to 1 S 16[10. 11] 17[12] he had eight sons; seven only are named in the genealogy, 1 Ch 2[13–15]. The Syriac and Arabic versions here insert 'Elihu the seventh' from 1 Ch 27[18], but there we should probably read 'Eliab,' with the LXX. Jerome (Qu. Heb. on 1 S 17[12], 2 S 21[21]) says that the prophet Nathan, or Jonathan son of Shammah, was reckoned as one of his sons. (β) In 2 S 17[25] Abigail is called the daughter of Nahash; accordingly Jewish tradition (Targ. on Ru 4[22], Is 14[29], Jerome, Qu. Heb. in loc.) identifies Jesse with Nahash ('serpent'), explaining the double name on the ground that he had no other sin than that original sin which the old serpent introduced into the world. Stanley (Jewish Ch., Lect. 22) suggests that the same woman was first wife of Nahash, king of Ammon, and mother by him of Abigail and Zeruiah, and subsequently wife of Jesse, and mother of his sons. This theory derives some slight support from the friendliness of Nahash and his sons to David (2 S 10[2] 17[27]), and also from the genealogy (1 Ch 2[16]), where Abigail and Zeruiah are not called the daughters of Jesse, but the sisters of his sons. It is possible, however, that בַּת־נָחָשׁ in 2 S 17[25] is, as Wellh. thinks, a textual error. See NAHASH.

It is interesting to note that while in his lifetime, and in the next generation, 'the son of Jesse' was a contemptuous epithet for David (cf. Jg 9[28], 1 S 22[12], Is 7[4. 5. 6. 9]), and is so used by Saul (1 S 20[27. 30. 31] 22[7. 8]), by Doeg (1 S 22[9]), by Nabal (25[10]), by Sheba (2 S 20[1]), and by the ten tribes

(1 K 12^{16}), yet the prophet Isaiah ($11^{1.10}$) associates one of the most sublime Messianic predictions with the stock (גֵּזַע) of Jesse, 'the root (שֹׁרֶשׁ) of Jesse,' and this honorific use of the phrase passed to later writers, 1 Ch 10^{14} 29^{26}, Ps 72^{20}, Ac 13^{22}.

JESUS, the Gr. form (Ἰησοῦς) of the name Joshua (יְהוֹשֻׁעַ) or Jeshua (יֵשׁוּעַ), is employed as a designation of—1. Joshua the son of Nun (AV of 1 Mac 2^{55}, 2 Es 7^{37}, Sir 46^{1}, Ac 7^{45}, He 4^{8}, in all of which passages RV has Joshua). 2. Jeshua (Joshua), the high priest contemporary with Zerubbabel (1 Es $5^{5.8.48.56.68.70}$ 6^{2} 9^{19}, Sir 49^{12}, where both AV and RV have in every instance Jesus). 3. The Levite (1 Es $5^{26.58}$ 8^{63} 9^{48}) who in Ezr 2^{40} 3^{9} is called Jeshua. 4. An ancestor of our Lord (Lk 3^{29} RV, where AV has Jose). 5. Jesus, son of Sirach. Method.—What method is fittest for a Christian writer to use in approaching the Life of Christ? There is a tendency at the present moment, on the Continent perhaps rather than in England, to approach it from the side of the consciousness of Jesus as the Messiah. A conspicuous instance of this would be Baldensperger's Das Selbstbewusstsein Jesu (Strassburg, 1888; 2nd ed. 1892), a work which attracted considerable attention when it first appeared. No doubt such a method has its advantages. It places the inquirer at once at the centre of the position, and enables him to look down the various roads by which he will have to travel. The advantage, however, is more apparent than real. It would hold good only if we could be sure of obtaining a far more adequate grasp of the consciousness to be investigated than on any hypothesis is likely to be obtained. On the Christian hypothesis, frankly held, any such grasp would seem to be excluded, and the attempt to reach it could hardly be made without irreverence.

It is on all grounds a safer and sounder, as well as a more promising method, to adopt a course which is the opposite of this—not to work from within outwards, but from without inwards; to begin with that aspect of the Life which is most external, and only when we have realized this as well as we may to seek to penetrate deeper, allowing the facts to suggest their own inner meaning. We may then take in certain sidelights which our documents also afford us, which, because they come, as it were, from the side, are not therefore less valuable. And we may finally strengthen our conclusions by following the history some little way into its sequel. In other words, we shall begin by placing ourselves at the standpoint of an observer, one of those who saw the public ministry of Jesus in its early stages, in its development, and to its close. When that has been fully unrolled before us, we can draw upon other data which are not of this public character; and we may further seek to argue backwards from effects to causes.

By pursuing this method we shall have the advantage of taking the facts in no imaginary order, but in the order of the history itself. We shall have them disclosed to us in the same sort of sequence in which they were disclosed to the first generations of Christians—a method always advisable where it can be had, and in this instance peculiarly advisable, because both the origins and the immediate sequel to the origins are of extreme interest and importance.

We shall also have the incidental advantage of following, not only the historical order, but the critical order suggested by the documents. It was natural that what was transacted in public should have the fullest and the earliest attestation: it lay in the nature of the case that some of the details which were most significant, just because of their private and intimate character, should become known only by degrees. This state of things is reflected in the Gospels as we have them. The common matter of the Synoptic Gospels is also the most public matter. It by no means follows that what is peculiar to a single Gospel is by that fact stamped as less historical: no one would think (e.g.) of affirming this of some of the parables peculiar to St. Luke; but it is fair to suppose that in the first instance it was less widely diffused. To this class would belong the narratives of the Nativity and of the Infancy. It will be in some ways a gain not to begin with these, but to let them enter into the story as they entered into it with the first Christians. More than one point which might otherwise perplex us will in this way suggest its own explanation.

Limits of space do not allow us to go elaborately into the question as to the trustworthiness of our materials. It may suffice to point to one undoubted fact which furnishes at least a considerable presumption in their favour. The apostolic age produced some strongly marked personalities, with well defined types of thought and phraseology. Now, broadly speaking, these types have left but little trace upon the Gospels. The special type characteristic of the Gospels themselves stands out conspicuously over against them. We need hardly do more than refer to such very significant facts as that the Gospels alone contain specimens of teaching by parables; that the idea of the 'kingdom of heaven' (or 'of God'), which is quite central in the Gospels, recedes into the background in the writings of the apostles; that the same holds good of that most significant title 'Son of Man'; that, on the other hand, such a term as 'justify' is rare and hardly technical, while 'justification,' 'sanctification,' 'reconciliation' (or 'atonement'), and a number of others are wholly absent. It may be said that the Fourth Gospel is an exception, that there we have a suspicious resemblance to the style and diction of the Epp. of St. John. Some resemblance there is, and we would not entirely reject the inference drawn from it. But even here the exception is but partial. It has often been noticed that the evangelist scrupulously confines his doctrine of the Logos to the prologue.

The writer of this art. may be allowed once more to express the conviction,* which he believes that continued investigation will confirm, that the great mass of the Synoptic Gospels had assumed its permanent shape not later than the decade 60–70 A.D., and that the changes which it underwent after the great catastrophe of the fall of Jerusalem were but small, and can without difficulty be recognized.

But the task on which we are at present engaged must in the main supply its own vindication. The picture which it is here attempted to draw will commend itself so far as it is consistent and coherent, and no further. No one, indeed, expects in these days the formal and external consistency aimed at in the older Harmonies; but the writer himself believes that in their inner essence the Gospels are consistent and coherent, and if he fails to convey the impression of this, the failure will be his own. He is conscious of something tentative in the way in which he has sought to work in data derived from the Fourth Gospel with those derived from the other three. But here, again, he is giving expression to the best opinion he can form, and the value of that opinion must be judged by the result. Where he is not satisfied with his own success, he has not hesitated to say so.

To what has been said above it should be added, that if we assume the standpoint of a spectator, a brief preface will be needed to explain what that standpoint is. In other words, we shall have at the outset to take a rapid survey of the conditions under which the Life of Christ was lived, so that we may see to what His teaching had to attach itself, and what served for it as a foil, by way of contrast and antagonism.

The main divisions of our subject will thus be —

I. Survey of Conditions.
II. The Public Ministry of Jesus, preceded by that of the Baptist.
III. Supplemental Matter, not included in the Public Ministry, and derived from special sources.
IV. The Verdict of History.

I. Survey of Conditions.—The picture which we form for ourselves of Palestine in the time of our Lord is apt to be wanting in play and variety. A few strong and simple colours are all that are used; we do not allow enough for their blending, or for the finer and subtler tones which mingle with them. We see the worldly ambition of the Sadducees, the self-seeking and formalism of the Pharisees; over both, the rough stern rule of the Roman; and under both, the chafing tide of popular passion, working itself up to its outburst of fury in the Great War. Perhaps we throw in somewhere in a corner the cloistered communities of the Essenes; but if so, it is rather as standing apart by themselves than as entering into the general life.

It is not so much that this picture is wrong as that it needs to be supplemented, and it needs a little toning down of the light and shade. This is the case especially with the internal conditions, the state of thought and of the religious life.

A. External Conditions: Government, Sects, and Parties.—The external conditions are so comparatively simple and so well known that a rapid glance at them will suffice.

At the time of our Lord's public ministry, Judæa and Samaria were directly subject to the Romans, and were governed by a procurator (Pontius Pilate, A.D. 26–36), who was to some extent subordinate to the legatus of Syria. Pilate had a character for cruelty (cf. Lk 13^{1}). And the Roman rule was no doubt as a whole harsh and unfeeling: we read of wholesale executions, which took the horrible form of crucifixion. But the people whom Rome had to govern were turbulent in the extreme; and so far as the Roman authorities come before us in NT, we cannot refuse them the credit of a desire to do a sort of rough justice.

*See the Bampton Lectures for 1893, p. 286 ff.

The odious duty of collecting tolls and taxes for the Romans led to the employment of a class of underlings (τελῶναι, publicani), who were regarded almost as outcasts by their Jewish countrymen.

The north and east of Palestine were still in the hands of sons of Herod. Antipas (4 B.C. to 39 A.D.) held Galilee and Peræa; and his brother Philip (4 B.C. to 34 A.D.), Ituræa and Trachonitis. The name given to the former, 'that fox' (Lk 13^{32}), will sufficiently describe him; he was living in open sin with Herodias, the wife of another brother, but was not wholly unvisited by remorse, and had at least curiosity in matters of religion (Mk 6^{20}‖, Lk 23^{8}). His capital was at Tiberias, on the Sea of Galilee, and he also held possession of the strong fortress of Machærus * E. of the Dead Sea. Herod Philip governed his dominions quietly, and was the best and most popular of his father's sons.

The Sadducees (Zadokite priests) consisted mainly of certain aristocratic priestly families (Ac 4^{6}) who held almost a monopoly of the high priesthood, and who played an influential and active part in the Sanhedrin, which under the Romans wielded considerable power. They were typical opportunists, and were bent above all things on keeping their own rights and privileges. Hence they were sensitive on the subject of popular disorder, which was likely to serve as an excuse to the Romans for displacing them (Jn 11^{48}). It was a coalition of Pharisees and Sadducees which procured the death of our Lord, but in the period of the Acts the Sadducees were the more active persecutors. Religion with them was secondary, but they differed somewhat both in doctrine and in practice from the Pharisees (Ac 23^{8}; cf. Edersheim, Life and Times, i. 314–321, etc.). They did not encumber themselves with the Pharisaic traditions, but took their stand upon the Pentateuch. They were notorious for strictness in judgment.

As contrasted with the Sadducees, the Pharisees (lit. Separatists or Purists) were essentially the religious party. They numbered more than 6000 (Ant. XVII. ii. 4), and were pledged to a high standard of life and scrupulous performance of religious duties (Mt 23^{23}). Unfortunately, the high standard was outward rather than inward. The elaborate casuistry to which the Pharisees had recourse was used as a means of evading moral obligations (Mk 7^{1-13}‖ 12^{38-40}‖, Mt 23^{13-33}), and resulted in a spirit hard, narrow, and self-righteous.

Not exactly coextensive with the Pharisees, though largely to be identified with them (we read of 'scribes of the Pharisees,' Mk 2^{16} RV; i.e. 'scribes who belonged to the party of the Pharisees'), were the Scribes (γραμματεῖς, νομικοί, νομοδιδάσκαλοι), or professed students of the law, who supplied the Pharisees with their principles. They had to a large extent taken the place of the priests as the preachers and teachers of Judaism. Their chief fields of action were the synagogues and the Rabbinical schools. The most highly respected of the scribes were the great religious authorities of the day. It was their successors who built up the Talmud. There were differences of opinion within the body (e.g. the rival schools of Hillel and Shammai, contemporaries of Herod the Great), but, without, their dicta were unquestioned. This veneration was, as a rule, only requited with contempt.

While the Pharisees at this date for the most part (though not entirely) held aloof from politics, on the ground that religion as they conceived it could be practised indifferently under any domination, and their own experiences under the national line, represented by Alexander Jannæus, had been the reverse of happy, the mass of the people were burning to throw off the yoke of the stranger. The party of action, which was prepared to go all lengths, was known as the Zealots. One member of this party was numbered among the apostles (Mt 10^{4}, Mk 3^{18}, Lk 6^{15}, Ac 1^{13}). In the siege of Jerus. they took the lead, and were distinguished at once by heroic courage and by horrible crimes.

The dynasty of the Herods had from the first claimed alliance with Hellenic culture. The founder of the dynasty had mixed with advantage to himself in the haute politique of his day; and he had signalized his reign by buildings in the Greek style, but on a scale of barbaric magnificence. The courts of the Herods must always have had a tincture of Hellenism about them. But the reaction against this was strong, and its influence probably did not extend very far, though it inspired the historians Nicolaus of Damascus, Justus of Tiberias, and Josephus. More likely to affect the lower and middle strata of the population would be the 'Greek cities' founded by the Syrian kings before the Maccabæan rising, such as the cluster known as Decapolis, for the most part east of the Jordan, with later foundations like the flourishing port of Cæsarea. But more important still would be the influence of the Jews of the Diaspora, constantly coming and going to the great feasts at Jerusalem, and with synagogues for their special use permanently established there (Ac 6^{9}). The greatest of the centres with which the Jews were thus brought in contact were Alexandria and Antioch. And there is reason to think that the amount of intellectual intercourse and interchange was by no means inconsiderable.

There must have been other foreign influences at work, but rather by what might be called underground channels. The connexion of Palestine with Babylonia and the East, which goes back to immemorial antiquity, had been revived and deepened by the Captivity. It was kept up by intercourse with the Jews who remained in those regions. But whether or not they had come precisely in this way, there can be no doubt that Oriental, and indeed specifically Persian influences were present in the sect of the Essenes. The ceremonial washings, and the reverence paid to the sun, can hardly have had any other origin. The asceticism and community of goods have a Pythagorean cast, and may have come from Greece by way of Egypt, while the rejection of sacrifice and what we know of the speculative tendencies of the Essenes may well be native to the soil of Palestine. The Essene settlements were congregated near the Dead Sea.

B. Internal Conditions: the State of Religious Thought and Life.

1. General Conditions.—To describe justly the state of Judaism in the time of Christ is a difficult and delicate thing. It is too apt to seem like an indictment of the Judaism of nineteen centuries, which not only on general grounds, but specially in view of the attitude of some Jewish apologists of the present day, a Christian theologian will be loth to bring. He will desire to make all the allowances that can rightly be made, and to state all the evidence (so far as he knows it) for as well as against. But at the same time he must not gloss over real faults and defects, without a statement of which Christianity itself can be but imperfectly understood.

Truth does not, as a rule, lie in compromises. And its interests will be perhaps best served if we set down without reserve both the darker and the brighter sides, only asking the reader to remember while he has the one before him, that the other is also there. That we attempt this difficult task at all is due to no wanton assumption of a right to judge, but to the unavoidable necessity that what is so intimately bound up with history should be seen in the full light which history throws upon it.

* In Ant. XVIII. v. 2 Machærus is in the possession of Antipas, in the previous § it belongs to Aretas; but the reading of this latter passage is questionable (cf. Schürer, NTZG i. 362 n., 365 n. [HJP I. ii. 23, 25]).

(α) The Darker Side of the Contemporary Judaism.—As we look broadly at the religious condition of Palestine in the time of our Lord, there can be little doubt that it was in need of a drastic reformation. This is the impression inevitably conveyed by the Gospels, and by the searching criticisms of St. Paul. Nor is it belied by the witness of Josephus, and in particular by the outbreak of untamed passion, with the horrors to which it gave rise, in the Jewish War. And although it may be easy to make a selection from the Talmud of sayings of a different character, it can hardly be questioned that the same source supplies proof enough that the denunciations of the Gospels were not without foundation. There is too evident a connexion between the inherent principles of Judaism and the defects charged against it to permit us to regard these as devoid of truth.

(i.) The idea of God was perhaps the strongest side of Judaism, but it was too exclusively transcendent. It had no adequate means of spanning the gulf between God and man. The faults of Judaism were those of Deism. It had one tender place, the love of J″ for Israel. But this fell some way short of the Christian idea of the Father in heaven, the God who not only loves a single people, but whose essence is love. Judaism also largely wanted the mystical element which has played such an important part in Christianity. The Johannean allegory of the Vine and the Branches, which agrees so closely with the teaching of St. Paul, the whole conception of immanent divine forces circulating through the organism, has no true analogy in it.* (ii.) But the most disastrous feature of Rabbinical Judaism was its identification of morality with obedience to written law. 'Duty, goodness, piety,—all these are to the Jew equivalent terms. They are mere synonyms for the same conception—the fulfilment of the law. A man therefore is good who knows the law and obeys it; a man is wicked who is ignorant of it and transgresses it' (Montefiore, Hibbert Lectures, p. 479). This identification of morality with law led to a number of serious evils. (iii.) Law can deal only with overt action. Hence there was an inevitable tendency to restrict the field of morals to overt action. Motive was comparatively disregarded. It is doubtless true that the Rabbis frequently insist on rightness of motive. A religion which in its Sacred Books included the Prophets as well as the Law could not do otherwise. But the legal conception was too deeply ingrained not to tell its tale. If it had not been so, there would have been no need for the Sermon on the Mount; and the address, 'Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites,' would have had no point. (iv.) Another consequence of the stress laid on overt acts was the development of an elaborate doctrine of salvation by works. We need not suppose that this doctrine was universally held and always consciously acted upon; but it cannot be denied that there was in Judaism a widespread opinion that might be expressed in the terms, 'so much keeping of the law, so much merit'; and the idea of a 'treasure of merit,' which each man stores up for himself, is constantly met with. (v.) In one sense the keeping of the law was very hard. The labours of the scribes had added to the original and primary laws an immense mass of inferential law, which was placed on the same footing of authority. This portentous accumulation of precepts was a burden 'grievous to be borne.' (vi.) Not only so, but a great part of this additional law was bad law. It was law inferred by a faulty system of exegesis. Even where the exegesis was bonâ fide, it was in a large proportion of cases unreal and artificial. But there was a great temptation to dishonesty, for which the way was left open by the exaggerated stress laid on acts, and the comparative ignoring of motive. In the dead level of written law the relative degrees of obligation were disregarded. Hence there were a number of precepts which were positively immoral (e.g. Corban, Mk $7^{11.\ 12}$ ‖). (vii.) A further defect in the legal conception of religion was its intellectualism. The Talmud bears witness to what is little less than an idolatry of learning, and that, we must remember, Rabbinical learning. With religion converted into science, and the science in great part no science, we may well say, 'If the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is the darkness!' The Scholasticism of the Middle Ages had no such unchallenged supremacy; it was not the one all-pervading ideal. (viii.) For the mass of the population the double law, traditional as well as original, could not but be a burden. The accumulation of precepts not possessed of moral value is always a thing to be deprecated. And however much we may allow for the fact that the observance of all these precepts was not expected of every one, there still remained enough to be a real incubus. And yet, on the other hand, the performance of the full Pharisaic standard was not so very difficult for persons of leisure, who deliberately made up their minds to it. It did not mean, or at least it might be understood as not meaning, more than a life mechanically regulated. But then it is easy to see that the existence of this class, consciously setting itself above its neighbours, and able, without any excessive strain, to make good its pretensions, must have inevitably engendered a feeling of self-righteousness or spiritual pride. The parable of the Pharisee and the Publican (Lk 18^{11-13}) must needs have been typical. (ix.) What the Pharisee was to the ordinary Jew, that the Jew was to the rest of mankind. However politically inferior, the Jew never lost his pride of race, and with him this pride of race was a pride of religious privilege. The Zealot sought to translate this into political domination, but the Pharisee was content to retire into the fortress of his inner consciousness, from which he could look with equanimity at the rise and fall of secular powers. (x.) This particular form of pride had a tendency to aggravate itself as time went on. 'To make a fence round the law' was a fundamental principle of Judaism. And in a like spirit the privileged people was tempted to make a fence round itself, and to dwell apart among the nations. Institutions which had had for their object to keep the nation clear of idolatry, were extended when the dangers of idolatry were past, until it required a revolution to say with St. Paul, 'There is neither Jew nor Greek.' (xi.) Worst and most disastrous of all was the tendency to fall back upon national privilege as a substitute for real reformation of life. We can see alike from the Gospels and from St. Paul how constantly the Jews had upon their lips, 'We have Abraham to our father' (Lk 3^{8}, Jn $8^{33.39}$, Ro 2^{17-20}). It is admitted that 'the Jews were somewhat too confident of their assured participation in the blessedness of eternal life; all Israelites, except very exceptional and determined sinners, were believed to have their share in it' (Montefiore, Hibb. Lect. p. 482).

(β) The Brighter Side of the Contemporary Judaism.—The above is a long and a serious catalogue of charges, partly resting upon the logic of the creed, but also too much borne out by positive testimony. It seems conclusively to prove that not only reformation, but a thoroughgoing reformation, was needed.

* The comparison of Israel to a vine is not unknown to Judaism, but in a wholly different application (see Wünsche, Erläut. d. Evang. on Jn 15^{1}).

And yet there is another side which the Christian teacher ought to emphasize more fully than it has been the custom to do.

(i.) In the first place, we have to remember that Judaism is professedly the religion of the OT. It is based upon a Book which includes the Prophets and the Psalms (to use the familiar description a potiori parte) as well as the Law. And however much Judaism proper gave precedence to the Law, it could not forget the other parts of the volume, or run wholly counter to their spirit. It is not too much to say that even in the Talmud we can see at every turn how the spirit of legalism was corrected by an influence which is ultimately derived from what are rightly called the evangelical portions of OT. We shall see to what an extent Christianity itself is a direct development of these.

(ii.) The evidence of NT, severe as it is upon the whole, yet is not all of one tenor. Its pages are sprinkled over with Jewish characters, who are mentioned in terms of praise: Zacharias and Elisabeth, Simeon and Anna, Nathanael, Nicodemus, and Joseph of Arimathæa, the young ruler, and the scribe who was pronounced to be 'not far from the kingdom of God' (Mk 12^{34}). We must not forget that there are parts of NT itself which in recent years have been claimed by Christian scholars as thinly veneered products of Judaism (Ep. of James, Apoc.). Whatever we may think of these particular instances, there are others (such as Didaché and the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs) in which it is highly probable that a Jewish original has been adapted to Christian purposes. And our present investigation will bring before us many examples in which, while Christianity corrects Jewish teaching, it nevertheless takes its start from it, and that not only from the purer original, but in its contemporary form.

(iii.) The panegyrists of the Talmud have at least right on their side to this extent, that single sayings can frequently be quoted from it in disproof of the sweeping allegations brought against it by its assailants. There are grains of fine wheat among its chaff. Some of these are referred, on what seems to be good authority, to a time anterior to the coming of Christ. The 'golden rule' is attributed to Hillel. The story is that when Shammai drove away an inquirer who desired to be taught the whole Torah while he stood on one foot, the man went to Hillel, who said: 'What is hateful to thyself do not to thy fellow; this is the whole Torah, and the rest is commentary' (Taylor, Pirqe Aboth, p. 37). Another great saying is ascribed to Antigonus of Soko: 'Be not as slaves that minister to the lord with a view to receive recompense; but be as slaves that minister to the lord without a view to receive recompense; and let the fear of Heaven be upon you' (ib. p. 27). There is a fair number of such sayings. If we take the treatise from which the last is directly quoted we shall see in it what is probably not an unfair representation of the better Judaism in the time of Christ, with its weaknesses sufficiently indicated, but with something also of its strength.

(iv.) It is right also to bear in mind that the Judaism of this date had no lack of enthusiasts and martyrs. Akiba in particular, though a Jew of the Jews, cannot but command our admiration (see Taylor, ut sup. p. 67 ff.). And in a different category his fortitude is matched by the mitis sapientia of Hillel, of whom it was said that his gentleness brought men 'nigh under the wings of the Shekinah' (ib. p. 37).

(v.) A favourable impression on the whole is given by the numerous pseudepigraphic works, which belong in the main to the two centuries on each side of the Christian era. The oldest parts of the Book of Enoch may possibly be earlier, just as some outlying members of the Baruch literature are probably later. The most typical writings are the Book of Enoch and the Psalms of Solomon (which can be dated with tolerable certainty B.C. 70–40), the Book of Jubilees and the Assumption of Moses (which may be taken as roughly contemporary with the founding of Christianity), and the Fourth Book of Ezra (2 Es) and the Apoc. of Baruch, both after the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. These writings show in varying degrees most of the characteristic infirmities of Judaism, but they also show its nobler features in a way which sometimes, and especially in the two latest works, throws the infirmities into the shade.*

It is a moot point how far the pseudepigrapha can be taken as representative of the main currents of Judaism. Montefiore, writing in 1892, says, 'It must be remembered that the apocalyptic writings lie for the most part outside the line of the purest Jewish development, and often present but the fringe or excrescence, and not the real substance of the dominating religious thought' (Hibb. Lect. p. 467). On the other hand, Charles has no difficulty in assigning the different portions to recognized party divisions in Judaism. Schürer in like manner describes their standpoint as that of 'correct Judaism,' adding, however, that they are 'not products of the school, but of free religious individuality' (HJP III. ii. 49). Similarly, Baldensperger speaks of 4 Ezra and Baruch as free from the spirit of casuistry, and not 'absorbed in the Halachic rules' (p. 35, ed. 1). This verdict would apply in some degree to this class of literature generally. It is perhaps in the main of provincial origin, or at least somewhat outside the beaten tracks of Jewish teaching. The Pss. of Solomon and Bk. of Jubilees would be nearest to these. It is very probable that 4 Ezr. and Apoc. Bar were directly affected by the ferment of thought caused by the birth of Christianity.

When we endeavour to put together the impressions which we derive from these various sources, we may perhaps say that the outcome of them is that Judaism at the Christian era had all the outer framework of a sound religion if only the filling in had been different. The Jew knew better than any of his contemporaries in Greece or Rome or in the East what religion was. He had a truer conception of God, and of the duty of man towards God; but on the first head he had much still to learn, and on the second he had many faults to be corrected in the working out of detail.

The Jew had at least a profound seriousness on the subject of religion. Where this was wanting, the man was no true Jew. And, even allowing for all the external influences which told against this, there was among the Jews probably less of professed atheism, indifference, levity, than there has ever been in any other society, ancient or modern. The Jew had also an intense feeling of loyalty to this society. His love of what we should call his Church rose to a passion. It is this which makes the apocalypses which followed the fall of Jerusalem so pathetic. The faith of men has probably seldom received a shock so severe. The authors of these apocalypses feel the shock to the uttermost. They grope about anxiously to find the meaning of God's mysterious dealings; but their faith in Him is unshaken. They are divided between passionate grief and resignation: 'Two things vehemently constrain me: for I cannot resist thee, and my soul, moreover, cannot behold the evils of my mother' (Apoc. Bar 3^3).

2. The Special Seed-plot of Christianity.—In general terms it may be said that when we seek for affinities to Christianity we find more of them the farther we recede from the centre of official Judaism. The one thing to which Christianity is most opposed is the hard, dry, casuistic legalism of the Pharisee. If we are right in thinking of the apocalyptic literature as in the main provincial, we shall not be surprised to find the points of contact with it become more numerous. Wherever there are traces of a fresher and deeper study of the Psalms and Prophets, there we have a natural kinship for the Christian spirit.

Now there is one class among whom this continuity with Psalms and Prophets is specially marked. It has been observed* that there is a group of Psalms (of which perhaps 9. 10. 22. 25. 35. 40. 69. 109 are the most prominent) in which the words translated in EV 'poor,' 'needy,' 'humble,' 'meek,' are of specially frequent occurrence. It appears that these words have acquired a moral meaning. From meaning originally those who are 'afflicted' or 'oppressed' (by men), they have come to mean those who in their oppression have drawn nearer to God and leave their cause in His hands. They are the pious Israelites who suffer from the tyranny of the heathen or of their worldly countrymen, and who refuse to assert themselves, but accept in a humble spirit the chastening sent by God. As there were many such in every period of the history of Israel, they might be said to form a class. Now there is other evidence that this class still existed at the Christian era. They are the mansueti et quiescentes of 4 Ezr (2 Es) 11[42]. They are just the class indicated in Ps-Sol 5[13f.] 'Who is the hope of the needy and the poor beside thee, O Lord? And thou wilt hearken: for who is gracious and gentle but thou? Thou makest glad the heart of the humble by opening thine hand in mercy.' (Compare also the reff. in Ryle and James, p. 48, and Index, s.v. πτωχός). The special NT designation is πτωχοὶ τῷ πνεύματι (Mt 5[3]). And a better expression of the spirit in question could not easily be found than the Magnificat (Lk 1[46–55]). It is clear that the group which appears in Lk 1. 2, not only Joseph and Mary, but Zacharias and Elisabeth, Simeon and Anna, all answer to this description. They are those who look for 'the consolation of Israel,' 'the redemption of Israel' (Lk 2[25. 38]), and who looked for it rather by fasting and prayer than by any haste to grasp the sword. There was no organized party, no concerted policy; but we cannot doubt that there were many devout souls scattered throughout the country, and in just the kind of distribution which the chapters Lk 1. 2 would suggest, some for shorter or longer periods making their way to Jerusalem, but the greater number dispersed over such secluded districts as the 'highlands' (ἡ ὀρεινή, Lk 1[39]) of Judæa and Galilee.

Here was the class which seemed, as it were, specially prepared to receive a new spiritual impulse and to take up a great movement of reformation. And other tendencies were in the air which were ready to contribute to the spread of such a movement when it came. The labours of the scribes had not been all wasted. There is a good example in Mk 12[32–34]—the happy combination of Dt 4[39] with Lv 19[18]—which shows that even among the Rabbis there were some who were feeling their way towards the more penetrating teaching of Jesus.

One great transition had been made since Ezk 18. The value of the individual soul was by this time fully realized. The old merging of the individual in the family and the clan had been fully left behind. Another germ contained in the teaching of the prophets had been developed. We can see from the case of the Essenes that men's minds were being prepared for the abolition of animal sacrifices, and along with the abolition of sacrifice for an end to the localized worship of the temple.

* See esp. Rahlfs, עָנִי und עָנָו in d. Psalmen, Göttingen, 1892; and Driver, Parallel Psalter, Oxf. 1898, Glossary, s.v. 'poor.'

The great extension of the synagogue services would contribute to the same result.

The proselytizing zeal which the later Judaism had displayed (Mt 23[15]) operated in several ways. It was a step in the direction of the ultimate evangelizing of the Gentiles. It had created a class in which the liberal influences of Graeco-Roman education prevented the purer principles of OT from lapsing into Judaic narrowness and formalism, and in which it was therefore natural that Christianity should strike root. We meet with specimens of this class in the Gospels (Lk 7[2–5]‖, Mk 15[39]‖) as well as in the Acts. And not only was there created a class of recipients for the gospel, but in the effort to meet the demands of these converts from paganism there was a tendency to tone down and throw into the background the more repellent features of Judaism. If it is true, as it probably is, that the so-called Didaché is a Christian enlargement of what was originally a Jewish manual for proselytes, it would be a good illustration of this process.

3. The Messianic Expectation.—But by far the most important of all the preparations for the gospel, negative as well as positive, both as demanding correction and as leading up to fulfilment, was the growth of the Messianic expectation, with the group of doctrines which went along with it.

The more the stress of the times was felt, and the more hopeless it seemed that any ordinary development of events could rescue the Jewish people from its oppressors, the more were its hopes thrown into the future and based upon the direct intervention of God. The starting-point of these hopes was the great prophecy in Dn 7. The world empires, one succeeding another, and all tyrannizing over the Chosen People, were to be judged, and Israel at last was to enter on the dominion reserved for it. The figure of the Son of Man who appears before the Ancient of days (Dn 7[13f.]) was not in the first instance a person: it was a collective expression, equivalent to the 'saints of the Most High' in v.[18]. The form of a 'man' is taken in contrast to the 'beasts,' which represent in the context the dynasties of the oppressors. In conflict with the last of these Israel is at first to be hard pressed, but God Himself will interpose by an act of divine judgment; the enemy will be crushed, and there will be given to Israel a kingdom which is universal and eternal.

This dominion is Israel's by right. It had not only been repeatedly promised from Abraham onwards, but it had been earned as a matter of desert. It was the complement of Israel's possession of the law. By its observance of the law Israel had acquired a right which no other nation could acquire. In the compact or covenant between Israel and Jehovah, Israel was doing its part, and it remained for God to do His.

The grand catastrophe by which this was to be brought about, the περιπέτεια in the tragedy of the nations, was to culminate in an act of judgment. The day of the Lord, conceived of by the prophets at first as a decisive battle in which God intervenes, gives place to a judicial act in which those who have oppressed His people are called to account, and the parts of oppressor and oppressed are reversed. To complete the justice of the case, those of the saints who have died in the times of distress must not be left out. There must be a resurrection. And the resurrection will usher in for them a state of lasting joy and felicity. Nature would share with man. There would be a 'new heaven and a new earth.' The tendency was to conceive of these somewhat literally and materially. Elaborate but at the same time prosaic pictures are given of the inexhaustible plenty which the saints (i.e. Israel as a people) are to enjoy.

Their bliss is also sometimes compared to a great feast (cf. Lk 14^{15}).

In the Bk. of Daniel, and, as it would seem, for some time afterwards, the reign of the saints is conceived impersonally. It is the dominion of Israel, the Chosen People. But gradually there arises a tendency to go back to a more primitive stage of prophecy, and to see the kingdom as concentrated in the person of its King: there is a personal Messiah. This is conspicuously the case in the Psalms of Solomon (17. 18), the date of which is fixed between B.C. 70–40. The righteous King who is to rule over the nations is the Davidic King of the elder prophets. A personal King is also implied in Orac. Sibyll. iii. 49 f., 652–656. In the middle section of the Bk. of Enoch (chs. 37–71), which is also probably pre-Christian, the title 'Son of Man' is taken up from Dn and distinctly identified with a person. Here, too, as in Orac. Sibyll. iii. 286, and Apoc. Bar 72^{2-6}, the Messiah is not only King but Judge (cf. Enoch 45^{3} 62^{3-13} 69^{27}). The execution of the judgment is handed over to Him by God. There is not absolute unity of view. Sometimes judgment is carried out by the Messiah, sometimes by God Himself (e.g. Enoch 90^{18-27}, Ass. Mos. 10^{3-10}). There is also some diversity as to the extent to which the resurrection is to be of the righteous, of Israel, or of all mankind. One view is that there are to be two resurrections, with a millennial reign between them.

The Sadducees held aloof from the Messianic expectation to which they were not clearly compelled by the few allusions in the Pentateuch, and which would have been only a disturbing element in their policy of making the best—for themselves—of things as they were. Some of the scribes must have also done what they could to discourage the belief. It is well known that Hillel is said to have asserted that the prophecies of the Messiah were fulfilled in Hezekiah. But there is abundant evidence that in spite of this the expectation was widely diffused. It must have been constantly preached in the synagogues of Palestine, and it certainly took a strong hold of the popular mind. It was differently received and understood by different hearers. With some quiet God-fearing souls, 'poor in spirit' like those who come before us at the beginning of the evangelical narrative in Lk 1. 2, it was cherished secretly with awed and wistful longing (Lk $2^{25.\ 38}$). With the mass of the population, as well teachers as taught, it took its place only too easily among the body of hard, narrow, materialized beliefs which were so characteristic of the time—a visible earthly kingdom reserved for Israel as its right, and carrying with it domination over other nations, with such unlimited command of enjoyment as a sovereign people might expect under conditions specially created for its benefit: all this introduced by supernatural means, wielded by One who is variously called 'Messiah' or 'Anointed,' 'the righteous King,' 'the Elect' or 'Son of Man,' not (if the question were pressed) in the strict sense God, though endowed by God with plenary powers, a fit Head for the Chosen People in its golden age, which was at last about to begin. And scattered among these masses there were many—some banded together under the name of Zealots, and thousands more who were ready to join them at the first signal—men not of dreams but of action, who were only waiting for the leader and the hour to put their hand to the sword and rise in revolt against the hated foreigners who oppressed them, prepared to take a fearful vengeance, and proud in the thought that in doing so they would be 'doing God service' and establishing His kingdom.

LITERATURE.—Vast stores of ordered material are contained in Schürer's great work orig. called Neutest. Zeitgeschichte (NTZG), and now as in the Eng. tr. Hist. of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ (HJP). The Eng. tr. from the 2nd much enlarged ed. came out in 1885–90; a 3rd ed., still further enlarged, has begun to appear (vols. ii. and iii., 1898). The late Dr. Edersheim's Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah (revised eds. from 1886) is also full of illustrative matter. Other works by the same author may also be consulted; esp. History of the Jewish Nation after the Destruction of Jerus. under Titus (2nd ed. carefully revised by H. A. White, 1896). Another very useful work is Weber's System d. altsynagog. Palästi. Theol., now called Jüdische Theologie (2nd ed., somewhat improved, 1897). As there is always a danger of confusing Jewish teaching of very different dates, this book should be checked as far as possible by comparison with the Pseudepigrapha, Philo, NT, and the early Talmudic work Pirqe Aboth (Sayings of the Jewish Fathers, ed. Taylor, 1877, and enlarged in 1897). To these authorities should now be added G. Balman, Die Worte Jesu (Bd. i., 1898 fin.), the most critical and scientific examination of the leading conceptions of the Gospels that has yet appeared.

Mention may be made among older works of Drummond's Jewish Messiah (1877) and Stanton's Jewish and Christian Messiah (1887). Hausrath's NT Times (Eng. tr. 1878–80) is picturesquely written, but far less trustworthy than Schürer; and Wünsche's Neue Beiträge z. Erläuterung d. Evv. (1878) is much criticised. Montefiore's Hibbert Lectures (1892) and arts. in JQR from an attractive apology for Judaism.

II. THE PUBLIC MINISTRY.—We shall now be in a position to approach the study of the Public Ministry of our Lord in the manner indicated at the outset. We shall be able to place ourselves at the standpoint of a sympathetic spectator. We shall have some rough conception of the kind of ideas which would be in his mind, and of the kind of conditions which he would see around him. We shall thus be able to follow the course of the Public Ministry with a certain amount of intelligence. We do not as yet attempt to penetrate the whole of its secret. Broadly speaking, we suppose ourselves to see what a privileged spectator might be expected to see, and no more. We reserve until a later stage the introduction of those special details of illuminative knowledge which, as a matter of history, were not accessible to the first spectators, but were only disclosed after a time. But we hold ourselves at liberty to collect and group the facts which were not removed from the cognizance of a spectator, in any way that may be most convenient to secure clearness of presentation.

It may be well to avail ourselves of this freedom at once, before giving an outline of the ministry, to state summarily certain conclusions which seem to arise out of the study of it. We shall hold the threads in our minds more firmly if we see to what results they are tending.

The anticipated conclusions, then, are these. (i.) From the very first (i.e. from the Baptism) our Lord had the full consciousness of the Messiah, and the full determination to found the Kingdom of God upon earth. (ii.) From the very first He had also the deliberate intention of transforming the current idea of the Kingdom. (iii.) In order to make this transformation effective, it was necessary to begin with the idea of the Kingdom and not of the King. In other words, the personal Messianic claim had to be kept in the background. But (iv.) the transformation of the idea was only a preliminary to the permanent establishment of the Kingdom; and this establishment turned round the Person of the Messiah. So that in the end the history of the Kingdom centres in the personal history of the King.

With so much of preface we proceed to give an outline of the Public Ministry according to the periods into which it seems to fall.

A. *PRELIMINARY PERIOD: FROM THE BAPTISM TO THE CALL OF THE LEADING APOSTLES.

Scene.—Mainly in Judæa, but in part also Galilee.

Time.—Winter A.D. 26 to a few weeks after Passover A.D. 27.

Mt 3^{1}–4^{11}, Mk 1^{1-13}, Lk 3^{1}–4^{13}, Jn 1^{6}–4^{54}.

* The choice of termini a quo and ad quem is sometimes inclusive and sometimes not inclusive. The most salient points are chosen. Here the term. ad quem is not inclusive.

B. First Active or Constructive Period: the Founding of the Kingdom.
Scene.—Mainly in Galilee, but also partly in Jerusalem.
Time.—From about Pentecost A.D. 27 to shortly before Passover A.D. 28.
Mt 4^{13}–18^{35}, Mk 1^{14}–6^{13}, Lk 4^{14}–9^{6}, Jn 5.

C. Middle or Culminating Period of the Active Ministry.
Scene.—Galilee.
Time.—Passover to shortly before Tabernacles A.D. 28.
Mt 14^{1}–18^{35}, Mk 6^{14}–9^{50}, Lk 9^{7-50}, Jn 6.

D. Close of the Active Period: the Messianic Crisis in View.
Scene.—Judæa (Jn $7^{10ff.}$, 11^{54}) and Peræa (Mk 10^{1}‖, Jn 10^{40}).
Time.—Tabernacles A.D. 28 to Passover A.D. 29.
Mt 19^{1}–20^{34}, Mk 10^{1-52}, Lk 9^{51}–19^{28} (for the most part not in chronological order), Jn 7^{1}–11^{57}.

E. The Messianic Crisis: the Triumphal Entry, the Last Teaching, Passion, Death, Resurrection, Ascension.
Scene.—Mainly in Jerusalem.
Time.—Six days before Passover to ten days before Pentecost A.D. 29.
Mt 21^{1}–28^{20}, Mk 11^{1}–16^{8} [16^{9-20}], Lk 19^{29}–24^{53}, Jn 12^{1}–21^{23}.

The chronology adopted in this article, not as certain, but as on the whole the best of current systems, is in substantial agreement with that of the art. Chronology of the New Testament. It differs from that in the writer's first work, The Authorship and Historical Character of the Fourth Gospel (London, 1872), by placing the Crucifixion in the year A.D. 29 rather than A.D. 30.

A. Preliminary Period: from the Baptism to the Call of the Leading Apostles.
Scene.—Mainly Judæa, but in part also Galilee.
Time.—Winter A.D. 26 to a few weeks after Passover A.D. 27.
Mt 3^{1}–4^{11}, Mk 1^{1-13}, Lk 3^{1}–4^{13}, Jn 1^{6}–4^{54}.

The Public Ministry of our Lord begins with His Baptism. (i.) This will therefore be the first point to attract our attention, and some explanation will be needed as to the Baptist and his mission. (ii.) Along with the Baptism we must needs take the Temptation, as a glimpse vouchsafed by Jesus Himself, and early and widely published, of the principles which were to determine the nature of His Ministry. (iii.) After this will come the first preliminary gathering of a few loosely attached followers, and the first miracle at Cana in Galilee. (iv.) Then the visit to Jerusalem for the Passover of the year 27, with a short stay in the South. (v.) Then we have a return to Galilee, followed by a brief period of partial retirement, leading up to the Call of the four chief apostles.

Allusions, more or less explicit, to the Baptism and to the ministry of John, are found in all four Gospels; the other events of this period are recorded only in the fourth—unless we are to identify the Healing of the Nobleman's Son (Jn 4^{46-54}) with that of the Centurion's Servant (Mt 8^{5-13}, Lk 7^{1-10}).

i. The Baptist and the Baptism.—Our survey of contemporary Judaism has shown us that 'the kingdom of God' was a phrase in almost every man's mouth. It meant, in point of fact, to the majority 'a kingdom for Israel' far more than a 'kingdom of God.' But though in a more or less indefinite sense it was understood to be near, no time had as yet been actually announced for it. Men were on the watch, but rather for the signs of the coming than for the actual coming itself.

We are not surprised, therefore, to find that the news that a prophet had appeared who preached the approaching coming of the Messiah caused a widespread excitement.* The aspect of this coming, which he put in the forefront, was the aspect of judgment. The axe was laid to the root of the trees, and the fruitless tree would be burned (Mt 3^{10}, Lk 3^{9}).

The prophet who made this announcement bore the name of John. The scene of his preaching was the wilderness of Judæa, near the lower course of the Jordan where it fell into the Dead Sea. In this wilderness he had lived in solitude for some time before he began his prophetic mission. His whole appearance was sternly ascetic. He seems to have adopted deliberately a garb and a manner of life resembling those of Elijah, probably not so much in anticipation of the verdict which was to be afterwards passed upon him (Mt 11^{14}) as because he took Elijah for his model.

His character and his mission alike were severely simple. His soul was possessed with a strong conviction, wrought in him in precisely the same manner in which such convictions were wrought in the prophets of the OT, that a great crisis was near at hand. What lay beyond was dim, and, so far as the prophet had a definite picture before him, it was probably not very different from that which presented itself to his countrymen. But he saw clearly that the crisis would take the form of a judgment, and that there would be a judge, a personal judge, with a mission vastly greater than his own. At the same time, it is also borne in upon him that the preparation required by this coming judgment is a moral reformation. This he sees intensely; and again he goes back behind the teaching of his day to that of the ancient prophets. That which is required is not merely a stricter performance of the law, but a deep inward change—a change spontaneously expressing itself in right action.

Once more, and indeed very conspicuously, he made good his resemblance to the older prophets by clothing this leading idea of his in an expressive symbolical act. The rumour of him brought the people to him in crowds; and one by one, as they confessed to him their sins and convinced him of the reality of their repentance, he took them down into the running waters of the Jordan; he made them plunge in or let the waters close over their heads, and then he led them out again with the consciousness that they had left their sinful past behind them, and that they were pledged to a new life.

The process was called 'Baptism'; and John, from the fact that it constituted the main outward expression of his mission, was called 'the Baptist.' The act bore a certain resemblance to those ceremonial washings with which the Jews were familiar enough, and which held a specially prominent place in the ritual of the Essenes. But it differed from all these in that it was an act performed once for all, and not repeated from day to day. The lesson of it was that of Jn 13^{10}: he who was once bathed in this thorough and searching fashion did not need to have the act repeated; the effect was to last for life.

The movement took hold especially of the lower and what were thought to be the more abandoned classes. John was kept fully employed in the work of confessing and baptizing, but he did not allow it to be forgotten that all this pointed forward to another mission greater than his own. The presentiment grew upon him that part of his task as prophet was to name this mightier successor. And again, after the manner of the older prophets, he knew that it would be made manifest to him whom he was to name.

Presently the sign was given. Among those who came to be baptized was one who passed for a relative of his own, with whom possibly, though perhaps not probably, he may have had some intercourse in boyhood (cf. Jn 1^{31}). As with others who before their baptism were called upon to confess, so also with this kinsman, John had some converse, and, if we may accept what is found only in a single narrative,* at first refused to baptize him. His scruples are set aside, but it is not until the actual baptism that the full truth bursts upon him. Still, the analogy of the older prophecy is maintained. A sign is given such as that which Isaiah offered to Ahaz (Is 7^{11}). From the Fourth Gospel we should gather that it was seen in prophetic vision by the Baptist (Jn 1^{32-34}); from the Synoptics we should gather that it was seen in like vision by the baptized (Mk 1^{10}, Mt 3^{16} 'he saw'). And to prophetic sight was joined also the prophetic hearing of a voice from heaven, proclaiming in words that recalled at once Ps 2^{7} and Is 42^{1} 'Thou art my beloved Son, in thee I am well pleased.'

* Stress can hardly be laid on the form of announcement in Mt 3^{2}, which would make the Baptist anticipate exactly the announcement of Jesus. This would seem to be due to the editor. The oldest version describes the Baptist as 'preaching a baptism of repentance for remission of sins' (Mk 1^{4}).

(α) The Baptist's Hesitation.—The incident of Mt $3^{14f.}$ is open to some suspicion of being a product (such as might well grow up by insensible degrees in the passing of the narrative from hand to hand) of the conviction which later became general among Christians, that their Master was without sin, and of the difficulty which thence arose of associating Him with a baptism 'of repentance.' We cannot exclude this possibility. But, on the other hand, the difficulty is for us, too, a real one, and the solution given, while it has nothing under the circumstances inconsistent or improbable, is attractive by its very reserve. 'To fulfil all righteousness'=to leave undone nothing which God had shown to be His will. In a general movement which embraced all the more earnest-minded in the nation, it was right that He too should share. It would not follow that the symbolical act of Baptism should have precisely the same significance for every one who submitted to it. For the main body it denoted a break with a sinful past and a new start upon a reformed life. For the Messiah it denoted a break simply, the entrance upon a new phase in the accomplishment of His mission. It took the place with Him of the 'anointing,' which marked the assumption of the active work to which they were called by the kings and prophets of old. This 'anointing' was the 'descent of the Spirit.' The Baptism of the Messiah was Baptism 'with the Spirit,' wherewith He was to baptize. The significance of Baptism in His case was positive rather than negative.

(β) The Voice from Heaven.—It has been too readily assumed by some distinguished writers (e.g. Usener) that the oldest version of the voice from heaven was in exact agreement with Ps 2^{7} 'Thou art my [beloved] Son: this day have I begotten thee.' In two of the three Synoptics the reading is undoubtedly ἐν σοὶ [ᾧ] εὐδόκησα [ηὐδ-]. It is true, however, that in Lk 3^{22} an important group of authorities has ἐγὼ σήμερον γεγέννηκά σε. This is the reading of the larger branch of the Western text (D a b c al. codd. nonnull. ap. Aug. Juvenc. al.). A similar reading is found in Justin, c. Tryph. bis and in other writers, and both readings are combined in the Ebionite Gosp. as quoted by Epiphanius. [The evidence is collected in full by Resch, Agrapha, p. 347 ff.]. On the other hand, it is by no means certain that in some of these cases the Ps is not directly quoted, and in all assimilation to the text of the Ps lay very near at hand. Even the Western text of Lk is divided, a smaller but very ancient branch (including e) agreeing with the mass of the Gr. MSS. There can be little doubt that not only the Canonical Gospels, but the ground document on which they are based, had the common reading. The competing reading was a natural application of Ps 2^{7}, and it fell in so readily with views which in different forms circulated rather widely in the 2nd cent. that we cannot be surprised if it met with a certain amount of adoption. See, further, below.

(γ) Apocryphal Details.—The story of the Baptism underwent various apocryphal amplifications and adornments. One of the earliest of these is the appearance of a bright light (Codd. Vercell. et Sangerm. ad Mt 3^{15}; Ev. Ebion. ap. Epiph., Ephraem Syr.) or of a fire upon the Jordan (Just. c. Tryph. 88, Prædicatio Pauli ap. Ps.-Cypr. de Rebapt. 17 al.). The most elaborate working up of this kind of material is found in the Syriac Baptismal Liturgy of Severus (Resch, Agrapha, p. 361 ff.).

(δ) The Synoptic and Johannean Versions.—When a prophet began his prophetic career he received clear proof of the reality of his call most often through some powerful inner experience or vision (e.g. Is 6), but also at times through Divine revelation to another (e.g. 1 K 19^{16}). We may regard the events of the Baptism as a Divine authentication of this kind of the Mission of Jesus. But if so, there would be nothing incongruous in supposing that this authentication was vouchsafed, both to the Messiah Himself and to the Forerunner, just as a similar authentication was vouchsafed to St. Paul and to Ananias (Ac $9^{3ff.}$ $11^{ff.}$).

We are therefore not in any way compelled to choose between the Synoptic and Johannean versions as to the incidence of the supernatural signs. The two versions may quite well be thought of as supplementing rather than contradicting each other.

The Baptism of Jesus undoubtedly marks the beginning of His public ministry. How much more was it than this? The Judaizing Ebionites of the 2nd century, who never rose above the conception of Christ as an inspired prophet, and some Gnostic sects which separated the Man Jesus from the Æon Christus, starting from the Synoptic narrative, and combining it with Ps 2^{7}, dated from the Baptism the union of the human and the Divine in Christ in such a way that they are sometimes described as making the Baptism a substitute for the supernatural Birth. We can imagine how, to those who had the story of the Baptism before them, but who had not yet been reached by the tidings of those earlier events round which the veil of a sacred privacy had been drawn, and which (as we shall see) only made their way to general knowledge by slow degrees and after some length of time had elapsed, should regard the descent of the Holy Ghost as a first endowment with Divinity. The fact that it was not till then that Jesus began to perform His 'mighty works,' would seem to give some colour to the belief. And it would be likely enough that a passing phase of Christian thought, based upon imperfect knowledge, would survive in certain limited circles. But the main body of the Church did not rest in this contracted view, which was really inconsistent with the Christology revealed to us in the earliest group of St. Paul's Epistles. It accepted, and, through such leaders as Ignatius of Antioch, emphasized strongly the earlier chapters of the canonical narrative; and the contents of those chapters gave shape to the oldest form (which can hardly be later than Ignatius) of the Apostles' Creed. Already, before the 1st century was out, St. John had presented what was to be the Catholic interpretation of the relation of the Baptism to the Godhead of Christ. Far back at the very beginning of all beginnings the Divine Word had already been face to face with God, and was Himself God; so that, when the same Word entered into the conditions of humanity, this did not denote any loss of Godhead which was inherent and essential. Much less could the Godhead of the incarnate Christ be supposed to date from the signs which accompanied the Baptism. The object of these signs was rather to inaugurate the public ministry of the Messiah, that He might be 'manifested to Israel' (ἵνα φανερωθῇ τῷ Ισρ., Jn 1^{31}). Though the Greek is different the idea is the same as that in Lk 1^{80}, where it is said of the Baptist himself that he was in the desert 'till the day of his showing unto Israel' (ἕως ἡμέρας ἀναδείξεως αὐτοῦ πρὸς τὸν Ἰσρ.). Whether or not the signs were in the first instance seen by more than the Messiah Himself and the Baptist (and it is probable that they were not), they were made public by the Baptist's declaration (Jn 1^{29-34}), so that in any case there was a real 'manifestation to Israel.'

No doubt there was more than this. Besides the outward manifestation, a new epoch opened for the Son of Man Himself. But the nature of this we can describe only by its effects. The evangelists evidently have before their minds the analogy of the prophetic call and prophetic endowment. After the events of the Baptism Jesus is 'full of the Holy Spirit' (Lk 4^{1}, cf. Mt 4^{1}, Mk 1^{12}). And He applies to Himself the prophetic language of Is 61^{1} 'The Spirit of the Lord is upon me; because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek,' etc. (cf. Lk 4^{18}; it is probably this allusion to 'anointing with the Spirit' which has led to the incident in Lk being placed thus early). In the Gospel according to the Hebrews this is expressed even more emphatically than in the canonical Gospels: 'Factum est autem cum ascendisset Dominus de aqua, descendit fons omnis Spiritus sancti et requievit super eum et dixit illi: Fili mi in omnibus prophetis exspectabam te, ut venires et requiescerem in te. In eo enim requies mea, tu es filius meus primogenitus qui regnas in sempiternum' (Hieron. ad Jes. xi. 1).

* Resch (TU. x. ii. 57), in his later opinion, regards this narrative as belonging to the oldest evangelical document; but the passages which he has collected in support of this view might quite well be explained as paraphrastic allusions to the canonical Mt. The Gosp. acc. to Heb. as used by the Ebionites (Epiph. Hær. xxx. 13) had a similar scene after the Baptism of Jesus (Resch, Agrapha, p. 345 f.).

We have only to add that from this time onwards the rôle of the Messiah is distinctly assumed. The 'mighty works' very soon begin; disciples begin to attach themselves, at first loosely, but with increasing closeness; and there is a tone of decisive authority both in teaching and in act.

LITERATURE.—There is a strange mixture of fine scholarship and learning, with bold, not to say wild, speculation on the subject of this section in Usener's Religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen, 1 Teil, Bonn, 1889. With this may be compared Bornemann, Die Taufe Christi durch Johannes in d. dogmatischen Beurteilung d. Christl. Theologen d. vier ersten Jahrhunderte, Leipzig, 1896. John the Baptist, by the late Dr. H. R. Reynolds (3rd ed. 1888), represents the Congregational Lecture of 1874, and deals more with the career of John than with the questions which arise out of the Baptism of Jesus; but it does not leave these untouched so far as they had at that date come into view.

ii. The Temptation.—We decline to speculate where the data fail us. But one remarkable glimpse is afforded us into the state of the inner consciousness of the Son of Man after His Baptism. Strictly speaking, this would not as yet have been available to the spectator. It was probably not at this early date that it was disclosed, even to those nearest and dearest to Him. Still, the disclosure must have been made by the Lord Himself during His lifetime; and the extent to which it has found its way into all the Synoptics shows that it must have had a somewhat wide diffusion among the main body of the disciples. For this reason, as well as for the advantage of introducing it at the place which it occupies in the narratives, we shall not hesitate to touch upon the Temptation here, though it might perhaps more strictly come under the head of 'Supplemental Matter.'

The narratives of the Temptation are upon the face of them symbolical. Only in the form of symbols was it possible to present to the men of that day a struggle so fought out in the deepest recesses of the soul. There are two instances of such struggle in the life of the Redeemer—one at the beginning and the other at the end of His ministry (Lk 4^{13} comp. with 22^{53}). In both, the assault comes from without, from the personal Power of Evil. It is impossible for us to understand it, in the sense of understanding how what we call temptation could affect the Son of God. It could not have touched Him at all unless He had been also, and no less really, Son of Man. He vouchsafed to be tempted in order that He might be in all points like unto His brethren (He 4^{15}).

The Temptation clearly belongs to the beginning of the Ministry. It would have had no point before; and the issue on which it turned had evidently been decided before the public life of Jesus began, as that life throughout its whole course followed the law which was then laid down. The Temptation implies two things. It implies that He to whom it was addressed both knew Himself to be the Messiah whom the Jews expected, and also knew Himself to be in possession of extraordinary powers. To say that He was now for the first time conscious of these powers is more than we have warrant for. But, in any case, it was the first time that the problem arose how they were to be exercised. Were they to be exercised at the prompting of the simplest of all instincts—the instinct of self-preservation? Were they to be exercised in furtherance of what must have seemed to be the first condition on which His mission as the Messiah could be accomplished—to convince the world that He had the mission, that it was for Him to lead and for them to follow? And, lastly, when He came forward as the Messiah, was it to be as the Messiah of Jewish expectation? Was His kingdom to be a kingdom of this world? Was it to embrace all the secular kingdoms and the glory of them, to enfold them in a system more powerful and more magnificent than theirs, brought about by supernatural means, with no local limitations like even the greatest of past empires, but wide as the universe itself and indestructible? Was it to be a real restoring of the kingdom to Israel? Was Jerusalem to be its centre, in a new sense the 'city of the Great King'?

All these questions Jesus answered for Himself absolutely in the negative. There did not enter into His mind even a passing shadow of the ambition which marked the best of earthly conquerors. He was determined not to minister in the least to the national pride of the Jews. Still less would He work out a new pride of His own. He did not desire in any sense volitare per ora. Even the most natural cravings of the nature which He had assumed He refused to satisfy so long as their satisfaction ended with Himself.

These principles are involved in the narrative of the Temptation. They are laid down once for all; and the rest of the history shows no swerving from them. At the same time it must be remembered that although the decision had been reached by Jesus Himself, it was not yet known, except so far as He was pleased to reveal it. Partly, the revelation was made by acts and the self-imposed limits of action. The clearest revelation was the story of the Temptation itself. But neither the one nor the other was wholly understood.

iii. The First Disciples and the Miracle at Cana.—At this point we leave for some time the Synoptic narrative and follow rather that in the Fourth Gospel, which it must be confessed comes to us with very considerable verisimilitude. If we had only the Synoptic Gospels we should have to suppose that our Lord gathered about Him a band of disciples abruptly and suddenly, capturing them as it were by the tone of authority in His command. In St. John we have the steps given which led up to this, and which make it far more intelligible.

From this Gospel it would appear that Jesus remained for some time in the neighbourhood of the Baptist; that the Baptist more than once indicated Him in a marked and indeed mysterious way (Jn 1^{29} 'The Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world'; cf. v.^{35} *); and that one by one several of John's disciples began to attach themselves, as yet more or less loosely, to His person. The Baptist's testimony, strengthened by first impressions, awoke in them the belief that at last the 'mightier than he' predicted by the Baptist had come (Jn 1^{41}). Such a belief at this time and under these circumstances would need no elaborate demonstration. It would be accepted in a tentative way, awaiting verification from events, and, of course, only with those contents which accorded with current Jewish opinion.

The home of Jesus was still, as it had been for some thirty years of His life, at Nazareth; and at the time when He began to collect followers round Him, He was already on the point of returning thither

* The words are remarkable, especially as coming thus at the very threshold. It is possible that the evangelist may have been led to define somewhat in view of later events and later doctrines (for the allusion seems to be to Is 53). But the context, including the deputation from Jerusalem, is so lifelike and so thoroughly in accordance with probabilities, that the saying has a presumption in its favour.

(Jn 1^{43}). He had not as yet separated Himself from the domestic life of His family. It was as an incident in this life that He went to a marriage feast at the village of Cana (prob. = Kâna el-Jelîl rather than Kefr Kenna) in the company of His mother and some at least of His newly-found disciples. Here occurred the first of those 'signs' which were to be one conspicuous outcome of His mission. No wonder that it impressed itself vividly on the memory of one who was present, and that it confirmed his incipient faith (Jn 2^{11}). We shall speak of these signs in their general bearing presently.

iv. The First Passover.—There would seem to have been some connexion between the family at Nazareth and Capernaum,* as the whole party now spend some days there (Jn 2^{12}). But the Passover was near, and Jesus, with at least some of His disciples, went up to it. In connexion with this Passover, St. John places, what has the appearance of a somewhat high-handed act, the expulsion of buyers and sellers from the outer court of the temple (Jn 2^{13-22}). The Synoptics place a similar act in the last week of the Ministry (Mk 11^{15-18}‖). It is possible that such an act may have happened twice; but if we are to choose, and if we believe the Gospel to be really by the son of Zebedee, we shall give his dating the preference—the more so as in these early chapters the dates are given with great precision, and apparently with the intention of correcting a current impression.

This act was the first definite assumption of a public mission to Israel, and its scene was fitly chosen at the centre of Israel's worship. It was the act, not as yet necessarily of one who claimed to be the Messiah, but of a religious reformer like one of the ancient prophets. It was naturally followed by a challenge as to the right of such an assumption. To this the enigmatic reply was given, 'Destroy this temple, and in three days (i.e. in a short time, cf. Hos 6^{2}) I will raise it up'; which seems to be rightly glossed in Mk 14^{58}—the Jewish Church with its visible local centre should give place to the Christian Church with its invisible and spiritual centre (cf. Jn $4^{21f.}$). The saying made an impression at the time, and was brought up at the trial of Jesus to support a charge of blasphemy; the disciples at a later date referred it to the Resurrection (Jn $2^{21f.}$).

A striking feature in the Johannean version of His visit to Judæa is the way in which the work of Jesus in connexion with it takes up the work of the Baptist and fills in conspicuous gaps in the narrative of the Synoptics. The cleansing of the temple is an act of reformation which follows up the call to repentance. In Jn alone of the authorities have we a distinct statement that Jesus adopted the practice of baptism (3^{22} 4^{1}), though no other account of the origin of the Christian Sacrament is so natural. We find also that the necessity for baptism and the 'new birth' which went with it is made the subject of a discourse with the Sanhedrist Nicodemus. The writer of the Gospel had been himself a disciple of John the Baptist, and still kept up his connexion with him, and knew what went on in his circle (Jn $3^{23ff.}$). At the same time he seems to expand the discourses which he records with matter of his own ($3^{16ff.}$ $^{31ff.}$).

v. Retirement to Galilee.—Soon after this John the Baptist was arrested by Herod Antipas, and Jesus retired into Galilee. On the way He passed through Samaria, and paused at Jacob's well near the village of Sychar (now generally identified with 'Askar), where His teaching made a marked impression (Jn 4^{39-42}). The Samaritans had a Messianic expectation of their own (Jn 4^{25}); and if the narrator has not defined what took place in the light of subsequent events, Jesus claimed to fulfil this expectation. This was contrary to His policy for some time to come in dealing with Israel (Mk 1^{44}), but He may possibly have used greater freedom among non-Israelites.

The events of Jn 2^{13}–4^{45} may have occupied three or four weeks, but hardly more. At the time when our Lord arrives in Galilee the impression of His public acts at the Passover was still fresh (Jn 4^{45}). This would lead us to explain the latter half of Jn 4^{35} as a description of the state of things actually existing; the cornfields were at the time 'white for the harvest,' and 'Say not ye,' etc., will be a proverb. But that being so, a difficulty would be caused if the incident of the plucking of the ears of corn (Mk $2^{23ff.}$) were in its place chronologically, as the crops would still be in much the same condition as during the journey through Samaria, though the wheat harvest was going on between Passover and Pentecost, and all the events implied in Mk 1^{14}–2^{22} would have intervened. The time is really too short for these. It is more probable that they were spread over some months. We must conceive of our Lord as returning to Galilee with the few disciples with Him still in the state of loose attachment characteristic of this period, and Himself remaining for a while in comparative privacy. The disciples had returned to their occupations when He takes the new and decisive step involved in the call described for us in the Synoptics.

The Synoptic Chronology.—If Mk 2^{23}‖ is to be taken as strictly consecutive with the events that precede, it would follow that the call of the leading apostles took place at least a week or two before the cutting of the ripened wheat, i.e., as we might infer, before rather than some time after the Passover season. In that case the Johannean and Synoptic narratives would not be easy to combine. But the sequence of incidents in Mk (Eating with sinners, 2^{13-17}; Fasting, 2^{18-22}; Two incidents relating to the Sabbath, 2^{23}–3^{6}) suggests that we have here rather a typical group of points in the controversy with the Pharisees than a chronicle of events as they happened in order of time. In that case the call of the apostles might fall in the autumn, and the plucking of the ears of corn might belong to the end rather than the beginning of the period upon which we are about to enter.

The Healing of the Nobleman's Son.—As the narratives have come down to us, there are no doubt real differences between the story of the healing of the Nobleman's Son (Jn 4^{46-54}) and that of the Centurion's Servant (Mt 8^{5-13}‖). We must, however, reckon with the possibility—it cannot in any case be more—that they are two versions of the same event, arising out of the ambiguity of παῖς and δοῦλος. Years ago (Fourth Gospel, p. 100 f.) the writer had taken this view, which has since been adopted by Weiss (Leben Jesu, i. 423 ff.). A similar question may be raised in connexion with the common features of the narratives Lk 5^{1-11}, Jn 21^{1-11}. There, too, there may have been some confusion (Fourth Gospel, p. 267; cf. Loofs, Die Auferstehungsberichte, p. 32). Such instances mark the limits of a laxer or stricter interpretation of the historicity of the documents, between which we are not in a position to decide with absolute certainty.

B. First Active or Constructive Period: the Founding of the Kingdom.

Scene.—Mainly in Galilee, but also partly in Jerusalem.

Time.—From about Pentecost A.D. 27 to shortly before Passover A.D. 28.

Mt 4^{12}–13^{58}, Mk 1^{14}–6^{13}, Lk 4^{14}–9^{6}, Jn 5^{1-47}.

In this period the points to notice are: (i.) The Call, Training, and Mission of the Twelve, followed perhaps by a larger number (the Seventy of St. Luke); (ii.) the gradual differentiation of the ministry of Jesus from that of John Bapt. and its assumption of a much larger scope; (iii.) a full course of teaching on the true nature of the Kingdom of God (or of Heaven); (iv.) the performance of a number of Messianic works, chiefly of healing; (v.) the effect of these works on the common people as seen in a great amount of superficial enthusiasm, but without as yet much intelligent apprehension of the object really in view; (vi.) the growing hostility of the scribes and Pharisees caused by a more and more declared divergence of principle; (vii.) the very gentle indirect and gradual putting forward by Jesus of His claim as the Messiah.

* The site of Capernaum is still much debated. At one time it seemed as if the suffrage would go for Tell Ḥûm, but of late there has been a reaction in favour of Khân Minyeh (see the art. in this Dictionary, HGHL p. 456 f., and von Soden, Reisebriefe (1898), p. 160 f., who quotes a resident, Père Biever), Buhl, however, GAP p. 224, still supports Tell Ḥûm.

Up to the point which we have now reached there had been no definite 'founding' of a society; no steps had been taken towards the institution even of a new sect, much less of a new religion. The Baptism of Jesus had been attended by circumstances which marked Him out in a highly significant manner; but the general knowledge of these circumstances was vague, and even in those who were not unacquainted with them they awoke expectations rather than convictions, and these, too, were vague and left for the future to define. For the rest little as yet had occurred to define them. A certain number of disciples had gathered round Jesus in the most easy and natural manner, just as disciples had gathered round many a Rabbi before Him. These simply came and went as inclination took them; they were not as yet bound by any closer ties to His person. He had gone about quietly with some of them in His company, but nothing very startling had happened. The expulsion of the buyers and sellers from the temple was a prophetic act, and two 'signs' had occurred at a considerable interval; but this was little to what the Jews expected in their Messiah. So far Jesus had worked side by side with the Baptist, and on very similar lines. If His disciples took a share in baptizing (Jn 4^{2}), it was in the same kind of baptizing as that of John. It was a baptism 'of repentance,' and in no sense baptism 'into the name of Christ.'

The period on which we are now entering marks a great advance. The work which Jesus came to perform now took its distinctive shape. What had gone before was of the nature of foretaste, hints, foreshadowings; now the strokes follow each other in quick succession by which the purpose of Jesus is set clearly before those who have eyes to see. We may take these one by one.

i. The Call, Training, and Mission of the Twelve (and of the Seventy).—The first step is one which evidently struck the imagination of the followers of Jesus, because it is placed in the forefront of the Synoptic narrative. It is, in fact, the real beginning of the Public Ministry. Among those who had been the first to seek a nearer acquaintance with the new Prophet were two pairs of brothers, both from Capernaum, and both fishermen by trade. When Jesus returned to Galilee they all went back to their ordinary occupations, and they were engaged in these when suddenly they saw Him standing by the shore of the lake and received a peremptory command to follow Him (Mk $1^{16\text{-}20}$ ‖). This 'following' meant something more than anything they had done as yet; they were to 'be with him' (Mk 3^{14}), so that they might receive His teaching continuously and in a manner systematically. They were encouraged to ask questions, and their questions were answered. Special and full explanations were given to them which were not given to others (Mt 13^{34}). The teaching of Jesus was not esoteric, but there was this inner circle to whom peculiar advantages were given for entering into it.

The call which was issued in the first instance to the four, Peter and Andrew, James and John, was gradually extended. The one other instance particularized in the Gospels is that of Levi, the son of Alphæus, to whom was given—possibly by Jesus Himself (Weiss, Leben Jesu, i. 503)—the name of 'Matthew' (= 'given by God'). A like call proceeded to others, till the number was made up to twelve (lists in Mk $3^{16\text{-}19}$, Mt $10^{2\text{-}4}$, Lk $6^{14\text{-}16}$, Ac 1^{13}). The persons chosen belonged to the middle and lower classes. Some must have been fairly well-to-do. Not only did the fishermen own the boats they used, but the father of James and John had 'hired servants' (Mk 1^{20}), and John was acquainted with the high priest* (i.e., perhaps, with members of his household, Jn 18^{15}). Matthew was of the despised class of 'publicans.' The second Simon belonged to the party of Zealots. One, the second Judas (like his father, Simon, Jn 6^{71} 13^{26} RV), was a native of Kerioth in Judæa. They were chosen evidently for a certain moral aptitude which they showed for the mission to be entrusted to them. Judas Iscariot possessed this like the rest, but wrecked his fair chances. The choice and call of Jesus did not preclude the use of common free-will.

The course of teaching in which the Twelve were initiated covered a considerable part of that of which an outline will presently be sketched, especially its first two heads. It is summarized in the phrase 'the mystery of the Kingdom' (Mk 4^{11} ‖). Of course it is not to be thought that the disciples at once understood all that was told them. Very far from it. They had much to unlearn as well as to learn, and they showed themselves slow of apprehension. But the form of teaching adopted by Jesus was exactly fitted for its object, which was to lodge in the mind principles that would gradually become luminous as they were interpreted by events and by prolonged if slow reflection.

Jesus Himself knew full well how unripe even the most intimate of His disciples were to carry out His designs. After a time—we may suppose early in the year 28—He sent out the Twelve on a mission to villages and country districts which He was not able to visit at once Himself (Mt $10^{1\text{ff.}}$ ‖). But they were not to attempt to teach. Some of the wonderful works which Jesus did Himself they also were empowered to do; but the announcement which they were to make by word of mouth was limited to the one formula with which both John and Jesus had begun: 'The kingdom of heaven is at hand' (Mt 10^{7}).

In one Gospel mention is made of a mission which seems to be supplemental to this. Lk speaks not only of the Twelve being sent out, but also of Seventy sent out like the Twelve by twos (Lk $10^{1\text{ff.}}$). When we observe that the instructions given to them are substantially a repetition of those already given to the Twelve, the question lies near at hand whether we have not in this incident a mere doublet of the preceding, the number seventy (var. lect. seventy-two) representing in current symbolism the nations of the known world (cf. Gn 10)—being gradually substituted in the oral tradition of Gentile Churches for the number twelve, which seemed to point specially to Israel. We note also that Lk omits the restrictions of Mt 10^{5}. But, on the other hand, Lk connects with the return of the Seventy a little group of sayings (Lk $10^{18\text{-}20}$) which have every appearance of being genuine, and so increase the credibility of the narrative which leads up to them. And there is reason to think that one at least of the special sources to which Lk had access came from just such a quarter as that indicated by the Seventy—not the innermost, but the second circle of disciples. He may therefore have had historical foundation for his statement. Nor need it perhaps mean more than that Jesus did not draw any hard-and-fast line at the Twelve, but made use of other disciples near His person for the same purpose.

ii. Differentiation of the Ministry of Jesus from that of John the Baptist.—We have just seen that John, Jesus Himself, and the apostles all opened their ministry with the same announcement. They also made use of the same rite—baptism. But there the resemblance ceased. These were only the links which bound the stage of preparation to the stage of fulfilment. Looking back upon the work of John, Jesus pronounced that the least of His own disciples was greater than he (Mt 11^{11}‖). It was the difference between one who was within the range of the Kingdom and one who was without it. The work of John was perfectly good and appropriate as far as it went. Its character was indicated by the 'preaching of repentance,' with which it stopped short. In full keeping with this was John's ascetic habit and mode of life. The abandonment of this by Jesus was the first outward sign of divergence which struck the eye of the world (Mk 2^{18-22}‖, Mt $11^{18f.}$‖). But the inward divergence was far greater. John inherited the old idea as to the nature of the Kingdon and of the Messiah. While impressed with the necessity of a moral reformation as leading up to it, there is nothing to show that in other respects John's conception of King and Kingdom differed from that of his countrymen. But Jesus came to revolutionize not only the conception but the mode of carrying it out. Hence it was that towards the end of his day, with the despondency of one whose own work seemed wrecked, and who was himself confined in a dungeon, and with the disappointment natural to one who saw or heard of but few of the signs which he had expected as in process of fulfilment, John sent to inquire if Jesus were the Messiah indeed, or, in other words, if the great hope and the great faith to which he had himself given expression had proved delusive. As yet Jesus had but in part, and that very covertly, declared Himself; it was impossible all at once to open the eyes of John to the full mysteries of the Kingdom; and therefore Jesus contented Himself with appealing from the current idea to one of the fundamental passages of ancient prophecy the higher authority of which John would recognize (Mt 11^{5}‖). At the same time He hinted that patience and insight were necessary for a true faith; anything less than this might easily stumble (Mt 11^{6}‖).

iii. Preaching of the Kingdom.—In the meantime the crowds of Galilee, and especially the Twelve, enjoyed the privilege which John did not. They were having expounded to them in full the new doctrine of the Kingdom of God (or of heaven). This doctrine is of such far-reaching importance, and is so intimately bound up with the rest of our Lord's teaching, that it has seemed best to reserve the fuller account of it for separate and connected treatment at the end of this section. In so doing we are following the example of the First Evangelist, who has massed together a body of teaching at an early place in his Gospel (Mt 5–7), not that it was all spoken on the same occasion, but as a specimen of the general tenor of the teaching of which it formed part. We have a similar example of grouped specimens of teaching in Mt 13. It must suffice to add here (a) that the main subject of the teaching at this period would seem to have been the nature of the Kingdom and the character required in its members: such sayings as Mt $7^{22f.}$ are more in keeping with the latter cycle of teaching, and were probably spoken later. (b) It must be remembered that the vast majority of those who listened to this teaching heard it only by fragments. It was like the seed-corn scattered in various kinds of ground (Mk 4^{1-20}‖): it was not to be expected that even under the most favourable circumstances it should germinate and bear fruit all at once. Clearly, the Twelve themselves did not take in its full significance. But it is much that they should have remembered so much of it as they did, and that when their eyes were more fully opened they should have been able to set it down so coherently.

iv. The Messianic Works.—Another marked characteristic of this period is the number of miraculous works of healing, etc., which are attributed to it and evidently belong to it. Once more we may follow the example of the First Evangelist by treating these works, which are so much the subject of discussion in modern times, by themselves. We assume here the result which we seem to reach in the section devoted to them. We assume that the miracles are historical; and we observe only that they bear the general character indicated in the reply of Jesus to John the Baptist. They are predominantly works of mercy; and they are a direct, and as we believe conscious, fulfilment of the most authentic of ancient prophecies, as contrasted with the mere signs and wonders for which the contemporary Jews were looking. Here, as in other things, we note at once (a) that Jesus condescends to put Himself at the level of those to whom He was sent. Miracles were to them the natural credentials of any great prophet, and especially of the Messiah. Jesus therefore did not refuse to work miracles. That He should work them was part of the conditions of the humanity which He assumed. But (b) though He condescended to work miracles, it was only miracles of a certain kind. He steadily refused to perform the mere wonders which the critics of His claims repeatedly challenged Him to perform. In other words, He made His miracles almost as much a vehicle of instruction as His teaching. Those which He did perform fell into their place as the natural accompaniment of one who as in character so novel and unexpected a King was founding so novel a Kingdom.

v. Effect on the Populace.—It is a confirmation of the view taken above and based on the Fourth Gospel,—that the call of the Twelve was preceded by a preliminary and more sporadic ministry—that from the first day on which the regular ministry began it attracted great attention and was attended by great, if superficial, success among the populace of Galilee (Mk 1^{32-34}‖). Nor did the success of this first day stand alone; it was frequently repeated, and indeed gives the character to the whole of this period (Mk $2^{2.\ 12}$‖ 3^{7-10}‖ ^{32}‖4^{1}‖ 5^{21}‖, Lk $7^{16f.}$). Both the miracles and the teaching of Jesus made a strong impression. The people were struck by the difference between the acts and words of Jesus and those of the teachers to whom they were accustomed. Acts and words alike implied a claim to an authority different in kind from that of the most respected of the Rabbis (Mk 1^{27}‖, Mt $7^{28f.}$). The Rabbis interpreted the law as they found it; Jesus laid down a new law (Mt $5^{21.\ 22}$ etc.), and when He spoke, it was with an air of command. It must not, however, be supposed that Jesus was at once recognized as the Messiah. The testimony of the Baptist had reached but few, and was by this time generally forgotten. The construction put upon the commanding attitude of Jesus was that described in Lk 7^{16} 'A great prophet is arisen among us; and God hath visited his people.' Still less can it be supposed that there was any adequate recognition of the change which Jesus came to work in the current conceptions of religion.

vi. Effect upon the Pharisees.—The populace came to Jesus with simple and credulous minds, and they did not resist the impression made upon them, though it lacked depth and permanence (Mk $4^{5f.}$‖). Our documents are doubtless right in representing the first signs of opposition and hostility as coming from the religious leaders, the scribes and Pharisees. They are also clearly right in representing the growth of this opposition as gradual. At first Pharisees joined freely in social intercourse with Jesus and His disciples, and even invited them to their own tables (Lk $7^{36ff.}$ probably belongs to this early period). They could not deny the possibility of a prophet arising, and they repeatedly sought to test after their manner whether Jesus were really a prophet sent from God or no (Jn $1^{19ff.}$, Mt $12^{38ff.}$‖ 16^{1ff} $19^{3ff.}$‖, Jn $7^{47ff.}$). But their suspicions were soon aroused. It was evident that the teaching and manner of the life of Jesus conflicted greatly with their own. There was a freedom and largeness of view about it which was foreign to their whole habits of thought. (a) In such matters as fasting, the practice of Jesus and His disciples was different (Mk $2^{18ff.}$, Mt $6^{16ff.}$ etc.). Worse than this, Jesus appealed expressly to those classes which they scrupulously avoided (Mk 2^{15-17}‖ etc.). (b) Not only did Jesus direct His ministry especially to those whom they regarded as outcast and irreclaimable, but He made some direct attacks upon themselves. At first these attacks may have been slightly disguised (as in Mt $6^{1ff.}$, where the Pharisees are not mentioned by name), but they constantly increased in directness and severity. (c) One of the first topics on which they came into collision was in regard to the keeping of the Sabbath. Mark has collected a little group of incidents bearing upon this (Mk 2^{23}–3^{6}), the first of which, from the mention of the ripe corn, appears, as we have seen, to belong to the second year of the ministry, but belongs to an early phase in the conflict. To the same effect is the incident related in Jn $5^{1ff.}$, and Luke contributes another (Lk 13^{11-17}). (d) The Pharisees were also honestly shocked at seeing Jesus adopt a tone and assume prerogatives which seemed to them to encroach upon the honour of God (Mk 2^{5-11}‖).

It is interesting, and throws a favourable light on the documents, to note how carefully the distinction is marked between (a) the local scribes and Pharisees, such as were to be found scattered throughout Galilee (Mk 2^{6}.‖ $^{16.}$‖ $^{18.\ 24}$ 3^{6}‖, Lk 7^{36}); (b) the scribes who came down from Jerusalem (Mk 3^{22}), apparently emissaries from the hierarchy, like the deputation of Jn 1^{19}; and (c) the Herodians (Mk 3^{6}), the dynastic party of the Herods, who with quite different motives acted in alliance with the Pharisees. The Herodians are mentioned again in Mk 12^{13}‖. The name is otherwise almost unknown to history, though the party is known to have existed. Josephus has οἱ τὰ Ἡρώδου φρονοῦντες, but not Ἡρωδιανοί. This is a pure reflexion of the facts of the time—facts which soon passed away, and which fiction would never have recovered. See, further, art. HERODIANS.

vii. The Self-Revelation of Jesus. — Although Jesus assumed these high prerogatives, and although, as we have seen, He both spoke and acted with an authority which permitted no question, He showed a singular reticence in putting forward Messianic or Divine claims. It is remarkable that from the first those possessed with demons publicly confessed Him for what He was; but it is no less remarkable that He checked these confessions: 'He suffered not the demons to speak, because they knew him' (Mk 1^{34}‖ 3^{12} [Mt 12^{16}]). He imposed a like injunction of silence on one healed of leprosy (Mk 1^{44}‖). The farthest point to which Jesus went in the way of self-revelation at this early period was by taking to Himself the special title 'Son of Man.' There was probably some precedent for the identification of this title with Messiah, but it was at least not in common use, and therefore served well to cover a claim which was made but in no way obtruded. A fuller discussion of the title will be found below (p. 622 f.).

This marked reticence of Jesus in regard to His own Person is clearly part of a deliberate plan. One of its motives was to prevent the rash and reckless violence which one who appealed to the Messianic expectation was sure to excite (Jn 6^{15}). But it was in full keeping with the whole of His demeanour and with the special character which He gave to His mission. The first evangelist rightly sees in this a fulfilment (which we believe here as elsewhere to have been conscious and deliberate) of the prophecy Is 42^{1-3} 'My servant . . . shall not strive, nor cry aloud; neither shall any one hear his voice in the streets,' etc.

It is impossible for us to think of the Jesus portrayed in the Gospels as forcing His claims upon the attention of the world. He rather let them sink gently into the minds of His disciples until they won an assent which was not only free and spontaneous, but also more intelligent than it could have been if enforced simply by authority. But, apart from this, it was essential to the development of His mission that the teaching of the Kingdom should precede, and precede by a sufficient interval, the public self-manifestation and offer of the King. The first thing to be done was to change the character and revolutionize the moral conceptions of men. This was to be the work of quiet teaching. The hour for the Leader to come forward was the hour when teaching was to give place to action. Hence it was well that at first and for some time to come the King should remain, as it were, in the background, until the preparation for His assuming His kingship was complete.

The Teaching of Jesus.

a. General Characteristics of the Teaching.

(1) Its Relation to the Teaching of the Baptist and to that of the Scribes.—We have seen that Jesus began by taking up not only the announcement of the Baptist that the Kingdom of God was at hand, but also his call to reformation of life and the rite of baptism by which that call was impressed upon the conscience. We are also expressly told that the call to repentance was part of the apostolic commission (Mk 6^{12}). And we find it no less insisted upon after the resurrection (Lk 24^{47}, Ac 2^{38} 3^{19} 5^{31} 11^{18} 17^{30} 20^{21} 26^{20}).

This is clear proof of the continuity which bound together the teaching of Jesus with that of the Baptist. The starting-point of both was the same. And yet this starting-point was very soon left behind. The heads of the Baptist's teaching are soon told; the teaching of Jesus expands and ramifies in a thousand directions. It is like passing from the narrow cleft of the Jordan to a Pisgah-view over the whole Land of Promise.

Although it was permitted to the Baptist to prepare the way for the teaching of Jesus, so far as even to enunciate its opening lesson, the place of the Baptist is quietly assigned to him; and it is a place outside the threshold of the Kingdom: 'He that is but little in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he' (Mt 11^{11}‖).

If Christ thus drew a line between His own teaching and that of John, still more marked was the difference between it and other contemporary teaching. John was at least a prophet, and spoke with the full authority of a prophet (Mt $11^{9.\ 13}$). The scribes had no original authority at all; they did but interpret a law which they had not made. Jesus spoke with an authority not only above that of the scribes (Mk 1^{22}‖), but higher still than that of John. He is the legislator of a new law (Mt 5^{22} etc.), the founder of that Kingdom which John did not enter.

(2) Its Universal Range.—With this commanding character of the teaching of Jesus there goes a corresponding width of outlook. We began with a rapid survey of the state of parties and opinions in Palestine at the time of Christ. But the object of this survey was not to explain the teaching of Jesus by affiliating it to any existing school. It was remarked of Him that He had had no regular training (Jn 7^{15}). He was not a Pharisee, not a Sadducee, not an Essene, not an Apocalyptist. The direct affinities of the teaching of Jesus were with nothing so transitory and local, but rather with that which was most central in OT. We might call it the distilled essence of OT: that essence first clarified and then greatly enlarged, the drop became a crystal sphere.

We are speaking, of course, of the substance, and of the main part of the substance, of the teaching of Jesus. The mere fact that it was conditioned by time and space involved that it should be addressed to a given generation in a language which it understood. Nor was it wholly without definite and particular applications—sidelights, so to speak, upon that space in history within which it falls. But history itself has shown that in the main it transcends all these conditions, and is as fresh at the end of eighteen centuries as when first it was delivered.

(3) Its Method.—This wonderful adaptability in the teaching of Jesus is accounted for in part by its extreme simplicity. If it had been a doctrine of the schools, something of the fashion of the schools would have adhered to it. But, as it was, it was addressed chiefly to the common people—sometimes to congregations in synagogues, sometimes to the chance company collected in private houses, more often still to casual gatherings in the open air.

And the language in which the teaching was couched was such as to appeal most directly to audiences like these. As a rule it takes hold of the simplest elements in our common humanity, 'das allgemein Menschliche.' The trivial incidents of everyday life are made to yield their lessons: the sower scattering his seed, the housewife baking her cakes or sweeping the house to find a lost piece of money, the shepherd collecting his sheep, the fishermen drawing in their net. Sometimes the story which forms the vehicle for the teaching takes a higher flight: it deals with landed proprietors, and banquets, and kings with their subjects. But even then there seems to be a certain deliberate simplification. The kings, for instance, are those of the popular tale rather than as the courtier would paint them.

(4) The Parables.—We have been naturally drawn into describing that which is most characteristic in the outward form of the teaching of Jesus—His parables. The Greek word παραβολή is used in NT in a wider sense than that in which we are in the habit of using it. In Lk 4^{23} it = 'proverb.' In Mt 15^{15} (comp. with vv. $^{11.\ 16\text{-}20}$) it = 'maxim,' a condensed moral truth, whether couched in figurative language or not. It covers as well brief aphoristic sayings (e.g. Mk 3^{23} 13^{28}||, Lk 5^{36} 6^{39}) as longer discourses in which there is a real 'comparison.' But these latter are the 'parables' in our modern acceptation of the term: they are scenes or short stories taken from nature or from common life, which present in a picturesque and vivid way some leading thought or principle which is capable of being transferred to the higher spiritual life of man. The 'parable' in a somewhat similar sense to this had been employed in OT and by the Rabbis, but it had never before been employed with so high a purpose, on so large a scale, or with such varied application and unfailing perfection of form.

We may say that the parables of Jesus are of two kinds. In some the element of 'comparison' is more prominent. In these the parable moves as it were in two planes—one that of the scene or story which is made the vehicle for the lesson, and the other that of the higher truth which it is sought to convey; the essence of the parable lies in the parallelism. In the other kind there is no parallelism, but the scene or the story is just a typical example of the broader principle which it is intended to illustrate. The parables in Mt 13, Mk 4 all belong to the one class, several of those in the later chaps. of St. Luke (the Good Samaritan, the Rich Fool, the Rich Man and Lazarus, the Pharisee and the Publican) belong rather to the other.

There is a group of sayings in the Fourth Gospel to which is given the name παροιμία rather than παραβολή (Jn 10^{6}, cf. $16^{25.\ 29}$), though the latter term would not have been inappropriate, in which Jesus uses the method of comparison to bring out leading features in His own character and person. In this way He speaks of Himself as the Good Shepherd, the Door of the sheep, the Vine, the Light of the World. These sayings form a class by themselves, and from the peculiar way in which they are worked out—the metaphor and the object explained by the metaphor being not kept apart but blended and fused together—are commonly classed under the head of 'allegory' rather than 'parable.' This is another instance in which we draw distinctions where the Greek of the NT would not have drawn them.

(5) Interpretation of the Parables.—To this day there is some difference of opinion as to the interpretation of the parables. The Patristic writers as a rule (though with some exceptions) allow themselves great latitude of interpretation. Any point of resemblance to any detail of the parable, however subordinate, justifies in their eyes a direct application of that detail. A familiar instance is the identification of the 'two pence,' which the Good Samaritan gives to the host, with the two Sacraments. An opposite modern school would restrict the application to the leading idea which the parable expresses. It is, however, fair to remember that the parables are meant to illustrate the laws of God's dealings with men; and as the same law is capable of many particular applications, all such applications may be said with equal right to be included in the parable. For instance, the parable of the Two Sons may be as true for individuals or for classes as it is for nations or groups of nations. The parable of the Great Banquet to which the invited guests do not come, and which is then thrown open to others who were not invited, no doubt points directly to the first reception of the gospel, but it is equally appropriate to every case where religious privilege is found to give no advantage, and the absence of religious privilege proves no insuperable hindrance. Any such range of application is legitimate and interesting; nor does the aptness of the lesson to one set of incidents make it any less apt to others where a like principle is at work. Every parable has its central idea, and whatever can be related to that idea may be fairly brought within its scope. To press mere coincidences with the picturesque accessories of a parable may be permissible as rhetoric, but can have no higher value.

(6) The Purpose of Teaching by Parables.—If we had before us only the fact of parabolic teaching, with the parables as they have come down to us and the actual psychological effect which they are seen to exercise, we should probably not hesitate as to the reason which we assigned for them. The parabolic form is, as it were, a barb to the arrow which carries home truth to the mind. The extreme beauty of this mode of teaching, handled as it is, has been universally acknowledged. If simplicity is an element in beauty, we have it here to perfection. But when simplicity is united to profundity, and to a profundity which comes from the touching of elemental chords of human feeling,—a touching so delicate, so sure, and so self-restrained, which reminds us of the finest Greek art with an added spiritual intensity which in that art was the one thing wanting,—we have indeed a product such as the world has never seen and will not see again. We seem to be placed for the moment at the very centre of things: on the one hand there is laid bare before us the human heart as it really is or ought to be, with all its perversities and affectations stripped away; and on the other hand we seem to be admitted to the secret council-chamber of the Most High, and to have revealed to us the plan by which He governs the world, the threads in all the tangled skein of being. No wonder that the parables have exercised such an attractive power, not over any one class or race of men, but over humanity wherever it is found.

Then the nature of the parable, at once presenting a picture to the mind and provoking to the search for a hidden meaning or application beneath it, would seem to be exactly suited to the pædagogic method of Jesus, which always calls for some responsive effort on the part of man, and which prefers to produce its effects not all at once, but rather with a certain suspense and delay, so that the good seed may have time to germinate and strike its roots more deeply into the soil.

This natural action of the method of teaching by parables seems so obvious that we might well be content not to seek any further. But when we turn to the Gospels, we find there stated a motive for the adoption of this method of teaching which is wholly different, and it must be confessed at first sight somewhat paradoxical. All three Synoptists agree in applying to teaching by parables the half-denunciatory passage Is 6^{9-10}; they would make its immediate object not so much to reveal truth as to conceal it—at least to conceal it for the moment from one class while it is revealed to another, and its ulterior object to aggravate the guilt of those from whom it is concealed. And, what is still more remarkable, all three Synoptists ascribe the use of this quotation to our Lord Himself, as though it really expressed, not merely the result of His chosen method of teaching, but its deliberate purpose. What are we to make of this? One group of critics would roundly deny that the words were ever used in this manner by our Lord. Jülicher (e.g.) takes his stand on Mk 4^{33} 'with many such parables spake he the word unto them, as they were able to hear it,' which would seem to make the method a tender concession to slowness of apprehension rather than a means of aggravating it. But, on the other hand, we observe that the quotation is attributed to our Lord in what must have been the common original of all three Gospels, i.e. in one of our best and oldest sources. And while such passages as Jn 12^{39-41} (where the same quotation is applied by the evangelist) and Ac 28^{25-27} (where it is applied by St. Paul) would show that it was part of the common property of the apostolic age, the fact that it was so would be still more intelligible if the example had been set by our Lord Himself. Nor would it be less but rather more appropriate as coming from Him, if we regard it as summing up in a broad way what He felt was and must be for many of those among whom He moved the final outcome of His mission. The lesson is very similar to that of Jn 12^{46-48}. The Son of Man does not need to pass judgment on those who reject Him. His word judges them by an automatic process. That which is meant for their life becomes to them an occasion of falling, when from indolence or self-will it makes no impression upon them. This was the actual course of things; it was a course rendered inevitable by the laws which God had laid down, and which in that sense might be regarded as designed by Him. And inasmuch as the Son associates Himself with the providential action of the Father, it might be also spoken of as part of His own design. It is so, however, rather in the remoter degree in which, allowing for the contrariant action of human wills, whatever is is also ordained, than as directly purposed before the appeal has been made and rejected. It belongs to that department of providential action which is not primary and due to immediate Divine initiative, but secondary or contingent upon human failure.

There is then perhaps sufficient reason to think that the words may after all have been spoken, much as we have them, by our Lord. But granting this, we should still not be forbidden to surmise that they are somewhat out of place. Standing where they do they come to us with a shock of strange severity, which would be mitigated if they could be put later in the ministry, where they occur in St. John. The transference may have been due to the position which the original passage occupies in Isaiah, where it also serves as a sort of programme of the prophet's mission. There, too, the arrangement may conceivably represent the actual historical order, but it may also represent the result of later experience, which for didactic effect is placed at the beginning of the career rather than at the end.

b. Contents of the Teaching.—There are five distinctive and characteristic topics in the teaching of Jesus—

(1) The Fatherhood of God.
(2) The Kingdom of God.
(3) The Subjects or Members of the Kingdom.
(4) The Messiah.
(5) The Paraclete and the Tri-unity of God.

With that simplicity which we have seen to be so marked a feature in His teaching, Jesus selects two of the most familiar of all relations to be the types round which He groups His teaching in regard to God and man—the family and the organized state; God stands to man in the relation at once of Father and of King. These two types by no means exclude each other, but each helps to complete the idea derived from the other without which it might be one-sided. At the same time, in different connexions, first one and then the other becomes more prominent. Thus, when stress is laid upon the Divine attributes, God appears chiefly in the character of Father; when attention is turned to the complex relations of men to Him and to one another, they are more commonly regarded under the figure of a Kingdom.

(1) The Fatherhood of God.—It has just been said that the doctrine that God is Father by no means excludes the doctrine that He is also King. This idea, too, is repeatedly put forward (Mt 5^{35} 18^{23} 22^{2} etc.). The title 'King' brings out what in modern language we are accustomed to call the 'transcendence' of God. But the recognition of this was, as we saw (p. 606[a] sup.), a strong point in the contemporary Judaism, and therefore it needed no special emphasis. It was otherwise with the idea of Fatherhood.

Not that this idea was unknown to the pagan religions, and still less to the religion of Israel. From Homer onwards Zeus had borne the name 'Father of gods and men.' But this was a superficial idea: it meant little more than 'originator.' This sense also appears in the older Jewish literature, but with further connotations added to it. God is more particularly the Father of His people Israel (cf. Dt 14^{1} 32^{6}, Jer 3^{19} $31^{9.\ 20}$), in a yet deeper sense of the righteous in Israel (Is 63^{16}), and, though not with the same wealth of meaning, of the individual (Mal 2^{10}, Sir $23^{1.\ 4}$).

It is the tenderest side of the teaching of OT (Ps 103^{13}) which is now taken up and developed. It becomes indeed the corner-stone of the NT teaching about God. The name 'Father' becomes in NT what the name Jehovah (Jahveh) was in OT, the fullest embodiment of revelation. If it is prominent in the apostolic writings, this is traceable ultimately to the teaching of Jesus (cf. Ro 8^{15} and comms.). The title belongs primarily to Jesus Himself as 'the Son' (ὁ Πατήρ μου, esp. Mt 11[27]). Through Him it descends to His followers (ὁ Πατὴρ ὑμῶν, ὁ Πατήρ σου, Mt 5[16. 45. 48] 6[1. 4. 6. 8. 9. 14. 15] etc.). But the love of God as Father extends beyond these limits even to 'the unthankful and evil' (Lk 6[35], Mt 5[45]). The presentation of God as Father culminates in the parable of the Prodigal Son. Older conceptions of God find their counterpart in the Elder Brother of this parable (Lk 15[25ff.] contrasted with v.[20]). The application which is thus made of the Fatherhood of God invests the teaching of Jesus with wonderful tenderness and beauty (Mt 6[32] 7[11] 10[29. 30], Lk 12[32] etc.).

(2) The Kingdom of God.—If the conception of God as Father does not exclude His majesty as King, no more does the conception of His Kingdom exclude that of children gathered together in His family. Still, the leading term to denote those active relations of God with man, with which the mission of Jesus is specially connected, is ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ or τῶν οὐρανῶν.

The use of these terms suggests a number of questions which are still much debated. (i.) Were both names originally used? Or if one is to be preferred, which? (ii.) What is the meaning of the phrase? Does βασιλεία = 'kingdom' or 'reign'? (iii.) When we have determined this, with what order of ideas is the phrase to be associated? With the later Judaism? or with the teaching of the prophets? Or does it belong to the more novel element in the teaching of our Lord? (iv.) Is the Kingdom merely conceived of from the side of man or from the side of God? Is it something which man works out or which is bestowed upon him? (v.) Is it present or future? Was it in course of realization during the lifetime of Jesus Himself, or is it mainly eschatological? (vi.) Is it inward or outward? A moral reformation or the founding of a society? (vii.) Was the conception as at first framed national or universal?

These questions are put as alternatives. And they are usually so regarded. But it may be well to say at once that in almost every case there seems to be real evidence for both sides of the proposition; so that the inference is that the conception to which they relate was in fact many-sided, and included within itself a number of different nuances, all more or less valid. And the reason for this appears to be, that our Lord took up a conception which He found already existing, and, although He definitely discarded certain aspects of it, left others as they were, some with and some without a more express sanction, while He added new ones. The centre or focus of the idea is thus gradually shifted; and while parts of it belong to so much of the older current conception as was not explicitly repealed, other parts of it are a direct expression of the new spirit introduced into it. The one element definitely expelled was that which associated the inauguration of the Kingdom with political violence and revolution.

(i.) The Name.—It is well known that the phrase ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν for ἡ βασ. τ. θεοῦ is a peculiarity of the First Gospel (where it occurs thirty-two times), and that it receives no sanction from the other Synoptics. Neither can Jn 3[5], where the reading is distinctly Western, be quoted in support of it. Hence some have thought that it was a coinage of Mt. It occurs, however, also in Ev. sec. Heb. (Handmann, p. 89); and the fact that βασ. τ. θ. is found in Mt 12[28] 21[31. 43] would go to show that the evangelist had no real objection to that form, while the corresponding phrase πάτηρ ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς though it disappears from Lk 11[2] is verified by Mk 11[25]. Moreover, we know that 'heaven' was a common metonymy for 'God' in the language of the time (cf. also Mk 10[21], Lk 10[20] 12[33]), and that the particular phrase 'kingdom of heaven' (though not exactly in the sense usually assigned to it; see below under ii.) occurs repeatedly in the Talmud. It seems, therefore, on the whole probable that both forms were used by our Lord Himself. In any case they may be regarded as equivalents.

(ii.) Meaning.—The phrase in both its forms is ambiguous: it may mean either 'kingdom' or 'reign,' 'sovereignty,' 'rule' of heaven, or of God. It appears that in the Talmud the latter signification is the more common (Schürer, NT Zeitgesch.[3] ii. 539 n. [Eng. tr. II. ii. 171]; Edersheim, Life and Times, etc. i. 267 f.). And though the former is that more usually adopted by commentators, there seems to be no reason why recourse should not be had to the latter where it is more natural (as, e.g., in Lk 17[20. 21]). The phrase covers both senses, and the one will frequently be found to shade off into the other. The best definition known to the writer is one given incidentally by Dr. Hort (Life and Letters, ii. 273), 'the world of invisible laws by which God is ruling and blessing His creatures.' This is the most fundamental meaning; all others are secondary. The 'laws' in question are 'a world,' inasmuch as they have a connexion and coherence of their own; they form a system, a cosmos within the cosmos; they come direct from 'heaven,' or from God; and they are 'invisible' in their origin, though they may work their way to visibility.

(iii.) Associations.—The sense just assigned was that which was most fundamental in the thought of Jesus. It was that which He saw ought to be the true sense, however much it might be missed by His contemporaries. It was deeper and subtler than the conception of Psalmist and Prophet, even than the bright and exhilarating picture of Ps 145[11-13], because it was compatible with any kind of social condition, and because it did not turn mainly on the majestic exercise of power. And if this was true of the later and more developed conception, much more was it true of the earlier notion of the theocracy, which was simply that of the Israelite State with a Prophet or Judge at the head instead of a King (1 S 12[7-12]). The contemporaries of Jesus when they spoke of the 'Kingdom of God' thought chiefly of an empire contrasted with the great world-empires, more particularly the Roman, which galled them at the moment. And the two features which caught their imagination most were the throwing off of the hated yoke and the transference of supremacy from the heathen to Israel. This was to be brought about by a catastrophe which was to close the existing order of things, and which therefore took a shape that was eschatological.

This eschatological and catastrophic side Jesus did not repudiate, though He gave a different turn to it, but the essence of His conception was independent of all convulsions. The simplest paraphrase for 'the Kingdom of God' is the clause which follows the petition for the coming of the Kingdom in the Lord's Prayer: 'Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven.' The only difference is that the Prayer perhaps hints rather more at the co-operation of human wills. This is not excluded in the idea of the Kingdom, which is, however, primarily the working out of the Will of God by God Himself.

(iv.) The Nature of the Kingdom: how far Supernatural?—The very name of the Kingdom 'of heaven or of God' implies that it has its origin in the world above. It 'comes' (ἔρχεσθαι, Mt 6[10], Mk 9[1], Lk 11[2] 17[20]; ἐγγίζειν, Mt 3[2] 4[17] 10[7] etc.; φθάνειν, Mt 12[28] = Lk 11[20]); it is 'given' (Mt 21[43]) and 'received' (Mk 10[15] = Lk 18[17]); it is 'prepared' by God (Mt 25[34]); it is 'inherited' (ib.), and men 'enter into' it (Mt 5[20] 19[23], Jn 3[5]); it is an object of 'search' (Mt 6^{33}=Lk 12^{31}, Mt 13^{45}). All this means that it is not built up by the labour of man, it is not a product of development from below, but 'of the creative activity of God' (Lütgert, Reich Gottes, p. 26). It is a gift bestowed, not something to be done, but something to be enjoyed ('Nie eine Aufgabe, wohl aber eine Gabe,' Holtzmann, NT Th. p. 202, partly after Lütgert). It is a prize, the highest of all prizes (Mt 13^{44-46}), corresponding to the summum bonum of pagan philosophy.

This part of the conception has a considerable range, according as the context points to the popular view of the Messianic Kingdom as implying outward conditions of splendour, abundance, and enjoyment, or as it points to what we have called the inner thought of Jesus, the invisible laws of God's working, taken into and welcomed by the individual soul, as in the parables of the Pearl and the Treasure in the Field.

These parables show that there is a place, though a subordinate place, left for human effort, the co-operation of the human will with the Divine. The process of 'seeking' implies both effort and renunciation. There must be a concentrating of the powers of the soul upon the Will of God, if that Will is to be really done; but where it is done it brings its own exceeding great reward (Lk 6^{38}).

From this point of view it may be said, with Holtzmann (NT Th. i. 202–207), that the negative side of the conception is the Forgiveness of Sins as the first condition of entrance into the Kingdom, and that the positive side of it is the active practice of Righteousness with the peace and contentment which that practice brings.

(v.) Present or Future?—There can be no real question that the Kingdom is presented in both lights as present and as future. Strictly speaking, the future is divided, and the notes of time are threefold—present, near future, and more distant future. Take, for instance, the following passages: Mt 12^{28} (= Lk 11^{20}) 'If I by the Spirit of God cast out demons, then is the Kingdom of God come (ἔφθασεν) upon you'; Mk 1^{15} (= Mt 4^{17}) 'The time is fulfilled, and the Kingdom of God is at hand' (ἤγγικεν); Mk 9^{1}‖ 'There be some here . . . which shall in no wise taste of death till they see the Kingdom of God come (ἐληλυθυῖαν) with power.' The only one of these passages about which there can be any doubt is the second (see above, p. 610), and even that belongs to the common groundwork of the Synoptic tradition, and it is supported by Mt 10^{7}‖. If the latest of these dates still falls within the lifetime of the then generation, there is a group of parables (the Mustard Seed, the Wheat and Tares, the Drag-net) which would seem at once to bring the Kingdom into the present, and to postpone its consummation.

These apparent inconsistencies are probably to be explained in the same way as others which we meet with. The future coming, the more or less distant coming, of which the Son himself does not know the day or the hour, is the eschatological coming of the current expectation, which, if we follow our authorities, we must believe that Jesus also shared. There was, however, a certain ambiguity even in this expectation as popularly held: it was not clear exactly in what relation of time the coming of the Messiah and the establishment of His Kingdom stood to the end of all things. And this ambiguity was necessarily heightened by the peculiar nature of the coming of Christ, and the conviction which gradually forced itself upon the minds of the disciples that there must needs be a double Coming,—one in shame, the other in triumph; one therefore which for them was past, and another still in the future.

But, apart from all this, it will be apparent that the more distinctive conception of the Kingdom as the 'world of invisible laws' by which God works is not subject to the same limitations of time. In this sense it embraces the whole providential scheme of things from the beginning; though, as we have said, it is really a cosmos within the cosmos, and it has its culminating periods and moments, such as was above all that which dates from the Incarnation. The most characteristic expression of this aspect of the Kingdom would be the parables of the Leaven and of the Seed growing secretly.

(vi.) Inward or Outward?—A like conclusion holds good for the question which we have next to ask ourselves: Are we to think of the Kingdom of God as visible or as invisible? Is it an influence, a force or collection of forces, or is it an institution? We are familiar with the very common and often quite superficial identification of the Kingdom with the Church. Is this justified? Many recent writers answer this question emphatically, No (list with reff. in Holtzmann, NT Th. i. 208). And it is true that there are certain passages by which it seems to be excluded.

Conspicuous among these are the verses Lk $17^{20.\ 21}$ Οὐκ ἔρχεται ἡ β. τ. θ. μετὰ παρατηρήσεως. οὐδὲ ἐροῦσιν, Ἰδοὺ ὧδε, ἢ ἐκεῖ. ἰδοὺ γὰρ ἡ β. τ. θ. ἐντὸς ὑμῶν ἐστίν. A majority of leading German scholars, including Schürer (Die Predigt. J. C. p. 18) and Holtzmann (with a slight modification, 'in your reach'), take the last words as meaning 'in your midst,' the main ground being that they are addressed to the Pharisees. But Field seems to have shown (Ot. Norv. ad. loc.) that this interpretation is lexically untenable ('no sound example'), and that the better rendering is in animis vestris.

But, on the other hand, parables like the Wheat and the Tares and the Drag-net are most naturally explained of a visible community; and there can be no doubt that the popular expectation was of a visible kingdom, such as that in which the sons of Zebedee sought for a chief place.

If we keep to the clue which we have hitherto followed, the facts will be sufficiently clear. The Kingdom in its highest and most Christian sense is the working of 'invisible laws' which penetrate below the surface and are gradually progressive and expansive in their operation. But in this as in other cases spiritual forces take to themselves an outward form; they are enshrined in a vessel of clay, finer or coarser as the case may be, not only in men as individuals but in men as a community or communities. The society then becomes at once a vehicle and instrument of the forces by which it is animated, not a perfect vehicle or a perfect instrument,—a field of wheat mingled with tares, a net containing bad fish as well as good,—but analogous to those other visible institutions by which God accomplishes His gracious purposes amongst men.

(vii.) National or Universal?—The same principle holds good throughout the whole of this analysis of the idea of the Kingdom. The aptest figure to express it is that of growth. It is a germ, secretly and silently insinuated, and secretly and silently working until it puts forth first the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear. It is a mistake to cut a section of that which is thus ceaselessly expanding, and to label it with a name which might be true at one particular moment but would not be true at the next. The Kingdom of God is not the theocracy of the OT, nor the eschatological Kingdom of the Apocalypses, nor the Christian Church of the present day, or of the Middle Ages, or of the Fathers. These are phases through which it passes; but it outgrows one after the other. For this reason, because He foresaw this inevitable and continuous growth, the chief Founder and permanent Vicegerent of the Kingdom showed Himself, as we might think, indifferent to the precise degree of extension which it was to receive during His life on earth; He was content to say that He 'was not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel' (Mt 15^{24}), though within a generation His gospel was about to be carried to the ends of the then known earth. It was enough that the seed was planted—planted in a soil suited to it, and under conditions that ensured its full vitality, 'like a tree by the streams of water, that bringeth forth its fruit in its season, whose leaf also doth not wither.' It is characteristic of God's processes that there is no hurry or impatience about them; the Master was not so anxious to reap immediate fruit as the disciple (Ro 1^{13}), and therefore He calmly left it to His followers to see 'greater things' than He saw Himself (Jn 14^{12}); but these 'greater things' are none the less virtually His own.

(3) The Members of the Kingdom.—As the 'Reign of God,' the βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ denotes certain Divine forces or laws which are at work in the world; as the Kingdom of God it was at most stages a society, but at all stages a definite sphere or area, into which men might enter, and, by entering, become partakers of the same Divine forces or subject to the same Divine laws. It was therefore a matter of much moment what were the conditions of entrance into the Kingdom, and what was the character impressed upon its members. The two things run into each other, because it was required of those who entered that they should possess at least the germs of the character to be developed in them.

(i.) Conditions of Entrance.—These are clearly laid down: 'Except ye turn, and become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 18^{3}). There was to be a definite change of mind, a break with the sinful past. This was to be ratified by submission to the rite of baptism, which, in the discourse with Nicodemus, is described as a new birth of 'water and Spirit' (Jn 3^{5}). The entrance into the Kingdom is something more than a deliberate act of the man himself, it is a self-surrender to Divine influences. The response on the part of God is forgiveness, which is the permanent concomitant of baptism, not only that of John, but also that in the name of Christ (Mk 1^{4}‖, comp. with Ac 2^{38}, Lk 24^{47} etc.).

(ii.) The Character of the Members.—The typical character of the members of the Kingdom is that of a 'little child,' in which the prominent features are innocence, simplicity of aim, absence of self-assertion, trustfulness, and openness to influences from above. A sketch of such a character is given in the Beatitudes (Mt 5^{3-9}; the ‖ in Lk 6^{20-26} refers rather to conditions or circumstances suited to the character). The Christian ideal here depicted stands out in marked contrast to most other ideals of what is admirable in man. The qualities commended ('poor in spirit'—'where the Matthæan gloss is in any case right in sense,—'meek,' 'merciful,' 'pure in heart,' 'peacemakers') are all of the gentle, submissive, retiring order. And this is fully borne out by other sayings, the cheek turned to the smiter, the litigant forestalled, the requisition of labour offered freely, and even doubled (Mt 5^{38-41} ‖), enemies to be loved, persecutors to be prayed for (ib. xv.$^{43.\ 44}$), the sword to be sheathed (Mt 26^{52}), the duties of charity strongly inculcated (Lk 10^{25-37}), the duty of forgiveness of injuries (Mt $18^{23ff.}$), service greater than authority (Lk $22^{25ff.}$). And it is noticeable that the same type of character is praised by St. Paul (Ro 12^{21} 'Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good'; cf. ch. 13). The whole duty of man is summed up in love to God and love to one's neighbour (again cf. Ro 13^{8-10}). We observe, too, that the ethical teaching of Jesus is almost confined to that side of ethics which touches upon religion. Allusions to civic and industrial duties are very few, and those negative rather than positive (Mt 18^{27} 22^{21} = Ro 13^{7}).

(iii.) Paradoxes of Christianity.—It is only natural that these features in the teaching of Christ should be taken hold of and made a charge against Christianity, as they have been from Suetonius onwards (Domit. 15, 'contemptissimæ inertiæ,' of Flavius Clemens, probably as a Christian; cf. Tertull. Apol. 42, 'infructuosi in negotiis dicimur'). And it may be doubted whether even yet the full intention of our Lord has been fathomed, and the exact place of the specifically Christian ideal in relation to civic and social duties ascertained. The following suggestions may be offered.

The precepts in question were probably addressed in the first instance, not to promiscuous multitudes, but to the disciples. If certain passages (as Mt 5^{1}) may be quoted to the contrary, it should be remembered that these introductory notes as to the circumstances under which discourses were spoken are among the least trustworthy parts of the Gospel tradition, and are often nothing more than vague conjectures of the evangelists. The type of character described bears on its face the marks of being intended for the little community of Christians (cf. Latham, Pastor Pastorum, p. 253).

As such we can see that it had a very special appropriateness. It was not an accident that Christianity is the religion of the Crucified. The Cross is but the culminating expression of a spirit which was characteristic of it throughout. Its peculiar note is Victory through Suffering. An idea like that of Islam, making its way by the sword, was abhorrent to it from the first. Jesus came to be the Messiah of the Jews, but the narratives of the Temptation teach us that, from the very beginning of His career, He stripped off from His conception of Messiahship all that was political, all thought of propagating His claims by force. A new mode of propagating religion was deliberately chosen, and carried through with uncompromising thoroughness. The disciple was not above his Master; and the example which Jesus set in founding His faith by dying for it, was an example which His disciples were called upon to follow into all its logical consequences. Christianity, the true Christianity, carries no arms; it wins its way by lowly service, by patience, by self-sacrifice.

History shows that there are no instruments of religious propaganda comparable to these. It also shows that the type of character connected with them is of the very highest attractiveness and beauty. Is it a complete type, a type to which we can apply the Kantian maxim, 'So act as if your action was to be a law for all human beings'? This would seem to be more than we ought to say. It is not clear that the Christian type would be what it is if it were not built upon, and if it did not presuppose, a certain structure of society, to which other motives had contributed. The ethical ideal of Christianity is the ideal of a Church. It does not follow that it is also the ideal of the State. If we are to say the truth, we must admit that parts of it would become impracticable if they were transferred from the individual standing alone to governments or individuals representing society. It could not be intended that the officers of the law should turn the cheek to the criminal. The apostles were to bear no sword, but the judge 'beareth not the sword in vain.'

May we not say that the functions of Christian morals—specifically Christian morals—are these? (1) At their first institution to form a vehicle, the only possible vehicle, for the Christian religion. So far as Christianity has taken a real and genuine hold upon society, it is through these means and no others. Other things may have commended it for a time, but no trust can be placed in them. (2) The Christian motive acting in the midst of other motives gradually leavens and modifies them, imparting to them something which they had not before. If we look round us at the principles which at this moment regulate the action of States, in their external or international relations as well as those which are internal, we shall see that if these principles are not wholly Christian, they are also not pagan. They have a certain coherence, and they mark a very conspicuous advance as compared with the principles of the ancient world. Christianity has shown a power of modifying what it does not altogether supplant. The world even outside Christianity is still God's world. It is a world of which the essential characteristic is that it is progressive; and it may conduce most to this progress that it should be brought under the influence of the Christian precept, not pure but in dilution. And (3) may we not draw from this the augury that in the end, at some time which we cannot see, the social structure may be still more fully recast, under the influence of Christianity: 'Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more'? We can conceive a condition of things in which the Church became coextensive with the State, and in which religion penetrated the body politic in a sense in which it has never done so yet. When that time came, conduct which now would be only quixotic might be rational, and required by the public conscience.

When the verse Mt 5^{42} 'Give to him that asketh thee,' etc., is criticized from the point of view of modern political economy, the mistake is in applying a standard which is out of place. In those days the natural and, indeed, the only outlet of the kind for benefiting the poor was almsgiving; and our Lord's main object was to strengthen the motive, which was in itself a thoroughly right one. It would have been in vain to anticipate methods which God has evidently intended to be the result of long experience. The argument from analogy comes in here with great force. God might have removed many forms of human ill with a word; but as it is, He has been pleased to let improved methods, and the wisdom to use them, grow gradually and grow together. The advance which mankind slowly makes is a solid advance, and an advance not here and there, but all along the line.

We have seen that our Lord was not careful to guard against misunderstandings. It has been a salutary exercise for His followers to find out what was the true sense of his sayings for themselves.

(4) The Messiah.—We are not concerned here with the very remarkable historical evolution of the claim of our Lord to be the Messiah, which will come before us in connexion with the narrative of His life. At present we have to do only with His teaching on the subject, and that mainly with reference to the deeply significant names by which His claim was conveyed.

(i.) The Christ.—We need not delay over the title 'Messiah,' 'Christ,' 'Anointed,' which is simply that of the current Jewish expectation. It is repeatedly applied to our Lord by others, and on three occasions, at least, expressly accepted by Himself (Jn 4^{26}, Mt 16^{17}, Mk $14^{61.\ 62}$ ||, cf. Jn 11^{27}); but only once does our Lord use the term of Himself (Jn 17^{3} Ἰησοῦν Χριστόν), and that in a passage where we cannot be sure that the wording is not that of the evangelist. In like manner the title 'Elect' (ἐκλελεγμένος, Lk 9^{35}; ἐκλεκτός, Lk 23^{35}), which is also current (cf. Enoch 40^{5}), is applied to our Lord, but not by Himself.

(ii.) Son of David.—Much the same may be said of another title which belongs to a prominent side of the expectation. 'Son of David' occurs several times (on the lips of the crowd at and before the triumphal entry, of the Syrophœnician woman, of Bartimæus, of the Pharisees), but Jesus Himself does not use it, and rather propounds a difficulty in regard to it (Mk 12^{35} ||).

(iii.) Son of Man.—The really characteristic title which occurs some 80 times in the Gospels, and is without doubt the one which Jesus chose to express His own view of His office, is 'the Son of Man.' Whereas the other titles are used by others of Him, this is used only by Him and of Himself. What He desired to convey by this is a question at once of no little difficulty and of great importance ('Die Frage gehört zu den verwickeltsten ja verfahrensten der ganzen neutest. Theologie,' Holtzmann).

The starting-point for this, as well as for the idea of the kingdom, is, we may be sure, Dn 7^{13}. The 'Son of Man' in that passage, as originally written, stood for Israel. The four world-empires are represented by beasts, the dominion that falls to Israel is that of a man. But in this as in other respects the passage was interpreted Messianically. In the Similitudes of the Bk. of Enoch (chs. 37–70) the Son of Man takes a prominent place. He is a person, and a superhuman person. It is He who holds the great judgment to which the Apocalyptic writings look forward. The attributes ascribed to Him are all more or less directly connected with this judgment, which is at once to vindicate the righteous, and finally to put down the wicked. The date of this portion of the Bk. of Enoch has been much debated, but opinion at the present time is still more preponderantly in favour of the view that it is pre-Christian (between B.C. 94–64, Charles, Enoch, p. 29 f.). The language of the Gospels requires that the title as applied to a person and to the Messiah should be not entirely new. It also requires that it should be not perfectly understood and familiar (Mt 16^{13}, Jn 12^{34}). It is probable that its use did not go beyond a small circle, the particular circle to which the Similitudes of Enoch belonged. This, however, would be enough to give the phrase a certain currency, and to make it at least suggest association with the Messiah.

It is associated with Him, especially in His character as Judge, and as the chief actor in that series of events which marks the end of the age, and the reversal of the places of good and wicked. This sense Jesus did not discard. It appears unmistakably in a number of passages (Mt 13^{41} 16^{28} 19^{28} $24^{30ff.}$ $25^{31ff.}$ 26^{64} etc.). But at the same time there can be no doubt that He read into it a number of other ideas, new and original, just as He read them into the conception of the Kingdom.

What is most distinctive in this novel element in the teaching of Jesus? There is an increasing tendency amongst scholars to lay stress on the Aramaic original of the phrase. The Aramaic equivalent is said to mean and to be the only way which they had of expressing 'Man' (generically, i.e. 'Mankind'). Hence the attempt has been made to interpret the phrase impersonally, and to get rid more or less of its Messianic application (see Holtzmann, NT Th. i. 256 ff.). It is true that an impersonal sense will suit such a passage as Mk 2^{28} 'The Sabbath was made for man . . . therefore the Son of Man is Lord even of the Sabbath.' At the same time this is by no means the necessary sense. And Wellhausen, who is one of those who most emphatically maintain the equation 'Son of Man' = 'Man,' yet sees that the expression must have been used by our Lord to designate His own person (Israel. u. Jüd.

Gesch^2. p. 381). Nor can this conclusion really be avoided by such an expedient as Holtzmann's, who calls attention to the comparative rarity of the title in the early chapters and early stages of the history (e.g. in Mk only $2^{10.28}$), and would explain it during this period impersonally, and only after St. Peter's confession personally. Against this and against more sweeping attempts (e.g. by Martineau, Seat of Authority, p. 339) to get rid of the Messianic signification altogether, it may be enough to point out that if reasonable critics like Holtzmann allow, and a narrative such as that of the Temptation seems to prove, that Jesus from the first really assumed the character of the Messiah, and if our oldest authorities with one consent treat the title Son of Man as in the later stages Messianic, it is fair to presume that it is Messianic also in the earlier. If the Similitudes of the Bk. of Enoch are pre-Christian, this conclusion would amount almost to certainty.

It is, however, fair to argue from the natural sense of the phrase in Aramaic, that by His use of it, Jesus did place Himself in some relation to humanity as a whole. And we are led to form the same inference by the conspicuous use of the corresponding Heb. in Ps 8^4 'What is man that thou art mindful of him? and the son of man that thou visitest him?' Here the parallelism shows that 'son of man'='man.' We also know from He 2^{6-10} that the psalm was at a very early date applied to Jesus as the Messiah, and at a still earlier date (the Baptism) we have the neighbouring Ps 2^7 applied to Him. It seems to follow, or at least to be a very natural presumption, that these two psalms early became an object of close study to Jesus, and helped to give outward shape to His conceptions.

Ps 8 seems specially adapted to fall in with these, as it brings out with equal strength the two elements which we know to have entered into the consciousness of Jesus—the combination of lowliness with loftiness, the physical weakness of man as contrasted with his sublime calling and destiny. We can see here the appropriateness of the application of one and the same title to Him who, on the one hand, 'had not where to lay his head,' and who must needs 'go as it was written of him,' and who yet, on the other hand, looked to come again 'with power' in His Kingdom.

We do not like to use such very modern phraseology as the 'ideal of humanity,' 'the representative of the human race'; and yet it would seem that Jesus did deliberately connect with His own person such ideas as these: He fused them as it were into the central idea of Messiahship, and we can see how the Jewish conception of the Messiah was enlarged and enriched by them. If the Messiah comes out in the claim to forgive sins, it is the Son of Man whose mission it was 'to seek and to save that which was lost' (Lk 19^{10}), 'not to be ministered unto but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many' (Mk 10^{45}‖).

Here we have another connexion in which the name is frequently used. The prophecies of the Resurrection and of the Second Coming are closely associated with the fatal end of the First: 'The Son of Man must suffer many things, and be rejected by the elders, and the chief priests, and the scribes, and be killed, and after three days rise again' (Mk 8^{31} etc.). If we ask for the OT original of this 'Saviour through suffering,' no doubt it is the Second Part of Isaiah, and especially Is 53. Still, it would be rather too much to describe this idea as embodied in the title 'Son of Man.' It is embodied in the character of the Son of Man as conceived by Jesus, but not exactly in the name. The name which expressed it was the 'Servant of Jehovah' (παῖς κυρίου); and this name was undoubtedly applied to Christ by the Church as soon as it began to reflect upon His life and mission (cf. Ac $3^{13.26}$ $4^{27.30}$, Mt 12^{18}), but we have no evidence that Jesus used it of Himself. One reason for the choice of the name 'Son of Man' probably was that it admitted and favoured these associations, even if it did not directly suggest them.

This comprehensive and deeply significant title touched at the one end the Messianic and eschatological expectation through the turn which had been given to it in one section of Judaism (the Book of Enoch). At the other and opposite end it touched the idea of the Suffering Servant. But at the centre it is broadly based upon an infinite sense of brotherhood with toiling and struggling humanity, which He who most thoroughly accepted its conditions was fittest also to save. As Son of God, Jesus looked upwards to the Father; as Son of Man, He looked outwards upon His brethren, the sheep who had no shepherd.

(iv.) Son of God.—Only once in Synopt. (Mt 27^{43}) and in a few places in the Fourth Gospel (Jn 10^{36}, cf. 5^{25} 9^{35} var. lec. 11^4) is it hinted that Jesus directly assumed this title. It is repeatedly given to Him by others—by the Baptist (Jn 1^{34}), by Nathanael (Jn 1^{49}), by Satan hypothetically (Mt 4^3), as also by the crowd (Mt 27^{40}), by the possessed (Mk 3^{11}‖), by the disciples (Mt 14^{33}), by the centurion (Mk 15^{39}=Mt 27^{54}), and by evangelists (Mk 1^1 v.l. Jn 3^{18} 20^{31}).

At the same time it is abundantly clear that the title was really assumed from the indirect mode in which Jesus constantly speaks of God as 'My Father.' This is very frequent in Synoptics as well as in St. John (Mt 7^{21} 10^{32} 11^{27} 15^{13} 16^{17} etc.). And although, as we have seen, the consciousness which finds expression in this phrase becomes the basis of an extended doctrine of the Divine Fatherhood ('the Father,' 'our Father,' 'thy Father,' 'your Father'), there is nevertheless a distinct interval between the sense in which God can be claimed as Father by men, even the innermost circle of the disciples, and that in which He is Father to the Son. In this respect the passage Mt 11^{27}=Lk 10^{22} is quite explicit (cf. also the graduated scale of being in Mk 13^{32}=Mt 24^{36}). Although this passage stands out somewhat conspicuously in Synoptics, the context in which it occurs is so original and so beyond the reach of invention, while it supplies so marvellously the key to that which distinguishes the history of Jesus from other histories, that doubt cannot reasonably be cast upon it. It is confirmed by the sense in which the title 'Son of God' is taken by the Jews—not merely by the populace but by the learned (Mt 27^{41-43}, cf. Mk $15^{31.32}$, Jn 19^7). And, on the other hand, it confirms sufficiently the substantial accuracy of like passages in the Fourth Gospel (e.g. $10^{30.38}$). We are thus prepared for the unanimity with which the Church at the earliest date fixed upon this title to convey its sense of the uniqueness of Christ's nature (Ac 9^{20}, Ro 1^4, Gal 2^{20}, Eph 4^{13}, He 4^{14} etc., 1 Jn 4^{15} etc., Rev 2^{18}).

This aspect of the question will come before us more fully later. We content ourselves for the present with observing that the teaching of Jesus, reserved and reticent as it is, presupposes as its background this wholly exceptional relation of 'the Son' to 'the Father.' From that as centre radiate a number of other relationships to His immediate disciples, to the Church of which they formed the nucleus, and to mankind. The Sonship of Jesus is intimately connected with His work as Messiah (Titius, p. 116). It is in this character that 'all things are delivered' to Him (Mt 11^{27}‖), in this character that He is enabled to give to the world a revelation of the Father (ib.), in this character that He carries out His work of redemption even to the death (Mk 14^{35} ||).

(5) The Paraclete and the Tri-unity of God.—In the earliest Epp. of St. Paul we find that the Son of God is placed side by side with the Father, and is associated with Him as the ground of the Church's being, the source of spiritual grace, and as co-operating with Him in the providential ordering of events (1 Th 1^{1}, 2 Th 1^{1}, 1 Th $3^{11f.}$). It is difficult to describe the effect of the language used in any other terms than as attributing to the Son a coequal Godhead with the Father. And it is remarkable that St. Paul does this, within some twenty-two years of the Ascension, not as though he were laying down anything new, but as something which might be assumed as part of the common body of Christian doctrine.

We observe also that throughout the earliest group of Epp. there are frequent references to the work of the Holy Spirit as the one great force which lies behind at once the missionary activity and the common life of the Church of the apostolic age (esp. 1 Co 12–14, but cf. 1 Th $1^{5f.}$ 4^{8} 5^{19} etc.). This, too, it is assumed that all Christians would understand.

How are we to account for the prevalence of such teaching at so early a date, and in a region so far removed from the centre of Christianity? It would be natural if the Lord Jesus Christ Himself in His intercourse with His disciples had prepared them to expect a great activity of the Holy Spirit, and if He had hinted at relations in the Godhead which made it threefold rather than a simple monad. Apart from such hints, the common belief of the Church respecting Christ Himself and the Holy Spirit seems very difficult to understand. Certain previous tendencies in Jewish thought might lead up some way towards it, but they would leave a wide gap unspanned.

When, therefore, we find that one Gospel ascribes to our Lord rather full and detailed teaching respecting the Paraclete, which is explained to be another name for the Holy Spirit (Jn $14^{16.\ 26}$ 15^{23}), when there is held out a clear hope and promise of a new Divine influence to take the place of that which is being withdrawn, and when in another Gospel we are also told of the institution * of a rite associated with a new revelation of God under a threefold Name, that of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit (Mt 28^{19}), these phenomena are just what we are prepared for, and just such as we should have had to assume even if we had had no definite record of them. We may, then, regard them as having received—whatever the antecedent claims of the documents in which they are found—a very considerable degree of critical verification. The single verse 2 Cor 13^{14} seems to require something very like what we find in Mt and Jn.

LITERATURE.—Much material of value will be found in the works on the Biblical Theology of NT by Weiss, Beyschlag, and esp. H. J. Holtzmann (1897). Reference may also be made to Bovon, Théol. du NT, Lausanne, 1897. The most considerable recent work on the Teaching of Jesus as a whole is Wendt's Lehre Jesu, Göttingen, 1890 (Eng. tr., T. & T. Clark, Edin. 1892). Bruce, The Kingdom of God (1890 and later) embraces the Synopt. Gospels only. In the last few years a number of monographs have appeared on the doctrine of the Kingdom and points connected with it—all, it may be said, bringing out some real aspect in the doctrine, though in the writer's opinion too often at the expense of other aspects. The series began with two prize essays, Die Lehre vom Reiche Gottes, by Issel and Schmoller (both Leiden, 1891), and includes treatises with similar titles by Schnedermann (Leipzig, 1893, 1895, 1896), J. Weiss (Göttingen, 1892), Lütgert (Gütersloh, 1895), Titius (Freiburg i. B. u. Leipzig, 1895), Krop (Paris, 1897); also Bousset, Jesu Predigt in ihrem Gegensatz zum Judentum (Göttingen, 1892); Paul, Die Vorstellungen vom Messias u. vom Gottesreich (Bonn, 1895); Lietzmann, Der Menschensohn (Leipzig, 1896); J. * Not, of course, the first institution, but its confirmation as a rite and its first association with the triple formula.

THE MIRACLES OF JESUS.—There has been a certain tendency of late to recede from the extreme position in the denial of Miracles. Harnack, for instance, writes in reference to the Gospel history as follows: 'Much that was formerly rejected has been re-established on a close investigation, and in the light of comprehensive experience. Who in these days, for example, could make such short work of the miraculous cures in the Gospels as was the custom of scholars formerly?' (Christianity and History, p. 63, Eng. tr.).

(i.) Different Classes of Miracles.—Partly this change of attitude is due to the higher estimate which would now be put on the value of the evangelical sources generally, as to which something will be said below. Partly it would be due to a change of view in regard to the supernatural, which is no longer placed in direct antagonism to the natural, but which is more reasonably explained as resulting from the operation of a higher cause in nature. And partly also it would be due to the recognition of wider possibilities in nature, 'more things in heaven and earth' than were dreamt of in the narrow philosophy of the Aufklärung.

(a) In particular, it may be said that medical science would have no difficulty in admitting a large class of miracles of healing. All those which have to do with what would now be called 'nervous disorders,' all those in which there was a direct action of the mind upon the body, would fall into place readily enough. Given a personality like that of Jesus, the effect which it would have upon disorders of this character would be strictly analogous to that which modern medicine would seek to produce. The peculiar combination of commanding authority with extreme gentleness and sympathy would be a healing force of which the value could not easily be exaggerated.

A question would indeed still be left as to the treatment of the cases of what was called 'demoniacal possession.' There can be no doubt that Jesus Himself shared, broadly speaking, the views of His contemporaries in regard to these cases: His methods of healing went upon the assumption that they were fundamentally what every one, including the patients themselves, supposed them to be. We can well believe that this was a necessary assumption in order to allow the healing influences to operate. We must remember that all the ideas of the patient would be adjusted to the current belief, and it would be only through them that the words and acts of Christ could take effect. In the accounts of such miracles we see that there was a mutual intelligence between Healer and patient from the first (Mk $1^{24f.}$ || ^{34} || 5^{6} ||). It was by means of this mutual intelligence that the word of command struck home.

We should be prepared, then, to say that this class of miracles implied accommodation to the ideas of the time. But when we speak of 'accommodation' on the part of our Lord, we do not mean a merely politic assumption of a particular belief for a particular purpose. We mean that the assumption was part of the outfit of His incarnate Manhood. There was a certain circle of ideas which Jesus accepted in becoming Man in the same way in which He accepted a particular language with its grammar and vocabulary.

It would have been wholly out of keeping with the general character of His Ministry if Jesus had attacked this form of disease in any other way than through the belief in regard to it which at that time was universal. The scientific description of it has doubtless greatly changed. But it is still a question which is probably by no means so clear, whether, allowing for its temporary and local character, the language then used did not contain an important element of truth. The physical and moral spheres are perhaps more intimately connected than we suppose. And the unbridled wickedness rife in those days may have had physical effects, which were not unfitly described as the work of 'demons.' The subject is one which it is probable has not yet been fully explored.

(β) There is, as we have seen, one large class of diseases in regard to which the healing force exerted by the presence and the word of Jesus has a certain amount of analogy in the facts recognized by modern medicine. We must not, however, treat that analogy as going farther than it does. It does not hold good equally for all the forms of disease which are described as having been healed. Wherever the body is subject to the action of the mind, there we can give an account of the miracle which is to some extent—to a large extent—rational and intelligible. But in cases in which the miracle involves a purely physical process it will not be possible to explain it in the same way.

This other class of miracles will fall rather under the same head as those which were wrought, not upon man, but upon nature. In regard to these miracles, the world is probably not much nearer to a reasoned account than it was. It must always be remembered that the narratives which have come down to us are the work of those who expected that Divine action would (as we should say) run counter to natural laws and not be in harmony with them, and that the more Divine it was the more directly it would run counter to them. We may be sure that if the miracles of the first century had been wrought before trained spectators of the nineteenth, the version of them would be quite different. But to suppose this is to suppose what is impossible, because all God's dealings with men are adapted to the age to which they belong, and cannot be transferred to another age. If God intended to manifest Himself specially to the nineteenth century, we should expect Him to do so by other means. We are, then, compelled to take the accounts as they have come down to us. And we are aware beforehand that any attempt to translate them into our own habits of thought must be one of extreme difficulty, if not doomed to failure.

(ii.) Critical Expedients for eliminating Miracle.—In view of the difficulty of giving a rational (i.e. a nineteenth century) version of miracle, it is not surprising that recourse should be had to critical expedients for explaining away Miracle altogether; in other words, to account for the narratives of miracles without assuming that objective facts corresponding to them really occurred. The expedients most in favour are: (α) imitation of similar stories in OT; (β) exaggeration of natural occurrences; (γ) translation of what was originally parable into external fact. These are causes which have about them nothing violent or incredible, and we may believe that they were to some extent really at work. The question to what extent, will depend mainly upon the nature of the evidence for miracles and the length of time interposed between the evidence and the events. This will be the next subject to come before us. We may, however, anticipate so far as to say that whatever degree of verisimilitude belongs to the causes suggested in themselves, they do not appear to be adequate, either separately or in combination, to account for the whole or any large part of the narratives as we have them. And there is the further consideration, on which more will also be said presently, that something of the nature of miracle, something which was understood as miracle, and that on no insignificant scale, must be assumed to account for the estimate certainly formed by the whole first generation of Christians of the Person of Christ.

(iii.) The Evidence for the Gospel Miracles in general.—Coming to the question as to the evidence for the Miracles recorded in the Gospels, there are three main observations to be made: (α) that the evidence for all these miracles, generally speaking, is strong; (β) that the evidence for all the different classes of miracles is equally strong; (γ) that although for the best attested miracles in each class the evidence is equal, there is a difference between particular miracles in each class; some are better attested than others.

(α) It is unnecessary to repeat what has been already said (p. 604 sup.) about the general character of the Gospel History. The critical student must constantly have in mind the question to what state of things the different phases of that history as it has come down to us correspond. Does it reflect conditions as they existed after A.D. 70 or before? And if before, how far does it reflect the later half of that period, and how far the earlier? How far does it coincide with a section of Christian thought and Christian life (e.g.) taken at the height of the activity of St. Paul; and how far does it certainly point to an earlier stage than this? In other words, how much of the description contained in the Gospels belongs to the period of consequences, and how much to the period of causes?

Every attempt to treat of the life of our Lord should contribute its quota to the answer to these questions. And it is becoming more and more possible to do this, not merely in a spirit of superficial apologetics, but with a deep sense of responsibility to the truth of history. And the writer of this article strongly believes that the tendency of the researches of recent years has been to enhance and not to diminish the estimate of the historical value of the Gospels.

(β) This applies to the Gospel records as a whole, in which miracles are included. It is natural next to ask, What is the nature of the particular evidence for Miracles? How is it distributed? Does the distribution correspond to the distinction which we have drawn between the easier and the more difficult Miracles? If it did, we might suppose that the former class had better claims to credence than the latter.

But an examination of the documents shows that this is not the case. Without committing ourselves to all the niceties of the Synoptic problem, there are at any rate broad grounds for distinguishing between the matter that is found in all the three Synoptics, in the First and Third, and in one only of the Three. Whether the ultimate groundwork is written or oral, the threefold matter represents that groundwork, and is therefore, if not necessarily the oldest, at least the most broadly based and authoritative. There is reason to think that the double matter is also very ancient. It consists largely of discourse, but some few narratives seem to belong to it. The peculiar sections of the different Gospels vary considerably in their character, and it is natural to suppose that they would have the least antecedent presumption in their favour. Some confirmatory evidence would be needed for facts which rested upon their testimony alone.

Now, if it had happened that the Nature-Miracles had been confined to sections of this last kind, while the Miracles of Healing—and especially the Healing of Nervous Diseases—had entered largely into the Double and Triple Synopsis; or—inasmuch as discourse more often bears the stamp of unmistakable originality than narrative—if the miracles of one class had appeared only in the form of narrative, while the allusions in discourse were wholly to miracles of the other, then the inference would have lain near at hand that there was a graduated scale in the evidence corresponding to a like graduated scale in the antecedent probability of the miracle.

But this is not the case. Miracles of all the different kinds occur in all the documents or sources. The Triple Synopsis contains not only the healing of demoniacs and paralytics, but the healing of the issue of blood (Mk 5^{25}‖), the raising of Jairus' daughter (ib. ^{38}‖), the stilling of the storm (ib. 4^{37}‖), the feeding of the five thousand (ib. 6^{35}‖). This last miracle is found not only in all three Synoptists, but also in Jn $6^{5ff.}$. And there is this further point about it, that if we regard the miracles generally as a gradual accretion of myth and not based upon fact, we should undoubtedly assume that the feeding of the four thousand (Mk 8^{1}, Mt 15^{32}) was a mere duplicate of it. But it is probable that this story also belonged to the fundamental source, in spite of its omission by Luke. In that case both the feedings of a multitude would have had a place in the oldest of all our authorities, and the first growth in the tradition would have to be pushed back a step farther still. We should thus have a nature-miracle not only embodied in our oldest source, but at its first appearance in that source already pointing back some way behind it.

(γ) It thus appears that the evidence, externally considered, is equally good for all classes of miracles. It is not, as we might expect, that the evidence for the easier miracles is better than that for the more difficult, leaving us free to accept the one and reject the others. We cannot do this, because the best testimony we have embraces alike those miracles which imply a greater deviation from the ordinary course of nature and those in which the deviation is less.

It does not, however, follow that within the different classes of miracles the evidence for particular miracles is equal. When Prof. Goldwin Smith insists that all the miracles recorded in the Gospels stand or fall together, he is going in the teeth, not so much of anything peculiar to the study of the Gospels, but of the historical method generally. And the examples which he gives are unfortunate. 'We cannot pick and choose. The evidence upon which the miraculous darkness and the apparition of the dead rest is the same as that upon which all the other miracles rest, and must be accepted or rejected in all the cases alike' (Guesses at the Riddle of Existence, p. 160). No critical student needs to be told that the evidence for the apparitions of the dead (Mt $27^{52f.}$) belongs just to that stratum which carries with it the least weight. The authority for the darkness is much higher, but its miraculous character need not be magnified. Any unusual darkening of the sky would naturally strike the imagination of the disciples; and it might be not contrary to nature and yet also not accidental.

(iv.) The Quality of the Evidence.—So far we have spoken of the external character of the evidence. It is speaking within the mark to say that a large part of the evidence for the Gospel miracles, including some of those that are most miraculous, is separated from the facts by an interval of not more than thirty years. We may be pretty sure that before that date, and even much before it, stories of miracles like those recorded in the Gospels circulated freely among Christians, and were a common subject of teaching by catechists and others. We now proceed to ask, What is the quality of the narratives in which these stories occur? What features are there in the stories themselves which throw light upon their historical value?

(α) We are met at the outset by the Temptation. If there is anything certain in history, it is that the story of the Temptation has a real foundation in fact, for the simple reason that without such a foundation it would have occurred to no one to invent it. It suits exactly and wonderfully the character of Jesus as we can now see it, but not as it was seen at the time. Men were trying to apprehend that character; they had a glimpse here and a glimpse there; but they cannot have had more than dim and vague surmises as to what it was as a whole. But whoever first told the story of the Temptation saw it as a whole. We have therefore already drawn the inference that it was first told by none other than Jesus Himself. And by that inference we stand. There is nothing in the Gospels that is more authentic.

But the story of the Temptation presupposes the possession of supernatural powers. It all turns on the question how those powers are to be exercised. It not only implies the possession of power to work such miracles as were actually worked, but others even more remarkable from the point of view of crude interference with the order of nature. The story of the Temptation implies that Jesus could have worked such miracles if He had willed to do so; and the reason why He did not work them was only because He did not will.

The keynote which is struck by the Temptation is sustained all through the sequel of the history. We can see that the Life of Jesus was what it was by an act of deliberate renunciation. When He says, as the end draws near, 'Thinkest thou that I cannot beseech my Father, and he shall even now send me more than twelve legions of angels?' (Mt 26^{53}), the lesson holds good, not for that moment alone, but for all that has preceded it. The Public Ministry of Jesus wears the aspect it does, not because of limitations imposed from without, but of limitations imposed from within.

Here lies the paradox of the Miracles of Christ. He seems at once to do them, and so to guard against a possible misuse that it is as if He had not done them. The common idea of miracles was as a manifestation of Divine power. Jesus gave the manifestation, and yet He seemed so to check it from producing its natural effect that it is as though it did not serve its purpose. It really serves His purpose, but not the purpose which the world both then and since has ascribed to Him.

(β) We have seen that the principles laid down at the Temptation governed the whole public life of Jesus. He steadily refused to work miracles for any purely self-regarding end. If the fact that He works miracles at all is a sympathetic adaptation to the beliefs and expectations of the time, those beliefs are schooled and criticized while they are adopted (Mt 12^{39} ‖ $16^{1f.}$, Jn 4^{48}), the element of mere display, the element of self-assertion, even of self-preservation, is eliminated from them. They are studiously restricted to the purposes of the mission.

Now this carefully restricted character in the miracles of Jesus is unique in history. Among all the multitude of wonders with which the faith, sometimes superstitious, but more often simply naïve, of the later Church adorned the lives of the saints, there is nothing quite like it. We may say with confidence that if the miracles of Jesus had been no more than an invention, they would not have been what they are. We can see in the evangelists a certain dim half-conscious feeling of the self-imposed limitations in the use of the supernatural by Christ. But we may be very sure that they have this feeling, because the limitations were inherent in the facts, not because they formed part from the first of a picture which they were constructing à priori.

(γ) There are three kinds of restriction in the miracles of our Lord. The limitation in the subject-matter of the miracles is one; the limitation in the conditions under which they are wrought is another (Mt 13^{58} || $15^{24.26}$); and the limitation in the manner in which they are set before the world is a third. In a number of cases, after a miracle has been performed, the recipient is strictly cautioned to maintain silence about it (Mk 1^{34} || demoniacs, 1^{44} || leper, 3^{12} demoniacs, cf. Mt 12^{16}, Mk 7^{36} deaf and dumb, 8^{26} blind). This hangs together with the manifest intention of Jesus to correct not only the current idea of miracles, but the current idea of the Messiah as one endowed with supernatural power. If He was so endowed, it was not that He might gather about Him crowds and establish a carnal kingdom such as the Jews expected.

This, too, is a very original feature. It is certainly not one that the popular imagination would create, because the motive to create it was wanting. It is not to be supposed that the popular imagination would first correct itself and then embody the correction in a fictitious narrative. Here again we are driven to the conclusion that the narrative truly reflects the facts.

(δ) In yet another way do the accounts of the miracles work in with the total picture of the Life of Christ. They have a didactic value, which makes them round off the cycle of the teaching. This fact perhaps leaves some opening for the possibility that here and there what was originally parable may in course of transmission have hardened into miracle. An example of such a possibility would be the withering of the Fig-tree (Mk $11^{12-14\ 20-25}$ || compared with Lk 13^{6-9}). But, on the other hand, it is just as possible that parable and miracle may stand side by side as a double enforcement of the same lesson. The story of the Temptation is proof that Jesus would not hesitate to clothe His teaching in a form at once natural and impressive to that generation, though it is less so to ours. In this He only takes up a marked characteristic of the OT Prophets.

(v.) Historical Necessity of Miracles.—The truth is that the historian who tries to construct a reasoned picture of the Life of Christ finds that he cannot dispense with miracles. He is confronted with the fact that no sooner had the Life of Jesus ended in apparent failure and shame than the great body of Christians—not an individual here and there, but the mass of the Church—passed over at once to the fixed belief that He was God. By what conceivable process could the men of that day have arrived at such a conclusion, if there had been really nothing in His life to distinguish it from that of ordinary men? We have seen that He did not work the kind of miracles which they expected. The miracles in themselves in any case came short of their expectations. But this makes it all the more necessary that there must have been something about the Life, a broad and substantial element in it, which they could recognize as supernatural and divine—not that we can recognize, but which they could recognize with the ideas of the time. Eliminate miracles from the career of Jesus, and the belief of Christians, from the first moment that we have undoubted contemporary evidence of it (say A.D. 50), becomes an insoluble enigma.

(vi.) Natural Congruity of Miracles.—And now, if from the belief of the Early Church we turn to the belief of the Church in our day, there a different kind of congruity appears, but a congruity that is no less stringent. If we still believe that Christ was God, not merely on the testimony of the Early Church, but on the proof afforded by nineteen centuries of Christianity, there will be nothing to surprise us in the phenomena of miracles. 'If the Incarnation was a fact, and Jesus Christ was what He claimed to be, His miracles, so far from being improbable, will appear the most natural thing in the world. . . . They are so essentially a part of the character depicted in the Gospels, that without them that character would entirely disappear. They flow naturally from a Person who, despite His obvious humanity, impresses us throughout as being at home in two worlds. . . . We cannot separate the wonderful life, or the wonderful teaching, from the wonderful works. They involve and interpenetrate and presuppose each other, and form in their indissoluble combination one harmonious picture' (Illingworth, Divine Immanence, pp. 88–90).

If we seek to express the rationale or inner congruity of miracles in Biblical language, we shall find this abundantly done for us in the Gospel of St. John. Miracles arise from the intimate association of the Son with the Father in the ordering of the universe, especially in all that relates to the redemption of man. When challenged by the Jews for healing a sick man upon the Sabbath, Jesus replied, 'My Father worketh even until now (i.e. since, and in spite of the institution of the Sabbatical Rest), I am working also' (Jn 5^{17}); the same law holds for the actions of the Son as for the conservation of the universe. And He goes on, 'Verily, verily, I say unto you, the Son can do nothing of himself, but what he seeth the Father doing: for what things soever he doeth, these the Son also doeth in like manner. For the Father loveth the Son, and showeth him all things that himself doeth: and greater works than these will he show him, that ye may marvel' (ib. vv. 19. 20). Many other passages at once suggest themselves to the same effect (Jn 3^{35} 8^{28f} 14^{13}). The Son is 'sent' by the Father, and He is invested with full powers for the accomplishment of that mission; or rather with reference to it and for the purpose of it, He and the Father are one (Jn 10^{30}).

The sayings of this character are all from the Fourth Gospel. But there is a near approach to them in the well-known passage Mt 11^{27} || ('All things have been delivered unto me of my Father'); and this does but form a natural climax to others, which, without it, would seem to leave something wanting and incomplete.

(vii.) The Unexplained Element in Miracles.—When all the above considerations are borne in mind, some may still think that there is a residuum which is not wholly explained—not so much as to the fact of miracles, or as to their congruity with the Person of Jesus, but rather as to the method of particular miracles in the form in which they have come down to us. It is quite inevitable that there should be such a residuum, which is only another name for the irreducible interval which must, when all is done, separate the reflective science-trained intellect of the nineteenth century from the naïve chroniclers of the first. Jesus Himself would seem to have been not without a prescience that this would be the case. At any rate there is a permanent significance, unexhausted by the occasion which gave rise to it, in His reply to the disciples of the Baptist, while appealing to works which, however beneficent, would, He knew, fail to realize all the Baptist's expectations: 'Blessed is he that shall find no scandal—or stumbling-block—in me' (Mt 11^{6} ||). There was doubtless something left in the mind of John which he could not perfectly piece together with the rest of such mental outfit as he had. And so we may be sure that it will be in every age, though age after age has only helped to strengthen the conviction that the modes of thought of the Zeitgeist may and do continually change, but that the worth for man of the Person of Jesus does not change but is eternal.

LITERATURE.—Probably the best work in English at the present moment on the presuppositions of the Gospel Miracles would be Illingworth's Divine Immanence (1898), a sequel to his Bampton Lectures (1894). It may be worth while to compare Gore, Bamp. Lect. (1891). On the other hand, Mozley's lectures on the same foundation for 1865 have reference rather to a phase of the controversy which is now past. There is, of course, much on the subject in the various treatises on Apologetics; and articles are constantly appearing in magazines, as well as shorter monographs, both British and Foreign. The present writer cannot say—or at least cannot remember—that he has gained as much from these several sources as in the case of the teaching of Jesus. He would like, however, to mention with gratitude, Grounds of Theistic and Christian Belief, by Dr. G. P. Fisher of Yale (New York, 1883; also pub. in London), a very clear and temperate statement of the evidence for the Gospel Miracles on older lines; the chap. on Miracles in Dr. A. B. Bruce, Chief End of Revelation (3rd ed. 1890); and three short lectures, entitled The Supernatural in Christianity (by Drs. Rainy, Orr, and Marcus Dods, in reply to Pfleiderer, Edinb. 1894).

The most considerable attempt in English to construct Christianity without Miracles is Dr. Edwin A. Abbott's The Kernel and the Husk (1886), and The Spirit on the Waters (1897). With this may be compared Dr. Salmon's Non-miraculous Christianity (and other Sermons).

There are well-known systematic works on the Gospel Miracles by the late Abp. Trench and Dr. A. B. Bruce.

C. Middle or Culminating Period of the Active Ministry.

Scene.—Galilee, with an excursion across the northern border.

Time.—Passover to shortly before Tabernacles A.D. 28.

Mt 14^{1}–18^{35}, Mk 6^{14}–9^{50}, Lk 9^{7-50}, Jn 6.

This is a period of culminations, in which the prophecy of Simeon begins to be conspicuously fulfilled: 'Behold, this child is set for the falling and rising up of many in Israel, and for a sign which is spoken against' (Lk 2^{34}). The main culminations are (i.) of the zeal of the populace, followed by their disappointment and falling away; (ii.) the still greater embitterment of the scribes and Pharisees; (iii.) the awakening at last of a more intelligent faith in the disciples, reaching its highest point in St. Peter's confession; (iv.) the Divine testimony to Jesus in the Transfiguration; (v.) the consciousness of victory virtually won in Jesus Himself (Mt 11^{25-30}, Lk 10^{17-24}); (vi.) at the same time He sees clearly, and begins to announce the seeming but transient catastrophe, the final humiliation and exaltation, in which His work is to end.

The time of this period is clearly marked by the occurrence of the Passover of the year A.D. 28 at its beginning, and the Feast of Tabernacles (in October of the same year) at the end. It is probable that within these six months all the salient events referred to below may be included. The place is, broadly speaking, Galilee, beginning with the shores of the lake (Jn 6); but in the course of the period there falls a wider circuit than any that had been hitherto taken. In this circuit Jesus touched on, and probably crossed, the borders of the heathen districts of Tyre and Sidon (Mk 7^{24}‖); He then turned eastwards through the neighbourhood of Cæsarea Philippi (Mk 8^{27}‖); and He finally returned to Capernaum, not directly, but after taking a round to the east of the lake and through Decapolis (Mk 7^{31}). The motive was probably not so much on this occasion extended preaching as to avoid the ferment excited among the population of Central Galilee. Observe Mk 7^{24} and the strict injunctions of secrecy in Mk 7^{36} 8^{30}‖ 9^{9}‖. If we may follow our authorities (Mk $7^{32ff.}$ $8^{11ff.}$ $11^{ff.}$) there was a certain amount of active work at the end of the circuit; but Mt $11^{20ff.}$ appears to mark the practical close of the Galilæan ministry.

The greater part of this circuit lay within the dominions, not of Herod Antipas, where Jesus had hitherto mainly worked, but of his brother Philip. Now we know that the hostility to Him was shared by the Pharisees with the partisans of Herod (Mk 3^{6} and p. 616^{a} above; cf. also Mk 8^{15}). We have also, but probably at a still later date, threats, which if not actually made by Herod Antipas were at least plausibly attributed to him (Lk 13^{31}). In any case, it is likely enough that intrigues were on foot between the two allied parties of the Pharisees and Herodians; and some writers, of whom Keim may be taken as an example, have attributed to these what they describe as a 'flight' on the part of Jesus. They may have had something to do with His retirement.

This division of our Lord's Life includes several narratives (the Feedings of the Five and Four Thousand, the Walking on the Water, the Transfiguration) which sound especially strange to modern ears. We must repeat the warning, that if a nineteenth cent. observer had been present he would have given a different account of the occurrences from that which has come down to us. But the mission of Jesus was to the first cent. and not to the nineteenth. His miracles as well as His teaching were adapted to the mental habits of those to whom they were addressed. It is wasted ingenuity to try, by rationalizing the narratives, to translate them into a language more like our own. Essential features in them are sure to escape in the process. It should be enough to notice that the narratives in question all rest on the very best historical authority. They belong to the oldest stratum of the evangelical tradition. And more than this: if we suppose, as it is not unreasonable to suppose, that the Feedings of the Five and of the Four Thousand are different versions of the same event, this would throw us back some way behind even that oldest stratum; because we should have to allow an additional period of time for the two versions to arise out of their common original (see p. 626 sup.). This would carry us back to a time when numbers must have been living by whom the truth of that which is reported might be controlled. In the case of the Feeding of the Five Thousand, we have the confirmatory evidence of the Fourth Gospel, which for those who believe the author to have been an eye-witness must be little less than decisive.

i. The Enthusiasm and Falling-away of the Populace.—It was just before the Passover of the year 28 that the impression which Jesus had made on the people of Galilee seemed to reach its climax. This was the result of what is commonly known to us as the Feeding of the Five Thousand. The fact that the Passover was so near at hand accounts for a special gathering of pilgrims, or those preparing for the journey, from the Galilæan towns. In such a mixed multitude there would doubtless be many Zealots and enthusiastic expectants of the 'deliverance of Israel.' The miracle convinces these that they have at last found the leader of whom they are in search. They are aware that hitherto He had shown no signs of encouraging the active measures which they desired: and therefore they hasten to seize the person of Jesus in order to compel Him to put Himself at their head, with or against His will. He, however, retires from them; and their disappointment is complete when on the next day the more determined among them, after following Him at no little trouble into the synagogue at Capernaum, find themselves put off with what they would regard as a mystical and unintelligible discourse. This is a turning-point in what had been for some time a gathering movement on the part of many who were willing to see in Jesus a Messiah such as they expected, but who were baffled and drew back when they found the ideal presented to them so different from their own. And the crisis once past, every possible precaution was taken to ensure that it should not recur (Mk $7^{24.36}$ 8^{30}‖ 9^{9}‖, as above).

Are the two Feedings of Mk 6^{30-40}‖ and Mk 8^{1-9}‖ to be regarded as two events or one? Besides the general resemblance between the two narratives, a weighty argument in favour of the latter hypothesis is, that in the second narrative the disciples' question appears to imply that the emergency was something new. They could hardly have put this question as they did if a similar event had happened only a few weeks before. The different numbers are just what would be found in two independent traditions. The decision will, however, depend here (as in the instances noted above) on the degree of strictness with which we interpret the narrative generally.

The discourse in the synagogue at Capernaum, Jn 6^{26-51}, works up to one of those profound truths which fixed themselves especially in the memory of the author of the Fourth Gospel. It is not a direct reference to the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, but it is a preparatory statement of the deep principle of which that Sacrament is the expression. We shall have more to say on this head below (see p. 637).

ii. Widening Breach with the Pharisees.—More than one incident occurs in this period which points to the increasing tension of the relations between Jesus and the Pharisees (Mk 8^{11-15}). But the decisive passage is Mk 7^{1-13}‖, the severity of which anticipates the denunciations of the last Passover. In this Jesus cuts away root and branch of the Pharisaic traditions and exposes their essential immorality. From this time onwards the antagonism is open and declared.

iii. The Climax of Faith among the Twelve; St. Peter's Confession.—We have seen how the enthusiasm of the multitudes reached its climax after the Feeding of the Five Thousand, but did not recover from the rebuff which it then received, and from that time more or less collapsed, until it flamed up for a moment at the triumphal entry. The Twelve were in a better position to enter into the mind of their Master, and it was but natural that they should be more steadfastly attached to His person. Hence their faith survived the shocks which it was continually receiving, and St. Peter gave the highest expression which it had yet received, when, in reply to a direct question, he exclaimed, 'Thou art the Christ [the Son of the Living God]' (Mt 16^{13-20}‖). Jesus marked His sense of the significance of the confession by words of warm commendation. He attributes it, indeed, to a direct inspiration from Heaven. The value of the confession stands out all the more clearly when it is compared with the doubts of the Baptist (see above, p. 615). We are not to suppose that St. Peter had by any means as yet a full conception of all that was implied in his own words. He still did not understand what manner of Messiah he was confessing; but his merit was, that in spite of the rude shocks which his faith had been receiving, and in spite of all that was paradoxical and enigmatical in the teaching and actions of his Master, he saw through his perplexities the gleams of a nature which transcended his experience, and he was willing to take upon trust what he could not comprehend.

It would be out of place to attempt here to discuss the conflicting interpretations of the blessing pronounced upon St. Peter. We can only say that although it is not adequate to explain the blessing as pronounced upon the confession and not upon St. Peter himself, it is nevertheless distinctly pronounced upon St. Peter as confessing. It is in the fact that there is at last one who, in the face of all difficulties, recognizes from his heart that Jesus is what He is, that the first stone, as it were, of the Church is laid; other stones will be built upon and around it, and the edifice will rise day by day, but the beginning occurs but once, and the beginning of the Christian Church occurred then. It is not to detract from the merit of St. Peter—which so far as the building up of the Church is concerned was as high as human merit could be—if we interpret the blessing upon him in the light of 1 Co 3^{11}. The Church has but one foundation, in the strict sense, Jesus Christ. It was precisely to this that St. Peter's confession pointed. But that confession was the first of all like confessions; and in that respect might well be described as the first block of stone built into the edifice.

iv. The Culminating Point in the Missionary Labours of Jesus.—God seeth not as man seeth. To the average observer, even to one who was acquainted with St. Peter's confession, it would seem to be the solitary point of light in the midst of disappointment and failure. A retrospect of the Galilæan ministry seemed to show little but hard-heartedness, ingratitude, and unbelief (Jn 12^{37-40}). Our Lord Himself can only denounce woe upon the cities which enjoyed most of His presence (Mt 11^{20-24}‖). And yet about the same time two sayings are recorded which mark a deep inward consciousness of success. The ministry which might seem to be in vain was not really in vain, but potential and in promise; to the eye which saw into the future as well as into the present, and which looked into the inmost counsels of the Father, the crisis might even be regarded as past. One of these sayings is Lk 10^{18}. The success of the disciples in casting out demons draws from Jesus the remark that the power of the prince of darkness is broken. And about the same time, as if ingratitude and opposition counted for nothing, He pours out His thanks to the Father: 'I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou didst hide these things from the wise and understanding, and didst reveal them unto babes; yea, Father, for so it was well-pleasing in thy sight' (Mt $11^{25f.}$‖). The next verse in both Gospels contains the clearest expression in the Synoptics of that sense of oneness with the Father which is brought out so pointedly in Jn. And the verses which follow in Mt are that wonderful invitation: 'Come unto me,' etc. He who understands this group of sayings has found his way to the heart of Christianity.

v. The Transfiguration.—To the confession of the apostle and to the words of thanksgiving, which are also words of serene contentment and inward assurance, there was not wanting an outward Divine sanction. This was given in the scene which is known to us as the Transfiguration (Mk 9^{2-8}‖). The narrative of the Transfiguration reminds us, in more ways than one, of those of the Baptism and Temptation. Once again the apostles hear words which seem to come from Heaven confirming the mission of their Master. At the same time they see a vision which brings out the significance of that mission in a way for which as yet they can hardly have been prepared. The appearance of Moses and Elijah by the side of, and as it were ministering to, Jesus, symbolized the Law and the Prophets as leading up to and receiving their fulfilment in the Gospel.

It is impossible not to see the appropriateness of this Divine testimony to the mission of Jesus occurring just where it does. That unique relationship of the Son to the Father, which forms the constant background of the narrative of the Fourth Gospel, and is not less the background—real, if not so apparent—of the Synoptics, could not but assert itself from time to time. And what time could be fitter for a clear pronouncement of it than this, when outward circumstances were for the most part so discouraging, and when the prospect was becoming every day nearer and more certain of the fatal and terrible end? If the Son must needs go down into the valley of the shadow of death, the Father's face will shine upon Him for a moment before He enters it with a brightness which will not be obscured.

As bearing upon the essentially historical character of the narrative, however difficult and even impossible it may be for us to reconstruct its details in such a way that we could be said to understand them, note (1) the significance of the appearance of Moses and Elijah at a time when that significance can have been but very imperfectly apprehended by the disciples, and when there was absolutely nothing to suggest such an idea to them; and (2) the Transfiguration comes within the cycle of events in regard to which a strict silence was to be observed. This striking and peculiar stamp of genuineness was not wanting to it. We may note also (3) the random speech of St. Peter (Mk 9^{5}‖) as a little graphic and authentic touch which had not been forgotten.

It might be supposed that the enlargements in Lk 9 31f. were merely editorial, but, like not a few added details in this Gospel, they become more impressive upon reflexion. The other evangelists throw no light upon the subject of the converse between the glorified figures; Luke alone says that they 'spake of his decease which he was about to accomplish at Jerusalem.' This was, we may be sure, the subject which deeply occupied the mind of Jesus at this time; and it is hardly less certain that the particular aspect of it which would be most present to Him would be its relation to the prophetic Scriptures of OT (and the Law also had its prophetic side). We might expect an appearance of Isaiah rather than Elijah; but Elijah was the typical prophet, and the Jews expected his appearing (cf. Wetstein on Mt 17 3). The other peculiar detail in Lk, that 'Peter and they that were with him were heavy with sleep,' may well seem confirmatory of the view (e.g.) of Weiss and Beyschlag, that the scene was presented to the three apostles in divinely caused vision.

vi. The Prophecies of Death and Resurrection.—The period we are describing is a kind of watershed, which marks not only the summit of the ascent but the beginning of the descent. We have seen how this was the case with the enthusiasm of the multitude: it was also the case with Christ Himself. The confession of St. Peter was immediately followed, and the Transfiguration both preceded and followed, by distinct prophecies of the fatal end which was to close His ministry—an end fatal in the eyes of men, but soon to be cancelled by His resurrection. As these prophecies will meet us again in the next period, to which they give its dominant character, we will reserve the discussion of them till then.

D. Close of the Active Period: the Messianic Crisis in View.

Scene.—Judæa (Jn 7 10ff. 11 54) and Peræa (Mk 10 1‖, Jn 10 40).

Time.—Tabernacles A.D. 28 to Passover A.D. 29. Mt 19 1–20 34, Mk 10, Lk 9 51–19 28 (for the most part not in chronological order), Jn 7 1–11 57.

In this period we may note more particularly (i.) the peculiar section of St. Luke's Gospel which might on a superficial view seem to be placed in this period; (ii.) that portion of the Johannean narrative which really belongs to it; (iii.) the general character of our Lord's Teaching at this time; (iv.) in particular, the prophecies of Death and Resurrection; and (v.) the hints which are given of a special significance attaching to these events.

The time of this period extends from the Feast of Tabernacles in A.D. 28 to the Passover of A.D. 29. There is more difficulty in mapping out the distribution of its parts topographically. We have some clear landmarks if we follow the guidance of the Fourth Gospel. The events of the section Jn 7 1–10 21 partly belong to the Feast of Tabernacles and in part follow at no great interval after it. We have again in Jn 10 22 a clear indication of time and place, the Feast of Dedication at Jerusalem. This would be towards the end of December. After that, Jesus withdrew beyond Jordan to the place where 'John was at the first baptizing' (Jn 10 40). Here he made a lengthened stay, and it was from hence that He paid His visit to Bethany for the raising of Lazarus. Then He again retired to a city called Ephraim on the edge of the wilderness north-east of Jerusalem, where He remained until the Jews began to gather together to attend the Passover (Jn 11 55). We have thus a fairly connected narrative extending from the beginning of the year to the Passover of A.D. 29, the scene of which is in part Judæa and in part Peræa. We have also a fixed point covering, perhaps, about a fortnight in the latter half of October and localized at Jerusalem. But what of the seven or eight weeks which separate this from the Feast of Dedication? Is it probable that Jesus returned to Galilee and continued His ministry there? It does not seem so. The solemn and deliberate leave-taking from Galilee is not likely to have been so broken. The principal objection to this view would be that the secret and unexpected visit to Jerusalem at the Feast of Tabernacles does not seem consistent with the solemnity of this leave-taking. We may, however, suppose that the Galilæan ministry was practically complete before this date, and that strong expressions like those of Lk 9 51, if they are to be taken as they stand, refer to one of the later journeys.

i. The so-called Perœan Ministry.—There is a long section of St. Luke's Gospel, Lk 9 51–18 34, which has been often treated as a single whole and as containing the record of a special ministry, identified with the last journey towards Jerusalem, and having for its scene the lands beyond the Jordan. This is based upon the fact that the beginning of the section coincides with Mk 10 1, Mt 19 1, and that the end of it brings us to the approach to Jericho (Lk 18 35). It is true that some part of the time preceding the last Passover was spent in Peræa. We know this on the joint testimony of the other Synoptists and St. John (Mk 10 1, Mt 19 1, Jn 10 40). But to suppose that the whole section must be localized there is to misunderstand the structure and character of St. Luke's Gospel. It is far more probable that he has massed together a quantity of material derived from some special source to which he had access, and which could not be easily fitted into the framework supplied to him by St. Mark.

When we come to examine these materials in detail, it would seem probable that they belong to very different periods in our Lord's ministry. Some incidents, for instance, appear to assume those easier relations to the Pharisees which we have seen to be characteristic of the earlier period (Lk 11 37 [but not vv. 42–54] 14 1ff.). It would be natural also to refer to this or the middle period the three parables of ch. 15 (Weiss, Leben Jesu, i. 507). On the other hand, some of the incidents are practically dated by their coincidence with the other Gospels; while others, like the severe denunciations of the Pharisees and eschatological sections such as Lk 13 22–30 17 20–18 8, are referred to the later period by their subject-matter. It would be wrong to lay too much stress on mere symmetry; but when a natural sequence suggests itself, it may be accepted as having such probability as can be attained. The document which St. Luke is using in this part has preserved for us discourses of the utmost value, and it is largely to them that the Gospel owes its marked individuality.

ii. The Johannean Narrative of this Period.—The historical value of the Fourth Gospel comes out strongly in this period. Rarely has any situation been described with the extraordinary vividness and truth to nature of ch. 7 (see esp. vv. 11–15. 25–27. 31. 32. 40–52). Not less graphic are the details of ch. 9; and there is marked precision in the statements of Jn 10 22f. 40f. 11 54–57. We note a special intimacy with what passes in the inner counsels of the Sanhedrin (Jn 7 47–52 11 47–53). This intimate knowledge might have been derived through Nicodemus or through the connexion hinted at in Jn 18 15.* But, apart from the peculiar verisimilitude of these details, some such activity as that described in these chs. is required to explain the great catastrophe which followed. It is impossible that Jesus should have been so much a stranger to Judæa and Jerusalem as the Synoptic narrative would at first sight seem to make Him. For the steps which lead up to the end we must go to St. John.

iii. The general Character of the Teaching of this Period.—There are no doubt portions of the teaching of this period preserved in the Synoptics. But except those contained in Mk 10 1–45 ‖ they are difficult to identify with certainty. For the greater part of our knowledge of it we are indebted to St. John, and we may observe that the teaching now begins to take a new character. Hitherto it has been mainly concerned with the nature of the Kingdom; henceforward greater stress is laid on the person of the King. We have already noted the remarkable verse Mt 11^{27}‖ 'All things have been delivered unto me of my Father: and no one knoweth the Son save the Father; neither doth any know the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him.' This verse may be said to represent the text which the discourses in St. John set in various lights. We have now the self-revelation of the Son as the central life-giving and light-giving force of humanity. As He is the living Bread (Jn 6), so is He the living Water (Jn $7^{37ff.}$); He is the Light of the world (Jn 8^{12} 9^{5}); He is the Good Shepherd (Jn 10^{11}), the Resurrection and the Life (Jn 11^{25}). If we suppose that these discourses were really held, we shall understand better than we could do otherwise the state of Christian thought which meets us when we open the first surviving Epistles of St. Paul.

iv. The Prophecies of Death and Resurrection.—From the time of St. Peter's confession Jesus began in set terms to foretell that His mission would end in His death, soon, however, to be followed by His resurrection (Mk 8^{31}‖). At the moment of His highest triumph, marked by the Transfiguration, the same solemn prediction is repeated (Mk 9^{31}), and again yet a third time towards the end of the period with which we are now dealing (Mk 10^{32-34}‖).

(a) Even an ordinary observer might have seen that the signs of the times were ominous. St. Peter's confession showed no more than one adherent whose fervid faith might be supposed capable of resisting a pressure of life or death. Herod Antipas and his faction were hostile. The Pharisees were yet more hostile, and their bitterness was growing every day. Within the period before us two deliberate attempts were made on the life of Jesus (Jn 8^{59} 10^{39}). And with the certainty that the course on which He was bent would include nothing to conciliate these antagonisms, it was clear where they would end.

(b) But the foresight of Jesus took a wider range than this. He had laid it down as a principle that it was the fate of prophets to be persecuted (Mt 5^{12} $23^{34.\ 37}$). In particular, He had before Him the example of the Baptist, whose fate He associated with His own (Mk $9^{12f.}$‖).

(c) But there was a deeper necessity even than this. At the Betrayal, to him who drew sword in His defence Jesus replied calmly, 'How then should the Scriptures be fulfilled, that thus it must be?' And this is His consistent language (comp. Lk $24^{25f.\ 44.\ 46}$ etc.). The mind of Jesus was steeped in the ancient prophecies. He had Himself, as we have seen, deliberately fused the conception of the conquering Messiah with that of the Suffering Servant of Jehovah, and He as deliberately went the way to fulfil these prophecies in His own person. There was nothing accidental about His Death. He 'set his face steadfastly' on the road which led to it.

(d) When we look into its lessons we are carried even behind the fulfilment of prophecy. We shall have to speak presently of the extraordinary novelty of the turn which Christ gave to His mission. Others had conquered by the exercise of force; He was the first to set Himself to conquer by weakness, patience, non-resistance. And the natural and inevitable consummation of this new method of conquest was Death.

(e) In all this He was carrying out, and knew that He was carrying out, the Will of the Father. It was conceivable that that Will might have yet ulterior objects even beyond those, deep enough as we might think, which we have been considering. That Jesus ascribed to His Death such an ulterior object we are led to believe by the way in which He speaks of it. The two places in which He does so must next engage our attention.

v. Significance of the Death of Jesus.—The first of the passages to which allusion has just been made is Mk 10^{45}‖ 'For verily the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many.' We observe here that Jesus brings His Death under the category of service, and regards it as the climax of a life of service. This is one way of stating the great paradox to which we have just alluded. The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over their subjects; but such was not to be the ambition of the disciples of Christ; rather the very opposite; and it was Christ Himself who set them the example. At the end of the avenue stood a cross, and the Saviour of men walked up to it as if it had been a crown. It is a question of pressing interest how much farther we may go than this: is the λύτρον ἀντὶ πολλῶν to be interpreted by the ἀπολύτρωσις and ἱλαστήριον of Ro $3^{24f.}$, and by the language of other similar passages? By itself we could not say that it compelled such an interpretation; but there is nothing forced in supposing that the early Church knew and followed the mind of its Founder. In that case we should have reason to think that Jesus Himself had hinted at the sacrificial character of His Death, and that He too regarded it as propitiatory.

If this passage suggests a sacrificial aspect of one kind, the other is more explicit in bringing out sacrificial associations of another. All the extant accounts of the institution of the Eucharist connect the Blood shed upon the Cross with the founding of a '[new] Covenant.' This is certainly an allusion to the inauguration of the first Covenant with sacrifice (cf. Ex 24^{4-8}, He 9^{18-23}), and the Death of Christ is clearly regarded as the Sacrifice inaugurating the second (see below, p. 638).

In other words, the momentous question came before the mind of Jesus whether the New Dispensation which He was founding was or was not like the Old in including the idea of Sacrifice. He deliberately answered that it was. And He deliberately foresaw, and as deliberately accepted the consequence, that the sacrifice of this New Dispensation could be none other than the Sacrifice of Himself.

That which gives this particular Death a value which no other death could have had is (α) the fact that it is the Death of the Messiah, of One whose function it is to be the Saviour of His people, and whose Death like His Life must in some way enter into the purpose of the whole scheme of salvation; and (β) the further fact that although the Death is a necessity in the sense that it was required for the full development of God's gracious purpose, it was nevertheless a purely voluntary act on the part of the Son, an expression of that truly filial spirit in which He made the whole of the Father's purpose His own. 'The good Shepherd layeth down his life for the sheep. . . . Therefore doth the Father love me, because I lay down my life, that I may take it again. No one taketh it away from me, but I lay it down of myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again. This commandment received I from my Father' (Jn $10^{11.\ 17f.}$). It follows (γ) that however much it may be right to conceive of the Death of Christ as a Sacrifice, and a sacrifice which has for its object the 'remission of sins' (Mt 26^{28}), we must not in connexion with it set the justice of God against His mercy, or think of Him as really turning away His face from the Son of His love.

LITERATURE.—The subject of these last two sections not only comes into the field of New Testament Theology in general and treatises (like Wendt's and others named above) on the Teaching of Christ, but it necessarily occupies a prominent place in discussions of the Doctrine of the Atonement. Among these may be mentioned especially Ritschl's Rechtfertigung u. Versöhnung, vol. ii. of which goes elaborately into the exegesis of the leading passages (ed. 2, 1882), and a recent treatise by Kähler, Zur Lehre von der Versöhnung (Leipzig, 1898), which gives prominence to the relation of the doctrine to the Life of Christ. A lengthy monograph by Schwartzkopff deals directly with our Lord's predictions of His Passion (Die Weissagungen Jesu Christi von seinem Tode, u. s. w., Göttingen, 1895); and 'Christ's Attitude to His Death' is the title of some striking articles by Dr. A. M. Fairbairn in Expos. 1896, ii., and 1897, i.

E. THE MESSIANIC CRISIS: THE TRIUMPHAL ENTRY, THE LAST TEACHING, PASSION, DEATH, RESURRECTION, ASCENSION.

Scene.—Mainly in Jerusalem.

Time.—Six days before Passover to ten days before Pentecost A.D. 29.

Mt 21^{1}–28^{20}, Mk 11^{1}–16^{8} [vv.$^{9-20}$ an early addition], Lk 19^{29}–24^{52}, Jn 12^{1}–21^{23}.

This series of momentous events has naturally furnished much matter for discussion and controversy, some of it very recent. (i.) Our first duty will be to sketch rapidly the course of the events with special reference to the motives of the human actors in them. (ii.) We must consider the debated points in the chronology of the last week. (iii.) We shall have to discuss the eschatological teaching which the Synoptists place in this period. (iv.) A number of points, critical and doctrinal, will meet us in connexion with the Last Supper. (v.) We shall have in like manner to consider both the attestation and the significance of the crowning event of all, the Resurrection. This will include some discussion of the Appearances which followed. Lastly (vi.), as our subject is the Life of Christ and not the Gospels, we must, even though in so doing we cross the threshold of St. Luke's 'second treatise,' follow the steps of the Master to His Ascension.

i. The Action and the Actors.—Our four Gospels, taken together, in part convey and in part suggest a view at once clear and probable of the course of events which led to the Crucifixion, and of the motives which impelled the several actors in them. We have seen that the Fourth Gospel is needed to explain the heightened enmity which had so tragic an issue. A residence in Jerusalem and Bethany of four days would not be enough to account for the overtures to Judas. The events of the Feast of Tabernacles, the Feast of Dedication, and the Raising of Lazarus, with the knowledge that Jesus had been teaching and making disciples at no great distance from Jerusalem, supply what is wanted. And in the case of the Last Week the touches which the Fourth Gospel adds to its predecessors supplement them effectively.

(a) The Populace.—In the Triumphal Entry we seem to see a gleam once more of the enthusiasm which had followed the Feeding of the Five Thousand. It was probably quite as superficial. We may imagine the crowd made up in part of those who had been impressed by recent teaching beyond the Jordan or in Jerusalem itself, or by the news of the still more striking miracle wrought upon Lazarus: besides these, there would doubtless be a contingent of pilgrims from more distant Galilee, the remnant of the crowds who had at one time or another followed Jesus there. But it would be too much to expect that all, or even many of these, had acquired an intelligent insight into the character of Him whom they were cheering. They were still in the twilight of their old Jewish expectations. They supposed that the moment had at last come when the hopes which they cherished would be realized, and when before the crowds assembled for the Passover Jesus would at last put Himself forward as the Leader for whom they were waiting. Nothing, however, came of this seeming appeal to their enthusiasm. A few discourses in the temple, partly levelled against the religious authorities they were most accustomed to reverence, but containing not a word of incitement against the Romans, and that was all. What wonder if their enthusiasm died away, and if in some of the fiercer among them it changed to bitter and angry disappointment! Doubtless some of these Zealots mingled with those who cried 'Crucify him, crucify him'; it was natural that they should prefer one of their own trade, like Barabbas; but the crowds in Jerusalem at Passover time were so great that many of these fanatics may have had no personal acquaintance with Jesus at all. The choice between Jesus and Barabbas would seem to them a choice between a mock leader, a dreamer of dreams, who offered them nothing but words, and a true son of the people who had shown himself ready to grip the sword in the good cause.

(b) The Traitor.—It is possible that Judas Iscariot may have shared something of these feelings. In the lists of the apostles he is usually named next to a Zealot. The long course of training which he had undergone may have failed to purge his mind of the carnal expectations of his countrymen. It may have been a sudden access of disappointment, greater than ever before, because the hopes by which it had been preceded had been greater, which impelled him to seek his interview with the members of the Sanhedrin. It has even been suggested that he did what he did in order to compel his Master to declare Himself, and with the belief that He would at last exert for the deliverance of the nation the supernatural powers with which He was endowed. For this we have no sufficient warrant; and we are told expressly (Jn 12^{6} RV text and most Comms.) that Judas was guilty of petty pilfering from the common fund, and therefore may infer that he was accessible to the temptations of avarice. Still, few men act from motives that they cannot at least make plausible to themselves: so that a mixture of obstinate and misguided patriotism is more probable than pure malignity. If Judas had not been at least capable of better things, it is not likely that he would have been chosen to be one of the Twelve.

(c) The Pharisees.—By this time between Jesus and the Pharisees there is open war. Insidious questions are still put to Him, but only in order to 'ensnare him in his talk' (Mt 22^{15}‖). And on His side Jesus replied to their treachery by the sternest denunciations. It need not be supposed that all 'scribes and Pharisees' were equally the object of these. We know that Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathæa were members of the Sanhedrin; we do not know that they belonged to the party of the Pharisees, but we cannot doubt that there were some Pharisees like-minded with them; just as we learn from the Acts that after the Resurrection a number of the 'priests' (Ac 6^{7}) and at least some Pharisees (ib. 15^{5}) became Christians.

(d) The Sadducees.—With the last week of our Lord's life, or rather, if we may trust St. John as far back as the Feast of Tabernacles (Jn 7^{45}), a new party comes into prominence. The Sanhedrin begins to take official action against Jesus; and, although the Pharisees had some footing in that body, its policy was more determined by the Sadducees, to whom belonged most of the 'chief priests,' and in particular Caiaphas, the acting high priest, and his yet more influential father-in-law and predecessor Annas. As against Jesus the two parties of Pharisees and Sadducees acted together, but their motives were different. The Pharisees were jealous for their authority and traditions, which were openly assailed. The Sadducees themselves rejected these traditions,—they were selfish politicians, who played their own game. Their motto was quieta non movere. They dreaded any kind of disturbance which might give the Romans an excuse to take the power out of their hands (cf. Jn 11^{48}). It is curious to note how from this time onwards the bitterest opposition comes from the Sadducees, while leading Pharisees are neutral or even favourable (Ac 4^{34-39} 23^{9}).

(e) Pilate.—The position of things is this. The Jews (i.e. primarily the Sanhedrin) were bent upon bringing about the death of Jesus. Now they themselves had not the power of life and death (Jn 18^{31}). According to the Talmud, they lost it forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem, which would be about this very time. It is probable, however, that they did not long continue to possess it after the annexation of Judæa by the Romans. This being the case, they could only act through the instrumentality of the Roman governor. This necessitated the putting forward of different reasons from those that really weighed with themselves. Rather we should say that there were really three sets of reasons: (i.) The real motive of the Sanhedrin was jealousy of its own authority,—on the part of the Sadducees fear of disturbance, on the part of the Pharisees resentment of the attacks upon themselves and their traditions, and with some of the most patriotic among them perhaps disgust at a Messiah who was not a Messiah in any sense which they could comprehend. (ii.) The ostensible reason, which with some may have been sincere enough, was the charge of blasphemy against God. This charge they tried to bring home, but for a time could not (Mk 14^{59} ‖), until at last they caught at the confession of Jesus Himself. On the strength of this He was condemned (Mk 14^{62-64}). (iii.) This charge, however, was not one which they could bring before the governor, and therefore they changed their ground. St. Luke, who in all these scenes draws upon special and good information, states the accusation with more precision than the other Synoptists. 'We found this man perverting our nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar, and saying that he himself is Christ a king' (or 'an anointed king,' RVm; Lk 23^{2}).

With this charge it is that the leaders of the Sanhedrin come before Pilate. Pilate has the rough Roman sense of justice, and he feels that the charge is not proved. He sees no evidence that Jesus is really a formidable conspirator, or even a conspirator at all against the State. He therefore desires to release Him; but the Jews insist, the leaders being backed by the clamour of the crowd. The Sanhedrists know the weak point in Pilate's armour, and they fasten upon it: 'If thou release this man, thou art not Cæsar's friend: every one that maketh himself a king speaketh against Cæsar' (Jn 19^{12}, a most lifelike touch). For themselves they protest their loyalty, 'We have no king but Cæsar' (Jn 19^{15}). For many of the Sanhedrin, Pharisees as well as Sadducees, this would be true, and those for whom it was not would discreetly hold their peace. To this pressure Pilate in the end gives way, washing his hands of the responsibility. He might have taken a nobler course, but he felt insecure of his position; he knew that the Jews had matter of just complaint against him; and sooner than face their malice, with the inconveniences which it might cause, he let them have their will.

LITERATURE.—With this section may be compared two works of imagination: Dr. Edwin A. Abbott, Philochristus, London, 1878; and As Others Saw Him, London, 1895 (written from a Jewish point of view, but sympathetic and instructive). Also Chwolson, Das letzte Passamahl Christi, etc., St. Petersburg, 1892, Anhang: 'Das Verhältniss d. Pharisäer, Sadducäer, u. der Juden überhaupt zu Jesus Christus' (minimizing the opposition of the Pharisees, and laying the blame upon the Sadducees [Jewish, but written with much special knowledge]).

ii. The Chronology of the Last Week.—A number of chronological difficulties meet us in the narrative of this Last Week. (1) The prima facie view would certainly be that the Anointing at Bethany was placed by Mark two days (Mk 14^{1}) and by John six days (Jn 12^{1}) before the Passover. (2) The common opinion is that the Crucifixion took place on a Friday, and the Last Supper on the evening of Thursday; but it has also been argued that the two events took place on Thursday and Wednesday. (3) There is a much larger division of opinion as to the date of the Crucifixion in the Jewish calendar, and the relation of the Last Supper to the Paschal Meal. The Synoptists seem to identify the two, whereas St. John expressly places the Last Supper before the Passover, and would make the Crucifixion fall on Nisan 14. (4) The authorities also appear to differ as to the time of day occupied by the Crucifixion. According to Mk 15^{25} the time of the Crucifixion itself was the 'third hour' (=9 a.m.); according to Jn 19^{14} the trial was not quite over by the 'sixth hour' (=noon), and therefore the Crucifixion was still later.

Of these discrepancies No. 2 need not detain us. The view that the Crucifixion took place upon a Thursday is almost peculiar to Dr. Westcott (Introd. to the Study of the Gospels, p. 322, ed. 3). It turns upon a pressing of the phrase 'three days and three nights' in Mt 12^{40}, along with the probability of confusion between 'preparation for the Passover' and the more ordinary use of the word in the sense of 'preparation for the Sabbath' (i.e. Friday). The phrasing of Mt. 27^{62} is somewhat peculiar, but not really less so on this way of reckoning than the other, because the day described as the 'morrow after the Preparation' would be itself the weekly παρασκευή. And Mt 12^{40} is due only to the evangelist, and is not supported by the other authorities. [On the length of the interval between the Crucifixion and the Resurrection see esp. art. CHRONOLOGY OF NT in this Dict. i. 410^{b} (with Field, Ot. Norv. iii. p. 7, there referred to), and Wright, NT Problems, p. 159 ff.].

No. 1 is commonly removed by treating the note of time in Mk 14^{1} ‖ as referring to the events of vv. $^{1.\ 2.\ 10.\ 11}$ and not to the intervening narrative of vv.$^{3-9}$. In support of this, Meyer-Weiss (ed. 8, ad loc.) points to analogous cases of intrusive matter in Mk 3^{22-30} 4^{10-25} 6^{14-29} 7^{25-30}. On the other hand, M'Clellan (Gospels, p. 472 f.) restricts the application of Jn 12^{1} to the arrival at Bethany, which, according to him, was on the afternoon of Friday, Nisan 8. The Anointing he would place on the evening of Tuesday, Nisan 12. Either view is possible, and neither can be verified. If we think that the fourth evangelist deliberately corrects his predecessors, we shall probably give the preference to him. On such a point Mark is not a first-hand authority, and the connexion between his placing of the Betrayal and of the Anointing may well be loose.

As to (4) the difference in regard to the hour of the Crucifixion, attempts have been made with some persistence to prove that St. John used a different mode of reckoning time from that in common use. The writer of this was at one time inclined to look with favour on these attempts. If the premiss could be proved, the data would work out satisfactorily. But, in view of the arts. by Mr. J. A. Cross in Class. Rev. 1891, p. 245 ff., and by Prof. Ramsay in Expositor, 1893, i. 216 ff., it must definitely be said that the major premiss cannot be proved, and that the attempt to reconcile the two statements on this basis breaks down (cf. also Wright, Problems, p. 149 ff.).

The ancient solution of the difficulty was to suppose a corruption (Γ for Γ, or vice versâ) of the text, more often in Jn than in Mk; and rightly, because in Mk there are three several notes of time (Mk $15^{1}\|^{25.\ 33}\|$) which hang together. So Eus. ad Marinum, with a group of MSS scholia (vid. Tisch. on Jn 19^{14}), etc. This solution is accepted by Mr. Wright op. cit. p. 156 ff.), and it may conceivably hold good.

Prof. Ramsay lays stress rather on the rough and approximate way in which the ancients used the reckoning by hours. It must be remembered that an 'hour' with them was a twelfth part of daylight, and not a fixed space of 60 measured minutes, as with us. If the two statements had been inverted—if Mk 15^{25} had described the end of the trial and Jn 19^{14} the raising of the cross—this elasticity might have amply covered both. As the two passages stand, it hardly does so.

We may ask ourselves whether, supposing that the slaughter of the Paschal lambs began at 3 p.m. (the time of slaughter is given as 3–5 p.m. by Jos. BJ VI. ix. 3), there would not be a rather strong temptation on typological grounds to fix the moment of the death of the Messiah at that hour. The other notes of time would naturally be conformed to this. But, on the other hand, St. John's 'sixth hour' seems inconveniently late for the events which have to be compressed between it and the evening. The whole question must be left open. There is a choice of possibilities, but nothing more.

Can we get beyond a similar choice on the last and most important point (3), the discrepancy as to the day of the month of the Crucifixion and of the Last Supper? Perhaps not.

It is the Last Supper which the Synoptists appear to fix by identifying it with the Passover. They say expressly that on the morning of the 'first day of unleavened bread, when they sacrificed the Passover' (Mk $14^{12}\|$), the disciples asked where the Passover was to be eaten. This would be on the morning of Nisan 14. In the evening, which from twilight onwards would belong to Nisan 15, would follow the Last Supper, and on the next afternoon (still, on the Jewish reckoning, Nisan 15) the Crucifixion. St. John, on the other hand, by a number of clear indications (Jn 13^{1} 18^{28} $19^{14.\ 31}$) implies that the Last Supper was eaten before the time of the regular Passover, and that the Lord suffered on the afternoon of Nisan 14, about the time of the slaying of the Paschal lambs.

We are thus left with a conflict of testimony; and the question is, on which side the evidence is strongest. Now, if we are to believe a very competent Jewish archæologist, Dr. Chwolson, the Synoptists begin with an error. 'From the Mosaic writings down to the Book of Jubilees (cap. 49), Philo, Josephus, the Palestinian Targum ascribed to Jonathan ben Uziel, the Mishnah, the Talmud, the Rabbinical writings of the Middle Ages, indeed down to the present day, the Jews have always understood by the phrase יוֹם רִאשׁוֹן לַחַג הַמַּצּוֹת "the first day of the feast of unleavened bread," only the 15th, and not the 14th' (Das letzte Passamahl Christi u. der Tag seines Todes, p. 3 f.); so that it would be a contradiction in terms to say with Mk $14^{12}\|$ 'on the first day of unleavened bread, when they sacrificed the Passover.' It is, however, only right to add that Chwolson's assertion is denied by another very good authority, Dr. Schürer, ThL, 1893, col. 182. [Schürer does not directly meet the statement that where the feast of Unleavened Bread is represented as extending over eight days, the days intended are Nisan 15–22, not 14–21.*]

* It is worth noting that the Gospel of Peter agrees with the Johannean rather than the Synoptic tradition, placing the Crucifixion not on, but before, the first day of unleavened bread (πρὸ μιᾶς τῶν ἀζύμων, Ev. Pet. 3).

Waiving this point, however, for the present, we observe (after Chwolson, but cf. Authorship of the Fourth Gospel, 1872, p. 206 f. etc.) that the Synoptists make the Sanhedrin say beforehand that they will not arrest Jesus 'on the feast day,' and then actually arrest Him on that day; that not only the guards, but one of the disciples (Mk $14^{47}\|$) carries arms, which on the feast day was not allowed; that the trial was also held on the feast day, which would be unlawful (on these points see Chwolson, op. cit. p. 6 ff.); that the feast day would not be called simply 'Preparation'; that the phrase 'coming from the field' (Mk $15^{21}\|$) means properly 'coming from work'; that Joseph of Arimathæa is represented as buying a linen cloth (Mk 15^{46}), and the women as preparing spices and ointments (Lk 23^{50}), all of which would be contrary to law and custom.

It follows that the Synoptists are really inconsistent with themselves, and bear unwilling witness to the chronology of St. John. We may be still reluctant to think that the contradiction is final. The Synoptists, so far as they identify the Last Supper with the Passover, look as if they were telling the truth. It is possible that there may be some way of reconciling the two accounts, which we do not know enough of the circumstances to specify.

One hypothesis, which the writer was at one time tempted to entertain,—very tentatively,—that the 'Passover' which lay before the disciples and the Sanhedrin was not the Passover proper, but the eating of the Chăgîgāh (so Edersheim, M'Clellan, Nösgen), he now believes to be untenable (see Expos. 1892, i. 17 ff., 182 f., and Wright, Problems, p. 173 ff.). It is more likely that, for some reason or other, the regular Passover was anticipated.

Dr. Chwolson, writing as a Jew, whose interest in the question is purely archæological, would account for such anticipation by the fact that in the year of the Passion, Nisan 15 (not 14) fell upon a Sabbath. But it must be confessed that his argument seems strained (cf. also Schürer in ThL, ut. sup.).

Mr. Wright thinks that the Synoptists have combined the narrative of the Last Supper with that of some previous Paschal meal partaken of by our Lord (Problems, p. 179 ff.). But even if this hypothesis held good, it would hardly meet the case; because it is just the details of the Last Supper, belonging to it qua Last Supper (e.g. the 'cup of blessing'), which remind us of the Passover. And, in any case, the hypothesis deserts the documents too far to be at all capable of proof.

As the question at present stands we can only acknowledge our ignorance. [The literature will have been sufficiently given in the course of this section; cf. esp. Mr. A. Wright's Some New Testament Problems, London, 1898, p. 147 ff.].

iii. The Prophetic Teaching of the Last Week.—This, too, has raised difficulties which are not only apparent but real. It is important to bear in mind that no less than six distinct kinds of prediction are ascribed to our Lord during this week or in the period preceding. There is (1) the prediction of His own death and resurrection. There is (2) the prediction of the siege and destruction of Jerusalem. With this in the great passage (Mk 13‖) is directly connected (3) the prediction of the end of the world and the last judgment. (4) The discourses in Jn clearly predict the coming of the Paraclete as the substitute for Christ Himself. (5) In another leading passage (Mk 9^{1}) a phrase is used which may be explained, though it is not usually explained, of the remarkable spread of the Christian Church from the Day of Pentecost onwards. Lastly (6), there is the explanation which is frequently given of the 'Coming of the Son of Man' as a so-called 'historical coming,' a coming not exhausted by a single occasion, but repeated in the great events of history.

The first three of these classes of predictions are, in any case, authentic and certain. To the believer in the genuineness of the Fourth Gospel the prophecy of the Paraclete is equally certain, and there is much which goes to confirm it in the Acts and Epp. independently of its direct attestation. The other two forms of prediction are more hypothetical. They have been introduced more or less in order to meet the difficulties, although they may have substantial grounds of their own. We will not as yet beg the question either way.

The great difficulty is that as our documents stand the second and third predictions are intimately connected with each other, and in at least one other passage it would seem as if it were expressly stated that the coming of the Son of Man (i.e. the final Coming, the Coming to Judgment) would take place within the lifetime of that generation. We know that it has not so taken place, and the great question is what we are to say to this. Is it an error in One who has never been convicted of error in anything else? We must not endeavour to explain away facts; but we may interrogate them, and interrogate them somewhat strictly, to see whether they are facts or no.

We cannot disguise from ourselves, that, whatever the precise language used by our Lord, the disciples would be exceedingly prone to attribute to Him the prediction of His own return as near at hand. The connexion of the Messiah with a world-wide judgment was no new doctrine, but was a common feature in the Jewish apocalypses. But this return would seem to them, as applied to our Lord, the necessary complement of the life of humiliation which He had led upon earth. For it was reserved the full triumph over His enemies which so far must have seemed very imperfect. Resurrection and Ascension would seem to be only foretastes of the great coming in glory on the clouds of heaven. They were steps, but only steps, towards the goal.

We might have been sure, even if we had not been told, that the disciples would naturally fix their thoughts on this Second Coming, and that it would be a natural inference for them to suppose that it was near at hand. Instances like the comparison of Mt 24^{29} = Mk 13^{24} = Lk 21^{25} show that the expectation as to time was not fixed but variable.

On the other side, no doubt, must be set the fact that in the apostolic circle the belief in the nearness of the Second Coming was almost universal (1 Th $4^{14ff.}$, 1 Co $7^{29ff.}$ 16^{23}, 2 Co 5^{3}, Ro $13^{11.\ 12}$, Ph 4^{5}, 1 P 4^{7}, 1 Jn 2^{18}, Rev 1^{3} 22^{10} etc.). The obvious conclusion to draw from this would be that the belief had a common root in the teaching of Christ Himself.

And in favour of that conclusion might be quoted the language of 1 Th 4^{15}, though it may be questioned how much of this is a 'word of the Lord,' and how much the construction put upon it by St. Paul. The ease with which the apostles postponed their expectation under the teaching of events would tell against the supposition that the words of Christ had been precise on the subject; and when we come to look into the Gospels there are many hints that the time of the Second Coming could not be fixed precisely and might be distant (Mt 24^{37-51}‖ $25^{10-13.\ 14}$). These passages are indeed so clear that they may be fairly said to neutralize those which are quoted on the other side, and to heighten the probability that the apparent definiteness of these other passages is due to the disciples rather than to the Master.

But another hypothesis has been put forward to remove the difficulty. It has been supposed that the Coming of the Son of Man in the places where it is spoken of as near at hand refers, not to the final coming, but to another kind of coming in the great events of history. The prologue of St. John's Gospel appears to point to such repeated comings (Jn 1^{9}); and if any event deserves the name, it might well be given to the Destruction of Jerusalem, which was certainly one of the turning-points of history, and had a momentous influence upon the fortunes of Christianity. There is no doubt that our Lord directly predicted this catastrophe; and it might well seem that the passages which apparently speak of the final coming as near were due to a confusion in the minds of the disciples between the two events regarded as 'Comings.'

It is, however, a question whether this idea of repeated coming can be made good. Most recent writers are inclined to set it down as a modernism (Schwartzkopff, Weissagungen Jesu Christi, etc. p. 155; Holtzmann, Neutest. Theol. i. 315). It is also very doubtful whether it has any real support in OT. What the prophets looked forward to was 'the day of the Lord'—a single great intervention of God—not a day or succession of days.

On this point the writer is glad to be able to refer to a note which he has received from Dr. Driver: 'The usual expression is "the day of J' "; in Is 2^{12}, however, it is indef. ("for there is a day for," etc., or "J'' hath a day"); Zec 14^{1} has also "a day"; Ezk 30^{3} is lit. "For near is a day, and near is a day for J ''"; Is 34^{8} "For there is a day of vengeance for J'' (or "J'' hath"), a year of recompense for," etc.: also "his days" in apparently the same sense, Job 24^{1}. But these hardly differ except formally from the usual "day of J''." I do not think that a succession of judgments is represented under this figure—except, of course, in so far as what the prophet pictured as taking place in a single day was in reality effected gradually.'

Another hypothesis, however, also appears deserving of consideration. The strongest of all the passages which would make our Lord expressly predict His own Second Coming within the apostolic age itself is Mt 16^{28} 'Verily I say unto you, There be some of them that stand here which shall in no wise taste of death, till they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom.' But when we compare this with the parallels, Mk 9^{1} = Lk 9^{27} it is clear that the words Son of Man are intrusive, and that the clause really runs, 'till they see the kingdom of God come with power' (om. 'with power,' Lk). It is not the 'Son of Man coming in his kingdom,' but the 'kingdom' itself which comes.

What is meant by the kingdom here? Is it not a very natural interpretation to explain it of that great intervention of the Spirit of God in the world, that great influx of Divine powers and energies which dates from Pentecost? In other words, is it not natural to equate it with the promise of the Paraclete in the Fourth Gospel, where it is implied that the coming of the Paraclete is equivalent to the coming of Christ Himself? (Jn 14^{16-18}).

The teaching of the Fourth Gospel respecting the Paraclete is already strongly confirmed by the part assigned to the Holy Spirit by St. Paul; and if the explanation just suggested* holds good, it would be also confirmed from another and unexpected quarter.

There has been a considerable tendency in the advanced liberal camp to get rid entirely of the apocalyptic and eschatological element in the teaching of our Lord. The chief means through which this is done has been the supposed discovery that in the discourse of Mk 13 ‖ there is incorporated a 'Little Apocalypse' of Jewish (Weizsäcker) or Jewish-Christian (Colani, Pfleiderer, Weiffenbach) origin, usually regarded as a 'fly-sheet' composed in A.D. 67–68 during the troubles which immediately preceded the siege of Jerusalem, and identified with the 'oracle' which led to the flight of the Christians to Pella (Eus. HE III. v. 3). The first to hit upon this idea was Colani (Jésus Christ et les Croyances Messianiques de son Temps, ed. 2, 1864, p. 201 ff.), who was followed by Weizsäcker, Pfleiderer, and on an elaborate scale by Weiffenbach, Die Wiederkunftsgedanken Jesu, Leipzig, 1873. This last-named work is usually referred to as having established the position. In the final form of the theory the 'fly-sheet' in question is supposed to consist of Mk 13^{7-9a} ‖ $^{14-20}$ ‖ $^{24-27}$ ‖ $^{30-31}$ ‖. And it is true that these verses are fairly detachable from the rest and make a fairly compact whole.

By thus eliminating the central passage on which the eschatological teaching of Jesus seemed to rest, it became not very difficult to explain away that teaching altogether. Weiffenbach did so by the hypothesis that the critically verified allusions to the Second Coming of the Messiah all originally referred to His Resurrection, the predictions of which formed the genuine nucleus out of which the rest had grown through misunderstanding of the words of Jesus and the blending with them of current apocalyptic doctrines. By this expedient, Weiffenbach, whose object was less radical than that of most of those who went with him, escaped some real difficulties; but just in this it may be doubted whether he has found any follower. It will be seen that the critical analysis of Mk 13 ‖ is the starting-point of the whole construction; and that has not perhaps as yet been brought to any final solution.

iv. The Last Supper.—The part of the Last Supper of which it is most incumbent upon us to speak here is its culmination in the solemn acts and words which institute the second of the two great Sacraments. Besides the debates of centuries which have gathered round this subject, a number of questions have been raised in recent years which require discussion. In particular, new light has been thrown upon the text of one of our leading authorities. And our first step must be to determine as nearly as we can its exact bearing.

(1) The Text of Lk 22$^{14-20}$.—The importance of this section is such, and it is so desirable that the evidence should be given with completeness and precision, that we may be forgiven if in this instance we print the full text of the original (after Greek RV), and then proceed to give the more crucial variants in technical fashion.

The evidence of the leading Latin MSS is given in full; that of the two oldest forms of the Syriac Version in a retranslation, based for the Sinai MS on Mrs. Lewis and Merx, and for the Curetonian on Baethgen. For the Coptic Version the new critical edition is used (Oxford, 1898).

To the textual critic these phenomena are fairly clear. The omission of vv.$^{19b-20}$ (D a ff^2 i l) belongs to the oldest form of the Western text. The next step (b e) was to transpose the order of vv.$^{17.\ 18}$ and ^{19a}, so as to make the sequence of the Bread and the Cup corrrespond to that in the other authorities. The next (Cur.) was to supplement the words relating to the Bread from 1 Co 11^{24}. The next (Sin.) was to supplement in like manner the part relating to the Cup by somewhat free interpolations partly suggested by Mt, Mk, but mainly from 1 Co 11^{25}. In this instance Syr.-Sin. represents a later stage than Syr.-Cur., though it is more often earlier. The omissions of vv.[^{16}] $^{17.\ 18}$ are probably not important.

We have then confronting each other the primitive form of the Western text, which is shorter, makes Lk transpose the order of the Bread and the Cup, and omits all mention of a second Cup, and the great mass of Gk. MSS and other authorities, which introduce a second Cup, or second mention of the Cup, and fill out the whole mainly from St. Paul. We cannot doubt that both these types of text existed early in the 2nd cent. Either may be original. And this is just one of those cases where internal evidence is strongly in favour of the text which we call Western. The temptation to expand was much stronger than to contract; and the double mention of the Cup raises real difficulties of the kind which suggest interpolation.

(2) Relation of the Texts to each other.—The adoption of the Western text of Lk greatly diminishes the coincidences between St. Luke and St. Paul. Indeed it reduces them to the practically equivalent εὐχαριστήσας for εὐλογήσας (in reference to the Bread; Mt, Mk use it of the Cup). The greatest loss is that of the apparent confirmation by St. Luke of the command to repeat the rite in memory of its Founder. It may be doubted, however, whether the introduction of this into the text of Lk, which—to obtain the circulation it had—must have taken place exceedingly early, and must have been carried out at the headquarters of the Church, is not even stronger testimony to the current practice of the Church than that of a single writer could be, even though that writer was an evangelist.

As to the main lines of the rite all the authorities are agreed. All note the taking of the Bread, the blessing (or 'giving thanks'), the breaking, the words, 'This is my Body.' All note the Cup, which both in the Synoptic (Mt, Mk) and Pauline tradition is related to the [new] Covenant inaugurated by the shedding of the Blood of the Messiah. In the Synoptics (Mt, Mk, Lk) there is an express mention of the giving of the Bread to the disciples, with the further command, 'Take' (Mt, Mk), 'eat' (Mt), and a like communication of the Cup (Synoptics, though with some difference of phrase). And whereas St. Paul emphasizes the redemptive value of the sacrificed Body (τὸ ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν lectio vera), Mt, Mk do the same for the shedding of the Blood (τὸ περὶ [ὑπὲρ] πολλῶν ἐκχυνόμενον Mt, Mk, and εἰς ἄφεσιν ἁμαρτιῶν Mt). St. Paul not only doubles the command for repetition, but also adds, 'For as often as ye eat this bread and drink this cup, ye proclaim the Lord's death till he come.'

(3) Other NT Evidence.—We thus have the institution of the Sacrament fully set before us. But if we look at one of the documents upon which we have been drawing, the first in order of writing, though it is only incidentally historical, 1 Co 11, we find there that the Sacrament proper is associated with something else—the common meal or agape (Jude[12], 2 P 2[13] var. lect.). We ask ourselves what can be the origin of this association? It can hardly go back to the original institution. It is more probable that the association arose out of the state of κοινωνία described in Ac 2[42. 44-46] 4[32-3] 6[1. 2].

Perhaps it goes back further still, at least to the very beginning of the period. For one of the characteristic expressions is ἡ κλάσις τοῦ ἄρτου, κλᾶν ἄρτον (Ac 2[42. 46]), of which Blass says, 'est autem κλᾶν τὸν ἄρτον sollemnis designatio cenæ dominicæ.' It must, however, be somewhat wider than that, for in the immediate context we have κλῶντες τε κατ' οἶκον ἄρτον μετελάμβανον τροφῆς, κ.τ.λ., where τροφή would seem to embrace the common meal as well as the Eucharist.

We are reminded further that the same phrase κλᾶν (κατακλᾶν) ἄρτον is repeatedly used of a solemn act of our Lord independently of the Eucharist (Mk 6[41] ‖ 8[6] ‖ [19], Lk 24[30]). And we gather from the context of the last passage that there was something distinctive in this particular act by which our Lord was recognized (Lk 24[35]). We are reminded also of the many instances in which attention is specially called to the 'blessing' (εὐλογεῖν or εὐχαριστεῖν) of food by our Lord. They are the same words which are used in connexion with the sacramental Bread and the sacramental Cup.

There is something in these facts which is not quite fully explained. There are lacunæ in our knowledge which we would fain fill up if we could. The institution of the Eucharist appears to have connexions both backwards and forwards—backwards with other meals which our Lord ate together with His disciples, forwards with those common meals which very early came into existence in the Apostolic Church. But the exact nature and method of these connexions our materials are not sufficient to make clear to us.

(4) Significance of the Eucharist.—We feel these gaps in our knowledge when we pass on to consider the significance of the Sacrament. Certainly Harnack was not wholly wrong, however far we may think him from being wholly right, when he held that the primary object of Christ's blessing was the meal as such, in its simplest elements, not specifically bread and wine (cf. TU VII. ii. 137).

The prominence given to the meal and to the natural products of the earth which contribute to it, finds some support in the eucharistic prayers of the Didaché. 'First, as regards the cup: We give thee thanks, O our Father, for the holy vine of thy son David which thou madest known unto us through thy Son Jesus; thine is the glory for ever and ever. Then as regards the broken bread: We give thee thanks, O our Father, for the life and knowledge which thou didst make known to us through thy Son Jesus; thine is the glory for ever and ever. As this broken bread was scattered upon the mountains, and being gathered together became one, so may thy Church be gathered together from the ends of the earth into thy kingdom; for thine is the glory and the power through Jesus Christ, for ever and ever. . . . Thou, Almighty Master, didst create all things for thy name's sake, and didst give food and drink unto men for enjoyment, that they might render thanks to thee; but didst bestow upon us spiritual food and drink and eternal life through thy Son' (Did. ix. 2-4, x. 3).

It would, however, be doing an injustice both to the ancient and to the modern writer if we supposed that they had in view only the gifts of God in nature. Harnack writes: 'The Lord instituted a meal in commemoration of His death, or rather He described the food of the body as His Flesh and Blood, i.e. as the food of the soul (through the forgiveness of sins), when it was partaken of with thanksgiving, in memory of His death' (op. cit. p. 139). And the Didaché looks beyond the physical eating and drinking to the 'spiritual food and drink,' and to the 'eternal life' bestowed through the Son; and when it speaks of the 'holy vine of David,' there is at least an allusion to the Jewish doctrine of the Messiah, if not directly to the Johannean allegory of the Vine.

We thus come round to an aspect of the Supper which has been emphasized and illustrated, especially by Spitta. There are allusions not only in the immediate context of the words of institution (Mk 14[25] ‖), but also elsewhere (Lk 14[15] 'Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God'; cf. Mt 8[11] 22[2ff.] 25[10]) to the language in use among the Jews respecting the great Messianic banquet. This took its start from the teaching of the Prophets (e.g. Is 25[6]), and has points of contact with prominent passages in the Wisdom literature. Thus in Pr 9[5] Wisdom issues her invitation, 'Come, eat ye of my bread, and drink of the wine which I have mingled'; which is taken up in Sir 24[19-21] 'They that eat me shall yet be hungry, and they that drink me shall yet be thirsty.' And in a like connexion the idea of the manna is applied in Wis 16[20f.] 'Thou gavest thy people angels' food to eat, and bread ready for their use didst thou provide from heaven without their toil. . . . For thy nature (ἡ ὑπόστασίς σου) manifested thy sweetness toward thy children.'

We are clearly upon the line of thought which links on to the discourse in the synagogue at Capernaum. Indeed, we meet here with the same phenomenon that has already come before us on other sides of our Lord's teaching. The current ideas are not discarded, but taken up on to a higher plane and filled with a new content. We have seen that Wisdom was regarded as giving herself to be 'eaten' (i.e. spiritually appropriated and assimilated). Philo repeatedly identifies the manna with the Logos (Spitta refers to ed. Mangey, i. 120, 214, 484, 564). Hence we are not surprised to find that St. Paul speaks of the πνευματικὸν βοῶμα and πνευματικὸν πόμα, the miraculously-given meat and drink which nourished the Israelites in the wilderness being treated as typical of the Christian Sacrament. In 1 Co 10[1] it is not the water, but the stricken rock as the source of the water, which St. Paul identifies with Christ Himself. But a little further he says plainly, 'The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not a communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not a communion of the body of Christ?' (ib. v.[16]). And in Jn 6[48-51] our Lord is made to describe Himself as the 'living bread which came down out of heaven,' and it is explained that the bread which He will give is His flesh, for the life of the world.

We take the view that the discourse in question does not relate directly to the Eucharist. But it does not do so only because it expresses the larger idea of which the Eucharist is a particular concrete embodiment, the one leading embodiment which Christ has bequeathed to His Church. As there is a communion with Him which is wider than—though it culminates in—that which we call κατ' ἐξοχήν, the Holy Communion, so is there a sense in which He is the Bread from heaven, which is wider than that in which He is given through the sacramental Bread, but it is that bread of which He said, 'This is my Body, which is for you.'

The parallelism between Jn 6[51] and 1 Co 11[24] (cf. Mk 14[24] ‖) is so close that we are certainly justified in interpreting the words of institution in the manner in which the Sacrament itself is interpreted by both St. Paul and St. John.

No writer has brought out this aspect of the Supper as signifying primarily the spiritual assimilation of Christ more forcibly than Spitta. But when he goes on to maintain that the Eucharist has no relation to His death, it is sheer paradox, which can be maintained only by the most arbitrary methods.

The assimilation of Christ does not exhaust the meaning of the Sacrament. If we take the words of institution as they stand, another idea is even more prominent. We have seen that there is considerable doubt as to how far the Last Supper is to be identified with the Paschal meal. St. Paul describes the Death of Christ as the Christian Passover (1 Co 5^{7}), and not only he but other NT writers apply to that Death the language of Sacrifice. But the particular sacrifice with which our Lord's own words most directly connect it is the sacrifice, or group of sacrifices, which inaugurated the Covenant (Ex 24^{4-8}). As the sprinkling of the blood upon the altar of God and upon the people ratified the covenant between Israel and Israel's God, so (it was implied) by partaking of the consecrated symbol of the Blood of Christ the Christian had brought home to him his share in the new Covenant—a covenant which had at once its inestimable privileges and its obligations. It was the means of admission to the state of Divine favour, and it bound over those who were admitted to that favour to a life of loyal service. Here, too, if we want a comment on the words of institution, we may seek it rightly in the later NT writings. For words could not well be more strongly attested than those which accompany the giving of the bread and of the cup, and together they converge upon a root-idea which is expanded most directly in He 9^{18-28}, but is also illustrated by Ro $3^{24f.}$ $5^{1f.}$ $8^{1ff.}$, Eph 1^{7}, 1 P 1^{19}, 1 Jn 1^{7} 2^{2}, Rev 1^{5}.

If we start from the idea of the death of Christ as a Sacrifice, then it lies near at hand to conceive of the Sacrament as the sacred meal which follows the sacrifice. In this there would be combined the universal and immemorial significance of such meals as an act of communion at once with the Deity worshipped and of the worshippers with each other. This double communion, under this aspect of the sacrificial meal, seems clearly indicated in 1 Co $10^{16f.\ 21}$, but it is also suggested by the words of institution, taken with the distribution of the elements of bread and wine, and the stress which is laid upon the general participation ('Drink ye all,' 'they all drank').

(5) Critical Theories.—A common feature in recent critical theories respecting the Last Supper is the denial that the command, 'This do in remembrance of me,' formed part of the original institution; or, in other words, that the particular circumstances which marked this solemn parting meal were meant to be repeated in the form of a permanent Sacrament. This view was put forward about the same time, and, it is probable, independently, in England by Dr. P. Gardner (The Origin of the Lord's Supper, London, 1893), and in Germany by Jülicher in the vol. of essays in honour of Weizsäcker (Theol. Abhandl. etc., Freiburg i. B. 1892), and by Spitta (Zur Gesch. u. Lit. d. Urchristentums, Göttingen, 1893). The English writer is the most thoroughgoing. Assuming the correctness of the WH text of Lk $22^{19.\ 20}$, St. Paul is left as the sole authority for the express command of repetition. It is then argued from the phrasing of 1 Co 11^{23} 'I received of the Lord,' that the whole account belongs to one of St. Paul's ecstatic revelations, and has not a solid historical foundation. In default of this it is thought that the apostle had been influenced during his stay at Corinth by the near proximity of the Eleusinian mysteries, the central point in which 'appears to have been a sacred repast of which the initiated partook, and by means of which they had communion with the gods' (p. 18).

How St. Paul could confuse such subtle external influences with a revelation 'from the Lord,' and how he came to deliver as authoritative instructions to the Corinthians what he had (upon the theory) only himself acquired during his stay at Corinth, are only incidental questions. We cannot tell precisely how St. Paul received his knowledge in such a sense that he could refer it to the Lord. But the solemn simplicity of phrase reads like history, and, so far as other authorities exist, it is completely verified. In any case, it is incredible that a usage which is thus treated as practically the invention of St. Paul could have spread from an outlying Gentile Church over the whole of Christendom. We cannot doubt that not only the Synoptic version of the Supper, but its repetition as a Sacrament, had their origin in the Mother Church. The κλάσις τοῦ ἄρτου of Ac $2^{42.\ 43}$ is an indication of this, which is confirmed by the evidence of Ignatius, Justin, and the Didaché. Spitta's theory, that the repeated Sacrament was due, not to a command of Christ Himself, but to the spontaneous instinct of affectionate recollection among His disciples, is more possible, but still gratuitous and hypercritical. We may not allege the witness of St. Luke himself in confirmation of St. Paul, but, as we have already seen (p. 636 sup.), the familiar text of his Gospel is no less valid evidence of the common belief and practice.

Of the critical theories respecting the origin of the Eucharist, that which we have just mentioned is the most important. Harnack's contention, that it was sometimes administered with water instead of wine, not only here and there among the sects, but in the main body of the Church, belongs rather to the history of the Early Church than to the Life of our Lord. It turns, however, upon a somewhat cavalier treatment of the text of Justin, and has met with strong opposition and (it is believed) practically no acceptance.

LITERATURE.—A summary may be given of the more recent special literature to most of which reference has been made. Lobstein, La Doctrine de la Cène, Lausanne, 1889; a lucid exposition dating from the time before the rise of the newer theories. A reasonable criticism may go back to it with advantage. Harnack, TU VII. ii., 1891 (replies by Zahn, Brot u. Wein, Leipzig, 1892; Jülicher, as below; Headlam, Class. Rev. 1893, p. 63); Jülicher in *Theol. Bp. Wordsworth's Visitation Addresses on The Holy Communion (2nd ed. 1892), though written before the controversy and dealing largely with the liturgical aspect of the question, may be specially commended to English readers.

v. The Resurrection.—For our present purpose the discussion of the Resurrection of our Lord will resolve itself into a consideration of (1) the evidence attesting the fact; (2) the sequence of the events, or the appearances which followed the Resurrection; (3) the explanations which have been put forward to account for the Resurrection without miracle; (4) its doctrinal significance.

(1) The Attestation.—A fact so stupendous as the Resurrection needs to be supported by strong evidence, and very strong evidence both as regards quantity and quality is forthcoming; but all parts of it are not of equal value, and it is well that the authorities should be compared with each other and critically estimated.

When this is done one piece of evidence drops almost entirely to the rear—the concluding verses of St. Mark. This is not invalidated merely by the fact that the verses were probably not part of the original Gospel. Since Mr. Conybeare's discovery of the Armenian MS, which appears to refer them to the 'presbyter Ariston' or 'Aristion,' it is fair to attach that name to them, because, although the authority is but slender, there is nothing at all to compete with it; and the Aristion mentioned by Eusebius (HE iii. 39) as one of the 'elders' consulted by Papias, would suit the conditions as well as any one else belonging to the same generation (say A.D. 100–125). Such an authority cannot be wholly without weight; if it represented a distinct line of tradition, its weight would be considerable. But when the verses Mk 16^{9-20} are examined, it seems pretty clear that the earlier portion of them is really a summary of the narratives in the extant Gospels of St. Luke and St. John, and therefore adds nothing to these Gospels beyond such further sanction as the name of Aristion may give to them. It is proof that the statements in those Gospels were accepted as satisfactory by a prominent Church teacher, himself a depositary of tradition, in the region where St. John had been active. So much the verses contribute, but not more.

There is still some mystery hanging over the close of the Second Gospel. The most probable view appears to be that its original conclusion has been lost—it is more likely than not—by some purely mechanical accident. The fragment that remains, Mk 16^{1-8}, is insufficient to enable us to trace it to its source. If we could be sure that it was complete, we should have to say that St. Mark was not here drawing upon the Petrine tradition, because that tradition could not have failed to speak of the appearance to Peter himself. It is, however, possible that that was contained in the missing portion.

This may detract somewhat from the weight of the common Synopt. narrative, which is here disappointingly meagre. And yet, if we are to throw the absence of any mark of Petrine origin into the one scale, there is a little bit of confirmatory evidence which it is fair to throw into the other. All through the history of the Passion St. Luke has access to a special source, which we may well believe to have been oral, but which gave him some items of good information. This information relates especially to the court of Herod Antipas (Lk 23^{7-12}), and it is natural to connect it with the particular mention of 'Joanna the wife of Chuza, Herod's steward' in Lk 8^{3}. Now this very same Joanna appears again in St. Luke's account of the visit of the women to the sepulchre (Lk 24^{10}). The rest of the paragraph appears to be based as usual upon St. Mark. But the renewed mention of Joanna is an indication of the special source, which at least goes to show that there was nothing in that source which conflicted with the Marcan document. In other words, it confirms that document by a distinct line of testimony (cf. Lk 23^{21-24}).

Is it not possible that the story of the Walk to Emmaus has a like origin? The name Cleopas (=Cleopatros) is just such as we should expect to find in the same Herodian circle. In any case, the source bears other marks of being a good one. It gives a graphic picture of the dejection through which the disciples passed; and the phrase 'we hoped that it was he which should redeem Israel' points back to a time before the dreams of national triumph had been purified of the grosser element in them. But most striking of all is the direct confirmation by St. Paul (1 Co 15^{5}) of another very incidental reference, the appearance to Peter (Lk 23^{34}). Not only does St. Paul confirm the fact, but he puts it practically in the same place in the series.

We have, then, every reason to think both that the special source used by St. Luke was excellent in itself, and also that it agreed in substance with the fragmentary record of St. Mark.

If St. Luke thus reaches a hand in one direction towards St. Mark, he does so in another direction towards St. John. For the appearance of Lk $24^{36ff.}$ corresponds to that of Jn $20^{19ff.}$; and both alike receive the seal of authentication from St. Paul (1 Cor 15^{5}). We may not, for the reason given above, use Mk 16^{9} in ratification of Jn $20^{11ff.}$. We note, however, that the incident of St. Thomas is a striking concrete illustration of the disbelief on which so many of our authorities lay stress.* For the rest, the narrative in the Fourth Gospel must go with the problem as to that Gospel generally. It has found a vigorous recent defender in Dr. Loofs (Die Auferstehungsberichte und ihr Wert, Leipzig, 1898).

The peculiar element in Mt might have seemed to possess the lowest claim to acceptance, were it not for the singular convergence of proof that something like the injunction of Mt 28^{19} must have been given, or most probably was given, by our Lord Himself (see p. 624 sup.; also p. 651). We believe that for this paragraph, too, there is solid foundation.

And yet the Resurrection is a part of the evangelical narrative for which the leading witness is, after all, not the Gospels, but St. Paul—the double witness of what St. Paul says and what he implies. It is hardly possible for testimony to be stronger than this is. In the same precise and deliberate manner in which he had rehearsed the particulars of the Last Supper, St. Paul enumerates one by one the leading appearances of the Lord after the Resurrection: (1) to Peter, (2) to the Twelve (as a body), (3) to an assembly of more than five hundred, (4) to James, (5) to all the apostles (1 Co 15^{5-7}).

We have spoken of these as the 'leading' appearances, because St. Paul doubtless has in view, not all who under any circumstances 'saw the Lord,' but those who were specially chosen and commissioned to be witnesses of the Resurrection (Ac 1^{22} 4^{33}, cf. 1 Co 15^{15}), i.e. as we should say, to assert and preach it publicly. For this reason there would be nothing in St. Paul's list to exclude such an appearance as that to Mary Magdalene (Jn 20^{11-18}). It may have been on this ground—because the two disciples involved were not otherwise conspicuous as active preachers or prominent leaders—that St. Paul does not mention the scene on the road to Emmaus. But it is equally possible that the story of this had not reached him.

We have seen by what a striking coincidence this story confirms, from a wholly independent quarter, the first appearance to Peter. The next in order, that to the Twelve, may well be identical with that which is more exactly described in Lk $24^{33ff.}$, Jn 20^{19-24}. The appearance to James is attested by another line of tradition embodied in the Gospel according to the Hebrews. Beyond this identifications are uncertain.

St. Paul contents himself with a bare enumeration, not from lack of knowledge, but because he assumes knowledge in his readers. He reminds the Corinthians of what he had delivered unto them first of all (ἐν πρώτοις, i.e. at the very beginning of his ministry among them). This throws back the date of the evidence some four years—we may say from the year 55 to 51, possibly earlier, but at the latest from 57 to 53.

We are thus brought to much the same date as that of another piece of evidence, not so detailed as that in 1 Co, but quite as explicit, so far as the fact of the Resurrection is concerned, the evidence of the first extant NT writing, 1 Th 1^{10} 4^{14}. The assured tone of these passages shows, not only that the apostle is speaking from the very strongest personal conviction, but that he is confident of carrying his readers with him; we may go further and say that the belief to which he gives this expression was unquestioned, the universal belief of Christians. We might infer this from the attitude of St. Paul in regard to it. Unfortunately, we have no evidence equally early from the Church of Palestine; but as soon as evidence begins to appear it is all to the same effect. The early chapters of Ac no doubt represent a Palestinian tradition, perhaps a written tradition; and they take the same line as St. Paul in making it the chief function of the apostles to bear witness to the Resurrection (Ac $1^{8.\ 22}$ etc.). We need not pursue this evidence further.

* This trait is not less authentic because it passed over from primary documents into secondary (such as the Coptic work discovered by Carl Schmidt and commented upon by Harnack in Theol. Studien B. Weiss dargebracht). It really does throw into relief, and the early disciples saw that it threw into relief, the revulsion of feeling on the part of the witnesses to the Resurrection and the strength of their conviction. Otherwise Harnack, p. 8, and Loofs, p. 21.

It is noticeable that although there were doubts in the Apostolic Age on the subject of resurrection (1 Co 15^{12}, 2 Ti $2^{17ff.}$), it is not as to the resurrection of Christ, but as to that of Christians. St. Paul argues on the assumption that Christ was really raised as from a premiss common to himself and his opponents.

And it is no less noticeable that even the most rationalistic of Christian sects, those (e.g.) which denied the Virgin-Birth, nevertheless shared the belief in the Resurrection (Irenæus, adv. Hær. I. xxvi. 1, 2 [where non before similiter should be expunged]; Hippolytus, Ref. Hær. vii. 35).

(2) The Sequence and Scene of the Events.—It is not an exaggeration—it is only putting in words the impression left by the facts—to say that the conviction among Christians that Christ was really raised, dates from the very morrow of the Resurrection itself. It was not a growth spread over a long period and receiving gradual accretions of strength; but it sprang suddenly into existence, and it swept irresistibly over the whole body of disciples. Of the force and universality of the belief there can be no doubt; but when we come to details it would seem that from the first there was a certain amount of confusion, which was never wholly cleared up. We have records of a number of appearances, not all contained in a single authority, but scattered over several distinct authorities; and it is probable enough that even when all the recorded appearances are put together they would not exhaust all those that were experienced. Different traditions must have circulated in different quarters, and specimens of these traditions have come down to us without being digested into accordance with a single type. The list which approaches most nearly to this character, that which is given by St. Paul in 1 Co, is, as we have seen, not so much a digest as a selection. It is a selection made for purposes of preaching, and consisting of items which had already been used for this purpose. Compared with this, a story like the Walk to Emmaus is such as might have come out of private memoirs. The brief record in St. Mark is more central, but in its present condition it is too mutilated to satisfy curiosity. The narrative of St. John is no less authoritative than that of St. Paul, but it is authority of a rather different kind. St. Paul writes as the active practical missionary, who seeks to communicate the fire of his own conviction to others. St. John also wishes to spread conviction (Jn 20^{31}), but he does so by bringing forth the stores of long and intense recollections from his own breast. He too selects what had taken the most personal hold upon him, and does not try to cover the whole ground.

It is as a consequence of these conditions that when we come to look into the narratives of the Resurrection we find them unassimilated and unharmonized. It is not exactly easy to fit them into each other. The most important difference is as to the chief scene of the appearances. Was it Jerusalem and the neighbourhood, or was it Galilee? The authorities are divided. St. Paul and the Gospel according to the Hebrews make no mention of locality. Mt and Mk throw the stress upon Galilee. The latter Gospel does not indeed (in the genuine portion) record a Galilæan appearance, but the women are bidden to say that the risen Lord would meet the disciples in Galilee (Mk 16^{7}). This is in fulfilment of a promise to the same effect given in the course of the Last Supper, and recorded in the same two Gospels (Mk 14^{28}, Mt 26^{32}). The express mention of prediction and fulfilment in both Gospels not only proves their presence in the common original, but also shows that they were no accidental feature in that original, but an essential part of the whole conception. We have besides a Galilæan appearance described in Jn 21, and clearly implied at the point where the fragment of the Gospel of Peter breaks off (Ev. Pet. § 12 [60]).

On the other hand, all the scenes of Jn 20 are laid in Jerusalem; and Jerus. or the neighbourhood is the only locality recognized in Lk 24, which ends with a command to the disciples to wait in the city for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit (Lk 24^{49}).

It is not unnatural that the critical school should regard these two versions as alternatives, one of which only can be taken. The more usual course has been to follow that of Mk and Mt, with or without the supposition that the grave was really found empty (Loofs, p. 18 ff.). According as this assumption was made or not, several constructions were possible, but all equally speculative.

Dr. Loofs has, however, recently argued in favour of the other tradition represented by Lk–Jn 20. And he has certainly succeeded in showing that there is as much intrinsic probability on this side as on the other. But, in order to carry out this theory, he is obliged to treat Jn 21 as having a different origin from the rest of the Gospel, and as falling into two parts, one of which (the fishing scene = Lk 5^{1-11}) has got misplaced, not having originally belonged to the period after the Resurrection, while the other (the dialogue of Jn 21^{15-23}) had originally nothing to connect it with Galilee. These are strong measures, which, however high our estimate of the tradition, Lk–Jn, are obviously not open to one who thinks that the identity of style between Jn 21 and the rest of the Gospel is too great to permit of their separation (the argument in Expos. 1892, i. 380 ff., may easily be extended to ch. 21).

The only remaining course is to combine the traditions, much as they seem to be combined in the Fourth Gospel and the Gospel of Peter. We must not disguise from ourselves the difficulties which this solution leaves. The most serious of these are caused by the command of Lk 24^{49}, and the contracted space within which we shall have to compress the events in Galilee. We have only 40 days to dispose of, in all, if we accept the traditional date of the Ascension,—and even if we regarded this as a round number, the nearness of the Day of Pentecost would allow us very little more margin. From these Forty Days we should have to take off a week at the beginning on account of Jn 20^{26}. And if, as we reasonably may, we suppose that there has been some foreshortening in Lk 24^{36-53}, and that two or three distinct occasions are treated as if they were continuous, we should still, to find a place for the injunction to wait in Jerus., have to cut off another like period at the end. That would not leave much more than three weeks for the retirement to Galilee and return to Jerus.—a length of time which cannot be pronounced wholly insufficient, but which does not fit in quite naturally with the way in which the apostles are described in Jn 21^3 as returning to their ordinary occupations. These difficulties would be avoided if we could regard the Day of Pentecost as that of the following year; but any such hypothesis would conflict directly with Ac 1^8, and the interval implied in Jn 21^{14} * is also a short one.

Whichever way we turn difficulties meet us, which the documents to which we have access do not enable us to remove. We have said enough as to the nature of these documents, and of the lines of tradition to which they give expression. It is not what we could wish, but what we have. And no difficulty of weaving the separate incidents into an orderly well-compacted narrative can impugn the unanimous belief of the Church which lies behind them, that the Lord Jesus Christ rose from the dead on the third day and appeared to the disciples.

(3) Attempted Explanations. — This universal belief is the root fact which has to be accounted for. It would be the natural product of a real event such as the Epistles assume and the Gospels describe. But what if the event were not real? In that case the widely held and deeply planted belief in it must needs constitute a very serious problem.

In the present century a succession of efforts have been made to account for the belief in the Resurrection without accepting it as a fact. Many of the hypotheses put forward with this object may be regarded as practically obsolete and abandoned. No one now believes that the supposed death was really only a swoon, and that the body laid in the tomb afterwards revived, and was seen more than once by the disciples (on this see a trenchant sentence by Strauss, Leben Jesu, 1863, p. 298, end of paragraph). Equally inadmissible is the hypothesis of fraud—that the body was really taken away by Joseph of Arimathæa or Nicodemus, and that the rumour was allowed to grow that Jesus was risen. The lingering trace of this which survives in Renan, Les Apôtres, ed. 13, p. 16 ('ceux qui savaient le secret de la disposition du corps') is thrown in quite by the way as a subordinate detail.

More persistent is the theory of 'visions.' This has been presented in different forms, assigning the leading part now to one and now to another of the disciples. Renan, who goes his own way among critics, sees in this part of the narrative a marked superiority of the Fourth Gospel (Les Apôtres, p. 9). In accordance with it he refers the beginning of the series to Mary Magdalene (cf. Strauss, Leben Jesu, 1863, p. 309). A woman out of whom had been cast 'seven devils' might well, he thinks, have been thrown into a state of nervous tension and excitement which would give form and substance to the creations of fancy. And when once the report had got abroad that the Lord had been seen, it would be natural for others to suppose that they saw Him. Strauss and Pfleiderer (Giff. Lect. pp. 112, 149) start rather from the case of St. Paul. Both lay stress upon the fact that he places the appearance to himself on a level with those to the older disciples. His own vision they would agree in explaining as due to a species of epileptic seizure, and the others they would regard as equally subjective, though led up to by different trains of psychological preparation.

It is at this point that some of the best attested details of the Resurrection interpose difficulties. To carry through a consistent theory of visions, two conditions are necessary. (a) If they arose, as Strauss supposes, from affectionate dwelling upon the personality of Jesus, combined with reflexion upon certain passages of OT (Ps 16^{10}, Is $53^{10\text{-}12}$), it follows, almost of necessity, that we must also with Strauss throw over the tradition of the 'third day,' and regard the belief as the outcome of a somewhat prolonged process—a process spread over weeks and months rather than days. (b) On the other hand, if we must discard the tradition as to the beginning of the appearances, we must equally discard that as to their end. The wave of feverish enthusiasm to which on this hypothesis they owed their origin, certainly would not have subsided in the interval between Passover and Pentecost. We note, as it is, an ascending scale in the appearances—they occur first to individuals (Mary Magdalene, Peter, the Emmaus disciples), then to the Ten and the Eleven, then to the Five Hundred. We can see how one appearance prepares the way for another. St. Peter (e.g.) must have been present at three or four. With this increasing weight of testimony, and increasing predisposition in the minds of the disciples, we should naturally expect that the appearance to the Five Hundred would contain within itself the germs of an indefinite series. We should not have been surprised if the whole body alike of Christians and of half Christians had caught the contagion. But that is not the case. There is just the single appearance to James; and then—the vision of St. Paul standing rather by itself—with one more appearance to the assembled apostles, the list comes to what seems an abrupt end.

This description of the facts rests on excellent evidence. The 'third day' is hardly less firmly rooted in the tradition of the Church than the Resurrection itself. We have it not only in the speech ascribed to St. Peter (Ac 10^{40}), but in the central testimony of St. Paul, and then in the oldest form of the Apostles' Creed. It is strange that so slight a detail should have been preserved at all, and still stranger that it should hold the place it does in the standard of the Church's faith. We must needs regard it as original. And for the circumscribed area of the appearances, we have at once the positive evidence of the canonical documents, and a remarkable silence on the part of the extra-canonical.

These phenomena are difficult to reconcile with a theory of purely subjective visions. An honest inquirer like Keim felt the difficulty so strongly that, while regarding the appearances as essentially of the nature of visions, he held them to be not merely subjective, but divinely caused, for the express purpose of creating the belief in which they issued.

This is the least that must be asserted. A belief that has had such incalculably momentous results must have had an adequate cause. No apparition, no mere hallucination of the senses, ever yet moved the world. But we may doubt whether the theory, even as Keim presents it, is adequate or really called for. It belongs to the process of so trimming down the elements that we call supernatural in the Gospel narratives as to bring them within the limits of everyday experience. But that process, we must needs think, has failed. The facts are too obstinate, the evidence for them is too strong; and the measures which we apply are too narrow and bounded. It is better to keep substantially the form which a sound tradition has handed down to us, even though its contents in some degree pass our comprehension.

* The numbering of this Galilæan appearance as the 'third' might seem to be at variance with St. Paul's list in 1 Co 15; but it is clear that the appearances which St. John enumerates were those to the body of 'the disciples' (i.e. primarily, to a group including the apostles). He himself does not count that to Mary Magdalene; nor would he have counted those to St. Peter or the Emmaus travellers.

(4) The Permanent Significance of the Resurrection.—The innermost nature of the Resurrection is hidden from us. And if we ask why the supreme proof that God had visited His people took this particular form, the answer we can give is but partial. Some things, however, seem to stand out clearly.

(a) In the first place it is obvious that the idea of a resurrection was present to men's minds. Herod thought that the works of Jesus were works of the Baptist restored to life (Mk $6^{14.16}$ ‖). Men were quite prepared to see Elijah or some other of the ancient prophets reappear upon the scene (Mk 9^{11-13} ‖, Jn 1^{21}). In Palestine and among the circles in which Christianity arose, no mark of special divine indwelling seemed at the time so natural. The belief had not been allowed to grow up without a reason.

For (b) from the very first the ideas of bodily and spiritual resurrection were closely intertwined together. Perhaps the oldest passage in which there is a hint of such an idea is the vision of Ezekiel (ch. 37); and there the revivification of the body is the symbol of a spiritual revival. This intimate connexion of bodily and spiritual is never lost sight of in Christianity.

(c) 'Die to live' is one of the most fundamental of Christian principles, and this principle is embodied once for all in the Resurrection. If the one side was 'placarded' before the eyes of the world (Gal 3^{1}) in the Crucifixion, the Resurrection was a no less signal manifestation of the other. There is a double strain of inference and application.

(d) On the one hand, the Resurrection of Christ was the pledge and earnest of physical resurrection and the life beyond the grave. St. Paul founds upon it the hope of immortality (1 Th 4^{14}, Ro 8^{34}, 1 Co 6^{14} $15^{12ff.}$, 2 Co 4^{14} etc.).

(e) But he equally founds upon it the most earnest exhortations to holiness of life. It is not only that this follows for the Christian as a duty: if his relation to Christ is a right relation, it is included in it as a necessity (Ro 6^{3-6}). St. Paul can hardly think of the physical Resurrection apart from the spiritual. And there is a very similar vein in the teaching of St. John (Jn 5^{24}, 1 Jn 3^{14}). The Resurrection is the corner-stone of Christian mysticism.

(f) In another aspect, as a divine act, the crowning mark of divine approval, it is a necessary complement of the Crucifixion. It supplies the proof, which the world might desiderate, that the Sacrifice of the Cross was accepted. If the death of the Cross was a dying for human sin, the rising again from the tomb was the seal of forgiveness and justification (Ro 4^{25}, cf. 6^{7}). St. Paul saw in it an assurance that the doors of the divine mercy were thrown open wide; and to St. Peter in like manner it was through it that mankind was begotten again to a 'lively hope' (1 P 1^{3}).

All this mass of biblical teaching hangs together. If the Resurrection was a reality it has a solid nucleus, which would be wanting even to the theory of objective visions. The economy which begins with a physical Incarnation, naturally and appropriately ends with a physical Resurrection. Thus much we can see, though we may feel that this is not all.

LITERATURE.—Besides the recent literature mentioned above (among which the paper by Dr. Loofs deserves rather special attention), and besides the treatment of the subject in numerous works on the Gospel History and on Apologetics, it is well to remember two monographs in English—Dr. Westcott's Gospel of the Resurrection (first pub. in 1866), and the late Dr. Milligan's The Resurrection of our Lord (first pub. in 1881).

vi. The Ascension.—The Resurrection in itself was incomplete. It was not the goal, but the way to the goal. The goal was the return of the Son to the Father, with His mission accomplished, His work done.

(1) The apostolic writers unanimously represent this return as a triumph. The keynote is struck in the speech which is put into the mouth of St. Peter on the day of Pentecost* (Ac 2^{33-36}). It would seem that the form of expression which the conception assumed was influenced largely by Ps 110^{1}, a passage to which attention had been drawn by our Lord Himself shortly before His departure, and which spontaneously recurred to the mind as soon as the nature of His return to the Father had declared itself. Along with this would be recalled the saying with which our Lord had answered the challenge of the high priest (Mk 14^{62} ‖). Psalm and saying alike represented the Messiah as seated 'at the right hand' of the Most High. This phrase appears to have at once (in the forms ἐκ δεξιῶν and ἐν δεξιᾷ) established itself in the language of the primitive Church: it occurs repeatedly, not only in the Acts ($7^{55f.}$) and in the Pauline Epp., but in He, 1 P, and Rev; and, like the detail of the 'third day,' it occupies a fixed place in the Apostles' Creed.

The speech of St. Peter culminates in the declaration, 'Let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God hath made him, whom ye crucified, both Lord and Christ' (Ac 2^{36}); and it is substantially a paraphrase of this when in a famous passage St. Paul, after speaking of the humiliation of the Christ, adds, 'Wherefore also God highly exalted him, and gave unto him the name which is above every name, that in the name of Jesus every knee should bow,' etc. (Ph $2^{9f.}$). The return of the Son to the Father was not merely the resumption of a previous state of glory (Jn 6^{62} 17^{5} etc.), it was the resumption of it with the added approval and recognition which His obedience unto death had called forth. We speak of these things κατὰ ἄνθρωπον; or rather, we are content to echo in regard to them the language of the apostles and of the first Christians, who themselves spoke κατὰ ἄνθρωπον. The reality lies behind the veil.

(2) How did our Lord Jesus Christ enter upon this state of exaltation? Now that we have before us corrected texts of the Gospels, it would seem to be probable that they did not give an answer to this question. The answer was reserved for the second volume which St. Luke addressed to Theophilus; it forms the opening section of the Acts of the Apostles.

Mk 16^{19} belongs to the Appendix to the Gospel, which we have seen (p. 638 f. sup.) to have been probably composed, not by St. Mark himself, but by the presbyter Aristion in the early years of the 2nd cent. The reading of Lk 24^{51} stands thus—

Καὶ ἀνεφέρετο εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν, ℵ^{c} ABCLXΔΑΠ, etc., c f q Vulg. Syrr. (Pesh.-Harcl.-Hier.) rell., Cyr-Alex. Aug. 1/2.

Om. ℵ*D, a b e ff$_2$ Syr.-Sin., Aug. 1/2.

This means that the omission of the words is a primitive Western reading, which in this case is probably right: it was a natural gloss to explain the parting of the Lord from the disciples of the Ascension; there was no similar temptation to omit the words if genuine.

In Ac 1^{1-11} the final separation is described as an 'ascent unto heaven.' When the last instructions had been given, the disciples saw their Lord 'taken up (ἐπήρθη), and a cloud received him out of their sight.' The over-arching sky is a standing symbol for the abode of God; and the return of the Son to the Father was naturally represented as a retreat

* When we ask how these early discoveries were transmitted to the writer of Acts, there is a natural reluctance to use them too strictly as representing the exact words spoken. And yet, taken as a whole, they fit in singularly well to the order of development and the thought of the primitive community, which has an antecedent verisimilitude, and accords best with indications in the Pauline Epistles.

within its blue recesses, the ethereal home of light and glory. It is sometimes necessary that a symbol should be acted as well as written or spoken. The disciples were aware of a vanishing, and they knew that their Lord must be where His Father was.

That the narrative in the Acts is not a myth seems proved by an authentic little touch which it contains, a veritable reminiscence of what we may be sure was their real attitude at the moment, though it soon ceased to be. When they asked, 'Lord, dost thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?' their thoughts were still running in the groove of the old Jewish expectation. It is the last trace of them that we have in this naïve form.

(3) From the point of view of Christian doctrine, for those who not only accept the facts of the life of Christ but the construction put on those facts by the writers of NT, the main stress of the Ascension lies upon the state to which it forms the entrance. (a) It is the guarantee for the continued existence of Him who became incarnate for our sakes. (b) It not only guarantees His continued existence, but the continued effect of His work. It puts the seal of the divine approval upon all that the Incarnation accomplished. It is the final confirmation of the lessons of the Baptism and of the Transfiguration, 'This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.' (c) The primitive phrase 'at the right hand of God' describes as nearly and as simply as human language can describe the double truth that Christ still is and that His work still is, that the Incarnation was no transient episode, but a permanent and decisive factor in the dealing of God with man. (d) This truth is stated in other words in the doctrine of the High Priesthood of Christ, a doctrine implicitly contained in many places in the writings of St. Paul, and worked out with great clearness and fulness in Ep. to Hebrews. There is something in the relation of the exalted Son to the Father and to His Church corresponding to and that may be expressed in terms of the functions of the earthly high priest in relation to God and to Israel. The great High Priest presents the prayers of His people; He intercedes for them; He 'pleads' or 'presents' His own sacrifice. Only, when we use this language it should be remembered that we are not speaking of 'specific acts done or words spoken by Christ in His glory. His glorified presence is an eternal presentation; He pleads by what He is' (Moberly, Ministerial Priesthood, p. 246 n.).

LITERATURE.—Dr. Milligan left a volume on the Ascension as a pendant to that on the Resurrection (Baird Lectures for 1891), which is the most comprehensive treatment of the subject in English.

III. SUPPLEMENTAL MATTER: THE NATIVITY AND INFANCY.—Throughout His public ministry Jesus passed for the son of Joseph and Mary, two peasants of Nazareth. Some of those who were present at the long discourse in the synagogue at Capernaum expressed their astonishment at the high pretensions which it seemed to contain, by asking, 'Is not this Jesus, the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know?' (Jn 6^{4}; cf. 1^{45}). The inhabitants of Nazareth appear to have put a similar question when He came and preached there. The exact words are somewhat differently transmitted. Mk 6^{3} has (in the better attested text), 'Is not this the carpenter?' Mt 13^{55} 'Is not this the carpenter's son?' Lk 4^{23} a passage which, although divergent, contains reminiscences of the same original, has still more directly, 'Is not this Joseph's son?' In the preliminary chapters the same evangelist speaks repeatedly of 'his parents' (γονεῖς, Lk $2^{27.\ 41.\ 43}$). And not only does he himself resolve this into 'his father and his mother' (2^{33}), but he makes the mother of Jesus say, 'Thy father and I sought thee sorrowing' (2^{48}).

It is in keeping with this language that both the First and the Third Gospels place in their forefront genealogies of Jesus, which, in spite of many attempts to prove the contrary, must be admitted to trace His descent through Joseph and not through Mary.

Yet, on the other hand, the same two Gospels, though differing widely in the details of the narrative, assert unequivocally that Joseph had no share in the parentage of Jesus, and that the place of a human father was taken by the direct action of the Spirit of God. The differences show that the two traditions are independent of each other; and yet both converge upon this one point. They agree not only in representing Jesus as born of a virgin, but also in representing this fact as supernaturally announced beforehand,—in the one case to Joseph, in the other case to Mary.

What account is to be given of these seeming inconsistencies? We cannot get rid of them by assigning the opposed statements to different sources. In St. Matthew the genealogy which ends in Joseph is followed immediately by the narrative of the Annunciation and Virgin-Birth. In St. Luke the successive sections of ch. 2, which begins with the Nativity and ends with the scene of the boy Jesus in the Temple, where we have seen that such expressions as 'his parents,' 'his father and mother' occur so freely, are linked together by the recurrent note, 'Mary kept all these sayings, pondering them in her heart,' 'his mother kept all these sayings in her heart' (Lk $2^{19.\ 51}$; cf. also the argument which Prof. Ramsay skilfully draws from 1^{80} $2^{40.\ 52}$*). And when we turn to St. John we cannot but remember that the Gospel which records so frankly the Jews' question, 'Is not this Jesus, the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know?' if it nowhere refers directly to the Virgin-Birth, yet goes further than any other Gospel in asserting the pre-existence of the Son as God with God.

What we regard as inconsistent will clear itself up best if we consider the order of events and the way in which these preliminary stages of the history were gradually brought to the consciousness of the Church.

The sources from which the knowledge of them was derived were, without doubt, private.† We shall consider presently the character of these sources. We know more about that of which use was made by St. Luke than of that used by St. Matthew, and we can rely upon it as a historical authority with greater confidence. We shall see that it is ultimately traceable to the Virgin herself, in all probability through the little circle of women who were for some time in her company.

We are told expressly that the Virgin Mary 'kept all these sayings (or things) in her heart.' She, if any one, might well say, μυστήριον ἐμὸν ἐμοί. It was only by slow degrees in the intimacy of confidential intercourse that she allowed her secret to pass beyond herself, and to become known. Even if committed to writing before it came into the hands of St. Luke, it probably did not reach any wide public until it was embodied in his Gospel. The place which the Virgin-Birth occupies in Ignatius and in the Creed seems to show that it cannot have been much later than the middle of the century before the knowledge of it made its way to the headquarters of Christianity. But before some such date as that there is no reason to think that it was generally known. It was no part of our Lord's own teaching. The neighbours among whom His early life was passed, the changing crowds who witnessed His miracles or gathered round Him to hear Him, had never had it proclaimed to them. 'Jesus son of Joseph, the prophet of Nazareth,' was the common name by which He was known. And it is a great presumption of the historical truth of the Gospels that they so simply and naturally reflect this language. We may well believe that the language was shared, as the ignorance which caused it was shared, even by the Twelve themselves. It would be very fitting if the channel through which these sacred things first came to the ears of the Church was a little group of women.*

* Was Christ born at Bethlehem? p. 87.

† 'Luke gives, from knowledge gained within the family, an account of facts known only to the family, and in part to the Mother alone' (Ramsay, op. cit. p. 79). Prof. Ramsay, however, seems to go too far in contrasting Mt with Lk when he says, 'Matthew gives the public account, that which was generally known during the Saviour's life and after His death.' We do not think that any account was known during the Saviour's life, and we prefer to think of the Matthæan version as parallel to rather than contrasted with the Lucan.

i. The Sources of the Narrative.—It has often been observed that whereas the first two chapters of St. Matthew appear to be written from the point of view of Joseph, the first two chapters of St. Luke are written from the point of view of Mary. In Mt the Annunciation is made to Joseph; it is Joseph who is bidden in a dream not to fear to take to him his wife; Joseph who is told what the Son whom she is to bear is to be called. It is Joseph, again, who is warned to take the young Child and His mother into Egypt, and who, when the danger is past, receives the command to return; and it is Joseph also whose anxious care is the cause that the family settle in Galilee and not in Judæa. On the other hand, when we turn to St. Luke the prominent figures at first are the two kinswomen, Elisabeth the mother of John the Baptist, and Mary. Mary herself receives the announcement of the holy thing that is to be born of her. The Magnificat is her song of thanksgiving. She treasures in her heart the sayings of the shepherds and of her Divine Son. The aged Simeon points his prophecy to her, and foretells that a sword should pierce through her soul.

In regard to the Matthæan document we are in the dark. The curious gravitation of statement towards Joseph has a reason; but beyond this there is not much that we can say. It would not follow that the immediate source of the narrative was very near his person. In the case of Lk we can see farther down the vista. We have already had grounds for connecting the source from which he draws ultimately with the Mother of Jesus. Through what channel did it reach the evangelist? Probably through one of the women mentioned in Lk 8^{3} 24^{10}; and as Joanna is the least known of the group, and therefore the most likely to drop out for any one not personally acquainted with her, perhaps we may say, by preference, through her (cf. p. 639 sup.). We learn from Jn 19^{25} (cf. Ac 1^{14}) that the Mother of Jesus was thrown into contact with this group,—perhaps not for any great length of time, but yet for a time that may well have been sufficiently long for the purpose. And we believe that thus the secret of what had passed came to be disclosed to a sympathetic ear.

Such an inference, if sound, would invest the contents of these chapters with high authority. Without enlarging more on this, we may perhaps be allowed to refer in confirmation to what has been already said as to the appropriateness of the picture given of the kind of circle in which Christ was born, and in which His birth was most spontaneously greeted (see p. 608 above). It was just the Symeons and Annas, the Elisabeths and Zachariahs, who were the natural adherents of such a Messiah as Jesus. And the phrases used to describe them are beautifully appropriate to the time and circumstances, 'looking for the consolation of Israel,' 'looking for the redemption of Jerusalem' (Lk $2^{25.\ 38}$).

ii. The Text of Mt 1^{16}.—Within recent years certain phenomena have come to light in the text of the first chapter of St. Matthew which demand consideration in their bearing upon this part of our subject.

* 'If we are right in this view as to Luke's authority, and as to the way in which that authority reached him, viz. by oral communication, it appears that either the Virgin was still living when Luke was in Palestine during the years 57 and 58 . . . or Luke had conversed with some one very intimate with her, who knew her heart and could give him what was almost as good as first-hand information. Beyond that we cannot safely go; but yet one may venture to state the impression—though it may be generally considered fanciful—that the intermediary, if one existed, is more likely to have been a woman than a man. There is a womanly spirit in the whole narrative, which seems inconsistent with the transmission from man to man, and which, moreover, is an indication of Luke's character; he had a marked sympathy with women' (Ramsay, op. cit. p. 88). In view of the close resemblance between much that appears in the text and Prof. Ramsay's admirable chapter, it is perhaps right to explain that this had not been read at the time when the text was written, and that it represents an opinion formed long ago. The question as to whether the source was written or oral is left open, because there is reason to think that St. Luke used a special (written) source which may have been connected with the women mentioned below, and through them with the Virgin Mary. The writer could not speak quite so confidently as Prof. Ramsay as to the nearness of this source to the Virgin, but he does not think that it could be more than two or three degrees removed from her. It must have been near enough to retain the fine touches which Prof. Ramsay so well brings out.

The peculiarities of the Curetonian Syriac, the (so-called) Ferrar group, and some MSS of the Old Latin, had been known for some time, but in themselves they did not seem of very great importance. A new and somewhat startling element was introduced by the publication of the Sinai-Syriac in 1894. More recently still a further authority has appeared, which contains the eccentric reading. This is the curious dialogue published by Mr. F. C. Conybeare under the names of Timothy and Aquila (Oxford, 1898). It professes to be a public debate between a Christian and a Jew held in the time of Cyril of Alexandria (A.D. 412–444), and it is in the main a string of testimonia commonly adduced in the Jewish controversy. It is a question how far some of this material comes from a work older than the date assigned. The criticism of the dialogue has been acutely treated by Mr. Conybeare, but the subject needs further examination. We will set forth the evidence at length, and then make some remarks upon it.

Mt 1^{16} Ἰακὼβ δὲ ἐγέννησεν τὸν Ἰωσὴφ τὸν ἄνδρα Μαρίας, ἐξ ἧς ἐγεννήθη Ἰησοῦς ὁ λεγόμενος Χριστός, Codd. Græc. unc. qui exstant omn. minusc. quamplur. Verss. (incl. ff$_2$, def. l), cf. Dial. Tim. et Aq. fol. 113 r°.

Ἰακὼβ δὲ ἐγέννησε τὸν Ἰωσήφ, ᾧ μνηστευθεῖσα παρθένος Μαριὰμ ἐγέννησεν Ἰησοῦν τὸν λεγόμενος Χριστόν, 346–826–828 (auctore K. Lake, def. 13–69); cui desponsata virgo (om. q) Maria genuit, Jesum qui dicitur (vocatur g, q), Christus a g, q, cf. Dial. Tim. et Aq. fol. 93 v°.

Similiter, cui desponsata virgo Maria genuit (peperit d) Jesum Christum (om τὸν λεγόμ., Christum Jesum d) d k Syr.-Cur. Jacob autem genuit Joseph, cui desponsata erat virgo Maria: virgo autem Maria genuit Jesum p (cf. c).

Ἰακὼβ ἐγέννησεν τὸν Ἰωσὴφ τὸν ἄνδρα Μαρίας, ἐξ ἧς ἐγεννήθη Ἰησοῦς ὁ λεγόμενος Χριστός· καὶ Ἰωσὴφ ἐγέννησὲν τὸν Ἰησοῦν τὸν λεγόμενον Χριστόν, Dial. Tim. et Aq. fol. 93 r°.

Ἰακὼβ ἐγενν. τὸν Ἰωσήφ· Ἰωσὴφ, ᾧ ἐμνηστεύθη παρθένος Μαριάμ, ἐγέννησεν Ἰησοῦν τὸν λεγομενον Χριστόν, Syr.-Sin.

The eccentric readings all occur within the range of the so-called Western text, and there is no doubt that they belong to a very early stage in the history of that text. Two opposite tendencies appear to have been at work, which are most conspicuously represented in ancient forms of the Syriac Version, though the original in each case was probably Greek.

On the one hand there was a tendency to emphasize the virginity of Mary, and to remove expressions which seemed in any way to conflict with this. For the blunt phrase, 'Joseph her husband,' the Curetonian Syriac with the oldest Latin authorities substitutes, 'Joseph to whom was espoused'—not only 'Mary,' but 'the Virgin Mary.' A little lower down (with Tatian's Diatessaron), for 'Joseph her husband being a just man' (ὁ ἀνὴρ αὐτῆς δίκαιος ὤν) it reads 'Joseph being a just man' (ἀνὴρ δίκ. ὤν). In v.^{20} for 'thy wife' it has 'thine espoused.' In v.^{24}, again with Tatian, it has some such softened phrase as 'he dwelt chastely with her,' and for 'took his wife' it has 'took Mary'; and in v.[25] (but here in agreement with ℵBZ al.) it has simply 'brought forth a son,'—not 'her first-born son.'

In some of these readings, or parts of them, the Sinai-Syriac agrees, but along with them it has others which seem to be of a directly opposite tendency. The most prominent is, of course, 'Joseph begat Jesus,' in v.[16]. We might have thought that this was an accident due to the influence on the mind of the scribe of the repeated ἐγέννησεν of the previous verses; but in v.[21] the same MS has 'bear thee a son,' and in v.[25] 'she bore him a son'; and in Lk 2[5] there is a counter change to that of the Curetonian in v.[20] ('with Mary his wife' for 'Mary his espoused'); all which readings hang together, and appear to be distinctly anti-ascetic. And now the singular reading in v.[16] has found a coincidence in the conflate text of one of the quotations in the Dialogue of Timothy and Aquila.

It is of course true that both these authorities—the Sinai-Syriac and the Dialogue—are very far from thoroughgoing. The Syriac text has not tampered in any way with the explicit language of vv.[18-20]; and—what is especially strange—in the very act of combining Ἰωσὴφ with ἐγέννησεν it inserts a large fragment of the Curetonian reading (ᾧ ἐμνηστεύθη παρθένος Μαριάμ) substituted for τὸν ἄνδρα Μαρίας. On the other hand, the peculiar reading occurs in one only out of three quotations in the dialogue, and there in the form of a conflation with the common text. But is it the case that these authorities point to some form of reading older than any of those now extant, which made Joseph the father of Jesus? There would be a further question, whether, supposing that such a reading existed, it formed any part of the text of our present Gospel?

There would seem to be three main possibilities. (a) The genealogy may in the first instance have had an existence independently of the Gospel, and it may have been incorporated with it by the editor of the whole. In that case it is quite conceivable that the genealogy may have ended Ἰωσὴφ δὲ ἐγέννησεν τὸν Ἰησοῦν. Unless it were composed by someone very intimate indeed with the Holy Family, it might well reflect the current state of popular opinion in the first half of the apostolic age. (b) The reading might be the result of textual corruption. There would always be a natural tendency in the minds of scribes to assimilate mechanically the last links in the genealogy to preceding links. A further confusion might easily arise from the ambiguous sense of the word γεννᾶν, which was used of the mother as well as of the father (cf. Gal 4[24]). If we suppose that the original text ran, Ἰωσὴφ τὸν ἄνδρα Μαρίας ἧ ἐγέννησεν Ἰησοῦν τὸν λεγόμενον Χριστόν, that would perhaps account for the two divergent lines of variants better than any other. A reading like this appears to lie behind the Coptic (Bohairic) Version. (c) It is conceivable that the reading (or group of readings) in Syr-Sin. may be of definitely Ebionite origin. That which we call 'heresy' existed in so many shades, and was often so little consistent with itself, that it would be no decisive argument against this hypothesis that the sense of the readings is contradicted by the immediate context. It would be enough for the scribe to have had Ebionite leanings, and he may have thought of natural and supernatural generation as not mutually exclusive. We can only note these possibilities; the data do not allow us to decide absolutely between them.

LITERATURE.—The fullest discussion of this subject took place in a lengthy correspondence in The Academy, towards the end of 1894 and beginning of 1895.

iii. The Genealogies.—At the time when it was thought necessary at all costs to bring one biblical statement into visible harmony with another, two hypotheses were in favour for reconciling the genealogy of our Lord preserved in Mt 1[1-17] with that in Lk 3[23-38]. These were (a) the hypothesis of adoption or levirate marriage, according to which the actual descent might differ at several points from the legal descent, so that there might be two equally valid genealogies running side by side; and (b) the hypothesis that the one genealogy might be that of Joseph, as the reputed father of Jesus, and the other genealogy (preferably St. Luke's) that of Mary. A certain handle seemed to be given for this latter supposition by the tradition which was said to be found in the Talmud (tr. Chagig. 77, col. 4, Meyer-Weiss), that Mary was the daughter of Eli. [This statement appears to be founded on a mistake, and should be given up; see G. A. Cooke in Gore, Dissertations, p. 39 f.]. It was felt, however, that this view could only be maintained by straining the text of the Gospel; and it is now generally (though not quite universally) agreed that both genealogies belong to Joseph. On the other hand, the theory of levirate marriage or adoption, though no doubt a possible explanation, left too much the impression of being coined to meet the difficulty. The criticism of to-day prefers to leave the two genealogies side by side as independent attempts to supply the desiderated proof of Davidic descent. Were they the work of our present evangelists, or do they go back beyond them? Both genealogies appear to have in common a characteristic which may point to opposite conclusions as to their origin. That in the First Gospel bears upon its face its artificial structure. The evangelist himself points out (Mt 1[17]) that it is arranged on three groups of fourteen generations, though these groups are obtained by certain deliberate omissions. That would be, in his case, consistent with other peculiarities of his Gospel: he evidently shared the Jewish fondness for artificial arrangements of numbers (Sir John Hawkins, Horæ Synopticæ, p. 131 ff.). From this fact we might infer that the stem of descent had been drawn up by himself from the OT and perhaps some local tradition. If such tradition came to him in writing, the list might still conceivably have ended in some such way as that which is found in the Sinai-Syriac, though if the list was first committed to writing in the Gospel the probability that it did so would be considerably diminished.

It would seem that a like artificial arrangement (77 generations = 7 × 11) underlies the genealogy in Lk. But as this is not in the manner of the Third Evangelist, and as he does not appear to be conscious of this feature in his list, it would be more probable that he found it ready to his hand. In that case it would be natural that it should come from the same source as chs. 1. 2, which would invest the genealogy with the high authority of those chapters. We cannot speak too confidently, but the conclusion is at least spontaneously suggested by the facts.

iv. The Census of Quirinius.—Until a very short time ago the best review of the whole question of the Census of Quirinius (Lk 2[1-5]) was that by Schürer in NTZG § 17, Anhang 1 (HJP I. ii. 105 ff.). This was based upon a survey of the whole previous literature of the subject, and was really judicial, if somewhat severely critical, in its tone. As distinct from the school of Baur, which was always ready to sacrifice the Christian tradition to its own reconstruction of the history, Dr. Schürer is an excellent representative of that more cautious method of inquiry which carefully collects the data and draws its conclusions with no prepossession in favour of the biblical writers if also without prejudice against them. In the present instance he summed up rather adversely to the statements in St. Luke; and in the state of historical knowledge at the time when he wrote (1890), that he should do so was upon his principles not surprising.

According to St. Luke, our Lord was born at Bethlehem on the occasion of a general 'enrolment' (ἀπογραφή) ordered by the emperor Augustus and carried out in Palestine under Quirinius as governor of Syria. The date was fixed as being before the death of Herod, which took place in B.C. 4; and it was explained that Joseph and Mary, as belonging to the lineage of David, had gone up to enter their names at Bethlehem, David's city.

There were several points in this statement which seemed to invite criticism. (i.) In the first place, there was no other evidence that Augustus ever ordered a general census of the empire, although there was good reason to think that he took pains to collect statistics in regard to it. (ii.) Even if he had ordered such a census, it seemed doubtful whether it would be carried out in a kingdom which possessed such a degree of independence as Judæa. And (iii.) if it had been conducted in the Roman manner, there would have been no necessity for Joseph and Mary to leave their usual place of residence. Further, (iv.) while it was allowed, on the strength of a well-known inscription, that Quirinius probably twice held office in Syria, yet, as it was known that Sentius Saturninus was governor B.C. 9–7, and Quinctilius Varus at least B.C. 7–4, it was argued that Quirinius' first term of office could not be before B.C. 3–1, i.e. after the death of Herod. (v.) As there was, in any case, a census of Judæa conducted by Quirinius after its annexation by the Romans in A.D. 6, it was thought that St. Luke had a confused recollection of this, and antedated it (in the Gospel, though not in Ac 5[37]) to the lifetime of Herod.

The chief authority for the census of A.D. 6 is Josephus; and an eminent German scholar, Dr. Th. Zahn, put forward in 1898 the view that it was Josephus who was at fault in dating from this year an event which really fell in B.C. 4–3 (Neue Kirchliche Zeitschrift, pp. 633–654). This brought the data more nearly, though still not entirely, into agreement with St. Luke. The theory need not, however, be more fully considered, as it has not met with acceptance, and there can be little doubt that it seeks a solution of the difficulties in the wrong direction.

There was one little expression which might have given pause to the critics of St. Luke, viz. his careful insertion of the word 'first' ('the first enrolment made when Q. was governor of Syria'). It might have shown that he was in possession of special knowledge which would not permit him to confuse the earlier census with that of A.D. 6. And yet the existence of the earlier census remained without confirmation, until it suddenly received it from a quarter which might have been described as unexpected if experience did not show that there is hardly anything that may not be found there—the rubbish heaps of papyrus fragments in Egypt.

Almost at the same time, in the year when Dr. Zahn made his ingenious but unsuccessful attempt (1893), three scholars, one English and two German, made the discovery that periodical enrolments (ἀπογραφαί) were held in Egypt under the Roman empire, and that they came round in a fourteen-year cycle. The proof of this was at first produced for the enrolments of A.D. 90, 104, 118, 132, and onwards; but in rapid succession the list was carried back to A.D. 76, 62, and 20.

This gave the clue, which was almost at once seized, and the whole problem worked out afresh in masterly fashion by Prof. W. M. Ramsay, first in two articles in Exp. 1897, and then in his volume, Was Christ born at Bethlehem? A Study in the Credibility of St. Luke (London, 1898). It would be too much to say that every detail is absolutely verified. The age of Augustus as compared with that which precedes and with that which follows is strangely obscure, and the authorities for it defective. But considering this, the sequence of argument which Prof. Ramsay unfolds is remarkably clear and attractive. (i.) He shows it to be very probable that there was a series of periodical enrolments initiated by Augustus at the time when he first received the tribunician power, and his reign formally began in B.C. 23 (this is the official date usual in inscriptions, p. 140). (ii.) He also makes it probable that this was part of a deliberate and general policy—that the census-takings were not confined to Egypt, but extended to other parts of the empire, and more particularly to Syria. Here, too, there was a tendency to periodic recurrence, though the evidence is not, and is not likely to be, so complete as in the case of Egypt. (iii.) He has shown that Palestine was regarded as part of the 'Roman world,' i.e. of the empire. Though Herod had the liberty of a rex socius, the Roman power and the emperor's will were always in the background; he had to see that the whole Jewish people took an oath of allegiance to the emperor; he could not make war without being called to account; he could not determine his own successor or put to death his own son without an appeal to Rome; in a moment of anger Augustus threatened that whereas he had hitherto treated him (Herod) as a friend, he would henceforth treat him as a subject (Jos. Ant. XVI. ix. 3). It was therefore likely enough that Herod would wish, if he was not positively ordered, to fall in with the imperial policy by taking a census of his people, as another subject king did in Cilicia in A.D. 35. (iv.) But although Herod held a census at the instance of Augustus, it would be in keeping with his whole character and conduct to temper it to Jewish tastes as much as possible; and he would do this by following the national custom of numbering the people by their tribes and families. This was the broad distinction between this enrolment of Herod's and the subsequent census of A.D. 6 or 7. The latter was carried out by Roman officials and in the Roman manner, which was the real cause of the offence which it gave, and of the armed resistance which it excited. (v.) Some uncertainty still hangs over the mention of Quirinius. Mommsen thought that he was the acting legatus of Syria in B.C. 3–1. Prof. Ramsay inclines to the view that he held an extraordinary command by the side of Varus some years earlier, as Corbulo did by the side of Ummidius Quadratus, and Vespasian by the side of Mucianus. Such a command might carry with it the control of foreign relations, and be included under the title ἡγεμών.

v. The Meaning of the Virgin-Birth.—It is but a very few years since there arose in Germany (the date was 1892) a rather sharp controversy in which many leading theologians took part over the clause of the Apostles' Creed, 'Conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary.' The echoes of that controversy reached this country, and, although not much was said in public, it is probable that some impression was made upon public opinion. This impression was strengthened by the publication soon afterwards of the Sinai-Syriac with its peculiar reading, which was not unnaturally caught at as representing a more ancient and truer text than that to which we are accustomed. But if what has been written in the preceding sections has been followed, it will have been seen that between that time and the present (end of 1898) there has been a steady reaction. The eccentric reading has found its level. As it stands, it cannot possibly be original; and however it arose, it cannot really affect the belief of the Church, as it introduces no factor which had not been already allowed for. And at the same time the historical value of the documents, especially Lk 1. 2, has been gradually rising in the estimation of scholars, until the climax has been reached in the recent treatise of Prof. Ramsay. Even those who desire to see things severely as they are must feel that the opening chapters of St. Luke are full of small indications of authenticity, that they are really not behind the rest of the Gospel, and that they form no exception to the claim made at the outset that the facts recorded have been derived from 'eye-witnesses and ministers of the word.'

Along with this process there has been growing up a better and fuller philosophy of the Incarnation. This has been due especially to some of the contributors to Lux Mundi, and may be seen in Canon Gore's Bampton Lectures (1891) and Dissertations (1895), in Dr. Moberly's Lux Mundi essay, and in Mr. Illingworth's Bampton Lectures (1894) and Divine Immanence (1898).

To those who regard primitive ideas as compounded of nothing but idle imagination, ignorance, and superstition, the evidence in folk-lore of stories of supernatural birth (such as are collected in Mr. Sidney Hartland's Legend of Perseus, vol. i., 1894) seems to discredit all accounts of such birth, even the Christian. They do not sufficiently consider the entire difference of the conditions under which the Christian tradition was promulgated from those which surrounded the creations of mythopoeic fancy. The Christian tradition belongs to the sphere, not of myth but of history. It is enshrined in documents near in date to the facts, and in which the line of connexion between the record and the fact is still traceable.

But, apart from this, if we believe that the course of human ideas, however mixed in their character—as all human things are mixed—is yet part of a single development, and that development presided over by a Providence which at once imparts to it unity and prescribes its goal,—those who believe this may well see in the fantastic outgrowth of myth and legend something not wholly undesigned or wholly unconnected with the Great Event which was to be, but rather a dim unconscious preparation for that Event, a groping towards it of the human spirit, a prophetic instinct gradually moulding the forms of thought in which it was to find expression.

And if we ask further what it all means,—why the Son of Man was destined to have this exceptional kind of birth, the answer is, because His appearance upon earth—His Incarnation, as we call it—was to be in its innermost nature exceptional; He was to live and move amongst men, and was to be made in all points like His brethren, with the one difference that He was to be—unlike them—without sin. But how was a sinless human nature possible? To speak of a sinless human nature is to speak of something essentially outside the continuity of the species. The growth of self-conscious experience, expressed at its finest and best in the formulæ of advancing science, has emphasized the strength of heredity. Each generation is bound to the last by indissoluble ties. To sever the bond, in any one of its colligated strands, involves a break in descent. It involves the introduction of a new factor, to which the taint of sin does not attach. If like produces like, the element of unlikeness must come from that to which it has itself affinity. Our names for the process do but largely cover our ignorance, but we may be sure that there is essential truth contained in the scriptural phrase, 'The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Most High shall overshadow thee; wherefore also that which is to be born shall be called holy, the Son of God.'

[The most important literature has been mentioned in the course of this section.]

IV. Concluding Survey: The Verdict of History.

A. Christ in History.—So far we have been involved in the study of the details of the Life of Christ, mainly on the basis of the Gospels. But the Gospels alone, though the fragments which they have preserved for us of that Life are beyond all price, would yet convey an incomplete idea of the total impression left by it even upon contemporaries, still less of all that it has been in the history of the world. Especially would this be the case if, as some would have us do, we were to follow the first three Gospels only, to the exclusion of the fourth. To that point we shall return for a moment presently. But the time has now come to enlarge our view, to look back upon our subject from the vantage-ground which we occupy at the end of the 19th cent., and to endeavour to see it no longer as an episode affecting a small portion of an 'unimportant branch of the Semitic peoples,' but as it enters into the course of the great world-movement of the centuries.

If we would appreciate this, we must once more go back to the Origins, not now so much in search of details, as in order, if possible, to catch rather more of the total impression. We cannot, of course, attempt to interrogate the whole of history. For our present purpose it may be enough to consider (i.) the net result, if we may so speak, of the portraiture of Christ in the Gospels; (ii.) the impression left by a similar reading of other parts of the New Testament, especially the Epistles; (iii.) the testimony borne by the Early Church, both formulated and informal; (iv.) the appeal that may be made to the religious experience of Christians.

The last of these heads is not really so disparate as it may seem from the rest. The ultimate object that we have in view is to bring home—or to suggest lines on which it may be possible to bring home—what Christ really was and is to the individual believer. In order to do this we endeavour to collect (i.) what He was to those among whom He moved during His life on earth; (ii.) what He was to His disciples, and primarily to the apostles after His departure; (iii.) what the still undivided Church apprehended Him as being. It will thus be seen that there is no real antithesis, as though the appeal were in the one case to history and in the other to experience. For our present purpose history may be regarded as the collective experience of the past, which we are seeking to put into line with the individual or collective experience of the present. Our historical survey, so far as it goes, simply embodies so many superimposed strata of experience.

i. The Christ of the Gospels.—We should thus be inclined to deprecate the attempts which are from time to time made to set in contrast some one or other branch of the appeal that we are making as against the rest. In this country we are accustomed to the opposition between the Christ of the (Synoptic) Gospels and the Christ of 'Dogma' or of the Church. And in Germany of late there has been a tendency to oppose the Christ conceived and preached by the apostles to the biographical Christ of the Gospels, and the experience of faith to any external and objective standards. (See especially the works of Kähler and Herrmann mentioned below.)

The disparagement of the Gospels as biographies seems to us, so far as it goes,—and neither writer is really very clear on the subject,—to rest upon a somewhat undue degree of scepticism as to the critical use that can be made of the Gospels. It does not follow that all that is doubted is really doubtful. For a more detailed testing of the historical character of the Gospels we must content ourselves with referring to the previous part of this article, only adding to it the two points which will be more appropriately introduced at the end of the next section,—the peculiar kind of confirmation which the two pictures (the evangelic and the apostolic) supply to each other, the difference between them showing that the teaching of the Epistles has not encroached upon the historical truth of the Gospels, while the less obvious likeness shows that they are in strict continuity. We shall also have to state once more in that context our reasons for believing the Fourth Gospel to be really the work of an eye-witness.

But the point that concerns us most at the present moment is that, even if we make to negative criticism larger concessions than we have any right to make, there will still remain in the Gospel picture ineffaceable features which presuppose and demand that estimate of the Person of Christ which we can alone call in the strict sense Christian.

Take, for instance, that central passage Mt 11^{28-30} 'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light.' Could we conceive such words put into any other lips, even the loftiest that the history of mankind has produced? They are full of delicate self-portraiture. They present to us a character which we may say certainly was, because it has been so described. No mere artist in words ever painted such a canvas without a living model before him. The portrait is of One who is 'meek and lowly in heart,' whose yoke is easy and His burden light; and yet He speaks of both yoke and burden as 'His' in the sense of being imposed by Him; He invites men to 'come' to Him, evidently with a deep significance read into the phrase; He addresses His invitation to weary souls wherever such are to be found; and (climax of all!) He promises what no Alexander or Napoleon ever dreamt of promising to his followers, that He would give them the truly supernatural gift of rest—the tranquillity and serenity of inward peace in spite of the friction of the world; that all this should be theirs by 'coming' to Him.

And then how easy is it to group round such a passage a multitude of others! 'I say unto you, Resist not him that is evil: but whosoever smiteth thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also' (Mt 5^{39}). 'The Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister' (Mk 10^{45}||). 'Suffer the little children to come unto me; forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of God' (ib. v.^{14}||). 'Whosoever would save his life shall lose it: and whosoever shall lose his life for my sake and the gospel's shall save it' (Mk 8^{35}). 'The Son of Man came to seek and to save that which was lost' (Lk 19^{10}, comp. the three parables of Lk 15). 'Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of these my brethren, even these least, ye did it unto me' (Mt 25^{40}).

Sayings like these, it is needless to add, could be multiplied almost indefinitely. Through all of them there runs, indirectly, if not directly, the same self-portraitures. And it is a self-portraiture that has the same two sides. On the one hand there is the human side, the note of meekness or lowliness, condescension that is not (though it really is!) condescension but infinite sympathy, patience, tenderness; and, on the other hand, no less firmly drawn, for all the lightness and restraint of touch, an absolute range of command and authority; all things delivered to the Son in heaven and on earth (cf. Mt 11^{27} 28^{18}).

That which we have called the 'human side' fills most of the foreground in the Gospels; the other, the transcendental side, is somewhat shaded by it; and we can see that it was deliberately shaded, that the proportions were such as mainly (though, as we shall see, not entirely) corresponded to the facts, or, in other words, to the divine method and order of presentation. But when we turn from the Gospels to the rest of the NT we shall find these proportions inverted.

We only pause upon this Gospel picture a moment more to say that, apart from any question of criticism of documents or of details in the narrative, it seems to us to be utterly beyond the reach of invention. The evangelists themselves were too near to the events to see them in all their significance. They set down, like honest men, the details one after another as they were told them. But it was not their doing that these details work in together to a singular and unsought harmony.

LITERATURE.—The fullest account of recent discussions as to the adequacy and trustworthiness of the presentation of Christ in the Gospels will be found in the second enlarged edition of Kähler's Der sogenannte historische Jesus und der geschichtliche, biblische Christus, Leipzig, 1896. Another work, which lays the stress rather on personal experience of the life of Christ, and is written with great earnestness from that point of view, but seems to us too restricted in its historical basis, is Herrmann's Der Verkehr des Christen mit Gott, ed. 2, Stuttgart, 1892 (Eng. tr. 1895).

ii. The Christ of the Apostles.—In passing over from the Gospels to the rest of the NT we find ourselves hampered by critical questions. What we should most wish to ascertain is the conception of Christ held by the mass of the first disciples. And to some extent we can get at this; but, so far as we can do so, it is nearly always indirectly. The writings that have come down to us are those of the leaders, not of the followers; and many even of these are encumbered with questions as to date and origin. Some of these do not so much matter, because in any case they belong to the end rather than the beginning of the apostolic age. The one book which we should most like to use more freely than we can is the Acts, the earlier chapters of which we quite agree with the author of the article in this Dictionary in estimating highly.

We will, however, cut the knot by not attempting to summarize the teaching of all the undisputed books, but by taking a single typical example of manageable compass, the first extant NT writing, 1 Thessalonians, written probably about A.D. 51—in any case not later than 53, or within the first quarter of a century after the Ascension.

Let us suppose for a moment, with the more extreme critics, that a thick curtain falls over the Church after this event. The curtain is lifted, and what do we find? We turn to the opening verse of the Ep. (emended reading). St. Paul and his companions give solemn greeting to the 'Church of the Thess. (which is) in God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.' An elaborate process of reflexion, almost a system of theology, lies behind those familiar terms. First we note that the human name 'Jesus' is closely associated with the title 'Christ' or 'Messiah,' which in the Gospels had been claimed with such quiet reticence and unobtrusiveness. From this time onwards the two names are almost inseperable, or the second supersedes the first: in other words, Jesus is hardly ever thought of apart from His high Messianic dignity. This effect is pressed home by the further title 'Lord' (Κύριος). The disciples had been in the habit of addressing their Master as 'Lord' during His lifetime, in a sense not very different from that in which any Rabbi might be addressed by his pupils (Jn $13^{13f.}$). But that sense is no longer adequate; the word has been filled with a deeper meaning. That 'Jesus is Lord' has become the distinctive confession of Christians (1 Co 12^{3}, Ro 10^{9}), where 'Lord' certainly='the exalted Lord' of the Resurrection and Ascension (cf. Ac 2^{36}).

What is still more remarkable, the glorified Jesus is, as it were, bracketed with 'God the Father.' Let us think what this would mean to a strict Jewish monotheist; yet St. Paul evidently holds the juxtaposition, not as something to which he is tentatively feeling his way, but as a fundamental axiom of faith. In the appellation 'Father' we have already the first beginning—may we not say the first decisive step, which potentially contains the rest?—of the Christian doctrine of the Trinity. And we observe, further, that the Thessalonian Church is said to have its being 'in Christ' as well as 'in God.' This is a characteristic touch of Pauline mysticism. The striking thing about it is that in this, too, the Son already holds a place beside the Father (cf. 2^{14} 4^{16}).

There is another passage in the Ep. (1 Th 3^{11}) in which there is the same intimate combination of 'our God and Father' and 'our Lord Jesus.' Here the context is not exactly mystical, but the two names are mentioned in connexion with the divine prerogative of ordering events. The apostle prays that God and Christ will together 'direct' (κατευθύναι, 'make straight and unimpeded') his way to them (the Thessalonians).

It is not by accident that the Holy Spirit is in a similar manner implicated in divine action ($1^{5, 6}$ 4^{8} 5^{19}), though it would be too much to say that the Spirit is spoken of distinctly as a Person.

The historical events of the life of Christ are hardly alluded to, except His death and resurrection (1^{10} 4^{14} 5^{10}). In the last of these verses Christ is said to have died 'for us'; and in the preceding verse 'salvation,' which is contrasted with 'death,' is said to come 'through' Him. In 1^{10} He is also spoken of as delivering Christians 'from the wrath to come.' It is assumed that Christ is in heaven, from whence He is expected to come again with impressive manifestations of power (1^{10} $4^{15f.}$; cf. also the frequent allusions to ἡ παρουσία τοῦ Κυρίου).

The Second Coming is the only point on which the Ep. can be said to contain direct and formal teaching. The other points mentioned are all assumed as something already known, not as imparted for the first time.

Not only may we say that they are known, but it is also fair to infer that they are undisputed. There is a hint of controversy with the unbelieving Jews, but no hint of controversy with the Judæan Churches, which stand in the same relation to Christ (2^{14-16}). This is important; and it is fully borne out by the other Epistles, which show just how far the disputed ground between St. Paul and the other apostles extended. There was a good deal of sharp debate about the terms on which Gentiles should be admitted. There is no trace of any debate as to the estimate of the Person of Christ.

We have referred to the Pauline mysticism and to the hints, slight but significant, of what is known as the doctrine of the Atonement. It is clear that St. Paul ascribed to Christ not only divine attributes but divine activities—activities in the supersensual sphere, what he elsewhere calls 'heavenly places' (τὰ ἐπουράνια). We know how these activities are enlarged upon in Epp. to Co, Gal, and Ro. It would, of course, be wrong to suppose that all Christians, or indeed any great number, had an intelligent grasp of these 'mysteries'; but we can see from the Ep. to He, 1 P, Epp. Jn, and Rev, that conceptions quite as transcendental had a wide diffusion. And a verse like 2 Co 13^{14} shows that there must have been large tracts of important teaching which are imperfectly represented in our extant documents. When we consider how occasional these documents are in their origin, the wonder is not that they have conveyed to us so little of the apostolic teaching, but that they have conveyed so much.

The summary impression that we receive is indeed that the revolution foreshadowed at the end of the last section has been accomplished. The historical facts of the Lord's life were not neglected; for Gospels were being written, of which those which we now possess are only surviving specimens. But in the whole epistolary literature of NT they have receded very much into the background, as compared with those transcendental conceptions of the Person and Work of Christ, to which the Gospels pointed forward, but which (with one exception) they did not directly expound.

No doubt this was in the main only what was to be expected. The narrative of the Gospels goes back to the period before the Resurrection; the epistolary literature dates altogether after it. Still it is remarkable how we seem to be plunged all at once into the midst of a developed theology. Nor is the wonder lessened, it is rather increased, when we remark that this theology is only in part set before us deliberately as teaching. The fact that it is more often presupposed shows how deep a hold it must have taken alike of the writer and of his readers.

Impressive contrasts are sometimes drawn (e.g. at the beginning of Dr. Hatch's Hibbert Lecture) between the Sermon on the Mount and the Nicene Creed; and the contrast certainly is there. But it goes back far beyond the period of the Arian controversy. It is hardly less marked between the Sermon on the Mount and the writings which have come down to us under the names of St. Peter and St. Paul. And yet these writings are practically contemporary with the composition of the Gospels. The two streams, of historical narrative on the one hand and theological inference on the other, really run side by side. They do not exclude but rather supplement, and indeed critically confirm, each other. For if the Gospels had been really not genuine histories of the words and acts of Christ, but coloured products of the age succeeding His death, we may be sure that they would have reflected the characteristic attitude of that age far more than they do. They do not reflect it, but they do account for it by those delicate hints and subtly inwoven intimations that He who called Himself so persistently Son of Man was also Son of God.

The one Gospel which bridges the gap more unmistakably than the others is the Fourth. And the reason is obvious, if St. John was its author. He had a foot in both worlds. As the disciple whom Jesus loved, he vividly remembered His incomings and outgoings. And in the same capacity, as a disciple who was also an apostle, it fell to him to build up that theology which was the deliberate expression of what Jesus was to His Church, not in a section only of His being, the short three years which He had spent among His followers, but in His being as He had revealed it to them as a whole. It is difficult to think of either function as merely assumed by the writer at second-hand. On the contrary, we acquire a fresh understanding of the weight and solemnity of his words when we think of these as springing from direct personal contact with Christ, and intense personal conviction of what Christ really was, not to himself only, but to the world. In this respect the Fourth Gospel is unique; and the very expansion which it gives of the divine claims of Christ prepares us more completely than the other Gospels alone might have done for the transition from them to the Epistles.

It is an especial satisfaction to be able to quote, in support of this view of the first-hand character of the Fourth Gospel, Dr. Loofs in PRE[3] iv. 29.

iii. The Christ of the Undivided Church.—For the purpose which we have before us we must examine the evidence of the Undivided Church on three distinct points. (a) What was the estimate of the Person of Christ in the age immediately succeeding that of the Apostles? (b) Are there any traces of a tradition different from this? (c) What is the bearing upon the subject of the creeds and conciliar decisions?

(a) On the first head we may say broadly that the mass of Christian opinion was in strict continuity with the NT, rarely (as we might expect) rising to an apprehension of its heights and depths, and keeping rather at the average level, but steadily loyal in intention, and showing no signs of recalcitrance.

Ignatius of Antioch has the strongest grip of distinctive features of NT teaching (Virgin-Birth, pre-existence, incarnation, Logos, Trinitarian language). Clemens Romanus, though much less theological, also has pre-existence and a clearly implied Trinity (lviii. 2). In the former point Barnabas and Hermas agree, though the latter shows some confusion, not uncommon at this date, between Son and Spirit. And then we have the opening words of 2 Clement which exactly describe the general temper, 'Brethren, we ought so to think of Jesus Christ as of God, as of the Judge of quick and dead.'

These, with Polycarp and Aristides, who adopt a similar tone, are the writers. And then, when we look for evidence as to popular feeling and practice, we have the wide prevalence of baptism in the Threefold Name (Didaché and Justin), and the hymns sung 'to Christ as God' (Pliny, Ep. ad Trajan. xcvi.; cf. Eus. HE v. xxviii. 5). It is clear that prayer was generally offered to Christ. Origen's objection to this was a theological refinement, as he held that the proper formula was εὐχαριστεῖν τῷ θεῷ διὰ Χ. Ἰ. (de Orat. 15).

The group of Apologists which stands out so clearly in the middle of the 2nd century is characterized chiefly by the use that is made of the Logos doctrine which was identified with the Logos of philosophy. With them begins a more active spirit of reflexion and speculation. The relation of the Son to the Father, and indeed the whole problem of unity and distinctions in the Godhead (Justin and Athenagoras), is beginning to be keenly canvassed. And at the same time it is clear that the question of what were afterwards called the 'Two Natures' was causing much perplexity. It was this difficulty which really lies behind the experiments of Gnosticism. When we come to the latter half and last quarter of the century, with the theologians of Asia Minor, Irenæus, and Clement of Alexandria, the foundations have been laid of a Christian theology, which already bears the stamp that marks it throughout succeeding centuries, viz. that it is not free speculation, but reflexion upon data given by the Bible.

(b) It was natural, and could not well have been otherwise, that there was in this reflexion at first a considerable tentative element. There was no break, and no conscious divergence between it and the canonical writings. But are there no signs of such divergence? Are there no signs of a tradition differing from that embodiment in these writings? Perhaps we ought to say that there are.

The Gnostics began by inventing traditions of their own, but they soon fell into the groove, and professed to base their views like the rest on the canonical Scriptures. A conspicuous example of this is Heracleon's commentary on St. John. But in these circles there was what we might call recalcitrance, as when Cerinthus and Carpocrates rejected the Virgin-Birth as impossible (Iren. adv. Hær. I. xxvi. 1, xxv. 1). The Gnostics, however, are outside the true development of Christianity, and their systems had a different origin.

In closer contact with Christianity proper are the heretical Ebionites. For them a better claim might be made out to represent a real divergence of tradition. It is possible that their denial of the Virgin-Birth was derived from the state of things when the canonical narratives had not yet obtained any wide circulation. And yet we should have to pass upon these Ebionites a verdict similar to that already passed upon the Gnostics. They were really Jews imperfectly Christianized. If they regarded Christ as ψιλὸς ἄνθρωπος, it was doubtless because the Jews did not expect their Messiah to have any other origin. This is a different thing from, though it may have some subordinate connexion with, the views (e.g.) of Paul of Samosata, whose difficulty was caused by the union of the two natures. The human nature he regarded as having an ordinary human birth, though it came to be united to the Divine Logos.

A like account would hold good of Theodotus of Byzantium and the Rationalists described in Eus. HE v. xxviii. At last the reader may think that he is upon the track of a genuine Rationalism; but this did not go very deep. It was consistent with belief in the Virgin-Birth and in the Resurrection (Hippolytus, Ref. Hær. vii. 35); in fact it probably amounted to little more than a dry literal exegesis.

The Clementine Homilies point out that Christ did not call Himself 'God,' but the 'Son of God,' and they emphasize this distinction somewhat after the manner of the later Arians (xvi. 15, 16). When we have said this, we shall have touched (it is believed) on all the main types of what might be thought to be a denial of Christ's full Godhead.

The more pressing danger of primitive Christianity lay in an opposite direction. Loyalty to Christ was so strong that the simpler sort of Christians were apt to look upon the humanity as swallowed up in the divinity. This is the true account of the early prevalence of Docetism (which made the deity of Christ real, the humanity phantasmal or unreal), and of the later prevalence of what is known to students as Modalistic Monarchianism, and to the general reader as Sabellianism (the doctrine that the Son and the Spirit were not distinct Persons in the Godhead, but modes or aspects of the One God). The answer of Noetus was typical of the frame of mind that gave rise to this, 'What harm do I do in glorifying Christ?' (Hippol. c. Noet. 1): it seemed meritorious to identify Christ with God. Both these tendencies were far stronger and more widely spread than anything that savoured of Rationalism. Docetism entered largely into the Apocryphal Gospels and Acts, which were very popular; and both Tertullian (Præx. 1, 3) and Hippolytus (Ref. Hær. ix. 6, μέγιστος ἀγών) imply that the struggle against Monarchianism was severe.

It is evident from this to which side the scales inclined. The traces of anything like Rationalism in the modern sense are extremely few and slight. For the most part, what looks like it is not pure Rationalism (or Humanitarianism) at all. More formidable was the excess of zeal which exalted the divine in Christ at the expense of the human. But the main body of the Church held an even way between both extremes,—held it at least in intention, though there were no doubt a certain number of unsuccessful experiments in the construction of reasoned theory.

(c) It was inevitable that in the early centuries there should be a great amount of tentative thinking. But little by little this was sifted out; and by the middle of the 5th cent. the ancient Church had practically made up its mind. It formulated its belief, perhaps almost at the same time, in the Chalcedonian definition (ὅρος τῆς ἐν Χαλκηδόνι τετάρτης συνόδου) of the year 451 (which counts as Ecumenical, though the only Westerns present were the two legates of Pope Leo and two fugitive bishops from Africa), and in the Quicumque vult, a liturgical creed composed in Southern Gaul (probably at, or in connexion with, the school of Lerinum), which came to be generally accepted in the West.

This creed and the definitions of Chalcedon represent the end of the process; the beginning is marked by the creed known as the Apostles'. Criticism has of late been active upon this creed as well as upon the so-called Nicene and Athanasian, with a result which tends, it may be generally said, to heighten the value of all three. The date of the Apostles' Creed (in its oldest and shortest form) has been reduced within the limits A.D. 100–150; Kattenbusch, the author of the most elaborate monograph on the subject, leans to the beginning of that period, Harnack to the end. It is agreed that it was in the first instance the local baptismal creed of the Church of Rome, and that it was the parent of all the leading provincial creeds of the West. The principal open question at the present moment (1899 in.) is as to its relation to the Eastern creeds. Kattenbusch and Harnack both think that it was carried to the East in the time of Aurelian (circa 270), and that it became the parent of a number of Eastern creeds, including that which we know as the Nicene; but this is conjecture. Harnack thinks that the Roman creed coalesced with floating formulæ, to which he gives the name of Kerygmata, already circulating in the East. But these also are more or less hypothetical. And the question is whether the Eastern creeds, which resemble the Roman, were not rather offshoots, parallel to it, of a single primitive creed, perhaps originating in Asia Minor. This is substantially the view of Dr. Loofs. The main argument in favour of it is that characteristic features of the Eastern type of creed already appear in Irenæus and in less degree in Justin. Harnack would explain these features as due to his Kerygmata; and from the point of view of the history of doctrine the difference is not very great, because the Kerygmata were in any case in harmony with the creed.

It would be difficult to overestimate the value of the existence of this fixed traditional standard of teaching at so early a date. It was the rallying and steadying centre of Catholic Christianity, which kept it straight in the midst of Gnostic extravagances and among the perils of philosophical speculation. Our so-called Nicene Creed is only the Apostles' Creed in one of its more florid Oriental forms, with clauses engrafted into it to meet the rising heresies of Arius and Macedonius; while the Chalcedonian formula and the Quicumque take further account of the controversies connected with the names of Apollinaris, Nestorius, and Eutyches.

The decisions in question were thus the outcome of a long evolution, every step in which was keenly debated by minds of great acumen and power, really far better equipped for such discussions than the average Anglo-American mind of to-day. If we can see that their premises were often erroneous (especially in such matters as the exegesis of the OT), we can also see that they possessed extraordinary fertility and subtlety in the handling of metaphysical problems. The disparaging estimates of the Fathers, which are often heard and seen in print, are very largely based upon the most superficial acquaintance with their writings. There are many things in these which may provoke a smile, but as a whole they certainly will not do so in any really open mind. There exists at the present time in Germany a movement, which bears the name of its author Albrecht Ritschl (1822–1889), directed against metaphysics in theology generally. No doubt Ritschl also was a thinker and writer of great ability; and the stress that he lays upon religious experience is by no means without justification. But it has not yet been proved that the negative side of his argument is equally valid, or that metaphysics can be wholly dispensed with. And so long as this is the case we certainly cannot afford to ignore these ancient decisions. Every word in them represents a battle, or succession of battles, in which the combatants were, many of them, giants.

LITERATURE.—The subject of this section brings up the whole history of 'Christology,' which may be studied in well-known works of Baur, Dorner, and Thomasius, or in Harnack's History of Dogma. There is an excellent survey by Loofs in PRE[3] iv. 16 ff., art. 'Christologie, Kirchenlehre,' marked by much independent judgment and research. In English may be mentioned Gore, Bampton Lectures (1891); Fairbairn, Christ in Modern Theology (1893); R. L. Ottley, Doctrine of the Incarnation (1896).

The later phases of the critical discussions on the creeds are set forth in Kattenbusch, Das Apost. Symbol (Leipzig, 1894, 1898, unfinished); Harnack's art. 'Apost. Symb.' in PRE[3] i. 741 ff. (this is the author's most complete and latest utterance; the Eng. reader may consult Hist. of Dogma, i. 157 ff.), and an important art. by Loofs in Gött. gel. Anzeigen, 1895.

For Ritschl's attitude it may be enough to refer to his tract, Theologie u. Metaphysik, Bonn, 1881. We had an English version of the opposition to metaphysics in the writings of Matthew Arnold.

iv. The Christ of Personal Experience.—In the case of Ritschl the religious experience of the individual or of communities is directly pitted against metaphysics as the criterion of theological truth. But apart from philosophical theory it is the criterion which is practically applied by hundreds of thousands of plain men—we will not say in search of a creed, but in support of the creed which they have found or inherited. And there is an immense volume of evidence derived from this source in corroboration of the truth of Christianity, or of what amounts to the same thing, the Christian estimate of the Person of Christ. The singular attraction of this Person, the sense of what Christ has done, not only for mankind at large but for the individual believer, the sense of the love of God manifested in Him, have been so overpowering as to sweep away all need for other kinds of evidence. They create a passionate conviction that the religion which has had these effects cannot be wrong in its fundamental doctrine, the pivot of the whole.

This personal experience operates in two ways. It makes the individual believer cling to his belief in spite of all the objections that can be brought against it. But it also possesses a formative power which so fashions men in the likeness of Christ, that they in turn become a standing witness to those who have not come under the same influence. St. Paul expresses this by a forcible metaphor when he speaks of himself as in travail for his Galatian converts 'until Christ be formed' in them, as the embryo is formed in the womb (Gal 4^{19}). The image thus formed shines through the man, like a light through glass, and so He who came to be the Light of the world has His radiance transmitted downwards through the centuries and outwards to the remotest corners of the earth.

This that we speak of is, of course, matter of common knowledge and of everyday experience. The note of the true Christian cannot help being seen wherever there is genuine Christianity. It is, however, an inestimable advantage that the process should have found expression in such classics of literature as the Confessions of St. Augustine and the De Imitatione. In these it can not only be seen but studied.

B. The Person of Christ.—It is necessary that this article should be brought to a close, and the close may seem rather abrupt. And yet the design which the writer set before himself is very nearly accomplished. It will be his duty at a later date to return to his subject on a somewhat larger scale; and for the present he would conclude, not so much by stating results as by stating problems.

i. The Problem as it stands.—We have seen that there are four different ways of attempting to grasp what we can of the significance of the Person of Christ. Towards these four ways the attitude of different minds will be different. For some the decisions of the Undivided Church will be absolutely authoritative and final. They will not seek to go either behind them or beyond them. Others will set the comparative simplicity of the Gospel picture against the more transcendental and metaphysical conceptions of the age that followed. To others, again, the picture traced in the Gospels will seem meagre and uncertain by the side of the exalted Christ preached by the apostles.* Yet others will take refuge in the appeal to individual experience, which will seem to give a more immediate hold on Christ and to avoid the necessity and perplexities of criticism. Others, still more radical in their procedure, will begin with the assumption that Christ was only man, and will treat all the subsequent development as reflecting the growth of the delusion by which He came to be regarded as God.

This last is a drastic method of levelling down the indications of the divine in history, against which human nature protests and will continue to protest. But, short of this, the other milder alternatives seem to us to put asunder what ought rather to be combined. They seem to us to propound antitheses, where they ought rather to find harmony. As the phases in question, distinctly as they stand out from each other, are so many phases in the history of Christianity, they ought to contribute to the elucidation of the Christianity which they have in common.

They ought to contribute to it, and we believe that they do contribute to it. There is, however, room still left for closer study, especially of the transitions. We have been so much in the habit of studying the Gospels by themselves and the Epistles by themselves that we have not paid sufficient attention to the transition from the one to the other. If we follow this clue, it will, we believe, show that the first three Gospels in particular need supplementing, that features which in them appear subordinate will bear greater emphasis, and that the resulting whole is more like that portrayed in the Fourth Gospel than is often supposed.

For instance, we are of opinion that much of the teaching of Jn 14–16 is required by the verse 2 Co 13^{14} and other allusive passages in the early Epp. of St. Paul; that the command of Mt 28^{19} (or something like it) is required by Didaché vii. 1, 3; Just. Apol. i. 61; that the teaching respecting the Paraclete is required by the whole Pauline doctrine of the Spirit; that the allegory of the Vine is required by the Pauline doctrines of the Head and the Members, and of the Mystical Union; that the full sense of Mk 10^{15}‖ is required by such passages as Ro $3^{24.\ 25}$ 4^{25} 5^{6-8} etc., and the full sense of Mk 14^{21}‖ by He 9^{18-22}. And observations of this kind may be very largely extended.

In like manner, while it is certainly right that the conceptions current in the early Church as to the Person and Work of Christ should be rigorously analyzed and traced to their origin, full weight should be given to the analogues for them that are to be found in NT; and where they have their roots outside the Bible, even there the efforts of the human mind to express its deepest ideas may deserve a more sympathetic judgment than they sometimes receive.

And throughout, it is highly important that the doctrinal conceptions, whether of the apostolic age or of subsequent ages, should be brought to the test of living experience, and as far as possible expressed in the language of such experience. The mind and heart of to-day demands before all things reality. It is a right and a healthy demand; and the Churches should try with all their power to satisfy it. If they fail, the fault will not lie in their subject-matter, but in themselves.

ii. A pressing Portion of the Problem.—There is one portion of the problem as to the

* 'We know, literally speaking, with much greater certainty what Paul wrote than what Jesus spoke.' 'The centre of gravity for the understanding of the Person (of Christ) and of its significance falls upon what we are in the habit of calling His Work.' Kähler, Jesus u. das AT, pp. 37, 60.

Person of our Lord Jesus Christ which both in this country and in Germany has excited special interest in recent years. In its most concrete form this is the question as to our Lord's Human Knowledge, which, however, runs up directly into what is generally known as the question of the Kenosis. And that, again, when thoroughly examined, will be found to raise the whole question of the Two Natures. In regard to this series of connected questions there is still abroad an active spirit of inquiry.

It was started in the first instance by the argument from our Lord's use of the OT in its bearing upon the question of OT criticism. This led to a closer examination of the text, Mk 13^{32} ‖ var. lec. That, again, expanded into a discussion of the technical doctrine of the Kenosis (see the art. s.v.), an episode in which was renewed study of the exegesis of Ph 2^{5-11}. And that in turn, in its later phase (H. C. Powell's Principle of the Incarnation, 1896), has opened up the whole question of the Two Natures, which in Germany for some time past has been far more freely handled than in Great Britain.

These discussions have produced one little work of classical value, Dr. E. H. Gifford's study of Ph 2^{5-11}, entitled The Incarnation, a model of careful and scientific exegesis, which appears to leave hardly anything more to be said on that head. It is also right to note the special activity on this subject of the diocese of Salisbury, largely due to the initiative and encouragement of its bishop (Mr. W. S. Swayne's Our Lord's Knowledge as Man, with a preface by the Bp. of Salisbury, 1891, and Mr. Powell's elaborate work, mentioned above). Weighty contributions have been made to the subject by Dr. Bright in Waymarks of Church History (1894), Canon Gore (Dissertations, 1898), and in arts. in the Ch. Quarterly, Oct. 1891, and July 1897.

On the Continent special views of the Kenosis are connected with the names of Dorner, Thomasius, Gess, Godet, and others rather more incidentally. Tracts upon the smaller questions have recently appeared by Schwartzkopff (Konnte Jesus irren? 1896), and Kähler (Jesus u. das AT, 1896).

In spite of all this varied activity, it may be doubted whether the last word has yet quite been said (Dr. Gifford's treatment of the exegetical question seems to us to come nearest to this). The first concern of the historian is that the facts shall be taken candidly as they are. It is more probable that our inferences will be wrong than the data from which they are drawn. And for the rest, we should not be surprised if a yet further examination of the subject should result rather in a list of tacenda than of prædicanda.

C. The Work of Christ.—In regard to the Work of Christ also it is best for us to state problems. Of these the most important are the two that meet us first; they have not been much discussed; and complete agreement upon them has not yet been attained.

i. The Place in the Cosmical Order of the Ethical Teaching of Christ.—It is almost a question of names when it is asked whether Christ brought into the world a new ethical ideal. The question would be what constituted a new ideal. The Christian ideal, properly so called, is a direct development of what is found in OT, esp. in Pss. and the Second Part of Isaiah. But it receives a finish and an enrichment beyond what it ever possessed before, and it is placed on deeper foundations.

The chief outstanding question in regard to it would be the relation in which it stood to the older ideals of the best pagan life and philosophy in regard to the civic virtues, and to the newer ideals put forward in modern times in the name of science, art, and industry. The Christian ideal, it must be confessed, rather leaves these on one side. That it should do so would be quite as explicable if we adopt the Christian estimate of the Person of Christ as if we do not. If we do not adopt it, then the omission (so far as there is an omission) would be one of the limitations for which we were prepared. But if we take St. John's view of the relation of the Son to the Father, and see in His action the action willed by the Father, we shall see it as part of the great world-movement, presupposing so much of that movement as had proved itself to be of permanent value in the past, and leaving room for further developments, corresponding to altered states of society, in the future. The teaching of Christ was not intended to make a tabula rasa of all that had gone before in Greece or Rome any more than in Judæa; nor was it intended to absorb into itself absolutely all the threads of subsequent evolution, where those threads work back to antecedents other than its own. It was intended so to work into the course of the world-movement as ultimately to recast and reform it. Its action has about it nothing violent or revolutionary, but it is none the less searching and effective. It is a force 'gentle yet prevailing.'

Some remarks have been made above (p. 621 f.) on the way in which the Christian ethical ideal operates and has operated. It is not thought that they are really sufficient; but they represent such degree of insight as the writer has attained to at present, and he would welcome warmly any new light on the subject.

ii. The Significance of the Personal Example of Christ in regard to His Ethical Teaching.—When once it is realized that the root principle of the ethics of Jesus is Life through Death, the death of the lower self with a view to the more assured triumph of the higher, it must needs break in upon us that the Life of Christ bears to His teaching a wholly different relation from that which the lives of ordinary teachers bear to theirs. An honest man will no doubt try to practise what he preaches, but that will be just a matter of maxims of conduct. The Life of Christ, we can see, was something very much more than this. It was a systematic working out of the Christian principle on a conspicuous and transcendent scale. The Death and Resurrection of Jesus were the visible embodiment of the law of all spiritual being that death is the true road to the higher life.

When we reflect further who it was that was thus exhibiting in His own Person the working out of this law to the utmost extremity, we become aware that Christians have it indeed 'placarded' before their eyes (Gal 3^{1}) in a sense in which no moral law ever was set forth before.

Add that Christ had Himself predicted and that His followers generally believed that after His Ascension He was again visiting His people through His Spirit; that Divine forces were at work in the world, all radiating from Himself—Himself at once crucified and risen; add this to the previous beliefs of which we have just spoken, —remember that Christians supposed themselves to be actually conscious of these forces impressing and moulding their own hearts and lives, and we may come gradually to understand what St. Paul meant when he spoke of 'dying' or 'being crucified' with 'Christ' and 'rising again with Him.' It seems to be a similar idea to that which St. John expresses when he puts into the mouth of Christ the claim, 'I am the Way.' Rather, perhaps, we should not narrow down this phrase to anything less than the whole content of the Life of Christ on earth. 'He supplied in Himself the fixed plan, according to which all right human action must be framed: the Spirit working with their spirit supplied the ever-varying shapes in which the one plan had to be embodied' (Hort, Huls. Lect. p. 30).

iii. The Work of Christ as Redemptive.—Here we come on to more settled ground. At a very early date Christian tradition gave to Christ the title 'Saviour' (Lk 2^{11}, Ac 5^{31} 13^{23} etc.; cf. Mt 1^{21}, Lk 19^{10}), 'Saviour of the world' (Jn 4^{42}; cf. 3^{17} 12^{47}). What does this title 'Saviour' include? It doubtless includes every sense in which Christ rescued and rescues men from the power and the guilt of sin. He does this, as we have seen, both by teaching and by example—by inimitable teaching and by a consummate example. But if we follow the method indicated above (p. 651), if we take the hints in the Gospels, with the fuller light thrown upon them by the Epistles, we shall be led to the conclusion that there was something yet more in the Life and Death and Resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ than this, that there was something in these connected acts of His which had its counterpart in the sacrifices of OT; and that the deepest meaning and purpose of sacrifice was fulfilled in Him. This is a belief which Christians have held from the first days onwards; and it is a belief which does not and will not lack careful restatement at the present time.

iv. The Work of Christ as Revelation.—On a similar footing is the belief that Christ came not only to give, but to be a revelation of the inmost mind and character of the Father. Such a revelation was needed. It is not contained in the 'cosmic process.' If we had that process alone before us, we could not infer that God was a Being absolutely righteous and absolutely loving. The idea that He might be so could not rise above a hypothesis. But at this point the Incarnation intervenes. And here again the Synopt. Gospels present us with one central passage (Mt 11^{27} ||) with other scattered hints which are taken up and made more explicit in the Fourth Gospel, while that again does but give the fuller ground for a belief which was certainly held in the apostolic circle (comp. e.g. the central passage Jn 14^{7-10} with $10^{14f.}$ 3^{15}, 1 Jn $4^{8.\ 16}$, Ro 5^{8} etc.). So we get the broad doctrine led up to by St. Paul and Ep. to the He (2 Co $4^{4.\ 6}$, Col 1^{15}, He 1^{3}), and finally formulated by St. John, that the Son was the Logos or Word (which might be paraphrased 'mouthpiece,' or 'vehicle of utterance of the mind') of the Father.

v. The Founding of the Church.—Conventional language is too often heard as though the immediate object of the Incarnation was the founding of the full hierarchical system as it existed in the Middle Ages. This language is based on the complete identification of the Church with the 'kingdom of heaven' (see p. 620 sup.). On the other hand, there is a school of critics, both in Germany and in England, who deny that 'Jesus ever created, or thought of creating, an organized society.' The main ground for this latter view is the doubt that rests over the two instances—one of them ambiguous—of the use of the word 'Church' which are confined to the peculiar element of the First Gospel (Mt 16^{18} 18^{17}), and the certainty that there are some senses in which the 'kingdom' and the Church cannot be identified. In some (though not in all) of those who adopt this line of reasoning there is the further tendency to minimize or restrict all that would imply an extended outlook of Jesus over the ages.

It seems to us, however, to be going too far to say that the 'kingdom of heaven' is 'without organization and incapable of being organized.' The two parables of the Tares and the Draw-net distinctly imply the existence of a society; and that the divine laws and influences which constitute the kingdom should express themselves in a society as the vehicle for their realization is antecedently probable. But when Jesus gathered round Him the Twelve, He was practically forming the nucleus of a society; and that society has had a continuous existence ever since, so that it is difficult to think that it was not contemplated. Moreover, when we turn to the writings of St. Paul, we find that even in his earlier Epp. he seems to think of Christians as forming a single body with differentiation of function (Ro 12^{4-8}, 1 Co 12^{4-30}), and in his later Epp. (Eph, Col, Past. Epp.) the unity of the Church with its regular forms of ministry is brought out still more emphatically.

We also find that the Day of Pentecost is described in Ac as inaugurating a state of things which agrees well with the indications in Epp. Paul, while it confirms the promise of Lk 24^{49}, Jn $14^{16.\ 26}$.

On the assumptions made in this art. it would be extremely improbable that this series of phenomena was not fully foreseen and deliberately designed by Christ. It would seem, however, that, after the manner of the divine operations in nature, He was rather content to plant a germ with indefinite capacities of growth, than thought it necessary Himself to fix in advance the details of organization.

The exact nature of the powers conferred upon the apostles is still a subject of much discussion as these concluding lines are written.

LIVES OF CHRIST.—To write the Life of Christ ideally is impossible. And even to write such a Life as should justify itself either for popular use or for study, is a task of extreme difficulty. After all the learning, ability, and even genius devoted to the subject, it is a relief to turn back from the very best of modern Lives to the Gospels. And great as are the merits of many of these modern works, there is none (at least none known to the writer—and there are several that he ought to know but does not) which possesses such a balance and combination of qualities as to rise quite to the level of a classic. What is wanted is a Newman, with science and adequate knowledge. No one has ever touched the Gospels with so much innate kinship of spirit as he. It should be needless to say that the Life of Christ can be written only by a believer. Renan had all the literary gifts—a curiosa felicitas of style, an æsthetic appreciation of his subject, and a saving common-sense which tempered his criticism; but even as literature his work is spoilt by self-consciousness and condescension, and his science was not of the best.

It will be well here only to name a select list of books which may be used more or less systematically. The minor works are legion.

Among the older works that would still most repay study would probably be those of Neander (ed. 7, 1873), Hase (Leben Jesu, ed. 5, 1865; Geschichte Jesu, 1876), Ewald (vol. vi. in Eng. tr. of Gesch. d. Volkes Israel, 1883), Andrews (American; revised ed. Edin. 1892).

In this country the books most generally current are Farrar's Life of Christ (since 1874); Edersheim's Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah (since 1883, revised editions from 1886, abridged ed. 1890); to which should perhaps be added Cunningham Geikie, Life and Words of Christ (1877). Of these the best is probably Dr. Edersheim's (with very ample illustrations from Jewish sources); but none of the three can quite be said to grapple with the deeper underlying problems, critical or other. A striking attempt was made by the late Prof. J. R. Seeley to realize in modern forms the ethical and social aspect of the Life of Christ in Ecce Homo (ed. 6, 1866). And the imaginative works, Dr. Edwin A. Abbott's Philochristus (ed. 3, 1878), and the anonymous As Others Saw Him (1895, see p. 633b sup.), may be consulted with advantage. [Dr. Abbott's latter works have been mentioned above (p. 628a)].

In French, besides Renan, E. de Pressensé (1866, Eng. tr. same date and later; Protestant) may still be read. Père Didon (1891, also translated; Roman Catholic) represents with dignity the older orthodoxy, and A. Réville (1897) the newer criticism.

The most thoughtful and searching, as well as (if we except Dr. Edersheim) the most learned work, has been done in Germany. The two writers who have tried most earnestly to combine the old with the new are Bernhard Weiss, and Beyschlag. Of these we prefer Weiss. His Leben Jesu (1882, Eng. tr. 1883, 1884) is a conscientious and thorough piece of work, which, however, has to be studied rather than read. Beyschlag's (1885 and later) is more flowingly written, but also exhibits rather more markedly the weaker side of a mediating theology. Keim's Jesus von Nazara (1867–1882, abridged ed. 1873–1883) is impressive from the evident sincerity of its author, his intellectual force and command of his materials, but the critical premises are unfortunate. A concise Life which has just appeared by Dr. P. W. Schmidt of Basel (Gesch. Jesu, 1899) seems, if a glance may be trusted, to come under the head of minor works. It gains its conciseness by omitting debatable matter.

The student may be advised to take Weiss for his principal commentary, referring to Schürer (p. 609 sup.) or Edersheim for surroundings, and using along with it Tischendorf's Synopsis Evangelica or a Harmony like Stevens and Burton's. He should read Ecce Homo.

W. SANDAY.

JESUS CALLED JUSTUS (Ἰησοῦς ὁ λεγόμενος).—A Jewish Christian resident in Rome during St. Paul's first imprisonment. The apostle sends a greeting from him to the Colossians (4[11]), speaking at the same time of the comfort that he had received from him as a fellow-worker unto the kingdom of God. Nothing further is known of him.

J. O. F. MURRAY.

JETHER (יֶתֶר 'abundance,' Ἰέθερ).—1. Father-in-law of Moses (RVm of Ex 4[18] E), prob. a mistake for Jethro, יִתְרוֹ. 2. Eldest son of Gideon, Jg 8[20]. When called upon by his father to avenge his uncle's death by executing the two Midianite chiefs, Zebah and Zalmunna, the lad shrank from the deed 'because he was yet a youth.' It seems surprising at first to find such a youth among Gideon's 300 tested warriors; but 8[4ff.] belongs to a much older source than 7[4-8], and may be connected with 6[34], where Gideon's men are drawn from his own clan of Abiezer; thus the boy would be included in his father's following. 3. An Ishmaelite, father of Amasa, 1 K 2[5. 32], 1 Ch 2[17] = יִתְרָא 2 S 17[25] Ἰόθερ, Luc. Ἰέθερ. 4. 5. Two men of Judah, 1 Ch 2[32] 4[17]. 6. A man of Asher, 1 Ch 7[38] = יִתְרָן v.[37], Ἰέθερ A. Ithran was the name of an Edomite clan, Gn 36[26] P.

G. A. COOKE.

JETHETH (יִתֵּת).—The eponym of an Edomite clan, Gn 36[40] = 1 Ch 1[51], which has not been traced. The MT is not beyond suspicion, in view of the LXX (A) reading Ἰεβέρ in Gn, (B) Ἰεθέτ (A) Ἰεθέθ in 1 Ch, and Luc. Ἰεθέρ in both passages.

JETHRO (יִתְרוֹ; in Ex 4[18a] יֶתֶר, i.e. Jether [so RVm]; LXX everywhere Ἰοθόρ. יִתְרוֹ may be for יִתְרוֹן, or, as Dillmann prefers, for יִתְרִי, a name of the same class as גֶּשְׁמִי of Neh 6[6] and bearing the same relation to יֶתֶר which גֶּשְׁמִי bears to גֶּשֶׁם of Neh 2[19]). —The priest of Midian and father-in-law of Moses. It was while keeping Jethro's flocks that Moses had his vision of the burning bush and received his commission from J" to the court of Egypt (Ex 3[1ff.]). Shortly thereafter he went to his father-in-law and obtained his permission to return to his brethren (4[18]). In a previous narrative (2[15ff.]) we are told how Moses, on fleeing from Egypt, came and dwelt in the land of Midian, how he assisted the seven daughters of the priest of Midian to water their flocks, and how finally he married one of these daughters named Zipporah. In this narrative no name is given to the priest (or it has been lost; see below).

An analysis of the above passages shows that Ex 3[1] and 4[18], as well as all the other passages where the name Jethro occurs (viz. 18[1. 2. 5. 6. 9. 10. 12]), belong to E, whereas Ex 2[15ff.] is from J. Now the question arises, What is the relation of Hobab of Nu 10[29] (also J) to Jethro? Is he identical with him, so that in the latter passage חֹתֵן מֹשֶׁה, 'Moses' father-in-law,'* applies to Hobab; or is he his son, Reuel being another name for Jethro, so that Hobab ben-Reuel was Moses' brother-in-law; or, as a third possibility,† are Hobab and Jethro both sons of Reuel and thus brothers? Various considerations point to the following as the most probable answer to these questions. Jethro is the name of Moses' father-in-law according to one tradition (E), Hobab ben-Reuel is the name according to another (J), which appears not only in Nu 10[29] but also in Jg 1[16] (see Moore's note) 4[11]. All difficulty in the way of identifying Jethro and Hobab is removed if we regard 'Reuel' of Ex 2[18] as a gloss due to a misconception of Nu 10[29] (Driver, LOT[6] p. 22̊ĭ.), or substitute for this reading 'Hobab ben-Reuel.' It is true that some obscurity (but this is so upon any theory of the relation of the two names) still arises from the circumstance that alike in Ex 2[15ff.] (J) and 3[1] (E) Moses' father-in-law is priest of Midian, whereas in Jg 1[16] 4[11] he is a Kenite. (See, further, Moore on Jg 1[16], and Dillmann-Ryssel on Ex 2[18]).

A very important incident is recorded in Ex 18 (E), where Moses receives a visit from Jethro, and at his father-in-law's instigation appoints subordinates to assist him in the work of 'judging' the people. In v.[27] we are told how thereafter Jethro 'went his way into his own country.' In J's narrative (Nu 10[29ff.]) we find Hobab in the camp of Israel, and gather the impression (cf. also Jg 1[16] 4[11]) that, though at first reluctant, he finally agreed to the proposal of Moses that he should remain and give the people the benefit of his services as guide. See, also art. HOBAB.

J. A. SELBIE.

* It is very doubtful whether the Heb. חֹתֵן has ever the sense of brother-in-law; at least there is no certain example in OT of its meaning anything but father-in-law.

† If (with Ewald, Gesch. ii. 38) we read 'Jethro ben-Reuel' for 'Reuel' in Ex 2[18].

JETUR.—See ITURÆA.

JEUEL (יְעוּאֵל).—1. A Judahite, son of Zerah, 1 Ch 9[6]. 2. A Levitical family name, 2 Ch 29[13]. 3. A contemporary of Ezra, Ezr 8[13]. In 2 and 3 Kerê has יְעִיאֵל, Jeiel. See GENEALOGY.

JEUSH (יְעוּשׁ; in Gn 36[5. 14], 1 Ch 7[10] the Kethîbh has יָעִישׁ Jeish. The Kerê is supported by Gn 36[18], the LXX Ἰεούς, Ἰαούς, Vulg. Jehus, Jaus, as well as by the form in which the name occurs elsewhere). —1. A son of Esau by Oholibamah; also the eponym of a Horite clan, Gn 36[5. 14. 18] = 1 Ch 1[35]. 2. A Benjamite chief, 7[10]. 3. A descendant of Saul, 1 Ch 8[39]. 4. The name of a Levitical family, 1 Ch 23[10f.]. 5. A son of Rehoboam, 2 Ch 11[19].

W. R. Smith (Kinship and Marriage, 218, RS[2], 42 n. 4) proposes to identify Jeush with the Arabian lion-god Jaghûth, of whose name he declares that it is 'the exact phonetic equivalent.' This is favoured by Wellhausen (Reste[2], 22) and Nöldeke (ZDMG, 1886, p. 168); but Lagarde (Mittheil. ii. 77, Bildung der Nomina, 133), followed by Dillmann (Genesis, ad loc.), objects on the ground, amongst others, that the LXX Ἰεούς points to ' and not gh in Arabic (see Gray, Heb. Proper Names, 109).

JEUZ (יְעוּץ).—The eponym of a Benjamite family, 1 Ch 8[10]. See GENEALOGY.

JEW, JEWS (Heb. יְהוּדִי, יְהוּדִים (Kethîbh יְהוּדִיִּים), Aram. יְהוּדָאִי, יְהוּדָאִין, Ἰουδαῖος, strictly = persons belonging to Judah). — In Jeremiah, the earliest writer employing the term whose date is certain, it is found without (32[12]) or with implied contrast to others (40[11. 12] Moabites, 38[19] 41[3] 52[28. 30], cf. 2 K 25[25] Chaldæans, 44[1] Egyptians). Curiously (unlike the earlier phrase, 'men of Judah,' אִישׁ יְהוּדָה 1 S 11[8] etc., or אַנְשֵׁי י׳ 2 S 2[4]) it is never found in contrast to persons of the N. Kingdom (2 K 16[6] is a more apparent than real exception, for though the 'Jews' spoken of do, in fact, belong to the S. Kingdom (14[22]), yet they are contrasted with Syrians [MT] or, rather, Edomites). It seems, therefore, to have been scarcely used until the kingdom of Judah was the one existing Heb. kingdom. This change would make it the more easy for 'Jew' to be employed as a synonym of 'Hebrew' (Jer 34[9]), and for the language common to N. and S. Pal. to be called 'Jewish' (יְהוּדִית 2 K 18[26. 28] ‖ 2 Ch 32[18], cf. Neh 13[24]). Although those who inhabited Jerus. and Judah were still regarded for a time as having a special right to the title (Neh 1[2] 6[3]), yet it became the national name of the people of Israel in contrast to Gentiles (Neh 4[6] [12] AV] 5[8], Zec 8[23], Dn 3[8], Est 2[5], and often; cf. 1 Mac 8[23. 27] τὸ ἔθνος τῶν Ἰουδαίων).

Josephus is therefore not far wrong when he says, ἐκλήθησαν δὲ τὸ ἔνομα ἐξ ἧς ἡμέρας ἀνέβησαν ἐκ Βαβυλῶνος, ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰούδα φυλῆς, ἧς πρώτης ἐλθούσης εἰς ἐκείνους τοὺς τύπους, αὐτοί τε καὶ ἡ χώρα τῆς προσηγορίας αὐτῆς μετέλαβον (Ant. XI. v. 7). Josephus also quotes a passage from Clearchus, which speaks of his master Aristotle definitely using the word 'Jew'; but as he only says that it is derived from Judæa, the country that the Jews inhabit, it is doubtful whether he uses the term in the merely local or the national sense (c. Ap. i. 22). Further, though nowhere expressly applied to members of the Ten Tribes (Mordecai as belonging to Benjamin would readily be called 'Jew'), yet, in view of the wide area over which 'Jews' are said to be scattered in Est 9^{15-19}, it seems impossible to believe but that when the Book of Esther was written the term included them.

In Neh 2^{16} (and so also, perhaps, 5^{17}, but not 5^{1}, cf. 5^{8}) 'the Jews' are distinguished from the priests, the nobles, the princes (sĕgānîm), and 'the rest that did the work,' and seem to mean the middle classes, which were, perhaps, then, as in NT times, the most zealous for Judaism. The term occurs as denominative of Gentiles adopting Judaism in Est 8^{17}.

In NT J. is generally used in contrast to Gentiles (e.g. Jn 2^{6} Ac 14^{1}), Samaritans (Jn 4^{9}), or proselytes (Ac 2^{10}), i.e. it = Jews both in race and religion (cf. also Jn 4^{22}). It is more natural in the mouth of Gentiles than Jews (Mt 2^{2}, cf. Lk 23^{37} spoken by Roman soldiers with ‖ Mt 27^{42}, Mk 15^{32} by the high priests). In Jn it specially denotes the typical representatives of Jewish thought contrasted with believers in Christ whatever their nationality and stage of belief, or with other Jews of less pronounced opinions (e.g. Jn 3^{25} 'a Jew,' 5^{10} 7^{13} 9^{22}, see more fully Westcott, St. John, Introd. ι. 1. i. α. γ.). In Gal 2^{13} it refers to Christians of Jewish race (cf. St. Paul, 'a Jew, a man of Tarsus,' Ac 21^{39}). Lk 23^{51} ('Arimathæa, a city of the Jews') perhaps means that Ar. was in Judæa, not Samaria or Galilee. For a similar use of the adj. cf. Mk 1^{5}, Jn 3^{22}. In Ro $2^{28.\ 29}$ (cf. Rev 2^{9} 3^{9}) with ref. to ideal Jews who correspond to God's call and choice. In Gal $1^{13.\ 14}$ St. Paul speaks of the 'Jews' religion,' and the same expression (Gr. Ἰουδαισμός) occurs also in 2 Mac 8^{1} (cf. 2^{21} 14^{38}).

Jewess (יְהוּדִית 1 Ch 4^{18}). — 'And his wife the Jewess,' RV ('Jehudijah,' AV), i.e. perhaps of the tribe of Judah, but perhaps in the widest sense (see above), esp. if she is contrasted with Bithiah, the daughter of Pharaoh, who was, as it seems, Mered's other wife.

In NT Timothy's mother is said to be a believing Jewess, but his father a Greek (Ac 16^{1}). In Ac 24^{24} Drusilla the wife of Felix is called a Jewess. In both cases there is no thought of the tribe.

Jewish (יְהוּדִית, Ἰουδαϊστί).—Of the language of the inhabitants of Jerus. in time of Hezekiah (2 K $18^{26.\ 28}$ ‖ Is $36^{11.\ 13}$, cf. 2 Ch 32^{18}) and of Nehemiah (Neh 13^{24}); in both cases contrasted with that of non-Isr. nations. In the time of Hez. this was quite, and in that of Nehem. almost, certainly Hebrew. In Tit 1^{14} 'Jewish fables' prob. = Haggadôth, by which Jewish teachers popularized their philosophical speculations. A. Lukyn Williams.

JEWEL is EV tr^{n} of 1. חֲלִי Ca 7^{1} 'The joints of thy thighs (RVm 'thy rounded thighs') are like jewels.' The word comes from a root חָלָה 'adorn.' Its only other occurrence is in Pr 25^{12}, where it is coupled with נֶזֶם 'nose-ring,' and where AV, RV tr. 'ornament.' From the same root comes 2. The ἅπ. λεγ. חֲלָיָה (again coupled with נֶזֶם) in Hos 2^{13} [Heb.^{15}], used of the jewellery worn upon the occasion of a religious festival. Festal garments and ornaments were in accordance with ancient custom, Ex $3^{18ff.}$. One who had not a special robe (Gn 35^{2}), at least washed his ordinary garments (Ex 19^{10}) before approaching the presence of the Deity (cf. W. R. Smith, RS 433 f.). After the celebration was over, the festal garment and ornaments were put off, because a certain virtue was believed to attach to them from contact with the object of worship, cf. Ezk 44^{19} '(The priests) shall put off their garments wherein they minister and lay them in the holy chambers, and they shall put on other garments, that they sanctify not the people with their garments'; cf. also the mantle of Elijah, 2 K $2^{8ff.}$ (see the interesting note of Nowack, Kl. Proph. 20).

3. כְּלִי, a general term for 'article,' 'utensil,' 'vessel,' 'thing.' When coupled with כֶּסֶף 'silver,' or זָהָב 'gold,' or both of them, it is tr^{d} 'jewels' in Gn 24^{53}, Ex 3^{22} 11^{2} 12^{35} 35^{22}, Nu $31^{50.\ 51}$, 1 S $6^{8.\ 15}$, Job 28^{17} (with פָּז), Is 61^{10}; so with יְקָר ('preciousness') in Pr 20^{15}; with תִּפְאֶרֶת ('fairness') in Ezk $16^{17.\ 39}$ 23^{26}; with חֶמְדָּה ('desirableness,' 'preciousness') in 2 Ch 20^{25} (cf. חֶמְדָּה in 32^{27}, where for AV 'jewels' RV has 'vessels').

4. נֶזֶם, which in EV is three times (Pr 11^{22}, Is 3^{21}, Ezk 16^{12}) tr^{d} 'jewel,' means 'nose-ring.'

5. סְגֻלָּה, Mal 3^{17} 'in that day when I make up my jewels.' Unfortunately, there can be no doubt that this beautiful and familiar phrase rests upon a mistranslation. The Heb. reads וְהָיוּ לִי לַיּוֹם אֲשֶׁר אֲנִי עֹשֶׂה סְגֻלָּה, which can hardly mean anything else than 'They shall be mine, in the day that I do make* (cf. v.^{21}), even a peculiar treasure' (so RV and Amer. RV, except that the latter gives 'mine own possession' instead of 'a peculiar treasure'). סְגֻלָּה, applied in 1 Ch 29^{3}, Ec 2^{8} to a private treasure (of gold, silver, etc.) belonging to kings, is repeatedly used of Israel as the special possession or prize of J", Ex 19^{5}, Dt 7^{6} 14^{2} 26^{18}, Ps 135^{4} (see Driver on Dt 7^{6}).

In Ca 1^{10} where AV has 'rows (of jewels)' RV gives 'plaits (of hair).' The Heb. is תּוֹרִים, the meaning of which is quite uncertain. Baethgen (in Kautzsch's AT) gives Gehänge, Siegfried-Stade Schnüre. In the second clause of the same verse RV substitutes 'strings of jewels' for AV 'chains (of gold).' The Heb. is הֲרוּזִים, which Siegfried-Stade tr. Perlen-, Corallenschnüre; Baethgen, Schnüre; Oxf. Heb. Lex. 'strings of beads.' In 1 P 3^{3} where AV has simply 'gold' RV gives 'jewels of gold,' which is a more exact rendering of χρυσίων (gen. plur.).

In Trumbull's Studies in Oriental Social Life (p. 319 ff.) there is a striking chapter on the extent to which gold and silver ornaments are worn by the women of Egypt and Arabia. Oriental dress lends itself to ornamental treatment much more than the Western style. The materials may be gold, silver, and rich cloth, as well as precious stones. All the references in Scripture to jewellery imply that it was highly appreciated, and might easily become dangerous to the moral life. It caused the tragedy of Achan; and provided at once the golden calf and the furnishings of the tabernacle. Among Orientals, the same taste that enjoys rich heavy perfumes and bright dazzling colours in dress, naturally found pleasure in the gorgeous display of jewellery. Jewels took the form of armlet, anklet, bracelet, crescent, earring, nose-ring, necklace, and often had a value of amulet protection. See, further, Stones (Precious).

JEWRY.—The Gr. name Ἰουδαία was rendered by Tindale Jewry (usually spelt by him 'Jury'), and this was accepted by all the VSS following, except occasionally Rhem. (Juda) and AV. The AV was apparently the first to use the more accurate form Judea, and it does so everywhere in NT, except Lk 23^{5}, Jn 7^{1}, where the earlier form Jewry has been allowed to stand. RV has everywhere the still more accurate spelling Judæa (wh. see). The Apocr. was more carelessly tr[d] in AV, hence Jewry is oftener retained, as 1 Es 1[32] 4[49] 5[7. 8. 57] 6[1] 8[81] 9[3], Bel [33], 2 Mac 10[24]; but still Judea is the more frequent form. In RV the Apocr. is not more carelessly, but it is less consistently tr[d] than NT, and so Jewry is allowed to remain in 1 Es and Bel, but changed to Judæa in 1 Mac. In OT the form Jewry occurs but once in AV, Dn 5[13]. The Aram. is יְהוּד, a form which in the very same verse is tr[d] Judah, as it is rendered everywhere else except Ezr 5[8] (Judea). RV always Judah. Cf. Tindale's tr[n] of Mt 2[5. 6] 'And they sayde unto hym; at Bethleem in Jury (τῆς Ἰουδαίας). For thus it is written by the Prophet. And thou Bethleem in the londe of Jury (γῆ Ἰούδα), art not the leest concernynge the Princes of Judah (Ἰούδα).'

JEZANIAH (in Jer 40 [Gr. 47][8] יַזַנְיָהוּ, LXX Ἰεζονίας; in 42 [Gr. 49][1] יַזַנְיָה, BA Ἀζαρίας, Q[mg] Ἰεζονίας).—A Judahite military officer who joined Gedaliah at Mizpah (Jer 40[8]). After the murder of Gedaliah, Jezaniah was one of those who went to the prophet Jeremiah for counsel as to their future action (42[1]). He is called in 2 K 25[23] Jaazaniah (which see), and is apparently to be identified also with Azariah (עֲזַרְיָה, Ἀζαρίας) of Jer 43[2], who was prominent in rejecting the prophet's advice.

JEZEBEL (אִיזֶבֶל, perhaps* 'un-exalted,' 'unhusbanded' [see Oxf. Heb. Lex. p. 33[a]], Ἰεζάβελ).—The daughter of Ethbaal, and wife of Ahab. Ethbaal (Ithobaal) had, after a period of revolution and anarchy, seized (c. B.C. 888) the throne of Tyre, which he occupied for more than thirty years. He was the first monarch of note who had reigned in Phœnicia since the days of Hiram, and his alliance was doubtless sought by Omri and Ahab in order to counterbalance the hostility of Damascus. The marriage of J. to Ahab (1 K 16[31]) exercised a powerful influence upon the history of religion in Israel, and indirectly also in Judah, where J.'s daughter, Athaliah, afterwards shared the throne with Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat. The worship of the Tyrian Baal was now supported by all the court influence. We are not, indeed, to suppose that Ahab abandoned the worship of J″, whose prophets he still consulted (1 K 22[6]), and whose name he meant to honour by the names he gave to his children (Ahaziah, Jehoram, Athaliah, all of which are compounds containing some form of יהוה). Nay, he could have pleaded that he simply copied the example of Solomon, both in his foreign marriage and in erecting a sanctuary for Baal (cf. 1 K 11[1. 7] with 16[31. 33]). But what had been tolerated in the days of Solomon now met with strenuous opposition. To the great prophet Elijah, J″ was a jealous God; there was no longer room in Israel for the worship of Baal; there must be no 'halting between two opinions,' but a definite choice of the one or the other deity. The attitude assumed by Elijah, and those like-minded with him, provoked the resentment of J., in whose hands Ahab seems to have been little more than a tool. The prophets of J″ were either put to death or driven to conceal themselves (1 K 18[4]), until Elijah could exclaim, 'I, even I only, am left, and they seek my life to take it away' (1 K 19[14]). The issue of the conflict on Mount Carmel, and the slaughter of the prophets of Baal, from which Elijah hoped so much, served only to augment the persecuting zeal of the queen (1 K 19[2]).

The darkest stain, however, upon the memory of J. is left by the atrocious crime she perpetrated (1 K 21) in order to procure for her husband the vineyard of Naboth the Jezreelite (see NABOTH). The judicial murder of Naboth sent a thrill of horror through the land, and, as W. R. Smith (Proph. Isr. 87), following Ewald and Wellhausen, has truly remarked, this crime had far more to do than the worship of Baal with undermining the throne of Ahab and Jezebel. The popular feeling is doubtless truly reflected in the terrible sentence which (according to the Deuteronomic compiler) Elijah passed upon the actors in this tragedy (1 K 21[17-24]).

J. survived her husband (who fell in battle at Ramoth-gilead, c. B.C. 853) some ten years, and saw her two sons, Ahaziah and Jehoram, in succession seated upon the throne. The house of Omri was at length destroyed by Jehu, a cavalry officer in the service of Jehoram, who treacherously slew both his master and Ahaziah king of Judah (2 K 9[24ff.]). When tidings of the catastrophe reached J., the aged queen prepared to meet death with fortitude and dignity. Having attired herself as for a state occasion (the notion that she meant to captivate Jehu by her charms is too ridiculous to need refutation), she awaited the arrival of the usurper, whom she mockingly accosted, 'Is it well with Zimri, the murderer of his master?'* The answer of the brutal Jehu was to order her eunuchs to cast her down from the window of the palace, and, as the helpless woman lay stunned by the fall, he and his captains trampled her under their horses' feet. After a banquet held to celebrate the success of his conspiracy, the savage warrior ordered the rites of sepulture to be paid to his victim; but it was discovered that her body had been devoured by the street dogs. So perished miserably the proud daughter of Tyre, and the murder of Naboth was avenged (2 K 9[30-37]).

The impression of J. that is left upon us by the narrative of the OT is that of an able, resolute woman, who, once she had formed a purpose, carried it to a conclusion, without much scruple as to the methods she employed. Whether she was guilty, in a literal sense, of the 'whoredoms and witchcrafts' of which Jehu speaks in 2 K 9[22], we have not sufficient evidence to decide. Her accuser is by no means an unprejudiced witness, and even he may have only meant, in his coarse fashion, to allude to her worship of the Tyrian Baal. Later traditions interpreted the accusation in its most literal sense (cf. Rev 2[20]).† There can be little doubt that the prevailing estimate of J.'s character is far less favourable than that which was cherished by her contemporaries. Much of the obloquy that attaches to her name, and that has made 'a Jezebel' a term of reproach, is due to an inexcusable misunderstanding of 2 K 9[30], which records a perfectly innocent and dignified act. It is surely a singular coincidence whereby the murderer and his victim, Jehu and Jezebel, are remembered best, not for the part they played at an

* Hommel's theory (AHT 116), that the first element of the word is a divine name, is very precarious. König (Expos. Times, Jan. 1899, p. 190[a]) suggests that the first element is אִי 'island,' and that the name may mean 'exalted isle,' which may have been originally an honorific appellation of Tyre itself.

* AV 'Had Zimri peace who slew his master?' is an improbable rendering, and even RV (text) 'Is it peace, thou Zimri, thy master's murderer?' seems hardly to suit the occasion. Our rendering is supported by Kautzsch's AT, 'Geht es Simri wohl?' and by Reuss, 'Wie geht's du Simri?' which is paraphrased by the latter, 'Ei guten Tag du Canaille!'

† The correct text is τὴν γυναῖκα. The copyist who added σου seems to have understood the 'angel' of the Church as the bishop. The name 'Jezebel' must be understood symbolically and not as the real name of the woman against whom the denunciation is uttered. She appears to have been a false prophetess (within the Christian Church, and not belonging to Judaism or heathenism) whose teaching had a licentious tendency, πορνεύειν and μοιχεύειν being probably used in a literal and not a figurative sense. Bousset (see his exhaustive note) thinks there is not sufficient evidence to warrant the interesting suggestion of Schürer, that Jezebel in this text is the priestess of the Chaldæan Sibyl, Sambethe, who is believed by Schürer to have had a sanctuary at Thyatira.

In modern times it has been applied especially to the vale between Jebel Duhy and Gilboa, sloping E. towards Beisân (see ESDRAELON). Jezreel* is the name also of—

1. A city in the territory of Issachar (Jos 19[18]), the site of which is now occupied by the village of Zer'în. This identification is beyond question. The two names are practically identical; the soft initial yod of the Heb. is dropped, and, as is not unusual, the Heb. -el is replaced by the Arab. -în in the modern word. Similar instances are found in Beitîn for Bethel, and Isma'în for Ishmael. Eusebius and Jerome (OS[2] 268. 52, 165. 14) place Jezreel in the great plain between Legio (Khân Lejjûn) and Scythopolis (Beisân), and the Bordeaux Pilgrim (A.D. 333) gives the distance from Beisân as 12 Roman miles, conditions quite met by Zer'în. Eusebius and Jerome speak of Esdraela, and the Bordeaux Pilgrim of Stradela, both obvious modifications of the Greek name of Jezreel. In Crusading times it was called Parvum Gerinum (William of Tyre, xxii. 6), and in 1173 Benjamin of Tudela mentions Zarein (זריין) as Jezreel. (The Constantinople ed. gives זרזין, but it is full of errors). Brocardus (c. vii. 176, 177) speaks of Zarcin, and notes the fine view which it commands. Sir John Maundeville says, '5 miles from Nain is the city of Jezreel, which was formerly called Zarim' (Early Travels in Palestine, Bohn's ed. p. 184). Robinson observes that from the 14th cent. to the beginning of the 19th the identification was lost sight of. He was himself the first to put it on a secure basis (BRP iii. 161–168 [[2] ii. 318–325]).

* The plain probably derived its name from the city, and not vice versâ (see Budde, Richt. u Sam. 46 ff.).

The beautiful and commanding situation of Jezreel amply warranted the distinction conferred upon it by Ahab and Jezebel. Mount Gilboa terminates to the N. in bold bluffs which descend steeply into the vale of Jezreel, and to the N.W. throws off a low sinking promontory, thrust like a wedge between the vale of Jezreel and the great bay of Esdraelon, which sweeps round by the base of Gilboa to Jenîn. Guarded on the N. by precipitous cliffs about 100 ft. in height, with the splendid rampart of Gilboa S. and S.E., it is a position of considerable strength, being easiest of approach from the S.W. Here, at an elevation of 200 ft. above the plain, stands the village of Zer'în. The hovels that form the village, some thirty in number, built on a mound of rubbish, are mean and dirty, and the general aspect is one of squalor. The inhabitants have been corrupted by travellers, and have learned to prey upon all who pass, while the street dogs here have an evil reputation for savageness.

The place contains little of interest and no antiquities. There are numerous broken cisterns among the houses; and Guérin found a white marble sarcophagus W. of the town (Samarie, i. 311; PEF Mem. ii. 131). The one conspicuous building is a large square tower, of no great age, now commonly used as a meḍâfeh or place for the entertainment of guests. From the top of this structure a magnificent view is obtained, including the great plain in its whole extent, and every point of importance around it, with the single exception of Tabor. S. and S.E. runs the high barren wall of Gilboa, with its memories of humiliation and defeat for Israel. From Engannim (Jenîn), its white domes and minarets glancing amid the greenery of its sheltered nook, the Samaritan mountains rising behind, the eye ranges along the edge of the plain to Megiddo (Khân Lejjûn), and thence to the bushy heights of Carmel, the rough crest of el-Maḫraḳah, the place of Elijah's burnt-offering showing clear against the sky. Cut off from the mountain on the north by the gorge of the Kishon, low oak-clad hills divide the plain of Acre from Esdraelon, and, sweeping round eastward in more fertile slopes, drop in precipitous cliffs upon the plain just south of Nazareth, the highest of whose white houses one may descry, with the dark uplands of Galilee beyond. Mt. Tabor is hidden by the shapely mass of Jebel Duhy, the hill of Moreh, crowned by its wely, with Shunem, Nain, and Endor clinging to its sides. Far down the broad and fertile vale of Jezreel as it slopes to the Jordan Valley, we catch a glimpse of the citadel of Beisân; and across the Ghôr the view is barred by the steep and rugged mountains of Gilead.

Besides the cisterns mentioned above, Jezreel was well situated for water supply. Bîr es-Suweid lies to the N. of the town; and at the base of the cliffs to the E. the waters of el-'Ain el-Meiyiteh, 'the dead spring,' form quite a considerable stream. The fountain is so named because once it dried up. After deep digging the waters flowed again; the pit was filled with loose gravel, and since then the supply has been continuous. About a mile farther E., in a cave at the base of Gilboa, a still more copious spring bursts forth, the stream from which is strong enough to turn a mill. This is probably the fountain where the Israelites encamped before the disastrous battle of Gilboa (1 S 29[1]). It is also with some likelihood identified with the spring of Harod (Jg 7[1]). The native name, 'Ain Jalûd or Jalût (Arab. for Goliath), seems due to some confusion with the scene of David's encounter with the giant. 'Here is the plain where David slew Goliath,' says the Bordeaux Pilgrim; but beyond this, says Robinson, no trace of the tradition is to be found. The fountain which the Crusaders knew as Tubana was doubtless the spring 'Ain Ṭuba'ûn, some little distance off, surrounded by marshy ground. The water is slightly reddish in colour. Conder suggests that this may represent the Talmudic Tubnia (Tosephta, Shevîith, ch. vii. ; PEF Mem. iii. 79). The water of all these fountains is sweet, and abounds in small fish : on this was founded the legend of the Crusading army being miraculously supplied with fish for some days (William of Tyre, xxii. 27).

Jezreel is first mentioned in marking out the lot of Issachar (Jos 19^{18}). It, with its district, remained faithful to the family of Saul, after the disaster at Gilboa (2 S 2^{9}). The days of its greatest prosperity dawned when Ahab and Jezebel, fascinated no doubt by the beauty of the place and its surroundings, chose it as a royal residence. The palace stood on the E. side of the city, the harem being close by the gate, with windows overlooking the road leading thither (2 K $9^{30.\ 31}$). A tower commanding a view of the approach from Jordan, up the vale of Jezreel, also formed part of the building (ib. 9^{17}). This was most necessary to guard against surprise ; as then, and until comparatively recent times, the hordes of the East came this way in making their inroads upon the fruitful land of Esdraelon. An object of special admiration was the house of ivory built by the king, an evidence also of the luxury in which the royal pair indulged (1 K 22^{39} ; cf. Am 3^{15} 6^{4}). The establishment of idolatrous priests must also have been large (1 K 16^{33}, 2 K 10^{11}). Hither drove Ahab from Carmel through the storm, preceded by the stern, swift-footed Tishbite (1 K $18^{45.\ 46}$). Here was the vineyard of Naboth the Jezreelite (הַיִּזְרְעֵאלִי), coveted by Ahab (ib. 21^{1}). Probably it lay E. of the town, where wine-presses cut in the rock are still to be seen (2 K $9^{21.\ 25}$). Whether this city or Samaria was the scene of Jezebel's outrage upon Naboth and his sons (1 K 21^{8-14}, 2 K 9^{26}) is in some doubt. If Ahab's blood was licked by the dogs at Samaria, that would point to the southern city as the scene of Naboth's execution (1 K 22^{38}). On the other hand, the natural sense of 1 K 21 seems to place it at Jezreel ; and with this Josephus agrees (Ant. VIII. xv. 6).* Joram, succeeding his father Ahab, maintained Jezreel as a royal residence ; and here he was visited by his kinsman Ahaziah king of Judah (2 K 8^{29}). These two were together when surprised by the newly anointed Jehu, who slew Joram and cast his body into the plot of Naboth : Ahaziah fled, but was wounded, and died at Megiddo (2 K 9^{27}). Here Jezebel also suffered miserably for her offences, being at the conqueror's command hurled from the window into the courtyard, where she was devoured by the pariah dogs (2 K 9^{30-37}). By the gateway of Jezreel were piled the heads of Ahab's 70 sons, brought hither by Jehu's orders from Samaria (2 K 10^{7}) ; then the town became the scene of one of those sickening massacres which so often stain the records of Oriental monarchies : all who might be suspected of sympathy with the house of Ahab, 'his great men, his familiar friends, and his priests,' were relentlessly done to death (ib. 10^{11}). The prosperity of Jezreel seems to have ended with the downfall of the house of Ahab, and its name is seen no more in the sacred books, save only in Hos $1^{4.\ 11}$, where it occurs with a symbolic significance. (See HOSEA).

The Crusaders knew Jezreel as Parrum Gerinum, and close by occurred in 1183 a skirmish with Saladin, after which the Saracen leader retired (William of Tyre, xxii. 26). In 1217 the Christian army passed down the vale to Beisân ; but the place has been the scene of no important event in later history ; and for many centuries it has presented, practically unchanged, the aspect of squalid poverty that meets the eye of the traveller to-day.

2. A town in the hill-country of Judæa, the site of which has not been identified. It was not far from the Judæan Carmel (Jos 15^{56}). Ahinoam (the Jezreelitess, הַיִּזְרְעֵאלִית or הַיִּזְרְעֵלִית), one of David's first two wives (1 S 25^{43} 27^{3} 30^{5}, 2 S 2^{2} 3^{2}, 1 Ch 3^{1}), was a native of this town.

JEZREELITE, JEZREELITESS.—See preceding article.

JEZRIELUS (A Ἰεζρίηλος, B Ἰεζόρικλος ; AV Hierielus), 1 Es 9^{27}.—In Ezr 10^{26} JEHIEL. The AV form is derived from the Aldine text.

JIDLAPH (יִדְלָף, perh. 'he weepeth,' if from root דָּלַף 'drip' ; A Ἰελδάφ, D om., Luc. Ἰεδλάφ).—A son of Nahor, Gn 22^{22} (J). The clan of which he is the eponym has not been identified.

JOAB (יוֹאָב 'J" is father').—1. (Ἰωάβ) the son of Zeruiah and brother of Abishai and Asahel. J.'s mother is named because she was David's sister, and thus of more importance than his father, of whom all we are told is that his sepulchre was at Bethlehem (2 S 2^{32}). The first mention of J. is upon the occasion of the engagement at Gibeon between David's men and those of Ishbosheth. Abner, who commanded the latter, was completely beaten, but in the course of his retreat killed Asahel, who had overtaken him. At sunset J., at the request of Abner, recalled his men from the pursuit, and returned to David's headquarters at Hebron (2 S 2^{12-32}). Some time afterwards Abner, having quarrelled with Ishbosheth, offered his allegiance to David. J. was absent when Saul's general visited Hebron for this purpose, but returned shortly after his departure. Prompted by a desire to avenge the death of his brother Asahel, and perhaps also by a jealous dread that Abner might supplant him in the favour of David, J. sent messengers to recall him, and then treacherously murdered him (2 S 3^{22-27}). At the siege of Jerus. by David, it was J., acc. to the Chronicler, who first scaled the citadel, and thus earned the reward promised by the king, that he should be chief captain of the host (1 Ch 11^{6}). After the defeat of the Edomites (2 S $8^{13f.}$, cf. title of Ps 60) J. remained in Idumæa for six months, and sought to exterminate all the male population. The terror of his name haunted that country for long (1 K 11^{14-21}). In conjunction with his brother Abishai, J. waged successful war against the allied forces of Syria and Ammon ; and when at length the citadel of Rabbath-ammon was ready to fall, he displayed a combination of magnanimity and prudence in sending for David to deal the final blow, so that the king himself might have the credit of the victory (2 S 11^{1} 12^{26-29}). It was during the siege of Rabbah that David was guilty of the most heinous sin of his life. J. fell in readily with the king's plan for getting rid of Uriah the Hittite, and thus obtained a new hold upon David through sharing his guilty secret (2 S 11^{6-27}). After Absalom's murder of Amnon, and his flight to Geshur, it was J. who, through the medium of 'a wise woman from Tekoa,' induced David to recall his son, and who

* It is possible that the prediction in 1 K 21^{19} (which is from a different hand from 22) contemplates the deed of Jehu in 2 K 9^{25}, and not the death of Ahab himself (cf. 1 K 21^{29}). In any case, 22^{38} is an interpolation. See, further, Wellh. Comp. 284.

at last, but with reluctance, effected a final reconciliation between them (2 S 14[ff.]). When the rebellion of Absalom broke out, J. remained loyal, and accompanied David in his flight across the Jordan. With his brother Abishai, and Ittai the Gittite, he shared the command of the royal army in the battle which proved so disastrous to Absalom and his adherents. It was by J.'s own hand that Absalom met his death as he hung defenceless in the branches of an oak. As he had not hesitated to take the rebel's life in spite of David's strict charge to the contrary, J. did not hesitate after the battle to remonstrate with the king for giving such unrestrained vent to his grief for his son's death. The sturdy common-sense of J., although his plainness of speech must have been very displeasing to his master, availed to check the disaffection that had begun to spread among the royal troops (2 S 19). It was probably resentment at J.'s conduct on this occasion that led David to transfer the command of the army to another of his nephews, Amasa, who had been Absalom's commander-in-chief (2 S 19[13]). The deadly mistake of this appointment speedily became apparent when the standard of revolt was raised by Sheba ben-Bichri. Amasa proved himself a useless fainéant, and the situation became so alarming that David was compelled to send Abishai (or perhaps J. himself) * to take command of the army. At any rate J. was present with the expedition, which was ultimately joined also by Amasa. J. seized the first opportunity to rid himself of his rival, whom he despatched with as little compunction as he had shown in the case of Abner (2 S 20[8ff.], on the text and interpretation of which see Driver, Sam., ad loc.). He then prosecuted the campaign with vigour, and speedily brought it to a successful issue. Sheba having taken refuge at Abel-beth-maacah, J. laid siege to the town, and only desisted when the head of the rebel was cast to him over the wall (2 S 20[22]). J. offered strenuous resistance to David's proposal to number the people (2 S 24[1ff.]), and, acc. to the Chronicler, did not complete the work (1 Ch 21[6]). When Adonijah took steps to have himself proclaimed king, J. attached himself to his party, probably without the slightest thought of disloyalty to David, who seems himself to have intended that Adonijah should succeed him, until the household intrigue of Bathsheba, aided by the powerful support of the prophet Nathan, led him to decide in favour of Solomon. The latter, upon his accession to the throne, considered it prudent to rid himself of J., whose influence with the army might have constituted a serious danger to the new monarch. No doubt a desire to wipe away from his house the stain of the unavenged blood of Abner and Amasa partially influenced Solomon, but State reasons must have predominated. J., on hearing that Adonijah had been put to death and Abiathar deposed, needed no further intimation that his own life was in danger, and he fled to the asylum of the altar. Refusing to leave the sacred place, by Solomon's order he was slain there by Benaiah, whose readiness to act as executioner was doubtless all the greater because he thus secured the reversion of the office of commander-in-chief for himself (1 K 2[28-34]). Acc. to 1 K 2[1-12] Solomon, in the execution of J., acted in obedience to the dying injunction of David. Wellh. and Stade hold, however, that this passage is an unhistorical interpolation. The hand of the Deuteronomic redactor is certainly evident in v.[3], but Budde (Richt u. Sam. 263 f.), following Kuenen, defends the antiquity (without committing himself to the historicity) of at least vv.[5-9].

The character of J. has often been unfairly estimated, either from lack of a due regard to the spirit of the age in which he lived, or from prejudice in favour of David and Solomon. The least that can be said is that he was a man of far-seeing statesman-like views, a brave soldier, a skilful commander, and a loyal subject. Even his assassination of Abner and Amasa, so repellent to us, could plead as excuse, in the one case the supposed duty to avenge his brother's death, and in the other the gross injustice of David in depriving him of his command. The Oriental is not usually distinguished for generosity to his enemies or scrupulousness in his methods of revenge, and J. was no exception to this rule; but his action on these two occasions must not blind us to the splendid services he rendered to his country. Without him David was like Ferdinand without Wallenstein. No doubt, like the last-named great general, J. made the most of his knowledge that he was indispensable, and thus in the end was able to obtain his own terms from his master. One thing he had resolved upon, that as he alone was fit for the post, he alone must command David's army. 'Wallenstein war Nichts wo er nicht Alles war, er muss entweder gar nicht oder mit vollkommener Freiheit handeln' (Schiller). This determination to brook no rival, combined with the low moral standard of the age, will suffice to explain the most questionable episodes in the career of the Wallenstein of Israel. J.'s conduct all through the Absalomic rebellion reflects the greatest credit upon his foresight. It is needless to offer any apology for his killing of Absalom, an act that was pardonable because necessary. Nor is it possible, as we have explained already, to convict him of treason because at first he supported Adonijah. Taking everything into account, we feel that this great man deserved a better fate, and it leaves a painful impression upon us when we learn that, after he had served his king and his country so faithfully, his grey hairs were not suffered to go down to the grave in peace.

* In 2 S 20[6] the MT and LXX have Abishai, but Syr. has Joab, and the latter reading is adopted by Thenius, Wellh., Driver, Kittel, Löhr. On the other hand, Budde, in his notes to the Bks. of Sam. in Haupt's Sacred Bks. of OT (p. 95), considers that MT is correct, and that the narrative is perfectly intelligible upon this assumption. 'As the new commander-in-chief Amasa left him in the lurch, David was obliged to make use of J.'s services, but his dignity as king would not permit the acknowledgment of this by an immediate reinstatement. By charging Abishai his brother with the commission he makes sure that J. will not remain behind, and the latter willingly joins the expedition as a volunteer, in order to put the king under new obligations to himself. The fact that he takes the leadership into his own hands is so much a matter of course that it does not need to be mentioned.'

JOAHAZ (יוֹאָחָז). — The father of Joah, the 'recorder' in the reign of Josiah, 2 Ch 34[8]. See also JEHOAHAZ.

JOAKIM ('Ιωακίμ or -είμ, LXX form of יְהוֹיָקִים).—The name is spelt Jehoiakim in canon. books, but Joacim or Joachim in Apocr. AV, and Joakim everywhere in Apocr. RV.

In Apocr. the name belongs to six persons. 1. King Jehoiakim, son of Josiah, father of Jeconiah (Bar 1[3]). 1 Es 1[40] follows LXX of 2 Ch 36[6] in saying that he was carried in copper chains to Babylon. This is in apparent, but not hopeless, discrepancy with 2 K 24[1. 6] and Jer 22[18] 36[30]. 2. Jehoiachin, son of Jehoiakim, who is erroneously called Joakim in 1 Es 1[43], and is said to have reigned after his father 3 months and 10 days. 3. A priest, son of Hilkiah, to whom the captives of B.C. 597 are said, in Bar 1[7], to have sent money for the purchase of offerings and incense. The Gr. says that the money was 'sent to J. the priest (τὸν ἱερέα), and to the priests (πρὸς τοὺς ἱερεῖς).' Hence RV renders ἱερέα, 'the high priest.' No high priest of this name, however, is mentioned in Scripture, and it is therefore better with Zöckler to regard J. as the second priest, invested with the duties of overseer or treasurer of the temple, as Pashhur (Jer 20[1]) is called chief officer in the house of J″; and as Zephaniah, a son of Hilkiah and brother of Seraiah who succeeded his father, was promised to be officer in the temple (Jer 29[26]), and was afterwards 'second priest' (Jer 52[24]). It is reasonable to suppose that Zephaniah was J.'s successor as sagan, or second priest. 4. A high priest, who, in the days of Holofernes and Judith, when the people of Judæa were 'newly come up from captivity,' is said, as head of the Senate, to have directed military affairs, by commanding the inhabitants of Bethulia to occupy the northern passes (Jth 4[3. 7]), and at the same time to have led the people in devout supplication in the temple, clad in sackcloth, and with ashes on his mitre (Jth 4[14. 15]). 5. A priest, son of Zorobabel, mentioned among the returning exiles in the reign of Darius (1 Es 5[5]). 6. The husband of Susanna, a wealthy Jew in Babylon. The rooms of his mansion were used for the administration of justice among the Jews; and acc. to Syr. W_2, for the Synagogue. The horrid calumny concocted by the two lascivious elders came on J. as a terrible blow, and, when Daniel solved the mystery, J. joined with Susanna's relatives in singing praises that no dishonour was found in her (Sus [63]). W_2 stands alone in saying that J. died shortly after marriage, and that Susanna was a pious widow when her trial came.

JOANAN ('Ιωανάν WH, 'Ιωαννᾶ TR, AV Joanna). —An ancestor of Jesus, Lk 3[27].

JOANNA ('Ιωάνα WH, 'Ιωάννα TR), the wife of Chuza, the steward of Herod Antipas. She was one of 'certain women which had been healed of evil spirits and infirmities' (Lk 8[2]). Thus bound to Jesus by the tie of gratitude, J. ministered to Him of her substance, and after the crucifixion was one of the company that went to the tomb to anoint the body of the Lord (Lk 8[3] 24[10]).

JOANNES ('Ιωάννης, AV Johannes).—1. (B -άνης) 1 Es 8[38] son of Akatan, in Ezr 8[12] JOHANAN. 2. 1 Es 9[29] son of Bebai, in Ezr 10[28] JEHOHANAN.

JOARIB ('Ιωαρ(ε)ίβ, 'Ιωαρ(ε)ίμ), 1 Mac 2[1] 14[29], Jos. Ant XII. vi. 1, the head of the priestly family from which the Maccabees were descended. Acc. to 1 Ch 24[7] this family, there called that of JEHOIARIB (which see), was the first of the twenty four courses of priests.

JOASH (יוֹאָשׁ).—1. Father of Gideon, a native of Abiezer (Jg 6[11] 8[2]). Notwithstanding Gideon's modest language (6[15]), J. must have been the most important person in his town ('one of the principal persons of the tribe of Manasseh,' Jos. Ant. V. vi. 2); he had more than ten servants (6[27]), and he was guardian of the local sanctuary of Baal. It may be reasonably supposed that the demonstrated impotence of Baal to protect his altar and the Asherah, coupled with love for his son, revived strongly in the mind of J. a conviction of the unique power of J″, which found utterance in that sarcastic address to the Abiezrites which recalls the mockery of Elijah on a like occasion, and which received a lasting memorial in the name Jerubbaal by which Gideon was known in later times (1 S 12[11], 2 S 11[21]). 2. A son of Ahab to whose custody, and that of Amon, governor of Samaria, Ahab committed Micaiah on his departure for Ramoth-gilead (1 K 22[26]=2 Ch 18[25]). J. was probably left behind as his father's viceroy. Rawlinson suggests that here and in 2 Ch 28[7] 'king's son' means a state officer; cf. Jer 36[26] 38[6]. 3. A descendant of Shelah, son of Judah, 1 Ch 4[22]. Vv.[21-23] are very obscure (see QPB). 4. (יוֹאָשׁ) A Benjamite, son of Becher, 1 Ch 7[8]. 5. A Benjamite warrior who joined David at Ziklag, 1 Ch 12[3]. 6. (יוֹאָשׁ) One of the comptrollers of David's private estate. He was over 'the cellars of oil,' 1 Ch 27[28]. N. J. D. WHITE.

JOB, BOOK OF.—In mod. edd. of the Heb. Bible, the third in order of the books called Kĕthubim in the Jewish Canon. Its place, however, has varied; in the Talm. order it stands between Ps and Pr; Jerome places it before both. In the Greek Canon the division of books is for the most part according to subject-matter. After the historical books follow Ps, Pr, Ec, Ca, Job (this is order in B); succeeded by Wis, Sir, and other extra-canonical books. Job, together with the canonical books of Pr and Ec, and the apocr. books Sir and Wis, belongs to what is called the Ḥokhmah or Wisdom-Literature of the Old Covenant, and forms its crown and climax. This article will deal severally with the Name of the book, its Contents, its Form, its Text, its Integrity, its Scope and Purpose, its Date and Authorship, and the History of its Exegesis.

i. NAME.—Heb. אִיּוֹב, Gr. 'Ιώβ, 'Ιyyōb, misrepresented in the usual Eng. pronunciation. In a postscript to the LXX (not found in Aq. or Symm., and in Theod. only in part), Job is confused with the Idumæan king Jobab, mentioned in Gn 36[33]. The sentence runs: 'This man is described in the Syriac book as living in the land of Ausis, on the borders of Idumæa and Arabia; and his name before was Jobab, and having taken an Arabian wife, he begot a son whose name was Ennon.' By a further confusion in the name Ζαρά (Gn 36[3]), Job's descent from Esau is inferred. The traditions embodied in this postscript are followed in the Koran, but are wholly untrustworthy. (For additional traditions concerning Job, see Koran, Suras 38, 40, also Sura 21).

The derivation of the name is doubtful, and the attempts to give to it a significance drawn from etymology are very questionable. It has been taken (Ges. and others) as a passive form from root אוב, meaning 'one persecuted' by Satan, or by his friends, or by calamity. Cf. יְלוֹד from ילד. But this form is never purely passive (Volck, p. 6). Others (including Ewald and Delitzsch) explain after the analogy of Arab. awwâb, as from root אוּב, 'the penitent one, resipiscens, or pious, ever turning' to God. The latter explanation is favoured by Hitzig and Cheyne (see his Job and Solomon, p. 62 and note).

The name of Uz (עוּץ) as the country in which Job lived is not of much assistance in determining his personality. The name is given to a son of Aram in Gn 10^{23}, to a son of Nahor Gn 22^{21} (RV, in AV Huz), and to a grandson of Seir Gn 36^{28}. This last passage, joined with Jer 25^{20} and the mention of Uz in connexion with Edom in La 4^{21}, points to a district E. or S.E. of Palestine, N. of Arabia, and adjacent to Edom. The LXX, quoted above, probably embodies a prevalent tradition; another tradition, traced out by Wetzstein (see Delitzsch, Comm., Appendix), points to the district of the Hauran. Fr. Delitzsch, judging from certain cuneiform inscriptions, fixes upon a district near Palmyra for the site of Uz, whilst some view the names both of place and hero as symbolical only. The names Bĕnê-ḳedem, 'children of the East' (1^{3}), 'Temanite,' and to a less extent 'Shuhite' and 'Naamathite,' may be held to confirm the general indications of locality mentioned above. (See Uz).

Outside this book, Job is mentioned in Scripture only in Ezk $14^{14.\ 19}$ 'These three men, Noah, Daniel, and Job'; and in Ja 5^{11} 'Ye have heard of the patience of Job.' Both of these passages apparently imply a belief in the actual existence of the proverbially upright and patient man of that name, but not necessarily the existence of this book, or the treatment which Job's history receives in it.

ii. Contents.—The following is an outline or 'argument' of this remarkable book; its form and significance will be considered later. It may be divided into five parts. 1. Prologue, written in prose, chs. 1 and 2. 2. Colloquies between Job and his friends, including Job's Lament, ch. 3. First colloquy, chs. 4–14; second colloquy, chs. 15–21; third colloquy, chs. 22–31. In the first two colloquies, each friend speaks once, and Job replies to each; in the third, according to the present arrangement of the text, Zophar fails to take up his turn, and Job, after replying to Bildad (ch. 26), speaks at unusual length, partly in a kind of monologue (chs. 27–31). 3. Intervention of Elihu, chs. 32–37. 4. A Theophany; utterances of J″, with very brief replies of Job, chs. 38–42^{6}. 5. Epilogue, written in prose, ch. 42^{7-17}.

1. The Prologue introduces us to a man named Job, living in the land of Uz, of great wealth and exceptional piety, surrounded by a large and happy family, and possessing every mark of divine favour. Upon this man there falls a series of heavy calamities, succeeding one another with startling rapidity, each more severe and trying than the last. His flocks are carried off by marauders or smitten by lightning, he is stripped of all his possessions, and bereaved at a stroke of all his children. The Prologue represents this as due to a scene in the Council of Heaven, at which there appeared among the 'sons of God' a being called 'the Satan' or 'the Adversary,' who questioned the sincerity and disinterestedness of Job's religion, and received permission to afflict him in various ways, but not to touch himself. This experiment is described as resulting in Job's complete vindication. He bowed in submission to the divine will, and in all this first stage he 'sinned not, nor charged God with folly,' i.e. never questioned the moral rectitude of divine providence.

Another council is represented as held in heaven, at which the Adversary accounts for Job's fidelity by saying that he has not been made to suffer in his own person. Permission is then given to inflict the utmost bodily pain upon Job, only his life is to be spared. Job is accordingly smitten with one of the most painful and loathsome of diseases, elephantiasis, a peculiarly trying form of leprosy. But in his utmost suffering and degradation he utters no complaint, though even his wife bids him 'renounce God and die.' Having received good at God's hand, he was content patiently to 'receive evil,' and in all this Job 'sinned not with his lips.'

2. Three friends, Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar, now come to condole with him. They sit in silent sympathy for seven days and seven nights, and 'none spake a word unto him, for they saw that his pain was very great.' The silence is at last broken by Job himself. He had thus far borne unparalleled troubles with unparalleled resignation, but now he 'opened his mouth and cursed his day.' The long-drawn wail of the third chapter is not a direct arraignment of God's providence, but it contains a bitter, agonised complaint which virtually amounts to this. He curses the day on which he was born, wondering why the misery of birth into such a life should ever have been inflicted upon him, and passionately longing for death as a blessed release which is inexplicably denied him. This outburst from the depth of a soul in anguish forms the occasion of the debate which follows. The tone of Job's complaint appears impious in the ears of his friends, who remonstrate, each after his own fashion, whilst to each elaborate speech Job makes elaborate reply. The first stage of the discussion is chiefly occupied by an assertion on the part of the friends of the justice and goodness of God, whose government of the world must be in accordance with truth and equity, the wicked suffering for their sin and the righteous enjoying divine favour. Job meets this by a passionate assertion of his own innocence, and a bitter and often very bold arraignment of the present order of things. At the second stage, the friends dwell more upon history and experience, pointing out the calamities which attend upon evil-doing, and leaving it to be inferred that some kind of sin must lie at the root of the troubles which have overwhelmed Job. On his part, Job clings all the more tenaciously to his original position. At the third stage of discussion, the friends attack Job more directly and explicitly, charging him with definite sins which they are sure he must have committed, to be thus punished. As the friends become more violent, Job becomes more calm. He has been working his way towards a solution, though as yet it is far from clear. He cares less to debate with men, and throws his soul more and more upon God, though He be still strangely and darkly hidden from him. Job's long monologue is full of pathos and sadness, but the bitterness which marked his 'curse' and opening speeches has given place to a more equable frame of mind.

Such is a general outline of the three colloquies, but it must not be understood that the progress thus sketched is uniform and unbroken. Neither Job nor his friends speak 'by the card.' Their utterances contain reasoning of a kind, but they are for the most part the outpourings of deep and earnest feeling, which cannot be reduced to syllogisms, and which necessarily imply much repetition and occasional inconsistencies. Job travels back upon his own course, varies in his moods, speaks now to God, now to the friends, now to himself; he is sometimes inconsistent, if not self-contradictory, as a sufferer wrestling with such a problem was likely to be. The speeches form part of a poem, not of an abstract demonstration, though the poet is artist enough to preserve order in the midst of variety, and never loses the thread of his argument amidst the outpourings of speakers whose feelings are sometimes at white heat. The first speech of Eliphaz is undoubtedly the most moderate, being almost apologetic in tone, whilst the last speeches show that the argument has come to a deadlock, and the resources of the friends fail them. Beyond this it is difficult to trace any clearly defined or steadily maintained advance in the arguments on either side. The conclusion shows each speaker as only more fully confirmed in his original position.

3. Here, according to the arrangement of the book as it has come down to us, an episode occurs, in which a previously unmentioned speaker, named Elihu, intervenes, and gives at considerable length his judgment upon the question in dispute (chs. 32 to 37). After a somewhat tedious introduction (32^{6-33}), Elihu blames the friends for the insufficiency of their arguments, but still more severely condemns Job for justifying himself, and undertakes to correct his many mistakes. The address to Job may be divided into four parts, corresponding with chs. 33. 34. 35 and 36–37 respectively. The gist of the whole may, however, be described as an attempted vindication of God, as at the same time a just and a merciful ruler of the world, who is great and glorious above man's power to comprehend, and who sends afflictions upon His own people as a chastisement, or as a means of purification, or as a divine warning against sin. In the stress laid upon affliction as discipline, lies Elihu's chief contribution to the discussion.

4. In the next section of the poem, J″ intervenes and 'answers Job out of the whirlwind.' Two addresses of the Almighty are given—the first in chs. 38^{1}–40^{2}, followed by a brief reply from Job $40^{3.5}$; the second in chs. 40^{6}–41^{34}, followed by another act of submission on Job's part, 42^{1-6}. The chief subject of the divine address is the glory of God in creation, the sublime and awe-inspiring features of which are recounted in order to impress Job with the greatness of God and the littleness of man, and the unsearchable wisdom and inconceivable power of God compared with man's utter ignorance and weakness. Sometimes the description enters into minute detail, as in the picture of Behemoth (the hippopotamus) in 40^{15-24}, and Leviathan (the crocodile) in 41^{1-34}. The description of the war-horse also in 39^{19-25} is elaborate and highly poetical. The object of the whole address, however, as indicated from time to time by a series of ironical questions, is to overwhelm Job with a sense of the irresistible majesty and resource of that God the justice of whose government he has ventured to impugn. How can one who is so utterly unable to subdue a single one of God's creatures, whose knowledge of even a corner of creation is so hopelessly inadequate, dare to arraign the procedure of Him who holds a universe of such creatures in the hollow of His hand? The effect of these addresses is immediate and complete. Job first confesses himself silenced and justly rebuked, and at last in full contrition acknowledges his sin and folly, repents of his ill-advised complaints, and bows low in submission beneath the irresistible hand of the Almighty.

5. In the epilogue, the story which was begun by a scene in heaven ends with a dénoûment visible on earth. The friends who had thought themselves representatives of the divine cause are rebuked, because they had not spoken of God 'the thing that is right,' as His servant Job had done. They are forgiven at Job's intercession, while on Job himself is bestowed prosperity precisely double that which he had previously enjoyed. Job lived long after all his troubles were over, saw 'four generations' of descendants, and died 'being old and full of days'—a sure mark of divine approval and favour (42^{7-17}).

iii. FORM.—The first question which falls to be considered under this head is whether the author intended to convey the idea that he was writing literal history. His narrative begins with the matter-of-fact statement, 'There was a man in the land of Uz,' etc., and both prologue and epilogue at first sight appear to be simple statements of actual fact. This view was held by a large proportion of early Jewish interpreters, but not universally. R. Resh Lakish is quoted in the Talmud (Baba Bathra, § 15. 1) as having said, 'Job existed not, and was not created, but he is (only) a parable.' This was altered later into 'was not created except to be a parable.' The prevailing opinion amongst both Jews and Christians for many centuries was that the Bk. of Job was strictly historical. Luther questioned, not the existence of Job, nor the substantial accuracy of the story told in the book, but its literal interpretation throughout as a record of actual facts. Some recent critics (Reuss, Merx, Hengstenberg) have gone to the opposite extreme, and represent the book as entirely imaginative. The majority of modern interpreters, however, view the book as 'poetically treated history'; some (e.g. Cheyne) finding in it but a small kernel of fact; others, from Grotius and Lowth to Delitzsch, Davidson, and Driver, being content to read the poem as a free and imaginative rendering of facts handed down by tradition and here substantially reproduced. It is hardly necessary to argue at length that the book cannot be read as literal history from beginning to end. The descriptions of the heavenly council in the prologue are clearly symbolical. The numbers used in the prologue, and the exact doubling of Job's possessions in the epilogue, indicate an ideal rather than an actual picture. Job's calamities come upon him in such a sudden and dramatic form, and are described in so poetical a fashion, with a sort of refrain, 'I, even I only, am left to tell thee,' that we readily understand we are not too literally to interpret every word. And never was it known that sufferer in the extremity of his anguish delivered his soul in highly elaborated poetical phraseology. If, then, the view of the book as 'poetically treated history' be taken as the most probable hypothesis, it is clear that considerable room is left for diversity of judgment as to where the solid substance of fact ends and the drapery of the poet's imaginative treatment begins. The names of the hero and his friends, the country in which he dwelt, the afflictions which befell him, the patience with which he endured them, and his emergence out of his difficulties, may perhaps be considered a kind of irreducible minimum of history used by the inspired genius of the author in his wrestling with the age-long problem before him.

Closely akin to this is the question whether the author of 'Job' intended to represent his hero, not as an individual, but as a type of the righteous in affliction. Does imaginative treatment extend so far that the name of an historical personage is merely used to embody teaching concerning national calamities and the way to meet them? Cheyne adopts the view of Chateaubriand, that 'Job is a type of righteous men in affliction' (see his Job and Solomon, p. 65, and the essay in Proph. of Isaiah, ii. 235–244), adding, that 'the common view that the hero of the poem of Job is simply an individual must, it is clear, be abandoned.' This can only be established if emphasis upon the word 'simply' is maintained. A purely allegorical view of the poem leads to questionable and sometimes fantastic exegesis. And there is nc sufficient warrant for supposing that the modern dramatic mode of treating such a theme, the historical element being so far minimized as to be hardly discernible, and a purely imaginative treatment of a religious subject adopted, was likely to have been used by a Jew at any period to which this book has been assigned. It seems most satisfactory to say, with such writers as Fairbairn (City of God, p. 146), that 'the national reposes on the personal sense,' and with A. B. Davidson, that 'Job is scarcely to be considered Israel, under a feigned name. He is not Israel, though Israel may see itself and its history reflected in him. It is the elements of reality in Job's history common to him with Israel in affliction, common even to him with humanity as a whole . . . it is these elements of truth that make the history of Job instructive to the people of Israel in the times of affliction when it was set before them, and to men in all ages' (see his Job, Introd. pp. xxvi, xxvii).

The chief reasons which incline us to this view of the poem lie, in truth, upon the surface. The references in Ezk 14^{14} and Ja 5^{11} suggest that Job was an actual person, known to tradition. The writer of the book conveys the impression that he is dealing with actual history, and his teaching would lose much of its force if it were supposed that the whole story lay in the mere cloudland of imagination. A majority of writers, however, include the word dramatic, in some form or other, in their characterization of the poem. Theodore of Mopsuestia employed the epithet in the 4th cent., and in modern times Ewald, Hupfeld, and Davidson use the word drama to describe the book. Delitzsch styles it a drama not emancipated from the lyric element, reminding us that a drama need not be scenic in its character. Volck, after Nöldeke, defines Job as 'a didactic poem, in dialogue form, with dramatic development.' Milton described it as an epic, and Godet follows in the same direction. Cheyne calls it a 'germinal character drama,' and compares Goethe's 'Iphigenia' and 'Tasso.' Driver says, 'It is of the nature of a drama, and may be termed a dramatic poem. Its principal parts are constructed in the form of a dialogue, and the action which it represents passes through the successive stages of entanglement, development, and solution. The action is, however, largely internal and mental, the successive scenes exhibiting the varying moods of a great soul struggling with the mysteries of fate, rather than trying external situations' (Introd. to O.T. Lit.[6] p. 411). If any technical definition of form is to be given, that of Volck, quoted above, appears to be the best, or the shorter phrase 'dramatic poem' might be admitted, for a drama in the usual sense of the word the book certainly is not. The name 'lyrical' or 'didactic-lyrical' (G. Baur, Stud. und Krit. 1856, p. 582) is misleading in its associations. But it is probably a mistake to attempt to stretch this highly original poem upon a Procrustes' bed, in order to make it fit in with later systems of classification. 'Soul is form, and doth the body make.' The author of Job had certain materials to use, and he kept certain religious objects in view as he wrote; he possessed a poetic genius of remarkable constructive power, and his thoughts were guided by the Divine Spirit. Under these circumstances he produced, not a drama, nor a didactic poem, nor any composition of conventional form or shape, but—the Bk. of Job, which is a law to itself, and which has influenced subsequent writers whose names stand among the highest in literature, yet who, by general consent, are, merely from the literary point of view, outsoared and outshone by their great prototype.

The intimate structure of the poem can best be understood in connexion with the general subject of the poetry of the OT (see POETRY). It may, however, be well to say that the ultimate element in Job, as in all Heb. poetry, is the couplet or distich, consisting of two parallel clauses, the length of each line being determined, not by the laws of regular metre, but by the beat of an irregular but musical rhythm. The single stones of which the poetical structure is composed may be triplets or quatrains instead of couplets, but these larger or smaller units are combined so as to form a strophe (the 'paragraph' of prose), and laws, which are none the less effective because informal and instinctively obeyed, determine the varying lengths of the line, the varying character of the parallelism, and the varying structure of the strophe. An analysis of Job's lament in ch. 3, or of any of the speeches, would illustrate in detail what can here be stated only in outline. It may be remarked, however, that the skill of the poet is especially conspicuous in the success with which he employs throughout a long poem a form of composition which is chiefly suited to the gnomic wisdom of 'Proverbs' or the comparatively brief lyrics of the Psalms.

But the poetical character of Job does not depend upon the balance of syllables or the answering beat of lines and clauses. The constructive imagination of the writer is conspicuous throughout. It reveals itself as remarkably in the bold conceptions, the free, flowing outlines of the whole poem, as in the wealth, variety, and finish of its detailed imagery. The architect of a cathedral shows his skill alike in the detailed workmanship of bosses and finials and in his conception of a majestic whole. It is hardly within the compass of this article to dwell upon the poetical grandeur of Job viewed as a literary composition. The sublimity and simplicity of its leading conceptions, the pictures of the august scene in the council-chamber of heaven, and of the sudden desolation and overwhelming sorrow in the earthly household, of Job lying in physical anguish and mental bewilderment upon the mezbele or ash-mound outside his house, and the deep sympathetic silence of his friends broken at last by the heartrending wail of the sufferer's despair, —all indicate the hand of a poet at the outset, and prepare the way for the unfolding of the tragedy that follows. Only a close study of the book can give an idea of the richness and multiplicity of its metaphors, the concentrated vigour of its phraseology, its depth of human feeling, its portraiture of patriarchal life, and the impressiveness of the descriptions of external nature, which form throughout a majestic background to the moving picture of human pain and sorrow.

Sometimes the figurative language is closely condensed—

> 'Wilt thou harass a driven leaf,
> And chase the withered stubble?' (13^{25}).

Sometimes the metaphor is elaborated with startling vigour and emphasis, as in the description of the Divine Being as a giant antagonist wrestling with the puny human frame, or making a target of the miserable man who can offer no resistance—

> 'I was at ease, but he shattered me;
> He seized me by the throat and shook me;
> He set me up as his mark,
> His arrows beset me.
> He cleaveth my side, and doth not spare;
> He sheddeth my gall upon the ground;
> He breaketh me with breach upon breach,
> He rusheth upon me like a giant' ($16^{12\text{-}14}$).

The description of the lion in $4^{10.\,11}$, of the eagle in ch. 39, 'where the slain are, there is she,' the comparison of deceitful friends to the brook drying up in summer and the mirage of the desert in $6^{15\text{-}20}$, the brief but graphic succession of figures to describe the rapid flight of years—

> 'My days are swifter than a runner;
> They flit away, they see no good;
> They shoot by like skiffs of reed,
> Like an eagle that swoopeth upon its prey!' ($9^{25.\,26}$)— are only examples taken at random of a poetic vitality in the writer which seems inexhaustible. The sketches of the wild beast in the desert are as faithful in detail as the limning of the glories of the constellations in the nightly sky is impressive; but in each case the work is done by a few strokes of a master-hand. One passage only may be transcribed as an example of several of the features which have been thus summarily and inadequately sketched, and it will, at the same time, illustrate the arrangement of the poem in strophes—

> 'The Shades tremble
> Deep below the waters and their inhabitants.
> The Unseen World is naked before him,
> The Abyss of Destruction hath no covering,
> He stretcheth out the North over the void,
> And hangeth the earth upon nothing . . .
> The pillars of heaven tremble,
> And are amazed at his rebuke . . .
> Lo, these are but the outskirts of his ways;
> And how small a whisper hath been heard of him
> But the thunder of his power, who can understand?'
> ($26^{5.\,6.\,11.\,14}$)

iv. TEXT.—The Massoretic text of the OT, as is now generally recognized, stands in some places in great need of critical emendation, but the materials extant for the purpose are very scanty. The oldest MS of Job is separated in date from its composition by more than twelve hundred years, and few critical helps from without are forthcoming to aid in the examination and, if need be, the reconstruction of the text. Under these circumstances, textual criticism virtually resolves itself into a comparison of the Heb. with the chief ancient versions, and an examination of internal evidence and inherent probabilities of corruption. Such a process naturally leads to widely differing results, varying according to the preconceptions and methods of individual critics. In modern times Merx led the way in his Das Gedicht von Hiob (1871), advocating a reconstruction of the text, based partly upon the ancient versions and partly upon a metrical arrangement of his own. G. Bateson Wright in 1883 carried the work some steps further. Bickell in his Carmina V.T. (1882) and in a series of papers in the Vienna Zeitsch. f. K. d. Morgenlandes (1891–94) has propounded an elaborate and revolutionary theory for ascertaining what he considers to be the primitive text of Job. He depends partly upon the LXX, but partly also on certain metrical theories, of which more will be said shortly. This work of Bickell has been popularized in English by Dillon in his Sceptics of the Old Testament (1895). Finally, Siegfried has published a polychromatic ed. of the text of Job (in Haupt's Sacred Books of OT), in which a thoroughgoing recension is advocated, based mainly upon internal evidence such as satisfies the critic.

The chief point for consideration at this stage is the LXX version.

This probably dates from the early or middle portion of the 2nd cent. B.C. The character of the translation is too free and loose to be of much service in the detailed criticism of the text, but it has been long known to scholars that the original text of the LXX was much shorter than the Textus Receptus now found in our MSS. In the time of Origen the current Gr. version was shorter than the Heb. by some 400 lines, the omissions noted by Jerome amounting to more than 700. Origen (Ep. ad Afric. § 4) tells us that, in the copies he used, as many as from three or four to sixteen or nineteen verses were lacking in some places, and he remedied the deficiencies by supplying the Greek from Theodotion, obelizing all the passages thus added to the Gr. text before him. Five MSS are extant preserving Origen's marks, and in 1889 Ciasca published a Coptic tr. of the LXX version of Job which exhibits the pre-Origenian state of the text. As this version substantially agrees with the evidence furnished by the five MSS above named, omitting the passages which in them are marked with asterisks, it is clear that this text gives us the LXX version in its earliest form.

The question is, what is its relation to the Hebrew? It must not be taken for granted either that it is earlier and purer than the MT, or that it is simply a curtailed and mutilated tr. from the Heb. that has come down to us. A similar state of things exists in relation to the text of Jeremiah, and scholars are not yet agreed upon an interpretation of the facts. In the case of Job, Bickell uses this evidence to support his own very sweeping reconstruction of the text, seeking to show that the book in its present state has grown by additions, successively made, to a very much shorter poem. Hatch (Essays in Bib. Greek, pp. 215–245) argues in the same sense, that the early Greek translation represents the primitive form, the Hebrew a later and amplified form, of the text. Dillmann, on the other hand (Trans. Royal Prus. Acad. of Sci. 1890), contends that, except in a few cases, omissions from the Heb. were arbitrarily made by the Gr. translator—a view apparently held previously by Bickell himself; and Driver (Contemp. Rev. Feb. 1896, p. 262), though with some hesitation, pronounces the latter to be the more probable hypothesis. It is noteworthy that the omissions of the LXX do not relieve the chief difficulties which attend the text of the book as it stands, whilst, in several cases at least, it is difficult to understand the context without these omitted passages, or to explain how, if they did not form part of the original text, the passages in the Heb. came to be added to it. Glosses and amplifications on such a scale generally declare themselves as such beyond much possibility of question. Intrinsic probability, in other words, is almost entirely against the hypothesis that the shorter Gr. form represents the primitive type of text. Budde, in his latest work on Job (see Literature below), also pronounces against the view of Bickell and Hatch.

None of the other versions are of much use in textual criticism. The Peshitta Syriac was made from the Heb., and its renderings are occasionally serviceable in difficulties of detail. The variations of the Targum are more curious than helpful, while the old Latin version was made from the Gr., and exhibits the same peculiarities (cf. Burkitt, Old Lat. and Itala, p. 8 f.). A revision of it was made by Jerome, preserving the critical marks which indicated the passages supplied from the Heb. to fill up the considerable deficiencies noted above.

v. INTEGRITY.—Obviously, this subject is closely connected with the last, and some arguments of critics concerning the text have been reserved for this section, because a discussion of the genuineness of certain passages cannot be carried on without an examination into the subject-matter of the book. Criticism has been busy in recent years with the construction of Job, and most modern interpreters hold that the book as it has come down to us has undergone more or less of amplification or modification. Some would reduce the volume of the book by at least one half. They hold that neither prologue nor epilogue, neither the speeches of the Almighty nor those of Elihu, formed part of the original work, and that the speeches of Job and the three friends must be both reduced in bulk and altered in character, if we would read them in their original form. Representatives of this extreme view, which lops off from the statue limbs and members till a mere torso, altered in its proportions, is left, are Bickell and Studer.

Three main reasons are assigned for this trenchant handling of the text. (1) The fact that the earliest form of the LXX version was so much shorter than the Heb. as it now stands. But we have seen that it is by no means clearly proved that the shorter form represents the primitive type, and the reconstruction proposed in many respects does not follow the lines thus indicated. (2) A metrical theory concerning the composition of Job—a hypothesis of great learning and ingenuity, in which, however, few Heb. scholars have followed Bickell—demands some such system of wholesale abbreviation as is thus proposed. This attempt to make the lines of Job 'scan' can only be carried out by the application of extreme violence. Not only must whole passages be shorn away, but the lines that remain must be read with frequent elisions and accommodations. In many cases these are so violent and unnatural as to make it clear that Bickell is trying to force into uniformity and regularity an irregular though real and impressive poetical rhythm which runs through the book. It may be added, that a metrical version of a poem which can be remembered with ease would not readily be displaced by a more cumbrous and irregular form. The whole history of Heb. poetry, moreover, is against the supposition that a poem of the length of Job, and of its probable date, was composed in regular metre with lines of almost uniform regulation length.

(3) The third chief line of argument is drawn from a view of the scope and design of 'Job' which is by no means proved. It assumes that the book in its first conception was a poem of revolt, the utterance of a genuine 'sceptic of the Old Testament,' who rebelled against the current doctrine of reward and punishment, and that it has only assumed its present shape under the hands of a number of 'orthodox' manipulators, who, by various additions and interpolations, have contrived to dress up the original product of a Sturm und Drang period into a shape in which it might appear in the sacred Canon. Without discussing this hypothesis in full, two remarks may be made. One is, that writers in the OT are not in the habit of disguising their moods of doubt and murmuring, and even rebellion against the will of God. The psalmists give the account of their gloomy periods of unsettled faith and positive denial; while Jeremiah from time to time 'waxes very bold,' and, like Elijah in his despondency, is driven by the pressure of the problems of life to doubt and to deny the goodness of Him who controls life. This supposed dressing up of doubt into decent orthodoxy is a device of modern days. It should be noticed, also, that this theory of the origin and history of 'Job' is hampered with the further difficulty that these large additions were made to the original text by a poet or poets whose 'imaginative power was at least not inferior to that of the original writer' (Hatch, op. cit. p. 244)—a somewhat large demand to make, when the original and sublime character of the book as a whole is borne in mind.

Siegfried, without going so far as Bickell, is yet very severe in his castigation of the MT. He classifies some passages—which may be represented by ch. 28, and the Elihu speeches, chs. 32–37—as 'polemical interpolations directed against the tendency of the poem.' Other passages found in the 12th, 27th, and other chapters, are styled 'correcting interpolations, conforming the speeches of Job to the orthodox doctrine of retribution'; while others, again, are 'parallel compositions,' amongst them being found the section 40^6–42^6. Some fifty separate passages are banished from the text as scattered interpolations of editors, inserted during the process of 'working over' the poem, which de Wette was the first to suggest had been freely employed. The shorn remnant of the text is, especially in chs. 13 and 14, 20 and 21, and again in 30 and 31, rearranged as regards the order of its clauses and paragraphs, according to the critic's judgment. It is, perhaps, unnecessary to say that for this wholesale reorganization there is no external evidence, the primitive form of the LXX text giving very little assistance in the places where serious difficulties in subject-matter are supposed to require radical changes in the text. Studer (1881) reconstructs the whole book, making chs. 29 and 30 the original prologue—a process which A. B. Davidson describes as leaving a mere trunk, 'so misshapen that its shoulders are found in the region of its bowels.'

Two recent monographs, representing the prevailing current of contemporary criticism, may be mentioned: Grill, Zur Composition des B. Hiob (1890); and Laue, Die Composition des B. Hiob (1896). The former rejects, as not belonging to the original book, the Elihu speeches, the descriptions of Behemoth and Leviathan, also $12^{4\text{-}13}$ $24^{5\text{-}9.\ 14\text{-}21}$ $26^{2\text{-}27}$ $27^{7\text{-}31}$, and chs. 29 and 30. Laue holds that ch. $9^{9\text{-}24}$ and ch. 12 are out of place, and that the former paragraph should be placed after ch. 25, and the latter after ch. 27. Ch. 24 is condemned in part as having been 'worked over,' only a portion of it representing the original tendency of the poem. From chs. 25–28 he admits only $26^{1\text{-}4}$ and $27^{1\text{-}6}$ as genuine. Laue, like many other critics, pronounces the Elihu speeches and the 'Behemoth and Leviathan episodes' to be interpolations, but he holds both prologue and epilogue to be genuine and indispensable parts of the original poem.

Merx, Bateson Wright, and Cheyne may stand as representing those who advocate less sweeping but very considerable changes. Some of the chief modifications proposed are, that as Bildad's speech in ch. 25 is very short, ch. $26^{5\text{-}14}$ might be better placed as a continuation of it. To supply the place of Zophar's third speech, which is lacking, ch. $27^{8\text{-}23}$—very awkwardly placed where it stands—might be read as coming from him. Ch. 28 is held to be a later insertion, as well as the whole episode of Elihu. The few verses, ch. $31^{38\text{-}40}$, even Delitzsch considers to be misplaced, forming an anti-climax in their present connexion. He would transpose and read them between vv. ^{32} and ^{33}.

A. B. Davidson is still more moderate; he is, in fact, one of the most conservative critics of the book. He holds that, with the exception of the speeches of Elihu, no serious objection can be brought against any of the five great divisions of the poem, but the Elihu episode he, in common with nearly all moderns, pronounces to be a later addition. Further, he entertains somewhat serious suspicions concerning ch. $27^{7\text{-}23}$, ch. 28, and the descriptions of Behemoth and Leviathan in the speeches of the Almighty, but apparently would not, on the whole, remove these from the text. A view nearly coinciding with this will be advocated in the present article; but the ultimate decision of such a question as this largely depends, it is clear, upon subjective considerations. Two classes of these may be mentioned. (1) What measure of difficulty in a passage warrants conjectural emendation, and how far is a 19th cent. critic competent to reconstruct an ancient poem, without being guilty of the vice of trying it by his own preconceived ideas and standards? (2) What is the view to be taken of the scope and design of the book? Can it be viewed as a fairly harmonious whole in its present state, and what amount of apparent inconsistency warrants interference with the text as it stands? These are questions which are certain to receive different answers from different types of mind. The only satisfactory line of argument in a conservative direction lies in a justification of the book as it stands, and its success must depend upon power to show that the book can be better understood as we have it, with certain comparatively slight omissions and modifications, than in the forms proposed by more destructive and revolutionary theories.

The section most open to objection is that containing the speeches of Elihu. The chief arguments against its having formed a part of the original book are the following. (a) Elihu is not mentioned either in the prologue or the epilogue. In the latter, especially, it would seem unnatural that Jehovah, when referring to the speeches of the three friends and Job, should pass Elihu by in silence. (b) Chs. 32–37 are awkwardly placed between Job's monologue and the divine answer out of the whirlwind. The intervention of the Almighty, and the words with which He addresses Job, are much better understood if ch. 38 follows immediately upon ch. 31. The ease and advantage with which this section could be detached from the rest of the poem seems to point to a line of juncture here. (c) Elihu's arguments appear to consist partly of a repetition of those of the three friends, partly an anticipation of the address of Jehovah. So far as Elihu does furnish an original contribution to the discussion in the emphasis which he lays upon the purifying influence of suffering viewed as chastisement, it is not in harmony with the general teaching of the book. (d) The style is prolix, and, in the opinion of most, distinctly inferior to the rest of the book; though Kuenen (for example) has pronounced that style alone would in this case be insufficient to prove a later origin. (e) Certain peculiarities of language are discernible, a much stronger and more decided Aramaic colouring being discernible in this section. Canon F. C. Cook (Speaker's Com.) argues, after Schlottmann, that this is the poet's way of indicating Elihu's Aramæan origin. The subject is investigated at length in Stickel's Das Buch Hiob (1842), Budde's Beiträge zur Kritik des B. H. (1876), and in an essay of Kleinert (Stud. u. Krit. 1886); and the bearings of these are investigated by Cheyne (Job and Solomon, Appendix, etc. 291–293), who sums up in the words, 'Evidently the speeches of Elihu are later compositions.' (Budde is the most distinguished of the defenders of the genuineness of the speeches).

The force of these arguments really lies in their conjunction. It will be observed that they are of different kinds, and their cumulative force is therefore all the greater. Standing alone, each one would not be fatal. Cook, for example, points out that no person is named in the book till he begins to take part in the action, and he attaches considerable weight to the arguments adduced by Elihu. Bradley, however, in his thoughtful lectures on the Book of Job (1887), takes a different view. The concurrence of arguments drawn from different quarters appears to the present writer convincing, and perhaps the strongest evidence of all is drawn from the view taken of the book as a whole, the plan and outline of which the episode of Elihu mars, or positively disfigures.

The same must, on the whole, be said of ch. 27^{7-23} and ch. 28. The former passage contains an elaborate account of the afflictions which overtake the wicked, apparently quite out of place on the lips of Job, and containing precisely such arguments as had previously been urged by his friends. Compare, e.g., the speech of Zophar in ch. 20, and observe that 27^{13} is almost identical in expression with 20^{29}. There is no real connexion between the first six verses of ch. 27, in which Job asserts his own innocence, and the strain of the verses that follow, which are quite inconsistent with Job's previous contentions. The only two modes of reconciliation possible are these. (1) Job wishes to show that he does not altogether deny the fact that the wicked are punished, and is anxious to sever himself from their perilous and friendless condition. He shrinks from the very thought of being as the wicked are. He wishes to 'avoid everything that can appear ambiguous, and to take a position upon a much higher elevation' (Ewald). Even, however, if this train of thought were appropriate in Job's mouth, it cannot be said that it fits in at all suitably with 27^{1-6} which precedes, or ch. 28 which follows. Or (2) it may be urged (again with Ewald) that Job has by this time conquered his doubts as to the divine moral government, that these 'have worked their own cure,' and that he anticipates already some such issue as is described in the epilogue. But it requires only a moment's consideration to see that this disturbs the whole order of the composition, that it is quite inconsistent with the language of Job's soliloquy, especially ch. 30, and it does not harmonize with the address of the Almighty to Job, which follows.

Ch. 28, again, is of the nature of an episode, beautiful and impressive in itself, worthy of a poetic genius and a devout spirit, but exceedingly difficult to understand in the place which it occupies in the poem. The general drift of the chapter is that Wisdom—in the sense of the principles of true and righteous government which direct the course of this world's affairs—is inscrutable by man; the only possible course for man is to fear and trust Jehovah, and (by implication) to leave himself and his fortunes entirely in the hands of God. Such a train of thought is quite in harmony with the teaching of other parts of Jewish sacred books,—compare several psalms and parts of Proverbs,—but it is irreconcilable with Job's previous position and subsequent language in chs. 30, 31. If Job had already reached this stage in his education, what need of chs. 38–42, and how account for the laments of ch. 31? Again, no satisfactory connexion of thought between chs. 28 and 27^{23} or 27^{6} can be established. The opening כִּי may, indeed, be variously understood. 'For there is a vein for the silver' (RVm) is the most obvious translation, the rendering 'surely' being adopted to avoid a difficulty, since the inscrutability of divine wisdom affords no reason for the fate which the end of ch. 27 describes as overtaking the wicked. It is necessary to read much between the lines in order to eke out a kind of connexion between the chapters as they stand, e.g. 'the wicked are punished, but for all that there are problems in life which that simple principle does not explain, and wisdom is really inscrutable'; or 'the wicked are overthrown, and such a fate is sure to overtake all who disobey God; for wisdom can only be attained by those who fear Jehovah.' It must be felt that these attempts are so forced and artificial that there is a strong presumption against the sequence of chapters as they stand. The difficulty of the opening כִּי would hardly, however, be a sufficient objection, if the chapter as a whole was appropriate to the frame of mind in which the book presents Job at the moment. This is far from being the case; the opening words of ch. 29, 'Moreover, Job continued his parable—Oh that I were as in months past,' etc., exhibit far too violent a break with 27^{23} for sound exegesis to explain.

We are led, therefore, to the conclusion that the section 27^{7-23} is out of place, whether or no it should form part of a speech of Bildad or a third speech of Zophar; that ch. 28 also, with all its truth and beauty, cannot be understood where it stands; and that chs. 32–37 form a subsequent addition to the original book by a pious writer who was not fully satisfied with its teaching. Ch. 31^{39-40a} may perhaps also with advantage be transferred to a place between vv.$^{32 \text{ and } 33}$.

The arguments urged against the genuineness of other portions of the book are not, however, convincing. Cheyne holds that prologue and epilogue do not form a part of the book, the prologue being perhaps part of a prose book of Job, and the epilogue added later by an editor whose object and views were quite distinct from those indicated in the prologue. His work is done 'in a prosaic spirit,' and he makes 'a sad concession to a low view of providential dealings' (Job and Sol. p. 69). This is a natural, but perhaps superficial, objection. Dillmann in the 4th edition of his Hiob (1891) finds these arguments unsatisfactory. The reply to those who contend that prologue or epilogue, or both, do not fit in with the rest of the poem, can only be made good when the scope of the whole book is examined.

It is further urged that the speeches of the Almighty are 'inserted passages' as much as those of Elihu, while the descriptions of Behemoth and Leviathan were added later still, a 'purple patch' the removal of which would be a gain. The last objection seems to resolve itself into a question of taste, on which no critic's judgment can be final. That the speeches of the Almighty constitute the book as it stands into a consistent whole, which would lose a chief portion of its meaning, if indeed it would be intelligible, without them, is a point which may conveniently be reserved till the scope of the poem is considered. The views of those who would separate prologue, epilogue, and the speeches of Jehovah from the text of the original poem are represented in the words of Cheyne when he says that the book as it stands forms a 'confused theodicy,' that these sections constitute 'disturbing elements,' and that to attempt to weld them into one whole shows a failure to understand the position. These are only the 'conflicting thoughts' of 'earnest, warm-hearted men' on the great question of the suffering of the righteous, interesting separately, but not intelligible in combination. This is the only objection to passages which in style and diction, in force and beauty, are confessedly of a piece with the rest of this noble and remarkable poem. The prose passages also, it is admitted, are not in themselves unworthy of the place in which they stand. The main issue, therefore, with regard to the integrity of the book, so far as these great divisions of it are concerned, depends upon the view taken of its scope and teaching. A fundamental difference of opinion on this head accounts for the differing conclusions of eminent critics on questions of genuineness.

vi. Scope and Design.—The mode of treatment adopted in this section will be to discuss the whole book as it now stands, showing how each part is related to the whole, and inquiring what teaching it may be supposed to convey in its present form. It has been shown in the last section that in all probability certain chapters did not form part of the original design: but this is matter of opinion; and while some critics would excise more, others object to the setting aside of any portion of the book. A picture may be surveyed as a whole, apart from the varying opinions of judges who hold that the colours in one portion or another of the canvas have been laid on by a later artist. Such a survey may aid in the decision of controverted questions.

The poem of 'Job,' so remarkable for imaginative power and literary skill, was unquestionably intended to set forth theological doctrine. Nothing abstract or technical is intended by the phrase; it is but a way of expressing the aspect from which the deepest questions of life are here viewed. The poet can be engaged with no higher themes, with no more living and burning questions, than God, man, evil, good, suffering, hope, destiny. The thesis of the book—to translate poetry into prose—is that suffering in the present life is not precisely proportioned to ill desert; on the contrary, the righteous suffer; yet God is, and God is good. How can this be? It is the object of Job to answer the question.

In the first place, let the presuppositions of the discussion be borne in mind. The debate is not concerning the primary truths of natural theology. God is: that is an axiom unquestioned, unquestionable. And by 'God' is meant a Ruler of the world, understood to be righteous and merciful, though the exact measure of His mercy and truth be not apprehensible by man. No atheistic theories are admissible,—that would mean to give up the problem, not to solve it. The pantheist, the materialist, have here no standing-ground. A Western mind of to-day may cut the knot presented in Job in a hundred several ways not open to the Eastern—to say nothing of the Israelite—of 2500 years ago. Further, the evidently accepted religious doctrine presupposed by the book is that in this life the wicked are punished and the righteous rewarded by a just God, each man according to his deeds and character. Against this current orthodox opinion the book is a protest, but it is a religious protest. It is not a sceptical inquiry, nor a cynical denial, nor a blasphemous denunciation, either as a whole or in any of its constituent parts. It is a plea for a wider, deeper, truer, more easily defensible orthodoxy. It represents the process by which a step was taken in the formation of religious thought, and a religious explanation of life-problems was arrived at. Even those who would reduce the book to the narrowest dimensions, and who reject certain portions as pious glosses or orthodox corrections, must admit that Job's attitude throughout is that of the man who is trying to understand God, not denying His existence or mocking at His rule. Job pleads for God as truly as the friends. The ring, if we may so speak, within which the conflict is carried on—a fight for life so far as Job is concerned—i.e. the recognized limits of the discussion, must be borne in mind throughout.

The colloquies form the kernel of the book: let them be taken first, especially as they are the only portions which beyond all question constitute its original elements. The exact issue between Job and his friends concerns, not the punishment of the wicked, but the suffering of the righteous. Job is not concerned to deny that the wicked as such suffer: if ch. 27^{7-23} belongs to him, he explicitly asserts it. What the friends assume is that only the wicked suffer, and precisely in proportion to their wickedness; what they at first imply and afterwards explicitly declare is, that if an apparently righteous man suffers, he cannot be so righteous as he seems; hence that Job, who is enduring exceptional pain and calamity, must have flagrantly offended, in secret if not openly, against the laws of righteousness and the Power which executes and vindicates them. This, Job strenuously and even passionately denies. Moreover, it is contrary to hypothesis. To draw for a moment from the prologue, Job is not only asserted by the historian, but by the Almighty, to be upright; 'perfect,' indeed, when judged by the relative standard which alone is in question, a man of thorough integrity within and without. If this be not granted, the whole problem vanishes. Job not only denies his opponents' contention, with his own consciousness and the testimony of facts to back him, but he does so successfully. The poet represents him as victor in the contest of words. The friends are silenced, though not convinced. Without availing ourselves of the justification of Job pronounced by the Almighty in the epilogue, it is clear that the friends are worsted in the conflict, and their position is rendered untenable.

But it does not follow that Job has succeeded in settling the great point at issue. The friends are wrong, but he may not be wholly right. What is Job's position, if we consider only chs. 3–31? Omitting for the moment the doubtful sections 27^{7}–28, and remembering in any case that Job's state of mind is set forth, not in a series of categorical propositions, but in the fervent outpourings of a deeply troubled soul, we may say that up to this point he is absolutely certain of his own righteousness, and that his sufferings are undeserved. He is deeply convinced also in what the mystics call 'the ground of the heart,' that God is righteous and rules righteously; but how these two convictions are to be reconciled, he does not clearly see. Some light has dawned upon him from various quarters in the course of his wrestlings with the great problem. At one moment he is disposed to hope against hope, and hold fast by what he cannot see. 'Though he slay me, yet will I wait for him,' may or may not be the meaning of ch. 13^{15},—for the readings admit of almost opposite interpretations,—but the words represent Job's attitude in certain moods. Not very different is his state of mind when he pleads that he might be allowed to come face to face with the Almighty; he is so sure that he could 'order his cause before him, and fill his mouth with arguments.' At another time he rests in the confidence that his own vindication will come, sooner or later. Whether Job expects this in the present life, or more or less vaguely in a future life, is a very important question in its place, but may for the purpose of this exposition be passed over for the moment. The passage ch. $19^{25.\ 26}$ remains on any translation ambiguous when we ask whether the vindication was to come on this side of the grave or beyond it, though it is glorious in its triumphant assurance that the Vindicator will speak at the last—'he will speak, and cannot lie.' This confidence, however, Job is unable continuously and permanently to preserve. It is not represented as a solution of the problem. Job's last words (ch. 31) are a pathetic lament over his vanished greatness, and a reiterated asseveration, strong, though no longer bitter, that he has not offended. If ch. 28 is to be assigned to Job, it must imply that for a time and in a certain mood he was prepared to bow before the inscrutable wisdom of the Most High; but this is not an abiding frame of mind, and cannot be presented as Job's solution of his own difficulties.

If the Elihu section formed a part of the original book—which we cannot admit—it must be understood as a contribution towards a solution, but one not completely adequate. It forms, in any case, a kind of side-chapel in relation to the whole structure. The righteous man must remember his need of chastisement; suffering is intended to exercise an educative and purifying influence, and the wise man will not recklessly rebel or fretfully chafe against it. But in the poem no one replies to Elihu, the Almighty disregards his utterances, no reference is made to them in any other part of the book, and they can scarcely be said, on any theory of their origin, to form an intimately organic part of the whole.

On the theory advocated by many modern critics, the original poem left the problem in this undetermined condition. The book puts forward no solution, it is a prolonged note of interrogation. There is nothing constructive about the colloquies when standing alone, especially in the mutilated form to which some critics would reduce them. But as the poem now stands, what solution does it furnish of the moral difficulty which it has so powerfully raised? The solution may be said to be threefold; or rather, three classes of considerations may be borne in mind in mitigation of the difficulties propounded. The first is found in the prologue. This lifts the curtain which hides the counsels of Heaven. It suggests that the drama of our earthly life has a significance which earth does not exhaust. The government of the Most High may contemplate issues which are at present beyond us. It may be needful to prove the existence of disinterested goodness to men, to angels, to devils; or to satisfy that strange personality who on the stage of history represents the great Accuser or Adversary of men, a being hard to persuade that goodness means something more than a pious care for one's own possessions or due consideration for one's own skin. If it were given to the righteous man, like a greater Prometheus, to suffer for such a cause, and demonstrate for once to assembled hosts of human spectators of the great drama of human life, or to invisible principalities and powers, that goodness and truth are something more than a cunning provision for the comforts they bring in their train, a life of pain and woe might be considered well spent. The vivid picture of the heavenly tribunal is only the graphic Oriental way of propounding what would now be called a philosophical or theological thesis. The lesson of Plato's Gorgias is here enforced against the sophistry of his Protagoras. Hedonism is not ethics. With magnificent daring Job is conceived as proving this great thesis on the side of God, against the insinuations of the Satan. Utilitarians should be the first to acknowledge that whether this be or be not a tenable solution of the problem of human suffering, it is a noble one. God knows the hearts of His servants, but on some is conferred the high prerogative of suffering in order to demonstrate to a scoffing world or an incredulous Accuser of the brethren what righteousness really means. This is not, however, represented in the poem as an ultimate or complete solution. The veil that has been drawn aside to allow a glimpse into the designs of Heaven drops again, and is never relifted. Job, by hypothesis, must not know of this procedure. Unless he can hold fast by the Right unaided, unconsoled, the experiment will be a failure. The fact that he never gives in or gives up is the poet's silent way of saying that the Adversary has lost his case. With all the odds against him, Job has won. He was content to 'hold hard by truth and his great soul,' beggary and leprosy and desertion and calumny notwithstanding. If the Almighty had never spoken, Job would remain alone upon the field—unconquered, if not victorious.

The Almighty, however, does speak. It is an old complaint with students of the Bk. of Job, that He says so little, according to men's conceptions, of what ought to be said. But much more is said than appears upon the surface. The addresses of Jehovah out of the whirlwind are a powerful plea for the probability that God's providence is right and man's indictment of it wrong. The Creator and Preserver of such a world as we see may surely be left to conduct its affairs unchallenged by the puny creature who knows but one corner of one field in a vast universe, and knows that imperfectly and ill. So far from 'binding the cluster of Pleiades or loosing the bands of Orion,' man does not know 'when the wild goats bring forth,' nor can he even 'loose the bands of the wild ass.' Thou who complainest against Me, 'where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth —hast thou an arm like God?' It is replied, though not in the poem, that this is no answer to Job's questions. By such arguments the Almighty may silence, but He does not convince. The poet judges otherwise. He represents Job as not only submissive, but contrite. Job acknowledges that he has been wrong in reasoning and in temper; he not only gives up his arguments, but repents him of his sin. And the inspired poet displays deeper insight into truth and more profound knowledge of the human heart than the self-sufficient reasoner of later days. Mozley, in his masterly study of Job (Essays, vol. ii. p. 219), suggests that the explanation is that 'amazing power softens him, and he feels himself within its grasp a poor and feeble creature, to be dealt with just as that Power pleases'; but this is surely only half the truth. Submission of soul is not satisfaction of mind. Job has learned to rest in God at last. His former attitude was wrong, and only now for the first time does he see light and find peace. Why is this, when no definite answer has been given to his passionate question, Why do the righteous suffer?

First, because he has seen and heard God Himself. What is meant by that phrase it would be hard to explain, for it can only be understood by one who has heard that Voice and seen that Vision. But the experience of mankind attests that there is a whole heaven between listening to the most convincing human arguments and receiving a message which is as the very voice of God to the soul. There is a difference between hearing of God and seeing Himself. That, Job says (42^5), is the essential difference between his former and his later state. Further, Job is convinced of God's perfect wisdom in his own case by the spectacle of His combined wisdom, power, righteousness, and goodness in creation around. It is the argument from the analogy of nature before Butler and before Origen. An indirect argument is more cogent against some forms of scepticism than a direct dealing with the difficulty. A contemplation of all that my friend is and has done—his course, his career, his character—may convince me that he is right in a particular instance which I cannot understand, more effectively than any amount of discussion concerning the case itself. Further still, Job's attitude of penitent submission is represented as the real solution of all his difficulties. Only in that attitude of spirit can man really rest. If he could reason out all the causes of all events—he cannot, but we may suppose it possible—he would still be further from the state of mind in which best to face the problems of life than Job was in ch. 42^6. The ultimate solution is not intellectual, but moral, since the problem is more moral than intellectual. 'I retract—and repent in dust and ashes.' The words do not mean that Job does not think, does not feel; but that he has risen above the level of keen resentment of physical pain, above the level of quick-witted dialectic and cut-and-thrust argument, soaring into the lofty altitudes or sinking into the peaceful depths where alone the godly man finds peace—in the shelter of the everlasting arms. The reasoner and the sceptic complain that the issue has been evaded; the religious man knows that he has not shirked it, but left it behind and beneath him, when he bows his head in self-abasing prayer, after a face-to-face vision of God.

After this, the epilogue might well appear to be a bathos indeed. That a man who has borne the extremity of anguish and fought the fiercest of battles and had a vision of the Almighty and come out conqueror, should descend to the level of an unusually prosperous sheikh who owns a few thousand more sheep and oxen than he did before, seems too humiliating. The irony could hardly go further than in the words, 'every man also gave him a piece of silver, and every one a ring of gold'—as if an answer to the soul's questionings were to be expressed in terms of coins and jewellery. The writer of the postscript to the LXX Version seems dimly to have felt this, for, to the words of ch 42^{17} 'Job died an old man and full of days,' he adds that 'it is written that he will rise again with those whom the Lord raises up.' From a modern point of view the epilogue is impossible; it does not move on the same plane as the prologue and the speeches of the Almighty. But the interpreter of Job should not occupy a modern point of view. The writer of the book could not say 'he will rise again at the last day.' If the light shed upon this life's tangles by the clear prospect of a future life had been vouchsafed to him, his book would have been very different. The epilogue is the author's way of saying the same thing. Under a dispensation in which there was no clear revelation of a future state, Job's subsequent prosperity was only the outward expression of the divine judgment expressed in 42^{8} 'ye have not spoken of me the thing that is right, as my servant Job hath.' The men who had prided themselves on understanding God's methods and defending Him against aspersion were condemned, and forgiven only at Job's intercession; whereas Job, who had fought against the God of narrow tradition in defence of the God of righteousness and truth was commended. His restoration to more than his former prosperity is but the outward expression of this divine sentence—a kind of 'poetic justice' which, under the conditions of the time, was felt to be needful to the vindication of Job's character and the justification of Job's arguments. And, as Froude suggests in his impressive study of this book, Job was now for the first time prepared fully to use prosperity aright (Short Studies, vol. i. p. 325). But the epilogue is not necessary in order to point the chief moral lessons of the book. These are independent of circumstances, and belong to all time.

Leaving the details, and taking the book as a whole, what may be said of Job as to its place in the history of revelation? It can only be rightly understood if it is viewed as a stage in the history of religious thought, an advance upon all that preceded it, a step forward taken at the cost of severe suffering and mental conflict, but still only one step in advance. It was given to the author of the poem to see the shallowness and insufficiency of the theory that would make righteousness and prosperity, wickedness and calamity, vary directly in proportion to one another, in the present life. It was not given to him to obtain anything more than a passing glimpse into the prospect of a future life, in which the balance might be redressed; in all probability even this phrase is too strong to express the nature of the confidence attained in ch $19^{25.\ 26}$. The mystery and the beauty of vicarious suffering in the moral and spiritual world were hidden from him. But he had begun to see that, even as regards the present, pain may be a privilege rather than a punishment; that the loftiest spirits may have to pass through it as a trial of their loyalty rather than a chastisement for their transgressions; and that in such a case it behoves them to bear, as the Lord's chosen ones, the burden and the mystery of life, as pregnant with a deep significance certain hereafter to be made known.

It has often been said that Job is a type of Christ. The Christian holds that throughout the OT there were hints and foreshadowings of spiritual truth more fully revealed in the NT, and the suffering of the upright man under the earlier dispensation prepared the way for and was in turn explained by the suffering of the only Sinless Man, the Mediator of a new covenant. Mozley says, 'The Crucifixion is the one consummate act of injustice to which all others are but distant approaches.' The Cross of Christ is at the same time the darkest and the brightest spot upon earth, because there is most fully seen the meaning of that world-old problem of the suffering of the righteous in an evil world. What appears 'injustice' is intended to be a part of redemption. The author of Job did not clearly see, perhaps never dimly guessed at that mysterious solution of a mystery. But he grappled with the moral difficulties of his own time like a giant, and left upon record some lessons concerning suffering and its significance, which neither the world nor the Church has fully learned yet.

vii. Date and Authorship.—There is little or no external evidence of a trustworthy kind to enable us to determine either author or date. The reference in Ezk 14^{14} cannot be quoted in relation to the Bk. of Job, though it may have a bearing on the historical reality of the man. Jewish tradition as represented in the Talmud (Sota v. 8; Baba Bathra 15*a*) assigned it to Moses. Writers so recent as Ebrard (1858) and Rawlinson (1891) have been found to hold the same position. But the earliest date assigned by the consensus of modern scholarship is the time of Solomon (Delitzsch, Cook, Cox), whilst by far the larger majority of critics place the book somewhere between the 7th and the 4th cent. B.C. For the period after the captivity of the Northern tribes, somewhere between Isaiah and Jeremiah, may be quoted the names of Ewald, Renan, Merx, Dillmann; Davidson and Driver would date the book during or shortly after the Exile, the period which Cheyne and Margoliouth are also inclined to favour. Cornill (Einleitung, p. 241) places the book amongst the very latest canonical OT literature. No author's name except that of Moses, which is quite out of the question, has ever been suggested. Whenever the writer lived, he is for us a great Unknown, and it is perhaps impossible to fix the time of composition, except by stating the century within which it probably falls. The following is the principal evidence on the subject furnished by the book itself.

At first sight Job presents a picture of primitive non-Israelitish life. Much that we are accustomed to find in other books of OT is conspicuous by its absence. The picture drawn of the life of Job is on the whole faithful to the conditions of patriarchal life. The wealth of the patriarch consists in his flocks and herds (1^{3} and 42^{12}); such sacrifices as are mentioned (1^{5} 42^{8}) are of a primitive type, performed by the head of the household as a priest. The age to which Job finally attains is patriarchal (42^{16}); the piece of money, קְשִׂיטָה named in 42^{11} is uncoined and primitive, mentioned elsewhere only in Gn 33^{19} and Jos 24^{32} of Jacob's purchase from the children of Hamor; whilst the musical instruments, תֹּף, נֵבֶל, עוּגָב, mentioned in 21^{12} 30^{31} are the primitive ones of Gn 4^{21} 31^{27}.

The names of God are such as belonged to patriarchal times, El and Eloah (occurring some fifty times in Job, but rarely in OT generally) being the oldest Semitic titles of the Divine Being. The name 'Jehovah,' used in the prologue and epilogue, is not found in the body of the book except once, as if by accident, in 12^{9} (compare יְהוָה in 28^{28}). In these and other features the colouring appropriate to the circumstances of Job's life is preserved with great fidelity and skill.

It is impossible, however, to believe that the book dates from a very early or even a moderately early period in the history of Israel. Davidson asserts that the features of a much later time may be perceived 'beneath this patriarchal disguise'; that 'the author is a true Israelite, and betrays himself to be so at every turn, however wide his sympathy be with the life of other peoples, and however great his power of reanimating the past'; and he urges that no careful reader should be deceived by the 'thin antique colour of the book.' Other critics would demur to such decided phraseology, and it is certain that the book has to be searched very carefully before any traces of the law can be discovered in it, and these are not of a pronounced kind. In 22^{6} 24^{9} we read of the taking of 'pledges' (see Ex 22^{26}), and in 22^{27} of vows, while in 24^{2} mention is made of the removal of 'landmarks' (see Dt 19^{14}). The adoration of sun and moon is spoken of in 31^{28} as an iniquity to be punished by the judge; so also adultery in 31^{9}. These, however, must be considered slight and doubtful references, and it is not upon them that the case turns for holding, in Davidson's words, that the book is 'the genuine outcome of the religious thought and life of Israel, the product of a religious knowledge and experience possible among no other people.' We should rather turn to the evidence that the book presupposes an advanced state of society, a knowledge of natural history and human life, a wide and varied experience impossible to a primitive inhabitant of an unsettled country bordering on the desert, who must have lived a nomadic life. Critics have pointed out that passages such as $12^{17\text{-}21}$, with its mention of counsellors and kings, priests and princes, spoiled and overthrown and captive, implies a knowledge of the history of nations, if not actually of the political changes brought about by great military empires like Assyria and Babylon. Disorder and misery must have been familiar features in the life of the author of this book; not merely personal suffering, but such as the psalmist describes when he says, 'If the foundations be destroyed, what shall the righteous do?'

Perhaps no conclusive argument can be drawn from the language. It is true that this is peculiar and striking. The book contains an unusually large proportion of Aramaic words, and of ἅπαξ λεγόμενα explicable only by the help of Arabic. But it has been argued by some that this is a mark of early date, by others that it is a mark of the Solomonic period as one of wide culture and extended intercourse, by others that it proves a date more or less contemporary with Deutero-Isaiah (Driver), only that the author of Job was brought even more within Aramaizing influences than the prophet. Dillmann does not lay stress upon the 'Aramaisms' as a mark of date, but holds that the language generally points to the period of the later Heb. in the 7th or 6th cent. B.C. Cornill thinks the 'Aramæo-Arabic' cast of the language supports the very late date he adopts (Einleitung, p. xxxii). The literary form and character of the poem certainly point, at least, to the maturity of Jewish literature. It is true that a poem of genius and power often characterizes the dawn of a nation's history; and in Dante, the first great writer in the vernacular of his country, is found a master of Italian who has never since been surpassed. This illustration alone is sufficient proof that the concentrated vigour and intensity of expression characteristic of some passages in Job does not necessarily imply a late date in the history of a national literature. The originality of the author of Job is one of his most striking characteristics, but it is not the originality of an early writer. His knowledge, his illustrations, his references, and, to some extent, his style, appear to imply an advanced and not a primitive period of literature and life.

The strongest argument, however, and perhaps the only one which is really conclusive, is drawn from the subject-matter. The theme here discussed and the manner of its discussion necessitate a long previous history. The problems of human life are doubtless old, but they could not be raised in the manner displayed in Job, without a previous religious history, and one of considerable duration, in which the doctrine of the three friends had come to be the current and orthodox explanation of the facts of life. The history of the OT shows that only at a comparatively late period were these maxims questioned; and when we find them not only questioned but discussed in the thorough manner of the Bk. of Job, we may be sure that it was not composed till at least the closing period of the monarchy. Other features of religious doctrine—the doctrine of God, the way in which Satan is mentioned, and the spiritual doctrine of man, for example—point, likewise, to a comparatively late date. In saying this, we do not include the passages which have often been thought to imply a doctrine of immortality, since the meaning of these is by no means certain.

The argument as to date drawn from parallel passages is one that the best critics do not press, as it is encumbered with doubt and difficulty, and is apt to resolve itself into a matter of subjective impressions. But a comparison of some passages in Job with other books in the OT is instructive, to whatever conclusions it may lead, and a few words may be said upon the subject. The parallels are numerous, though in no case are they exceedingly close; they are chiefly found in Dt, Ps, Pr, Is, Jer, and La; the books of Hos, Am, and Zec presenting in a minor degree certain points of comparison. The chief parallels with Dt are Job 5^{14} compared with Dt 28^{29}, Job 5^{18} with Dt 32^{39}, Job 20^{4} with Dt 4^{32}, whilst the references to the removal of landmarks and other offences in Job 24^{2} and $31^{9.\,11}$ have been thought to imply a knowledge of Dt 19^{14} 22^{22}. Davidson goes so far as to say that if Dt be understood to be a composition of the reign of Josiah, B.C. 620 is the point above which the composition of Job cannot be carried. As to the Psalms, it appears quite certain that Job 7^{17} implies Ps 8^{5}, but the date of the latter cannot easily be fixed. The reader may further compare Job 10^{9} with Ps 139^{8} 139, Job 35^{14} with Ps 37^{6}, Job 22^{19} with Ps 107^{42}, and Job 13^{4} with Ps 119^{69}. The Books of Job and Pr, as both belonging to the class of Wisdom-literature, exhibit, as might have been expected, considerable affinity. The personification of Wisdom is found in both; the providential features of human life are dealt with in both, though from different points of view; whilst some phrases are common to both books, the coincidence of form being such as can hardly be the result of accident. The proverbial expression concerning 'the lamp of the wicked being put out' of Pr 13^{9} 24^{20}, is taken up in Job 21^{17} in a way which absolutely proves the priority of the former. Job 6^{3} may be compared with Pr 27^{3}, and Job 3^{25} with Pr 10^{24}, though the comparison presents nothing conclusive as to date. Much more reliance may be placed upon a general comparison of the representations of Wisdom in Pr chs. 1–9 and Job 28, with regard to which it would appear manifest that Job is the later. It has been already admitted that ch. 28 may be a later addition to Job, and the date of the opening section of Pr is not conclusively fixed; but of the general teaching of Job it is clear that it must have followed upon and not preceded the general teaching of Proverbs. For the proverbial philosophy of the latter is in the main that true but insufficient generalization from experience, embodied in prudential maxims, which forms the groundwork of the arguments of the friends. Upon this Job forms a searching criticism, and represents a considerably later stage of thought.

The relation between Job and Isaiah, especially Deutero-Isaiah, is exceedingly interesting. It has been discussed at length by Cheyne in the essay appended to his Proph. of Isaiah (ii. 235 f.). Job 14^{11} presents coincidence in expression with Is 19^{5}, the latter being probably the earlier passage. But a more extended parallel with the later chapters of Isaiah may be established by a comparison of Job 12^9 with Is 41^{20}, Job 15^{35} with Is 59^4, Job 9^8 with Is 44^{24} and 45^{12}, Job $26^{12.\ 13}$ with Is 51^9, and Job 13^{28} with Is 50^9. The whole teaching of the Bk. of Job should be studied in connexion with the remarkable picture of the Servant of J", which is one of the chief features of Deutero-Isaiah. The spectacle of the righteous servant of God suffering, desolate, mocked of men and apparently afflicted of God, yet retaining his hold upon God and ultimately justified by Him, is so far common to the two books and to these almost alone in the OT as to make the comparison full of interest. Cheyne and Davidson have discussed it in full, but the question of priority is not easily settled. Perhaps the conclusion to which most readers will be brought by a study which cannot even be outlined here, will be that announced by Davidson and Driver, acquiesced in by Cheyne, that the two writers were 'surrounded by the same atmosphere of thought' and 'worked up common conceptions into independent creations.' Most critics incline to place Job the later of the two, but the view of suffering taken in Is 53 can never have presented itself to the author of Job. Either the two were entirely independent, or Job is earlier than Deutero-Isaiah, would seem to be the inevitable verdict.

A comparison with Jer furnishes two or three parallel passages in which coincidence can hardly be accidental, though priority may not be easy to determine. One of the chief of these is the 'curse' of Job $3^{3\text{-}10}$ compared with Jer $20^{14\text{-}18}$. Dillmann in 1869 judged that the passage in Job must have been the earlier of the two, an opinion which he modified later (Hiob[4], p. 33); while Cheyne writes that Jer 20^{15} 'clearly betokens the hand of the original writer.' Other parallels are Job 6^{15} and Jer 15^{18}, Job 12^4 and Jer 20^7, whilst Job 9^{18} may be compared with La 3^{15}, Job 30^9 with La 3^{14}, and Job 16^{13} with La 3^{12}. In the latter passages opinion is likely to assign a later date to the highly wrought elegy of La than to the vigorous and forcible language of Job. Ps 37 and 88 suggest a general comparison with Job, and there are points of coincidence in expression with other psalms; but all that can be said is that the writer of Job seems to have been acquainted with some psalms, whilst other psalmists appear more or less to have imitated the greater poet.

On the whole, the use of parallel passages in this instance seems to mark out the general position of Job in relation to other OT literature, rather than to fix definitely its date in relation to particular books. All the signs point to a period subsequent to the 7th cent. B.C., though how much later, remains undecided. As Margoliouth has pointed out, the references to Ophir in 22^{24} 28^{16} give a terminus a quo in the Solomonic period, and a comparison with 1 Ch 21^1, in which Satan is used as a proper name, shows that Job 1 and 2, etc., in which the article is used, must have been written earlier. This furnishes a terminus ad quem in the 4th cent. B.C. The alternatives lie between the 'very late date somewhere in the Persian period' favoured by Margoliouth and Cheyne, and a date somewhat, though not much, earlier than the Bab. captivity, which appears to the writer the more probable. The range of a century earlier or later than the Exile would be sufficient to include all but the most extreme of modern critics.

LITERATURE.—The following may be mentioned amongst the writers who have contributed to the elucidation of the Bk. of Job during the Christian era, but chiefly during the last century. Origen's contributions towards the study of the text, and Jerome's translation, have been already referred to. Not many of the early Christian writers commented on Job, but the Scholia of Ephraem Syrus may be mentioned, and the bulky commentary of Gregory the Great, Moralia in Jobum, in which exposition proper is overlaid by a discussion of an endless variety of doctrinal and ethical questions. Amongst the Jewish expositors of the Middle Ages, R. Sa'adya Gaon wrote brief notes in Arabic, and besides Ibn Ezra and Rashi, the two most important commentaries are those of R. Moses ben Nachman and R. Levi ben Gerson, of the 13th and 14th cents. respectively. At the time of the Reformation, Luther characteristically illustrated the new spirit of exegesis by the way in which he handled the Bk. of Job; his remarks gave offence to many by their freedom. The Conciones of Calvin exhibit the strength and lucidity characteristic of that prince of expositors.

In the 18th cent. Alb. Schultens (1737) opened a new epoch in the study of Job by his philological notes, illustrating the meaning of words largely—some have thought too largely—from the Arabic. Reiske (1779) and Schnurrer (1781) followed in the same direction. In the present century the number of commentaries on Job has multiplied very largely. The following list of selected literature during the last half century does not profess to be exhaustive or exactly chronological, the dates affixed usually indicating the publication of the first and last editions.

Umbreit, Das B. Hiob (1824–1832); Ewald, Dichter des A. B. iii. (1836–1854); Stickel, Das B. Hiob (1842); Schlottmann, Das B. Hiob (1851); Renan, Le Livre de Job (1859); Frz. Delitzsch, Das B. Hiob (1864–1876); Hengstenberg, Das B. Hiob erläutert (1870–1875); Merx, Das Gedicht von Hiob (1871); Zöckler in Lange's Bibelwerk (1872); Hitzig, Das B. Hiob (1874); Budde, Beiträge zur Kritik des B. Hiob (1876); Hiob (in Nowack's Handkom. 1896, a summary of the conclusions of which is given by Budde himself in Expos. Times, Dec. 1896, p. 111 ff.); Reuss, La Sainte Bible, pt. 6 (1878–1888); Volck in Kurzgef. Komm. (1889); Dillmann in Kurzgef. Exeg. H'buch (1891); Duhm, Das B. Hiob erklärt (in Mohr's Kurzer Hand-Com. 1897); also Beer, Text des B. Hiob untersucht (1895). Of these, Umbreit, Ewald, Renan, Delitzsch, and Zöckler have been translated into English. Amongst recent English writers may be named Cook in Speaker's Com.[7] (1880); Cox, Commentary and New Translation (1880); and Bateson Wright, Translation, with Essays, chiefly Critical (1883). A. B. Davidson published in 1862 a full commentary based upon the Heb., but this included only chs. 1–14, and has not been completed. In 1884 his English commentary appeared (Cambr. B. for Schools). Cheyne, Job and Solomon (1887); Bradley, Lectures on Job (1887); R. A. Watson in Expositor's Bible (1892); also Rawlinson in Pulpit Commentary (1891). The section on the Bk. of Job found in each of the chief 'Introductions' to the OT should, of course, be consulted. The following may be mentioned as representative:—Bleek (6th edition by Wellhausen, 1893), Riehm (ed. Brandt, 1889), Driver (6th ed. 1897), and Cornill (3rd and 4th ed. 1896). Amongst separate articles some of the most noteworthy are Riehm, Zeitschr. f. Luth. Theol. (1866); Godet, Etudes Bibliques (1874); Budde, Beiträge (1876), ZATW (1882), 193–247; Giesebrecht, Wendepunkt des B. H. (1879); Kleinert, Das specifisch Hebräische in B. H. in Stud. u. Krit. (1886); C. H. Wright, Bibl. Essays (1886); Mozley in Bibl. and Theol. Essays (1878); Dillmann, Textkritisches zum B. H. in Sitz. Ber. der K. Akad. d. Wis., Berlin (1890); as well as the monographs of Grill and Laue mentioned above. The present writer has dealt with the subject in his Wisdom Literature of Old Test. (1893).

JOBAB (יוֹבָב).—1. Name of a son of Joktan, Gn 10^{29} (1 Ch 1^{23}): identified by Glaser (Skizze, ii. 314) and others with יהיבב, a place mentioned in a Sabæan inscription (CIS iv. p. 55; Glaser, Mittheilungen, 3 ff.). The author of that inscription speaks of his 'fathers and uncles' as governors of YḤYBB, and further mentions a king of Saba, Karibail Wathar, whom there is reason to place in the middle of the 8th cent. B.C. The name is said to occur in another inscription also (Glaser, Skizze, ii. 303); but in neither is there anything which fixes its locality, though its governors would appear to have been vassals of the kings of Saba. It is variously read Yuhaibab and Yuhaibib, and is compared by J. Derenbourg with the Arab. yabāb, 'a desert.' Earlier commentators thought of the Ἰωβαρῖται of Ptolemy (vi. 7. 24), and indeed one recension of the LXX has the form Ἰοβόρ. This name seems to correspond with the Arabic Wabār (so Sprenger), which denotes a considerable portion of Yemen 'all between Najrān and Ḥadramaut, Mahrah and Shiḥr' (Yāḳūt). Neither of these identifications can be considered more than conjectural. 2. A king of Edom, Gn $36^{33f.}$ = 1 Ch $1^{44f.}$, confused in LXX of Job 42^{17b} with Job (see above, p. 660[b]). 3. A king of Madon, Jos 11^1. 4. 5. Two Benjamites, 1 Ch $8^{9.\ 18}$.

D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

JOCHEBED (יוֹכֶבֶד 'J" is glory,' cf. the Phœn. כברמלקרת 'Melkart is glory' (?) CIS I. i. 364).—Known to us by name only from P, who states that J. was a sister of Kohath, who was married to Amram her nephew, and who bare to him Aaron and Moses (Ex 6^{20}) and Miriam (Nu 26^{59}). An earlier writer, E, in narrating the birth of Moses, speaks of his mother as a daughter of Levi, but seems to have been unacquainted with her name (Ex 2^1).

JOD (י).—The tenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such used in the 119th Psalm to designate the 10th part, each verse of which begins with this letter. It is transliterated in this Dictionary by y. See JOT.

JODA (A Ἰωδά, B Ἰούδα[s ?]), 1 Es 5^{58} (^{56} LXX).—1. The same as JUDAH the Levite in Ezr 3^9; elsewhere called HODAVIAH, Ezr 2^{40}; HODEVAH, Neh 7^{43}; SUDIAS, 1 Es 5^{26}. 2. An ancestor of Jesus, Lk 3^{26} (Ἰωδά WH, Ἰουδά TR, AV Juda).

JOED (יֹעֵד, etymology uncertain, Syr. ܝܘܥܕ). —A Benjamite, the father of Meshullam and son of Pedaiah, Neh 11^{7}. In the corresponding list 1 Ch 9^{7} the name does not occur.

JOEL (יוֹאֵל).*—1. The prophet (see next article). 2. A son of Samuel, 1 S 8^{2}, 1 Ch 6^{28} (RV, see Driver's note on 1 S 8^{2}) 6^{33}. 3. An ancestor of Samuel, 1 Ch 6^{36} (called in v.^{24} Shaul). 4. A Simeonite prince, 1 Ch 4^{35}. 5. A Reubenite, 1 Ch $5^{4.\ 8}$. 6. A Gadite chief, 1 Ch 5^{12}. 7. A chief man of Issachar, 1 Ch 7^{3}. 8. One of David's heroes, 1 Ch 11^{38}. 9. 10. 11. Levites, 1 Ch $15^{7.\ 11.\ 17}$ 23^{8} 26^{22}, 2 Ch 29^{12}. 12. A Manassite chief, 1 Ch 27^{20}. 13. One of those who married a foreign wife, Ezr 10^{43}. 14. A Benjamite overseer after the Exile, Neh 11^{9}.

JOEL (יוֹאֵל, Ἰωήλ), the son of Pethuel (LXX Βαθουήλ, Vulg. Phatuel), is the author of the second (LXX fourth) book of the Minor Prophets. No information has reached us regarding the prophet or his father. The name Joel probably signifies 'J″ is God,' and, on the assumption of the date proposed by Credner, may contain a reference to the re-establishment of the worship of J″ after the overthrow of Athaliah (cf. 2 K $11^{18ff.}$). This, though possible, is scarcely probable. The name is not an uncommon one (cf. 1 S 8^{2}, Ezr 10^{43}, Neh 11^{9}, etc.).† The book supplies no definite information, either as to the place or the time of the prophet's labours. The date is greatly disputed, but it is generally agreed that Judah, and most probably Jerus., was the theatre of Joel's prophetic activity.

i. Occasion.—The occasion of the prophecy was an invasion of the country by locusts, accompanied by a drought of unusual severity. A calamity of this kind was not uncommon in Pal., and, in ordinary circumstances, would not be made a subject of prophetic discourse. But the visitation described by J. was exceptionally severe. Successive swarms of locusts swept over the country (1^{4}), and their devastations went on for years (2^{25}). The produce of the fields, vineyards, and orchards was destroyed (1^{10-12}). Food failed for man and beast ($1^{10-12.\ 16.\ 17.\ 18-20}$). The daily offering to J″ was suspended from lack of the necessary materials ($1^{9.\ 13}$ 2^{14}). This was equivalent to an interruption of the covenant relation between J″ and His people. A calamity which led to such a result was a very serious one. No prophet would have been faithful to his mission as watchman of Israel if he had failed to warn the people of the danger with which such a visitation threatened them. Joel saw in the locust invasion a special judgment from J″, and used it as a text for one of the most interesting and instructive discourses contained in the prophetical books of the OT.

ii. Contents. — The book consists of three chapters. [The Heb. text has four chapters, the last five verses of ch. 2 in AV forming ch. 3 in the MT]. It divides itself easily into two parts, in the first of which (1^{2}–2^{17}) the prophet, and in the second (2^{18} to the end) J″, is the speaker.

The first part is made up of two discourses, of which, however, the theme is the same, viz. the locust invasion. The language in which the calamity is depicted differs considerably in the two chapters. But that the army, whose movements and operations are described so graphically and rhetorically in ch. 2, must be identified with the locusts of ch. 1, appears from 2^{25}, where the promise of the removal of the judgment and the renewal of blessings is given in the words, 'I will restore to you the years that the locust hath eaten, the cankerworm, and the caterpillar, and the palmerworm, my great army which I sent among you.'* After introducing his subject (1^{2-4}), the prophet, in the first discourse (1^{5-20}), describes the judgment which has fallen on the country in a narrative remarkable for the vividness of the picture and the minuteness of the details. The invading host pours over the land in countless myriads, with teeth like the teeth of lions for the work of destruction before them. The vine is wasted. The fig-tree is not merely stripped of its leaves,—the very bark is torn off, and trunk and branches are left bare (1^{7}). The grain and the fruit crops are alike destroyed (1^{10-12}). The prophet lingers over the desolation which has been wrought, and pushes his description into regions which, if the visitation were not real, would scarcely be referred to. The seed perishes under the clods; the barns are left to fall into decay because there is nothing to gather into them (1^{17}). Such a calamity falls heavily on the beasts of the field. Under the pangs of hunger and thirst they groan and cry unto God. The instinctive appeal of these irrational creatures affects the prophet so powerfully that he associates himself with them in supplicating the Lord for relief (1^{18-20}). Thus the first discourse closes.

In the second discourse (2^{1-17}) the language is highly poetical and rhetorical. The figure before the prophet's mind is that of an army which marches with unbroken ranks and irresistible force to the accomplishment of its mission. This army is J″'s host, at the head of which He marches (2^{11}). The army, as we have seen, is the locusts (2^{25}); and, if the testimony of travellers is to be relied on, the prophet's description as a whole, and the individual illustrations, are true to nature. But no description of the calamity—however powerful and startling—can exhaust the prophet's duty in connexion with it. Such a judgment calls for humiliation and prayer on the part of the people; and the prophet urges this in terms scarcely less striking than those employed in depicting the divine visitation (1^{14} 2^{12-17}).

The second part of the book (2^{18} to the end), with J″ as the speaker, contains the promise of blessings—first of temporal, and secondly of spiritual, blessings. The first words of the promise show that the judgment is at an end (2^{19b}). Famine and drought are to cease; prosperity is to be restored. The new abundance will compensate for the losses inflicted by the ravages of the locusts, and Israel, having learned in the school of suffering that J″ alone is worthy of their trust, will acknowledge and rejoice in Him as their God (2^{21-27}). This prepares the way for the bestowal of spiritual blessings (2^{28-32}, Heb. 3). The outpouring of the Spirit on all the people, without distinction of age or sex, of rank or class, is to follow, in point of time, the restoration of material prosperity (2^{28} 'it shall come to pass afterward that I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh'). How long afterward is not indicated. On a matter of this kind the horizon of prophecy is undefined. Then shall come the day of the Lord, which occupies so prominent a place in the book. This day, ushered in by awe-inspiring phenomena, is a day of doom for the nations hostile to Israel. These nations are brought down to the valley of Jehoshaphat ('J″ judges'), where J″'s heavenly warriors crush them as grapes are crushed in the wine-press—cut them down as the grain is cut by the reaper. Israel, on the other hand, shall dwell securely in a land of extraordinary fertility, and J″, enthroned on Mount Zion, shall dwell among them. The situation, as between the people of J″ on the one side and the hostile powers on the other, is summed up in the pointed contrast at the close of the prophecy (vv.$^{19.\ 20}$ Egypt and Edom are to be a desolation; Judah is to dwell under the favour of J″ for ever).†

iii. Interpretation.—The interpretation of the prophecy depends on the view taken of the locusts. 1. Many of the early Fathers explained the locusts figuratively; and in recent times this view has been supported in his usual fearless fashion by Hengstenberg (Christ. of OT, Eng. tr. i. 296 ff.). According to this view, the prophecy refers to future events, and the locusts, in chs. 1 and 2, represent the world-powers opposed to the Church,—such as J″ judges on His great day ($3^{1.\ 2}$ [Heb. $4^{1.\ 2}$]). 2. What may be regarded as a modification of this ancient opinion has been recently proposed. According to this view the locusts are apocalyptic,—creatures of a supernatural kind, such as may

* This name is generally taken to mean 'J″ is God,' and this was prob. the etymology accepted by the later Hebrews, with whom the name was popular. But it is very doubtful if this was the primary meaning. Nestle (Eigennamen, 86) and W. R. Smith (Kinship, 301) identify with the god Wail (Iolaos). See, further, Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v., and Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 153.

† The name might be taken as a Hiph. Impft. from יאל, (cf. יוֹקֵם), but this is not a probable derivation. (See Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v.)

* The words used in this verse for the locusts are the same as in 1^{4}, but the order is different; and the prophet perhaps refers to successive swarms of locusts rather than to the same swarm in different stages of growth.

† The connexion in which Egypt and Edom are mentioned at the end of the book deserves consideration. The Phœnicians and Philistines appear (v.^{4}) to have been actively hostile to Judah in the prophet's day. The Egyptians and Edomites would naturally have been mentioned along with these if they had stood in the same relation to Judah. And it is possible that, in the antithesis at the close of the book, Egypt and Edom are used typically,—the former representing hostile powers that had no family connexion with Judah, the latter those that were of common ancestry.

fitly find a place in a vision of the last things, with which the Bk. of Joel closes (cf. the locusts in NT Apocalypse). 3. The third and, in recent times, the most generally accepted opinion is that the locusts are real. The prophet describes an actual locust invasion, and makes it the occasion of his prophecy. According to the first two views, the book becomes an eschatological prediction, without any historical basis, or any direct reference to the prophet's contemporaries. Against this explanation of the book, the text, on a fair interpretation, offers serious objections. (1) It is not easy to find a satisfactory explanation of the twofold call to repentance already noticed. According to the allegorical or apocalyptic view, we have to think of the prophet as sitting, like a monk in his cell, brooding over the past history of his people, and endeavouring to forecast their future. The fruit of his meditations he records for us in this short book. He has no message to his contemporaries. Even the call to repentance is a mere ideal appeal. The ground of the appeal is the locust invasion. But to the prophet's contemporaries the appeal can have no practical value, if not a single locust is visible and no trace of locust devastation can be discovered. For the ordinary purpose of prophetic teaching the appeal vanishes into thin air. This explanation utterly fails to do justice to the text. The prophet urges repentance on his fellow-countrymen with a view to the removal of a grave calamity, and the restoration of the divine favour. This purpose was realized. The second part of the book begins, as we have seen, with the promise of the withdrawal of the judgment and the bestowal of rich blessings. The explanation may be inferred from $2^{18.\ 19a}$. J″s anger is at an end. The way is open to the restoration of the covenant relation between Him and His people. The inference is that the people have repented and humbled themselves before Him. Now, that is the practical result for which every prophet laboured among his countrymen. And when the prophetic purpose and the result aimed at are exhibited in the proper relation, as they are in Joel, it is scarcely possible to accept the view that the prophecy has no direct reference to the circumstances of the prophet's contemporaries. (2) The language in which the locust invasion is described is strongly opposed to the allegorical and apocalyptic explanation. The details of the first chapter have been partially referred to. It is highly improbable that the narrative, in this part of the book, is a pure work of imagination, produced by some recluse of post-exilic times. The description of the second chapter is equally opposed to the figurative explanation. If the language is figurative, the locusts represent the world-powers hostile to the Church. The prophet has before his mind men, —warriors, like those led by a Sennacherib or a Nebuchadnezzar. He tells us that these invaders 'run like mighty men' (v.[7]); if they were really gallant warriors, like whom else, or what else, should they run? 'They climb the wall like men of war' (ib.); if they were human soldiers, what does the prophet mean by these words? He presents a picture of an invading horde, going steadily forward, in perfect order, to the accomplishment of their task. In their progress they reach the capital, and climb the walls; but it is not said that they make breaches in the walls or cast them down. 'They leap upon the city' (v.[9]), but there is not a hint that their purpose is to destroy it. The ravages wrought by these invaders are confined to the fields. Not a man falls before them. The people suffer grievously, but it is indirectly, through the destruction of their crops, etc. And when the prophet urges the people to repent with the view of propitiating J″, the effect of the withdrawal of the judgment is, not the sparing of the lives of the inhabitants, but the renewal of fertility to the earth, so that there should no longer be the lack of the materials required for the daily meal-offering and drink-offering (vv.[12-14]). The description in these verses ([7ff.]) loses its point, and raises a perplexing question as to the literary character of the book, if the locusts are not real but figurative. If the prophet has before his mind — not locusts, but — a horde of cruel men sweeping over the country and leaving ruin behind them, his language raises not the least difficult of OT problems. And there should be little hesitation in admitting a real invasion of locusts.

iv. DATE.—The date is greatly disputed, but there is general agreement that it is either very early or post-exilic. The book itself contains no distinct chronological data of the kind supplied by the superscriptions in many of the other prophetical books. In such a case the most helpful and trustworthy evidence for the fixing of the date is derived from the nations (if any) mentioned in the book. On this point the argument e silentio is important in Joel. No mention is made of Syria, Assyria, or Babylon. But from the days of Amos to the exile of Judah, one or other of these powers has a prominent place in prophetic literature. It may therefore be reasonably inferred that J. wrote before the Assyr. power began to threaten the chosen people, or after the Bab. power ceased to be dangerous; in other words, the date is prior to the 8th cent. B.C., or later than the overthrow of Babylon by Cyrus. If the late date is accepted, the prophecy would fall in the Pers. period. No valid objection to this date can be founded on the non-mention of Persia. For, while it is true that the Jews were in subjection to the Persians, there was a radical difference between the relation of Persia to the chosen people and that of Assyria and Babylon. The latter invaded and conquered the land of promise, and carried the people into captivity. Their relation was one of active hostility. The Persians inaugurated the period of their supremacy by the restoration of the Jewish exiles to their own land. This would sufficiently account for the Persians being placed in a different category from the Assyrians and Babylonians. And the way is clear for a pre-Assyr. or post-Bab. date. The prophet, however, mentions certain peoples as hostile to Judah: Phœnicians and Philistines (3^4 [Heb. 4^4]), and Egyptians and Edomites (3^{19} [Heb. 4^{19}]). If the typical use of Egypt and Edom is accepted (p. 672[b] n[†]), the mention of these countries is of no importance in the discussion as to the date. Otherwise, a date must be found comparatively near to hostile action on the part of Egypt and Edom; and the same remark applies to Phœnicia and Philistia. In the period between the invasion of Judah by Shishak (c. B.C. 930) and the war in which Josiah fell (B.C. 610), there is no report of hostile action on the part of Egypt such as would meet the requirements of the prophecy. With regard to the other countries mentioned, the case is different. The Chronicler (2 Ch $21^{16.\ 17}$) reports an invasion of Judah by the Philistines in the reign of Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat and son-in-law of Ahab. The serious character of this invasion may be inferred from the statement of the Chronicler, that the palace was captured, and the royal family—wives and children, with the exception of a single son—were carried into captivity. That the Philistines were actively hostile to Judah about this period is sufficiently attested by Amos (1^6). According to this prophet, the Philistines found a market for their Jewish slaves in Edom; and in this traffic the Phœnicians are associated with the Philistines (Am 1^9). Further, as against Edom, which appar ently had been a dependency of Judah since the time of David, the Chronicler reports that, in the days of Jehoram, it made an effort to secure its independence,—'Edom revolted from under the hand of Judah and made a king over themselves' (2 Ch 21^8, cf. 2 K 8^{20}, where the statement of Ch is confirmed). Edom, indeed, was an inveterate enemy; but in the days of Jehoram specific acts of hostility were committed, which suffice to explain the reference in Joel. It is true that in Ch the Phœnicians are not mentioned. Amos, however, includes them in the same charge as the Philistines. The Phœnicians were the great naval power of the time. The maritime carrying-trade of the world was very largely in their hands. The Jewish slaves who were sold to the Ionians (Jl 3^6 [Heb. 4^6]) were, no doubt, conveyed in Phœn. vessels to the slave markets of Greece. The descendants of those whom Hiram allied to Judah broke the friendly relation, and ranged themselves with the enemies of the chosen people. And there was more than this. The Phœn. Baal-worship had been introduced into the northern kingdom through Jezebel, and into Judah through her daughter Athaliah, the wife of Jehoram. The influence of Phœnicia had been powerful enough to largely suppress the worship of J″ throughout the land of promise. When that worship was restored by Jehoiada, pious Jews would regard the friendship of Phœnicia as more dangerous than the hostility of Philistia. And a prophet of the period might be expected to assign to the Phœnicians a first place among the powers hostile to Judah. This is what Joel does (3^4 [Heb. 4^4]). In support of the late date, attention is directed to the fact that Joel mentions only petty peoples in the neighbourhood as enemies of Judah; whereas, in the early prophets, prominence is given to a heathen power of widely extended influence, which threatens the independence of the chosen people. It is quite true that from the time of Amos, who, if Joel is late, first raises this question in OT prophecy, a world-power aiming at universal empire has to be dealt with. But if a prophet did actually appear and write a book fifty years before Amos,—what then? At that time Assyria was beyond the prophetic horizon. Egypt since the days of Shishak—a century before—had ceased to cause anxiety. Only Phœnicians, Philistines, and Edomites troubled Judah. On the assumption of the late date, the peoples mentioned by Joel raise a serious difficulty. The date proposed by Merx, and favourably regarded by other critics, is about the middle of the 5th cent. B.C., when Nehemiah restored the wall of Jerusalem. In the historical books that deal with that period, tribes in the neighbourhood of Jerus. are spoken of as bitterly hostile to the Jewish community. Chief among these are the Samaritans and the Ammonites,—no mention is made of the Phœnicians (cf. Neh $4^{1ff.}$). It is scarcely credible that a prophet living in Jerus., while Nehemiah was struggling to put the capital in a position of security, should threaten heavy judgments against powers—some of them remote—whose hostility was scarcely felt, and not so much as mention the peoples bordering on Judah whose forces were united in active opposition of the most bitter kind against the Jewish community. And the case is strengthened by the fact that Ezekiel, from whom, according to Merx, Joel is supposed to have freely borrowed, begins his denunciation of the hostile powers with the Ammonites,—as bitter opponents as the Jews of the period had to deal with (cf. Ezk $25^{1ff.}$). Accordingly, if Merx' date is accepted, the mention of the peoples referred to—a factor of the weightiest importance in the determination of the dates of prophetical books—is deprived of its historical significance.

It has been urged that the Bk. of Joel is not an original work, but a Midrash—a sort of eschatological compendium—founded on the books of earlier prophets. According to this view, the nations named would lose their historical value. This might be admitted of the Egyptians and the Edomites, and, in a less degree, of the Philistines. But the reference to the Phœnicians cannot be explained in this way. And, in point of fact, so far as our historical information warrants an opinion, there is no period when a prophet loyal to the theocracy would be more likely to introduce his censure of hostile powers in the words of Joel (3^4 [Heb. 4^4]) than the early part of the reign of Joash, when Judah had just escaped the danger of ruin through the Phœn. Baal-worship. To sum up this point—a typical reference cannot be assigned to all the nations mentioned; an exact historical reference is not consistent with the post-exilic date proposed.

In connexion with the late date, another point deserves consideration. The prophet summons the people to repentance; but he does not name any special sin of which they are guilty. How unlike this is to Amos and his successors! On this ground alone it is difficult to find a suitable place for Joel between Amos and the exile of Judah. This may appear to favour a post-exilic date. But the condition of Judah described in the post-exilic books of OT is quite unlike that suggested in Joel. If the latter half of the 5th cent. is accepted as the date, Joel and Malachi would belong to the same period. Malachi gives as melancholy a picture of the moral and religious state of his countrymen as any prophet before the Exile. And the situation, then, is this. One prophet lays bare the sins which are eating as a canker into the heart of the post-exilic Church in language as severe as that of Amos or Isaiah,—while another prophet—practically a contemporary—writes as if there were not a special sin to denounce. Further, Malachi's efforts do not appear to have been crowned with much success (see his book throughout); Joel's simple, earnest appeal led to the happiest results (cf. $2^{18ff.}$). It follows that, if Joel had a practical message to his contemporaries, he can scarcely be placed in the generation to which Malachi belonged. A fair interpretation of the language is opposed to the view that the book is a mere Midrash, having no reference to the circumstances of the prophet's day. If the occasion of the prophet's exhortation was found in the actual condition of Judah at the time, the proposed post-exilic date is highly improbable. If the date is pre-exilic, it is not easy to point to a time more suitable than that suggested by Credner, viz. the early part of the reign of Joash of Judah. Through the reforming zeal of Jehoiada, the worship of J″ was at that time comparatively pure. And the people would be likely to respond to the earnest and affectionate appeals of a prophet like Joel.

Other points of less importance have found a place in the discussion as to the date. No king is mentioned. The prophet appeals to the priests as if the direction of affairs was in their hands. This is held to point to the condition of Judah after the return of the exiles from Babylon, when there was no king, and the administration of affairs, under the Pers. governor, was conducted by the priests and elders. The conclusion seems reasonable. It is urged in reply that Joash was only seven years of age when he ascended the throne, and that, for a time, the affairs of the kingdom would, of necessity, be left in the hands of Jehoiada the high priest. That is an important consideration. But of greater importance is the obvious purpose of the book. The prophet makes no special reference to civil or political affairs, or to the social condition of the people. His object is to reach the heart and conscience of the nation through the calamity which has fallen on the country,—to bring his countrymen as penitent suppliants before J″. In a matter of that kind it is the priests that should take the lead. And the prophet's appeal to the priestly party is appropriate.

Again, it is urged that the prophet makes no mention of the northern kingdom. But why should he? His view is confined to the disaster which has overtaken Judah. Negative evidence—such as the non-mention of the northern kingdom, and of a king of Judah—cannot counterbalance the positive evidence derived from the peoples named in the book, and the practical purpose of the prophet in behalf of his contemporaries. The question is, 'Whether a judgment such as Joel depicts forms a suitable theme for a prophetic book?' If it does, the absence of references found in other books of prophecy, which cover a much wider field and deal with subjects of various kinds, cannot safely be pressed in discussing the question of the date.

The importance attached to the ritual is held to favour a late date. The question of the ritual is raised, generally, by the prominence assigned to the priests, and, specifically, by the mention of fasting, and of the daily offering. Fasting, in connexion with an unexpected calamity, was a common practice from an early period of Israel's history in Canaan (cf. 2 S 1^{12} 12^{16}, 1 K $21^{9.12.27}$). The reference to fasting in Jl is quite consistent with an early date. The arrangements for the daily offering are found in P (Ex $29^{38\text{-}41}$). Whatever date may be assigned to P, the offering of the morning and evening sacrifice was an ancient practice, with the ritual of which the people would be familiar (cf. 2 K $16^{13\text{-}15}$). The direct references to ritual in Jl are as consistent with an early as with a late date. Moreover, devotion to ceremonial was not a peculiarity of post-exilic times. It may be doubted if any generation of Israelites was more attentive to external observances than those addressed by Amos (cf. Am $4^{4.5}$ $5^{21\text{-}23}$). The same may be said of Judah in the days of Isaiah (cf. Is 1), and, later, in the time of Jeremiah (cf. Jer 7). It is urged, however, that Joel attaches quite a special importance to the ritual. The interruption of the daily offering is equivalent to a breach of the covenant between J″ and Israel. And it may be doubted whether such a view can be reasonably assigned to any period between Amos and the Exile. The question is, 'Whether it is more reasonable to assign such an estimate of the ritual to post-exilic times than to an early period of reformation like that under Jehoiada?' If Mal may be trusted, Pharisaism was as unspiritual in the 5th cent. B.C. as it was in the most degenerate days before the Exile. The information available for the post-exilic period is scanty; such as it is, it can scarcely be said to support the simple, spiritual explanation of Joel.

. In addition to the general character and teaching of the book, there are special expressions which are held to favour a late date. It is argued that ch. 3 [Heb. 4] $^{1.17}$ presuppose the exile of Judah. But the words rendered 'to bring again the captivity of Judah' do not necessarily mean that Jews are actually to be brought back from exile. If this literal interpretation is insisted on, it follows that the restoration of the exiles has not yet taken place, and a date between B.C. 586 and 536 must be found—a most unlikely period for a prophet like Joel. To say that the restoration in B.C. 536 is inadequate, in view of the brilliant promises of the pre-exilic prophets, and that a restoration of a more glorious character must lie in the future, is simply to give up the literal interpretation of the words. In these circumstances, usage must be carefully considered. The words 'to bring again the captivity' seem to be used in the sense of 'to reverse a line of procedure.' Chastisement is to have an end, and that is to be followed by proofs of the divine favour (cf. Dt 30^3, Am 9^{14}, Hos 6^{11}, Jer 29^{14} $30^{3.18}$ [where the expression is applied to the tents of Jacob], 48^{47} [where the words are applied to Moab]). Moreover, it should be noted that the turning of the captivity is to take place in the same period as the outpouring of the Spirit, and, chronologically, is associated with the final judgment of the nations hostile to the Church. The prophet emphasizes this note of time, ch. 3 [Heb. 4] ^{1a}:—'behold, in those days, and in that time.' If this period was ushered in on the Day of Pentecost—as St. Peter teaches (Ac $2^{16\text{ff.}}$)—the turning of the captivity and the judging of the nations are thrown into Christian times, and the reference to the Bab. exile falls to the ground. Nor does the mention of the Ionians require a date in the Pers. or Gr. period. The reference to the Phœnicians and the Philistines (3^4 [Heb. 4^4]) connects the prophet's message with his contemporaries; the charge against these peoples is that they sold Jews as slaves to the Ionians. The Ionians were settled on the coast of Asia Minor before the 9th cent. B.C. And the ports of Asia Minor offered the nearest market-place for the sale of slaves conveyed in Phœn. vessels. Upon the whole, the evidence available, if used as in the case of other books of prophecy, seems to the present writer more favourable to a pre-exilic than to a post-exilic date.

v. DOCTRINE.—Joel contains a comprehensive summary of prophetic teaching. The calamities of life are the fruit of sin. The punishment of sin cannot be escaped without repentance. Sincere repentance will secure forgiveness, and the restoration of the divine favour. Further, such a calamity as Joel describes is severe enough, and deliverance from it a great blessing; but there is a final judgment and deliverance of which these are but types. Joel uses a grave occurrence of his own day as a basis for a prediction concerning the last times, when, on the great day of the Lord, the cycle of judgment shall close, and the deliverance of the people of J″ shall be complete. To that day of the Lord the prophet sees all things tending. The locust invasion appears to be a harbinger of that day; hence the earnestness of the prophet's appeal to the people. Such, generally, is the teaching of the book—the day of the Lord being the most important subject.

It is quite surprising how much of the imagery and thought of Joel appears in other books of Scripture. If the date is early, later writers lie under very special obligations to the author of this short book. The most striking part of the imagery is that connected with the locusts, which appear as agents in divine judgments from the time of the exodus from Egypt down to the close of the present dispensation (cf. Ex $10^{4\text{ff.}}$, Rev $9^{3\text{ff.}}$). For the phenomena connected with the day of the Lord, the speedy approach of which is supposed to be indicated by the locust invasion, cf. Ex $10^{21\text{ff.}}$, Is $13^{9\text{f.}}$, Ezk $32^{7\text{f.}}$, Am 8^9, Mt 24^{29}, Mk $13^{24\text{f.}}$, Lk $21^{25\text{f.}}$, Rev $6^{12\text{ff.}}$. In ch. 3 [Heb. 4] ^{13} two figures occur which appear elsewhere, especially in the Bk. of Rev. The first is that of the harvest (cf. Hos 6^{11}, Jer 51^{33}, Mt 13^{39}, Rev $14^{15\text{f.}}$). The second is that of the wine-press (cf. Is 63^3, La 1^{15}, Rev $14^{19\text{f.}}$). Noteworthy also is the figure of the fountain proceeding from the house of J″, when His people are restored to His favour, and watering the dry acacia-wady (ch. 3 [He 4] ^{18}; cf. Ezk $47^{1\text{ff.}}$, Zec 13^1 14^8, Rev 22^1). In the promise of the outpouring of the Spirit, Joel seems to have given expression to a glimpse into NT times, with which he was specially favoured. His words have been taken up by the NT Church, and will be used, to the end of our NT dispensation, to express the sum of blessing bestowed by God on His true people (cf. Nu $11^{26\text{-}29}$, Zec 12^{10}, Ac $2^{16\text{ff.}}$, Jn $16^{7\text{ff.}}$).

Not less important are the two closely allied truths regarding the remnant and the called (2^{32}) [Heb. 3^5]. For the former, cf. Ob ^{17} (where the language is the same as in Jl), Is 6^{13} (and various other passages), Mic $5^{3.7.8}$ [Heb. $^{2.6.7}$], Jer $31^{7\text{ff.}}$, Ro 11 $5^{\text{ff.}}$. For the latter, cf. Ro $9^{7\text{ff.}}$. It is worthy of note that, in this OT book, the truth is distinctly laid down that (as Ewald puts it) 'no man may boast of a right to redemption' (Prophets of OT, Eng. tr. i. 137).

This investigation might be pushed further, but enough has been stated to show that the Bk. of Jl and other books of Scripture have a great deal in common.*

The style of Joel is clear and of a high order, and the language comparatively pure. One of his words for the locusts (בָּלְעָם) occurs

* Is 13^6 (cf. Jl 1^{15}), Am 1^2 (cf. Jl 3 [Heb. 4] ^{16}), Am 9^{13} (cf. Jl 3 [Heb. 4] ^{18}), raise directly the question of quotations. This point has not been discussed, because, in the case of such a book as the OT, an argument founded on quotations is extremely precarious. That quotations occur in the passages just mentioned is scarcely doubtful. The question is, 'Who quotes?' The words of Jl 3^{16} occur quite naturally in a highly poetic passage. The same words in Am 1^2 seem to be chosen as a sort of text for the prophet's discourse. And the reasonable view is that, in this case, Jl is the original source.

elsewhere only in Am 4⁹. This, partly, led Bleek to the conclusion that the locust invasion described in Jl was the same as that referred to in Am, and that the two prophets belonged to the same period—Joel being the earlier. If this view is accepted, the perplexing expression הַצְּפוֹנִי (the northern, 2²⁰) admits of a comparatively easy explanation. A north wind is all that is required to bring the locusts from the northern kingdom into Judah.

JOELAH (יוֹאֵלָה, text doubtful, see Kittel in SBOT. While LXX A has Ἰωηλά, B has Ἐλιά).—A warrior who joined David at Ziklag, 1 Ch 12⁷.

JOEZER (יוֹעֶזֶר 'J" is help,' B Ἰωζάρα, A Ἰωζάαρ).—One of David's followers at Ziklag, 1 Ch 12⁶.

JOGBEHAH (יָגְבְּהָה; LXX in Nu καὶ ὕψωσαν αὐτάς, in Jg Ἰεγεβάλ, B).—A town of Gad in Gilead, Nu 32³⁵, named also in connexion with Gideon's pursuit of the Midianites, Jg 8¹¹. It is the present ruin Jubeihah (or Ajbeihât), N.W. from Rabbath-ammon, and about midway between that place and es-Salt. There are remains of a considerable Roman town, and the position is suitable for the line of Gideon's pursuit, from Succoth to Penuel and thence S.E. to Jogbehah. There are three groups of ruins, hence the plur. Ajbeihât.

JOHANAN (יוֹחָנָן; LXX Ἰωνά, Ἰωανάν, Ἰωνάν, Ἰωαννάν, Ἰωάννας).—1. 2 K 25²³, Jer 40⁸–43⁵ (see AZARIAH, No. 23, and GEDALIAH), the son of Kareah, chief of 'the captains of the forces,' who after the fall of Jerusalem joined Gedaliah at Mizpah. Johanan seems to have been a shrewd man; and, foreseeing the calamities which would certainly ensue if Ishmael's plot were successful, he not only joined the other captains in warning Gedaliah, but in a secret interview pressed in vain to be himself permitted to assassinate Ishmael. When the murder of Gedaliah became known, J. pursued after Ishmael, who was carrying captive the remnant of the Jews. The murderer escaped with the loss of two men (Jer 41¹·¹⁵); but J. recovered the captives, and brought them to a khan (?) near Bethlehem, Geruth-chimham (see 2 S 19³⁸, Lk 2⁷), whence they might start for Egypt. The politic J. foresaw that the captains would be held responsible by the Chaldæan authorities for the murder of Gedaliah and the escape of the assassin. Having thus determined, J. and all the people consulted Jeremiah, earnestly affirming their resolve to follow at all risks the revealed will of the Lord; but the answer being strongly adverse to their leaving their own land, they accused Jeremiah of being a false prophet, under the malign influence of Baruch, and carried off to Egypt both the prophet and his scribe. 2. 1 Ch 3¹⁵ eldest son of Josiah, not the same as Jehoahaz; for (α) Jehoahaz was not the eldest son (see 2 K 23³¹·³⁶); and (β) he is mentioned in this verse as Shallum. Johanan possibly predeceased his father. 3. 1 Ch 3²⁴ a post-exilic prince of the line of David. 4. 1 Ch 6⁹·¹⁰ a high priest, perhaps under Rehoboam, father of Azariah, No. 5. 5. 6. 1 Ch 12⁴·¹² two warriors who came to David to Ziklag, a Benjamite and a Gadite respectively. 7. Ezr 8¹² (JOANNES, 1 Es 8³⁸) one of those who returned with Ezra. 8. 2 Ch 28¹² an Ephraimite, father of AZARIAH, No. 17. The Heb. is יְהוֹחָנָן, Jehohanan. 9. See JONATHAN, No. 6, and JEHOHANAN, No. 3.

JOHN (Ἰωάννης).—Five persons of this name are mentioned in the Apocr. 1. The father of Mattathias, and grandfather of the five Maccabæan brothers (1 Mac 2¹). 2. J., surnamed Caddis or (RV) Gaddis (wh. see), the eldest son of Mattathias (1 Mac 2², where inferior MSS read Ἰωαννάν; Jos. Ant. XII. vi. 1). In B.C. 161 he was slain by the 'sons of Jambri' [JAMBRI] (1 Mac 9³⁵·⁴²; Jos. Ant. XIII. i. 2–4). In 2 Mac 8²², and perhaps again 10¹⁹, he is by mistake called Joseph. 3. The father of Eupolemus (1 Mac 8¹⁷, 2 Mac 4¹¹, Jos. Ant. XII. x. 6), who was sent by Judas Maccabæus as an ambassador to Rome. The passage in 2 Mac speaks of certain royal privileges obtained for the Jews by this J., but disregarded by Epiphanes. The privileges referred to are probably those granted by Antiochus the Great (Jos. Ant. XII. iii. 3), among which was the right of being governed according to their own laws. 4. An envoy, who together with another named ABSALOM (which see) was sent by the Jews to treat with Lysias (2 Mac 11¹⁷). 5. One of the elder sons of Simon the Maccabee (1 Mac 16²), commonly known as J. Hyrcanus (cf. Jos. Ant. XIII. vii. 4), and described as 'a (valiant) man' (1 Mac 13⁵³), was appointed by his father commander of the forces, and stationed at Gazara. In conjunction with his brother Judas he defeated CENDEBÆUS (1 Mac 16¹·¹⁰, cf. Jos. Ant. XIII. vii. 3). When his father and brothers had been murdered by Ptolemy at Dok near Jericho, J., who was then at Gazara, received warning of their fate, and, having put to death the men sent to assassinate him, secured the position of high priest, which had been made hereditary in the family of Simon B.C. 135 (1 Mac 16¹¹·²⁴, cf. 14⁴⁶). See MACCABEES.

JOHN (Ac 4⁶).—A meeting of the Sanhedrin is mentioned, at which there are said to have been gathered together 'the rulers, the elders, and the scribes, with Annas the high priest, and Caiaphas, and John, and Alexander, and all who were of the high priestly family.' Nothing further is known of either John or Alexander (wh. see), and the attempts made to connect the names with other historical characters (such as Johanan ben-Sakkai) are more than improbable. A. C. HEADLAM.

JOHN, FATHER OF SIMON PETER.—In Jn 1⁴² the true reading is Σίμων ὁ υἱὸς Ἰωάνου, in 21¹⁵·¹⁶·¹⁷ Σίμων Ἰωάνου. The Vetus Interpretatio Latina of Origen (in Matth. tom. xv. 14, Migne, Pat. Gr. xiii. 1295) quotes a passage from the Gospel according to the Hebrews in which the words occur, 'Simon, fili Joanne, facilius est camelum intrare per foramen acus quam divitem in regnum cælorum' (cf. Hilgenfeld, Evang. secundum Hebræos, pp. 16, 25), a passage, however, which has no place in the Greek text. Further, a cursive MS (Matt. Mk.) of the 9th century (Tisch. Not. Cod. Sin p. 58) has four marginal glosses, in which τὸ Ἰουδαϊκόν [sc. εὐαγγέλιον] is referred to. One of these agrees with a fragment quoted by Jerome from the Gospel according to the Hebrews, so that it appears that these scholia reproduce matter from that Gospel. On Mt 16[17] (Βαριωνᾶ) there is the note: τὸ Ἰουδαικὸν υἱὲ Ἰωάννου (see Handmann, Das Hebräerevang., 'Texte u. Untersuch.,' v. pp. 65, 85). There is sufficient evidence, therefore, that John was found in the Gospel according to the Hebrews as the name of the apostle's father.

In Mt 16[17] the father's name is given as Jonas—Σίμων Βαριωνᾶ.* In the LXX we find that not only is יוֹנָתָן represented in B by Ἰωνά in 2 K 25[23] and by Ἰωνάν in Jer 47 (40)[8], but even יְהוֹחָנָן (1 Ch 26[3]) is represented in B by Ἰωνᾶς, in A by Ἰωνάν; cf. 1 Ch 12[12] (Ἰωάν), Ezr 8[12], Neh 6[18], 1 Es 9[1], Jer 43 (50)[4] (ℵ*). There is ground, therefore, for the conclusion in the case in question that Ἰωνᾶς is a contraction of Ἰωάνης (so Keim, Geschichte Jesu von Nazara, ii. p. 213 [iii. p. 261, Eng. tr.]; see esp. Lightfoot, On a Fresh Revision, p. 159 n.).

It is possible, however, that we have here an instance of a double name. Such double names were not uncommon; see Zunz, 'Namen der Juden,' in his Gesammelte Schriften, ii. p. 15, who among instances of double Hebrew or Aramaic names adduces Jochanan-Joseph (Gittin, f. 34*b*). More common were the cases in which to a Hebrew or Aramaic name was added a Greek or Roman name—the latter being often chosen so as to make an assonance with the former. Familiar instances are Saul-Paulus (see Deissmann, Bibelstudien, p. 181 ff.), Joseph-Justus (Ac 1[23]). It seems therefore not impossible that the name of St. Peter's father was Jona-Jochanan or Jona-Johannes. The latter name was so common (see e.g. the Index to Josephus, or Pape, Wörterbuch) that it must have been familiar to Gentiles (cf. inscription at Ancyra, CIG 4045), and in intercourse with them would have something of the convenience of a Greek or Roman name.

A curious specimen of the harmonizing expedient is found in a note of the Paris MSS. Reg. 1789, 1026, Πέτρος καὶ Ἀνδρέας ἀδελφοί, ἐκ πατρὸς Ἰωνᾶ, μητρὸς Ἰωαννᾶ, or (as it is otherwise read) ἐκ πατρὸς Ἰωάννου, μητρὸς Ἰωνᾶς (see Lightfoot, ubi supra).

JOHN THE BAPTIST (Ἰωάννης ὁ Βαπτιστής).—

i. Sources of Information.
ii. The Facts of John's Life and Ministry.
iii. John's Work and Teaching.
iv. John's Relation to Christ.

i. SOURCES.—In regard to John the Baptist we have practically no sources of first-hand information outside the NT besides the passage in Josephus (Ant. XVIII. v. 2), referred to by Eus. (HE i. 11). The fullest account is that of St. Luke, with which that of St. Matthew agrees closely, so far as the time after the beginning of his public ministry is concerned. St. Mark's notices are very brief. The Fourth Gospel seems to differ from the others in recording only the 'witness' of John the Baptist after our Lord's baptism, while Mt and Lk give his prophetic teaching before that event. The relation of the Fourth Gospel to the others, in this connexion, has been made the subject of special monographs, such as that of Boissonas, mentioned at the end of this article.

ii. LIFE AND MINISTRY.—John the Baptist was the son of Zacharias and Elisabeth. The latter was 'of the daughters of Aaron' (Lk 1[5]), while Zacharias belonged to the course of Abiah (wh. see), one of the sons of Eleazar, who gave his name to the eighth of the twenty-four courses into which the priests were divided. His priestly descent on both sides brings into stronger contrast the prophetic character of his work. We cannot determine exactly either the time or the place of his birth. Dates varying from B.C. 6 to B.C. 3 have been assigned to it, and Lk 1[36] would lead us to infer that it was three months before that of our Lord. In regard to the place, it is argued that Zacharias must have lived in one of the priestly towns; but it is possible to prove that priests often lived elsewhere. It is still more arbitrary to pick out one of the priestly towns and fix on Hebron (Othon, Lex. Rabbin. 324). Nor is there sufficient evidence for reading Juttah in Lk 1[39], though this place, which lay a little S. of Hebron, is mentioned (Jos 15[55] 21[16]) as a priestly town. A tradition, resting on the evidence of the Russian abbot Daniel (c. A.D. 1113), who quotes as his authority a monk of St. Sabas (Didon, Life of Christ, Eng. tr. App. D), fixes the residence of Zacharias at 'Ain Karim, a village to the N.W. of Bethlehem. We cannot go behind the vague statement of St. Luke, who mentions (1[39]) 'a city of Judah in the hill country.' Of John's early life and training St. Luke, our sole authority, tells us very little. It is summed up in the two verses which state that 'the hand of the Lord was with him' (1[66]), and that 'the child grew and waxed strong in spirit, and was in the deserts till the day of his showing unto Israel' (1[80]). To these may be added the words of the angel Gabriel (Lk 1[15]), 'He shall drink no wine nor strong drink, and he shall be filled with the Holy Ghost, even from his mother's womb.'

With these few details we have to pass over a period of about thirty years which preceded his ἀνάδειξις (cf. Lk 10[1], Ac 1[24]), and can only speculate on the question (which is of some interest in reference to Jn 1[31]) whether our Lord was personally known to him (as their relationship would seem to necessitate) or not. There can be little doubt that the elaborate accumulation of dates given by St. Luke (3[1. 2]), combined with the expression (unique in the NT) 'the word of God came,' is meant to mark the beginning of John's ministry, and to emphasize its prophetic character. If (see CHRONOLOGY OF THE NT, vol. i. p. 405) we may assign the fifteenth year of Tiberius to A.D. 25–26, then this is the date of the beginning of John's ministry. We cannot determine how long after this beginning the incident of our Lord's baptism occurred, and the arguments used to show that this interval was long (Didon, l.c.) or short (Weiss) are not decisive. The only definite fact to notice is that the first passover of our Lord's ministry (see CHRONOLOGY OF NT, p. 405) is that of A.D. 27, and therefore the baptism must be fixed before that time. To the period following Christ's baptism is to be assigned the carefully defined record of Jn 1[19-42], while the Synoptic account belongs to the period which precedes that event.

How long an interval elapsed between Christ's baptism and John's imprisonment is the next point to consider. Here it may be noticed (1) that Lk 3[19. 20] mentions the imprisonment before our Lord's baptism, evidently with the intention of completing the references to John before passing to our Lord's ministry; (2) that Mt 4[12] and Mk 1[14] connect our Lord's first journey into Galilee with the imprisonment, and make it follow that event in time; (3) that St. John mentions a short stay in Galilee and a visit to Jerusalem for the passover, and then makes the definite statement that 'John was not yet cast into prison' (3[24]). We must either assume, therefore, that Jn is at variance with Mt and Mk, or that the visit to Galilee which he records preceded our Lord's public ministry there. The latter is the more probable explanation, and in that case the visit of Mt 4[12] and Mk 1[14] may be identified with that of Jn 4^2. At any rate, for determining the date of the imprisonment, Jn's statements are more important, for that event must have been subsequent to the passover of A.D. 27; further, if we may press the allusion in Jn 4^{35}—τετράμηνός ἐστιν καὶ ὁ θερισμὸς ἔρχεται—our Lord's journey into Galilee will have taken place not very long after the passover, and if we may also use the statements of Mt and Mk which assign the imprisonment as the reason of our Lord's going into Galilee, then we may fix the imprisonment early in A.D. 27. One incident is related during that imprisonment (Mt 11^2, Lk 7^{18}), viz. the message sent by John through his disciples to ask our Lord whether He was the Messiah. This is definitely connected, in St. Matthew's account, with the plucking of the ears of corn; in St. Luke it seems to be the result of the report of Christ's ministry in Galilee, and especially of the Raising of the Widow's Son. If, therefore, we follow Mt, this incident would be some time between April and June of the same year; nor would the latter month allow too little time for the completion of the Galilæan tour required by St. Luke's narrative.

The last event to which we have to try and assign a date is the death of John the Baptist, recorded Mt $14^{3ff.}$, Mk $6^{14ff.}$. Little weight can be attached to the almost universal commemoration of this event on Aug. 29 (Nilles, Kalend. Utr. Eccles.), though it certainly represents a comparatively early usage. We cannot base any argument on the context in Mt and Mk, for in both the account is inserted parenthetically to explain Herod's statement that John was 'risen from the dead'; but it may be noticed that the news of his death in Mt 14^{13} leads on at once to the miracle of the Feeding of the Five Thousand. Nor can we fix the date of John's death by its coincidence with the γενέσια of Herod Antipas. Herod's reluctance (Mt 14^5) to put John to death may, but need not, imply a considerable interval between his imprisonment and death; thus Renan (Vie de Jésus, ch. vii.) puts the arrest in the summer of 29, and the death on the birthday of Herod Antipas in 30.* We may perhaps safely argue that his death had taken place before the unnamed feast of Jn 5^1, for during our Lord's visit to Jerusalem on that occasion he refers to John's witness as past (Jn 5^{35} ἦν); and though it is possible to argue that his witness was closed by his imprisonment, it is more natural to refer the expression to his death. John's death therefore took place before the feast of Jn 5^1, that is, certainly before the second passover of our Lord's ministry, but how long before must depend on the interpretation given to Jn 5^1. It cannot be placed later than the beginning of A.D. 28. According to tradition (Theodt. HE iii. 3), John was buried at Samaria.

The scene of John's ministry will be placed partly in the desert of Judæa (Mt 3^1), in which it began, and partly in the Jordan Valley, and more definitely near the fords (Bethabara [which see]= 'place of crossing over'), either those in the neighbourhood of Bethshean or those in the neighbourhood of Jericho. Two places are mentioned in connexion with his 'baptism,' viz. Bethany or Bethabara (Jn 1^{28}), and Ænon near to Salim (Jn 3^{23}), probably in the neighbourhood of Bethshean. From Jn 3^{26}, and also from the fact of his coming under the jurisdiction of Herod Antipas, we infer that he probably spent some time in Peræa.

iii. JOHN'S WORK AND TEACHING.—(α) The name ὁ βαπτιστής or ὁ βαπτίζων (whether given to him to distinguish him from others of the same name or not) indicates the feature of his work which attracted special attention. It was used of him during his lifetime by his disciples (Lk 7^{20}), and that the term is not due to the evangelist is clear from Lk 3^2 7^{18} etc., where John is by him called son of Zacharias, or simply John. The term is used of him also during his lifetime by our Lord (Mt 11^{11}), who, however, also uses the name John simply (e.g. Mt 11^{13}), by Herodias (Mt 14^8), by Herod after John's death (Mt 14^2), and by the evangelists Mt and Mk but not Lk and Jn. In regard to his baptism, we gather that his right to perform the ceremony was questioned, inasmuch as (Jn 1^{25}) it was connected, according to Jewish ideas, only with the Messiah (cf. Ezk 36^{25}, Zec 13^1 etc.), with Elias as His forerunner, and with 'the prophet' (i.e. of Dt 18^{15}). John speaks of himself as having received a special commission from God to baptize (Jn 1^{33}), though this is not spoken of in the angel's message to Zacharias, and he seems (Jn 3^{27}) to defend our Lord's baptism (Jn 3^{26}, but cf. 4^2) by basing it on a similar divine commission. The import of the rite was early a question of discussion (Jn 3^{25}), nor does the language of the evangelists make clear what was understood by it; for while Mk 1^4 Lk 3^3 define it as 'a baptism of repentance for remission of sins,' Mt 3^{11} speaks of it as a baptism εἰς (τὴν) μετάνοιαν; but μετάνοια can hardly have been the object of the rite, for it was preceded (Mt, Mk) by a confession of sin. The submission of a Jew to the rite was, so far, an act involving μετάνοια, in that it implied that he put himself in the same position towards the coming βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν which the proselyte took up towards the old Jewish dispensation; it implied that he rested no longer on his privileged position as a Jew, but realized his individual responsibility in regard to sin. This comes near to Sabatier's explanation (see Lit. below) of the rite as 'consecrating a new Israel,' and would perhaps best explain the meaning of our Lord's words, in regard to Himself, that a submission to John's baptism was (Mt 3^{15}) a fulfilment, i.e. a complete realization, of what was meant by δικαιοσύνη, as something which consisted not merely in external rites, but involved moral claims. Our Lord implies that John's baptism was from heaven (Mk 11^{30}); and the refusal of the Pharisees and lawyers to receive it is in itself a virtual rejection of God's purpose, while the acceptance of it by the publicans and the people showed a truer recognition on their part of what the righteousness of God really meant (Lk $7^{29.\ 30}$ ἐδικαίωσαν τὸν θεόν). We may notice, too (Mt 21^{32}), that our Lord regards John as coming ἐν ὁδῷ δικαιοσύνης. So that we may regard John's baptism as emphasizing the true nature of δικαιοσύνη.

(β) We pass from his baptism to (1) his position as a teacher; (2) the language in which that teaching was conveyed; (3) its underlying ideas.

(1) The angel Gabriel connects with him (Lk 1^{17}) the prophecy of Malachi ($4^{5.\ 6}$), but precludes the idea that Elias would return in person as many expected (see Geux, l.c. p. 73 ff.), by saying that John should come in 'the spirit and power' of Elias. That he was Elias come in the flesh John himself (Jn 1^{21}) denied, while Christ affirmed that John the Baptist was really the Elias who was to precede the Messiah's coming (Mt 11^{14} 17^{11-13}). The other prophecy which was applied to John the Baptist by himself (Jn 1^{23}) and also by the evangelists (Mt 3^3, Mk 1^2) is that of Is 40^3. He was then 'more than a prophet,' as himself the subject of prophecy. But he was also essentially a prophet, and as such St. Luke introduces him in the unique expression already noticed, as such Zacharias refers to him (Lk 1^{76} προφήτης Ὑψίστου κληθήσῃ), as such Christ regarded him (Mt 11^{11}), and the people as a rule (but cf. Mt 11^{18}) accepted him as a prophet (Mt 14^5 21^{26}). In regard to his special mission we must refer also to the words used of him in Jn 1^6 3^{28}

* These dates are, of course, later than those in the article on CHRONOLOGY OF NT, which is here followed.

(ἀπεσταλμένος) and Mt 11[11] (ἐγήγερται). It is then as 'the last of the prophets' and as such closing the dispensation of 'the law and the prophets' (Mt 11[13], Lk 16[16]) that we specially think of John the Baptist.

(2) When we pass to the language in which his teaching was conveyed, we find that it is largely based on that used by OT prophecy, especially by Isaiah. His metaphors of the burning chaff, the fan, the barren tree, are all to be found in OT. Some of the expressions are difficult to trace, and not easy to explain. Thus various interpretations have been assigned to the phrase γεννήματα ἐχιδνῶν (Mt 3[7] etc., Lk 3[7]), which is not to be found in the OT, but is one of several expressions common to our Lord and John the Baptist; another expression of which the meaning is not quite clear is the baptism 'with fire' (Mt 3[11]).

(3) In regard to the substance of his teaching, it must be remembered (a) that even in the fullest account of it given by St. Luke we have only an abstract (cf. 3[7] imperfect ἔλεγεν, and 3[18] πολλὰ καὶ ἕτερα); (b) that St. Luke regards the character of his teaching as a consequence (3[7] οὖν) of his carrying out the preparatory work spoken of in Is 40[3]. We may amplify the abstract by noticing the words which are used to describe it. They are κηρύσσω (Mk 1[4] etc.), εὐαγγελίζω (Lk 3[18]), παρακαλέω (Lk 3[18]), and in the case of Herod ἐλέγχω; and these imply that he announced good tidings, and also the preparation necessary for it; and in both these his prophetic character appears. The 'good tidings' he announced was the near approach of 'the kingdom.' The nature of this kingdom he does not define, nor does he state how the kingdom is to be established, nor who its members are to be. Probably, in accordance with ancient Jewish belief, he expected a visible kingdom; but he advances on that in so far as consciously or unconsciously to imply that it was spiritual, and to prepare the way for the realization that it was not to be merely Jewish but universal. These points can be seen from his insistence on the moral preparation for it. Repentance is a necessity, for all national privileges are useless, and the fitting mode of life requires that ordinary pursuits should be followed, but in a new spirit. Thus an individual and universal responsibility is insisted on, and an individual and universal judgment is proclaimed as imminent. Limits of space prevent an examination in detail of this teaching, but it will repay careful study. We can only summarize. It was addressed (Lk 3[10]; cf. Mk 1[5], Mt 3[5]) to the ὄχλοι, who came out to him in large numbers, and included in their ranks (Mt 3[7]) many Pharisees and Sadducees. The points insisted on by John are (1) confession of sins, and repentance, which had been already enforced by the OT prophets (e.g. Hos 6[1], Jl 2[12] etc.); (2) the uselessness of reposing on their national privileges as 'children of Abraham' is indicated, and possibly the outburst γεννήματα ἐχιδνῶν may have been provoked by the thought that many of his hearers were relying on his baptism as of value per se, and teaching others to do the same (Boissonas, l.c. p. 40); (3) a judgment is imminent (ἤδη), which is universal (πᾶν δένδρον), and determined by the character of the individual. This judgment involves a manifestation of divine ὀργή, not only towards the political enemies of Israel (as in OT), but towards the Jews. This ὀργή is frequently mentioned in OT and NT, and a resulting purification or separation, διακαθαριεῖ, probably implies not, as Godet, the universal character of the purification, but its thoroughness; (4) St. Luke alone records the answers given to different classes who realized the need of action of some kind. John's answers show the changed requirements—not outward observances or a leaving of their ordinary duties, but a new attitude towards them; (5) finally, John removes the doubts of some as to whether he was the Messiah, by asserting the inferiority of his own person and work. His teaching as recorded in St. John will be best considered under the next heading; but it will be interesting for students to try and trace whether there is any difference between St. John's teaching before and after his baptism of our Lord.

It remains under this head to say a word as to the effect of his teaching. It is clear that very large numbers came to him, and he was generally accepted as a prophet; and of the lower classes many accepted his teaching (Lk 7[30]), though the upper classes refused to accept his baptism, and some said of him, as of our Lord, δαιμόνιον ἔχει (Mt 11[18]). Besides the effect of his work and teaching on the people at large, we read also of μαθηταί who fasted (Mk 2[18] etc.), who attended him in prison (Mt 11[2] 14[12]), and to whom he taught special forms of prayer (Lk 5[33] 11[1]), some of whom left him to follow Christ (Jn 1[37]). Their number is given in Clem. Hom. ii. 23 as thirty. In the Acts (18[25] 19[3]) we hear of Christians at Ephesus who accepted John's baptism. Their mention shows 'how profoundly the effect of John's preaching was felt in districts as remote as proconsular Asia, even after a lapse of a quarter of a century' (Lightfoot, Colossians, p. 402). Later on (and Lightfoot finds a trace of this in the argument of St. John's Gospel) the Hemerobaptists connected their beliefs and practices with John the Baptist, and Christians called after him, the Sabæans or Mandæans, are still, though in diminishing numbers, to be found in the marshy districts near the confluence of the Tigris and Euphrates (see Lightfoot, l.c., and literature quoted by him p. 405; and also Renan, who finds evidence of Babylonian ideas).

iv. JOHN'S RELATION TO CHRIST.—From the narrative of St. Luke (chs. 1 and 2), and from Mt 3[14], we should infer that John knew our Lord, and realized the nature of His Person; but the words of Jn 1[31. 33] 'I knew him not,' imply that at any rate till the sign was given at our Lord's baptism John did not recognize Him as the Messiah; and this view is taken by Strauss, Godet, and Weiss. It is quite probable that the Synoptic narrative gives John's teaching before the baptism, and that the Fourth Gospel gives the special μαρτυρία which it was John's function, in the Divine Providence (Jn 1[7]), to bear, so soon as he realized by the sign at the baptism what our Lord's real personality was. This does not require that our Lord's divinity did not begin till His baptism and the descent of the Holy Ghost there, as held by various Gnostic and Humanitarian sects.* To the time of John's baptism of our Lord is to be assigned that 'anointing' with the Holy Spirit (Ac 4[27] 10[38]) which was His consecration to His ministry. We assume here that the Synoptic narrative does refer to the time before our Lord's baptism, and the Fourth Gospel to the period which follows. In the former his references to our Lord's person are only relative to himself: He is ὁ ἰσχυρότερος—He is the master, while John is the servant who bears (Mt) or looses (Mk, Lk) the master's sandals. The unwillingness to baptize our Lord (Mt 3[14]) does, however, require that John had some definite grasp of who it was that came to him. John speaks of the work of Him for whom he was preparing as consisting in a baptism 'with the Holy Ghost and with fire.' The baptism with fire must refer either to the fire of judgment (as Keim, Neander, Meyer, etc.), or to the Holy Spirit (as Godet), and its effect is either that of devouring (Dt 4^{24}) or purifying (Zec 13^{9}, Mal 3^{2} etc.). In the Fourth Gospel, though we probably must not understand the twice repeated (Jn $1^{15.\ 30}$) 'who was before me' as a statement of belief in the pre-existence of Christ, yet the language in which John the Baptist speaks of Christ as 'the Son of God' (1^{34}) and the 'Lamb of God' implies a much higher and more definite conception of the person of Christ than any words used by John the Baptist in the Synoptic Gospels, and is best explained by the vision referred to in these Gospels, which would account for the clearer grasp. We cannot be sure that the Baptist understood completely the term 'Lamb of God' which he applied to our Lord, but he must have had in his mind some thought of Is 53. In the other passage in which he speaks of Christ as the Bridegroom, he is using language by which the relation of Jehovah to His people is frequently described in the OT (Is 54^{5} 61^{10}, Hos 2^{20}). It is an interesting point of coincidence between the Synoptic narrative and that of St. John that our Lord uses this same expression of Himself when disciples of John were present, Mt $9^{14f.}$.

* Cf. Conybeare, Key of Truth, pp. xii, xiii, for the teaching of Gregory the Illuminator, esp. 'John gave priesthood, and unction, and prophecy, and kingship to our Saviour Christ, and Christ gave it to the apostles, and the apostles to the clergy of the Church.'

To complete our notice of John's relation to Christ, it is necessary just to refer to the message which he sent to our Lord from the prison (Mt 11): we can hardly believe, after the terms applied by him to Christ in St. John, that his own faith wavered, and must suppose that he wished some confirmation of Christ's Messiahship to be given for the sake of his disciples

Before we leave this heading of the subject, it is worth while to notice how many of our Lord's expressions resemble those found in John the Baptist's mouth. Besides the reference to the Bridegroom just mentioned, we find a connexion in the command to repent with which our Lord begins His ministry, in the language about the tree and its fruits (Mt 7^{16} 12^{33}), in the expression γεννήματα ἐχιδνῶν (Mt 3^{7}), used twice by our Lord (Mt 12^{34} 23^{33}), and nowhere else except by John the Baptist. We must also briefly notice here the testimony borne by our Lord to John, as the greatest born of women, as closing the older dispensation of the law and the prophets, and yet as less than the least in the kingdom of heaven, because he preceded its advent (Mt 11^{11}).

It hardly falls within the scope of this Dictionary to follow the many references connected with the name of John the Baptist in art, in liturgical use, in the dedication of churches, etc. etc.—for these reference may be made to the Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, articles 'John the Baptist' and 'Baptisteries,' to the index of Nilles' Kalendarium Utriusque Ecclesiæ, to Paciandi, Antiquitates Christianæ, vol. iii. ('De cultu J. Baptistæ') Romae, 1755, and to various books on sacred art, etc., such as those of Kraus, Detzel, and Wessely, or Jameson's Sacred and Legendary Art.

LITERATURE.—Besides the books just mentioned, and the commentaries on the Gospel narratives, the following will be found useful:—Hort, Judaistic Christianity, p. 22 ff.; Lightfoot, Colossians, p. 400 ff.; Sabatier, article in Lichtenberger's Encyclopädie; Renan, Vie de Jésus (index). I. THE LIFE OF ST. JOHN.—The fragmentary character of the literature relating to the earliest days of the Christian Church has deprived us of any very full or certain knowledge of the lives of the apostles. And it has happened, in the case of St. Peter and St. John conspicuously, that the discussion of the traditions of their later history has been involved in controversy. It will tend to clearness if the ordinary traditional account of St. John's life is first set out, and then the range of the controversy indicated.

(a) There are but few scenes in the Gospel story in which St. John takes a prominent place; but enough is said to produce a strong impression of the apostle's character. He appears first, according to a very natural inference, in the opening chapter of the Gospel that bears his name. Two disciples of the Baptist, hearing the witness borne by their master to Jesus, follow the new Prophet. One is named by the author—it was Andrew, the brother of Simon Peter (Jn 1^{40}). The other is not named, but it has seemed obvious to infer that it was St. John. His call to be an apostle is told in the Synoptic tradition, by St. Luke, with the greatest fulness of detail (Lk 5^{8-11}, Mt $4^{21.\ 22}$, Mk $1^{19.\ 20}$). It is from this source we learn that he was son of Zebedee (for John's possible relationship to Jesus see art. SALOME), and that he and his father were fishermen and Galilæans. It has often been pointed out that the presence of hired servants in the ship (Mk 1^{20}) with Zebedee implies a position of some degree of wealth. During the course of our Lord's ministry St. John appears only rarely in a position distinct from that of the other apostles. He is clearly one of the most prominent of the group of our Lord's followers. He, with Peter and James, is admitted to witness the raising of Jairus' daughter (Mk 5^{37}, Lk 8^{51}); the same three are chosen to be present at the Transfiguration (Mt 17^{1}, Mk 9^{2}, Lk 9^{28}), and are nearest to the Lord at the agony in Gethsemane (Mk 14^{33} and parallels). Once these three, with Andrew, are described as inquiring when our Lord's last prophecies would receive fulfilment (Mk 13^{3}). Besides these instances, the two brothers, James and John, appear (Lk 9^{51}) independently, as wishing to call down fire on the Samaritan village that refused them shelter; and are brought to the Lord by their mother with a request for a special place of dignity in the kingdom (Mk 10^{35}). John is once connected with St. Peter alone; according to St. Luke, these two apostles were sent to prepare the passover (Lk 22^{8}). Once John is described as acting alone; it is he who asks our Lord what is to be done with the man whom they had found casting out devils in Jesus' name (Mk 9^{38}, Lk 9^{49}). These notices, though scattered and fragmentary, definitely suggest a particular character — the character indicated by the name given to John and his brother by our Lord: Boanerges (wh. see), 'sons of thunder' (Mk 3^{17}). They were fiery in their zeal and severe in temperament; yet, for all this, they were among the closest of our Lord's chosen band. Though He rebukes their vehemence, He sees in them a character such as an apostle needs.

When we turn to the Fourth Gospel, we find that the name of John, son of Zebedee, is never once named. But there are in the account of the Passion and Resurrection certain references to an unnamed apostle whom universal tradition has identified with St. John. At the Last Supper we read of a disciple whom Jesus loved, who was reclining at the table in a place of special nearness to our Lord. It seems from the language used (ch. 13) that the three, our Lord, St. Peter, and this unnamed apostle, occupied one triclinium. They reclined, according to custom, on the left side, obliquely across the couch. Our Lord was in the centre, St. Peter in the place second in dignity to this, parallel to the position occupied by the Lord and behind Him; St. John in the third place, parallel also but before Him. When the prophecy of the betrayal is made, St. Peter from behind beckons to St. John in front to ask who it is. St. John, leaning back upon the breast of Jesus as he lay (13^{25} ἀναπεσὼν ἐκεῖνος οὕτως ἐπὶ τὸ στῆθος τοῦ Ἰησοῦ), asks the question and receives the (probably whispered) communication. This same apostle is apparently he who was known to the high priest (18^{16}), and used his acquaintance to admit St. Peter to the court of the high priest. The disciple whom Jesus loved is at the foot of the cross, and there receives the commission to take care of the Virgin-mother after the Lord's death (19^{26}). He is again in close connexion with St. Peter on the day of the resurrection. The news is brought to Simon Peter and the disciple whom Jesus loved (20^{2}), and the two together make a visit to the tomb. In the last chapter of all, for the only time in this Gospel 'the sons of Zebedee' are mentioned (21^{2}), and in the scene which follows, St. Peter and the disciple whom Jesus loved are the prominent agents. It is the latter who is first to recognize the Lord. The chapter is indeed inserted in order to correct an impression that this disciple is to await the coming of the Lord without dying. And then, in words which are closely parallel to the claim (19^{35}) to have been eye-witness of the scene upon the cross, it is distinctly asserted that the disciple whom Jesus loved is he that testifieth these things and that wrote these things (21^{24}).

(b) In the Acts, St. John appears in two important scenes in company with St. Peter; the connexion of these two apostles (noted in Lk 22^{8} and closely in agreement with the Fourth Gospel, if the beloved disciple is indeed St. John) is carried out in these chapters of the Acts. These are the two who heal the lame man at the Beautiful Gate of the temple, and are brought before the Sanhedrin (Ac 3.4). These, again, are the two who go down to Samaria to bestow the gift of the Holy Ghost on those whom Philip had converted and baptized (8^{15}). Once more the name of John is mentioned, again in connexion with St Peter, as having been seen at Jerusalem by St. Paul when he went up by revelation (Gal 2^{1}) and saw those who seemed to be pillars (Gal 2^{9}). After this, except in the Revelation, the name of John disappears from the New Testament.

(c) When we pass beyond the New Testament, we find ourselves in the region of somewhat fragmentary tradition. We learn that at some period undefined St. John left Jerusalem and took up his residence at Ephesus. Of the intervening period between the departure from Jerusalem and the residence at Ephesus we know nothing, except that Tertullian (de Præsc. Hær. 36) affirms that St. John came to Rome, and was there by way of suffering martyrdom. He was placed in a cauldron of boiling oil, but was miraculously preserved from death. No date is fixed for this by Tertullian, but St. John is said to have been banished after his escape to an island ('relegatur ad insulam'). Eusebius, however, definitely connects this banishment with the persecution of Domitian (HE III. xviii.), and quotes in support of his view the statement of Irenæus that St. John saw the Revelation πρὸς τῷ τέλει τῆς Δομετιανοῦ ἀρχῆς (Iren. adv. Hær. V. xxx. 3). Eusebius then affirms (on the basis of ὁ τῶν παρ' ἡμῖν ἀρχαίων λόγος, HE III. xx.) that, on the accession of Nerva, St. John removed from Patmos to Ephesus. Here he organized the Churches in Asia, and survived till the time of Trajan (Eus. HE III. xxiii., quoting Iren. adv. Hær. II. xxii. 5, III. iii. 4).

It is to this period that most of the remaining anecdotes of St. John are assigned. Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus, in a letter to Victor of Rome, says that John was priest here, and wore the πέταλον or high-priestly headdress; that he died, and was buried there (Eus. V. xxiv.). On the authority of Apollonius, St. John is said to have raised a man from the dead at Ephesus (Eus. V. xviii.). It was in illustration of his exercise of the episcopal office with characteristic love that Clement of Alexandria tells the story of his journey into the forest to reclaim a convert who had fallen into bad ways and joined a band of robbers (Clem. Alex. Quis Div. Salv. ch. 42). While at Ephesus he combats fiercely the heresy of Cerinthus, refusing even to be under the same roof with the heretic (Iren. adv. Hær. III. iii. 4), and being persuaded to write his Gospel, specially to confute such heretics as this (ib. III. xi.). The Muratorian Fragment contains a story of the origin of the Gospel somewhat akin to this. It describes a discussion in which Andrew took part, in which St. John was pressed to write down his teaching about our Lord. After deliberation, and a special intimation from the Holy Spirit, he acts upon the advice. There are two stories of his extreme old age preserved, the one by Cassian, the other by Jerome. Cassian tells how he used to play with a tame partridge, and when censured for such frivolity used the phrase, 'the bow cannot be always bent' (Coll. xxiv. 21). And Jerome describes him at a time when he had to be carried into church, and was too old to speak for any length of time; he used then, in addressing the Church, to use simply the old commandment, 'Little children, love one another.' His disciples, weary of the continual repetition, asked why he always said this: his answer was, 'Quia præceptum Domini est, et, si solum fiat, sufficit' (Jer. Comm. in Gal. vi. 10). The last chapter of the Gospel did not prevent the growth of a legend that the apostle was not really dead, but only asleep. And it was confidently affirmed that the ground where he lay rose and fell with his breathing, and that the dust was moved by his breath. St. Augustine mentions this (Tract. in Joh. cxxiv. 2), but does not altogether accept it ('Viderint . . . qui locum sciunt, utrum hoc ibi faciat vel patiatur terra, quod dicitur:

quia et revera non a levibus hominibus id audivimus' *).

These are the fragmentary materials out of which is built the idea of the beloved apostle prevalent throughout the Church. They form a consistent picture, of a character that is vehement and tenacious, but has been moulded in its later days by the spirit of love. The story of the journey after the robber is quite consistent with that of the refusal to be under the same roof with Cerinthus the heretic. And both are parallel to scenes in the Gospels and Acts ascribed to St. John.

(d) The difficulties that have been raised about the whole question of St. John's sojourn at Ephesus do not arise from any inconsistency in the story itself, but from considerations of a different order altogether. They are part of the whole question of the authorship of the writings ascribed to St. John. If the authorities upon which the Ephesian tradition depends are accepted as trustworthy, it will be difficult to explain why and how the account of the origin of the Gospel which seems to have been part of the Ephesian tradition can be set aside. It is not part of our subject to consider the question of the authorship of the Gospel, further than is necessary in order to estimate the evidence for the tradition, but the points now to be raised would be scarcely intelligible apart from this explanation. See, further, next article.

The real point at issue is comparatively small. Irenæus, who became bishop of Lyons in South Gaul after the persecution of A.D. 177, writes a letter to Florinus, a presbyter of the church of Rome who has fallen into heresy. A fragment of this letter is preserved by Eusebius (HE v. xx.). In it Irenæus appeals to Florinus to contrast the doctrines he has accepted with those which he once learnt at the feet of Polycarp, who himself claimed to be the pupil of the Apostle John. Irenæus refers to a former time when he, as a boy (παῖς ἔτι ὤν), saw Florinus, then in distinguished position at court (λαμπρῶς πράττοντα ἐν τῇ βασιλικῇ αὐλῇ), with Polycarp. Now Polycarp was martyred, at the age of eighty-six (Mart. Polyc. § 8), on Feb. 23, 155.† Thus he must have been born (unless the phrase in Mart. Polyc. refers to his conversion and not his birth) in A.D. 69. If St. John really lived till the time of Trajan, i.e. till about A.D. 100, there is no reason why Polycarp should not have known him.

This tradition has been assailed on various grounds. It has been asserted that there is no real indication of Johannine influence in the writers who date from Ephesus and its neighbourhood; more especially that Ignatius when writing to the Ephesians in the year 115 makes no allusion to St. John's presence there, though he does mention St. Paul (Ign. Eph. ch. xii.), and shows signs of the influence of the letter 'to the Ephesians.' This argument is used by Keim (Jesus of Nazara, Eng. tr. vol. i. p. 211 ff.), but its value is greatly impaired by the authority of subsequent critics. The researches of Paul Ewald (Das Hauptproblem der Evangelienfrage), of H. Wendt (Lehre Jesu), and especially of von der Goltz ('Ignatius von Antiochien,' in Texte und Untersuchungen, xii. 3), tend to show the presence in the region required, and in the Ignatian Epistles in particular, of that type of teaching which is associated with St. John's name. This line of argument may therefore be left out of account.

Another and much more impressive method of criticism is that pursued by Harnack in his Chronologie der Altchristlichen Literatur bis Eusebius, Bd. i. pp. 320–340, 656–680. It will have been noticed already that the hinge of the whole case is the relation of Irenæus and Polycarp. If it seemed likely that this relation was less close than is generally supposed, no doubt the evidence of Polycarp to the presence of St. John in Ephesus might be seriously weakened. This is the central point of Harnack's argument. He lays emphasis on the youth of Irenæus (παῖς ἔτι ὤν), and the casual character of his relation with Polycarp. There is no evidence, he maintains, that Irenæus was in any strict sense a pupil of Polycarp; he merely heard him preach, like any other member of his congregation. It is, therefore, not improbable that he confused the Apostle John with the John quoted by Polycarp, this other John being really the Presbyter John—a person whose existence is affirmed by Papias. To this Presbyter John, Harnack assigns the Fourth Gospel. It is difficult to avoid the conviction that Harnack is greatly minimizing the significance of the passage from the letter of Irenæus to Florinus. It is true that we do not know exactly the age of Irenæus at the beginning of his episcopate, and that the year of his birth cannot be fixed within very narrow limits. It is true that we cannot be certain of the date of the scene ἐν τῇ κάτω Ἀσίᾳ to which Irenæus refers. It is true that παῖς ἔτι ὤν suggests that Irenæus refers to a time when he was from 12–17 or 18 years old.* But (1) the tone of the letter, especially the reference to the psychology of memory, seems to imply an advanced age; it is usually between 60 and 70 or later that the memory begins to fail for more recent events; and (2) Harnack greatly underrates the fulness of the knowledge which Irenæus claims. If it be true that the words do not imply any direct and personal relation with Polycarp, they do seem to imply a careful and continuous observation of Polycarp's habits both in act and word.† Indeed it is difficult to know what words would convey an account of a continued and carefully treasured experience, if these do not. And it is hardly conceivable that an experience such as is described should have passed, and yet that Irenæus, with all his keenness of observation, should have failed to discover whether Polycarp was talking of John the Apostle or not. Again, the Twelve were a perfectly recognizable and distinct body from a very early time in the Church, and Polycarp's discourses must have been more than usually confused if they left his intelligent hearers uncertain on a fundamental point such as this. It is an even more extravagant hypothesis that Polycarp himself was confused. People will always estimate such a question as this somewhat differently, so that it will be impossible to claim that the significance of Irenæus' words is certain beyond all possibility of discussion. At the same time, the interpretation here given seems the most

* The tradition which has so profoundly influenced art, that St. John drank poison without being affected by it, occurs in Isidore of Seville, De ortu et obitu Sanctorum, ch. lxxii.; and in Acta Johannis, c. 9, ed. Bousset, 1898. It is also alluded to in the Soliloquies, falsely ascribed to Augustine, ch. xxii. The present writer has failed to trace the origin of the tradition, if it be a tradition, which Browning has followed in A Death in the Desert.

† This seems to be the most likely date: an alternative is Feb. 22, 156. See Lightfoot, Ignatius and Polycarp, i. pp. 626–722; C. H. Turner, 'On the day and year of St. Polycarp's Martyrdom,' in Studia Biblica, Oxford, vol. ii. pp. 105–155; and Harnack, Chronologie, Bd. i. pp. 334–350, and reff.

* Though Lightfoot, Ign. and Polyc.[1] vol. i. p. 432, quotes passages showing the extreme looseness with which such words as παῖς were used.

† Μᾶλλον γὰρ τὰ τότε διαμνημονεύω τῶν ἐναγχος γινομένων· αἱ γὰρ ἐκ παίδων μαθήσεις συναύξουσαι τῇ ψυχῇ ἑνοῦνταί αὐτῇ ὥστε με δύνασθαι εἰπεῖν καὶ τὸν τόπον ἐν ᾧ καθεζόμενος διελέγετο ὁ μακάριος Πολύκαρπος, καὶ τὰς προόδους αὐτοῦ καὶ τὰς εἰσόδους καὶ τὸν χαρακτῆρα τοῦ βίου καὶ τὴν τοῦ σώματος ἰδέαν καὶ τὰς διαλέξεις ἃς ἐποιεῖτο πρὸς τὸ πλῆθος καὶ τὴν μετὰ Ἰωάννου συναναστροφήν ὡς ἀπήγγελλε καὶ τὴν μετὰ τῶν λοιπῶν τῶν ἑωρακότων τὸν Κύριον καὶ ὡς ἀπεμνημόνευε τοὺς λόγους αὐτῶν καὶ περὶ τοῦ κυρίου τίνα ἦν ἃ παρ' ἐκείνων ἀκηκόει, καὶ περὶ τῶν δυνάμεων αὐτοῦ καὶ περὶ τῆς διδασκαλίας ὡς παρὰ τῶν αὐτοπτῶν τῆς ζωῆς τοῦ λόγου παρειληφὼς ὁ Πολύκαρπος ἀπήγγελλε πάντα σύμφωνα ταῖς γραφαῖς.

natural, and it would require very considerable positive evidence to overthrow it.

Such evidence is not forthcoming. The two fragments which bear on the question are less convincing than the passage from Irenæus, but their natural meaning is consistent with the above interpretation of Irenæus. Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus, writing to Victor of Rome about A.D. 180, mentions various distinguished persons in the early history of the Church who are buried in Asia Minor. Amongst these he names the Apostle Philip, John the Apostle, and Polycarp. He is a person of importance, a bishop himself, belonging to a family which has given 7 bishops to the church, and he describes himself (probably) as 65 years old (ἑξήκοντα πέντε ἔτη γεγονὼς ἐν κυρίῳ). This would bring his birth to the year A.D. 115. He describes the work of the apostle at Ephesus in the words ἐγενήθη ἱερεὺς τὸ πέταλον πεφορηκώς. If the evidence of Irenæus is invalid, doubtless the probability is increased that Polycrates has made a similar confusion, and has mistaken John the Presbyter for John the Apostle. If, however, Irenæus may be trusted in his account of Polycarp's teaching, then Polycrates becomes an independent witness to the state of things described by Polycarp, and a witness of some importance. He bears testimony to the existence of this tradition in the ecclesiastical circles at Ephesus, and he had probably extremely good opportunities of knowing what these were.*

Lastly, we come to Papias. It is to a fragment of this author that we owe our knowledge of the existence of the Presbyter John. In a passage from the Prologue to his lost work, Expositions of the Oracles of the Lord, which Eusebius quotes (HE III. xxxix.), Papias explains his method. He has not paid attention to those who have much to say (τοῖς τὰ πολλὰ λέγουσιν), but to those who teach the truth. He has collected and examined the sayings of those who followed the elders (εἴ που καὶ παρακολουθηκώς τις τοῖς πρεσβυτέροις): endeavouring to ascertain 'what Andrew, or Peter said, or what Philip, or Thomas or James; or what John or Matthew or any of the disciples of the Lord: and what Aristion and the Presbyter John the disciples of the Lord say.' Papias is not so good a witness as the others. Eusebius describes him as σμικρὸς τὸν νοῦν, and he certainly seems to have made statements on the authority of John and the elders which are in themselves ridiculous, and can never have come from any one who knew the Lord. The passage mentioned above does not prove that Papias was a disciple of the Apostle John; and Papias shows himself capable of serious confusion in regard to St. John's doctrine. But, in the light of the passage in the letter to Florinus, Papias' statement that he endeavoured to ascertain in Asia Minor what John and other apostles had taught, may at least stand as an additional ground for believing that St. John had dwelt at Ephesus.

We are, fortunately, not concerned with the further and more complicated question of the authorship of the Fourth Gospel, but only with the residence of St. John at Ephesus. The evidence alleged is fragmentary. Even with the addition of the Muratorian Fragment, which confirms what has been already produced, it is less than we could wish. But in a case like this the important point is not so much the extent as the character of the evidence that is to hand. And it is to be noticed that all the three authors we have named are men who would have had the best opportunities of knowing about this matter. We have only fragments of their works, but they were not fragmentary. They cover a century between them—a century of vigorous and active Christian life; and they all of them held office in their several churches. We have not pressed the evidence of the Muratorian Fragment, because of the uncertainty of its origin, and the comparative lack of a true context in which to place it. But these difficulties do not attach to the evidence of Irenæus, Polycrates, and Papias. Their relation to the age in which they lived can be denied only at the expense of the surrender of the largest portion of 2nd cent. history.*

II. The Theology of St. John.

A. The Gospel and Epistles.—In the writings ascribed to St. John there is more of a complete and reasoned theology than is to be found in any of the other NT writers. It is therefore a comparatively simple task to indicate the lines of the author's theological thought. It must, however, always be remembered that in the Gospel the theological positions are placed in close relation with the history. So that, in some sense, a historical evolution is traceable in the doctrine described. The prologue to the Gospel ($1^{1\text{-}18}$) may be regarded as summing up the doctrine of the book; and, in like manner, many of the statements in the Epistles are of the nature of inferential doctrinal affirmations. It seems best, therefore, to describe as shortly as possible the progress in doctrine in relation to the history, and then to discuss the conclusions which result.

(1) The Gospel professes to be a selection of anecdotes, out of a large number not recorded, describing the signs which Jesus did before His disciples. By signs are meant acts which convey a certain teaching, indicate a particular truth or reality. These particular signs are recorded in order to produce a particular belief—'that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ the Son of God' ($20^{30.\ 31}$). The main part of the Gospel describes the growth of this idea in the minds of the apostles, and, at the same time, the growth of hostility on the part of the Jews. The mode in which the conviction is brought home to the minds of Christ's followers is called witness (μαρτυρία), and is characterized in various ways. The first stage in the process is the witness of John the

* The authority of Polycrates has been assailed on another ground. It is said that, when he speaks of Philip the Apostle as being at Hierapolis, he has confused him with Philip the Evangelist; hence that he might easily have confused John the Apostle with John the Presbyter. The question turns on the allusion to Philip's daughters. Luke (Ac $21^{8.\ 9}$) says definitely that Philip the Evangelist, 'one of the seven,' had four daughters παρθένοι προφητεύουσαι. Polycrates affirms that Philip the Apostle had three daughters, two of whom grew old as virgins, and the other ἐν ἁγίῳ πνεύματι πολιτευσαμένη died and was buried at Ephesus. Clem. Alex. (Eus. HE iii. 30) quotes Philip as one of the apostles who did not forbid marriage, as he τὰς θυγατέρας ἀνδράσιν ἐξέδωκεν. Papias (Eus. HE III. xxxix.) speaks of Philip the Apostle among his authorities. The Dialogue between Cairus and Proclus (Eus. HE iii. 31) represents Philip Evang. with four daughters—as having lived at Hierapolis. The authority of the Dialogue is by some adduced to prove the confusion in Polycrates' letter. This seems unnecessary. The Dialogue is later in time, and remote in its origin (Italy as against Ephesus), and is manifestly under the influence of the Acts. The statement of Polycrates is precise, and not identical with that in the Acts. We know there were two Philips, and it is not impossible that one had three daughters, and the other four. Cf. Lightfoot, Colossians, pp. 45, 46.

* It is not quite clear what is meant by Polycrates' phrase ἐγενήθη ἱερεὺς τὸ πέταλον πεφορηκώς. Πέταλον is the word used for the high-priestly mitre; and therefore the adoption of it by St. John must have meant either that he claimed that the old exclusive high priesthood was at an end, or, more probably, that he asserted its fulfilment in the Christian priesthood. Delff (Gesch. der Rabbi Jesus v. Nazareth, p. 71) asserts that the phrase means that St. John was of the family of the high priest, and had actually performed high-priestly functions in Jerusalem, wearing the mitre for the purpose. This interpretation of the words of Polycrates is only part of a complicated theory as to the authorship of the Fourth Gospel with which we have nothing to do. But it should be observed (1) that this is not the natural interpretation of the passage; (2) that it assumes a degree of ignorance and confusion on the part of Polycrates which is unjustifiable. St. James is also said to have worn the πέταλον (Epiph. Hær. lxxiii. c. 14, where he follows the language of Hegesippus closely; but this particular statement is absent from the passage of Hegesippus quoted in Eus. HE II. xxiii.).

Baptist. He first denies to the deputation of priests and Levites that he is the Christ, and then points definitely to Jesus as the Lamb of God, the person on whom the Spirit descended and abode. In consequence of the repetition of this witness on the following day, two of the disciples of John—Andrew and, probably, John himself—are detached from the Baptist and follow Jesus. The result of a day's colloquy is that Andrew announces to his brother Simon, We have found the Messiah. In like manner Nathanael is attracted by the same promise, though he seems to have had a stronger and loftier view of the personality of the Messiah than we usually find (1^{49}). The newly-won disciples begin, therefore, with a conviction that Jesus is Messiah. The 'sign' at Cana of Galilee gives them new thoughts. John had done no sign (10^{41}), but in this scene at Cana the disciples perceived what St. John, in the reflective language of his later life, calls the manifestation of the glory of Christ (2^{11}). This phrase seems to mean the specially Divine powers and characteristics which the Lord displayed upon earth; and therefore the importance of the passage consists in this, that St. John marks the occasion when the previous belief in the Messiahship of Jesus began to be affected by a deeper notion of His Divine nature. Looking back upon it in later life, he sees that at that moment the thought that He was Divine was dawning in them.

This event at Cana is also described (2^{11}) as the 'beginning of signs.' It is the opening incident of a particular line of witness—the witness of the works (cf. 5^{36} 10^{38} 15^{24}). This is continued at Jerusalem at the Passover, and produces a number of adherents (2^{23}). And here, again, St. John notices an impression created by Jesus upon His apostles: they found that He exercised considerable reserve in His treatment of those who professed belief, in virtue of an insight into them which He possessed.* After this we come to the account of the Ministry and Preaching of our Lord. As in the Synoptic Gospels, He begins by preaching (to Nicodemus) the Kingdom of God, with this difference, that He declares the necessity of new birth as the condition of entry. It is after the record of this preaching that the witness of John is finally completed and closed, in words which imply that his preparatory mission is over (3^{30}). It is noticeable that in this passage Nicodemus is attracted to the new prophet by signs (3^{2}), and that the Lord, when He is challenged to explain the new birth, refers to the witness of an experience already growing up around Him (ὃ οἴδαμεν λαλοῦμεν, καὶ ὃ ἑωράκαμεν μαρτυροῦμεν, 3^{11}). In like manner the conversation with the woman at Sychar leads to the unequivocal declaration of Messiahship on the part of the Lord (4^{26}), and an affirmation of the greatest importance as to the nature of God (4^{24}, see below, p. 689). The impression created by these two scenes on the minds of the apostles is not marked in the same way as before (2^{11} and ^{23}). But it is obvious that their view of His character is changing and developing rapidly. They have as yet no precise and clear view as to His nature, but they are careful as to commenting on, or asking questions about, what He does. This is expressed in a marked way when the apostles return and find Him talking with a woman. They are surprised, but no one said, 'What seekest thou, or Why talkest thou with her?' (4^{27}). So again, when He says, 'I have meat to eat which ye know not,' they do not ask Him what He means, but talk among themselves (4^{33}). A feeling of reserve and reverence is growing up, which completely prevents all curious questions. Their conception is developing as their experience widens.

We now come to the period at which hostility, continually increasing in fierceness, is caused by the acts and words of the Lord. The first scene is at an unnamed feast at Jerusalem, probably occurring some time before the second Passover of our Lord's ministry. The controversy arises over the law of the Sabbath. A man who had been crippled with a disease for 38 years is cured, and told by our Lord to take up the bed on which he is lying, and carry it away. This was, of course, a breach of the Sabbath law, and it seems, from the expression used (5^{16} ταῦτα ἐποίει ἐν σαββάτῳ), to have been somewhat typical of our Lord's action. In answer to the Jews, the Lord develops at length the relation between Himself and the Father; His answer, in fact, amounts to a claim to stand in the same supreme position as the Father in regard to the law in question. 'My Father worketh up till now, and I work' (5^{17}).

The discourse which follows is of great importance for our present purpose. In it the Lord, speaking first of Himself under the title of 'the Son,' affirms the absolute and indissoluble unity of the will of the Father and the Son. The Son certainly has derived Being; but the Father has given Him to have life in Himself (5^{26}); in what He does He fulfils the Father's commission, which includes the power of giving life even to the dead, and the prerogative of judgment ($5^{21.\ 22.\ 26.\ 27}$). This unity of action is based on love (5^{20}), and carries with it the right on the part of the Son to honour co-ordinate with that of the Father (5^{23}). It is obvious that this claim, if substantiated, completely meets the charge of independent and self-willed defiance of a law imposed by the Father. In 5^{30} the Lord identifies Himself with the Son, and proceeds to deal with the question of evidence. Here He uses the idea characteristic of this Gospel—witness. This teaching, He says, is not a bare assertion of His own; He has evidence, consentient witness to establish it (5^{32}), besides the inner certainty of His own knowledge. There is first the witness of John (5^{33-35}) temporary and limited, but bearing on the truth. Secondly, there is the witness of the works, done in pursuance of the Father's commission (5^{36}). Thirdly, there is the witness of the Father (5^{37}, see below, p. 686), and, lastly, the witness of the Scriptures. From them will come the really damning charges against the Jews; they have disbelieved the writings of Moses, how can they believe Christ's words? ($5^{39.\ 46.\ 47}$).

St. John does not chronicle the effect of this discourse, either upon the Jews or upon the apostles, important as it obviously is. The next scene does lead to a decisive and significant result. Here, again, it is important to recall the circumstances under which the scene took place. It occurred immediately after the miracle of the Feeding of the Five Thousand. The persons thus fed seem to have been a body of Galilæan pilgrims going up to, or returning from, the Passover (cf. 6^{4}). The result of the miracle is that the pilgrims conceive the plan of seizing Jesus and making Him a king; that is, they see in Him the fulfilment of their very uninstructed Messianic hopes. The following day the fact emerges in a dialogue with the Lord that they have compared His act with that of Moses, who fed the people in the wilderness, and that their allegiance will depend on Christ's rivalling this (6^{31}). From this point the discourse takes its start. With increasing clearness our Lord points to Himself as the fulfilment of the acted prophecy of Moses. The Jews (who appear at v.[40]) protest against the claim implied in this; but this protest only leads the Lord to the still more startling assertions, that life in any true sense depends upon connexion with Himself, and that this connexion is established by eating His Flesh and drinking His Blood. And He ends by definitely connecting this with the type of the manna in the wilderness (6^{58}, cf. 6^{49}). The result of this discourse was to separate the Twelve sharply from other followers: these are puzzled, and walk no more with Him; the apostles, by the mouth of St. Peter, confess Him as the Holy One of God (6^{69}).

After this scene, the development of the hostility is comparatively rapid; there are practically only three more occasions described. The first occurs at the Feast of Tabernacles. In his account of this feast St. John has shown us a perfect turmoil of conflicting ideas and surmises as to the new prophet, with a background of firm hostility on the part of the ruling class among the Jews. With the various problems and difficulties which were raised by the various parties, we have nothing to do; the decisive utterance from which the discourse or dialogue follows is the phrase, 'I am the Light of the world' (8^{12}). The subsequent passage is of great difficulty. Emphasis is laid again upon the witness of the Father ($8^{15.\ 16}$) and the coincidence of the works with the will and commission of the Father ($8^{28.\ 29}$); and the result was that many believed on Him (8^{30}). But an attempt made by the Lord to offer true freedom to those who had believed Him, rouses their national feelings, so that when Christ, after an agitated argument, makes a claim which they understand as coequality with God, they take up stones to cast at Him as a blasphemer.* In the second of the scenes in question, at the feast of Dedication (reading ἐγένετο τότε in 10^{22}), a similar discussion is presented to us arising out of a miracle performed upon a Sabbath-day, and involving by its method a breach of the law. The Jews definitely challenge Jesus with the question of His nature (10^{24}). He refuses to answer directly, but refers again to the works (10^{25}) and to the Father's will, ending with the strongest assertion yet made of His union with the Father, ἐγὼ καὶ ὁ πατὴρ ἕν ἐσμεν (10^{30}). In consequence of this He has to withdraw from Jerusalem; but St. John notes that many believed, seeing how He fulfilled the prophecy of the Baptist ($10^{40\text{-}42}$). The last scene is that of the raising of Lazarus and its immediate consequences. A miracle such as this could not have failed to produce an effect; and St. John notes that it is the decisive event which leads the authorities to determine on the death of Jesus, and produces the enthusiasm among the crowds which is expressed in the Triumphal Entry (cf. $11^{47.\ 48}$ $12^{17\text{-}19}$). At the end of ch. 12 St. John solemnly sums up the result of the mission of Christ; the evidence of signs had largely failed (12^{37}); there were many even of the rulers who really believed, but did not dare to express it (12^{42}), and in all this St. John sees the fulfilment of the prophecy of Isaiah, when 'he saw his glory (i.e. of Jesus), and spake concerning him.'

In the part of the Gospel which we have now briefly considered, the author explains the series of events through which his convictions developed. We have therefore before us the idea of one who fulfilled the national expectation of a Messiah, but who, at the same time, identified Himself with the typology of the OT, spoke mysteriously of a deeper union with the Father, and who represented union with Himself as the one necessary means of satisfying human needs. These two latter points are developed at great length in the Last Discourses (cf. $14^{10.\ 31}$ 17^{4} $14^{1\text{-}12}$ $15^{1\text{-}11}$ etc.). But the Discourses are delivered under a sense of immediate departure, and therefore they develop, in language mysterious at the time but explained later by events, the close union of the Father and the Son, the future work of the Paraclete, and the new commandment to the followers of Jesus. The questions of the apostles recorded from time to time in the course of these chapters show that they only partially understood then what was said to them. But the teaching is continuous with what had gone before, and could only have confirmed the opinions already held by the apostles. We shall consider it more in detail further on.

One last sign is noted by St. John in the account of the Crucifixion — the effusion of blood and water, and the bearing of prophecy on the scene. This is mentioned with great emphasis, and the presence of the author as eye-witness is deliberately asserted (19^{35}). There then follows an account of the intercourse of the Risen Lord with various of His followers, and we then return to the passage mentioned before, in which St. John declares the purpose of his Gospel ($20^{30.\ 31}$).

It will be seen that the result attained by St. John is an evolution that starts from the idea of the Messiah, and rises through the witness of signs and the teaching of Discourses to a lofty and profound notion of Jesus as the Christ, the Son of God. It is this which is the fundamental idea of all St. John's theology, and it has been necessary, therefore, to put it first.

(2) It is obvious, however, that such a view could not be maintained without involving serious consequences upon the idea of God: or, to put the same thing in somewhat different language, the development in the notion of Jesus, from that of Messiah to that of the Son of God, will be found to rest upon theological presuppositions. These are revealed in the Discourses of the Lord, and in part drawn out by the author in the Gospel and Epistles. We have passed them by so far in order to display the historic movement of St. John's thought; but we must now turn to them.

The first passage which calls for consideration is, of course, the Prologue. This contains, in summary, St. John's theology of the Incarnation. It begins by describing the Person involved—the Word; and of Him it asserts eternal pre-existence, eternal communion with God, and finally Divinity itself. The author then proceeds to give an account of the various functions of the Word of God.* The Word of God is the instrument of

* It is assumed that the Pericopæ Adulteræ is out of place in this chapter.

* It is impossible to discuss at length the origin and associations of this much disputed expression—the Word of God (see art. Logos). It must suffice here to say that there seems to be a great difficulty in connecting it, as would at first sight appear natural, with Greek philosophic thought. It is true that the word λόγος in its earlier usage contained ideas which might have developed into such a conception as this of St. John. But in the history of Greek thought the development of the meaning of the word was governed by the particular interest of Greek philosophy. The idea of language or speech is complex. Speech conveys information (1) as to the mind of the speaker, (2) as to the subject spoken about. In the former case the uttered word appears as the representative of the person or character or act of the speaker; its reference to fact may be of merely secondary importance. In the other case the word has a sort of substantive existence. It does not matter who uses it; the important thing is what it means. The more this aspect of the relation is emphasized the more the idea of a word tends towards that of abstract scientific definition—it is a form conveying truth. Its ideal is to correspond as nearly as may be with the reality it describes. The Greeks found the ideal correspondence between thought and thing in universality; and therefore, concurrently with the development in philosophic thought, the word λόγος took on more and more the associations of universality, and lost more and more those of the individual thing or person. With the Hebrews, on the other hand, the Word of God meant always God speaking or doing certain things; the Word was the emissary and representative of God. A doctrine of Incarnation in the Johannine sense is possible on the one line of thought, and impossible on the other.

Creation (πάντα δι' αὐτοῦ ἐγένετο, not ὑπ' αὐτοῦ). The gift of life, expressed in a living world, was the object, or, if we may so say, the ruling principle of the action of God through the Word, and life was to have been a sign or suggestion to man of the presence of the Word—to have been the light of men. But, owing to the intrusion of the darkness, the light now shines in a hostile atmosphere, without, however, being overcome by it. This doctrine lies closely in connexion with that of the Old Testament. The Pentateuch (Gn 1) and the Psalter (Ps 33[6]) both ascribe creation to the word of God; they use the metaphor of speech to describe the act of God in it. And throughout the OT the presence and effect of evil is continually asserted. But St. John makes a considerable and important addition to the doctrine of the OT when he unequivocally asserts the Divinity of the Word. In the OT the idea of language was a metaphor used to describe an act; it is said that in Rabbinical thought the Word of God was beginning to take on a quasi-personal character; with St. John the Word by which the world was brought into being was a person, separate enough from God (ὁ θεός, i.e.), to be in communion with God, but yet essentially Divine in nature.

We next learn St. John's conception of that Revelation of the Word which he himself had experienced. It was heralded by John the Baptist, who was sent from God to witness concerning it. The light was already in the world, and had already a place of its own in the world, but the world rejected its appeal. New birth—birth of God—was given to those who received the light when it came—a birth that broke through and destroyed the old physical succession (1[6-13]). Having thus described the Person of the Word, and the effect of His mission, St. John proceeds to describe the mode of His manifestation. 'The Word,' he says, 'became flesh, and dwelt as in a tent among us, full of grace and truth.' As thus Incarnate, the Word manifested His Divine glory. In regard to this, St John uses a remarkable phrase. He says it was 'glory as of an only-begotten from a Father,' i.e. it was identical in nature, but different, if the phrase may be allowed, in individuality from that of the Father. It was representative in the fullest sense, not merely an irradiation from without; it was Divine glory, but the glory of an only-begotten son. For the evidence of this, St. John refers to the witness of John the Baptist (1[15]), and more particularly to the experience of himself and of the Church. 'We beheld his glory,' he says (1[14]); and again 'of his fulness,' the grace and truth which came with Him, 'have all we received' in continually increasing proportions, grace in place of grace (1[16]). Then St. John explains summarily the full height of this Revelation. It superseded the Mosaic law, which was partial and external, by means of this gift of grace and complete truth (1[17]). It did not give us the vision of God: it meant that one who was God and only-begotten, who is in the bosom of the Father, had come among men and declared the truth.*

We have already seen in brief outline the process of historical observation through which St. John obtained his view of our Lord's nature. The Prologue shows us the same ideas formulated and in some degree systematized. The central point is still the Sonship,—Christ is Son of God in a unique sense,—but the mission of the Son is clearly defined in relation to other things. He is the Word of God: Eternal and Divine: He is the Instrument of Creation: the source of the knowledge of God which men should acquire by life and nature. His coming has superseded all previous revelation. In its earlier stages, as in the case of John, revelation was for witness of a light yet to come. The revelation of the Word was the manifestation of that Light. It was complete where the law, the highest expression of the old order, was partial: it gave final certainty about God on the authority of God only-begotten.

(3) The Epistles show how fundamental a doctrine this was in St. John's theology. He asserts in the most emphatic way (1 Jn 1[1-4]) his own experience in the matter; how the life—the eternal life—which was continually (ἦν) with the Father, was manifested in time (ἐφανερώθη) to us; we saw and heard and touched beyond possibility of error. To deny the Father and the Son is the sign of antichrist (1 Jn 2[22. 23]); it is a departure from the original message (1 Jn 2[24]). It is the test of spirits: 'Every spirit which confesses Jesus Christ come in the flesh is of God, and every spirit which confesses not Jesus, is not of God, and this is that spirit of antichrist, of which ye have heard that it cometh, and now it is already in the world' (4[2. 3]; cf. 5[1. 6-8. 12]). In the Second Epistle St. John forbids his readers even to receive into their house and salute one who makes denial of this final truth (2 Jn [7-12]). There is therefore no hesitation in his mind as to the truth or the necessity of this doctrine: it is the fundamental doctrine of Christianity and the test of true membership of the Church.

(4) It is in regard to this subject that the theology of St. John is most systematic. We must now pass on to the consideration of some other points less fully systematized, but no less decisive in their character. And first we must call attention to the Theology of the Father and the Son. It is contained, for the most part, in incidental references in the Discourses of the Lord. The Father is supreme, and is the source of the Being and all the action of the Son (5[19. 26] etc.). He has sent the Son into the world (3[16]), and given Him commission to perform certain works there (5[36] 8[26] 10[32. 37] 14[31] 15[10] 17[4]). The relation between the Father and the Son is variously described. It is a profound and complete unity: 'I and the Father are one' (ἕν ἐσμεν) (10[30] 17[11. 21]). But this unity does not destroy the distinction between the Father and the Son. The Father loves the Son (5[19] 15[9]), and the Son loves the Father (14[31]); the Father knows the Son, and is known by Him (10[15]; cf. 8[55]). Before the world was, the Son enjoyed 'glory with the Father,' to which He returns (17[5]). The Father abides (μένει) in the Son, and the Son in the Father (8[28. 29] 14[10. 11]): so that it is said 'the Father abiding in me doeth his works' (14[10]). All that belongs to the Son belongs also to the Father, 'and thine are mine' (17[10]): yet 'the Father is greater than I' (14[28]). Hence the representation of the Father by the Son is complete: 'He that hath seen me hath seen the Father' (14[9], cf. 8[19]). So that honour given to the Son is given to the Father (5[23. 33]), and those who reject the Son reject also the Father (8[19] 15[21-24]; cf. 1 Jn 2[22-24]). This fulness of union and intercourse throws some light upon the obscure subject of the witness of the Father. In 5[31. 32] the Lord disclaims bearing witness concerning Himself, but refers instead to the witness of John, and then 5[37] to the witness of the Father. In ch. 8, in answer to the Jews, He says, 'If I do bear witness of myself, my witness is true, because I know whence I came and whither I go' (8[14]), and then again (8[18]) refers to the witness of the Father. In 3[32. 33] (probably a reflective passage by the evangelist and not part of a discourse) we read, 'He that receiveth his (i.e. the Son's) witness hath set to his seal that God is true' (ἐσφράγισεν ὅτι ὁ θεὸς ἀληθὴς ἐστίν); and in 1 Jn 5[10] St. John says again, 'He that believeth on the Son hath the witness in himself; he that believeth not God, hath made him a liar, because he has not believed in the witness which God has witnessed concerning his Son.' Thus the most obvious sign of failure to receive the witness of the Father is to misunderstand the promises of God, and the indications of His purpose, which Christ fulfils. The witness of the Father is closely allied to the witness of Scripture, but is not quite the same. It seems to consist in that inner perception of the purpose of God resting on the love of God (5[42]), which carries conviction in the presence of the life and works of Christ; the Jews fail 'because ye have not his word abiding in you' (5[38]); without this, they search the Scriptures, and so fail to receive their witness also. The Son appeals to this witness against the charge of self-seeking or self-advertisement; and the certainty of His knowledge of His own nature, and of His mission ('whence I come and whither I go') justifies His witness to Himself.

(5) The next point for consideration, starting with the above-described theology of God and the Incarnation, is the process or scheme of salvation. To do this it is necessary to define first St. John's conception of the world, and of the condition requiring remedy. The word κόσμος means primarily the created order; so in 1[9. 10] we find that the world was created through the Word. Also the phrase ὁ βίος τοῦ κόσμου occurs (1 Jn 3[17]) for this world's goods. From the idea of transitoriness (e.g. 1 Jn 2[17]) the word gets a sinister sense; and we find it in its most characteristic signification of the fallen world, the world in opposition to the will of God. In this sense St. John says of it that the whole world lies in the evil one (1 Jn 5[19]). It is the embodiment of the principle of hatred to all that God requires; by the inherent necessity of its nature it hates Christ and His Church (Jn 15[18-23], 1 Jn 3[13]). Christ is alien from it (Jn 8[23] 17[14] 18[36], 1 Jn 4[5]). Its hostility is represented in a ruler, ὁ ἄρχων τοῦ κόσμου τούτου (Jn 12[31] 14[30]), who has an 'hour' in which he apparently triumphs. The characteristic attitude of the world is sin, which is 'lawlessness,' i.e. self-will and rebellion (1 Jn 3[4] 5[17]). Those who live in sin are under the wrath of God (3[36]): their life is no true life, their existence may be described as death (Jn 8[24], 1 Jn 3[14]). From another slightly different point of view the principle of the world's hostility is called the flesh, and it is clearly declared to be impossible to pass by natural evolution out of the range of the flesh. That which is born of the flesh is flesh (Jn 3[6]), and therefore there is no power in the flesh to restore or recreate itself; it can only go on reproducing itself perpetually. This is the condition of things which it is Christ's mission to redeem.

The impulse to restore the world comes from the Father, and is based on love: 'God so loved the world that he sent his only-begotten Son' to save it (Jn 3[16. 17]; cf. 1 Jn 4[10-14]). The effect of the mission of Christ is variously described; He comes that the world may be saved through His means (Jn 3[17]; cf. 4[42], 1 Jn 4[14]); that is the most general phrase. He is the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world (Jn 1[29], 1 Jn 3[5]). He comes that He may destroy the works of the devil (1 Jn 3[8]). But perhaps the most frequent expression of the intended result is the phrase eternal life (Jn 3[16], 1 Jn 5[11]). This forms the subject of many of the discourses and warnings of the Lord, and it is constantly occurring in the First Epistle. Those who believe have passed from death into life (1 Jn 3[14]; cf. Jn 8[24]); eternal life has been promised to mankind by God (1 Jn 2[25]). Christ Himself is identified with it (1 Jn 1[2] 5[11. 20]). He declares that He has come 'that they may have life, and have abundance' (Jn 10[10]); the commandment of the Father is eternal life (Jn 12[50]). And again, 'This is life eternal, that they may know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent' (17[3]). Thus the life which Christ brings consists in union with Christ, obedience to the Father's commandments, and knowledge of God. It is not a thing to be attained only in the future; it is actually in the possession of those who believe (Jn 6[47], 1 Jn 5[11-13]). From another point of view this condition is described as light. Christ is the light of the world (Jn 8[12]; cf. 3[19] 12[46]) in contradistinction to the darkness of sin (cf. 1 Jn 2[9-11]). (See below, p. 689).

The means of salvation for the world is only through Christ. This is partly implied by the general statements of the purpose of God already cited, and partly by the series of metaphorical phrases used by Christ Himself to describe His functions. Thus He is the Bread of Life (6[35. 51]); without participation in His Flesh and Blood there is no true life at all (6[53]). He is the true fulfilment of the type of the water in the wilderness (7[37. 38]); the light of the world (8[12] 12[46]). He is the Door into the true fold, to the exclusion of all others (10[7. 9]); and again, He is the good Shepherd (10[11. 14]). So, at the grave of Lazarus, He proclaims Himself the Resurrection and the Life (11[25]); in answer to the question of Thomas, He declares Himself the Way, the Truth, and the Life (14[6]). Through Him alone is man's access to the Father; in Him all truth and all life are summed up. Once more, He is the True Vine, the unity and quickening force of all those who believe (15[1] etc.). Nor are His functions restricted to those whom He may be connected with during His earthly life, or to those who belong to the chosen people. His work is universal in power and validity (Jn 10[16] 11[52] 12[32], 1 Jn 2[2]).

The idea of God, then, if we may so say, is the salvation of the world through His Son, Christ. We must now consider what action is necessary to achieve this purpose, both on the part of Christ and of mankind. We have already spoken of the obedience of Christ, and the exact way in which He fulfilled the commission of the Father; we have now to deal more in detail with the subject. (a) The method by which Christ saves the world is by the sacrifice of Himself through death. The law under which He lived is first suggested by the Baptist in his witness: Behold, the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world (1[29. 36]).* Christ Himself asserts the same truth, with greater or less distinctness. First to Nicodemus obscurely (3[14]), and again more clearly to the Jews after the feeding of the 5000. 'I am the living Bread which came down from heaven . . . and the bread which I will give is my Flesh for the life of the world' (6[51]). He is 'the good Shepherd that giveth his life for the sheep' (10[11-18]; cf. 1 Jn 3[16]); and by so doing He shows that He has the uttermost love (15[13]). So deeply is this necessity woven into the fabric of things, that the high priest 'of that year,' speaking more wisely than he knew, prophesied that He must lay down His life for the people (11[51. 52]). It is the condition of drawing all men to Him (12[32]). In two places in the First Epistle St. John uses the phrase ἱλασμός, or propitiation (2[2] 4[10]); once (1 Jn 1[7]) St. John speaks of the blood of Jesus Christ as cleansing us from all sin. And our Lord Himself uses once the peculiar phrase, 'I sanctify myself for their sake' (Jn 17[19]).

Thus it is by this process of sacrifice that our Lord performs His part in the plan initiated by God. (b) We now come to consider the function of man—the response required of the world. (1) The fundamental law under which the world is ordered here meets us. The world can do nothing for itself. He, therefore, that will see and enter the kingdom of God must be born again: the old physical sequence—of blood, of the will of the flesh, and the will of man—must be broken off, and a new kinship established (3[3-6], cf. 1[13]). (2) Further, there is required of necessity faith in the Son, and acceptance of His mission (Jn 3[16] 5[24] 6[40. 47], 1 Jn 3[23]). This faith is more than mere belief (8[31]), which in the passage quoted fails to bear criticism. But St. John supplies no definition of it, or anything approaching a definition. It is rather trust in a person than belief in the truth of what he says: or rather, this kind of belief comes as a result of the trust. It is made impossible, as we shall shortly see, by certain moral conditions. (3) The new life which the new birth begins must be sustained by continual participation in the Life of Christ. This is the burden of the strong and startling language in the synagogue at Capernaum (Jn 6[52-59]): 'Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, ye have not life in yourselves. He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day.' And this is said in explanation of the phrase, 'the bread which I will give is my flesh for the life of the world.' It implies that the faithful must in some way, not explained by St. John, enter into and share the sacrifice of our Lord. The sacrifice is thus not an external transaction: all men must have a part in it.

In face of these demands stands the fact that Christ was in large measure rejected. He came to His own place, and His own people received Him not (Jn 1[11]). This, which might easily become a difficulty, is met in two ways. First, St. John presents a strong theory of predestination. The failure no less than the success falls within the sovereignty of the Father. 'No man can come to me, except the Father draw him' (6[44]); 'I manifested thy name to the men whom thou gavest me out of the world' (17[6], cf. 10[29]). The success and the failure are even matters of prophetic prevision (12[37-39]): Isaiah saw what would come about, 'when he saw his glory, and spake concerning him.' And Christ administers the will of the Father in this, as in other respects. 'Ye did not choose me, but I chose you, and set you that ye should go and bring forth fruit' (15[16], cf. [19]). Secondly, faith depends upon certain moral conditions. Those who are evil are, ipso facto, incapable of faith: they shun the light (3[19. 20]). This general truth is made plainer in various discourses of the Lord's. The essential moral fault which prevents faith is self-seeking, aiming at personal distinction, seeking glory one from another (5[41. 44] 7[18]). The Jews refuse to accept the teaching of Christ, because they do not understand the spirit in which it is given: If another comes in his own name, him ye will receive (5[43]). They will not do the Father's will, and therefore they blind themselves. 'If any man will to do his will, he shall know concerning the teaching, whether it is of God, or I speak of myself' (7[17. 18]). And the peril of this position lies just in the fact that they are so self-confident. 'If ye had been blind, ye would not have had sin: but now ye say, We see; therefore your sin remaineth' (9[41])

Thus it is that the manifestation of Christ produces a twofold effect, corresponding to the varieties of moral condition. On the one hand, it produces faith, and so eternal life; this is its natural and proper result. On the other hand, it produces rejection, which is a declaration of affinity with evil—in St. John's language, judgment (3[19]). 'This is the judgment, that the light has come into the world, and men loved the darkness rather than the light, because their deeds were evil.' As eternal life is not a future state of blessedness, but is the correlative of right faith in the Son of Man, so judgment is a condition the precise opposite of life. It consists in the revelation, in action, of hostility to Christ and all that He represents. So Christ says (12[47. 48]), 'If any man hear my words and keep them not, I do not judge him: for I came not to judge the world, but to save the world. He that rejecteth me and receiveth not my words, hath one that judgeth him: the word that I spake, that will judge him in the last day.' Thus judgment follows the same course of meaning as life. The Father has given into the hands of the Son the two Divine prerogatives of life and judgment (5[21. 22]). Yet Christ speaks as if life were the immediate consequence of faith, and judgment the consequence of the refusal to believe (cf. 5[24] 6[47]). At the same time, both in the case of life and judgment, there is a sort of consummation to be looked for at the last day (6[40. 54] 12[47. 48]). In neither case does the condition of life or judgment begin after the last day; it is a process which begins here, and is defined and completed at the last day. In the same way Christ speaks before the Passion of having already overcome the world (16[33]), and St. John in his First Epistle uses similar language of the faith (4[4] 5[4. 5]), although in the same Epistle he warns against continuance in sin. So again he speaks of the sinlessness of those who are 'born of God' (3[9]) in similar connexions. On the other hand, to continue the refusal to accept Christ after the opportunity is finally past is 'to die in sin' (Jn 8[21. 24]).

(6) It remains to consider the doctrine of the Holy Spirit and the Church as we have it in these books. The provisions made by the Lord for the future are to be found chiefly in the Last Discourses. These were uttered after the Last Supper and before the arrest. The prominent note in them is, of course, one of farewell: and the provision for the future is put in language which later experience would alone fully explain. First, our Lord promises an Advocate (παράκλητος) who will supply His place on His departure (14[16]). There are several noticeable points in regard to this mission. Christ speaks of it as His own return (14[18]): He promises in relation to it, that the Father will come with Himself to those who keep His sayings, and 'we will make our abode with him' (14[23]). The Advocate is spoken of as distinct from the Father and the Son, and yet His mission is one which reveals the Father and the Son. Again, in 14[16] Christ says, 'I will ask the Father, and he will give you another Advocate, that he may be with you for ever—the Spirit of truth.' In 14[26] a different phrase is used: 'The Advocate, the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name'; and once again there is a further difference (15[26], cf. 16[7. 13]), 'When the Advocate comes, whom I will send to you from the Father, the Spirit of truth, that proceedeth from the Father.' Thus there is difference of language in regard to the Spirit's mission, and it is difficult to determine precisely St. John's idea. It seems clear, however, that this is due to the close intercourse and union which we have already noticed in regard to the Father and the Son. The Spirit, though sent like the Son, is one in whom full Divinity resides; His activity is a mission, not the effusion of an impersonal influence. The mission of the Holy Spirit depends on the departure of Christ (16[7], cf. 7[39]): the two dispensations are not to be synchronous. The nature of the mission of the Advocate is gathered from various phrases in these chapters. Like the Son, He will not speak from Himself (16[13. 14]), but He will speak the things He hears. His mission continues that of Christ. 'He will glorify me, because he will take of that which is mine, and will declare it unto you' (16[14]). He will teach, and recall all the things which Christ had said (14[26]). He will guide into all the truth, just because He speaks not of Himself (16[13]). His Presence is described as an 'anointing' (χρίσμα, 1 Jn 2[20. 27]) which protects those who have it from error; and is a sign (1 Jn 3[24]) of the indwelling of Christ in us. Further, He continues the process of witness to Christ already mentioned (15[26]). This last point brings us in presence of one of the most difficult passages in St. John's writings, that of the Three witnesses.* It is impossible to enter into the complicated discussions which lie round this verse. The witness of the Spirit is placed on a level with that of the water and the blood, and the witness of the three is said to be consentient. It seems probable that the phrase applied to Christ (ὁ ἐλθὼν δι' ὕδατος καὶ αἵματος) refers directly to the event noticed by St. John —the effusion of blood and water upon the cross (19[34. 35]). But also the Spirit is connected emphatically with water in the Gospel (3[5. 6]) in the passage which gives the principle for interpreting the rite of baptism. And again in 6[63] the Spirit is appealed to when the disciples are puzzled by our Lord's language about eating His flesh and drinking His blood—a passage which contains the theology, so to say, of the other Sacrament. It is probable, therefore, that those are right who see in this passage an assertion of the witness — the evidence conveyed of the truth of the faith—which comes from the Sacraments, interpreted by the Spirit. Our uncertainty (1) as to the exact significance ascribed to the effusion (19[34]), and (2) as to the exact position assigned by St. John to the Sacraments, makes this interpretation less than certain. So far we have considered the function of the Spirit in regard to the Church. He has also a function in regard to the world. The world cannot receive Him, because it neither sees nor knows Him (14[17]); but His presence in the world rebukes or convicts it (ἐλέγχει) concerning sin, and righteousness, and judgment (16[8-11]). That is, the presence of the Spirit shows up in its true character the nature of sin, in the refusal to believe in Christ: the nature of righteousness, in the triumph of Christ through humiliation and death, to which the Spirit is a perpetual witness: the nature of judgment, in the final condemnation already passed upon the ruler of this world, and reiterated so long as the faith of Christ is in the world.

The effect of this mission of the Holy Spirit upon the Church has two sides: it alters men's relations to God and to one another. As regards God, it brings them into the closest possible union. Again and again Christ speaks of abiding in them. The Father and the Son will make their abode with those who love the Son (14[23]). He is the vine, and they are the branches, depending for life on their union with Him (15[4-6. 7. 11] etc.). And the same phrase is constantly used by St. John in his First Epistle (2[5. 6. 24] 3[5. 24] 4[13] 5[20]). It results in the certainty of access to God: we have boldness (2[28] 4[17]) at the last day (3[21. 22]) in judging our own conscience; (5[14. 15]) in prayer, knowing that He hears, and that we therefore have our requests. Five times does our Lord promise fulfilment to prayer in His name (Jn 14[13] 15[7. 16] 16[23. 24. 26]). We are Christ's friends (15[14]); His joy is in us, and our joy is fulfilled (15[11] 17[13]), even under persecution (16[20]); to us He leaves His peace (14[27]). He looks forward to a consummation in His Father's house, where His followers shall be with Him for ever (14[3]); and then we, who are now sons, shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is (1 Jn 3[2. 3]). He sets before the Church as its ideal of unity the abiding of the Father in the Son, the love of the Father and the Son (Jn 15[9. 10]), and the unity of the Father and the Son (17[11]), including in this those who shall believe through the preaching of the apostles (17[20. 24-27]). In this true correspondence between God and man, especially in the free intercourse through prayer, the Father is glorified in the Son (14[13]).

This intimate union determines the character of the Church in its relation to the world. The apostles are sent into the world as Christ Himself was sent there (17[18]); they are His representatives, so that they who receive them receive Him (13[20]); and they will meet with the same hatred and persecution from the world as He did (15[17-21]). Among themselves, they will keep His commandments (14[15. 21. 23. 24] 15[10], cf. 1 Jn 2[3]), and especially the new commandment to love one another (13[34] 15[12. 17]). This is emphasized in the Epistles when St. John is writing to the Church already constituted and at work (1 Jn 3[11. 23] 4[21], 2 Jn [5]). And St. John in his usual manner continually contrasts this principle of love, which is of God (1 Jn 4[7]), with the opposing principle of hatred. This has the essence of murder in it, as the example of Cain shows (1 Jn 3[12-15], cf. Jn 8[44], where the rising desire to kill Christ is connected with the devil, who was a murderer from the beginning); and this hatred is inconsistent with eternal life (1 Jn 3[15]), or with the love of God (4[20]). Their power to overcome the world, in which by Christ's wish and God's ordinance (Jn 17[15]) they are placed, is their faith that Jesus is the Son of God (1 Jn 5[4. 5])—a faith which in St. John's own case and that of his fellow-apostles rested on experience (1 Jn 1[1-4], Jn 1[14]), but belongs also to those who have not seen but yet have believed (Jn 20[29]).

At His departure, the Lord gave to His Church the power to forgive sins, saying, 'Whose soever sins ye shall remit, they are remitted unto them; and whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained' (20[23]). To St. Peter also He gave the charge to tend and feed the flock (21[15. 16. 17]). There are signs in the Epistles of the exercise of some discipline. It is made abundantly clear that sin is inconsistent with the Church altogether (1 Jn 1[6] 2[1] 3[6. 9] 5[18]); to do sin is to relapse into the darkness from which the light has freed us (2[8. 9], cf. 1[6. 7]). Still if a man does commit a sin (ἐάν τις ἁμαρτῇ) we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous (2[1]); the blood of Jesus Christ cleanses us from all sin. For certain sins, not unto death, St. John enjoins the prayer of intercession (1 Jn 5[16-18]); for heresy, he forbids all intercourse or salutation (2 Jn [10]). In one church Diotrephes ὁ φιλοπρωτεύων requires to be deprived of his undeserved eminence, and reduced to order (3 Jn [9. 10]).

(7) It would be impossible to close an account of the Theology of St. John's Gospel and Epistles without reference to the three great phrases in which the nature of God is described: 'God is Spirit' (Jn 4[24]), 'God is Light' (1 Jn 1[5]), and 'God is Love' (1 Jn 4[8. 16]). These three phrases form the crown, and, at the same time, a summary of his Theology. It is important to consider them in close connexion with their content.

The first is ascribed to our Lord Himself in His dialogue with the woman of Samaria. She, finding herself in presence of a prophet, brings before Him the question that had long been at issue between the Jews and the Samaritans. 'Our fathers worshipped in this mountain, but ye say that in Jerusalem men ought to worship.' Jesus answers her implied question comprehensively. For the past ages, the Jews were right: they worshipped with some knowledge, and not blindly, looking forward to salvation: they had so much certainty about God. But for the future, both are alike wrong; the day of local worships is over;

* We assume the omission of the late Western gloss concerning the Three Heavenly witnesses.

God no longer chooses a particular place where men should approach Him: 'He is Spirit, and must be worshipped in spirit and truth.' Thus this phrase marks the transition from the old to the new order. It excludes all limitations of space and time and matter from God, and, at the same time, the context preserves the truth which the Jewish religion had enshrined.

In the second of these phrases we go further: it bears on the moral nature of God. Throughout these books the contrast of Light and Darkness is used metaphorically to express Good and Evil. In the immediate context of this phrase an instance occurs. God is Light, and therefore all who walk in darkness are not in communion with Him. Darkness means hatred (1 Jn 2^{11}) and blindness (ib.), and is passing away (2^{8}). The true light was manifested; and 'this is the message which we have heard of Him, and report to you, that God is light.' This phrase, which cannot be altogether separated from the thought of revelation, is really the correlative of the OT doctrine of the Holiness of the Lord. It conveys the assurance of the undimmed purity of God, and the need of purity to man, if he would have fellowship with God.*

In the third we pass beyond both the two previous phrases. The doctrine that God is Love, asserts, in the strongest possible form, His Personality, and the possibility of personal intercourse between God and Man. This is indeed the drift of the two contexts in which it occurs. The man who is without love does not know God, for God is love. Knowledge of Him, in other words, is possible, but possible through likeness in nature. And so later the same point is more strongly emphasized: 'God is love, and he that abideth in love abideth in God, and God in him' (1 Jn 4^{16}). The object for which Christ came to earth, that man should have this fellowship with Him and with the Father, depends on the fact that God is love. But it is possible to go a little further than this. The doctrine that God is love helps to clear up those difficult phrases (mentioned above, p. 688) in which Christ speaks of the mission of the Paraclete. The account of the work of the Father, the Son, and the Spirit is full of contradictions, if they are conceived on the analogy of three separate individuals; but these particular difficulties are in some degree modified if we think of them as Three essential eternal modes of the Divine Life, bound together in a perfect love. Such a thought explains the peculiar language used of the Word in His relation to the Father (ἦν πρὸς τὸν θεὸν, ὁ ὢν εἰς τὸν κόλπον τοῦ πατρός, $1^{1.\,18}$). We cannot wonder that from this text has arisen the precise theology of the Holy Trinity.

B. THE APOCALYPSE.—The task of describing the theology of the Apocalypse is one of very great difficulty. There is no book more obscure, or more doubtful in its historical reference. The method of the author is to explain his ideas by means of an extremely complicated symbolism, to which it is hard to find the key. In interpreting OT prophecies, the first thing to be done is to decide, if possible, on the historical occasion from which they arose. But in the case of the Apocalypse there is great difficulty in getting any certain clue to the occasion. The majority of modern critics are of opinion that the book was written in the time of Nero; but they are not unanimous, and the ancient tradition is unvaried in favour of the times of Domitian. It will be necessary as far as possible to ignore these difficulties in the present discussion: they are dealt with in special articles. See JOHN (GOSPEL, p. 707 ff.) and REVELATION.

* Philo (de Somn. I. xiii., Tom. i. p. 632 Mang.) uses the same phrase, but with the association of undimmed intellectual vision.

The aim of the book is limited, and is defined both at the beginning and at the end: it is to describe things ἃ δεῖ γενέσθαι ἐν τάχει (cf. 1^{1} 22^{16}). The visions recorded are not set down as mere pieces of the individual history of the writer: they are events which are full of meaning for the future. But interpreters are not agreed as to whether they are to be referred to the immediate history of the time, or to the whole course of the Church's life, or to the remote future at the end of the world. It is well to remember that St. John, supposing that he is the author, is capable, as has already been noticed, of idealizing in a remarkable way; so that he speaks of the sinlessness of the regenerate at the same time that he provides against the commission of actual sin. It is possible, therefore, that the descriptions even of the end of things are the pictorial exposition of principles permanently at work. In any case it will be sufficient to consider the working of the principles, leaving aside the question of their manifestation. The book falls into two very obvious and clear divisions. The first three chapters contain the opening vision and the Epistles to the Seven Churches: this forms the first division. The second (chs. 4–22) contains the Apocalypse proper—the vision or series of visions in which the things which must shortly come to pass are revealed.*

(a) The Doctrine of God.—There is no part of the book devoted to the exposition of this doctrine; such doctrine, therefore, as may be gathered from it, underlies the language in which the proper subject of the book is treated. We gather much, first, from the titles used of God. (a) In the salutation (1^{4}) we have the assertion of the eternity of God ἀπὸ ὁ ὢν καὶ ὁ ἦν καὶ ὁ ἐρχόμενος. The name stands undeclined in the nominative, in spite of its construction with the preposition ἀπό; and the imperfect ἦν is treated as a participle. The phrase thus stands for a Being who is subject to no change, but is always, through all the changes which occur; it is an expansion of the old covenant-name Jehovah. The phrase is repeated in 1^{8}, and is there sanctioned by the words, used by the prophets to authorize their message, λέγει ὁ Κύριος. It is worth noticing that in 4^{8}, when the same words recur in the ascription of glory by the four beasts, their order is changed. The words expressing permanence occur in the second instead of the first place: ὁ ἦν, καὶ ὁ ὤν, καὶ ὁ ἐρχόμενος. After the consummation of things (11^{17}) ὁ ἐρχόμενος is omitted (cf. 16^{5}). The same meaning is carried by the striking phrases τὸ Ἄ καὶ τὸ Ὦ (1^{8} 21^{6} 22^{13}), ὁ πρῶτος καὶ ὁ ἔσχατος (1^{17} 22^{13}), ἡ ἀρχὴ καὶ τὸ τέλος (22^{13}). God is conceived as eternal: from Him all things take their origin, and to Him all things return. In 10^{6} and 15^{7} τῷ ζῶντι εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων, the endless continuity of an eternal Being is declared; in 15^{3} ὁ βασιλεὺς τῶν αἰώνων, the idea of rule or dominion is involved. (β) This brings us to a second idea which is frequently associated with God in this book, ὁ παντοκράτωρ—the all-ruling (1^{8} 4^{8} 15^{3} $16^{7.\,14}$ $19^{6.\,15}$ 21^{22}). It is noticeable that, with the exception of 1^{8} 4^{8}, and possibly 21^{22}, this title is used in connexion with some statement as to the Divine judgments; i.e. with the catastrophic declaration of the principles of His rule. This should be compared with the idea of judgment already traced in the Gospel of St. John (see above, p. 688). Besides this, the phrases should be noted in which the creation of the world is ascribed to God (10^{6} 14^{7}). These simply contain references to it as a fact. In 4^{11} the Will of God is definitely assigned as cause, both for the conception and realization of the created order: διὰ τὸ θέλημά σου ἦσαν καὶ ἐκτίσθησαν.* The cry of the souls slain for the word of God and the witness which they held, contains another title still, ὁ δεσπότης ὁ ἅγιος καὶ ἀληθινός (6[10]). This word occurs but rarely in NT of God, and not elsewhere in St. John; it would seem to convey the idea of personal relationship, as St. Paul speaks of himself as the slave of Christ (δοῦλος). The word ὅσιος is used 15[4], but the usual word for the holiness of God is, as might be supposed, ἅγιος.

* The question of the internal structure of this section does not come before us.

The various doxologies heard in heavenly places by St. John convey the same teaching, but with some differences in expression. The Elders, in their response to the ascription of the Four Beasts, say, 'Thou art worthy, Lord and our God, to receive the glory, the honour, and the power, because thou didst create all things, and for thy will they were, and were created' (4[11]). Later on (5[11]), when the whole of creation responds to the angels and the elders, they ascribe blessing and honour and glory and might (τὸ κράτος); the redeemed (7[10]) speak of salvation (ἡ σωτηρία); and the angels, in response to the great multitude from every nation under heaven (7[12]), say, 'Amen: Blessing, and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and honour, and power, and strength (ἡ ἰσχύς), be unto our God for ages of ages.' All these, in various ways, assert the supreme sovereignty of God. This is specially emphasized (11[17] 15[3, 4]) in regard to the judgments of God: the ways of God are vindicated when, after long trial, the evil is done away with, and holiness triumphs. So the elders, when they sing the song of Moses the servant of God, and of the Lamb, say, 'Just and true are thy ways, O King of ages' (15[3]); and again, when the waters are turned into blood (16[5]), St. John heard 'the angel of the waters saying, Thou art just, thou which art, and which wast, the Holy, because thou hast judged these things: because they poured forth the blood of saints and prophets, and thou hast given them blood to drink: they are worthy.' And the altar responds in the same sense (16[7], cf. 19[2]). The majesty of God is described symbolically at the beginning of ch. 4; the Father is 'He that sitteth on the throne' in the centre of the heavenly place. The author does not attempt any description of this supreme Presence in this, or in any other of the many passages where the phrase ὁ καθήμενος ἐπὶ τῷ θρόνῳ occurs; he uses merely metaphorical language, and implies by so doing that God is in Himself invisible. Thus we have in this book an expansion of the old Hebrew doctrine of God: He is eternal, invisible, supreme Creator, Ruler, and Judge of the world. The coherence of this with the fuller Christian doctrine of God will be obvious when we consider the functions of the Son of God.

(γ) We will consider, first, the relation of the Father and the Son. It is noticeable that these names are most frequent in the first three chapters. The incarnate Son occupies a position of subordination. Thus in the preface to Rev we find these words: 'The Revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave him, to show his servants' (1[1]). And this is borne out in the chapters which follow: 'I will give him authority over the nations . . . as I also have received from my Father' (2[27]). So He says, 'I will confess his name before my Father' (3[5]); and in 3[21] He draws a parallel between His own victory and triumph and that of His followers. In 3[12] He even speaks of the Father as 'My God' (ὁ θεός μου). On the other hand, when St. John in the spirit on the Lord's Day sees the opening vision, the figure ὅμοιον υἱὸν ἀνθρώπου, the Son thus manifested uses of Himself words usually applied to the Father, the first and the last (1[17]); referring to the Resurrection, so that there can be no possibility of mistake, and claiming further to possess the keys of Hades and of death. Moreover, the features which St. John notes in the figure—the flaming eyes, and two-edged sword from the mouth—are, as the messages to the various Churches show, symbolic of judgment. So He is the source from whom the messages to the Seven Churches come: He holds the seven stars in His right hand (i.e. the angels of the Seven Churches, 2[1]; cf. 1[16, 20]). These phrases imply sovereignty, and the exercise of judicial office. The same position is conveyed by the various titles used in this passage of the Son. He is 'the faithful and true witness' (1[5] 3[14], cf. 1 Ti 6[13]); 'the firstborn of the dead' (1[5]), 'the amen' (3[14]), 'the ruler of the kings of the earth' (1[5]). These deal with His work on earth, with His function as fulfiller of the promises of God (cf. 2 Co 1[19, 20]), and with its triumph over mankind. So, too, 2[1] 3[1]. But the title 'the beginning of the Creation of God' (3[14]), 'the first and the last' (1[17] 2[8]), and those in which the prerogatives of judgment are asserted (2[12, 18] 3[7]), emphasize the Divine attributes of the Son of God (2[18]). The teaching in these and similar passages precisely resembles in its ambiguity the language already noted in the Gospels. There also the Son speaks of Himself as derived and subordinate, and yet exercises functions which He also reserves for the Father. Such a phrase as Jn 5[22] 'Neither doth the Father judge any man, but hath given all judgment to the Son,' expresses precisely the point of view of the Apocalypse.

In the first three chapters we find Christ dealing with the Church in the world; with the fourth we pass into the region of visions and symbolism; and the words Father and Son, as already noticed, are of rare occurrence. But the theology is the same, in spite of difference of language. Sovereign over all things is 'he that sitteth on the throne.' By His right hand is the Book written within and without, sealed with seven seals (5[1]). The seer is told that the Lion of the tribe of Judah, the root of David (cf. 22[16], where Jesus assumes this latter title to Himself), has overcome, so as to open the Book and its seven seals (5[5]). Then 'in the midst of the Throne of the Four Beasts and in the midst of the Elders' he sees a Lamb standing as it had been slain (5[6]). The Lamb came and took the Book from the right hand of Him that sitteth on the Throne (5[7]). 'And when he received the Book, the four Beasts and the four-and-twenty Elders fell before the Lamb, having each a harp, and golden bowls full of incense, which are the prayers of the saints. And they sing a new song, saying, Thou art worthy to receive the Book, and to open its seals; because thou wast slain, and didst buy for God with thy blood out of every tribe, and tongue, and people, and nation, and madest them to our God a kingdom and priests; and they reign upon the earth' (5[8-10]). The angels then respond to this new song with a doxology to the Lamb parallel in character to those addressed to the Father (5[12]). And, lastly, the whole creation responds with a similar doxology, combining in it both the Lamb and Him that sitteth on the throne (5[13]). It is obvious that this is a highly significant passage. The Lamb receives the Book from the Supreme; but He is treated with worship similar to that paid to the Supreme. (Contrast the scene in which John falls down to worship the angel, 19[10] and 22[8, 9]). Moreover, through the language used by the Elders (5[8-10]), the Lamb is identified with Jesus Christ: 'To him that loved us and loosed us from our sins with his blood, and made us a kingdom and priests to God and his Father—to him be glory and might for ever' (1[5, 6], cf. 7[10]). The same position is maintained throughout the book. The

* If ἦσαν is the true reading, it is difficult to see what it can mean but this; cf. Jn 1[4] ὃ γέγονεν ἐν αὐτῷ ζωὴ ἦν.

Lamb is mentioned in connexion with the Supreme ($7^{9.\ 10}$ etc.), and He performs work in which His honour is of the same sort with that of God. The redeemed are they 'who follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth: these were bought from among men a first-fruits to God and the Lamb' (14^{4}). He appears in the judgment, and witnesses the ruin of the Beast and his worshippers (14^{10}). He wars with the Beast, and overcomes; because He is King of kings and Lord of lords (17^{14}), cf. 'the wrath of the Lamb' (6^{16}). The Church, the new Jerusalem, is the Bride of the Lamb ($21^{9.\ 10}$), and 'the Lord the God, all-Sovereign, is the temple of it, and the Lamb' (21^{22}). There also stands the throne of God and the Lamb (22^{3}). Similar teaching is found in connexion with the name of Christ (much more rare than the symbolic title 'the Lamb'). 'The kingdom of the world is become (the kingdom) of our Lord and of his Christ' (11^{15}). 'Now is come the salvation and the power and the kingdom of our God, and the authority of his Christ' (12^{10}). The whole scheme is bound up with the order of the world: the Lamb was slain from the foundation of the world (13^{8}); and yet those whose names are among the redeemed are said to have their names in the Lamb's book of life (13^{8} 21^{27}). It is difficult to draw any conclusion from this but that St. John regarded the Lamb as a Divine Being, to whom Divine honour was paid, and who was associated in His sovereignty by God. At the same time, He takes from God the commission to perform His functions: He is not independent. Little is said of human nature in regard to Him: twice only He is described as ὅμοιον υἱὸν (var. lec. υἱῷ) ἀνθρώπου (1^{13} 14^{14}). But the sacrifice and the blood of the Lamb are the means by which men are redeemed from their sins; and there is one definite allusion to the crucifixion (11^{8} 'the great city, which spiritually is called Sodom and Egypt where also their Lord was crucified'). With this may be compared the prophecy in 1^{7} 'Every eye shall see him, and they who pierced him' (ἐξεκέντησαν), and Jn 19^{37} ὄψονται εἰς ὃν ἐξεκέντησαν. The profession of those who follow Christ is called (from the point of view of its manifestation in the world) 'the witness of Jesus.' St. John claims to be giving this himself (1^{20}, cf. 19^{10}). It is, as it were, a message the contents of which are obnoxious to the world (1^{9}) and to the powers of darkness (11^{7} 12^{17} 17^{6}); it involves persecution even to death (6^{9} 17^{6} 20^{4}); it is the cause of the triumph of those who have it (12^{11}); and it is the fulfilment, the significance, the spirit of prophecy (19^{10}).

(b) We may speak here of the doctrine of the Spirit, so far as it is contained in this book. It is somewhat involved in symbolism. Thus we read of the seven spirits which are before His throne (1^{4}): the seven λαμπάδες (4^{6}) before the throne are identified with the seven spirits, and so also the seven eyes of the Lamb (5^{6}) are the seven spirits of God, sent (ἀπεσταλμένοι) into all the earth. The number seven probably stands for completeness, and the phrase 'the seven spirits' probably means the Spirit in the full variety of His manifestation. It is noticeable that the salutation to the seven Churches comes from the Eternal, and from the seven spirits, and from Jesus Christ (1^{4}) in that order: the seven spirits, in this case only, standing between the Father and the Son. In the Epistles themselves a peculiar use is to be observed. Each Epistle begins with an announcement from Christ, made with some symbol indicative of His authority, or His intention to exercise judgment; and each ends with the same formula: 'He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith to the Churches' ($2^{11.\ 17}$ etc.). Also in 3^{1} the Ep. to Sardis begins: 'These things saith he that hath the seven spirits, and the seven stars' (i.e. the angels of the Churches, 1^{20}). In two other places the Spirit is represented as speaking, 'I heard a voice from heaven saying, Write, Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord from henceforth: Yea, saith the Spirit, that they shall rest from their labours' (14^{13}). And again at the end (22^{17}), 'the Spirit and the Bride say, Come.' There is thus comparatively little definite allusion to the Spirit in this book. What there is, seems to involve the following points: (1) the Spirit in His various manifestations proceeds from the Father: (2) Christ holds the seven spirits, regulates the diverse operations of the Spirit in the Church; (3) the voice of the Spirit in the Church is, in a sense, the voice of Christ; (4) the Spirit joins in the prayer of the Bride. Though somewhat limited in character, these points imply a doctrine which, both in its clearness and obscurity, resembles the doctrine of the Last Discourses (see above).

(c) The remaining points for consideration are those connected with the facts of sin and judgment, salvation and the Church. It is better to take these together, owing to the particular form in which they come before us. In dealing with the Gospel we noted the use by the author of pairs of parallel but contrasted ideas, such as Light and Darkness, Life and Judgment, This method is carried out in the Apocalypse on a very extended scale. In the visions contained in this work we witness the warfare of two contending powers: on the one side is the Lamb, and on the other the devil. The devil is described under various names. In 12^{3} we read, 'And another sign was seen in heaven, and behold a great red dragon, having seven heads and ten horns,' etc. This dragon is identified (12^{9}, cf. 20^{2}) with 'the old serpent, called the devil and Satan, who deceiveth the whole world.' The 'serpent' implies, of course, a reference to the story of the Fall, and this title, therefore, implies that the source of the evil in the world is the power that was against God. In other places we hear of a synagogue of Satan (2^{9} 3^{9}), a throne of Satan (2^{13}), and the place where Satan dwelleth (2^{13}); a doctrine of Satan, called by those who follow it 'the deep things of Satan' (2^{24} τὰ βαθέα τοῦ Σατανᾶ). But this is not all. There is described in this book an organized kingdom of evil, claiming sovereignty over men like the kingdom of the Lamb. This introduces the most tangled of all the questions connected with this book: the interpretation of the Beast. We cannot enter upon the various explanations proposed (see REVELATION), but must confine ourselves to the general question of the position occupied by the Beast in the book. He is the embodiment of the power of the devil (13^{2}): he aims at winning the homage of the world, and does so win it in a large measure (13^{4}): he has a certain power to vex the saints—power which is given him (ἐδόθη αὐτῷ, 13^{7}). Further, he has a representative, a second Beast, who works among men in favour of the first (13^{12}), and does signs (v.^{13}), and inspires an image of the first beast with life and speech: he also compels some to receive a mark in their hands or foreheads, and persecutes all others (vv.$^{16.\ 17}$). In all this there is traceable a kind of attempt to caricature the methods and the kingdom of Christ. One of his heads was ὡς ἐσφαγμένην εἰς θάνατον, and the blow of his death was healed (13^{4}), as if he claimed resurrection. The second Beast has two horns, like the Lamb (13^{11}). The worshippers who are deceived say, 'Who is like unto the beast, and who is able to war with him?' (13^{4}), which caricatures the meaning of the word Michael, —'who is like unto God,'—Michael having cast the dragon out of heaven. In 16^{13} we find three powers spoken of—the dragon, the beast, and the prophet who occupies the place of the second beast.

Then later, a woman appears seated on a beast, clothed in scarlet, named Babylon the great. Between these two war arises, in pursuance of the plans of God (17^{17}). With all the obscurity of details the general sense of this imagery seems clear. The forces of evil in the world take their origin from Satan; and the essence of the evil consists in setting up rival claims to worship as against God. This is the force of the caricature of Divine methods. Satan claims to do for men all that God can do. As in the Gospel, the final difference between those who fall under the delusions of the Beast and those who do not is explained by means of predestination. All who dwell upon the earth shall worship him (the Beast), every one whose name has not been written in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world (13^{8}, cf. 17^{8}). This, as well as the temporary power of the Beast, his persecution and ultimate fall, are in the hands of God.

With regard to the judgments of God, it is to be noted that they are retributive in character. During the time before the end the plagues of God come upon the world, and those who follow the Beast only blaspheme the more because of them, and fail to repent ($16^{9.\ 10.\ 11.\ 21}$, cf. 9^{20} and contrast 11^{13}): pain in their case fails to convert. When the end comes, men are judged κατὰ τὰ ἔργα (20^{14} 22^{12}). More precisely, those who have slain the saints are given blood to drink (16^{6} 13^{10}); those who commit fornication in Thyatira are cast upon a bed (2^{20}); Babylon is punished with the cup which she mixed for others (18^{6}). The time of probation passes, and then the sins themselves are their own punishment: 'He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he that is filthy, let him be filthy still' (22^{11}).

The evil which has thus entered upon the world affects mankind, apparently as a whole; at least there is no sign in the book that any can avoid its taint. And it therefore requires to be abolished: men need salvation. In this book there is but one means to this end: the blood of the Lamb. The first allusion to this is in the doxology immediately before the salutation, τῷ ἀγαπῶντι ἡμᾶς καὶ λύσαντι ἡμᾶς ἐκ τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν ἐν τῷ αἵματι αὐτοῦ (1^{5}). It appears again in the doxology to the Lamb (5^{11}, cf. 14^{4}). The hundred and forty and four thousand are said to have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb (7^{14}, cf. 22^{14}): it is by means of it that they win victory over the Beast (12^{11}). A reference to it is made when He who is called the Word of God goes forth with His garments sprinkled with blood (19^{13}). Nothing is said as to the way in which this sacrifice is applied: the fact of it is asserted.

Those who are thus redeemed are made by Christ into a kingdom, priests unto God and His Father (1^{6} 5^{10}); that is, they are a society of men ruled over by God as King. They are sealed in their foreheads (7^{3}). They come from the twelve tribes, but not from these alone: 'I beheld, and, lo, a great multitude, that no man could number, from every nation, and tribe, and people, and tongue, standing before the throne, and before the Lamb' (7^{9}; cf. 14^{6}). Moreover, the whole creation has a part in the scheme of God, and responds with a doxology to the Lamb (5^{13}): the 'eternal Gospel' is based on the fact of Creation (14^{6}), 'I saw another angel flying in midheaven, having an eternal gospel to preach to those that sit upon the earth, and to every nation, and tribe, and tongue, and people, saying in a loud voice, Fear God, and give him glory; because the hour of his judgment has come: and worship him that made heaven, and earth, and the sun, and the springs of waters.'

In the meantime, before the end comes, the ideal of the Church is not attained. There is sin and heresy in the seven Churches. There are false apostles (2^{2}), false Jews (2^{9}), the teaching of Balaam (2^{14}), a false prophetess (2^{20}), impurity (3^{4}), lukewarmness (3^{15}). The devil has power to persecute, so that the men in the earth may be tested (2^{10} 3^{10}). Those who are slain cry out beneath the altar, How long? (6^{10}) but others, their fellow-servants and brethren, will have to be slain as they. This fate must befall especially the two witnesses, who prophesy against the Beast (11^{3-8}). So for all this time emphasis is laid upon the qualities of endurance and faithfulness (cf. 3^{10} 2^{10} 13^{10}). The cowardly, the unfaithful, those who murder, and lie, and are idolaters or impure (21^{8} 22^{15}), have no part in the heavenly kingdom. Even a Church, that is already in existence, may lose its place: 'if not, I come to thee, and will remove thy candlestick from its place, if thou repent not' (2^{5}).

In the eyes of God and of the seer the time of waiting is very short. 'Behold, I come as a thief' (16^{15} 22^{20}). And when the time does come the harvest of the world will be reaped (14^{15}), and the vintage gathered (14^{18}), and the evil will be finally separated from the good. Then comes the consummation. There will be the new heaven and new earth; the sea—symbolizing probably restlessness, and division and barrenness—will be no more. And the new Jerusalem, founded on the twelve apostles of the Lamb (21^{14}), will appear. In this the redeemed will dwell for ever (22^{5}) in perfect freedom and happiness. The actual presence of God and the Lamb will make a temple for worship unnecessary: the servants of God shall see His face. Thus the purpose for which man is created is fulfilled.

It is not, perhaps, fanciful to see a symbol of this perfect communion in the fact that it is after the renewal of the heaven and earth, that He that sitteth on the throne is said to speak (21^{5}). Before, voices came from the throne and from the temple, but none from the Supreme. Now at last, when all is fulfilled, He speaks.

It is manifestly impossible to exhaust within reasonable limits the meaning of this inexhaustible book. An attempt has been made to indicate the outlines of the theology assumed in it. It must be obvious by this time how closely the thought of the Apocalypse is connected with that of the Gospel and Epistles. Perhaps the most noticeable points of difference are the comparatively small place occupied in the Apocalypse by the doctrine of the Spirit, and the emphasis laid in this book upon the catastrophe of the judgment. It cannot, however, be said that these are very significant. For, first, the doctrine of the Spirit is similar in character to that in the Gospel so far as it goes; and, secondly, the judgment expresses in its final form a warfare which continues throughout the history of the world.

The Fourth Gospel is generally admitted to be the work of one remarkably gifted man. Neither in style nor in motive can criticism break it up into different centuries or antagonistic tendencies. Editorial hands have for the most part spared its subtle beauty. There is little with which it can be compared. It stands free of fashion, and possesses throughout a strongly marked idiosyncrasy.

The problem that is forced upon the student is this: Is the so-called 'Gospel' the outline of a biography, or the artistic clothing of an ideal? Have we a true report of the impression produced on the consciousness of an intimate friend by the teaching, manner, and deeds of One whom he could not think of as less than the Eternal Word of God manifest in the flesh, or must we conclude that what we have is the speculation of some one who did not shrink from creating its material and inventing the basis of its theologoumena?

The problem is the more puzzling because to the presumed author of the Gospel is also attributed the production of the Apocalypse. If this compound authorship can be accepted, the personality of 'John' becomes almost as perplexing to scientific history as that of the Lord Jesus Christ Himself. When the diversity of the characteristics of the two documents came into the clear consciousness of the 3rd cent. (Eus. HE vii. 10, 24, 25), the apostolic origin of the Apocalypse was repudiated, rather than that of the Gospel. But the preponderant belief of Christians has practically accepted the unity of the Johannine writings. The fact that St. John had the insight which enabled him to preserve discourses and sayings of the Lord Jesus, to see in His human life the fulness of grace and truth, the glory of the only-begotten Son, has seemed consonant with the fact that the same eyes might also have discerned in Him the slain Lamb, the Lion of the tribe of Judah, the Prince of the kings of the earth.

If the Son of God did say and do the things recorded in this document, then everything in the universe, every fact in the history of the world, the conclusions of all philosophy, the meaning of all scientific discovery, the future of the world, and the goal of humanity, must be affected by its disclosures. We do not, indeed, contend that the Christian faith is dependent on the Fourth Gospel, or that, should this supreme expression of its inmost spirit be banished to the realm of speculative romance, the faith or the kingdom of Christ is relegated to the same region. The ministry of the Apostle to the Gentiles must have been completed between 30 and 40 years before this Gospel saw the light. Great historic Churches grew into importance and began to suffer disintegration from internal discord before it was possible to heal them by the Valedictory Discourse. The Churches of Judæa and of the Dispersion lived by 'the faith of the Lord of Glory' (Ja 2^1), and 'looked for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life' (Jude $^{20-22}$), before this document could have come into circulation.

If we read between the lines of the most authentic Epp. of St. Paul, St. Peter, or the Ep. of St. James, we see that the message of the apostles had already inaugurated a new philosophy of heaven and earth, of time and eternity, new conceptions of history and ethics, and new standards of life. The leaven had spread from Jerus. to Antioch; from thence it had spread to Ephesus, Corinth, and Rome. All this had occurred before the Fourth Gospel had been crystallized into form, or its interpretation of the baffling mystery had been offered to mankind. Even if we were robbed of the Apoc. and of the spiritual Gospel, or deprived of all confidence in either, we should still be in indefeasible possession of a faith which unriddles the universe, which works by love, which overcomes the world. We should, therefore, mistake most obvious facts if we persisted in regarding the Fourth Gospel as the 'acropolis' or citadel of the faith.

But although this is freely conceded, the inestimable preciousness of the document must still be urged with earnestness. Those who strenuously deny its historicity and repudiate its apostolic character are ready to confess, with Baur, Schenkel, Thoma, Taylor, that the highest, and essentially the truest, revelation of the Son of Man, and interpretation of the mind and will of God, are to be found in this record. Much which it contains has long since been verified by the Christian conscience as fundamentally true, and has permanently enriched the mind of man.

We hail the teaching of the Fourth Gospel as establishing for us the inspiring persuasion that the divine and human are not separated by an impassable chasm, but are in their innermost essence one; that, in the portraiture of the Logos made man, humanity at its best is nothing less than the clearest and most gracious revelation of the Eternal God, and that Divinity at its greatest has been manifested through the human.

A philosophy based on the intrinsic unknowableness of God, on the impossibility of converse being held between man and his Creator, is pledged to demonstrate the late origin of the Fourth Gospel, and to find in the Johannine teaching of St. Paul some of the materials of the pious fraud of this falsarius of the 2nd century. Many have struggled with the attempt to discover Alexandrine philosophy in the Fourth Gospel. Efforts have been made to show that in the speculations of Cerinthus, Valentinus, and Basilides we may find the historical antecedents of this Gospel. It was even urged by Volkmar that 'John' may have used the works of Justin Martyr, rather than Justin have quoted from 'John,' and a date was provisionally determined for the appearance of the Gospel just anterior to the time when, by general admission, it is known to have been regarded in Antioch and Lyons, Alexandria, Ephesus, and Rome as one of the four indisputable authorities for the biography of the Lord Jesus.

I. EXTERNAL EVIDENCE FOR THE EARLY EXISTENCE OF FOUR GOSPELS.—The strength of the argument for the historicity and the credibility of St. John's Gospel is to be found within itself: (1) in the proof which it explicitly contains of its own authorship; (2) in the transcendent revelation it gives of an august Personality immeasurably greater than that of the supposed author himself, who did not fully assimilate words or thoughts of his Master which yet, by some psychologic process, he was able to preserve and record for all time; (3) in the subtle harmonies between 'St. John's' conception of the Son of God and that expressed by the Synoptists and St. Paul; (4) in the germinant force of the uttered word of Jesus, and in the triumphant response it has found in the consciousness, the fears and hopes, of the human race. And yet there are discords as well as harmonies. These we shall presently attempt to separate, but first we must clearly apprehend what is the material of which these things can be said.

There is proof that towards the last quarter of the second cent., in every part of the Roman Empire, four Gospels had been selected and were regarded as authentic, and that these four documents were identical with those which are described as 'according to' Matthew, Mark, Luke, and JOHN. Up to that period, τὸ εὐαγγέλιον was a name for the good message, or acceptable speculation, which Christian or heretical writers were offering to their followers. Thus Hippolytus (Ref. Hær. vii. 27) speaks of the disciples of Basilides as possessing 'a gospel' which was the knowledge (γνῶσις) of supramundane things; but Theophilus of Antioch applied the name to the four separate Gospels, and we hear henceforward not only of the Gospel, but of τὰ εὐαγγέλια.

(a) The most conspicuous of these testimonies is that of IRENÆUS, Bishop of Lyons in Gaul, who lived between A.D. 140 and 202, and who wrote his treatise Refutation of Heresies between A.D. 180 and 190. Other fragments of his work, and a letter to Florinus, are preserved by Eusebius (HE v. 20). These are of considerable interest, and show, in combination, that the 'four Gospels' are, together with the Old Testament, to be regarded as 'the Scriptures.' Irenæus specifies these four (Hær. iii. 1), referring them by name to their respective authors. He makes frequent reference to St. John by name, and he gives a mystic reason for there being four Gospels, neither more nor fewer. Though this is fanciful and carries no theological weight, it shows that the canonical 'four' must have been long in circulation among the Churches of Lyons and Vienne.* Irenæus makes no fewer than 500 citations from the four Gospels, 100 of these being from the Fourth (see Index of Ante-Nicene Library, Works of Irenæus, ii. 193–197).

Great stress must also be laid on the relation that subsisted between Irenæus and Polycarp, the disciple of John the Apostle. If the letter to Florinus, recalling in lifelike form the appearance and ways of Polycarp, is genuine, it is quite incredible that the Johannine Gospel from which Irenæus thus quoted 100 times was not written by the venerated teacher of Polycarp.

(b) THEOPHILUS, Bishop of Antioch, c. A.D. 180, declared in his three Books addressed to Autolycus, a heathen, that the same things were advanced by the prophets and evangelists, and he quotes John (i. 13) by name. He is also reported to have written commentaries on the Gospels. On the genuineness of the Lat. transl. of these comm. much controversy has prevailed between Zahn and Harnack; but there is no question that Theophilus was acquainted with St. John's writings, and he designates him as 'spirit-bearing'—occupying the same level with the Law and the Prophets. It is, moreover, far from improbable that he refers to Jn 12^{24} and 20^{27}, for the resemblance to St. John's language is striking, and we know that he was acquainted with the Gospel.

(c) CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA was the head of the celebrated Catechetical School from A.D. 189, and was himself a pupil of Pantænus and the teacher of Origen, who succeeded him in his office. Irenæus and Hippolytus probably for a brief period followed his instructions. He was a littérateur, and diligent collector of the opinions and dicta of philosophers. He held in reverence other sacred books, in addition to the Canonical writings of the NT, such as the Gospel according to the Egyptians, and the Apoc. of Peter, a fragment of which has been recently brought to light. He was accustomed to cite and compare the testimonies of ancient writers, as well as early traditions, concerning the Evangelists and the apostles. It is unfortunate that the most interesting of these are preserved for us only by Eusebius (HE vi. 14, iii. 23), but they aver the existence and value of the four Gospels. In the Exhortation (προτρεπτικός, § 59) he quotes from one or other of the Gospels between 400 and 500 times, and cites St. John's by name. Eusebius preserves the tradition of Clement, that Peter approved of Mark's narrative, and that 'John, divinely moved by the Holy Spirit, wrote a spiritual Gospel on observing that the things obvious to the senses had been set forth in earlier Gospels.'

(d) TERTULLIAN, whose literary work was done in Carthage between A.D. 190 and A.D. 230, left abundant testimony to the existence and apostolic authority of each of the Gospels. He cites passages from almost every chapter of the Fourth Gospel, and from some chapters almost every verse (see Watkins, Bampton Lectures, p. 24). His evidence is of high value, because of the close attention he paid to the text of St. Luke's Gospel, and the detailed proof he advanced, verse by verse, that Marcion's 'gospel' was a mutilated copy of St. Luke. After long and anxious reinvestigation by Baur, Ritschl, Volkmar, the author of Supern. Religion, and Sanday, the contention of Tertullian has been sustained; but it is he also who makes it highly probable that Marcion was acquainted with the Fourth Gospel (see Godet's Introd. to Gospel of St. John, vol. i. 221); and without doubt, as in his work (adv. Praxeam, ch. xxiii.) against the monarchianism of Praxeas, Tertullian submitted to the authority of John the beloved disciple.

No weight need be laid upon the fragments which remain, chiefly in Syriac, of the writings of Melito of Sardis, or of Claudius Apollinaris of Hierapolis, though the list of their works given by Eusebius, and the high value set upon them by Jerome and Socrates, make it probable that treatises on the Paschal Festival and on the Birth of Christ showed acquaintance with the Four Gospels.

(e) But a strong link in the chain of proof is found in the writings of FLAVIUS JUSTINUS, the philosopher and martyr. Critics differ as to the chronology of Justin's career and the date of his martyrdom,* but Hort (Journal of Class. and Sac. Philol. iii. pp. 155–193), closely approximated by Volkmar, thought it safe to say that the chief works of Justin, his two Apologies and his Dialogue with Trypho, must fall between A.D. 145 and 148. Caspari and Krüger have ventured on a still earlier date. Justin tells us that, after passing through various stages of philosophic thought, he found the satisfaction of his mind restored by men of prophetic spirit, who did not demonstrate truth, but, being filled by the Holy Spirit, speaking things they had seen and heard, gave him what he wanted: 'kindled a flame in his soul,' and convinced him that 'this philosophy

* 'Religious veneration such as that with which Irenæus regarded these books is of slow growth. They must have held a great place in the Church as far back as the memory of living men extended' (R. W. Dale, Living Christ and Four Gospels, p. 145).

* Credner places the limits of his activity between A.D. 130–166 Volkmar reduced the limits between A.D. 140–150.

alone was profitable and safe.' The torch of Aristotle and Plato faded when he became familiar with the Light of Christ. In the first apology he frequently cites what he styles 'Memorials' composed by the Apostles and their followers.' In ch. 66 he adds 'which are called Gospels,' but this clause, as opponents urge, may be a marginal gloss. The term or phrase is slightly varied. Thus he sometimes, as in Ap. i., calls them 'Memoirs of the Apostles,' sometimes 'Memoirs' simply, as in the Dialogue; and when he is referring to an incident mentioned by all four Evangelists, he introduces it by 'the apostles wrote.' The names of the apostles are not mentioned, yet no phrase could more adequately denote them than 'the apostles and those that followed them.' In addressing the Roman emperors, or the bigoted Jews of Rome or Asia Minor, the obscure names, Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, would have detracted from, rather than increased, their weight. This is parallel with the reticence of Tertullian, who, when writing his Apology and his address To the Nations, makes no distinct reference to the 'Gospels' or to their authors. Cyprian, Arnobius, and Lactantius follow the same rule. In Justin's references to the events of our Lord's life, he introduces a few picturesque details not to be found in the Canonical Gospels, indicating, it may be, some additional sources of information. If he possessed any 'harmony' of the evangelical narrative, as well as the 'memorials,' it is more likely that it was formed from them, than that it was the parent of them. It is, moreover, simply incredible that, between the date of Justin's writing the Apology or Dialogue and Irenæus' writing his Refutation, the Four Gospels should have been brought into existence, and utterly displaced Justin's 'memorials,' or that they should have come into such vogue as to be read in churches and be regarded as of primary importance in Lyons and Carthage, Antioch and Alexandria. Justin refers to some details which are found, so far as we know, in St. Matthew's Gospel only; he also cites some of the few specialities of St. Mark's Gospel, and at least seven peculiarities to be found in St. Luke's Gospel. The deviation from the strict accuracy of quotation may be the idiosyncrasy of the author, for he shows also slight and marked divergences from the LXX, and from the text of the Dialogues of Plato (see Sanday, Gospels in the Second Century). The deviations from strict accuracy are, as we should expect, more numerous in quotations from the Gospels than from these other sources. Except when quoting a lengthened passage from LXX or other sources, he may have fallen back upon his memory, as other divines have done in all ages.

The contemporaneousness of Justin and Irenæus is a fact of importance when we call to mind the undoubted confidence which the latter places in the Fourth Gospel. Irenæus makes no fewer than 30 references to the Apology and Dialogue of Justin. Equally abundant are the references to Justin by Tertullian, Theophilus, and others, to say nothing at present of Tatian, the supposed author of the Diatessaron.

II. External Evidence for the Early Existence of the Fourth Gospel.—(A) We will commence with the quotations from, or references to, the Fourth Gospel by Justin himself (see Watkins, Bampton Lectures, pp. 73–81, for a summary of recent investigations by Ezra Abbot, Thoma, Hilgenfeld, Drummond, Sanday, Westcott, Edwin A. Abbott, and others). The resemblances between Justin and the Fourth Gospel are undeniable, but it has been contended by some that 'John' borrowed from Justin, rather than the reverse. Such a contention, however, must be held to betray a deficiency of literary perception. Others, who accept the priority of John, urge that Justin did not regard the authority of the evangelist as apostolic; and that, if he had drawn upon the Gospel, he ought to have quoted it when endeavouring to establish the pre-existence of Christ, instead of citing words of OT prophets. This suggestion supposes that we can grasp the ethic and philosophy of citation in the 2nd century. There are seven or eight passages in the Apology, and several in the Dialogue, which turn on (1) the Johannine doctrine of the Logos, its idea of the relation of the Logos to God, as His πρῶτον γέννημα (ch. 21), His υἱός (chs. 22 and 63), His πρωτότοκος τῷ ἀγεννήτῳ θεῷ (ch. 53); (2) on the incarnation of the Logos, His becoming σάρξ, or ἄνθρωπος, in Jesus Christ, and the 'Teacher' or 'Saviour' of the world (Ap. 5; Dial. 48, 105). Many portions of the Gospel, besides the Prologue, are referred to by Justin, e.g. in Ap. 35 he regards Isaiah's oracle in 48^2 as fulfilled by a curious text of Jn 19^{13}, where ἐκάθισε is altered into transitive ἐκάθισαν, and refers to Jesus being forced to sit on the βῆμα or judgment-seat, rather than to Pilate's taking his seat on it. This supposition, that part of the gross humiliation of Jesus consisted in placing Him upon the seat of judgment, is confirmed by the fragment of the Gospel of Peter recently discovered. In Dial. 69, Justin refers to the incidents of Jesus healing those ἐκ γενετῆς πηρούς (cf. Jn 9), the lame also and dumb, by His word. Again, Jn 4^{10} is referred to in Dial. 114.

The most important passage is Ap. 61, which professes to be the word of Christ Himself, ἄν μὴ ἀναγεννηθῆτε οὐ μὴ εἰσέλθητε εἰς τὴν βασιλείαν τῶν οὐρανῶν. Ὅτι δε καὶ ἀδύνατον εἰς τὰς μήτρας τῶν τεκουσῶν τοὺς ἅπαξ γεννωμένους ἐμβῆναι φανερὸν πᾶσίν ἐστιν. We have only to place this by the side of Jn 3^{3-5} to discern the original form of the idea, although there are many differences in the expression: Ἐὰν μή τις γεννηθῇ ἄνωθεν, οὐ δύναται ἰδεῖν τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ θεοῦ. λέγει πρὸς αὐτὸν ὁ Νικόδημος, Πῶς δύναται ἄνθρωπος γεννηθῆναι γέρων ὤν; μὴ δύναται εἰς τὴν κοιλίαν τῆς μητρὸς αὐτοῦ δεύτερον εἰσελθεῖν καὶ γεννηθῆναι. Schwegler, Baur, Zeller, Supern. Relig., E. A. Abbott, have called attention to every deviation, but none of the theories by which they account for these is so free from difficulty as the suggestion that Justin, in an awkward way, has appropriated with gravity, as his own confirmation of Christ's words, the semi-humorous query of Nicodemus which was passed over by our Lord in silence and implied rebuke. There was probably also an echo of Mt 18^8 blended by Justin with our Lord's words in Jn 3^{3-5}. The verbal differences are conspicuous, and yet accounted for by the very common interchange of the equivalent expressions 'kingdom of God' and 'kingdom of heaven.' Justin expresses the idea of γεννηθῇ ἄνωθεν by ἀναγεννηθῆτε, which is not to be wondered at, seeing that ἄνωθεν is often interpreted by 'again,' and that numerous later writers, who quote indisputably from the Fourth Gospel, make the same modification of the text (cf. also Vulg. and AV). Another deviation, the οὐ μὴ εἰσέλθητε, in place of οὐ δύναται ἰδεῖν, may easily be the reflection of the εἰσελθεῖν of v.[5] Ezra Abbot found 69 similar deviations from the text in 46 different English divines of modern times.

Hilgenfeld and Keim admit that while the Synoptists affirm that John the Baptist was the 'voice of one crying,' Justin might have referred the exclamation to the consciousness of the Baptist by acquaintance with Jn $1^{22, 23}$ and 3^{28}. When, in Apol. i. 63, Justin declares that the Jews knew neither the Father nor the Son, he must have had Jn 8^{19} and 16^3 in his memory.

The various uses of the Prologue in the passages referred to, led even Volkmar to declare that 'the prologue of John is the primordial revelation of the Logos in its immediate majesty, and that the writings of Justin are the first attempts at a rational analysis of the contents of the revelation.' Other and later writers derived these great truths from the Prologue of St. John's Gospel; why should not Justin be allowed to have done the same?*

Albrecht Thoma (Die Genesis des Joh. Evang. p. 824) has endeavoured to show that Justin found his idea of the Logos in Philo Judæus, and that he derived nothing from the Gospel, unless it be the identification of Jesus with the incarnation of the Logos. But the objection to this suggestion is, that while the Logos of Philo receives many striking designations, such as 'High Priest,' 'Son,' 'First-Begotten,' etc., Philo never hints at the Messianic idea or the Incarnation. Nothing could be less like the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ than the Philonic God who, by His λόγος, 'eternal reason,' created or sustains the universe (see Reynolds' introd. to Gospel of John in Pulpit Comm. p. xxviii).

(B) What indications do we find of the existence of the Fourth Gospel between the latest date of Justin and that of the literary activity of Irenæus?

(1) HERACLEON is referred to by Irenæus and Hippolytus, by Clemens Alex., and above all by Origen, as a disciple of Valentinus, the great Gnostic of the middle of the century. He is probably referred to by Irenæus as one of the unnamed Gnostics who, with Ptolemæus, helped to divide the Valentinians into two groups (Ref. Hær. ii. 4, vi. 35. 29), differing on the question whether the original principle of the universe was a monad or a dyad. He did not write a formal exposition of Valentinus, but a practical exegesis of the Gospels of Luke and John, in which the doctrines of Valentinus were assumed. He writes with extreme reverence for the text of the Gospels, as if they commanded attention on the highest ground. He is one of the earliest to write a commentary on any book of the NT; and from his commentary on the Fourth Gospel, Origen quotes 50 times in his own comm., sometimes accepting Heracleon's views, more frequently contradicting them. Large extracts from the comments on the first, second, fourth, and eighth chapters are thus preserved by Origen (see 'Heracleon' in Dict. Christ. Biog. by Salmon). The method of comment is allegorical; and while the historical or natural sense is not rejected, the higher and truer meaning is found in forced analogies. But the point of interest here is, that before Irenæus, and reaching back by Heracleon's personal relations with the celebrated heresiarch to Valentinus himself, this Gospel was esteemed as of prime importance and authority in the view of heretics as well as orthodox. That Justin should not have known this document, becomes almost incredible.

(2) This conclusion grows more certain when we compare with it the testimony of Justin's pupil, TATIAN, who between A.D. 160 and 170 issued his Discourse to the Greeks, in which explicit citations are made from Jn $1^{3,5}$, and also from Jn 1^{1} 4^{24}.† After the death of Justin, Tatian held and propagated certain heterodox opinions on the subject of marriage, which he regarded as 'corruption' and whoredom. He repudiated the OT as the record of the Demiurge, in consequence of its implied sanction of polygamy. Eusebius reports that Tatian was the founder of the sect of Encratites. All that Irenæus states is that Encratites appear to have appealed to Tatian, as holding that Adam could not be saved, seeing that 'in Adam all die.' Eusebius (HE iv. 29) refers to a much more important work of Tatian's, which was a patch-work of the evangelia, compiled after a fashion he did not understand, and called τὸ διὰ τεσσάρων.* This document, said Eus., 'is in the possession of some even now.' This passing observation is the first extant reference to the Diatessaron, on which much additional light has been thrown in recent times by unexpected discoveries, and by documents the importance of which had been long overlooked. This is not the place to tell the romantic story of the several steps by which the Diatessaron to which Eusebius referred has come into our hands. We are amazed at the tenuity and tenacity of the thread of proof on which the conclusion rests that we have before us the interweaving of four distinct Gospels and no others by Tatian, and dating near the middle of the 2nd cent. Seeing that this conclusion carries with it the early and wide circulation at that date of the Fourth Gospel, it naturally excites keen criticism (see Nineteenth Century, April 1895). The second reference in Greek antiquity is that of Theodoret (Hær. i. 20), Bp. of Cyrus or Cyrrhus in E. Syria (457–8), who attributes the Diatess. to Tatian, but condemns it for the omission of the genealogies and the rejection of the evidence that Christ, according to the flesh, was born of the seed of David. Theodoret states that more than 200 copies of this work were found in his little diocese, and that he substituted for them copies of the Four Gospels (see calculations based on this fact in Norton's Genuineness of Gospels, ch. 1, touching the extensive distribution of Scripture in the 5th cent.). It appears from this that the Harmony was in all probability written in Syr., which would explain Eusebius' ignorance of its contents. This (as Fuller urges) may account for the blunder made towards the close of the fourth century by Epiphanius (Hær. 46), who had got the idea that this document was none other than the 'Gospel according to the Hebrews.' Evidently, neither Eusebius nor Epiphanius had any definite information or actual knowledge of Syr. literature. But Victor, Bp. of Capua (d. A.D. 554), came into possession of a codex of NT containing an anonymous harmony of the four Gospels, which he called Diapente, and which he was disposed to identify with a 'harmony' made from that of Ammonius of Alexandria, or from that to which Eusebius referred as constructed by Tatian. That which Victor published was a revision in terms of Jerome's Vulg., and is one of the earliest and most valuable MSS of the Vulgate. This codex of the NT Vulg. was conveyed by Boniface to Fulda, and has had bestowed upon it the name Fuldensis. As far as the Gospels are concerned, it is practically identical with the Arab. VS of Tatian's Diatessaron which has subsequently come to light. Unlike the description of Tatian's Diat., it commences with Lk 1^{1-4} and contains portions of genealogies which Tatian's did not. These are found to be alterations of the original text, by a careful comparison of the index with the MS. This Latin codex was translated into the Old Saxon dialect in alliterative verse under the name Héliand. Another link of interest is the discovery of the Homilies of Aphraates, bishop and abbot of a convent near Mosul (A.D. 336–345). They were written in Syr., and give lengthened extracts from the Diatessaron. Another interesting fragment is a treatise, the Doctrine of Addai, which contains the curious Syr.

* Kirchhofer (Quellensammlung) and Charteris (Canonicity) quote a large number of other passages from both the Apol. and Dial. which reveal greater or less resemblance to passages from every part of the Gospel.

† See Fuller's most elaborate dissertation in Dict. of Christ. Biog., as well as that of Donaldson (Hist. of Ch. Doct. and Lit. vol. iii. pp. 1–60). Both these writers carefully analyze the 'Discourse' and summarize its teachings; Fuller gives the remarkable passage in which the Fourth Gospel is quoted.

* Salmon (Introd. to NT[5], p. 74), on the authority of Mahaffy, shows that διὰ τεσσάρων may be a musical term incorrectly transferred to literature, and means a harmony of four, as διὰ πασῶν a concord of the octave, διὰ πέντε of the first and fifth notes.

legend of the Saviour's letter to king Abgarus of Edessa; and this refers to the Harmony called Ditourion = Diatessaron, which was used and read in the Syriac churches. We learn from other Syr. documents of the 12th cent., on the authority of Dionysius Bar-Salibi, that Ephraem Syrus, a deacon of Edessa, who died A.D. 373, had written a commentary on the Diatessaron of Tatian in the last ten years of his life (see Lightfoot's discussion of this belated testimony of Bar-Salibi, Contemp. Review, 1877). It is an extraordinary circumstance that two forms of this commentary are found to exist in the Armenian language. These have been collated and translated into Latin by Aucher and Moesinger. Tatian is not mentioned, but Ephraem comments upon one passage after another of the Gospels, and not infrequently upon a text which is a blending of two or more Gospels.

Zahn (1881) and Wace (see Expos. 2nd Ser. ii. 1, 128, 193; iv. 161, 294) have given a careful digest of all these passages, and the text on which Ephraem was commenting. The commentary appears to have been written in Syriac. Hamlyn Hill, assisted by Armitage Robinson, has, by comparison of Moesinger's Lat. and the Arm. text, reached a very close approximation to the words of Ephraem. Zahn has been able to arrange the text of the Diatessaron in one hundred sections, with explanatory and textual criticism, collation of the Lat., Syr., and Arm. Vulgates, and the codices A, B, etc. But a remarkable addition to the apparatus criticus has been romantically made by the examination of two Arabic MSS of the Diatessaron itself: one brought from Egypt to the Vatican Library in 1719, by Assemani, known by the title of No. XIV.; the other, also brought from Egypt to Ciasca, of the Vatican Library, and practically a repetition of No. XIV., but with important differences in detail. The collated text has been translated into Eng., and edited by Hamlyn Hill (Earliest Life of Christ, 1894; see also Hill, Dissertation on Gosp. Harmony of S. Ephraem, 1896; and Rendel Harris, Fragments of Com. of Ephrem Syrus, 1895). These translations leave no valid doubt that we have the text before us on which Ephraem commented, and which the Arab. MS avers is a translation from Syriac of the long-lost Diatessaron. A large portion of St. John's Gospel is included in the Diatessaron—a fact which establishes, if it is Tatian's collation of the four Gospels, not only the existence of the Fourth, but the esteem in which it was held between A.D. 150 and 160. The doubt cherished by many about the 'Memoirs' of Justin must therefore be abandoned. Harnack's judgment in the Encycl. Brit. (1888, xxiii. 81) is to the same effect. Watkins justly observes, 'the Diatessaron of Tatian is the key to the Memoirs of Justin' (Bamp. Lect. 71), and it certainly bridges the gulf between the literary phraseology of Justin and Irenæus.

(3) The MURATORIAN FRAGMENT, one of the earliest attempts to give a list of the books of NT, not only includes the Fourth Gospel, but, in legendary fashion, describes the circumstances under which the Apostle John was urged by Andrew and other apostles to prepare his narrative with their recognition and sanction (recognoscentibus cunctis). This testimony is extremely important, but its value depends on its date. The writer says, 'Hermas has very recently in our days written the "Shepherd" while Pius his brother was Bishop of Rome.' The earliest dates for the commencement and close of the episcopate of Pius I. are from A.D. 139–154, the latest from A.D. 141–156. It has been customary to say that the limit of the date (nuperrime temporibus nostris) cannot be put later than A.D. 170 (so Döllinger, Lightfoot, and Westcott). But Salmon* (Introd. to NT, and art. in Smith, Dict. of Biog. vol. iii.) judges differently of this limit, on the ground that the great change in the position of the Bishops of Rome with and after Pius had so long passed as to be forgotten when the unknown author penned these words, and that we cannot assume a date earlier than about A.D. 200. One of the most weighty features of the proof that the Gospel was at that moment widely prized and regarded universally in the Church as the work of the Apostle John, is the reference to the First Epistle, which the writer treats as an appendix to the Gospel, adding that John 'professes that he was not only an eye-witness, but also a hearer and writer (scriptorem . . . per ordinem 'a historian') of all the wonderful things of the Lord.' The testimony of the Fragment thus confirms the conclusion already reached by the testimonies of Theophilus, Irenæus, Tatian, Justin, and Clement of Alexandria.

(4) Our evidence may be carried still further backwards by what remains of the words or life of PAPIAS, Bp. of Hierapolis. The fragments of the works of this early Christian writer were, for the most part, preserved by Eusebius (HE iii. 36, 39).† He is there said to have been bishop of the Church of Hierapolis, and a contemporary of Polycarp the disciple of John. It is more than probable that he was born between A.D. 60 and 70, and wrote his exposition in five books about A.D. 135. The estimate which Eusebius expresses of his mental character in different pages is contradictory. In one place he is called an eminently small man, in derogation, perhaps, of some extravagantly chiliastic prophecies which he is said to have referred to the lips of our Lord. Elsewhere Eusebius describes Papias as 'well skilled in all kinds of learning, and mighty in the Scriptures.' His importance to us lies in the probable source of his information and the nature of his written work. This last appears to have consisted of comments upon the words, miracles, and prophecies of Christ, such as he was eager to obtain from those who had known the Lord ('the truth'), and he mentions 'the elders Andrew, Peter, John, Philip, Thomas, and James, Matthew and other "disciples"' as authorities, whose words came to him by direct speech of friends of his who had known the apostles; and he adds 'what Aristion and the elder John say (λέγουσιν),' as though these elders had survived the rest, and were still available for information.

It is a vain wish that we had more than the few hundred words which Eusebius has preserved. With only these fragments, it is misleading and arbitrary to argue from the silence of Papias as to what he knew of the four Gospels or the Epistles of St. Paul. The passage preserved by Eusebius is taken from the fourth book of the Expositions of Papias,—Irenæus having informed us that Papias had written five such books,—in which he confirms his interpretations by his own reminiscences of the speech of those that had known the apostles. It is worthy of special regard that the earliest witnesses and disciples of our Lord are cited in the Eusebian fragment of Papias in the very order in which they are referred to in the Fourth Gospel. Eusebius does not cite passages from Papias in proof of the authenticity of the Fourth Gospel. He adopts this course upon the principle which he follows everywhere, viz. to mention very little concerning the entirely undisputed books, but to bring confirmation from various sources of those which had, upon any ground, been rejected or disputed. In like manner he makes no reference to any of the quotations indisputably made by Irenæus or Origen from the Gospel. The silence here is a proof that Papias made abundant use of the Gospel rather than the reverse. The references to Papias' use of 1 Peter and 1 John support a further suggestion, that Papias was familiar with the Gospels of Mark (the interpreter of Peter) and John the Divine. Eusebius does not refrain (in his Chronicon ad Olymp. 220) from speaking of 'Papias the Hieropolitan, and Polycarp Bp. of Smyrna, as being known to be hearers of John the Divine and Apostle, as is declared by Irenæus and others.'

* Similarly, Zahn and Harnack.

† The only other trace of the book, 'The Exposition of the Oracles of our Lord,' is in an inventory of the books in possession of the cathedral of Nismes, dated A.D. 1218.

This particular passage raises no question about John 'the elder,' of whose existence there is no proof except this solitary comment of Eusebius upon an obscure fragment of Papias. The present writer has discussed the subject fully in Introd. to Gospel in Pulpit Com.; see also Salmon, art. 'Joannes Presbyteros,' in Dict. Chr. Biog.; Farrar in Expos. (1881) 2nd Ser. ii. 321; Haussleiter in Theol. Lit.-blatt, Sept. 25, 1896; and Gwatkin in Contemp. Rev., Feb. 1897 (cf. Expos. Times, viii. 1897, pp. 338, 416). Westcott, Lightfoot, and Gwatkin hold to the Eusebian suggestion. Delff advocated the existence of a disciple not John the Apostle, but possibly John the Presbyter, who is credited with the authorship of the Gospel, who was the disciple whom Jesus loved, and who knew more of the esoteric teaching than any of the Twelve. But the entire story of the second John is due, as many hold, to the inaccurate interpretation by Eusebius of the saying of Papias.

(5) In conjunction with Papias, it is well here to recount the testimony of POLYCARP, Bp. of Smyrna, who may be safely credited with carrying the evidence for the existence of the Gospel back to the lifetime of St. John. The letter of Irenæus to Florinus, preserved by Eusebius, HE v. 20, is charged with proof of his own personal remembrances of Polycarp. Irenæus recounts his ways, his 'personal intimacy with John and with the rest who had known the Lord.' 'The miracles and doctrine of the Lord were told by Polycarp, in consistency with the Holy Scriptures, as he received them from the eye-witnesses of the Doctrine of Salvation.' These 'Holy Scriptures' to which Irenæus refers were no other than the Gospels,—including the Fourth,—from which he made hundreds of citations in his great work. The historical character of Polycarp's visit to Rome, and of his martyrdom, has withstood all criticism. The memorable exclamation, 'Eighty and six years have I served Christ,' limits the interval between the martyrdom and birth of Polycarp. The painstaking researches of Waddington (independently confirmed by Lightfoot) give A.D. 155 as the date of the martyrdom, and therefore A.D. 69 as that of the birth, and possibly the baptism, of this venerable link between the apostles and the subapostolic Church. This would allow for Polycarp's having attained thirty years before the death of John. It is almost impossible to believe that Irenæus blundered so extravagantly as not to have found out, in the strength of his vigorous manhood, whether it was St. John himself, or another, of whom Polycarp spoke to him, in days so well remembered. The brief Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians contains an unmistakable citation of 1 Jn $4^{2.3}$: 'For every one who does not confess that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh is Antichrist, and whoso does not confess the testimony of the Cross is of the devil.' The hypothesis of Volkmar, that the author of the 1st Ep. was quoting from Polycarp, is surely discredited by the assurance that Papias also made use of 1 Jn. The authenticity of Polycarp's letter has been placed beyond question by the researches of Lightfoot (Contemp. Review, 1877, and Apost. Fathers, pt. II. vols. i. and iii.). Dale, in his Living Christ and Four Gospels, developed a striking argument from the absence of mysticism and the lack of originality displayed by Polycarp, in addition to the fact that John, whom he knew, must have written the Gospel which he accepted, and taught his disciples to regard as Holy Scripture. Even the contrast between the tone, the teaching, and the chronology of the Synoptics, and the Fourth Gospel, certainly strengthens the conclusion. This contrast has been greatly exaggerated, but nothing is more likely to have prevented a widespread hesitation as to the authenticity of the Gospel, on account of this contrast, than the assurance of such a man as Polycarp.

6. The testimonies available from CLEMENS ROMANUS and BARNABAS are handicapped by their own antiquity. This is peculiarly the case with Barnabas, in the opinion of hostile critics. But Keim has urged that Barnabas is saturated with the ideas of the Fourth Gospel.* If this can be sustained it must share, with corresponding features in the writings of St. Paul, the author of He and others, the explanation that, pari passu with the Synoptic tradition, there had from the first been widely diffused a tradition of the teaching of the beloved disciple. Such diffusion must have urged the apostle in his latest years to put into fixed form his undying memories, and greatly facilitated its acceptance in the earliest years of the 2nd cent. There are, indeed, phrases which reflect the influence of Johannine teaching in the First Epistle of Clemens Romanus. Thus, among others, ch. 49, 'He that hath love in Christ, let him do the commandments of Christ' (cf. Jn $14^{15.23}$, 1 Jn 5^{1-3}), and 'Jesus Christ our Lord gave His blood for us, by the will of God, and His flesh for our flesh, and His soul for our souls' (Jn 6^{51} and 15^{13}).

The Second (so-called) Epistle of Clement, which may be accepted, with Lightfoot, as 'an ancient homily of an unknown author,' say about A.D. 150, betrays no certain reference to either St. Paul or St. John. Still, note the tone of ch. 9: 'If Christ the Lord, who saved us, being first spirit became flesh (ἐγένετο σάρξ), and so called us, in like manner in this flesh, we shall receive our reward. Let us then love one another.' We are certainly reminded here of Jn 1^{14} and the spirit of the first Ep., or, what seems more probable, we recognize the diffusion on all sides of those aspects of our Lord's teaching which we refer to Johannine memories.

(7) IGNATIUS.—The great controversy touching the genuineness of the Ignatian letters may be regarded as having now terminated in favour of the Vossian Shorter Gr. Text, and the triumphant refutation by Lightfoot of the hypothesis of Cureton that the three short forms of the Syr. VS of the Epp. to the Romans, to Polycarp, and to the Ephesians are the sole genuine nucleus of the entire literature. If these seven letters, vouched by the Ep. of Polycarp to the Philippians to be genuine, can be regarded as the writing of the Martyr on his way to Rome, certainly not later than A.D. 116, and more probably A.D. 109, we have indubitable traces of the Fourth Gospel having already found its way from Ephesus to Antioch when the memory of St. John must have been fragrant throughout Asia Minor.

A strongly Johannine phrase, not without a special difficulty of its own, appears in the letter to the Magnesians, viii. 2: 'There is one God, who manifested Himself through Jesus Christ, His Son, who is His Logos, proceeding from σιγή, who in all respects was well pleasing to Him that sent Him.' Lightfoot has shown how this difficult term σιγή was used in the 1st cent., and thinks that Ignatius had a leaning to the early pre-Valentin. Gnosis of the period. Whatever be the text, whether we should read, 'proceeding from σιγή,' or 'not proceeding from σιγή,' a reference to the Fourth Gospel is obvious. In the letter to the Romans, vii. 2, we read, 'the living water speaking within me (or, probably truer text, 'flowing, bubbling up'), says, "Come to the Father"; I take not delight in the nourishment of corruption, nor the pleasures of this life: I desire the bread of God, which is the flesh of Jesus Christ (of the seed of David), and desire the drink of God, which is His blood, which is incorruptible love.' In this passage we have reference to Jn 4^{14} and $6^{55.\ 32.\ 33}$. In the letter to the Philadelphians, vii. 1, ix. 1, there are further echoes, and Jn 10^{7} is expressively referred to.

Before passing from this period, we may refer to the Acta Martyrii Polycarpi, the date of which shortly follows the martyrdom, and 'the letter of the Churches of Lugdunum and Vienne' preserved by Eusebius, and presumably written by Irenæus, who was the bearer of it (HE v. 1): 'Then were fulfilled the words spoken by the Lord, that "'the period should come when he that killeth you will think that he offers service to God,"' which is almost a verbal citation from Jn 16^{2}.

(8) The Epistle to Diognetus was once included among the writings of Justin. Whilst by some it has even been attributed to Scaliger, it is assigned by Nitzsch to A.D. 110–125, by Westcott to A.D. 117, by Bunsen to 135, and by Hilgenfeld to a much later period in the century. It does not therefore supply any valid evidence. Its early origin cannot, however, be disproved, and we find in it the remarkable phrase, apparently from Jn 17^{14} 'They (Christians) are not of this world.' In ch. 10 there is a nearly accurate quotation of Jn 3^{16}, and a striking interpretation of Jn 1^{1} etc. applied to the functions of the Christ. There is also a reference to 1 Jn 4^{17} in ch. 10.

(9) In the Testaments of the XII Patriarchs, a Jewish Christian puts into the mouths of the founders of the Jewish race Christian counsels and consolations. Sinker, who edits and translates it for the Ante-Nicene Lib., places it at the end of the 1st or beginning of the 2nd cent. Many now regard it as a Jewish work edited for Christian readers. The Saviour is spoken of as 'Light of the world,' 'the Son of God,' 'the only Son,' 'the Lamb of God,' and 'the Spirit of truth'; 'Sin unto death' (cf. 1 Jn 5^{16}) is referred to; 'eating of the tree of life' (Rev 2^{7})—all phrases which reveal the presence of the Johannine thought and expression.

(10) The Didaché of the Twelve Apostles may prove to be the most ancient of the post-apost. literature. It is referred to by Clement of Alexandria, who cites it as 'Scripture.' The simplicity of the style and the entire absence of any reference to the Ebionite or Gnostic heresies prove that it must have been antecedent to Irenæus or Justin.

The Ep. of Barnabas, which may have been written between A.D. 100 and 120, contains a confessed expansion of the earlier portions of the Didaché. A comparison of these related passages (see Bryennios' ed. of the Didaché and Schaff's Oldest Church Manual, where they are placed side by side, p. 228 ff.) has convinced almost all Eng. and Amer. scholars, as well as Zahn, Funk, Langen, of the priority of the Didaché.

The date of Hermas' Shepherd is very variously estimated, but, as in the case of Barnabas, what is common to the two documents is most certainly earlier than the Shepherd (Schaff, p. 233).

We are brought by the Didaché into the midst of the movements of the early Church. It contains quotations from the Gospels of Mt and Lk. Though we cannot say that the writer had the Fourth Gospel in his hands, yet Harnack admits the striking connexion between the Eucharistic prayers of chs. 9 and 10 with Jn 6 and 17.

John (1^{14}) used the remarkable word ἐσκήνωσεν to denote the dwelling in (with) us of the 'Word made flesh.' See here Did. x. 2. Christ, 'I am the true Vine, and my Father is the husbandman': cf. Did. ix. 2, 'We give thanks to Thee, our Father, for the Holy Vine of Thy servant David, which Thou hast made known through Thy servant Jesus.' Cf. also Jn 15^{15} and 17^{26} with Did. ix. 2, 3 and x. 2. There are, moreover, striking resemblances between 1 Jn $2^{5.\ 17}$ and Did. x. 5, 6. Much of this teaching obviously points to a community familiar with Johannine teaching.

(11) The use which HERMAS is supposed to have made of the four Gospels, and his adoption of the phraseology of the Fourth, have been diligently investigated by Dr. C. Taylor in his Witness of Hermas to the Four Gospels, 1892. The argument turns on the special style and method of Hermas. He translates into some synonymous or symbolic expression ideas differently phrased by Clemens II. Ancient Homily, the Didaché, or ad Diognetum. Thus in the Shepherd ἀγγελία ἀγαθή takes the place of εὐαγγέλιον. In Vision iii. and Similit. ix. the earliest suggestion of necessary fourfoldness of the Gospels corresponds with the fourfoldness with which all the universe is compacted [a theory found in Plato and Arist. Nic. Eth. I. x. 11, τετράγωνος ἄνευ ψόγου]. The four cherubic figures, the four pillars on which the Christ is seated, the Old and New Gate into the Symbolic Tower, are all supposed by Taylor to have been borrowed by Irenæus from Hermas, rather than the other way. The process by which the writer establishes scores of references by Hermas to the Fourth Gospel is a subtle one, and does not carry conviction, except perhaps as to the existence of the tetrad of Gospels a generation before Irenæus wrought out the comparison.

External evidences of the use of the Fourth Gospel by the enemies of Christianity and by well-known leaders of Gnostic heresies must not be passed over in this rapid recital. We will, in reviewing this evidence, commence with the later testimonies, and press upwards through the century.

(1) CELSUS was probably no other than Celsus the friend of Lucian, an Epicurean. He was the author of the λόγος ἀληθής to which Origen replied in the 3rd cent. He was a bitter enemy of the Christian faith, but from Origen's great work it appears that he was intimately acquainted with the four Gospels. He lived about A.D. 178, and thus shows not only that these works were beginning to be recognized as of paramount authority, but that they were known as such by heathen controversialists.

Origen (c. Celsum, i. 50) tells us that Celsus accused Christians of believing that 'the Son of God is come down from heaven' (see Jn 3^{31} 8^{23}). In i. 67 Origen quotes from Celsus, 'Thou hast made no manifestation, although they challenged thee in the temple to exhibit some unmistakable sign that thou wert Son of God' (cf. Jn 2^{18} 10^{24}). In i. 70 Celsus objected that the body of a God could not be thirsting at the well of Jacob, or eating broiled fish and honeycomb (Jn $4^{6f.}$, Lk 24^{42}). ii. 31 says that Celsus objected that Christians are in error who 'declare that the Logos is Son of God, when they present no pure and holy Logos, but a degraded man punished by scourging and crucifixion. In ii. 36 Celsus referred to the ichor flowing in the veins of the crucified; which is a reflection of Jn $19^{34.\ 35}$. The Fourth Gospel must have been widely diffused for a heathen writer about A.D. 178 to have made this use of it.

(2) We possess only a Lat. tr. of the Recognitiones of the PSEUDO-CLEMENT, made by Rufinus. The Homilies are probably the more ancient work, and are extant in Greek. The date at which this Ebionite work was produced cannot be finally determined, but the best judgment throws it into the middle of the second century. Hilgenfeld in 1850 declined to see any quotation from the Fourth Gospel. Lagarde, however, gives 15 supposed references to it. Thus, Hom. iii. 52, 'The true Prophet hath sworn "I am the gate (θύρη) of life," whoso entereth by me, entereth into the life'; and again, 'My sheep hear my voice' (cf. Jn 10^9 and 27). In Hom. xi. 26, 'Except ye be born again of or in living water (ὕδατι ζῶντι) unto the name of the Father, Son, Holy Spirit, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of the heavens' (cf. Jn 3^5). In 1853 Dressel discovered the xixth Homily, where, in ch. 22, occurs an almost verbal quotation of Jn $9^{2.3}$. Hilgenfeld yielded to this evidence, which makes Baur's date for the Gospel finally incredible. There is, doubtless, little agreement between the spirit and teaching of the Gospel and the Clementines, which makes the evidence still more remarkable.

(3) Montanus and Montanism also suffer as evidence by the uncertainty as to their date. The disproportionate space given to this theme in Eusebius, HE v., does not clearly fasten the rise of this Phrygian heresy to a distinct period, though giving the names and a sketch of the writers, Miltiades, Apollonius, etc., who contended with it in the reign of Commodus, 180 ff. Some have fixed on 140—Gieseler on 150—others 157, others 180. Salmon looks to the 3rd cent. for the origin of the heresy. If the earlier date should be finally established, the evidence becomes clear that John's Gospel must have been taken as a record of the valedictory discourse, for Montanus chose therefrom the term Paracletus, 'the other Comforter,' as referring to no other than to himself; actually claiming that our Lord prophesied his (Montanus') appearance in the fulness of time. Theodoret also says that Montanus made a similar use of the terms Λόγος and Νυμφίος.

(4) Marcion admittedly makes no reference or allusion to the Fourth Gospel, but Tertullian (adv. Marc. iv. 3) shows that Marcion uses Gal 2 to justify his rejection of gospels supposed to be apostolic, because they were apostolic, not because they were not so. Tertullian (de Carne Christi, ch. iii.), while arguing against the hyperspiritualism of Marcion, says, 'If thou hadst not rejected the writings opposed to thy system, the Gospel of John would be there to convince thee.' Surely the Fourth Gospel is more explicit than are the Synoptics in asserting the full humanity of the Lord Jesus. Marcion reached Rome in A.D. 140, and we are thus allowed to assume an earlier and wide diffusion of the various gospels which he rejected and mutilated to serve the purposes of his own system of philosophy.

(5) Valentinus, the poet-philosopher of Gnostic theosophy, with his disciples Ptolemæus and Heracleon, Theodotus and Marcus, formed an important school of thought, pervading the 2nd cent. He appeared in Rome between A.D. 135–160, having been before this in Alexandria, and is said to have died in Cyprus A.D. 160. Tertullian tells us that he made use of the whole of the instrumentum, i.e. books of NT (de Præscr. Hær. 38). Irenæus, about A.D. 182, wrote his great work (adv. Hær.) in part to meet and refute the eclectic errors of Valentinus and his school. Hippolytus wrote his Refutation of all Heresies in the same spirit, and they both quote from the master and his disciples, not always accurately discriminating them. Now, as we have seen (cf. p. 697a), Heracleon [said by Clem. Alex. to have been well known to Valentinus] composed a comm. upon considerable portions of John's Gospel, extracts from which are preserved by Origen. These passages show that a disciple of Valentinus treated the Fourth Gospel as of divine authority. Ptolemæus also, in a letter of his addressed to Flora and preserved by Epiphanius (adv. Hær. xxxiii. 3–7), quotes Jn 1^{1-3} and Jn $1^{2\text{-}7}$. Indeed, Irenæus positively assures us that Valentinus and his disciples 'abundantly make use of the Gospel'; and Hippolytus confirms this by a perverted use of Jn 10^8, which he attributes to Valentinus himself,—with the formula φησί rather than φασίν,—and cites also, as from Valentinus, the Johannine phrase, 'the Prince of this world,' 6^{52}. But the entire system of 'Æons,' and their 'Syzygies' or couples, which make up the Ogdoad and the Pleroma, is marked by the use of such terms as Πατήρ, Λόγος, Φῶς, Ζωή, Ἀλήθεια, Μονογενής, Παράκλητος, with others; it is clear that this cannot be accidental: either 'John' built upon Valentinus, or Valentinus, finding these terms in a book believed to be of sacred authority, utilized them for his own purposes. Putting the simple, natural, and religious use of these terms in the prologue of the Gospel and elsewhere, over against the highly technical and theosophical use of them in the system of Valentinus, it becomes clear that the heresiarch himself was familiar with the Fourth Gospel. In this conclusion, Bleek, Keim, Bunsen agree, as against Davidson and Sup. Rel. Thoma (p. 822) admits that the dependence of the Valentinian school upon the Gospel is not chronologically or dogmatically impossible, though indemonstrable.

(6) Basilides and the Basilidians. Basilides, whose work and system preceded that of Valentinus, both at Alexandria and Rome, is named by numerous writers—Epiphanius, Jerome (de Viris Ill. ch. xxi.), Hippolytus (vii. 8), and Eusebius (HE iv. 7) who places his period in the days of Hadrian (117–138) and speaks with intense abhorrence of his impieties and his inventions and asceticism. He does not refer to his doctrine. Hippolytus speaks of the claim made by the followers of Basilides that he had received special instructions from Matthias, one of the disciples of our Lord (Ac 1^{24}). Whether there may or may not be any truth in this report, at any rate it gives early antiquity to their father and founder. Epiphanius (Hær. xxiii. 1-7, xxiv. 1) attributes to B. a period of activity in Antioch before his appearance in Alexandria or Rome. If Basilides quoted from the Fourth Gospel, the origin of that precious document is thrown back to the earliest days of the century, and, as has already been urged, into the lifetime of the apostle. Now it is very probable that Hippolytus, in writing his great book (Ref. Hær. vii. 22), had the work of Basilides open before him, and that he referred to the master and to his school by his accustomed method of citation, φήσι for the former, while he used φασίν, or κατ' αὐτούς or λέγουσι for the latter. If the whole of this passage is read (see Eng. tr. in A.N. Lib.), little doubt can remain in any candid mind that Hippolytus was quoting two passages as cited by Basilides himself from Jn 1^9 and 2^4. (See also Matthew Arnold, God and the Bible, p. 268; Mangold-Bleek, Einleitung, 265; Watkins, Bamp. Lectures, p. 365).

(7) The Oriental Gnostics, Ophites, Naassenes, Peratæ (Bunsen's Hippolytus and his Age, see Introd. to St. John, xli. 11, by Reynolds), made, according to Hippolytus, abundant use of the Fourth Gospel. We cannot depend on his citations as representing the verbal use of the Gospel made by any specific section or leader of these extreme dualists. So great was their antagonism to the OT that they took the very name of the serpent, nahash (Heb.) or ophis (Greek), as their ideal of intelligence and emancipation. What recent investigation has shown is, not that we must carry down the Pastoral Epistles or Colossians or the Fourth Gospel till after the days of Marcion for proof of the prevalence of these dualistic ideas, but that ideas of the kind were prevalent as early as the activity of St. Paul, who combated them at Corinth and Ephesus, and that the author of the Apoc. encountered them at Thyatira and elsewhere in Asia. Godet has treated the 'Christ party' in the Corinthian Church as those who sharply separated between 'Jesus' and 'the Christ'—who could accept the heavenly Christ, but repudiate the genuine incarnation, crucifixion, or resurrection; who could even anathematize Jesus, and claim special knowledge of, and union with, the Christ. The existence of such a party reveals the presence of these Gnostic tendencies in the middle of the 1st century. Consequently, we have no occasion to wait till the middle or end of the century to find the occasion for the protest against dualism discoverable in the Fourth Gospel.

There is one exception to the uniform result of these researches into the religious ideas of the century. A shadowy sect or people, called by Epiphanius Ἄλογοι [i.e. persons destitute of sound sense], Hær. II. i. 57, had manifested some antagonism to the Logos-Gospel. Epiph. is amused with the pun which he has perpetrated to their discredit, and hopes that it will stick to them. The objections which they raised were not of a philosophical or religious character, but had to do with chronological difficulties which the number of passovers suggests, the close association in which the highest dignity of Christ is placed with His presence at a wedding feast, and, further, the absurd statement that the Gospel had been produced, not by the disciple whom Jesus loved, but by Cerinthus. Tradition certainly has made John and Cerinthus contemporary, and this tradition is confirmed by the supposition of these 'stupid' people, that the Gospel had been written by Cerinthus. The views of Cerinthus leaned towards Ebionitism; the whole teaching of the Fourth Gospel is that the Christ came down from heaven.

It is with amazement we read in Reuss, History of NT, p. 233, 'The unspeakable pains that has been taken to collect external evidence only shows that there is none in the proper sense of the term.' We do not wish to accept evidence that would not be accepted elsewhere, but the proofs of the existence of the Fourth Gospel seem as cogent as those that are advanced for any books of the NT, to say nothing of the most celebrated patristic or classical masterpieces.

Our conclusion is that we discern the first indications of its appearance in the wide diffusion of Johannine ideas in the epistles of Barnabas and Clement, Ignatius and Polycarp, the Epistle to Diognetus, and the Didaché. We have pseudepigraphical literature like the Test. of XII Patriarchs and the Clementines, early heretics and dualists like Basilides and Valentinus quoting from its pages and falsely utilizing its authority. Nay, we actually find some of them commenting at length upon considerable portions of the Gospel. There is not only abundance of such evidence outside the pale of the Church, but the celebrated Christian philosopher, Justin Martyr, in quoting from 'The Memoirs of the Apostles and those that followed them,' has preserved a large number of the apothegms of Jesus; and that these must have been taken from the Gospel becomes almost demonstrated by the romantic discovery, not only of Tatian's Address to the Greeks, but also of the Diatessaron, where the largest part of the Fourth Gospel is interwoven with the other three. Within 20 years of this date we have the clear testimonies of Irenæus, Theophilus of Antioch, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian, and then that of Athenagoras, and the Muratorian Canon, frequently cementing the fragmentary relics of the century. Even Keim admits that the evidence is as strong as for any other of the Gospels. Not one of these reminiscences or citations was placed where it has been found for the sake of the modern apologist. It is simply marvellous that the elements of the testimony should thus have been drawn together from such a number of sources within the compass of a century.

III. Canonicity of the Fourth Gospel.—There is sufficient evidence that this Gospel is among the least disputed components of the earliest collection of documents. The Apoc., 2 P, 2 and 3 Jn, are missing from the Peshitta. In the Old Lat. belonging to the 2nd cent., He, 2 P, and Ja are wanting. The Mur. Canon does not contain a reference to Hebrews, unless it be identified with the Letter to the Alexandrians; and the reference to 2 and 3 Jn is dubious. The document is incomplete or mutilated, and does not contain explicit mention of the Gospels of Mt or Mk. Yet all these early indications of a list of NT books contain the Gospel of John. The same may be said of Origen's list (184–253). And Eusebius' Canon, which placed among the antilegomena Ja, 2 P, Jude, 2 and 3 Jn, and reckoned the Apoc. spurious (νόθην), contained the Fourth Gospel. The earliest codices of the 4th cent. (B, ℵ), the Canon of Athanasius and all those of the ecclesiastical councils, also include it. These facts establish widespread and ancient conviction as to the sacred character and authority of this document.

IV. Internal Evidence for the Authorship.—The familiar process by which the question of the authorship of the Fourth Gospel is limited and decided must now be briefly recounted in the light of the fresh treatment it has received at the hands of Wendt, Ewald, Weizsäcker, Beyschlag, Cross, Delff, and Sanday.

a. The author, whoever he may have been, was essentially a Jew.—From beginning to end he is saturated with Heb. and OT ideas, though they are illumined from within by the new and heavenly light which broke upon him through direct contact with Jesus.

i. The inner sources and main tendencies of the author's thought are to be found in the OT; and his quotations from it in independent freedom, even from the current Gr. VSS, are hardly now in dispute. The whole argument of the Prologue is a prophetic foreshortening of the history of 'His own,' and their age-long refusal to admit to the full the highest revelation of the Eternal. Note also the reference to the hope of the Prophet who should make all things clear, and to the Elijah of the new dispensation (1^{21} 4^{25}), our Lord's zeal for the sanctity of the temple (2^{13-20}), his familiarity with OT history (3^{14}), the ascription to Jesus by John the Baptist of the function of the Bridegroom of the true Israel, an idea which frequently appears in ancient oracles (Jer 2^{2}, Ezk 16^{8}, Hos $2^{19.\ 20}$). The writer's references to the feasts of the Jews, the passovers (chs. 2, 6, 12, 18), the unnamed feast (ch. 5) which may or may not be a passover, the feast of tabernacles (ch. 7), the feast of dedication (ch. 10), show the region of his religious ideas. He alludes to the special ceremonial of the feast of tabernacles in the pouring of water and illumination of the temple. The same conclusion may be drawn from his numerous references to Moses (1^{7} 5^{45} 7^{22}), and Abraham (ch. 8); from the great authority attributed to the law, and even from the verbal criticism of the Psalms (ch. 10); from the declaration that 'the Scriptures cannot be broken'; and especially from the fourteen passages quoted from OT. Five of these are attributed to our Lord, seven are made by the Evangelist, two by other speakers (see Turpie, Old Test. in the New; Westcott, Introduction in Speaker's Comm. p. xiii; Sanday, Expositor, March 1892, p. 178 ff.). Four of these agree with the accurate tr. in the LXX. Some, however, are in closer agreement with the Heb. against the LXX. Thus Jn 19^{37} 'They shall look on him whom they pierced' (=Zec 12^{10}) instead of 'insulted.' This tr. is found also in Rev 1^{7}, and is a curious link of linguistic correspondence between the Gospel and Apoc. It is found also in Justin, and in the versions of Theod., Symm., and Aquila. This does not necessarily imply that the author was utilizing his personal knowledge of Heb., but that more accurate translations of Zec than that of LXX existed. Cf. with this Jn 6^{45} (=Is 54^{13}); and especially 13^{18} (=Ps 41^{9}) 'He that eateth bread with me has lifted up his heel against me.' Here the Gospel stands alone, the four other extant Gr. VSS differing from each other. The passage 12^{40}, quoted accurately from LXX, where this version fairly represents Heb. in Mt and Ac, is different from both authorities in our Gospel. There is no case where this Gospel agrees with LXX against the Hebrew. These peculiarities indicate knowledge of the original Scriptures. Besides these phenomena of translation, let it be observed that the author is acquainted with a majority of the OT books, the historical books, Psalms, Proverbs, and both parts of Isaiah. He is familiar with the history of Abraham, Jacob, Moses, and David, with the brazen serpent, with circumcision, with the manna in the wilderness, and with OT similitude and doctrine.

ii. A point upon which the opponents of the Johannine authorship have laid much emphasis is the writer's use of the term 'the Jews,' as of a hostile party from whom he was separated, e.g. 'the purifying of the Jews' (2^{6}), 'the passover of the Jews' (2^{13}), 'a feast of the Jews' (5^{1} 6^{4}), 'the manner of the Jews is to bury' (19^{40}). But the writer is here conveying no reproach, but explaining to Gentiles events of his early life. Doubtless 'the Jews' are discriminated from the ὄχλος of Galilæans as hostile to Jesus, but the writer calls special attention to Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews, to Joseph, and to those of οἱ ἴδιοι who received Him, as well as to the πολλοί who 'believed on Him.' He says that Jesus made more disciples in Judæa than John (4^{1}), and in a most emphatic way that Jesus recognized that σωτηρία is from the Jews. Cf. the difficult passage (4^{43-45}), where Jesus is said to regard the land of Judæa as 'his own country.' Even ch. 5, which discloses the enmity of 'the Jews' to our Lord's interpretation of the Sabbath (cf. ch. 9), is penetrated throughout with the Jewish ideas of the Sabbath, of the Scriptures, and of Moses. The dramatic episodes of chs. 7–10 reveal great antagonism on the part of the mob in Jerus. and the Jewish authorities to the teaching and mandate of Jesus, but the conversations display the author's intimate knowledge of Jewish law, alike of the Sabbath and of circumcision (7^{23}), and the Jewish idea of the διασπορά. And these three or four chapters are replete with assurances that 'many believed on him,' while 8^{31} speaks of 'the Jews that had believed him.'

Again, when Jesus speaks of 'their law' and 'your law,' which Pharisees and Sadducees had misinterpreted, it is as one who is bringing to their memory what they and not He had forgotten

Moreover, not infrequently, by the term 'the Jews' the writer evidently means to denote technically the ruling powers in State and Church, the Sanhedrin in its pride, in opposition to the pilgrims from Galilee or from the 'Dispersion.'

One passage from the 'Jewish' Gospel of Mt (28[15]) shows an analogous use of the οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι. See also Lk 23[37]. St. Paul's use of the term is well known, and must have familiarized men in Ephesus, Corinth, and Thessalonica with it, without suggesting for a moment that he was not a 'Hebrew of Hebrews.'

iii. The author is by many opponents of the genuineness of the Gospel allowed to be of Jewish origin and sympathy, but not a Palestinian Jew. He is supposed to have belonged to Alexandria or Ephesus, otherwise, they contend, he would never have made so many errors of a topographical or historic kind. The most serious charge is his reference to Bethany beyond Jordan (1[28] RV). But it is clear that the author was not confounding this Bethany with that near Jerusalem. And if there were two Bethsaidas, two Canas, two Antiochs, and two Cæsareas, why not two Bethanys? Origen, it is true, had not recognized the site, and probably suggested the Bethabara of AV which is found with variants in some MSS. Caspari has located it N. of the Sea of Galilee; Conder, nearly S.E. of the Sea, far above the traditional site and much nearer to Cana of Galilee. Then the reference to the Pool of Siloam (Jn 9[7]) has been triumphantly confirmed by recent discovery. The mention of 'Ænon near Salim,' of Ephraim in the wilderness, and of 'Sychar' near Shechem, has been remarkably confirmed by recent research. In association with this may be classed the picturesque reference to the brook Kidron (18[1]); the 'gabbatha' of the Roman governor, with its Aram. name (19[13]); 'Solomon's porch' (10[23]); 'the treasury in the temple' (8[20]); the scenery and various nomenclature of the Sea of Galilee; and possibly the decoration of the temple courts by the golden vine (14[31] 15[1-7]).

These indications of personal knowledge have been disputed as evidence of the author's Pal. origin, because the writer might have visited Palestine and picked up, like the author of the 'Apocr. Gospel of Matthew,' a multitude of small details. So esp. Cross (Westminster Rev., Aug. 1890, p. 177). It is enough to refer to Sanday's complete reply in Expos., March 1892, p. 163.

Frequent use is made of the supposed ignorance of the writer touching the appointment of the Jewish high priest, illustrated by the statement that Caiaphas held the office 'in that year,' as though the sacerdotium had been an annual appointment. But the evangelist speaks of Annas being high priest in the very 'same year' in which Caiaphas delivered the unconscious prophecy of the effect of the death of Jesus (11[49]). Moreover, St. Luke, both in the Gospel (3[2]) and in the Acts (4[6]), speaks of Annas and Caiaphas as 'high priests.' Annas had been deposed by the Roman procurator in favour of his son-in-law Caiaphas. His influence was great, though not officially recognized by Pilate; and therefore the evangelist, who was known to the family of the high priest, in giving the account of the preliminary examination by Annas, says that Jesus was sent bound by Annas to Caiaphas the high priest, from whom alone Pilate would have accepted the official charge of the Sanhedrin. The phrase 'that same year' reflects the absorbing interest of that year in which the highest court in the nation rejected and delivered over to the Gentiles the Incarnate Son of God. (See Pulp. Com. Introd. p. xl, and notes on 11[49] 18[13. 19. 23. 24]).

Efforts have been made to relegate some of the most characteristic teaching of the Fourth Gospel and First Ep. of the same writer to the dominant influence of Philo Judæus of Alexandria. Lücke, Bleek, Baur, Keim, Schürer, Alb. Thoma, and many others have laid great emphasis on this filiation of ideas. But Siegfried has found the same influence abundantly evident in St. James, in Ep. to Heb., and in St. Paul. Luthardt, Godet, Pressensé, and others disclaim any relation, direct or indirect, on the part of St. John with the philosophy of Philo or his school. Even Keim and S. Davidson contend for the originality of the Fourth Gospel, pre-eminently in its teaching regarding the incarnation of the Son of God and its doctrine of the Messiah. The phraseology current in the Alex. school consists of important terms also used in the Johannine writings, i.e. not only Logos, but Light, Life, Truth, the Paraclete, the Archon, the Pleroma, the μονογενής and πρωτότοκος, 'only-begotten' and 'first-born.' These terms are used to denote the relation and mediation of the Divine Essence to the κόσμος, and part at least of the process by which all things have come into being. Philo endeavoured to utilize the speculation and phrases of both Plato and the Stoics in order to expound the teaching of the Pentateuch, but the amalgam was uncertain and really valueless. No one finally accepted these high-flown allegories of 'law,' or of 'narrative,' any more than they did the Stoic interpretation of the Homeric poems. It is, however, true that the place which, about the same time, St. Paul had in Co, Gal, and Col assigned to 'Christ' and 'the Son' and the 'Rock in the wilderness,' Philo had assigned to the 'Logos.' So, too, 'the heavenly bread' is explained by Philo as the manifestation of the Logos; and other terms in He 1[1-3], and the 'Wisdom' of the Psalms, and in the Sapiential Books, are by Philo similarly correlated with the Logos. There are, however, strong reasons for disputing either a verbal or a philosophical dependence of the author of the Fourth Gospel on the Alex. theosophy.

(a) The twofold meaning of the term 'Logos.' In Greek this represents not only, as in Philo, the Reason and Self-consciousness, the rationality of a thing or person, but also 'the word,' the expression, the process by which a revelation can be made or ratiocination carried into effect. The same ambiguous word is used for the Reason and the Word of both God and man. There are those who say that they are but the reverse and obverse sides of the same reality. At any rate, the same term is used by Philo for the archetypal reason and by 'John' for the creative energy, the divine personal nature, the source of life and light in man, which is at length incarnated in humanity, the glory of God revealed, full of grace and truth, the only-begotten and beloved of the Father, able to declare Him.*

(b) The Philonic Logos is in no sense personal. The Logos is often identified with the 'world,' as 'intelligible,' the 'image' of God in the universe; 'by His Logos, God is both governor and good.' True, Philo spoke of the Logos who, in place of the Angel of the Lord, brought back Hagar to Sarah (de Cher. p. 108), but by Hagar he meant not the woman Hagar, typical or historic, but 'human arts and science, brought back to the true virtue.' Numerous illustrations of the same method constantly recur. There is no personality in the Logos of Philo, such as we find adumbrated in the Books of Job or Wis, and, in another form, in 'the Son' of the Fourth Gospel, the 'Christ' of St. Paul, and the ἀπαύγασμα of God in He 2[3].

(c) The doctrine of Messiah was ignored by Philo,

* Schürer (HJP II. iii. 340–368) has more fully given to Philo's Logos the quality of word.

and that of the incarnation of the Logos was abhorrent to the whole Neo-Platonic school.

(d) To the phraseology of Philo some curious analogies are found in the Fourth Gospel, but by Siegfried (l.c.) many similar ones have been found in all the books of NT. Even the Ep. of Ja, the Targums, and the Synop. Gospels (Pulp. Com. Introd. p. xlix) are supposed to reflect Philo's influence. But this phraseology is kindled into entirely new meaning by the Word made flesh,—cf. 'love,' 'faith,' 'righteousness,' 'life eternal,'—and the use of it does not in the least degree establish a non-Pal. origin for the author of the Fourth Gospel. Thoma's eloquent enumeration of the titles and glories of Philo's Logos vanishes as an anticipation of the Fourth Gospel when it is found that these are only tropical phrases for the discipline through which souls are passing to the rest of a true philosophy.

(e) The true origin of the ideas and phraseology of the Fourth Gospel is to be sought in the OT. St. Paul and St. John found their material in the books which they had studied from their youth, and in the traditional interpretations of the Pal. schools. The spoken word is throughout Gn 1 the creative agency, the mediator between the Eternal and the 'cosmos.' In Ps 33^6 and 147^5 'the word of J″' is approximately personified for the same purpose. The personifications, moreover, of the direct activity of J″ under the form of Memra or Debra of the Lord in the Targums, though they cannot attest a literary usage answering to the Prologue of 'John,' indirectly reveal a mental tone in the Aram. schools, out of which the Johannine representation sprang. The same remark may be made touching 'the Angel of J″,' distinct from the created angels, who makes His appearance throughout the OT, and suggests awful and sublime depths in the bosom of the Divine Essence. The phrase is used as Logos is used, interchangeably with Deity and invested with all J″'s glory. Kurtz in his Old Covenant has criticised this, his earlier view (appx. of Eng. tr.); but see Westcott (Introd.), Liddon (Divinity of our Lord). Cf. also art. ANGEL, vol. i. p. 94.

Philo used to refer the manifestations of the Angel of J″ to the operations of the Logos and to specialized functions of the human mind; the apostles found in this mysterious phraseology an age-long witness to the possibility of an incarnation.

Perhaps nothing more than a personification of wisdom can be found in Pr, Job, or the Sapiential Books, but this method of presentation reappears in the Epistles of Paul to the Corinthians and in those to the Colossians and Ephesians.* See also He $1^{1.2}$, from which it is clear that ideas of the Son, robed in phraseology of the Sapiential Books descriptive of wisdom, are independent of the treatment of the Alex. philosophy, and also of the author of the Fourth Gospel. With this may be compared the almost extreme Johannine phrases of Mt 11 and Lk 10. Where could these writers have obtained these notions except from the widely diffused traditions and holy memories of the apostles themselves? Thoma has done service in demonstrating the remarkable resemblance between the root-ideas of St. Paul and the Fourth Gospel. Beyschlag, in his Theology of NT, vol. i., has endeavoured with success to show the identical basis of the Synoptic and Johannine ideas of the relation between the Father and Son, the Father and Christ. Yet it is very noteworthy that 'John' uses a term from Gr. philosophy to which he attached a profoundly different sense from Philo, and to which the other sacred writers have not attained. It is almost a demonstration that he was a Palestinian, not an Alexandrian Jew.

β. The writer claims to have been an eye-witness and ear-witness of that which he describes. Numberless unconscious touches, without any theological bias in them, reveal the indelible impression left upon the writer of what he had seen and heard. E.g. observe the numerous indications of 'day' and 'hour' when that which he recorded took place ($1^{29.35.39.43}$ 2^1 3^2 $4^{43.52}$ $6^{16.22}$ $12^{1.12}$ $13^{1.30}$ 18^{28} 20^1, and many others).

In 1^{14} and in 1 Jn 1^1 he puts himself in the position of those disciples who beheld His glory, and in 19^{35} he lays the strongest emphasis on the testimony he was personally able to bear to a great sign which accompanied the piercing of the side of the dead Christ. The fact that the author speaks of himself in the third person under the term ἐκεῖνος is in keeping with other tacit references to himself elsewhere, and with a similar usage of ἐκεῖνος, referring to the subject of the sentence, in 9^{37}. The writer indicates throughout intimate acquaintance with the secret fears, thoughts, murmurs, and questionings of the innermost circle of the disciples. He knows what they thought at the time, and how they subsequently modified their views (1. $2^{11.21.22}$ 12^{16}); he records the conversations with Nathanael, Andrew, Philip (chs. 1–6); the questions of Peter, Thomas, Judas Alphæi, Philip, in the valedictory discourse, together with remarks of his own; he gives indications of the blank ignorance of the disciples themselves with reference to the great utterances of their Lord (4^{33} $6^{70.71}$ $11^{7.8.16}$ 16^{17}); the innermost mind of Peter at the feet-washing ($13^{6-11.22}$); the ignorance on the part of all of the deep significance of Scripture (20^9); and the conversations with Thomas (20^{24-29}).

He is, moreover, acquainted with the very thoughts and motives of Jesus Himself ($2^{24.25}$ 4^1 5^6 $7^{1.6}$ $13^{18ff.}$); he gives a whole group of condensed perceptions of the blended divinity and humanity of our Lord which were flashed upon his consciousness by the Saviour's work and conduct (cf. 18^4–19^{28}). He certainly suggests himself as the unnamed disciple of the Baptist and of our Lord (ch. 1); and we feel that he must have been an auditor of the conversations with Nicodemus and the Samaritan woman, and with the nobleman in chs. 3. 4. Caspari's interesting suggestion that he had a house in Jerus., connected with the fish trade between that city and the lake, would explain his presence in Jerus. (ch. 5), and his intimate knowledge of what occurred (ch. 6) in 6^{17}. There is an unconscious revelation of his presence in the words, 'Now Jesus was not yet come to them.' We do not see any animosity to Peter's prominence. He is one of the two whom Jesus loved (20^2). We owe to his constant clinging to Jesus the details of the trial before Annas, the private converse with Pilate, and the words from the Cross which intrusted the Mother to his care ($19^{25.26}$).

The closing scenes of ch. 21, with the appendix by the survivors, leaves it without doubt that the writer was one of the disciples whom Jesus loved, but not Simon Peter. Those present at the Sea of Galilee ($21^{1.2}$) are Peter, distinguished from the unnamed disciple (v.^{20}); Thomas and Nathanael, who are elsewhere mentioned by name; the two sons of Zebedee; and two other of His disciples. Now, James the brother of John was slain (Ac $12^{1.2}$). It follows that the 'beloved disciple' who, in the Epilogue, is accredited with the authorship, must either have been John the son of Zebedee, or one of the two unnamed disciples. Andrew and Philip are conceivably hinted at, but, seeing they are elsewhere mentioned by name, it is not probable: and since the two are mentioned last, it is more in accordance with the usage of the writer to understand that they did not belong to the number of the eleven apostles.

* See Watkins in Smith's *DB*2 p. 1755, who also shows the link between OT and Fourth Gospel in many other particulars of 1 P.

The opinion that John, who is frequently referred to in the Synoptic Gospels and in the Acts (Ac 3^{1} 4^{13} 8^{14-15}; cf. Gal 2^{9}) in conjunction with Peter or with his brother (in Synop.) as at the very centre of the apostolic group, is not the disciple who produced this wonderful narrative, brings an anomalous circumstance to view: that the author, whoever he was, never once mentions the name of John. If he was some philosophic mystic of the 2nd cent., he must have deliberately invented the innumerable touches of the eye-witness, which he introduced with such apparent artlessness, with the view of suggesting that he was no other than 'the beloved disciple.' This supposition is so harsh that it cannot be accepted without more cogent reasons than those which have hitherto been advanced. Delff (Grundzüge d. Entwick.-Gesch. d. Relig. 1883, p. 266) has argued that the beloved disciple was a friend of Joseph and Nicodemus and the high priest, resident in Jerus., familiar with the Jerus. life of Christ, and from his education, higher than that of the Twelve, better able to appreciate and work into his matchless narrative the deeper teaching of Jesus. In that case some incongruities that have afflicted critics would be dissolved, but many fresh difficulties would be created, e.g. the utter disappearance of this remarkable personage from evangelic tradition; his acquaintance with Peter, Andrew, Philip and Thomas, Judas Alphæi and Judas Iscariot, Nathanael, Martha, Lazarus, and the Marys, to whom he has referred, together with his utter silence about 'John,' who took so high a place in the early development of the Church in the NT and early tradition. It is incumbent upon the student to weigh the indications which other literature supplies of the character and personality of John the son of Zebedee, and to see whether they are incompatible with the revelation which the writer has unconsciously offered of himself in the composition of the Fourth Gospel.

It must, however, be acknowledged that the self-revelation is studiously repressed. He never distinctly utters his own name, or that of his parents, or of his brother. He allows others to speak for him, and he hides himself behind the shadow of his Lord, and loses himself in the light of his Master's love. We can gather here and there what he thought of 'the Jews,' of the high priest, of Judas and Pilate. We can gather the interpretation he put upon certain perplexing sayings of the Lord, so different from their own lofty tone and fathomless depths, which he was nevertheless able to remember and record. But for the most part he conceals his own individuality.

V. The Character and Career of John as preserved in other Literature. — A. The Synoptic Gospels tell us that a man named Zebedee (Mk $1^{19.\ 20}$) with his wife Salome had two sons, James and John, that they lived at Bethsaida, near Capernaum, on the Lake of Galilee, and were partners with Simon and Andrew the sons of Jonah (or of John, see RV and crit. notes on 1^{42} and $21^{15.\ 16}$) in a fishing enterprise (Mk 1^{29}, Lk 5^{10}). They had fishing-tackle, boats, hired servants, and a house. We gather from comparing Mt 27^{56} and Mk 15^{40} that Salome was the name of the mother of Zebedee's children. The Fourth Gospel makes it more than possible that she was sister of the mother of Jesus, and, if this inference is correct, she and her sons were nearly related to Jesus. Zebedee accepted, without recorded murmur, the departure of his sons and of his partners Simon and Andrew at the summons of Jesus to them. The father thenceforth disappears from view. Salome's devotion and ministry of her substance to the wants of Jesus and His disciples, suggest the religious enthusiasm and Messianic patriotism with which the family had been brought up, and it is probable that, through friendship and kinship with the holy society of Nazareth, her expectations had been raised to fever-point. Whether John was called into close companionship with Jesus only once for all, or on two or three separate occasions, belongs to the exegesis and harmony of the Gospels. Matthew (20^{20}) tells us that Salome presented a request of great compass and audacity, that her two sons might sit on the Saviour's right and left hand when He should come in His kingdom. It is most likely that she cherished ideas of a temporal and visible sovereignty; and that John at this period had not been weaned from these materialistic hopes. We gather, however, that the brothers were taught some lessons about the great tribulation, the baptism of sorrow and blood through which they would have to pass to such high fellowship with the Head of the kingdom.

For years before this, John had been in the innermost circle of Christ's disciples (Mt 10^{2}, Lk 6^{14}, Mk 3^{7}, Ac 1^{13}). He had been in the death-chamber of the child of Jairus (Mk 5^{37}, Lk 8^{51}). He had been taken into the cloud of transfiguration (Mt 17^{1}, Mk, and Lk), though Peter was the spokesman of the feelings of the three. The two brothers James and John, with Simon and Andrew, had been permitted to hear the discourse upon the last things, which had opened John's prophetic eye to the great world-wide events with which his Master's kingdom was associated. John was sent with Peter to prepare the passover. With Peter and James, he was a witness of the agony in the garden. There is not a word or a hint in all this incompatible with the spirit of the author of the Fourth Gospel.

We do not know why James and John were called by Jesus 'Boanerges.' There must have been something special in the courage and bearing or in the character of James which signalled him out to Herod Agrippa as a victim that would 'please the Jews' (Ac $12^{2ff.}$). It is probable that, being the elder of the two brothers, he was the more prominent petitioner for the coveted dignity of nearness to the King of Sorrows when approaching the goal of His self-sacrifice. A significant record occurs in Mk $9^{38ff.}$ and Lk $9^{49ff.}$, where John himself exclaims, 'Master, we saw one casting out demons in thy name, and we forbade him, because he followeth not (thee) with us.' The question seems to invite the rebuke he received, 'Forbid him not, etc. . . .' This was an event which revealed a jealous love for the Master, and it is paralleled by the spirit which flames forth in the treatment of those enemies of the cross with whom the author of the second and third Epistles contended. But the most striking instance of this spirit is recorded in Lk $9^{54.\ 55}$, where John as well as James burned with indignation against certain Samaritans who refused to receive Jesus. 'Master, said they, willest thou that we call fire from heaven to consume them, even as Elias did?' Here again the two brothers are rebuked. The apostle of love is traditionally accredited with a similar outburst of indignant wrath in his treatment of Cerinthus. The current mediæval representation of the author of the Fourth Gospel was that of one characterized by effeminate softness. This popular conception is not justified by the letter of the Gospel, but is due to tradition and legend. In no part of NT do we find such thrilling utterance of the wrath of God against sin as in Jn. (See $3^{18.\ 19}$ 3^{36} 5^{29}). It is in Jn 6^{70} that Judas is called 'a devil'; cf. also 7^{34} $8^{23.\ 24.\ 44.}$ 9^{39}. Even in the upper chamber, we hear terrible tones of the Judge of all the earth, and the traitor is called 'the son of perdition' (15^{25} 16^{1-3} 17^{12}), while the Evangelist himself (12^{37-43}) denounces the sin of the people in language which echoes Lk 9^{54}. There was much more for John to learn, and the occasional outbreaks of stormy wrath are of the very nature of a finite human love cherished with intensity of emotion for that wonderful Person whose grandeur of being, as well as whose human loveliness, was breaking upon his mind. There are no other special references to John in the Synoptic narrative, and, as a revelation of the personal character of the author, those mentioned are explained rather than contradicted by the tone of the Fourth Gospel.

B. The Acts of the Apostles hides John in the company of the Twelve, and behind the more prominent figure of Peter. Still, the promises given by the ascending Lord (ch. 1), and the preaching of Peter (chs. 2. 3. and 4), reveal the tone and matter of the closing discourse of our Lord, of which John's mind was the repertory. Compare Jn 5^{20} 7^{39} 17^{5} 16^{7} with the substance of Peter's great sermon at Pentecost, and the defence made by Peter and John (Ac 3. 4) with the vindication in the Fourth Gospel of the Messiahship of Jesus. (See esp. Jn 20^{31}). As in the Fourth Gospel, John is a silent presence in the early Church (see Ac 8), but the mission of the two apostles to Samaria prepares us for the mighty words which 'John' was at length to reveal to the world.

C. St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians makes a reference to James, Cephas, and John as 'pillars' of the Mother Church, to whom St. Paul was willing to refer his Gentile ministry, based on Christ's own teaching concerning the place of ceremonial in the kingdom of God. This is the only reference in the writings of St. Paul to the personality of John, and so far there is not the smallest reason for questioning, on St. Paul's authority, the widely attested conviction that the beloved disciple was the author of the Fourth Gospel.

D. The First Epistle of John. The Mur. Canon makes distinct reference to 1 Jn as an appendix to the Gospel. It specifies two Epistles by the same evangelist later on. Eusebius (HE iii. 39) tells us that Papias 'used passages from the first Epistle'; and we have an unmistakable citation of 1 Jn 4^{1} in Polycarp's Epistle to Phil. ch. viii. The extreme significance of this quotation led the author of Supernatural Religion, vol. ii., to contend that 'John' quoted from Polycarp, rather than vice versâ. Tertullian frequently refers to, or quotes from, the Epistle. Clemens Alex., Origen, and Cyprian cite it as St. John's writing. Many who opposed the authenticity of the Gospel, like Bretschneider in his Probabilia, with Paulus and others, do not attempt to separate the authorship of the Gospel and Epistle; but Hilgenfeld and Davidson have advanced many reasons for believing that they belong to different writers and periods. Davidson (Introd. to NT) assigns some ten distinct points of difference, which hardly need more than statement for their refutation. Holtzmann (Einleitung, p. 463) admits identity of authorship. Haupt and Lias have shown how the original form of the teaching is referred by the apostle to the words of Jesus Himself, while in the Epistle we see the method adopted by the evangelist to apply it to the condition of the Church at the close of the century. Doubtless there are differences in style, weight, compass, between the utterances of the Lord and the application of these ideas to later days, but all the fundamental conceptions of the divine character and righteousness, of 'the word of life,' of the contrariety between 'the flesh' and 'the spirit,' between 'light' and 'darkness,' the emphasis upon the divine love, upon the Holy Spirit and the eternal life, appear in a practical form in the Epistle as well as in the Gospel. There is no necessity to invoke the shadowy form of the Presbyter John to explain the differences between the two documents. They must stand or fall together. Testimony to one becomes a witness for the coexistence of the other. They combine to give us the best insight into the mind of the author of both. What is worthy of particular attention is the conviction that we have here not only the apostle of love, but one whose wrath flamed against untruthfulness, unbelief, and the spirit of the world. Let special notice be taken of 1^{10} $2^{9-11.\ 16.\ 22}$ $3^{6.\ 8.\ 12.\ 15}$ 4^{3} $5^{10.\ 16}$. While there is every reason for recognizing, throughout, the disciple whom Jesus loved and the author of the Fourth Gospel, there is a striking correspondence with the disciple who was ready to call fire from heaven upon those who rejected the Lord and His truth. The first Epistle is a link between the Synoptic John and the personality of whom we are in search.

E. The Second and Third Epistles of John, so far as they bear on the character of the author of the Fourth Gospel. The authenticity and canonicity of the smaller Epistles have had to sustain a heavy fire of criticism. Even Eusebius hesitated to acknowledge them as St. John's own, but Clemens Alexandrinus, Irenæus, and Dionysius have little doubt about them. The small circulation of these private letters is enough to account for their non-inclusion in the Peshitta, though Ephraem Syrus quotes them. The Mur. Canon leaves it doubtful whether the compiler knew of more than two Epistles in all; Theodoret does not mention them. Theodore of Mopsuestia rejected them. Jerome, building on the view taken by Eusebius of the supposed reference to the Presbyter John by Papias, is disposed to attribute them to that shadowy personage; but he does not finally come to that conclusion, as he enumerates seven Catholic Epistles. In modern times the circumstance that the author calls himself 'the elder' has been pressed against their apostolic authority; but it should be remembered that St. Peter (1 P 5^{1}) calls himself συμπρεσβύτερος, and that Papias calls the apostles, including St. John, 'elders.' Irenæus gives the same title to Polycarp; and when writing to Soter, Bishop of Rome, gives no higher title to his predecessors in that see, though these are supposed to have included both St. Peter and St. Paul. These considerations show that the title is one which St. John might, consistently with much other usage, have used for himself. And that Diotrephes used malicious words about John the apostle is no reason for thinking that the author was other than the apostle, when we bear in mind the parallel experience of the greatest of the apostles. These Epistles teach the same fundamental truths, and are characterized by the same omissions as the first Epistle and the Gospel, in neither of which is there distinct reference to the Church or the Christian sacraments. The prime words are used in all three Epistles, such as ἀλήθεια, ἀγάπη, ἀντίχριστος, περιπατεῖν, etc. There is the same limpid style, aphoristic utterance, and extraordinarily simple way of saying deep, loving, and terrible things. Our conclusion is that these two Epistles do much to link together the authorship of the Gospel with their own, as well as demonstrably prove that any specially prophetic and 'thunderous' symptoms of character discovered in the Synoptic Gospels were not absent from the man who wrote with intense affection, breaking into flames of wrath, the Fourth Gospel. [On this subject see detailed treatment in Pulp. Com. Introduction; Ebrard's Comm. on the Epistles of John; Huther, Haupt, Westcott, Lücke, Alexander, and others; as well as the art. JOHN, EPISTLES OF, in this Dictionary].

F. A general comparison between the authors of the Apocalypse and of the Fourth Gospel.—The criticism of the Apoc. begun by Vischer, with Harnack's co-operation, and the theory of a Jewish document which is said to lie at the heart of it, and to be touched up by Christian vision and interlineated with Christian doctrine, have not reached a final stage. The theory might account for some of the most difficult phenomena without taking the authorship out of the hands of the Apostle John. But this is not the place to discuss either the authorship or the date of the Apocalypse. External evidence for the later date and the apostolic origin of the book is stronger than that for any other book in NT. The chief argument on which a much earlier date is assigned turns on purely internal considerations, such as, e.g., the suggestion that Jerus. is still standing when the Apoc. is written, that the succession of Roman emperors fixes the moment of its grand dénouement, that 'the number of the Beast' is a cryptogram of Nero Cæsar, whose anticipated reappearance after his supposed assassination was confidently feared by the world and the Church. These are controversial matters capable of decision only by careful exegesis, and much balancing of opposing theories. Davidson, Renan, and Farrar have argued in favour of this earlier date; while Lücke, Hengstenberg, and many others have taken the opposite side. It is admitted by all that the longer the interval between the composition of the Apoc. and the Gospel, the easier it becomes to argue that the fiery enthusiasm and prophetic blasts, and the imaginative intensity, more Hebrew than Greek, of the young apostle, may have subsided by long meditation and reflection on the vitalizing words of the Master in the days of His flesh; that the atmosphere of Ephesus and the wide diffusion of Hel. and Alex. culture may then have had time to purge his style and refine his tone, and direct him to a new standpoint of thought and feeling. Many scholars, from Dionysius of Alexandria, who elaborated the contrasts between the Apoc. and the Gospel almost as completely as has been done by modern critics, down to the early followers of Baur, such as Zeller and Hilgenfeld, have come to the conclusion that no ingenuity can ever show the two books to have originated from the same mind, whatever interval or change of scene may be intercalated between them. Some then, with F. C. Baur, by establishing the apostolic authorship of the Apoc., have believed that they demolished the authenticity of the Gospel; while others, by relinquishing the Apoc. and handing it over to some Judaic zealot, have believed that they left the course open to a full acceptance of the Johannine authorship of the Fourth Gospel. But however great the contrasts of an earlier and later style,—as witness, comparatively, in our own day, those of Burke and Carlyle,—a much greater conflict and dissimilarity may be observed when a man of commanding powers distinctly sets himself to approach a different subject, or to look and write from a new standpoint. Many writers, like Swift, Cowper, Wordsworth, and Tennyson, were throughout their career able to adopt, whether by dramatic temperament or deliberate tours de force, glaring contrasts of form, dialect, style, tone, manner, which are enough to deceive those who cannot discern the subtle resemblances, and, moreover, have no external evidence of authorship to guide them in their conclusions. The different attitude and atmosphere, the modified diction and general purpose of the two books, are not sufficient (whatever be the theory of date) to divorce them from each other while the internal and external evidences of the authenticity of each remain independently so convincing.

That John, the author of the Apoc., called himself a 'bond-slave of Jesus Christ,' and not an apostle, corresponds with the modesty of the writer of the Gospel, and with the very phrase of St. Paul in four of his Epistles. He classes himself among the 'prophets' of the NT, and does not dissociate himself from the apostles, some of whom were undoubtedly 'prophets,' and, since our Lord built His Church and kingdom (Mt 16^{18}) upon the petra of Peter's confession, it is not surprising that John should have seen the names of the twelve apostles upon the foundations of the new Jerusalem. The author declares that 'he bare witness to the word of God, and to the testimony of Jesus Christ' (Rev 1^{2}), which ranges him among the innermost circle of Christ's disciples. The 'John' cannot, by any ingenious theory, refer to any other personage of that name mentioned in NT. Further, the references to persecution, exile, Patmos, and an Ephesian residence, correspond with a whole cycle of tradition and citation which cannot be here given. It is true that Keim (Jesus of Nazara, Eng. tr. i. 143, 207) discounts the citations from Irenæus (ii. 22. 5, iii. 23), Clem. Alex., Justin, Apollonius (Eus. HE v. 18), Jerome, Epiphanius, etc., thinking that a blunder of Irenæus is the parent of all the supposed testimony; and Keim has been followed in this by Harnack and several other recent writers. But the arguments are unsatisfactory. On the other hand, the external testimonies to the Apocalypse are in various ways confirmatory of apostolic origin and authority, while a clear mention of it in the Mur. Canon—together with that of Peter—assigns it a sure place in the reverence of the Church early in the 2nd cent.

The arguments of Dionysius of Alexandria are based on fundamental differences between the Apocalypse and the Fourth Gospel.

(1) Differences of designation, such as that the author of the Apoc. calls himself 'John,' whereas the author of the Gospel withholds his name. This, as Salmon (Introd. to NT, 276) says, can be easily accounted for. The historical books of OT, with the exception of Neh, are all anonymous; the same may be said of the Synoptic Gospels and Ac, while all the prophetic books, with the exception of Daniel (see ch. 7), open with the name of the prophet himself. Now, the Apocalypse is distinctly prophetic, and its style and imagery are borrowed from that source. Dionysius did not reject it as uninspired, or as written by Cerinthus, or as having insufficient external testimony. He said that he could not understand its meaning, though this was not his point of critical doubt; but that its great dissimilarity in language, style, theme, and tone from the Gospel convinced him, that as there might be many 'Johns' in Asia during the 1st cent., one of them may have been the author. He argued, further, that the resemblance between the Gospel and the first Epistle in phrase, leading terms, and decisive teaching increases the feeling of discrepancy between the Gospel and the Apocalypse. On the hearsay that there were two tombs of 'John' at Ephesus, he raises the ghost of the shadowy 'Presbyter,' who has done such notable service in the piecing together of 2nd cent. fragments. The position occupied by Dionysius in the middle of the 3rd century may have been unconsciously adopted by this wise and candid man, owing to the strong objection he entertained for the chiliasm which he found in the Apocalypse. Nevertheless, his hypothesis was comparatively disregarded until the present century, when it was used in a contrary sense by F. C. Baur and his followers, who recognized and emphasized the apostolic authorship of the Apoc., to the entire repudiation of that of the Gospel, which was supposed to have originated under different conditions at the close of the 2nd cent. On the other hand, Lücke, Ewald, Lutzelberger, Düsterdieck, de Wette, and Neander, holding the authenticity of the Gospel as proved, and accepting the burden of the Dionysian argument, have resigned the authorship of the Apoc. to the 'Presbyter,' to 'John the Divine,' to John Mark, or to any other who could bear the weight of the responsibility. Volkmar and Renan pressed the Judaic aspects so strongly as to suppose that it was, among other things, an early manifesto against the Pauline Churches and doctrine, under the pseudonym of Balaam or the Nicolaitans.

(2) The emphasis laid upon the Heb. and Hel. spirit of the two books respectively has been brought into strong relief by Vischer's Die Offenbarung Johannis eine Jüdische Apokalypse in christlicher Bearbeitung, mit einem Nachwort von Adolph Harnack, 1886; see Schoen's Origine de l'Apocalypse, also Bousset's Commentary, and A. Meyer in Theol. Rundschau, Nov. and Dec. 1897. Doubtless the Apocalyptic literature of the Hebrews, as seen in Dn, 2 Es, Enoch, must have been present to the mind of the author; but that he or another re-edited a Jewish Apoc. is more than the precarious criticism which has prevailed of late can be said to have proved. Moreover, the links of connexion and the subtle resemblance between these two most wonderful testimonies to Christ have been too much slighted. The use of rare words and forms characterizing both documents, the practically identical Christology, and a certain resemblance in structure, lead to the conclusion that if John be indeed the author of the Apoc., then the author of the Gospel, notwithstanding its transparent differences, must have been his pupil and follower in the deepest motives and spirit of his utterance. Again, the supposed oppositions of style are certainly balanced by interesting correspondences, the fancied solecisms can be shown to have analogous representations in classical Greek, and certain views of the OT and of the Person of Christ are almost, if not quite, peculiar to these two works. The impression therefore grows upon many, that, notwithstanding the dicta of the Tübingen school, the two books not only may, but must, have issued from the same mind. If this be the final word of the long controversy, the authenticity of the Apoc. becomes one of the strongest arguments for the apostolic origin of the Fourth Gospel.

It is common to say that the Apoc. is strongly Heb. in its grammar, while the Gospel is written in excellent Hel. Greek. The substitution of καί in the Apoc., as representative of the Heb. ו, for the rich variety of Gr. particles, is urged as a conspicuous proof of the position. But we find also in the Gospel that, where the emotions are intense, and when every sentence becomes a heart-throb, as in chs. 15, 17, and in ch. 21 (where the succession of events constitutes the very nerve of the transcendent narrative), the author is equally content with the simple καί, and dispenses with all other particles. It is urged that πάντοτε and πώποτε and καθώς are used in the Gospel, but not in the Apocalypse. Now, the last word is used often in the Synoptics; and though the former words occur in Jn, they are not to be found in Ac, and only very occasionally in NT, so that no conclusion can be drawn from their omission in the Apocalypse. While the Heb. forms 'Amen,' 'Abaddon,' 'Hallelujah,' are found in the Apoc., and the Heb. imagery of the 'manna,' the 'root and offspring of David,' the 'twelve tribes of Israel,' and the 'New Jerus.' are introduced, they certainly are balanced by the long list of Heb. phrases, information, and imagery found in the Gospel (see below). The Gospel makes claim for the 'Word made flesh' that Abraham rejoiced to see the days of the Christ; that Moses wrote of Him; that Jesus Himself was the Heavenly 'Manna' which came down from heaven, that He was the Lamb of God, taking away sin, that He was the Bridegroom of the Church, that He was greater than the temple, able to rebuild it after its wanton destruction. The Lamb (τὸ ἀρνίον, not, however, ὁ ἀμνός) of the Apoc. is in tremendous conflict with the power of the theocracy, then with the world, then with concentrated world-powers, over which He gains the victory, and receives the acclamations of the universe. The Lamb of the Gospel narrative encounters the powers of the world, displays great 'signs' in the temple, on the land and on the sea, on the bodies and minds of men. Through meekness and submission, not through impotence, through the mystery of suffering and cruel death, and the glory of resurrection, He gains a victory over the world, over all its representatives, over the flesh and the devil. He takes His perpetual place with, among, and within His people, their Lord, their King. Doubtless there is a concrete specialism in the imagery of the Apoc. which seems to conflict with the universalism of the Gospel: but it must not be forgotten that the Apocalyptist sees 'a multitude which no man can number, gathered from every people and kindred and tribe,' who circle the throne of God and of the Lamb, and at last the 'leaves of the tree of life are for the healing of the nations.' The Hebraism of both documents is obvious, and it is hardly more conspicuous in the one than in the other. Instead of separating them by contrast, it may be held to establish community of origin.

(3) The grammatical peculiarities of the Apoc. include apparently 'false apposition,' the most remarkable example being 1^4, where ἀπό is followed by ὁ ὤν, καὶ ὁ ἦν, etc. This, however, arises from the writer having regarded the phrase as a tr. of the Eternal, as J", and an indeclinable noun. In 30 other places he gives ἀπό its proper regimen. Other instances of unusual apposition may easily be explained without recourse to solecism, such as the ἡ λέγουσα of 2^{20}, cf. 3^{12} 8^9 etc., which are paralleled by similar constructions in Plato (Winer, 671, Eng. tr.), Thucydides, and others. Anomalous varieties of gender and number are best explained by the fervid personifying temperament which gives masculine or feminine features to neuter nouns. The same peculiarities are found in other parts of NT, though they would scarcely be expected in the quiet, limpid prose of the Fourth Gospel. As a set-off against these curiosities, a considerable number of verbal coïncidences demand attention. The verb μαρτυρεῖν and the noun μαρτυρία occur very frequently in the Gospel and the Epp. of John, very sparingly in other parts of NT, and in a different sense; but they occur 13 times in the Apocalypse. The word νικᾶν is used in the sense of overcoming evil and the world both in Gospel and Epp., and 17 times in the Apocalypse. Τηρεῖν τὸν λόγον is a phrase peculiar to the Gospel, Epp., and Apoc., and so is τηρεῖν τὰς ἐντολάς. The idea of the tabernacling of God among or with men, σκηνοῦν, is also to be found expressed by the same word in these documents. The following words are virtually peculiar to them: σφραγίζειν in the sense of 'confirm,' Ἐβραϊστί, λαλεῖν μετά τινος, κύριε σὺ οἶδας, περιπατεῖν μετά τινος, which are characteristic of all three writings. What is still more remarkable is that words strangely absent from the Gospel and Epp., like μετάνοια, γέεννα, are not to be found in Apocalypse. The word πίστις, which occurs 340 times in NT, does not occur in the Gospel, and is almost absent from Epp. and Apocalypse. The same Gr. tr. of Zec 12^{10}, different from LXX, is found in the Gospel, 19^{34-37}, and Apoc. 1^{7}. These correspondences might be greatly multiplied. Weiss and Watkins give lists of more than 100 words or phrases common to the three documents. The impression made upon some opponents of the authenticity of the Gospel is that the 2nd cent. writer who is supposed to have written it, studied the vocabulary, etc., of the Apoc., with the intention of producing the impression of Johannine authorship. This hypothesis neutralizes the hypothesis based upon their conspicuous dissimilarity.

(4) The plan, scope, and structure of the two books. — Many insist on the extreme contrast between the two writings in these respects, e.g. the absence in the Gospel of climax, the quiet flow of the stream of narrative and discourse, the movement from Jerus. to Galilee and back to the metropolis, with nearly imperceptible chronology, the lack of imaginative background, the omission of transfiguration and ascension, and only the quiet gathering intensity of conviction that the victory over evil must lie for all time with the Man of infinite capacity, boundless sympathy, and measureless affliction—so that at length the most sceptical of the Twelve admits His supreme claims. On the other hand, 'the revelation of Jesus Christ to His servant John' is an impressive series of tableaux, arranged in climacteric form, and with very marked septenary arrangements. After the first visions, come the letters to the Seven Churches, a special aspect and title of the Lord being presented in each. Next we have the vision of the seven seals of the Divine Book; the separate issues of the opening of the six seals; the intermezzo of the four angels and other angel; and then the new septenary group of trumpets introduced by the loosing of the seventh seal. Further, after the twofold revelation of the temple and the beasts, come the seven last plagues following on the pouring out of the seven vials. Then appear the closing contrasts of Babylon and the New Jerus.; the victory of the Logos of God over all His foes, the destruction of the Beast, the False Prophet, and the Evil One for ever and ever; and the renewal of all things in the light of the Lord. This series of magnificent images seems strangely diverse from the meditative, gentle flow of the river of life, of which we catch lucent gleams in the Fourth Gospel.

An examination of the Gospel reveals, however, a deeply pondered plan. One thing readily appears: the septenary arrangement. Seven great signs precede the Passion. These constitute a climax, and a revelation not only of divine realities but of the mind of the writer. The first sign (Jn 2^{11}) shows the mastery of the Word made flesh over the material of nature; the second (4^{54}) His mastery over one of the most cruel troubles of human nature, even when the Lord was not visibly present with the sufferer; the third (5^{8}) shows His power to restore the forces which have been lost by sin; the fourth and fifth ($6^{11.\ 19}$) are great signs of power and pity, both on earth and sea, with mastery over the forces of nature; the sixth ($9^{ff.}$) is a double proof of His being the 'Light of the World'; the seventh (11^{43}) is a concrete conflict with the most terrible evil of humanity, and a victory over it. In addition to this, a singular parallel to the throbbing suspense or postponement of climax in the Apoc., e.g. at the loosing of the seventh seal, at the sounding of the seventh trumpet, and in the intercalated scenes before the final victory and glory, may be traced also in the structure of the Gospel. Thus the 'hour' of the highest manifestation seems always at hand, but is again and again postponed. Without enumerating details, cf. Jn 2^{4} $4^{21.\ 23}$ $5^{25.\ 28}$ 7^{30} 8^{20} 12^{27}, followed by new and wonderful departures. In the midst of the valedictory discourse, 'Arise, let us go hence, seems to strike the hour; but even now the moment comes for still higher teaching and the Eternal Prayer. This overlapping and renewal of suspense in striking interlineation are continued throughout the story of the Passion to the confession of Thomas and the hyperbole of the closing verses. Observe, further, the presence in both documents of prologue, rehearsal, conflict, victory, epilogue, which curiously correspond with each other and which almost bind them together. In each alike the prologue is an anticipation of the successive arguments of the visions or oracles, as the case may be. As the letters to the Seven Churches give a compendious forecast of the seals, trumpets, and vials, so Gosp. chs. ii.–iv. or v. give most vivid rehearsals of characteristic specimens of the Lord's method and teaching. The sublime key-word of the Gospel, 'The Word became flesh,' rises over the entire Gospel as 'an awful rose of dawn,' just as the vision of the Divine Christ in Rev 1 dominates every subsequent paragraph in the Apocalypse.

(5) This leads us to a brief treatment of the religious teaching of these two documents. Many modern critics, Strauss, Baur, Harnack, Wendt, Weiss, Ritschl, put into forcible antithesis the earlier and later Johannine teaching. There is no necessity for these distinctions. Gebhardt and others have given all the evidence needed to prove that no two books of Holy Scripture are so coincident in teaching, even to special peculiarities, as the Gospel and Apocalypse. In one, the author is calmly meditating upon the concrete facts, the peerless life, the transcendent teaching, the unique ending on earth of a ministry which was beginning to exert widespread spiritual influence upon individuals, and to produce political and even cosmic effects upon humanity and the world. In the other, the vision of the place which Jesus had taken in the sphere of providential rule flashes upon him. In the one, he is sweetly dreaming over the potent, procreant fact; in the other, fancy and even grotesque imagination forecast the future. The visions of Heb. seers, by their nature, follow one another, but do not grow from less to more—they are architectural rather than spontaneous. Remembering these different conditions, it is nothing short of unique that the ideas of the two documents should have been so similar, if not coincident. The same writer was able to see more deeply than any other into the heart of Jesus, and was also permitted to see more accurately than other apocalyptic writers into the ferments wrought in humanity by the leaven of the kingdom. [Gebhardt's Doct. of the Apoc., Eng. tr. pp. 305, 424; Reynolds' Introd. in Pulpit Comm. pp. lxxx–lxxxv].

These considerations may be held to prove that the twofold Johannine literature, instead of breaking the evidences of unity of authorship, reveals a high probability that the two documents proceeded from the same mind. We have also seen that the strong evidence for the existence of the Gospel towards the very beginning of the 2nd cent., and the traditional attribution of authorship to the son of Zebedee, are not countermanded by the characteristics of John supposed to be given in the Synoptic Gospels, the Acts, the Pauline Epistles, and the three Epistles of John.

Some able critics, like Gebhardt, Renan in some edd. of the Vie de Jésus, and Matthew Arnold, are ready to admit that the external evidence for the Fourth Gospel is as copious as for the Synoptic Gospels and the Pauline Epistles. Keim has even triumphed over Baur's chronology and pressed back the date of the existence of the Gospel to a time when the son of Zebedee may have been still living. But all these hold a view of the writing which deprives it of historic value. They regard it as a Christological romance in the form of a narrative, which was not intended even by the author to be taken as a serious or historical record of what was actually said and done. The intense personality of the author pervades the whole. He has, say they, very sparingly made use of the Synoptic Gospels and the teaching of St. Paul, and freely manipulated traditional material as suited his purpose, and he never intended to convey other than the grand impression produced upon his mind by the forms of the new faith. As Jth, Enoch, 2 Es, the Shepherd, the Platonic Dialogues, the Divina Commedia, Paradise Lost, etc., used semi-narrative forms for the purpose of conveying religious ideas, so our evangelist was one of the most effective writers of didactic fiction.

Others have gone much further than this. They have questioned every mark of early origin, and have thought that they found abundant evidence of later date, e.g. references to the second destruction of Jerus. under Hadrian. Some have found traces of Docetism, later Gnosticism, Neoplatonism in the Gospel, and have contended that it is an attempt to trace to the words of Jesus the two types of Hel. and Heb. Christianity, the writer's deliberate aim being to bring about the healing of a schism which can be traced back to the apostles themselves. The controversy turns on the relation of the Fourth Gospel to the Synoptic narrative, and this we must now examine.

VI. The Relation of the Fourth Gospel to the Synoptic Narrative.—A. A general statement of the contrast between them.—It is now admitted that this contrast has appeared to modern criticism more extreme than to that of previous centuries. 'Atmosphere' or climate are difficult to define, but the most conservative critics are conscious of a vital change when passing from genealogical details to the abysses of eternity, from the homely life and trade of Nazareth and Capernaum to the heated discussions of the temple courts, from the Sermon on the Mount to the valedictory discourse. The dramatis personæ are different. Nicodemus, Lazarus, and Nathanael, the impotent and the blind man, are introduced to us for the first time. Thomas starts into prominence and a position of high argumentative importance. The chronological elements differ. The various visits to the metropolis interfere with the simple flow of the Synoptic narrative. No direct mention is made of the birth in Bethlehem from the virgin mother. The story and testimonies of John the Baptist are taken up where the Synoptists drop them, and yet no direct account is given of his death. The temptation, the transfiguration, the agony in the garden, the trial before the Sanhedrin, the dereliction, the ascension, are apparently ignored. The main themes of the discourses, viz. the conditions of admission into the kingdom, are exchanged for profound hints as to the uniqueness of the Lord's own person, His pre-existence, His claim to reveal the Father and to give eternal life. The miracles of the Synoptic narrative appear to set forth His comradeship and His pity for the sorrows of the world, but the later narrative of miracles of Jesus seems mainly used to insist upon the apologetic value of His miracles—they are 'signs' of the glory of God. The little children have vanished from the scene, even from the hosannas of the triumphal entry. It is considered scarcely possible to exaggerate the contrast between the gradual development of the Synoptic Christ, and the aureole of Messianic and divine splendour which invests Him from the first in 'John's' representation.

The first three Gospels represent more than one current type of tradition. The Fourth Gospel is almost universally admitted to be the work of one thoughtful mind, which has impressed itself upon the whole work. The author in propriâ personâ addresses his readers with explanations of his own, and at times seems to expand by further reflections or recollections even the words of his adored Master; so that a vigorous subjective element cannot be excluded, although it may have been relatively exaggerated.

B. We have to examine these divergences and some others, and to decide whether the admission of their existence destroys the historical value of the Fourth Gospel. Primâ facie, the claim of the writer to be the most intimate friend and disciple of Jesus Christ must be held to give a weight and an authority to his autoptic representations to which none of the Synoptists can lay equal claim.

(1) Can we accept the new version of the principal scene of the ministry of Christ? Matthew and Mark refer to one passover feast only, for which they bring Jesus to Jerus.—while all the other incidents and teachings are confined to Galilee. It is worth while to remember that to the Romans and Hellenes, to whom Mk and Lk appeal, the difference between the two must have been very insignificant. To the introspective soul of John, who thought of days, places, hours of his intercourse with 'the Word incarnate,' it was of moment to record some of these things in sharper detail. Thus, seeing that the Synoptic narrative of the public ministry ignores the Judæan ministry of the first passover, he reveals his intimate knowledge of the facts by the use of the word πάλιν in 4^3, thereby corresponding with the Synoptists as to the date of the commencement of the public ministry. In ch. 5 we have an intermezzo in which a visit to Jerus. brings our Lord into conflict with the Pharisees on the Sabbatic law. This explains and corresponds with the long and bitter struggle with the Pharisees detailed by the Synoptists in the early portion of the Galilæan ministry. Jesus does not appear to have been accompanied by more than a few disciples on these visits to the metropolis. Caspari (Chron. Introd. to Life of Christ, Eng. tr. 142) has made the acute suggestion that John, who was known to Caiaphas, and had a house in Jerus. to which he resorted at the time of the great feasts, may have been the sole auditor and witness of the conversations, and have been his Master's host as well as his biographer. But 'John' never expanded these precious memoranda into a full biography. He, like his predecessors, has given us only fragments, pregnant incidents, great words, which lifted the veil from the mystery of the Lord's consciousness. The references to special occasions are abrupt, e.g. to the abiding in Judæa (3^{22}), the walking in Galilee (7^1), the retiring to Peræa (10^{40}), the pause at Ephraim (11^{54})—other signs and teachings are cited and summarized from first to last. It is helpful to remember that even the Synoptists are not silent about visits to Judæa, as compare the (Tisch.[8], WH) text of Lk 4^{44}, where εἰς τὰς συναγωγὰς τῆς Ἰουδαίας is inserted in the text—Tregelles and RV insert it in the margin. This might be synchronous with either the first visit of Jesus to Jerus. or even the second. In Lk 5^{17} the presence in Galilee of Pharisees from Jerusalem represents the impression already produced in the temple by the great discussion on the Sabbatic law. Both Matthew (24^{37}) and Luke ($13^{21.\ 33.\ 34}$) record the terrible and tender apostrophe, 'O Jerusalem . . . how often would I,' etc. In Lk 10^{38} the incident of Mary and Martha is not incompatible with our Lord's presence at Bethany during the feast of Tabernacles, described in Jn 7^{10}. The Synoptic narrative implies, in the final scenes, familiarity with people and things, which is best explained by the Johannine account of these visits to Jerusalem.

(2) Is the length of our Lord's public ministry so different, after all, in the two accounts as hopelessly to discredit either account? Browne (Ord. sæclorum) has endeavoured to compress even John's account into the short space of one year, contained between the first and last Passover; and this is effected by expunging from the text (Jn 6^{4}) the reference to another passover; but it has the tendency to render the whole narrative unhistorical when we consider the astounding brevity of the period during which the entire personal influence of Jesus upon friends and foes must have been produced. This becomes more striking when we compare it with the length of the teaching of Socrates, Buddha, or Mohammed. The same comparison may be made with the record of the ministry of Hosea, Jeremiah, or Ezra, or with the history of the career of Moses, David, or Solomon. The fact is that there is no positive statement in any of the four Gospels upon the subject. The only termini are the 15th year of Tiberius (Lk 3^{1}) and the recall of Pontius Pilate (A.D. 36). There is therefore more historic probability in the whole narrative if the extended chronology of John into two years and a half be followed. There is nothing to contradict it in the Synoptic narrative. See, further, art. CHRONOLOGY OF NT, vol. i. p. 406 ff.

(3) The most perplexing and debated apparent discrepancy between the first three Gospels and the Fourth turns on the day of our Lord's death. As judged by critics of all schools a formidable difference emerges, which some, like Baur and Strauss, have lifted into capital importance as demonstrating the late origin of the Fourth Gospel at the hands of one who was ready from doctrinal and ecclesiastical motives to contradict the far-spread tradition of a century. It is assumed that the writer wished to make it appear that Jesus was the true Passover, in whom all the ancient symbolism of the Lamb and the system of sacrifices culminated, and that he did not hesitate to affirm by a group of incidental references that our Lord was crucified at the time when the Jews were preparing to kill and eat the paschal supper; whereas the Synop. Gospels had been unanimous in their assertion that the day preceding the agony and the crucifixion was that on which the days of unleavened bread commenced and the paschal lamb was slain and eaten, and that, the Lord Jesus having been tried and condemned on the day of the Feast and Holy Convocation, was laid in the grave on the evening of the Sabbath preparation. The difference of statement is explicit, and said, by the opponents of the authenticity of the Fourth Gospel, to be irreconcilable. This conclusion is strongly emphasized by the Tübingen writers, on the ground that the Quarto-deciman and Jewish-Christian party persisted in celebrating their 'feast of the Saviour's Passover' on the 14th day of Nisan, when the Jews slew their paschal lamb. Their festivals of rejoicing commenced after their fasting had ended, on whichever day of the week it occurred. According to Eusebius (HE v. 24), Polycrates of Ephesus affirmed that the Eastern Churches founded their custom in part on the practice of the Apostle John himself, 'who observed the 14th day according to the Gospel.' But what Gospel? Not the Fourth, according to the critics, but the Synoptic Gospels, where John is mentioned with Peter as preparing the Passover on the morning of the 13th Nisan, and celebrating it with the Lord on the night of the 14th. This, it has been alleged, runs directly counter to the representations of the Fourth Gospel.

Now, the difficulty here involved has been greatly aggravated by the twofold method in which conservative critics have endeavoured to solve it. Hengstenberg, Tholuck, Edersheim, Luthardt, M'Clellan, etc., satisfy themselves that every reference in John is compatible with the Synoptic assertion that the Lord's Supper coincided with the Jewish passover on the evening of 14th–15th of Nisan. They think that several of the proceedings of the night were exceptional, e.g. Judas going out, that the possible purchase of things needed for the feast or gift of alms could be justified, that 'the passover' which the chief priests were intending to hold, and for the ceremonial attendance on which they would not enter the prætorium, referred to a midday meal on the feast day called 'chagigah,' a 'thank-offering,' and sometimes termed by laxity 'passover' (2 Ch 33^{22} 35^{7-9}), and that the references to the παρασκευή—and the bearing of the cross, are all compatible with the first day of convocation. It is thus thought that the two accounts are harmonized; but, on the other hand, Bleek, Greswell, Godet, Weiss, Westcott, Watkins, etc., have shown the entire incompatibility of the proceedings of the trial, of the crucifixion, the bearing of the cross by one coming from field labour, the purchase of spices, etc., with the most elastic interpretation of the letter of the law then in vogue. The violations of Sabbatic law in performing or allowing deeds of mercy would have been utterly insignificant by the side of these flagrant contradictions of both letter and spirit. These numerous details (see Reynolds' Introd. pp. xcii–xcv, and notes on the passages in Gosp.) cannot be discussed. The Synoptists themselves supply many confirmations of the Johannine view, especially the determination of the authorities not to apprehend Jesus 'on the feast day.' Since Luke reckons the 50th day after the first day following the Sabbath of Passover (see Lv 23^{15}, Dt 16^{9}) as that on which Pentecost had fully come (Ac 2^{1}), and as the universal tradition and custom of celebrating it on a Sunday cannot be disputed, it is evident that Luke must have reckoned in the year of our Lord's death that the paschal feast was held on the night following the crucifixion.

St. John, who took part in the preparation of the passover, was not purposely correcting a common tradition, but making the chronology more clear. Still there remains to be accounted for the explicit manner in which Luke and Mark refer to the celebration of the supper and the blending with it of the ancient ceremonial on the night of the betrayal. Godet and Westcott do not hesitate to imply that the Synoptic narrative shows that our Lord must have anticipated by a day the legal celebration. Haste and the imminence of the tragedy are thought to account for this departure. The fresh point made by Caspari (Chron. Introd. to Life of Christ, Eng. tr. pp. 195–217), is that the four evangelists are unanimous in the assertion that Jesus suffered on the 14th of Nisan, after having prepared for the paschal supper, though without the lamb, or the bitter herbs, or the elaborate ceremonial; that the lamb may have been reserved for the evening of the day of the crucifixion itself, for the hurry and awfulness of which they were unprepared. If this be the fact, the difficulty vanishes. In its favour may be added the Chronicon Paschale, which quotes Clemens Alex., who, following the chronology just set forth, implies that the disciples had learned that Jesus was Himself the Lamb, the food and the wine of the feast. The fact that Origen, Chrysostom, and others in the course of the various Easter controversies, took a different view from Clemens Alex., does not here concern us. The points at issue with the Western Church turn on other considerations not vitally connected with our present discussion. With three most plausible, if not absolutely satisfactory, methods of accounting for the difficulty, it is scarcely worthy of candid scholarship to speak of irreconcilable contradiction, or of the impossibility of St. John's being the author of the Fourth Gospel.

(4) The omission by the Synoptic Gospels of events and discourses which constitute vital portions of the Fourth Gospel is very startling, and difficult to explain; but it is important to observe that Matthew and Luke are also almost equally characterized by peculiarities of their own. Without enumerating them here in detail

(see Pulp. Com. xcvi), it may be sufficient to notice that while paragraphs of various length, peculiar to the author of the Fourth Gospel, amount to ninety-six, yet the specialities which we owe entirely to Lk amount to no fewer than seventy-two, and similar peculiarities of Mt to sixty-two, exceeding together by thirty-eight those of the Fourth Gospel. It is sufficient to urge that the three evangelists each found in the abundance of material what best corresponded with the supreme motive of his selection. Special emphasis has been laid upon the silence of the Synoptists on an event which definitely precipitated the tragedy. Most certainly, the death and restoration of Lazarus take so signal a place in the final working out of Jewish hostility, in John's Gospel, as to imply an extraordinary reticence on the part of the Synoptists. It is possible that amid the affluence of mighty works wrought in Galilee the sorrows and joys of Bethany did not bulk so largely as they seem to the critics to do when this one event is singled out for minute inspection.

(5) The omission by the Fourth Gospel of events of capital importance in the Synoptic narrative.

(a) The miraculous birth and infancy, the youth, the family, the genealogy of Jesus, and the early ministry of John the Baptist, are passed over in silence. Yet there are significant hints of these things which carry the reader's mind over the omission, without the suspicion of ignorance or indifference.

(b) The baptism of Jesus by John, with its accompaniments, is not definitely recorded, and yet it is implied in the testimony of John, and in the thrilling effect produced upon the mind of the Baptist by what he saw and heard. Similarly, no account is given of the imprisonment and death of the Baptist, yet both are hinted at.

(c) The omission of the temptation in the wilderness has been put down to doctrinal prepossessions of 2nd cent., but closer study seems to show that the evangelist inserts between the great testimonies of the Baptist and his imprisonment—i.e. in precisely the chronological position where Synoptic teaching places the temptation—a series of events covering the matter of each of them. The creative multiplication of wine, as an act of love to others rather than of self-assertion or the rectification of personal need, corresponds with the temptation to dispense with the Father's providential care of His beloved Son. The sudden descent upon the temple with reforming energy, in lieu of casting Himself from the pinnacle to attract the admiration of the sign-loving multitude, is charged with effective analogies. Then, thirdly, we find an unostentatious refusal of Christ to palter with evil, or to accept the sanction of the Sanhedrin in order to accomplish the ends of even His own mission. 'Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him alone shalt thou serve,' rings through Jn 2. 3 and 4 just where the Synoptists had chronologically placed the mighty struggle with the suggestions of the devil.

(d) The omission of the transfiguration, an event which is fully described in the Synoptic narrative. This is surprising, because the latter represents the son of Zebedee as one of the three witnesses of the incident; but the explanation may be that the eyes of the beloved disciple received more convincing evidence than the bright cloud and the heavenly visitants and a supernatural voice, to establish the divine glory and Person of the Lord. 'We saw,' he said (1^{14}), 'his glory, the glory of the only-begotten.' It is worthy of notice in this respect that Moses and Elijah were perceived by John to have prepared the way of the Saviour and His sacrifice ($1^{17.\ 29}$). The whole Gospel is a continuous revelation of the glory of the Life, a vindication of the fact that Jesus is the light- and sight-Giver to blinded humanity.

(e) A more perplexing omission is that of the institution of the Eucharist, especially as the very meal at which it took place is mentioned with some other accompaniments, such as the feet-washing of the disciples. Somewhere in the folds and parentheses of the stupendous sentence ($13^{1\text{-}5}$) we imagine that the institution of the Eucharist, which was intended for the sustenance and the responses of a transcendental love, lies concealed. On no supposition can we conceive the author to have been ignorant of the sacramental rite. We know that it had spread from Jerus. to Troas (Ac $20^{7.\ 11}$) and Corinth, and was so highly esteemed as to be abused by the unwary (1 Co $11^{20\text{f.}}$). The best supposition is that the apostle has spread out over the discourse contained in chs. 13–17 the deepest and most essential features of the Eucharist. The teaching of transcendent love, and mutual indwelling and eternal life, is thus repeated by the divine Master in these chapters. More than this, John has reported the astonishing discourses at Capernaum (ch. 6), where the Lord described deep spiritual communion with Himself as 'eating his flesh and drinking his blood.' Christ laid emphasis on the faith which accepted the Incarnation, the reality and nearness of the God-man, the actual and perfect humanity of the Son of God, the divine Bread which came down from heaven, under the unique phrase 'eating his flesh,' and a deep appreciation and assimilation of His sacrificial death as nothing less than 'drinking his blood,' not only of 'the blood which is the life,' but the blood which was shed. So early in His ministry, He taught that what He also elsewhere in the Synop. narrative described as a ransom in place of many, was effected by the giving of His life. Thus He made it evident that life in Him was closely bound up with the stupendous idea of the death of the Christ of God. 'He that eateth me shall live because of me.' Two theories have prevailed—one, that a transcendental philosopher in the middle of the 2nd cent., ignoring or repudiating the sacrament of the body and blood, chose this way of expressing his spiritualization of this widely prevalent usage. The other hypothesis is, that the beloved disciple, having heard and recorded the Lord's own interpretation of eating His body and drinking His blood, was content. This seems to us far more reasonable. But why should he have omitted the symbol which was so well calculated to preserve the teaching of the great discourse at Capernaum, $6^{54\text{-}60}$? We have just seen that he did not repel the historical concrete always in favour of the ideal representation. But he may reasonably have been wounded by the prevalence of heathen and superstitious adjuncts to the celebration of the Eucharist. He was not a bigoted spiritualist, as we may judge by the significance of the seven great miracles recorded by him, by the interesting feet-washing which had never become a sacramental usage. (See art. 'Fuss-waschung' by H. Merz in Herzog's RE; Smith's Dict. of Christ. Ant. 'Baptism,' §§ 34 and 67).

(f) The omission of the agony in the garden. Keim says, if St. John's account of the imperial bearing of Jesus in the garden and at the arrest be historical, then the Synoptic narrative is 'pulverized.' Renan, B. Weiss, and others are ready on the other hand to allow that we owe to this Gospel historic traits which throw much light upon the incidents of the passion. In John's account we have a more definite description of the place (κῆπος) than in Mt and Mk with their χωρίον, or Lk with the indefinite τόπος. The 'garden' was a 'place'

'to which Jesus often resorted with his disciples.' Moreover, if the Synop. narrative be historical, John must have been with His Lord in the depth of the olive shade. He must even have witnessed what Luke (22[43. 44], see below) describes of an agony insupportable, of the exceeding bitter cry, of the cup which the Father gave the Son of His love to drink, of the bloody sweat, and of the supernatural rally when, having called from the depths of a divine despair to Him who was able to save Him from death, He was heard because of His godly fear. But this apostle must have seen as no other reporter saw so distinctly, the lanterns and torches which accompanied the temple-guard as they descended into the Kidron Valley by the steep side of the hill below the city wall; he knew the name, Malchus, of the servant of the high priest, whose right ear Peter smote. Note, in addition to all this, how Jesus, according to John, rebukes Simon Peter for his rash manifestation of physical courage, in words which remind us of the bitterest experience of Gethsemane. We must admit that little trace of the prostration of that awful scene presents itself when the God-man (according to the Fourth Gospel) faces the enemy. He there appears to be a match for all the treachery of Judas, the malice of the chief priests, and even the military power of Rome. He meets the serried ranks of evil in the imperial calm of the intercessory prayer. It is the manner of this evangelist, and of other scriptural writers, to leave unexplained gaps in the midst of what seems to be continuous narrative. Such a manifest lacuna occurs here between the close of the valedictory discourse and the arrest of the Son of Man. But we see even from the Synoptists that the great agony was over, and that the angel had strengthened Him (Lk 22[43], whose genuineness is indeed doubtful; see WH's note). The cry, 'Thy will be done,' had linked the Father's purpose of redemption with the bleeding heart of man. He had now the energy to rebuke the rabble that gathered round Him. He drove Judas to despair with words of incomparable reproach. He moved forwards, in the face of false witness, to the assertion of the highest claims of Messiahship and divine authority. Even according to the Synoptists, the agony of the garden is compatible with the most stupendous claims.

Moreover, it should not be forgotten that the Fourth Gospel never ignores the vicarious sorrow or the sacrificial agony of the Son of God. Not only does the author show in the valedictory address and prayer the keenest appreciation of suffering (see 16[2. 3. 32] 17[12] 15[18-22 f.] and 14[30]), but he gives a parallel scene of surpassing intensity in 12[25-34], when a fearful looking for of deviation from the Father's will is surmounted by 'Father, glorify thy name!' The moral significance and the culminating intensity of the sacrifice is really placed chronologically before (not after) the experience of the upper chamber. Cf. also the strange blendings of humiliation and victory in the story of the resurrection of Lazarus. We must admit that as the temptation, the transfiguration, and the Eucharist are suggested throughout the Fourth Gospel, so also is the agony of Gethsemane, and, we may add, the bodily ascension of the Lord. The question arises: is the Synoptic narrative, which presents these themes in tableaux visions or revelations, or is the Fourth Gospel, which gives the same teaching in a group of objective facts and recorded words, the more historical?

To John's eye the grand synthesis of majesty and mercy, of divinity and humanity, of the ideal and the actual, the blending of the mystery of pain with the brightness of the glory, was present in all the word and work of the Logos incarnate. To the Synoptic tradition, the universally diffused synthesis is gathered up into scenes and acts of a drama which readers have no power to blend without philosophical and theological hypotheses. If we are right here, much of the current anti-theological criticism of the Fourth Gospel vanishes.

C. There are numerous correspondences between the two documents which merit special consideration.

(a) The broad facts, the leading outlines of the life of the Only-begotten are the same. The name of 'Jesus,' the place of His early residence (Nazareth), the indisputable reference to 'father,' 'mother,' 'brethren,' and 'sisters,' the significance of this in connexion with the confession of His birth from the Spirit and of His having come down from heaven, belong to the two sources. The birth at Bethlehem (Jn 7[42]) is assumed to be true by the refusal to explain away a charge actually made. The reader knows that the Synop. tradition has already forestalled the objection which John, for special reasons, reported. Both sources of tradition agree that Capernaum was chosen by Jesus as the scene of special ministry. The different treatment of the Baptist is due to the obvious fact that the Fourth Gospel takes up his story where the Synoptics lay it down. After the wondrous manifestation in the Jordan, and the confidences between Jesus and John after the temptation, the Baptist was dazzled with a vision both of His glory and of His sacrifice. He penetrated the reality of both, and used the mighty names of 'Son of God,' 'Lamb of God,' and 'Bridegroom' of the veritable Israel. All this was perfectly compatible with the fact that the previous knowledge of Jesus by John—even a knowledge sufficient to justify the exclamation, 'I have need to be baptized of thee' (Mt 3)—was as star-light to sun-light.

Two great 'signs' of our Lord's mastery over material elements and the forces of nature are recorded in the Fourth Gospel (6[1-21]), and correspond with the Synoptic narrative in all their main features, and the two throw valuable side-lights on each other; e.g. the circumstance that Jesus constrained His disciples to enter the boat while He sent the multitude away (Mt 14[22] || Mk 6[45]), is best explained by the sympathy felt by the disciples towards the desire of the multitude to take Jesus by force and hail Him as Messiah King (Jn 6[15]). The combined narrative brings out the impressive feature of the history.

Jn 12 gives new and interesting details of the anointing of the Lord by a woman (cf. Mt 26, Mk 14). It is from the Fourth Gospel that we learn her name, as well as the date, the motive, the criticism of this noteworthy deed which has filled the Church and the world with the fragrance of its perfume.

John agrees with the Synoptists in the main features of the triumphal entry into Jerusalem. The accounts of the 'supper' that preceded the passion, notwithstanding differences already discussed, have much in common, e.g. the detection and departure of Judas, and much of the matter of advice and consolation given by the departing Lord (cf. Lk 13[31-38] with the valedictory discourse).

In addition to this there are numerous identities, such as the trial scenes, the denials by Peter, the conduct of Pilate, the incident of Barabbas, the 'title' and accusation, the crucifixion, the two other victims, the death itself, with its certification—the witnesses of the resurrection. Much that John wrote would be more difficult to appreciate if we could not suppose that he had the narrative of the Synoptists before him. Thus, although John does not describe the discussion in the San-hedrin or the decision arrived at, he implies it in Pilate's private interrogation of Jesus.

(b) Other matters of fact or teaching, given in detail by the Synoptists, are characteristically hinted at in the Fourth Gospel, e.g. John does not describe the baptism of Jesus, but he pointedly refers to the accompaniments and consequences of it. The reference in 3^{24} to the fact that 'John was not yet cast into prison,' is best explained by the evangelist's knowing from the Synoptic narrative that the commencement of our Lord's Galilæan ministry coincided with the imprisonment of John. Further, he seems to show that the previous Judæan ministry was not incompatible with the assertion that a great public ministry of Christ in Galilee was apparently dependent on the arrest of John's activity. The Saviour's knowledge of Peter, and the latter's acceptance of the authority of Jesus (Lk 5^{8}, Mt 4^{18}, Mk 1^{16}), are best understood from Jn 1^{42} and the record of their early intercourse in the place where the Baptist was first exercising his ministry. The parable of the Children of the Bridechamber in Mt 9^{15} is curiously confirmed by the last recorded utterance of the Baptist, Jn 3^{29}.

Again, there are proverbial sayings found in Jn which are preserved sometimes in different connexions by the Synoptics. Comp. 4^{44} with Mt 13^{57}, Mk 6^{4}, Lk 4^{24}; and 12^{25} with Lk 6^{40} and Mt 10^{24}; also 13^{20} with Mt 10^{40} and Lk 10^{16}.

The identity of the character of our Lord as portrayed in the Synop. and Johan. narratives is very remarkable, though this has been sometimes disputed. Even A. B. Bruce (Apologetics, p. 485) thinks it difficult to reconcile the apparent motive of the great miracles of the Fourth Gospel with the philanthropic, sympathetic, and personal reasons which dictate corresponding miracles and other incidents in the Synoptics. He says that while our Lord's chief motive in the Synoptics was pitifulness over human need, on the other hand the obvious purpose of His 'signs' in the Fourth Gospel was to call attention to His own Person and claims on human love and veneration. There is serious matter for contemplation here, should this contrast be observed throughout these documents. But the case of every applicant for His mercy was severally considered and dealt with according to His wisdom. As He said to the woman who washed and anointed His feet, 'Thy sins are forgiven thee'; 'She loved much'; 'Go in peace';—so to the woman taken in adultery, and brought before Him, He said, 'Go and sin no more.' Doubtless He healed many in the affluence of His love, as detailed by the Synoptists; but He would not allow the woman with the issue of blood to steal away with a purely temporal blessing; and in like manner He 'found' the sick man of Bethesda in the temple to give him warning, and did not rest after healing the blind man until He 'found' him to confer upon him the highest benediction. The reason of the miraculous feeding of the multitude in both documents is anxiety for their secular and physical requirements; and the creation of the elements of wine at the wedding feast is an answer to the call upon His pity on behalf of the embarrassed villagers. The walking of Jesus upon the boisterous lake was a distinctly expressed concern for the peril both of mind and body to which His disciples were exposed. In all these cases our Lord undoubtedly found occasion to bring out the great assurance that He had come forth from God and down from heaven; that He was the Light of the world, the Giver of strength, and a great Prophet. So though the raising of Lazarus was conditioned by consciousness of alliance with Heaven and oneness with the Father, yet few things in the Bible are more impressive than His sympathetic weeping over that grave, and His divine condolence with Martha and Mary.

Obviously, it was the purpose of the Fourth Evangelist to record the impressive words, gestures, revelations by which the Lord unveiled both Himself and the Father. These are more impressive in St. John than in the popular tradition, but they did not conceal the humanness of His love. The ironical charge, which was transformed into a crown of glory, 'He saved others, himself he could not save,' is one of the keynotes of the Fourth as well as of the other Gospels. On the other hand, do we not find in the Sermon on the Mount as well as in the charge to the twelve disciples (Mt 10), to say nothing of the interpretation of the great parables of the Sower, of the Tares, and of the Dragnet (Mt 13), and of the Seed growing secretly (Mk $4^{26ff.}$), stupendous claims of personal dignity, and of kinship with the supreme Revealer and Arbiter of human destiny? Does any assumption of the Fourth Gospel transcend the claims made by the great prophet of Mt 23–25? The Jesus of the Fourth Gospel felt that His own powers and claims were of supreme moment to mankind, but that the end of all He said and did was the life, light, peace, and joy of His brethren, and their victory over the world. Let the following passages be specially consulted: 5^{40} $6^{27.\ 47\text{-}50}$ $7^{17.\ 37.\ 38}$ $8^{12.\ 31.\ 32}$ $10^{9.\ 10.\ 28}$ 11^{40} $12^{25.\ 35}$ $13^{34.\ 35}$ $14^{3ff.}$, and almost every paragraph of the valedictory discourse. The same features and spirit pervade the Synoptic Gospels, establishing more of unity than diversity in their theme. They alone relate the supernatural birth of Jesus. Nothing more characteristically Johannine can be found than Mt $11^{25\text{-}28}$ and Lk $10^{21.\ 22}$, wherein the Lord's supreme self-consciousness was uttered, and is revealed in most close and gracious relations with the consolation and salvation of mankind. No words in the Fourth Gospel concerning our Lord's character and prerogatives are loftier than those in the Synoptic Gospels. We believe we are justified in saying that the Synoptists would be more difficult to expound without the light of the Fourth Evangelist than the Fourth Gospel without the aid of the Synoptists.

Other interesting and mutually corroborating elements are found in the four Gospels. There is, for example, the portraiture of certain personages in the Fourth Gospel of whom we know nothing elsewhere, not even the name—unless the name be a second name of one known to us by another.

(1) The most striking instance of this is Nathanael (1 and 21). A widely spread idea prevails that he is to be identified with the Bartholomew of the Synoptic lists of apostles, where he is (by his patronymic only) associated with Philip and Thomas.

(2) Nicodemus is thrice referred to (3. 7^{50} 19^{39}), nay, he is photographed by a few phrases. The familiarity of our Lord with this distinguished personage is quite parallel with numerous scattered hints of His social relationships, especially in Lk 7^{36} 8^{3} 19^{2}. There is no certain identification of Nicodemus with one N. ben-Gorion, who, according to the Talmud, survived the fall of Jerusalem (see Geikie, i. 584; Winer's Realwörterbuch, ii. 152).

(3) The woman of Samaria is portrayed with inimitable vivacity, and in a few sentences she has told her own story for all time. The references to Samaria and the Samaritans in Lk and Ac are all illumined by this sketch of the early intercourse of our Lord with the inhabitants of Sychar.

(4) Mary and Martha have been introduced to the Synoptic history almost as ideals of the contrast between the contemplative and the active religious life. In Jn there is a brilliant page of genuine biography and history. The time and the place are recorded; the characterization of the women is beautifully preserved along unconscious lines in Jn 11. The resemblance of their brother's name to that of the beggar of St. Luke's parable does not throw any light on this story, for all the surroundings are different, unless there be a faint adumbration in Abraham's word, 'Neither will they be persuaded,' etc., of the access of malignity in the hearts of the Pharisees, as reported in Jn 12^{10}, on hearing of the resurrection of Lazarus.

(5) The Virgin Mother. The reticence of the Synoptic account is one of the marvels of NT. We learn there that probably both she and Joseph also were the lowly heirs of the family and throne of David, that she occupied a purely OT standpoint, that she saw in the great function intrusted to her a solution of the baffling paradoxes of the theocratic kingdom. Mt and Lk combine to tell us of the gracious incidents of the infancy, while Mk sheds a very strong light on the probability that she shared with her other sons the fear that her prophetic child was 'beside himself,' and that she received from Him a severe yet filial rebuke. She would doubtless have spared Him every rough handling, and sought to restrain all undue exposure to the rising storm of mingled enthusiasm and malignity. The sublime way in which, according to Mk, the Lord baffled the design of the brethren, and emancipated Himself from the control of His domestic circle, is on many grounds, both literary and doctrinal, most noteworthy. Cf. and connect Mk 3^{20} with $^{30-35}$. Mary followed Jesus to Jerus. and was present at the tragedy, but there is no statement in any of the Synoptists that she was there. Lk, however, places her with her sons among the disciples before and after the Ascension, and it may be readily inferred that she was among the women who ministered to Jesus, though Mary of Magdala and Mary the mother of James the less and of Joses hide her from view. The same picture of the Virgin Mother is preserved by the beloved disciple. Here also she allows herself to be overshadowed by others and hidden in the glory of her Son and Lord. The author of the Fourth Gospel never breathes her name, but preserves the memory of the incident which he knew best, that he received the dying legacy of his Master, and as a son with a mother took her to his own home. The reference to the mother of our Lord frees his narrative from all Docetic taint; and the firm vindication of the truth that the Lord came in the flesh and was made flesh, seemed to him to be of the very essence of the Gospel, and the denial of it to be antichrist. At the same time, his constant reference to the supernatural, heaven-descended life of Christ gives the most vital basis for His immaculate conception. Minute touches also show at Cana the manner in which, while He delivered Himself from maternal control, Jesus obeyed her desire to meet the needs of their humble hosts. Thus, in the most subtle manner, the rare and wonderful portraiture is the same in both documents.

(6) The portrait of John the Baptist differs from that of the Synoptists; but if it be noted that the Fourth Gospel takes up the story where the current tradition dropped it, the chief difficulty vanishes. The strange question sent from the prison (Mt 11^2 and parallels) seems all the more strange in view of the great testimonies to Jesus borne by the Baptist as given in Jn 1 and 3 (cf. Reynolds, John the Baptist, 419–449). But there is nothing, after all, in the 'witness of John' which transcends the OT standpoint, and Christ declares in ch. 5 that He had 'greater witness than that of John.' Like Judaism itself, John would never have accomplished his proper work if he had not held to it too tenaciously even after it had reached its climax. But this involves exegetical considerations that are beyond our present scope.

(7) Of nothing are we more certain than of the historical character of Simon Peter. The blending of courage and weakness, the desire to suggest the courses to be followed even by his Lord, succeeded by the profound deference paid to the expression of the thought of Christ as soon as his reckless blundering was corrected, recur from first to last. This double personality appears at the earliest introduction to Jesus, amid the splendours of the transfiguration and the solemnities of Gethsemane, in his base denials and bitter tears, on the morning of the resurrection amid the visions of heavenly things, in the controversy with St. Paul over the essence of justification, and in the traditions of Church history. He is a real, not an imaginary man. If St. John had given a fundamentally different interpretation of his personality, it would have been strongly adverse to the historicity of his narrative; but the fact is, that in the transactions of chs. 13. 18. 20 and 21, though handling several diverse incidents, St. John's statements exactly preserve the same complicated features of St. Peter's inner and outer life. He who said to the Lord of the invisible world, 'Not so, Lord,' or 'Depart from me, for I am a sinful man,' or 'That be far from thee, Lord'; who would have builded tabernacles on the slopes of Hermon, or engaged a whole battalion of Roman soldiers with a single sword, and then declared with curses that he knew not the man whom he had risked his life to defend,—is the same as the disciple who first cried, 'Thou shalt never wash my feet' and then, 'not my feet only, but also my hands and my head'; who rushed into the sea to reach the feet of his risen Lord, and whose new act of impulsive curiosity received anew the rebuke of the Lord. The indelible imprint of personality is carried throughout the fourfold narrative.

(8) Caiaphas and Pilate, though portrayed at a different angle and in the midst of circumstances which though concordant with those of the Synoptists have a different bearing on the whole narrative, are alike etched from the life, and betray no departure from the reality common to the earlier representation. Caiaphas and Pilate are described as priest and ruler of Israel during the whole of the ministry of Jesus, Lk 3^1. The remorseless resolve of the Sadducean priest to find or make a capital charge against Jesus on the ground either of sedition or blasphemy; the unprincipled endeavour to keep the Pharisees from siding with Jesus in His reformatory zeal; the demand on oath from our Lord of the loftiest claim of Messiahship and Sonship with a view to his immediate condemnation on a charge to which Pilate could not listen; and the delivery of Jesus to the Romans on a new charge altogether, which Pilate saw through at a glance,—all this is left intact by the Fourth Evangelist, while he casts an additional light on the main motives of both the priest and the governor. The moral confusion of the motives of Caiaphas, evinced (11^{49}) in his prophetic forecast of a scapegoat to the indignant majesty of Rome, offered in the person of one absolutely innocent of the crimes alleged; the superstitious fears which blended in Pilate's mind with the abuse of his sovereign power; the uprising of his moral, at least of his political, conscience, which led to the temporary delay of the sentence,—all these elements are emphasized by the Fourth Gospel from its own sources of evidence. The private interviews between Pilate and Jesus, to which the beloved disciple was privy (18^{33-38} 19^{9-12}), as well as the private and preliminary examination before Annas, add to the general information, and have a supplementary character; still the author does not ignore, but gives the result of the action of the Sanhedrin under the leadership of Caiaphas in Pilate's own words, 'Thine own nation and the chief priests delivered thee unto me' (18^{35}). The Barabbas incident brings into pointed relief the action of the priestly party as touched on in the Synoptic narrative, telling us that there was a pause and a questioning among the ὄχλος, which was overcome by the activity of the priests, who 'persuaded' the people (Mt 27^{20}); but the Johannine narrative shows how the fact corresponds with the earlier tradition; and the extremely culpable weakness of Pilate is further shown in the delineations of the Fourth Gospel. Pilate crushed the warnings of his own conscience, and was more intent on visiting his supercilious antipathy on the priests than on carrying out his own expressed conviction that the prisoner was innocent of the charge brought against Him. He yielded at last to a clamour which might complicate his relations with Tiberius, as the most fateful expression of Jewish national degradation at length burst upon his ear. 'We have no king but Cæsar' sealed the doom, not only of Jesus, but of the theocratic nation. Jesus was sacrificed to the cowardice and meanness of Pilate. The spirit of revenge which induced him to abide by the 'title' upon the Cross is another touch of characterization which we owe, as we believe, to the special sources of information possessed by the Fourth Evangelist. We are not concerned to deny that John's silence about the sublime assumption of the Messiahship and judgment of the world, and of the divine claim He made to the highest conceivable dignity, even when it sealed His death-warrant from the Sanhedrin, is a serious perplexity, but, at all events, it reveals no mere doctrinal perversity on the part of the writer to press the apparent theme and motive of his own wonderful contribution to the history of the Word made flesh.

We have thus considered the objections drawn from the chronological and biographical details of the Synoptic Gospels, and have shown that the omissions by the Synoptics of certain facts presumed to be of historical importance, as well as the striking omissions by the Fourth Gospel of events of cardinal significance in the Synoptic narrative, have often been pressed beyond their real significance. We have traced also the general correspondences in the chief facts and minute details of manner and matter between them, and examined the biographic portraiture of the most noted characters. There remain some general objections of greater or less moment which affect the whole composition.

D. Miscellaneous Objections.—α. The supposed exaggeration, through the mythopœic tendency in the later writer, of the supernatural element. The transmutation by creative process of 'water' into 'wine' is reckoned as an exaggerated and suspicious instance of divine prerogative attributed to the incarnate Logos. But this act seems by no means a more wonderful display of the will of Christ in harmony with the Supreme Will than is the multiplication of the bread, which belongs to the entire tradition. The heightened intensity of some of the special signs selected by 'John' is sometimes cited, e.g. the thirty-eight years of the man's infirmity in ch. 5 is compared disadvantageously with the eighteen years of similar paralysis as mentioned by Lk; so likewise the blindness from birth is compared unfavourably with the temporary blindness which Jesus healed, as recorded by Mt and Mk. But the way in which Mt tells of two blind men where the other evangelists, Mk and Lk, mention one, and two demoniacs instead of one at Gadara, and two multiplications of bread and fish instead of one in the other records, is far more open to the charge of mythical enlargement than anything that is here attributed to the Fourth Gospel. There is a deepening glory in the resurrections from the dead, which has been commented upon since the days of Augustine. The daughter of Jairus just laid upon her deathbed, and the young man at Nain being carried to his grave, might seem insufficient per se to prove that the Lord Jesus had the keys of death in His hands, but the fourth day of death and the probable putridity of Lazarus' corpse are more conclusive evidence that the Lord is King, and can and will raise in some way all that are in the dust of death. He had chosen death and the sepulchre as His special battlefield,—the evangelist had ample facts from which he made selection with reference alike to blindness and death, and in both cases, as well as in the bread sign and the Bethesda 'Sabbath cure,' he apparently chose the incidents for the sake of the discourses with which they were followed, and which he remembered so well. It must not be forgotten in estimating the weight of this argument that the Fourth Gospel is parsimonious in describing specific miracles, though it records the fact of their abundance ($20^{30.\ 31}$). Further, it is the only one of the four which declares that the miraculous is a kind of evidence far inferior to that of intuition and personal recognition of the divine in Himself (Jn 14^{10-14}). The miracle arrested attention, but it was still in the region of the natural and sensuous, and appealed rather to the understanding than to the higher conscience or to the spirit. The most startling and dramatic scenes, including, as we have seen, the temptation, the transfiguration, and the portents of the crucifixion, are shorn of those mysterious accompaniments which are desired by the miracle-loving multitude, and might be described as the unhistorical accretion of years. After prolonged pondering of the problem, we are convinced it might be urged that there is more of the mythical lustre overspreading the Synoptic narrative, more of the imaginative setting, and the solitary uncorroborated event or teaching in both Mt and Lk than in the Fourth Gospel, and more of the pictorial and even dramatic presentation in the Gospel of Mk than in either of them, and still more than in the stern self-repression and spiritual recollections of the great Apostle of Love.

β. Schenkel (Charakterbild Jesu, § ii., and elsewhere throughout his able work), Hase, Renan, Ritschl, and others, have emphasized the absence from the Fourth Gospel of that progressive mental and official development of the character and Messianic claim of Jesus alleged to be discoverable in the Synoptic tradition. But if the Preacher of the Sermon on the Mount identified Himself with 'righteousness,' and declared that, by penetrating the secrets of all hearts, He could and would dispose of the final destinies of individuals; if He was hailed as the Holy One of God by the demoniacs (Mk), and in the synagogue at Nazareth (Lk) aroused inveterate hatred by a double claim to Messianic dignity and to an obnoxious universalism,—there is not much room for development after that, especially when the three Gospels emphasize the significance of the Heavenly Voice which accompanied His baptism by John, and His subsequent transfiguration, as the climax of His Galilæan ministry. We are not concerned to deny the development of Jesus from His birth to the twelfth and afterwards to the thirtieth year of His life. Enough has been told to discriminate His infancy finally from that of the later legends of Buddha, or the precocities and monstrosities of the non-canonical Gospels of the Infancy. The originality of Jesus leaves no room to think that either John the Baptist or Philo, Hillel or Gamaliel, contributed anything to His mental resources or to His Messianic rôle. He knew His own mind, and followed it throughout, allowing the voice of the Father and the foreordained unfolding of human need and inquiry to determine the successive phases of revelation. While He was waiting for God, God was working in all things to the unveiling of His own true nature and the vindication of His love to the uttermost. There appears to be quite a parallel, if not a richer, development in the Fourth Gospel than in the other three. There is a wide space between the language addressed to Nathanael (1^{42}) and that to Philip on the night of the passion: 'Have I been so long time with you,' etc.; between the elementary instructions given to Nicodemus (3^{1-16}) touching the fundamental aspects of the new life, and the true nature of the kingdom of God, as consisting of regenerated men on the one hand, and on the other the sublime teaching of the 'good Shepherd,' the mutual indwelling of the Vine and its branches (ch. 15); the glorification of the Son of God, who would go unto the Father, prepare a place for them, 'come again to them' in the power and presence of the Comforter. Almost every school of criticism admits a momentous advance after the close of ch. 12. Those whom He had gathered out of the world, those who at length had come to believe in the mission of the Lord, are set forth at length as face to face with each other, under the shadow of the cross, in the coronation of sacrifice, suffering, sorrow, and death. A higher strain of instruction pervades the Fourth Gospel than that current in the Synoptic tradition—one more adapted to the solitary inquirers, or to a knot of carping and critical priests, or to the society of His own disciples at great crises of their spiritual history, or to angry sticklers for their own customs when preparing their final and deadly assault upon His life, than to the ordinary and miscellaneous groups at the lake side or on the hill slopes of Galilee. However, the contrast does not interfere with the historicity of either account. The progressive aspects of each group of revelations is obviously the result of the different susceptibilities of His audience and their power to catch the meaning of His teaching. In the case of St. John's Gospel this is heightened by the circumstance that the reporter is throughout one intense, perfervid, yet contemplative spirit, who received from the infinite fulness of the God-incarnate—knowing Him to be this—just the impression which he alone could receive, and in some degree record for after generations.

γ. The Gnostic element in the Fourth Gospel, as distinct from the Synoptic narratives, has been supposed to carry this document from the close of the 1st to the middle of the 2nd cent., to the great disparagement of its biographical and autoptic value. Siegfried, as we have seen, endeavours to establish an influence from Philo of Alexandria upon the entire literature of NT, upon Mt and Ja as well as on Hebrews and the Johannine writings. Thoma has maintained a similar thesis. He even fastens on Valentinus, as Baur had done on Marcion, to redate the Pauline Epistles, and so obtain, a fortiori, a plunge down into the 2nd cent. for the Johannine books. This kind of criticism overshoots itself. Both the 1st cent. B.C. and the 1st and 2nd cents. A.D. were seething with the ferment produced by the blending of Hel. and Oriental ideas, of Gr. and Heb. philosophy and phrase. There is no need to come down to the middle of the 2nd cent. to understand the phraseology of Col or Hebrews, the letters of Ignatius or Barnabas, or the Wisdom of Solomon. Specific terms, such as 'Logos,' 'Life,' and 'Light,' were ready at all times to take up a richer connotation than before. The special contrast between the Synoptists and John, to the disparagement of the latter, has been pressed, as though Jn had thus received the hall-mark of the end of 2nd cent. The question arises whether the creation of the whole world by the Logos or Son is affirmed or repudiated by the Fourth Gospel. Does it recognize the dualistic view of the source of good more than do the Synop. Gospels? Surely the latter give us more references to the malice, mischief, and kingdom of Satan, of darkness and demonism, than the Fourth Gospel, which never refers to demoniac energy. There is nothing more, on the other hand, than a vague side reference to the Creation in the Synoptics (Mk 10^{6}). Such language is by no means so clear and explicit with reference to Creation as πάντα δι' αὐτοῦ ἐγένετο (Jn 1^{3}), nor can it be pretended that matter (ἡ ὕλη) or any other element in the κόσμος is excepted from the πάντα, which owe absolutely their genesis to the Logos. The non-interpenetrating characteristics of 'light' and 'darkness' is not asserted. The power of 'darkness' is not chaotic or anarchic, but represents simply the negation of 'light.' 'Darkness' is not impenetrable to 'light.' The element of will or moral nature enters into the conditions of its permanence. The idea of ὁ πονηρός belongs rather to the Synop. than Johan. representations; see Mt 5^{37} 6^{13} 13^{19}, Lk 11^{26}. S. Davidson considered that Jesus (Jn 17^{9}) did not 'pray for the world,' because the κόσμος was hopelessly beyond the region of conversion or the power of prayer. This interpretation seems entirely inconsistent with 1^{29} 3^{16} 4^{42} $6^{33.\,51}$ 8^{12} 12^{47} 16^{8}, and even with the context of the assertion, 'I pray not for the world,' in which the Lord prays (v.[21]) for those who should believe on Him through the word of His disciples, and looks forward to the great consummation of His own mission, 'that the world may believe that thou didst send me.' This is the final purpose of the Lord's intercession for His disciples. We admit that pervading the Fourth Gospel there is a class of references to an elect kingdom of susceptible souls to be found throughout the world, 'the other sheep' of 10^{16}, cf. $3^{20.\,21}$ 18^{37}, which suggest the wideness of God's mercy, and also the inscrutable and boundless depths of the divine decrees, the extent of the invisible and omnipotent graces affecting human destiny and counteracting human perversity and corruption. This is not Gnosticism, but one of the great teachings of Divine Revelation in the God-man. A Docetic element is charged upon the Fourth Gospel, and the Gnostic Ebionitism of the 2nd cent. is referred to as its source, and the later supposed date is assigned on this ground to the whole class of representation; but the Johan. writings, and especially the Gospel, are the most decidedly pronounced anti-Docetic documents in NT. They speak of the true humanity of the Son of Man with intentional emphasis. Thus the father, mother, brothers of Jesus are spoken of; the weariness, thirst, tears, inward groanings, personal affections, dress, food, spittle, touch, flesh, blood, bones, wounded side, are severally mentioned. He was 'made flesh,' i.e. full humanity; His dead body was partially embalmed, His raiment was divided among the soldiers. After His resurrection He was prepared to take broiled fish and honey and bread. We do not admit a treatment of the supposed phantasmic appearances or disappearances of the Lord (7^{30} 8^{59} 10^{39} 18^{6}) as Gnostic or Docetic in the Fourth, when similar events are recorded in the Synop. Gospels, e.g. Lk 4, as well as the walking on the water and the walk to Emmaus. Hilgenfeld has laid stress on a translation his theory has demanded, that in $8^{43.44}$ our Lord is supposed to refer to 'the father of the devil,' and so to the origination of the devil by some inferior god, like the Jehovah of OT as imagined by the Ophites. The whole of this contention has been taken up favourably by the advocates of the 2nd cent. date. It proceeds from unwillingness to recognize that the Gospel places the difference between the children of God and the children of the devil, not in primordial difference of essence, but in the will of man (see Godet's Introd. vol. i. 182 ff.).

δ. The phenomena of the Johan. discourses unquestionably introduce us to a new atmosphere, and to a place and audience different from those of the Synoptics. This is not finally explained by the frequent suggestion that the Synoptics represent our Lord as addressing the multitudes in Galilee, and that the Fourth Gospel is almost exclusively occupied with individuals, or with small groups of His disciples,—because, on the one hand, we see that the great controversy of ch. 6 was conducted in the synagogue of Capernaum, and those of chs. 5 and 10 were held with large and excited groups in the temple courts. On the other hand, the great Synoptic discourse on the last things was addressed to only four of the twelve disciples. Moreover, the comparison of Mt 5–7 with Lk 6 shows that the Sermon on the Mount was a selection of the most recondite instructions addressed at the first — and in the main — to the inner circle of the disciples. The same features are observed in the special discourse to the twelve disciples in Mt 10, and correspond with much similar instruction given to the seventy disciples in Lk 10^{1-16}. We cannot account for these differences of style and subject-matter on such easy terms. A considerable element of subjective choice is distinctly claimed by the author on two occasions. He selected his materials from copious accumulations, out of a wide range of memory and of tradition. The reporter put them together with the hope and belief that they would evoke confidence in the Messiah-functions and divine Sonship of Jesus (20^{31} and 21^{25}). Some of the most 'Johannine' utterances are likewise to be found in Mt 11^{23}, Lk $10^{25ff.}$. Moreover, every great claim made by our Lord in the Fourth Gospel is anticipated by the direct or implied teaching of the reported sayings, and the miracles and parables of the Synoptics. The diction of these sayings is different from that of the earlier narratives, though it is easy to exaggerate the difference, and to ignore a very fundamental element of the problem. We have already seen how much common matter there is in these four documents. Many proverbial sayings or startling apothegms, found in the Three, are not absent from the Fourth, though they are given in fresh connexions. The strain of the self-consciousness of Jesus appears frequently in the Synoptic narrative, though given there when our Lord was concerned with the judgment of men, and foreboding the consummation of all things. Whatever may be the ultimate solution of this great problem, this at least is shown to be probable, that there was from the first a twofold, double-sided strain in our Lord's discourse, on which minds of congenial and susceptible characteristics would and did lay hold, with verbal tenacity, when brought into intimate relation with Him. This corresponds with analogous phenomena in other regions of biographical record. Only by blending these and some dissimilar elements can we obtain the approximate portraiture. We need to combine the commonplace representation of the man Socrates by the matter-of-fact Xenophon, and even the lampoon of the Sophists in the comic satire of Aristophanes, with Plato's ideal of the great teacher, martyr, citizen, and philosopher, before we have the historic Socrates on our canvas. In like manner we are bound to take account of the Pauline Christ and that of the Ep. to the Hebrews, the 'unwritten words,' the threefold type of the Synoptists, and, above all, that representation which in this Gospel presses most near to that portion of His consciousness wherein He communes with the Father and with Himself. In these conversations and soliloquies the subjective element of the reporter is more conspicuous than elsewhere. The prince of biographers is he who is able to gather up the spirit and gist of a long conversation or discourse, and present it in the words of the Master Himself. This is exactly what John seems to have done, and thus he brings us nearer than any other to the great historic reality—'historic,' i.e. not, as often implied, on purely non-supernatural lines, but in the sense of objective fact.

The opponents of the authenticity of the Fourth Gospel urge that the writer, alike in his prologue and in the report of the Lord's words in the epilogue, and in the first Ep., adopts a style of expression which he puts into the mouth of Nathanael and Nicodemus, Mary and Martha, Caiaphas and Pilate, the blind man and John the Baptist, corresponding in diction so closely with the phraseology of Jesus, as to suggest that the Greek words of all the speakers, including the Lord Himself, are nothing else than St. John's own strongly characterized vocabulary and diction. Some of the most acute and learned defenders of the authenticity of the document have not hesitated practically to admit this contention. Watkins (in his Bampton Lectures, and in his article on the same theme in Smith's DB[2]) has maintained the possibility of which we have spoken, and has endeavoured to account for the phenomena by the simple theory of translation from an Aramaic original. It is probable that some of the discourses have undergone this process of translation. There is a distinct tradition to a similar effect with reference to the Gospel of Matthew. The same peculiarity must be held equally possible in Mk and Lk. And many of the difficulties are surmounted in the present case by the theory of the translation of words uttered in Aramaic into the Greek of Jn, which, having been built up through long years, enabled him to make use of it in representing the words of others, and then he may have adopted the same favourite terms, and a somewhat similar construction of sentences on all occasions. But we cannot admit that this hypothesis completely satisfies the facts of the case.

ε. The diction of our Lord and of His biographer. There are peculiarities of diction, vocabulary, and structure which are certainly adopted by this writer—Gr. words are used by him and by no other, some of which are somewhat uncommon, such as ἄντλημα, ἀποσυνάγωγος, βιβρώσκειν, γλωσσόκομον, δακρύειν, δίδυμος, ἐπιχρίειν, θήκη, θρέμματα, κέρμα, κολλυβιστής, νιπτήρ, προσαίτης. But in respect of special vocabulary Jn does not differ from other writers of NT. Again, there is a peculiar fondness manifested in Gospel and Epistle for certain special and almost technical words, — which by frequent repetition acquire a deeper meaning,— such as φῶς (23 times), δόξα (42), κόσμος (78), μαρτυρία (47), γινώσκειν (55), πιστεύειν (98), σημεῖον (17 times). It is also clear that the writer adopted a Semitic connotation for ו in the καί which he makes do ample duty for the various connective particles of the Gr. tongue. A common phenomenon in the Johannine writings is simple juxtaposition of sentences, often producing by the mere use of καί, and in fact sometimes without it, an ad-versative, concessive, or peculiar emphasis (1^4 15^{24} 3^{11} 5^{39}). The very common antithesis of μέν and δέ is almost dropped, and καί repeatedly made to represent δέ. It is curious that the writer, after using λόγος in ch. 1, subsequently drops it and never puts it into the lips of Jesus. It recurs in the 1 Ep. (ch. 1) and in the Apocalypse. It therefore becomes clear by this and many other passages and peculiarities that the author had a Greek diction somewhat peculiar to himself, which he used when following his own lines of meditation or narrative. Attention may also be called to the remarkable fact, that he puts into the lips of our Lord no fewer than 145 words which he never uses in his own person. Thirty-eight of these are found also in the Synop. account of our Lord's discourses. A similar peculiarity of expression or construction is reserved by the writer for Jesus, but never adopted by himself. There are nine peculiarities of our Lord's diction, such as the reduplicated 'Amen,' which are peculiar to Jn and never found elsewhere. There are 500 words which are freely used by him in his own portions of the Gospel or in the words of one or other of the interlocutors, which he never attributes to our Lord, so that the phenomena of translation still leave some problems to be solved by closer investigation. That there was a certain amount of translation is obvious, and some strong subjective element in the selection and arrangement of material cannot be ignored; but an effort must have been made to conserve the sacred words of the Lord Jesus in a phraseology which was supposed especially adapted to represent and enshrine the original utterances of the Master. This becomes more obvious when the evangelist frequently comes into direct communication with his reader: when he speaks in propriâ personâ occasionally he offers a commentary on the words of our Lord, perhaps even an expansion along certain lines of his own, of the words of Jesus which, though he caught them (and even transferred them into Gr.), he had not fully comprehended. These contrasts between the writer's memories and his explanations, both of the narrative and of the discourse, deserve far more attention than they have received.

The surpassing majesty of the Prologue ($1^{1\text{-}18}$) indicates that the mind of the writer was interpenetrated, overwhelmed with the effect produced by his contact with the Lord Jesus Christ. Clearly, he could think of Him as nothing less than 'the only-begotten of the Father,' as the Agent by whom the fulness of grace and truth broke upon the world,—and yet he drew a distinction between ὁ θεός and the λόγος as divine element in Jesus, although in the same breath declaring an identity between them. The Word, said he, was 'in the beginning,' and 'with God,' and yet 'was God.' It was 'the Word' by whom 'all things' came into being. The Word was both the source and the sphere of life, of that life which was light. All the light which had ever flashed into the darkness, and which the darkness was too gross to admit, was the beaming of His face. This conflict with the darkness resulted in most tragical issues. Nevertheless, this Word at length came into the world, and did so along fresh lines, not merely as eminent in all life and light, but as a fully constituted humanity—'flesh.' From this point onward he proceeded to show how the soliloquies and words of Jesus fell upon his sensitive and susceptible soul, as belonging rather to eternity than to time, as voices which had in them an infinity of meaning and of truth. He selected a few only of these for description and comment, and they grew in weight and wonder till he laid down the pen. At the same time, we feel that the Lord did not write, and could not have written, the Prologue. The logical exordium, the sublime climax, were neither in our Lord's own manner nor in His own phrase, as afterwards reported by the evangelist. A full discussion of this comparison must be reserved for some other place, but a brief treatment of a few of the most salient passages may be attempted.

§. The incommensurability between the writer and his theme. We come into close contact with the writer in the following passages:—1^{25} $2^{9\text{-}11.\ 21\ 23\text{-}25}$ $3^{18\text{-}21.\ 23}$, possibly $^{34\text{-}36}$ $4^{1\text{-}6}$ $5^{1\text{-}6}$ $6^{6.\ 15.\ 17.\ 64.\ 65}$ $7^{30.\ 39}$ $8^{9.\ 20}$ $9^{7.\ 22}$ $10^{41.\ 42}$ $11^{6.\ 13.\ 33\text{-}35.\ 51.\ 52}$ $12^{16.\ 33.\ 37\text{-}43}$, possibly $12^{46\text{-}50}$ $13^{1\text{-}6.\ 11.\ 28\text{-}30}$ $16^{17\text{-}19}$ 17^3 $18^{4.\ 9.\ 14.\ 28.\ 32}$ $19^{14.\ 24.\ 28.\ 35\text{-}37}$ $20^{30.\ 31}$ $21^{14.\ 23\text{-}25}$. These passages are independent of pure narrative, and are selected mainly because the writer essays to inform his readers of the secret sentiment of the disciples or of others, which does not appear in the narrative itself, but still more because of the way in which he attempts to make more obvious the words of the Lord Himself, when the wisdom of his interpretation, though doubtless up to a point conveying a deep or an obvious meaning, is not equal to the accuracy of his report. Only a few of these can be indicated here. 2^{21} 'But he spake of the temple of his body,' was doubtless a natural inference of a believer in the bodily resurrection of Jesus from the death to which the Sadducean party would in the main condemn Him. The first notes of the death-peal were sounded in the temple. The departure of Jesus from Jerus. was proof of the kind of reception which the great Prophet received from 'his own' as soon as 'darkness' set itself to quench the new 'light.' This was one and the nearest interpretation. But with all the subsequent history of the spiritual temple of believing men, and of the rapidity—the 'three days'—in which the new body and temple rose into spiritual splendour and sufficiency, it is difficult to believe that the evangelist sounded or grasped all the significance of the weighty words. The question whether 3^{16} or $^{18\text{-}21}$, and again $^{34\text{-}36}$, are expansions of the remembered and cited words of Jesus and the Baptist in the explanatory terms of the evangelist, cannot be discussed here, yet would not have arisen if criticism had not recognized in both places the subtle difference between the individuality of the evangelist and the style of each of his masters. The frequent reference to 'the hour' of Jesus, as in 7^{30} $8^{20.\ 59}$ 10^{39}, suggests the knitted, anxious brow of the evangelist as he watched the approach of crisis, and the mysterious deliverance of the Lord from the malice, the arrest, the stones of His enemies. It is curious that many of the chief puzzles of exegesis are to be found in the evangelist's own comment or narrative. By far the most difficult theological crux is 7^{39}, which yields perhaps its treasure up to patient inquiry; but the statement of the passage is entirely due to 'John,' viz., that 'until Jesus was glorified' the Holy Spirit was not, had not been ('given' or 'manifested'). This assertion is apparently discordant with the teaching of Christ and his apostles, and of John himself. It was a question of 'more' or 'less,' not a contrast between nothing and something. The fulness or splendour of the new dispensation varies with the vital truth and revelation of God wherewith He energizes in the consciousness and even below the consciousness. The contrast between the quickening of intelligence under the OT, and the descent of the Holy Spirit upon Jesus, is so great as to account for John's words, and a fortiori the contrast between the ministry of the synagogue and the ascended Lord. The evangelist makes a great and unintentional revelation of himself in $13^{1\text{-}5}$. His mind must have been working in flights of unparalleled ecstasy when he endeavoured to convey the impression which the feet-washing had made upon him. But the style of the passage, the assumption of co-ordinate emotions in the bosom of Jesus, and the motives not verbally revealed, differ profoundly from the diction and method of thought of the Lord Himself. St. John was able to represent the tones of the 'eternal now' when recording the words of Jesus, but when he tried to reflect the motives or inner spirit of Christ he could find no adequate language.

The purport of the Gospel and the plan and classification of its subject-matter have been variously presented by successive critics and commentators from Lampe of Utrecht (1724) to the present hour under the handling of Reuss, Godet, Luthardt, Thoma, and Beyschlag. Because the structure of this very wonderful book reveals a gathering intensity of meaning, and the succession of events a climacteric force, it does not follow that the broad outline of the chronology has been tampered with in either historical or theological interests. Many of the lives of our greatest men naturally arrange themselves in epochs, great opportunities, deep sayings of historic significance, crises, tragedies—as, e.g., those of Socrates, Cæsar, Buddha, Luther, William of Orange. Now, if we can accept the fundamental idea of God manifest in the flesh, we are satisfied that the most unsympathetic narrator would unconsciously sift material, and gather climax, and glow with dramatic intensity in spite of himself. The Synoptic narrative, with its most solemn and far-reaching suggestions, has prepared the way for the Fourth Gospel, which everywhere presupposes the existence of the wider and more copious detail. It lays down firmly the chronological points, between which it is not impossible to show that the vistas of miracle, parable, self-revelation open out. The non-obtruded but certain septenary arrangement, the gathering of the glory as the story moves from eternity to eternity, the poetic framework showing that from the great deep to the great deep it goes, does not disturb its true proportions of credible and realizable fact.

η. The order of the thought due to the evangelist.—We will make some attempt to show what is the actual order of the thought, whether intentional or not, on the part of the evangelist. As many writers show careful and subtle alliteration in their prose, rhythm and accentuation in their poetry, without any consciousness on their part, so the progress of the thought comes into view with the evolution of the life and self-revelation.

A. Proem. chs. 1–4 contain specimens of the nature and method of the Lord—first manifestations of the Logos Incarnate to His own, to Israel, and the world.—i. Prologue, 1^{1-18}. Explanation of the astonishing phenomena which Jn proceeds to record. Jesus is all that Synoptists endeavoured to prove, viz. Messiah, Son of God, Son of Man; but to St. John He is all this, because He is the incarnation of 'the Word,' v.14, who is in the beginning 'with God' and 'God,' and has been variously manifested and active before the incarnation, in nature, prophecy, conscience, and grace.

ii. The testimonies of the forerunner, 1^{19-34}.

iii. The testimony of the first witnesses, 1^{35-51}.

iv. The testimony of two great signs, $2-3^{2}$.

v. Revelation of heavenly things and the new life and redemption; meaning of the whole revelation, 3^{3-21}.

vi. The final testimony of the great seer, 3^{22-36}.

vii. The ministry of the Lord beyond the limits of the theocracy, the Life-giver, the Prophet, and Saviour, 4^{1-42}.

viii. The summation of the Galilæan ministry, 4^{43-54}.

B. The conflict of the Logos Incarnate with His own people, down to the signing of the death-warrant, chs. 5–11.

iv. The request of the Greeks and the reply of Jesus, including the glorification of the Son of Man in and through death, and the anticipation of Gethsemane, 12^{20-29}.

v. Last words, and the reflections of the evangelist, 12^{30-50}.

D. The final manifestation of the Word Incarnate as love unto the uttermost, chs. 13–17.

I. The inner glorification of the perfect love to His own disciples.—i. Self-abandoning service, while simultaneously giving the highest expression of His divine commission and His God-consciousness, 13^{1-11}.

ii. Followed by the exclusion of the faithless disciple. 'It was night,' 13^{18-30}.

iii. The last conversation and discourse. (1) The glorification of the Son of Man, with its great demand on the disciples, 13^{31-35}. (2) The question of Simon Peter and its terrible response and sublime consolations ($13^{36}-14^{4}$). (3) The question of Thomas—bringing out the reply, that He, by death, was their way to the Father, 14^{5-7}. (4) The question of Philip, with greater revelations and the promise of the greater works, 14^{8-21}. (5) The question of Judas, the conditions of His self-manifestation, 14^{22-31}. (6) The parable of the Vine and its branches, 15^{1-10}. (7) The results of the union of Christ and His disciples—bitter but glorious, $15^{11}-16^{6}$. (8) The promise of the Paraclete, 16^{7-33}. (9) The high-priestly intercession for Himself, for His disciples, for the whole Church, 17^{1-26}.

II. The more outward and public glorification in the passion, $18-19^{42}$.—i. The betrayal, 18^{1-12}.

ii. Examination before Annas, with the discomfiture and denial of Simon Peter, 18^{13-27}.

iii. The Roman trial, presupposing the decision of the Sanhedrin, $18^{28}-19^{16}$.

iv. The crucifixion. Love unto the uttermost, 19^{17-24}.

v The words from the cross, 19^{25-30}.

vi. The side-piercing and the burial, 19^{31-42}.

III. The final glorification and the Resurrection.

(1) The evangelist's own personal conviction, 20^{1-10}.

(2) The manifestation to adoring love, 20^{11-18}.

(3) The manifestation to the ten disciples and others, 20^{19-20}.

(4) The manifestation to anxious scepticism, eliciting the cry, 'My Lord and my God,' 20^{24-29}.

(5) The peace, the gifts of the Spirit, ib.

(6) The evangelist's summation of His argument throughout, 20^{30-31}.

IV. The Epilogue.

(1) The manifestation of Himself in the work of life, 21^{1-14}.

(2) The service of love. The rehabilitation of, and solemn charge given to, Simon Peter, 21^{15-19}.

(3) Special manifestation to waiting love, 21^{20-23}.

(4) Identification of the author by subsequent editors with the disciple whom Jesus loved, $21^{24f.}$.

By whomsoever this marvellous document was constructed, it is unique in literature. The concentration and supernatural fulness of the subject-matter — sentence within sentence, hint within hint—reveals worlds of reality with the prodigality wherewith Nature surprises us. An immensely difficult task has been successfully finished by the simplest means; the Divine-Human Christ of the Ep. to Hebrews and the Christ of Ro 3 and 8 and 1 Co 1–4 and 10–15, of Eph and Col, nay, the mysterious personality of Rev 1–3, is not incompatible with the preacher of the Sermon and the parables of the Sower, the Drag-net, and the Prodigal Son; and here He lives before us, and there is no inconsistency. The Supreme Man reveals Himself, still without comparison or analogy or rival, among the sons of men. He stands absolutely alone, yet infinitely near, the one who sums up but transcends all physical and physiological law. All attempts to account for the document upon principles other than those we have contended for, every hypothesis made to bring it down to the middle of the 2nd cent., and there to find an occasion or an author, must be pronounced to have failed, and we fall back upon the memories and love of the first generation or two after this great revelation had been made. It is bound by links which cannot be broken, to the history, the geography, the religion of the day, but transcends as yet all mere human history or known ways of nature.

VII. LITERATURE. — The translation by C. R. Gregory of Luthardt's St. John, the Author of the Fourth Gospel, is enriched by a voluminous list of all the works and pamphlets written on the positive and negative side of this prolonged controversy, from Evanson, an Anglican clergyman in 1792, to Beyschlag in 1875. It occupies eighty 8vo pages. Crombie in his tr. of Meyer's Comm. on Jn has furnished an ample catalogue of selected works, bearing more upon the interpretation and exegesis of the text than on the controversy about its origin. These lists were completed in 1875. Watkins' Bampton Lectures have carried critical and classified enumeration to a later date. A digest of the most noteworthy literature and epoch-making works is all that can be here appended.

Evanson (Ipswich, 1792), with insufficient evidence, gave voice to a rising spirit of free-thinking among the English Deists of an earlier part of the century touching the 'dissonance of the four evangelists,' etc., and suggested that the Fourth was the work of a Platonist of the 2nd cent. Evanson was replied to by no other than Joseph Priestley and by James Simpson, and again took arms in 1794 in defence of his thesis. In 1796 Eckermann assailed the genuineness of the Gospels on the ground of the prominence therein given to miracles. He was one of the first who endeavoured to discriminate between the apost. or Johan. nucleus of the Gospel, and that which he thought had been added by later hands. Two years later, Eckermann retracted these views, 1798. Discussions prevailed between Schmidt and Bolton as to the original language, Syriac or Greek, in which the Gospel had first been written. In 1801 Vogel wrote a vulgar book in which he gave a melodramatic turn to the controversy by bringing the author of the Gospel for trial at the judgment day. Luthardt-Gregory enumerates about fifty works before 1820, but no deep impression was produced until the celebrated theologian Bretschneider issued his Modest Enquiries into the Genius and Origin of the Gospel and Epistle of John, in which he gathered to a point all the doubts that had been in the air for a generation. He was ably answered by Olshausen, Lücke, and others, and admitted that his doubts were resolved. Schleiermacher after this did not hesitate to recognize the true historical character of the Christ of John, anticipating views which have long been held in suspense. For several years the positions of Bretschneider were reconsidered by positive and negative critics. Paulus, de Wette, Sartorius, Stein, E. G. Bengel, Hase's different editions of his Leben Jesu, 1829 and 1834, and fifty other publications, prepared the way for the four edd. of the celebrated Life of Jesus by Strauss, 1835–1840, with which it is well to compare Das Leben Jesu für das Deutsche Volk, 1864. Neander's Life of Christ largely contributed to the refutation of Strauss, just as the latter had reduced to ridicule the rationalistic anti-supernaturalism of Paulus. Bruno Bauer (1840) made it clear that the mythical theory could not explain the Fourth Gospel, which throughout reveals the presence of a commanding thinker, who, if not a poet of distinct romantic faculty, must have been a wilful forger. Ebrard and others handled this hypothesis with severity. De Wette, Schenkel (1840), Reuss, Schwegler, and many others, grappled with special aspects of the many-sided controversy. In 1840 the highly important Introd. and Comm. of Lücke of Göttingen appeared, followed in 1852 by his celebrated Einleitung in die Offenbarung des Johannes, in which the authenticity of the Gospel is sustained by referring the Apocalypse to the Presbyter. Cf. Luthardt, De Compositione Evangelii Johannis. Andrews Norton, Genuineness of the four Gospels, 1837–1848, made a most notable contribution to the discussion as it stood before the efforts of Baur of Tübingen. The latter epoch-making theologian commenced his assault by maintaining, in 1844, that the Gospel could not have been written before A.D. 160. In the Th. Jahrb. 1845, Zeller pushed the date forward another decade. Baur wrote Krit. Untersuch. über d. Canon. Evangelien, Einleit. in d. NT. theol. Wissenschaft (1850–51 of Th. Jahrb.), Das Christenthum und d. Christl. Kirche d. drei ersten Jahrh. (1853, 3rd ed. 1863). In 1854 he replied to Luthardt, Fr. Delitzsch, Brückner, and Hase, who had disputed his positions. Hilgenfeld, in 1854, Die Evangelien, does not consent to postpone the date of the origin beyond A.D. 120–140. Schneider, 1854, Die Aechtheit des Jn. Evangeliums nach den Ausseren Zeugnissen, made an able reply to Baur's treatment of the internal evidence. Scholten, Schürer (to some extent), Ebrard, Luthardt (with reference to the relation of the Gospel to Justin Martyr and the Clementines) fought the issues earnestly. In 1856 Jordan Bucher issued his Des Apostels Johannes Lehre von Logos, nach ihrem Wesen und Ursprunge, and endeavoured to identify the Logos of 'John' and Philo; and in 1857 Baur again replied. The date of the last passover now took a prominent place in the debate, and Tholuck again defended the position of the Fourth Gospel. The main thesis of Baur and Hilgenfeld and others was the discovery of a system of Church organization and Christian ideas through which the Fourth Gospel could alone have seen the light. Baur supposes that the Gospel reveals the presence of the 2nd cent. Gnosis, and further, that it reflects the healing of a conjectural and violent schism between the Jerus. apostles and St. Paul, and the Churches which derived their origin and tone from these sources respectively. The two tendencies towards Judaic exclusiveness on the one hand and Pauline universalism on the other, were intensified by Marcionitic anti-Judaism on the one side and Montanistic revolt against the Episcopate on the other. In the writings of Baur the further speculation was hazarded, that towards the close of the 2nd cent. a tendency towards co-operation began; that the Epp. to Col, Eph, Ti and Tit, He, and the Bk. of Ac, were fabricated to bring about a fusion of the hostile parties; that this Gospel was a part of the system of forgeries by which the Cath. Church was originated. It is supposed that an unknown writer cunningly suggested that he was the beloved friend of Jesus and knew His inmost heart; His belief in the theocracy, that 'salvation was of the Jews,' but that God was 'a Spirit'; that among Greeks as well as Jews the buried corn of wheat would bring forth much fruit. This extraordinary writer was ready to justify the Montanistic realization of the grace of the Paraclete, and also, by a delicate series of modifications of the Synoptic tradition, to make the passover of the Jews reach its climax at the hour of the crucifixion; and he sought, moreover, to link the Christ with the ΛΟΓΟΣ of a popular philosophy. Every line of the Gospel was searched for confirmation of some portion of the hypothesis; and adverse elements were cleverly contrived to spread out the occasion for the publication of the spiritual Gospel. The strife between the Eastern and Western Churches as to the celebration of the Easter festival had broken out, and it was a masterstroke to show that one of the Jerus. apostles, who is traditionally reported to have followed the Jewish celebration on the 14th Nisan, the day preceding the crucifixion, had actually set forth the identification of the crucifixion of Jesus with the sacrifice of the paschal lamb. Baur fixed A.D. 170 as the date when this astonishing feat of forgery, concealed polemic, and spiritual manifesto, first saw the light. The question of this date was discussed with great acumen. Ebrard (Introd. to Comm.), Thiersch, Hilgenfeld, Lange, Steitz in numerous articles in German journals, with occasional replies from Baur, who died in 1860, kept the controversy before the world.

We have already shown reason to believe that the date assigned by Baur, viz. A.D. 170, is quite untenable, and that step by step the appearance of the Gospel must be antedated at least by forty years and pushed back to the time of Basilides or Valentinus, who must have had the ideas and phrases of the Gospel before them. It has at length become impossible to deny that Justin quoted from the Fourth Gospel, and increasingly probable that Tatian, his contemporary and disciple, actually constructed a Harmony of the Four Gospels, with a chronological basis in the Gospel of John. In 1862 H. Ewald showed that no authorship of an ancient writing is so conclusively attested as that of the Fourth Gospel (see Die Johan. Schriften übersetzt u. erklärt). Weiss and Weizsäcker discussed, in Jahrb. f. deutsche Theologie, the relation of the Logos doctrine of John to its sources. Strauss and Hilgenfeld, in 1863, made assault upon the Mur. Canon and on minor defences of the Gospel; Volkmar, Renan, A. Réville thought to rehabilitate the argument that if the Fourth Gospel had been in use in A.D. 150, Marcion would have found it more useful for his purpose than Luke's. We have elsewhere shown that Marcion could not even by mutilation have expunged from John's Gospel the humanity of Jesus, his reverence for the Old Covenant, his identification of 'the Lord' of OT, the Creator of all things, with the God and Father of Christ.

In 1863 van Oosterzee's Life of Christ, Hengstenberg's Comm. on Gospel, favoured, while Echthal's Les Évangiles attacked the authenticity. Martineau's review of Renan's Vie de Jésus, and Astié, Explication de l'Évangile, followed in 1864, with Nicholas' advocating of a partition theory. To this may be added Schenkel's Charakterbild Jesu, which suggested that the original nucleus of the Gospel appeared A.D. 110–120, and was afterwards coloured by the Gnostic speculations of Basilides and Valentinus. In 1866 Holtzmann in Bunsen's Bibelwerk, Pressensé in his Jésus Christ son temps sa vie, etc., and Sabatier, Essai sur les sources de la vie,—all three maintaining the authenticity,—were encountered by Keim, Geschichte Jesu von Nazara, etc., who argued (1867) that the Gospel was published at the beg. of 2nd cent. under the name of the Apostle John, who nevertheless had never been in Ephesus. Taylor, An Attempt to ascertain the Character of the Fourth Gospel in relation to the three first, was strongly opposed to the authenticity. Tobler attempted to cut out the original kernel, and later on (1870) he reduced it to 81 verses. Oosterzee and Scholten again took up opposite sides, so also Ezra Abbot, Higginson, Milligan, and S. Davidson. In 1868 Riggenbach endeavoured to show that the Presbyter John and the apostle were one and the same. In 1869 Holtzmann returned to the controversy, as did Meyer, Introd. to the Exeg. Handb., Godet, Komm. z. d. Ev. Johannis, written also in French and translated into English. Stanley Leathes' Boyle Lecture (1870) on The Witness of St. John to Christ and Hilgenfeld kept up the struggle. In 1871 Krenkel, in his work, Der Apostel Johannes, argued that the apostle was the author of Apoc., but not of Gospel; cf. Milligan, arts. in Contemp. Rev. and Brit. and For. Evang. Rev.; and Hutton, Essays, Theological and Literary, who defended with great force the historicity of the Gospel against Baur and his followers. Holtzmann once more took up the claims of John the Presbyter. In 1872 appeared the important Comm. and Introd. of Schaff, being a tr. and great enlargement of Lange's Comm. in his Bibelwerk; and the singularly valuable Authorship and Hist. Character of 4th Gospel, by Sanday, followed in 1876 by The Gospels in the 2nd Cent. In 1874 was published Supernatural Religion, An Inquiry into the Reality of Divine Revelation, which created almost a literature of reply. The anonymous writer was vehemently adverse to the authenticity of this Gospel (vol. ii. 251–476) on every ground and every side issue. Lightfoot in the Contemp. Rev. (afterwards republished); Sanday in the Gospels during the 2nd Cent.; Row, The Jesus of the Evangelists; Luthardt, Der Johan. Ursp. des 4ten Evang. (tr. into Eng. by C. R. Gregory, 1875),—replied very successfully. Farrar's Life of Christ (1874) sustained the authenticity; but Hilgenfeld, in 1875, in Hist.-Krit. Einleit. in das NT., determined the limits of production between A.D. 132 and 140. Mangold (Bleek's Einleit.) was again adverse, but Matthew Arnold, Review of Objections to Literature and Dogma, (Cont. Review, afterwards republished in God and the Bible), defended the authenticity with high literary tact, but by falling back in part on some special partition theory of his own. In 1882 the remarkable work appeared of Albrecht Thoma, Die Genesis des Johan. Evang.: ein Beitrag zu seiner Ausleg., Gesch., u. Kritik, in which the author endeavoured to find an Alex.-Philonic origin for the entire Gospel, which is dealt with as Philo handled the Pent., and which, on this hypothesis, could have had no meaning save among the Neoplatonic schools, where supposed forecasts and summaries of history were only cryptograms of philosophical theory, e.g. ch. 9 is regarded as a cipher of the position and career of St. Paul, and ch. 21 an outline of the history of the Acts of Apostles. With ingenuity the theory was carried through 879 pages. In 1882 (Eng. tr. 1883) appeared B. Weiss, Life of Christ. The chapters on the 'Johannine' sources are singularly impressive, and vindicate the historicity of the Gospel against the speculations of various offshoots of the Tübingen School. The theory of the reminiscence of one who had fathomed the deep secret of the Incarnate Logos in Jesus, interprets the author's 'ideal elevation and spiritual form, but also his historical trustworthiness. If it be regarded as the invention of a semi-Gnostic philosopher of the 2nd cent., it is a delusive will-o'-the-wisp—in truth, a gigantic lie.' In the same sense Godet's invaluable Introd. to his Commentary touches and illumines every part of this great subject (Eng. tr. 1887). In 1885 Salmon's Hist. Introd. to the Study of NT gave ample space and great freshness to the maintenance of the authenticity. Edward Reuss in his Hist. of Sac. Scrip. of NT, tr. into Eng. by Houghton from the 5th Germ. ed., with additional bibliographical details, minimized the value of the external evidence, and left it as only barely possible that Jn was the work of the apostle. The introductory discussions of Hengstenberg are scattered throughout his Commentary. Special excursuses on the Paschal and other questions are to be found in M'Clellan's great work on the Gospels. Against Edwin Abbott's view in his article 'Gospels' in *Encyc. Brit.*9 may be put Ezra Abbot's External Evidence of the Fourth Gospel, and Westcott's Introd. to his invaluable Comm. on the Gospel in Speaker's Commentary (and published separately); also Milligan and Moulton, Introd. to their Comm. in Schaff's Popular Commentary, and Watkins' Introd. to Comm. in Ellicott's Comm. for Eng. Readers, as well as his very important discussion of the history of criticism in Bampton Lectures for 1890; Reynolds' Introd. to his Comm. on Jn in the Pulpit Commentary. Keim in his voluminous Life of Jesus of Nazara settled down to the date A.D. 130 and to a repudiation of St. John's residence in Ephesus. He decided that early antiquity was grievously misled by Irenæus in this and other respects, just as Riggenbach, Farrar, and others think that the very personality of 'John the Presbyter' has been created by an ill-starred guess of Eusebius. In Handkom. z. NT ('Joh. Evangelium'), Holtzmann, 1890, argues that the most extreme critical view which he adopts doubles the value of the Gospel. Edersheim's Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah (1883) throws vivid light upon the Johan. as well as other sources of the great biography by his intimate acquaintance with Heb. literature. In 1890 Hugo Delff, Das 4 Evangelium, and (1883) in his Grundzüge des Entwick.-Geschichte d. Religion, advocated a special view which creates many fresh difficulties, that 'John' was neither the son of Zebedee, nor John the Presbyter, nor the author of the Apoc., but a well-to-do philosophical disciple of Jesus, whom He loved and who was specially acquainted with the ministry in Jerus., who was subsequently confounded with the John of Acts and Apocalypse. P. Ewald, in 1890, Das Hauptproblem der Evangelienfrage, strove to bring out the original Johan. nucleus of the entire evangelical tradition, of which John has given the richest anthology. In 1891 Gloag issued Introd. to the Johan. Writings. This is one of the most complete résumés of the entire question in the light of modern criticism, embracing not only the Gospel but the Epp. and the Apocalypse. Harnack in his History of Dogma, vol. i. 96–98, admits that the origin of the Johan. writings is 'a marvellous enigma,' that therein a Christ clothes the indescribable with words, that a Pauline Christ walks on the earth 'far more human than the Christ of Paul, yet far more divine.' He seems to admit that Christ Himself is the author of ch. 17, but all is suffused in a bright cloud of the supra-historical. He repudiates the dependence on Philo and Hellenism, with which John has little in common but the word λόγος, and he regards the author as a born Jew. Important articles have appeared at various times in the Expositor by Lightfoot, Sanday, and others. In 1891 Willibald Beyschlag of Halle published his NT Theol. (Eng. tr. 1895). In vol. i. pp. 216–221 he avows his firm conviction of the genuineness of the Gospel, that it rests on historic facts and is superior to the Synoptists in many important details, that 'the Logos Romance' is a critical failure, and, notwithstanding great difficulties, he imagines that the subjective element necessary to a character formed and trained by the Master Himself may solve them.

VIII. The Teaching of the Fourth Gospel.

—A. Theology and Christology.—The teaching of Jesus cannot be satisfactorily discriminated from that of the evangelist, except in places where the latter speaks in propriâ personâ, or offers his interpretation of the Master's words. Alike in the Epistle and Prol. to Gospel, the apostle sums up or generalizes the teaching of Christ or of His mighty deeds, and for the ideas, thought by thought, fact by fact, he brings out a justification in the narrative itself. As to the Abbrechungen and Incongruenzen on which Wendt insists as indicating different strains of thought and purpose, e.g. in the different estimate of ἔργα, σημεῖα, and ῥήματα in the great plan of the Supreme Teacher, the reconciliation is not far to seek, and is to be found in the divine-human majesty of the Lord, whose Personality gives unity to all his representation. The consciousness of the Lord Jesus, as brought out in the fourfold revelation, provides the fact upon which the constructive intelligence of later centuries has founded its doctrine of the Godhead. To put it in a word, the Doctrine of the Divinity is simply an endeavour to state without explanation the various elements of that unique consciousness. The most fundamental element in the entire teaching is the absolute oneness of the Deity. Christ never taught the existence of two or three Gods, though the unity or solity embraced the divine indwelling in the entire universe, an infinite transcendence involving the internal relations of Fatherhood and Sonship, and all the mighty operations of the Spirit in the world and in the minds of men. There is only one veritable God, μόνος ἀληθινὸς θεός (17[3]), although the Lord was self-conscious of the nearest possible approach of the centres of the spheres, both of His divine and human nature, to the Centre of the all-including and embracing Unity. The theophanies of the OT are outshone by the eternal knowledge of the Only-begotten (1[18] and 6[46]), and the adequate sufficing power of the human life and consciousness of Jesus to disclose the secrets of the divine bosom. This revelation differs widely from the Gnostic or Oriental or modern impersonality, 'the Absolute.' Here the ineffable is clothed in forms not incompatible with the Eternal Unity. 'Father,' 'Son,' 'Word,' 'Love,' 'Life,' 'Light,' 'Spirit' are terms which make no schism of the one Deity, but are each necessary concepts in it. This is so complete and thoroughgoing that Fairbairn has skilfully pressed the position that the Lord Jesus was in fact the first monotheist in the history of the world.

A few of the elements of this great synthesis must be specified.

(1) In 4[24ff.] the spirituality of the One who is called 'the Father' is insisted upon. The spirit of man leads the way to the most direct realization of the Eternal.

(2) He is the living and life-giving One, or even Life itself. In the Logos—who is God—there is Life. The mystery of 'life' was not solved, or a definition given, by Jesus or the evangelists; nor is the mystery reduced, but intensified, by the widest and latest researches of science; but St. John may at least be credited with seeing behind the inexplicable phenomena of 'life'—physical, ethical, spiritual, and eternal—nothing less than the personal activity of the Lord God, the Living One.

(3) In this life is light. In 1 Jn 1[5] God is (not luminous, but) 'Light, and in him is no darkness at all,' no evil, no imperfection, absolute purity, goodness, righteousness, and illumination (Jn 17[25] 1[4, 5]).

(4) The most characteristic doctrine of God which we must attribute to the evangelist is that God is Love (1 Jn 4[8]), or that the most essential quality and absolute essence of God is that which freely lavishes Himself on the objects of His love. The moral perfections which our Lord attributes to this living and loving One are truth (8[-6]), righteousness (17[25]), and holiness (17[11]).

(5) But the most characteristic name and function is that of 'Father,' 'my Father,' 'your Father,' the 'living Father' who has life in Himself (5[-6]), who seeks for spiritual worshippers (4[23], where the vital internal relation between God as Father and God as Spirit is made very evident). This fatherly love is, first of all, lavished on the Son and on those who are given to Him. He becomes the source of life to others, and in Him God loves the world (5[19. 26] 10[17] 17[24. 26] and 3[16]). Preparation for this revelation of Fatherhood is found in OT and Hel. thought and in the Synop. teaching, but the Fourth Gospel is peculiarly saturated with the ennobling and uplifting thought. Here we come face to face with one who could speak of the Almighty as 'my Father.' He was the 'wisdom' and the 'power' of God, not only (as St. Paul represented it) as the 'image,' but as 'the Son of His love.' The relation of Logos to Theos is warmed into the deeper relation of Son to Father, the Only-begotten to the Eternal. The Fatherhood is essential to God, and therefore eternal. If the Father be thought of as the Supreme Giver evermore lavishing upon an adequate object His own fulness of being, then the Son also is eternal, and from the relation between the giver and receiver, between the Father and Son, does the very conception of Deity emerge. From before all time and worlds, and independently of time or space, the writer saw the infinite giving and receiving of Eternal Love; and he saw in the completeness of the mutual relation the moral and spiritual ἀρχή of the universe. This is not the monad of the Platonic schools or the Gnostic sects, but the living fulness of an infinite Personality, within which there is the reciprocal interchange of gracious and everlasting relations. St. John is alive to the primordial rank and supremacy of the Father, and tells us by the lips of the Divine Son that the Father is the source of all power, and of the self-dependence of the Son. 'He gave to the Son to have life in himself,' He is 'greater' than the Son, 'gives the Spirit' to the Son without measure, He 'sent the Son into the world' to learn and fulfil all His will (5[27] 10[31-37] 14[24]). Yet the unity and the solity of the Eternal turns upon this very relation; and so identical is the substance and will of the Father and Son, that 'all things,' πάντα, flow out of the mutual relation (1[1-3]), the monarchy of the Father compatible with unity of the Father and Son.

(6) The relation of Logos to Theos, as conceived by the evangelist, is sustained by the successive words and deeds of Jesus which had slowly broken on the mind of the writer. The majestic words of the Prologue which are repeated in the opening sentences of the Ep. are the necessary antecedents of the events, the twofold meaning and ambiguity of the term Logos, connoting the self-consciousness and the necessarily connected utterance of the Eternal Theos. This Logos so interpreted is both 'God' and 'with God' at once. He is the organ of divine activity and the great image of His glory. Beyschlag, in his attempt to reduce all the subsequent narrative to the ordinary human consciousness of Jesus, appears to ignore or minimize the supra-historic basis which precedes the historic narrative. Before the manifestation in the flesh of Christ, the Logos was the divine agent of creation. No element of matter, no thrill of force, no harmony or beauty of the cosmos was excluded. The life and light of God streamed forth from Him. The divine immanence in nature and man was His function. The darkness was not in harmony with the Light, and did not apprehend it. He came age after age to His own, to those who were prepared by conscience, providence, and prophecy, and His own received Him not. The Logos, even to the present hour, is working in events, laws, and forces, designing and forecasting and evolving the eternal purpose; yet the world and even His own know it not, nay, He is rejected and despised. An element of deep tragedy has entered into human nature which has ever resisted Omnipotence, but never exhausted the resources of divine love. Conscience, even the 'light which lighteth every man,' was reinforced by prophetic voices, of which the Baptist was the highest type, and the conflict between the Spirit and the flesh, the light and the darkness, the Logos and humanity, is always in progress. The victory over the world and the flesh has made still greater demand upon an infinite compassion, and so we are led on to believe in a higher and more convincing contact of the Logos with human nature. The indwelling of the Logos with the cosmos falls immeasurably short of the Incarnation, i.e. of an event which is described in the assurance (v.[14]) that the Word became flesh. The Logos did not become 'all things,' but became σάρξ, to heal the source of human corruption, and consummate the plan of God.

(7) The entire Johannine conception turns on what is meant by these words. Is the synthesis of the divine and human such as obliterates either of the two elements in the Christ; or is it one which, while preserving both in their completeness, stretches the vinculum between them, so that it snaps, and there is left no other than a human Saviour, after all? Beyschlag objects to the ecclesiastical orthodoxy, and wisely discounts the Kenotic theories of Gess, Thomasius, Godet, Pressensé, and others, on the ground that if our Lord never adopted phraseology incompatible with 'mere humanity,' the idea of a divine consciousness and the hypothesis of a true incarnation could never have arisen. Putting aside the two extremes of Nestorian and Monophysite interpretation, and shrinking from the Catholic acceptance of what is true in both, Beyschlag falls back upon the bare human consciousness and historical surroundings of Jesus. He reviews the great sayings of our Lord which affirm a remembrance of 'the glory which he had with the Father before the world was' (17[5. 24]), or which assert a conscious existence before Abraham (8[58]), or which indicate a realization of being 'in heaven' while yet on earth (3[13]), or which refer to His descent from heaven and return thither (6[33. 51. 62]), and affirm conscious unity with the Father. In doing this the critic is content with a purely Ebionitic interpretation which leaves the mystery of the greatest fact in the history of the moral world entirely unsolved. He falls back upon a method of interpreting Christ's own pre-existence, corresponding with the Rabbin. method of regarding things of high value, such as the ark of the covenant, as 'eternally pre-existent in God.' By the use of metaphor, or fervid imagination, or intense prophetic or mystic realization of the divine indwelling, and full reconciliation with God, even absorption into the divine fulness, the expressions arose from which he supposes the Christian faith to have had its origin. A similar interpretation of the words and the consciousness of Jesus is advocated in Drummond's Hibbert Lecture, Via Veritas Vita, where we seem called upon to forgive our Lord the use of phrases which, after all, are only the commonplaces of the religious life.

The statement, ὁ λόγος σὰρξ ἐγένετο, does not, in John's usage, mean a transubstantiation of λόγος into σάρξ, so that henceforth there is no longer λόγος but only σάρξ, seeing that the evangelist (2^9) uses a precisely similar phrase to denote 'the water which had become wine.' As the water took up into itself elements not previously in it, so the eternal Logos took up human nature into Himself, and this is enough for humiliation of the Infinite Love. The method of the consciousness can only occasionally (if ever) be given its fulness, but the three axes of revolution in succession suggest the entire mystery. These are 'the Son of God,' 'the Son of Man,' and the 'Christ'; and these remarkable terms are found in the Synoptic Gospels in much the same sense as in the Fourth.

The first, SON OF GOD, is an honorific ascription when used by the disciples or by the Jews, and it is nearly if not perfectly identical with 'Messiah.' It is paralleled by the extraordinary prevalence of like terms among surrounding religions and nations. In Egypt the same king is often set forth on monuments as 'the son' and 'beloved' of many different personages of the Pantheon. God-born was the highest superlative to denote glory and authority. Nathanael ($1^{50.\ 51}$) identifies 'the Son of God' with the theocratic king. Martha (11^{27}) anticipates the advent of one so near to and beloved of God as to have power over death and Hades. Still, the Synoptic citation of the adjuration of Caiaphas shows that he regarded the title, not only as an honorific term for Messiah, but as one which it was blasphemy to assume. The claim to be 'Son of God' in a unique sense, a sense that associated Him with God and enthroned Him as supreme Judge, was the specific charge on which Jesus was condemned by the Sanhedrin. Not merely is He the human offspring of the eternal God, but, as He spake of Himself, pre-eminently the Son, the highest expression of the relation of Son to Father, the archetype of Sonship in itself. Doubtless He is 'sent into the world,' to reveal the Father because He is the eternal spectator and companion of the Father, the object of eternal love, the conscious exposition of the Father's character and grace. The entire term is chastened and exalted by the ordered sequence of events. In $3^{28.\ 29}$ $4^{25.\ 29}$ 6^{14} the expected 'Prophet' rather than the triumphant 'King' comes into view, and Simon Peter's confession ($6^{68f.}$ RV) shows that he had grasped the richer aspect of Messiahship which Jesus now permits to become His self-revelation. $12^{12\text{-}19.\ 34\text{-}36}$ convey the most explicit acceptance of the term by Him, and He actually uses it in the intercessory prayer (17^3). The entire progress of the thought culminating in 20^{31} shows that the evangelist blended into one the correlated ideas of 'Logos made flesh,' 'the Son of God,' and 'the Christ.'

The other term SON OF MAN is a mode of expression which, with only two exceptions (Ac 7^{56}, Rev 1^{13}), is never used by any of the disciples, but is confined to His own self-designation. It is being more and more conceded by criticism that the expression is not a euphemism for 'man' as in the prophecies of Ezekiel, or a translation of the Aram. 'bar-enosh,' but a reflection of the transcendent meaning assigned to it in Dn 7. The ideal man there is lifted into the highest glory, and receives an eternal kingdom. It is as Son of Man that Jesus claims to be Lord of the Sabbath, the forgiver of sin, the judge of quick and dead. In the Synoptic representations and in this Gospel He calls himself Son of Man, because of the divine nature which is the substratum and explanation of the human. In 3^{14} 5^{27} and elsewhere we find in this title a revelation of the highest glory and the most perfect sympathy, not a tertium quid, neither God nor man, but at once both God and man. He was known to be Son of Man, the highest, holiest man, by the experience of those who knew Him best. He did not hesitate to use the title of Himself. The inference was, and still is, that He is 'Son of God,' i.e. that the divine will and indwelling must be presupposed to justify such a term.

(8) The relation of the Father and the Son, or of Theos and Logos, does not exhaust the Johannine conception of 'the only true God.' Indeed the OT writers speak of the Spirit of God as the agent of the Eternal in creation, as the primal source of the human Ego, and as discriminating the living soul of man from that of the animal. With them Spirit is the cause of all beauty or genius, of all prophetic gift, and all sanctifying grace. The Spirit of God is by the Synoptists set forth as the occasion of the humanity and formation of the person of the Lord Jesus. The divine personal Spirit perfects the human character and completes the official equipment of the Son of Man to be the Saviour of the world. So completely is He dominated by the Spirit, that He claims to communicate the Holy Spirit to others (Mt 3^{11}, cf. Lk 11^{13}), while the Pauline teaching identifies the Spirit of Christ with that of the Father (Ro $8^{9\text{-}11}$). The NT yearns after the unity of the self-conscious Father and the self-conscious Son—the unity of the divine nature as self-conscious in the Christ, together with the conscience of human nature, the unity of all believers in one body by the One all co-ordinating Head. These unities find their best explanation in the Lord's own teaching concerning the Spirit. In the Synop. (Mt $12^{29.\ 32}$ and parallel passages) the dispensation of the Son of Man is contrasted with the dispensation of the Spirit; and in the Fourth Gospel Christ claims to give the Spirit to the Church, that the world may be convinced 'of sin, righteousness, and judgment.' The Lord so states the relation of the Holy Spirit to His own consciousness, that He identifies the coming of the Comforter with His own return. The indwelling of the Father and of the Son in human souls is effectuated by nothing less than the Spirit, i.e. by the activity and personality of all the fulness of the Godhead. His advent was an incoming to souls both of the Father and of the Son, for the one cannot be without the other. Beyschlag, Reuss, and others seem anxious lest they find anything like Trinitarian doctrine in these numberless references to the Ego of the Father, of the Son, of the Spirit, of the Christ. The Unitarian development of the 4th to the 6th cent. is not homogeneous, because encumbered by the attempt to repudiate the philosophical explanations of the so-called heretics. The Gospels, and particularly the Fourth, like the greatest symbols of the faith, are content to say (a) that Jesus was Son of Man; to show that He was Man in body, soul, spirit, will—Man, i.e. in all respects, in birth, frailty, limitations, sufferings, and death; (b) that the mind of Jesus sounded also the depth of the divine consciousness, so that in His full personality He had dwelt in the bosom of the Father and was able to reveal Him (1^{18}); (c) that in the completing and glorifying of the Son of Man, in the resurrection and ascension of the Christ, the God-man shared finally in the very glory of the Eternal.

B. The Johannine Teaching concerning the Cosmos.—(a) The evangelist, following his Master, discriminates the world of things from that of men. Everywhere the cosmos is created, not self-originated. It is the platform of the entire representation, and consists both of heaven and earth. It is not evil in its origin or essence, though it is the theatre of both moral perversity and divine redemption. (b) The Gospel and Epp. use κόσμος for humanity considered apart from grace, just as they use σάρξ for human nature apart from the spiritual life

This may include humanity in its pride, power, civilization, and refinement. To this is not given the faculty of knowing the Eternal Father ('The world hath not known thee'), or of discerning the pre-incarnate Logos, or even of seeing the Father in the Son of His love. The world of men strangely hates the highest light and shrinks from it (3^{19}), neither comes to it. The Father loves the world in its need (3^{16}); Jesus comes into it to 'save,' to 'draw it,' and to be a way for it unto the Father. There is vivid contrast between those who see the light, who live the heavenly life, who are 'convinced of sin, righteousness, and judgment,' who overcome the darkness and the flesh, who follow the Good Shepherd, who feed on the bread of God, with whom the Father and Son take up their abode, who are 'of the truth' and hear the voice of the Son of God; and, on the other hand, those who do not come, are not drawn, nor convinced, who are in danger of perishing, are 'sons of perdition,' are veritably 'lost.' The ultimate cause of the contrast cannot be explained away, nor can any good or bad name which is assigned to it modify the issue. The intense severity of our Lord's judgment (7. 8) is not due to a Gnostic twist given by this evangelist to the teaching of Jesus, but to the historic accuracy with which the tendencies and hostility of the classes in Jerus. were known and set forth. Yet the human will, and no inexorable fate, is (throughout the Johannine theology) the critical element in the question of light or darkness. The activity of the will is not the absolute solution of the puzzle, but it is the proximate occasion of all moral issues. The dualism of the Fourth Gospel is not more explicit than the dualism of other parts of NT, such as St. Paul or the Synoptists. (c) St. John and St. Paul, and the Synoptists also, recognize a moral centre of the evil in humanity. Though St. John makes no reference to demoniacs, he refers to 'the Prince of this world' as the source and occasion of the trials of the Lord, between whom and Christ there is irreconcilable antagonism. The designs of the enemies of Jesus are affiliated to the father of lies and manslaying, and the phrase is akin to the use by our Lord and the Baptist of the terrible term 'ye brood of vipers.' Thoma (lib. cit. 202–205) regards the circumscription of the operations of the Evil One to the mind of humanity as strongly differentiating the Fourth Gospel from the rest of NT. True, there is no reference to 'possession' in St. John; but neither is there to leprosy, or fever, or other forms of disease on which, as we hear (2^{3} 3^{2} 4^{48} 5^{36} 20^{30}), Jesus wrought marvellous signs. The statement that St. John ignores the visible works of the devil is excessive (see 1 Jn 3^{8} and Jn 12^{31}). Thoma does not agree with Hilgenfeld in finding the Valentinian Demiurge in St. John's doctrine of the ἄρχων. It is refuted by the teaching of the Gospel and Epistle on the expulsion of the devil and the consecration of the world.

C. The Johannine Soteriology.—In grasping the Johan. ideal of salvation, Beyschlag finds the same thoughts as in the Synop. teaching concerning 'the kingdom,' which phrase, when he finds it in ch. 3, he regards as the simple equivalent of 'the life' and 'the eternal life' given by the great Teacher and Revealer of the Father. The kingdom and the life are closely allied in the teaching of Christ, and found in both sources; but they must be discriminated. The kingdom of God is the region within men and communities and the world in which the will of God operates through the free powers of the individual. The methods of discovering it, of entering it, of finding in it hidden potencies and of bringing forth its countless signs, whether acts or fruits, are always in evidence. It is originated as life is in new forms, by seed charged with its future. It has internal intensive force and extensive evolutionary energy, embracing every form of divine indwelling and spiritual growth. In St. John's Gospel, Salvation is Life, Light in its essence, and Truth and Love in method, instrument, or form. But the very idea of salvation, which was appreciated, to begin with, by John the Baptist (1^{29}) and by the Samaritans (Jn 4^{42}, 1 Jn 4^{14}), implies from OT times the great need of man and the greatest work of God. It denotes the rectification or reinstitution of all the relations which had been shattered by sin,—all that is elsewhere covered by such Pauline phrases as pardon, justification, sanctification, adoption,—all such divine experiences as faith, hope, love, life eternal,—in fine, all the work wrought for us by the Christ, the Son of God,—all the internal transformation which is effected in us, in the fabric of our being, by the Spirit of the Father and of the Son. Christ in the Fourth Gospel makes provision for abolishing the shame and curse, and indicates the hopelessness involved in dying in sins. The most damning sin is a steady refusal to admit His own claim. Faith in Him is the condition of deliverance, not merely by its remoter ethical importance or its stimulus to obedience, but by the very nature of the case; moral surrender to the highest revelation of God is salvation and eternal life.

Christ is that in human nature, and does that in it and through it which can stanch the wound and arrest the spell of sin. He had always been coming into the world—a fact testified by the prophets ($1^{5ff.}$). The great Lawgiver spoke of Him (5^{46}); Abraham desired a fuller revelation (8^{56}); all the Scriptures testified to Him (5^{39}). Nevertheless, these operations of the Logos, so long as conducted along these lines, were insufficient to secure conviction until He came into closer contact with humanity, was more obviously manifest in human flesh, and came into actual living personal union with the disturbed and imperilled roots of our mind, heart, and will. He thus provides a tangible object of faith. He renews the eye of faith, and supplies the motive of search. He is the shield from condemnation, the deliverance from wrath, the emancipation from bondage. He can 'save' from the malicious destruction of alien powers (10^{10}), from the deadly pangs of unsatisfied hunger (6^{50}); and He can give the food of which if a man eats he shall never die. Under the three often quoted metaphors, salvation covered all the need of man and all the capacities of the Infinite—LIFE, LIGHT, and LOVE.

There is no salvation if we do not consciously possess another LIFE than this ever-vanishing, always-threatened earthly existence. The heavenly life is not menaced by the million perils of earth and the organized hate of hell, by the cruel temptations of time and sense, and will be finally emancipated from the fear which hath torment. Life in its perpetuity is independent of the conditions of death, it is veritable (answering, i.e., to its ideal and archetype), it is eternal. The purport of the Fourth Gospel was to give concrete proof that Jesus has the power to establish the indispensable conditions and execute the initial stages of this everlasting life. Jesus began by declaring that He would build up the temple of His body after men had destroyed it (ch. 2), and that those who believed in Him should receive this life at His hands ($3^{16.\ 17.\ 36}$). He selected the palsied man as an image of the method and need of the conferring of life, and He exercised the function along the lines of the divine Father's life-giving work ($5^{21\text{-}29}$). He sustained human life by creative forces against various perils of hunger and storm, with express parabolic instruction as to the de-liverances of the inner life from greater peril, and that by His own imperial mandate. The whole of ch. 6 is one continuous illustration of how the Incarnate One could give eternal life, how those who would feed on Him (on His flesh and blood) should die no more for ever. The whole lesson of His unique relation to life, and His power over death, is once more given in ch. 11, where no barriers block the access of His eternal power and Godhead as the Son of the Father's love, and as working out the will of the Eternal. He unriddles death and takes away its sting. In the night of the passion He says, 'because I live, ye shall live'; and the evangelist tells us that all that has been written by himself was to make evident to us, that by believing we might have life through His name (20^{31}).

A second analogue and interpretation of σωτηρία pervading the Fourth Gospel is LIGHT. It is the antithesis of darkness, both moral and intellectual. Darkness is dependent on two conditions, absence of illumination and deficiency or destitution of the power of vision, and in both respects He fulfils the functions of light. He is 'the light of the world' (8^{12}, and cf. 9^{5}), the forthstreaming of the Divine Glory ($12^{35.\ 46}$), the image of His substance, 'the truth' (ἀλήθεια) concerning God, the full expression of the archetypal man, the embodiment of the normal relations between God and man ('for I do always those things that please him'; 'my meat is to do,' etc. 4^{34}); 'I knew that thou hearest me always' (11^{42}). Thus salvation and eternal life is a knowledge of this truth (17^{3}), an acceptance of the light. Moral contamination occasions mental and spiritual blindness —a doctrine inverting the Platonic dictum, which charges all moral contamination on mental incapacity. In the soteriology of St. John the subjective condition is so hopelessly imperfect, and the need of visual faculty has become so imperative, that Christ is represented as restoring a man 'blind from birth' to the exercise of sight, and as commenting on the analogy between this imperial act and what He would do for humanity (9^{37-41}). The glory into which the light of the full revelation of God has ushered His own human nature is the very same light and glory which He supplicates for all His own, and into which He will bring them.

But in close association with Life and Light appears the highest conception of the nature of God which has ever dawned on human intelligence. If God is love, the central essence is absolute self-surrender to the well-being of others. That 'God IS LOVE,' and Love is of God, are the final outcome of the irradiation of St. John's mind with 'the light of the knowledge of the glory (the essential beauty) of God in the face of Jesus Christ.'

The Prologue commences the sublime details by declaring that the incarnate and only-begotten was full of grace and truth. He had been 'in the bosom of the Father,' and declared that which no other had seen. He said, 'the Father loveth me, because I am laying down my life—not as if that were to be the final end, as so many seem resolved to have it, but—that I may take it again' (10^{17}). The revelation of the principle of sacrificial love in the eternal heart of God, as the motive of the heavenly giving, sending, and equipping of the Son, receives its triumphant expression in the human life, which adequately revealed the eternal. A large portion of the Gospel is interfused with this thought. In the conversation with Nicodemus the keynote was the eternal self-sacrificing love of God, of which He had become the expression ($3^{16ff.}$). To the Samaritans He made it clear that He was seeking the salvation of men, 'of the world' ($4^{32.\ 42}$), by the sacrifice of Himself. The discourses of ch. 6 indicate the fountain of self-abnegating love, by which He was giving life to the world. The excited scenes of chs. 7 and 8 combine sternest condemnation of sin with love to sinners. Chs. 9. 10. 11 are the apotheosis of love and sacrifice. Ch. 12 is the record of the response of love to Himself, the fragrance of which has filled 'the whole world.' The evangelist himself shows in $13^{1ff.}$ how he had personally felt the pulsation of divine love in the breast of Jesus, and how the Lord loved His own unto the uttermost. Every paragraph of the 'Discourse' and 'Prayer' is a fresh variation of the great revelation; and the scenes of the arrest, the magnanimous self-surrender, intensify the teaching. The record of His relations with His mother, with the other Marys, with the beloved disciple, with Thomas and Simon, give a perfectly unique revelation of the fundamental essence of Deity, and the forecast of the fulfilment of the high-priestly prayer, 'that the love wherewith thou lovest me may be in them, and I in them.'

We have further to state the significance assigned in the Johannine writings to the death of the great Sacrifice.

In the first Epistle the author regards the blood of Christ as the propitiation for the sin of the world, and as that which cleanses from all sin, and that God 'laid down his life for us.' In the Apoc. in various ways and many degrees of intensity the saved are the purchase of the blood of a high-priestly sacrifice, are souls redeemed by 'the blood of the Lamb which was slain'; while a right to the final privileges of the saved, access to the Tree of Life, is secured by washing the robes (RV).

St. Paul had laid the greatest emphasis on the expiation of sin, the redemption, the propitiation for sin, the ransom, and the righteousness of men through faith in the blood of Christ.

The Synoptists, by the record of the institution of the Lord's Supper, refer to the lips of Jesus Himself the sublime declaration that His blood was being 'shed for the remission of sin.' Mark refers to our Lord the weighty saying, that He had come to give His life a ransom for many (ἀντὶ πολλῶν).

The way in which St. John handles this momentous teaching differs from these familiar representations, but is not incompatible with them. Reuss (Théol. Chrét.), Beyschlag, and others emphasize the contrast, and try to exclude from the Fourth Gospel all reference to or implication of the expiatory worth of the death of Christ. We admit, of course, that the glorious dignity of the incarnate Son of God has covered even the humiliation of His death with a mantle of lustre. The 'lifting up of the Son of Man' (12^{32}), and the bursting of abundant fruit from the dying of the corn of wheat, give a character to the awful tragedy somewhat different from that of the Synoptists. Weiss, against the whole of the Tübingen school, rightly emphasizes those elements where the same truth appears in altered form, e.g. where John the Baptist (1^{29}) indicates the Lord Jesus in His essential character and function as fulfilling the oracle of Is 53. The chief significance of this is, that the whole passage is frequently quoted by NT writers and speakers as descriptive of the very heart of the work of Christ. By the use thus made of it by Peter, Philip, John, Matthew, Clemens Romanus, it becomes a chapter of NT doctrine, and the quotations of portions practically cover the whole oracle. Now with these citations John the Baptist's words, 'Behold the Lamb of God,' must be placed. Continual anticipations of Calvary and the Cross occur. In the record of the first cleansing of the temple, in the prolongation of 'the hour,' and in the arrest of murderous hands in act to strike, the whole of the Saviour's holy life becomes a continuous sacrifice. The double reference by the evangelist to the prophecy of Caiaphas is specially charged with the same idea ($11^{49f.}$ 18^{14}).

In the discourse at Capernaum (6^{51}), the eating His flesh and drinking His blood, in other words the moral surrender to His violent death, is life. The moral assimilation of the stupendous fact of the divine-human person of the Lord, eating of the flesh, and the acceptance of the sacrifice of that mysterious life of His for the life of the world, 'drinking his blood,' utterly transcends a purely and simply human consciousness. Beyschlag here wonders at Weiss, but does not reply to him or to thousands who have come to the same conclusion before him. A full interpretation which does not emasculate the reference by our Lord Himself to the 'brazen serpent' (3^{14}), leaves the sacrificial meaning of the conquest of sin and death by the Son of Man still glittering with meaning, and calling with undiminished force for faith, love, and obedience.

We have already drawn attention to ch. 10, where our Lord, by sacrificing Himself as the Good Shepherd for the flock, does not relinquish His saving work. Indeed He renews, by resuming His life, His power to deliver men as a shepherd of the sheep, and then His arms become identified with the everlasting arms, and His hands with the almighty hands of the Father. If the Jews had taken the Tübingen view, surely they would not have lifted stones to stone their Saviour-shepherd for His presumption and blasphemy.

The whole tone of the final discourse (14. 15. 16) is that Christ's very method of departure from this world, amid the exultation of the world and the lamentation of His disciples, unveils the nature of His heavenly work, and the fact that His way of returning to the Father (viz. death and resurrection) is the ground on which He calls Himself their 'way,' and says that no man cometh unto the Father but by Him. The entire method by which, in this Gospel, he conveyed the fact of the resurrection to different classes of mankind is charged with the highest order of revelation, for He bare in His risen form the signs of His fearful agony and shame, and yet wielded all authority in heaven and earth.

(a) The method of appropriating the great salvation. Faith is as explicitly pressed in the Fourth Gospel as by the Synoptists and St. Paul. Believing in His name is the condition of becoming 'sons of God.' In great variety of connexion, faith is made the foundation and condition of eternal life ($3^{15\text{-}18}$, cf. ^{36} and 5^{24}). Coming to Him is the physical analogue of mental and moral surrender to Him (6^{35}). This is the part of man in the synthesis, the condition which God demands. He whom God hath sent is indeed the power by which the Father draws men to Himself (6^{65}, cf. 12^{32} 14^{6}). Belief in His name was itself conditioned by moral willingness to do the Father's will, and was itself the indispensable antecedent of receiving the Holy Spirit ($7^{37\text{-}39}$).

(b) The following of Jesus. All progress in the divine life is a prolongation of the act of faith. The abiding of Christ in the soul, and of the soul in Christ (the chief theme of ch. 15), are essential to any conception of the efficacy of faith, and emphasize the mutual relations of the human and divine will, the growth and continuance both of grace and faith. 'Following Jesus' and 'abiding in him' are frequently identified with such organic union as to ensure final participation with Him in eternal life and glory. He who sows and they who reap rejoice together (4^{37}); 'He that eateth me shall live by me' (6^{57}); 'He that receiveth whomsoever I shall send receiveth me'; 'He that receiveth me receiveth him that sent me'; 'I am in my Father, and ye in me, and I in you'; 'My Father will love you, and we will come and make our abode with you.' Union will be life-giving; and though separation between the Lord and His disciples is an obvious matter of fact, yet in the power of the spiritual presence after His ascension His disciple may be enabled to 'touch him' (20^{17}). The 'peace,' the 'joy,' the 'love,' the 'glory' will pass from the central heart of Jesus to 'whosoever wills' or 'comes' (14^{27} 15^{11} 16^{22} $17^{22.\ 26}$).

D. The Johannine Eschatology.—The teaching of the Fourth Gospel differs from the rest of NT in its bearing on the future life and eternal judgment.

If, however, the truths in the parables are stripped of their imaginative clothing, and the great arguments and implications of St. Paul deprived of their metaphor, and the nucleus of the apocalyptic visions laid bare, it is probable that we shall find nothing more than, nay, not so much as, we find in the Fourth Gospel. The latter has no festival rejoicing, no exclusion of the guest who does not wear the wedding garment, no scene of final judgment and everlasting life and punishment; yet there is judgment ever ripening in the 'loving of darkness,' and there is freedom from condemnation and even from death in any form; and these are shown to be essentially equivalent to the moral rupture with God on the one side, or to ethical harmony with the highest concept of God as 'Light' and 'Love' on the other. The future, like the past, is lost in an eternal now. In $5^{28.\ 29}$ the resurrection, the final consummation, are doubtless involved, but in 15^{6} the process which burns up the fruitless prunings would seem to be eternal. The blinding of the foolish heart, the abiding of the divine wrath upon the disobedient, the judgment that is always being enacted and evolved, the terror of dying in sins, the judgment that is inevitable and just (8^{16}), and the crisis, the expulsion of the world and its prince, all bring the reader into more vivid realization of the objective fact of judgment than do the parables of the Rich Man, the Marriage, the Talents, or the final unveiling of the great white throne. The momentous events of Heb. history had thrown a lurid light on the prophetic metaphors of the popular discourse; but as the apostle ponders and reports the principle of the eternal judgment upon men and nations and on the entire world, we get closer to the heart and mind of Jesus than by any other medium of communication.

In 1 Jn $2^{18.\ 28}$ and 4^{17} the writer anticipates the consummation and the parousia, of which the whole NT speaks. It is the perversity of criticism which endeavours to separate the two documents on this very ground, or which cannot discern the harmony between them. The kingdom of God upon earth (ch. 3), the multitudes who are 'of the truth' and 'hear his voice,' who come to the light and yield to His control, the underlying theocracy, or Christocracy, identify the teaching of the Fourth Gospel with that of the Synoptists. 'These things are written that ye may believe that Jesus is the CHRIST, the Son of God, and that believing ye might have life through His name.' In these words the beloved disciple sums up the teaching of all the Gospels.

IX. LITERATURE.—The literature of this subject is in part contained in the foregoing list of works issued during the last hundred years. Some of those which now follow embrace the theology of the Epp. and Apoc. as well as the Gospel. Beyschlag, whose work on NT Theol. is the last on our previous list, has taken each separately, though he has given the theology of the Gospel and the Epistles with some deliberate estimate of their agreement as well as their alleged divergences.

The following works are occupied with the entire subject:—Neander, Hist. of Planting, etc., of Christ. Church, Eng. tr. vol. ii. 1–58; Reuss, Hist. de la Théol. Chrét. ii. 369–561, also his Theol. Johan. Baur, in his Bib. Theol., emphasized the details in which the author of the Gospel rose above the Hebraic and Pauline Christianity. Schmidt and van Oosterzee, in their works on Bib. Theol. of NT, have separated the teaching of Christ in Synop. from that of the Prologue and the Epistles of John. Köstlin, Der Lehrbegriff des Evangeliums und der Briefe Johannis, moves along the lines of the Tübingen criticism. Weiss, Bib. Theol. of NT (Eng. tr. ii. 311–421), gives an exhaustive treatment. Wendt, Der Inhalt der Lehre Jesu, 1890, is largely occupied with the peculiarities and (notwithstanding difficulties) the historical value of the material which was at the disposal of the writer, and in the second part with a very elaborate examination of the teaching of Jesus as gathered from the fourfold representations. Beyschlag criticizes throughout many of the conclusions of Wendt, and everywhere minimizes the amount of approach to traditional views of the person and sacrificial work of Christ, accepted by Weiss and Wendt. They all three fundamentally differ from Hilgenfeld, Das Evangelium und die Briefe Johannis nach ihrem Lehrbegriff dargestellt, and Albrecht Thoma, Genesis Joh. Evangeliums, 1882, pp. 171–302. Marcus Dods, in the Expositor's Bible, on St. John's Gospel, covers much of the ground in practical and forceful manner, and the Memorabilia of Jesus, by Peyton, with much vivacity and mystic extravagance, yet brings out the heart of the teaching of Jesus. The same may be said of Sears, Heart of Christ, and of a vast number of comm. (e.g. Westcott in Speak. Comm.) on the Gospel, of which no list is here attempted.

Of the twenty-one Epp. now included in the NT Canon, three, which form a series by themselves, are associated with the name of St. John. Historical testimony shows them to have been in existence in certain parts of the Church, and to have been used by men of note in the Church, at a very early period; in the case of the longest, at least by the middle of the 2nd cent., and, in the case of the other two, before the 3rd cent. was far advanced. Their connexion with the name of John, and their wide recognition as authoritative writings, are also things of very ancient date; taking us, in the case of the first, as far back as to Papias and Irenæus, and, in the case of the others, perhaps to Clement of Alexandria and Origen, certainly to Dionysius, the pupil of Origen. Before the close of the 4th cent. they had become so generally accepted that they were recognized in the Canons of Councils. From time to time, though never on a large scale till our own century, their claims have been disputed, their connexion with the name of John being denied, or another John than the son of Zebedee being thought to be the writer. But it has been the prevailing belief from the oldest times that they are all three apostolic writings, and part of the legacy of the beloved disciple to the Church.

They belong to a group of Epp. which from a very early date have occupied a position of their own in the NT Canon, and have been known by a distinct title. This group, which in most ancient MSS of the NT (with occasional exceptions, as in the case of ℵ) is placed between Acts and the Pauline Epp., did not appear as a separate collection at one and the same period all over the Church, nor did it include all these three Epp. from the beginning. It had neither the same name nor the same compass at all times or in all the different sections of the Christian communion.

In the Eastern Church the Epp. embraced in it received the title of Catholic or General (καθολικαί). In the Western Church, in which the collection was of later formation, they were known, at least from the 6th cent., as Canonical (Canonicæ). In one important section of the Church, the Syrian, the group consisted only of three Epp., and among these only the longest of the Johannine letters found a place. In other parts of the Church, and in the Eastern division at least by the beginning of the 4th cent., it embraced seven Epistles. These included our three, the longest of the three being, along with 1 Peter, the earliest accepted of the whole collection, and the two shorter being added at a later period. (See the article Catholic Epistles).

By their inclusion in the peculiar circle of the Catholic Epp. these three are marked off in one particular respect both from the Pauline Epp. and from other Epp. which were held in a measure of honour in the Church but not ultimately accepted as canonical. In other respects they also form a class by themselves. They have a character which cannot be mistaken. They are so obviously distinguished from the other members of the group to which they belong and from the NT Epp. generally, that the least discerning eye must recognize their apartness.

The peculiar character is most evident, of course, in the largest of the three, but it discovers itself also in the smaller two. The latter are Epp. of extremest brevity, the shortest writings in the Canon. They are writings, too, of incidental interest, and personal or ecclesiastical, not to say congregational, concern; while the former looks more like a studied composition, and deals with the weightiest questions of doctrine and the largest concerns of practice. Yet they are so much of the same stamp that in all ages the prevailing, if not absolutely universal, opinion has been, that they come from the same mint and are by the same hand. They are writings in which the profound and the simple kiss each other, great and inexhaustible thoughts being wedded to the clearest and least ambitious terms. They combine the qualities of majesty, maturity, authority, and serenity with occasional fire and vehement utterance.

They are almost impersonal as regards the mind to which we owe them. The first gives no hint of the author beyond the fact that he classes himself in an unstudied and informal way with those who had seen Christ in the flesh, and indicates a measure of acquaintance with the circumstances of those whom he addresses. The second and third give only the intimations contained in the use of the designation of 'the presbyter,' and in the mention of certain individuals whom we have no means of identifying with any confidence. Yet, devoid as they are of tangible, personal notes, the writer's individuality makes itself felt throughout. They move within a circle of ideas which, while not without points of affinity with the thought of the other NT Epp., especially the greater Pauline letters, are for the most part their own. They have a diction which also belongs in a marked degree to themselves. Their words are words of calmest dignity, yet instinct with emotion —words which might be those of the philosopher, but yet are those of the common Christian intelligence.

A large literature has grown up around these Epp., which has always found something new to say in expounding their teaching and in grappling with the problems of their history. The affluence of their thought, the fruitfulness of their doctrine, the spell of their spirituality and their deep tranquillity, have attracted the richest and devoutest minds, the most practical and the most speculative intellects in every age. Their characteristic contents, the forms in which they present the essential message of the gospel, the expression which they give to some of the cardinal Christian doctrines, the insight which they afford into the condition of the early Christian societies, the light which they shed upon the operation and the influence of certain kinds of error, make them Epp. of singular interest. Even in the few verses of the Third Ep. disclosures are found which are of far-reaching significance for the story of the life and the theory of the constitution of the primitive Church.

Questions of various interest and of no small difficulty are connected with them. They present some problems in exegesis (I 2^{19} $3^{2.\ 9.\ 19}$ $5^{6\text{-}8.\ 16}$), and some curious points in textual criticism (I 3^{1} 2^{23} $4^{3.\ 20}$ 5^{7}, II ^{8}, III ^{2}). Most things touching their literary history have been the subject of dispute, and some of them are far from easy to determine. The old debate is prolonged as to the where and the by whom of their composition; whether they were written in Ephesus, in Patmos, or elsewhere; whether by one hand or more; whether by one John or two Johns or three. The destination of the first two; the way in which the second and the third came to rank as Catholic Epp. and to have a position in the Canon; the source and the explanation of their special form of doctrine; whether a place can be found within the apostolic age for the type of thought and the ecclesiastical conditions which they exhibit,—these are questions which are still under discussion.

Of these questions, that of their origin and authorship is of primary importance. The answer which comes readiest to hand when one reads them together is that all three are products of the same mind. The answer that is suggested both by historical testimony and by their contents is that that mind is the mind to which we also owe the Fourth Gospel and the Apocalypse. And in point of fact these are the views which prevailed in the ancient Church, and which have been generally acquiesced in since then. But they were not left unchallenged even in ancient times, while in modern times they have been disavowed by a succession of thinkers of distinguished rank among NT critics.

In our own century, in particular, their claims to apostolic date and worth have been strongly contested, and judgments of the most diverse kind have been pronounced upon them by the critical schools. There are those who find no difficulty in attributing all three Epp., as well as the Gospel, to the Apostle John, but discover another hand in the Apocalypse. Bleek, e.g., admits the existence of clear points of contact between all the writings assigned to St. John. But he is of opinion, at the same time, that the affinity between the Epp. and Gospel on the one hand, and the Bk. of Revelation on the other, is limited and occasional, while the difference is great and pervading. That difference is held to extend not only to the diction and the style, of which in the case of the Apoc. the one is confessedly peculiar and the other is pronounced rough and broken, but to the whole genius of the books, their attitude to the Jewish people, city, and temple, their teaching on the Parousia, and other things. It is thought to amount to so much that, if the Epp. are ascribed to St. John, the Apoc. must either be allowed to be a forgery by a much later hand or be explained as the work of another John, 'the presbyter,' referred to by Papias in a way interpreted by many as distinguishing him from the apostle (Euseb. HE iii. 39). There are others, again, who read the story of these writings in the reverse way, fixing the stigma of the spurious on the Epp. alone, or on the Epp. and the Gospel together. S. G. Lange regarded the Gospel and the Apoc. as the real writings of St. John, but took the First Ep. to be the work of an imitator a century later. The Tübingen critics agree in claiming the Apoc. for St. John, and in repudiating the other writings, though they differ with regard to the order of the latter. Baur himself (in 1857) held the First Ep. to be an imitation of the Gospel by a different hand, while Hilgenfeld places the Ep. earlier than the Gospel. Among those, too, who hold by the common Johannine authorship, certain differences appear, some regarding the First Ep. as the middle term between the Gospel and the Apoc. (Godet), others giving the Ep. a position in time between the Apoc. and the Gospel.

The historical case, as it has been understood by the great majority of students, so far as concerns the main questions, is this: that, while certain doubts overhung for a time the recognition of the shorter Epp., we find them, so far back as we can trace them, bearing the name of John and never any other, when the author's name is given; and that, while certain differences of view appeared in the early Church regarding the particular John, all three were regarded by most as writings of the apostle, and had an assured position as such before the close of the 4th cent. Whether the case can be accepted as it has thus been put, and what the probabilities are with the critical theories referred to, will best appear as the final result of a study of the writings. We shall take each Ep. therefore by itself, and shall look at its order of thought and the various questions which have been raised with respect to its occasion, its purpose, its message, etc. Having done this, we shall take up anew the problem of its origin and authorship, endeavouring to estimate the worth of the traditional view on the one hand and the counter-theories on the other.

THE FIRST EPISTLE. —1. Order of Thought. — The Ep. opens with some calm and lofty sentences, not cast in the form of epistolary introduction with which we are most familiar in the NT, but more in that of the Ep. to the Hebrews. In these, without indicating either himself or his readers except in an indirect and general way, the writer states at once the great fact on which all that he has to say rests, viz. the historical manifestation in Jesus Christ of the life that is behind all life, the eternal life that was with the Father. He declares at the outset, too, in this Introduction, the great object which he has in view in addressing his readers, viz. that his joy in them might be perfected by seeing them one with him in that fellowship with God in which he and the brethren with whom he classes himself are conscious of standing ($1^{1\text{-}4}$). He enters then at once upon his specific subject, giving as the basis of his counsel and the fundamental apostolic message the truth that 'God is light'; from which the immediate inference is that a walk in the light is indispensable on our part to this fellowship with God. This inference, however, from which there can be no escape, is declared, not in its logical directness, but in the form that to profess to be in fellowship with God and to continue to walk in darkness, is to commit ourselves to a lie and to all unreality. This walk in the light is not to be thus dealt with. Too much depends on it—not only fellowship with God, but fellowship with other members of Christ's body, and also the purgation of sin by Christ's blood. The cleansing which every Christian needs and which he also obtains coming thus into view, the explanation follows that on the one hand, if we claim to have no sin, we deceive ourselves and put God Himself to the lie, while on the other hand real confession of sin brings with it the divine forgiveness and the divine cleansing (1^{5-10}). The same thought is put in another form before the writer passes to his next subject, when he proceeds to remind his readers that all that he writes to them of the revelation of life, the fellowship with God, the pardon and purification of sin, is written with the practical purpose of instructing them not to sin, and then, recognizing the sin of which the true Christian cannot but be conscious, he points to the certainty of its forgiveness in virtue of what Christ is as Paraclete and Propitiation ($2^{1, 2}$).

The thought of the new fellowship which has come by the Gospel leads to another near akin to it—that of the knowledge which the same Gospel requires and makes possible. The position in which those addressed were at the time, furnishes the occasion for speaking with emphasis and decision of the knowledge with which alone the believer is concerned, and of spurious forms with lofty pretensions. So the writer declares the knowledge of God in its reality to be possible only where the humble way of practical obedience to God's commandments is followed; in which connexion he urges the necessity of walking as Christ walked. In further illustration of the kind of life which befits the Christian, he identifies the walk in the light with the walk in brotherly love, and holds before his readers the duty of loving the brethren as the commandment of commandments, one at once old and new (3^{7-11}). He warns these Christians also against the love of the world and the seductions of false teachers, which are contrary to the love of the brethren, and presses this warning with the greater insistence because the world's opportunity is now short. It is the last time with it and all things, as is witnessed by the fact that many antichrists have appeared. These antichrists are described, and the description is pointed by an exhortation to these believers to abide in that knowledge which they have by the Holy Ghost, a knowledge which cannot deceive, so that they may not be put to shame in the great day of the Lord's Parousia (2^{12-28}).

The thought of God as light passes over next into the thought of God as righteous. Following out this new idea, the writer proceeds to say that only he who is righteous can be the child of God; that the man who has the hope of being like God or Christ must purify himself; and that, as Christ is sinless, he who is in Christ cannot sin. But he adds, with an eye to the subtle deception of the false teachers, that to be righteous means to do righteousness, and in sharp and decisive terms distinguishes those who sin as the children of the devil, from those who do not and cannot sin as the children of God. He identifies this righteousness also, which is the note of the son of God, as he had previously done in the case of the walk in light, with the love of the brethren, and again warns his readers against the love of the world, which, as was seen in the instance of Cain, means hatred of the children of God (2^{29}–3^{12}). At this point he sets Christ before them again as the supreme pattern of Christian love—a love which must be in deed and truth, and which carries with it these two blessings—the consciousness of being of the truth and the confidence that our prayers shall be heard. Touching again on God's commandment, he shows that it, too, means two things, viz. belief in Christ and love of one another, and explains that he who keeps the divine commandments not only is in fellowship with God, but has through the Spirit the consciousness of that fellowship (3^{12-24}).

Returning to the question of the immediate dangers which threatened his readers, the writer speaks again of the false prophets; and his words of warning on that subject become the occasion for taking up anew the two great themes—the law of love and the keeping of God's commandments, which are so much in his view. He repeats his cautions against the seductions of misleading teachers, and indicates the marks of distinction between the spirit of God and the spirit of Antichrist, between the spirit of truth and the spirit of error (4^{1-6}). He urges again the supreme duty of love—love to God indeed in the first instance, but also, and more particularly in this case, love to man. He reminds those for whom he is so solicitous, that the man who is of God is of love, called to love Him who Himself is love, and who has given the last proof of that in the mission and propitiatory death of His Son. To love God, he tells them, is to be in God, and to have God in them, and to be delivered from the torment of fear. It is all this, but it is also a love that gives proof of itself in the obvious practical duties of loving the brethren and keeping the divine commandments. And these commandments, he adds, whatever they may be to others, cannot be grievous to those who are begotten of God (4^{6}–5^{3}). The mention of this new relation to God, expressed by the term 'begotten of God,' forms a natural point of transition to the idea of the new mental attitude that goes with the new birth. So the writer comes to speak of faith,—of what it is as belief in Jesus as the Son of God, and of the witness which it carries with it to His being that; of the victorious might that is in that belief, and of the witness as something more than any external testimony—a witness which the believer has in himself (5^{4-12}). As the letter approaches its conclusion he states again the great object with which it has been written. He refers once more to what prayer is to the children of God, the confidence in it which is their prerogative, and the things they are entitled to ask (5^{13-17}). He brings the Epistle to an end by proclaiming anew the separation of the Christian from sin and from the wicked one; the privilege which is the Christian's both in understanding and in possession; and the necessity that is laid upon those who know the true God and have fellowship with Him to keep themselves from idols (5^{18-21}).

2. Character. — It appears, therefore, that the argument of the Epistle, if such a term can be applied to it, turns on a few large and simple ideas. It unfolds itself mostly in terms of certain broad antagonisms—those between Christ and Antichrist, believers and the world, the children of God and the children of the devil, the love of God and the love of the world, righteousness and unrighteousness, confidence and fear, love and hate, sins and a sin unto death, walking in the light and walking in darkness, being begotten of God and being touched by 'that wicked one.' In connexion with these fundamental and recurring antitheses we have a series of statements of what the message of the gospel is; of what fellowship with God is, how it comes, and what it implies; of what Christ is, and what His mission into this world means; of what the believer is, and what the Christian vocation involves.

The message of the gospel is that God is light; that we are to love one another; that in Christ God has given us eternal life. The fellowship with God which is in view is made possible by two things—the historical manifestation of God in Christ and the believer's faith, the former being the objective ground of this new and gracious relation, the latter its subjective condition. This fellowship brings with it the graces of joy, forgiveness, knowledge, the cleansing of the life, the liberty of intercession, the answer to prayer, the assurance and fearlessness of children. It involves a walking in the light, the doing of righteousness, the purifying of ourselves, love to God and love to the brethren, filial obedience, practical benevolence, the observance of the divine commandments, the forswearing of idols. Christ is the Son of God, the only-begotten Son, the manifestation of the Father and of that eternal life which was with the Father; pre-existent as being sent by God into the world; true man, righteous, sinless, the Paraclete with the Father, the propitiation for the sin of the world. His mission is to destroy the works of the devil, to bring us back to God, to give us eternal life, to put away our sin, and to be the Saviour of the world. And the Christian is one who has fellowship with God; who confesses his sin and is cleansed and forgiven; who is begotten of God and sins not; who has the gift of knowledge and can distinguish good from evil, the children of God from the world, truth from error, the false prophet or the false spirit from the true; who walks in the light and does the truth, loving God and the brethren, imitating Christ, and finding no grievousness in the divine commandments; who has passed out of death into life; who knows that his prayers are heard, and looks with holy confidence to the coming of his Lord and the judgment, and has the consciousness of eternal life in him.

Alike in the matter of its thought and in the way in which its ideas are expressed, this Epistle has a character wholly its own. The only Epp. of the NT which are of the same stamp are the two smaller letters which are associated with it. It differs most of all from the Epp. which bear St. Paul's name. It has nothing of the formal structure, the systematic course, the dialectical movement of these. The logical particles which abound in the Pauline writings are strange to this Epistle. Its thought moves on, but not in an obvious progress to a goal. It takes the form of a succession of ideas which seem to have no logical relation, and which fall only now and again into a connected series. They are delivered, not in the way of reasoned statements, but as a series of reflections and declarations given in meditative, aphoristic fashion. This lack of the constructive quality gives the teaching of the Epistle a peculiar directness and simplicity. But it is the directness of authority, the simplicity of truths which are felt to be self-attesting. These characteristics add to the vigour, the originality, the attractiveness of the Epistle. They have strangely been regarded by some as tokens of weakness, and have been reckoned among the things which are supposed to speak of the 'feebleness of old age' (S. G. Lange). Even Baur discovered a certain 'indefiniteness,' a tendency to repetition, a want of 'logical force,' in the tenor of the Ep. which gave it a 'tone of childlike feebleness.' But those critics show a better insight—and they are of Baur's school as well as of others—who find a peculiar beauty, richness, and originality in the Epistle, a special freshness and vividness, particularly in what it says of the 'subjective, inner life of Christianity' (Hilgenfeld).

If the characteristic ideas of the Ep. are few and simple, they are of large significance, and they are presented in new aspects and relations as often as they recur. They belong to the region of primary principles, realities of the intuition, certainties of the experience, absolute truths. And they are given in their absoluteness. The regenerate man is one who cannot sin; Christian faith is presented in its ideal character and completeness; the revelation of life is exhibited in its finality, not in the stages of its historical realization. They are ideas which take us into the inner and essential nature of things, into the real that is behind the phenomenal, the inward that is the heart of the outward, the permanent that is the ground of the transitory, the future that is in the bosom of the present. They are mystical in the sense that they are given as truths of immediate certitude, absolute reality, inward vision. But they are not mystical in the sense of being the pure products of intuition, things only of the subjective world, or superior to the common experience of life. They are given in practical relation to the ordinary course of Christian life and conduct. They have their roots, too, in the great facts of the objective revelation of God in Christ, in that which 'we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled of the word of life' (1^1).

3. Ideas.—The doctrinal and ethical ideas which meet us in the other NT Epp. appear also in this letter. But they are presented in a special light, and with distinctive notes. The Theology of the Ep. has its own points of interest. God is seen in this Ep., as elsewhere, in His Fatherhood, His truth, His righteousness, His forgiving grace, and in the fulness of His life as expressed in His triune Being. But, above all else, He is 'light' (1^5) and He is 'love,' loving us before we loved Him, and so imparting Himself to us that He dwells in us ($4^{8.\ 10.\ 12}$). The Christology also has its peculiar features. Christ is the Son, 'the Son of God,' 'the Only-begotten,' who was with the Father before He appeared in the world. He is the explanation of all things. For in Him we see the eternal life that is behind all things, and from Him we have the life that is life indeed. His divine and pre-temporal relations are not left without expression or intimation. But it is especially in His human nature and relations that He forms the great subject of this Epistle. He is never called 'the Son of Man,' it is true, yet it is the integrity of His humanity that is especially affirmed—the fact that He appeared on earth in the full reality of the 'flesh,' neither in phantasmal form nor in divided being, neither as mere spirit nor yet with the divine and the human in any loose or temporary connexion, but as at once 'Jesus' and 'the Christ,'—Jesus Christ come in the flesh, and 'not by water only, but by water and blood' (2^{22} $4^{2.\ 3}$ 5^6). His sinlessness is asserted (3^5), as it is in the Pauline and Petrine writings, and He is said to have been 'sent' by God (4^8), as St. Paul also speaks of His appearance on earth. But His entrance into our world, and His assumption of our nature and estate, are not given, as they are in St. Paul, under the aspect of a humiliation. The designation 'the Paraclete,' which occurs in the NT only in the Johannine writings, and is used in the Fourth Gospel directly of the Holy Spirit and only implicitly of Christ, is applied here to the Son Himself directly and definitely (2^2). Further, in this Ep. Christ is presented less in respect of what He was and is, and more in respect of what proceeds from Him and is done by Him. It is a question whether the term 'the Word' is used directly and personally of Him. The form which the sentence takes in which that great term is used is indirect, and its subject is neuter and impersonal (1^{1-3}). It is specifically as 'the life' that He is set before us here, and the more general term is chosen to express His appearance on earth. It is a φανεροῦσθαι. It is not said of Him that 'the Word was made flesh'; and though the idea that His entrance into our world was a real incarnation is implied in the description of Him as 'come in the flesh,' that event is exhibited rather as a manifestation, and in particular the manifestation of life.

The Holy Spirit, again, is spoken of especially as given by God and as bearing witness to Christ (3^{24} 5^{8}). Sin is 'unrighteousness' (1^{9} $3^{6.7}$ 5^{17}) and 'lawlessness' (3^{4}); but it is also 'darkness' (1^{6}) and 'death' (3^{14}). The believer is the 'child' of God (τέκνον, not υἱός), 'born' or 'begotten of God,' the special relation in which he is introduced being that of the new life rather than the new standing ($3^{1.2}$). Large expression is given also to the forces of evil which are opposed to Christ and the children of God. They are the devil and his works (3^{8}), the spirit of deceit (4^{6} πνεῦμα τῆς πλάνης), seducing spirits that have to be tried (4^{1}), the many 'antichrists' who have separated themselves from the Church or been cast out of it, and in whom the antichrist of prophecy is seen ($2^{18.19}$ 4^{3}). Among these forces is mentioned also 'the world,' an expression which in this Epistle conveys the largest and most complex conception of immediate, encircling evil (2^{15-17} 3^{13} 4^{1-5} $5^{5.19}$). Faith, too, has its special aspect and compass here. It is the great subjective condition of the Christian life and standing, but it is not presented here either in the broad idea of it which is expressed in the Epistle to the Hebrews (11^{1}), or in the definite character given to it in the great Pauline Epistles. It is neither generally 'the assurance of things hoped for, the proving of things not seen,' though it comes near to that, nor distinctively the faith that justifies and gives peace with God. It is belief in Jesus Christ, the belief that comes with regeneration, that is of the new life, that is the characteristic note of the man who is born of God. As such it is power, it is victory, it is its own witness ($5^{1-5.10}$).

The Ep. also has its doctrine of the last things. Its theology, indeed, is not distinctively an eschatological theology. Its fundamental idea is rather that of life, and that 'life' not as a thing wholly or specifically of the future. It is a 'life' that has been with the Father from the beginning, and that has been historically revealed in Christ (1^{1-3}). It is in Christ, and it becomes our possession now in virtue of our belief in Him and attitude to Him ($5^{11.12}$). It is 'eternal' life, and that not in respect of its perpetuity merely, or its changelessness, but distinctively in respect of its quality—as essential life, a new ethical order of being, not a certain duration of existence, but the kind of life that means the ideal good of life, the perfection of life, its satisfaction in God. This great conception of life as 'eternal life,' which bulks so largely in the Fourth Gospel, occurring there some seventeen times, has an equally prominent place in this Ep., meeting us here six times in the forms ζωὴ αἰώνιος (3^{15} $5^{11.13.20}$) and ἡ ζωὴ ἡ αἰώνιος (1^{2} 2^{25}). But while this qualitative or ethical conception of life, which lifts it above distinctions of present and future, is the prevailing idea, it does not exclude the eschatological. The 'life' which is essential, and which is ours now in Christ, also looks to a fuller completeness, a future perfection. The Ep. speaks of a manifestation of what the children of God are destined to be (3^{2}). It has its word of hope, its vision of a blessedness still prospective, its anticipation of a manifestation in which we shall see Christ as He is, its doctrine of an advent of Christ which it expresses, as St. Paul also expresses it, as a Parousia ($3^{2.3}$ 2^{28}). There is no express mention, it is true, of the Resurrection. But it is implied in what is said of the Parousia and the Judgment, the fact of a great Judgment in the future being stated in express terms (4^{17}). The things of the End may occupy a smaller place in this Ep. than in the writings of St. Peter and St. Paul. But alongside the present conditions which are expressed by the same words, the 'coming' of Christ, the 'judgment,' the 'life eternal' appear also as events of the end and as final conditions. These are, in brief, the main ideas of the Epistle. They have an important bearing, as will be seen, on the question of the authorship of the writing. See also art. JOHN (LIFE AND THEOLOGY OF).

4. Form and Structure.—There are certain questions relating to the form and construction of the Epistle. They are matters of subordinate importance, which have had a consideration given them that is much beyond their merits. One of these is the question whether this writing is really an Epistle or something else. The fact that it has neither an introduction nor a conclusion, such as we find in other NT Epp., neither a greeting nor a benediction nor a doxology, such as we get in the Pauline Epp., together with the circumstance that in much of its matter it does not run in terms of direct address, has led some to deny it the character of a letter, and to speak of it as a homiletical essay or a pastoral (Reuss, Westcott), a libellus rather than an Epistle (Bengel), a manual of doctrine (Heidegger), a treatise (Michaelis), a practical or polemical composition meant to form part of the Gospel (Berger, Storr). But if it wants the usual form of superscription and greeting, it has an equivalent resembling the opening of the Ep. to the Hebrews. If it has not the kind of conclusion, or the doxology, with which we are familiar in the Pauline Epp., that is the case also with the Ep. of James. The freedom of the style, the use of such direct terms as 'I write unto you,' 'I wrote unto you,' and the footing on which writer and readers stand to each other all through its contents, show it to be no formal composition or didactic treatise, but an Epistle in the proper sense of the word.

Nor is anything to be gained by applying to 1 Jn such ingenious distinctions as are attempted to be drawn (e.g. by Deissmann, Bibelstudien) between 'letter' and 'epistle,' and denying it the former designation. If the term 'letter' were to be restricted, indeed, in common speech to a piece of private correspondence not meant for the public, it might be necessary to speak only of 3 Jn as a 'letter,' and to describe 1 Jn and (on a particular interpretation of its address) 2 Jn as 'Epistles.' And so some would hold St. Paul's letters to be the only 'letters' in the proper sense in the NT. But there are 'open' letters as well as closed, encyclical letters as well as personal, letters to communities as well as to individuals. What gives to a composition the character of a letter is its style and contents. And though there is not a little in 1 Jn that might suit an address or discourse, there is more that fits a letter, especially such a letter as one might write who had both age and honour on his side, and who could write both freely and authoritatively. The relations which the writing indicates between writer and readers are not distant, but familiar. They are the near relations of those who know each other well.

The question of the structure of the Ep. has also been much debated. Some have pronounced the writing to be wholly without a plan, and to consist simply of a number of reflections, counsels, or deliverances loosely put together, without continuity or logical connexion (Calvin, cf. his Argumentum Epist. 1 Joh.; Flacius Illyricus, Episcopus).

Others have regarded it as a systematic composition, on a dogmatic plan, and with a methodical arrangement of ideas in all its parts. Bengel, e.g., asserted for it an elaborate contextual plan on a basis mainly Trinitarian. These are extreme opinions, and the truth lies somewhere between them. It is impossible to claim for this Ep. the strict logical sequence of thought which some imagine they find in it. But it is at the same time more than a series of unrelated ideas, a collection of unconnected maxims or aphorisms. There is a certain order in the Ep., due to the object with which it is declared to have been written. But it is an order that can be taken only in a broad and general way. Attempts have been made to carry it out in detail; but they have been only partially successful. Some have distributed the contents of the Ep. into something like eight groups of ideas (Lücke); others have found five main divisions in it, viz. 1^{5}–2^{11} $2^{12\text{-}27}$ 2^{28}–3^{24a} 3^{24b}–4^{21} $5^{1\text{-}21}$ (Hofmann, cf. Schriftbeweis; Luthardt); others four, viz. 1^{5}–2^{11} $2^{12\text{-}28}$ 2^{29}–3^{22} 3^{23}–5^{17}, dealing respectively with the danger of moral indifference, the love of the world and Antichrist, the necessity of a life of brotherly love, and faith as the foundation of the Christian life (Huther). Some, again, have arranged the matter of the Ep. on the plan of three great exhortations, viz. 1^{5}–2^{28} 2^{29}–4^{6} 4^{7}–5^{21}, with Introduction and Conclusion (de Wette). Others have regarded it as consisting of Introduction, Conclusion, and two great connected sections, viz. 1^{5}–2^{28} 2^{29}–5^{5}, both parts setting forth the same subject of fellowship with God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ; but each in its own way—the former having for its special theme the proposition that God is light, the latter the proposition that God is righteous (Düsterdieck, Alford). Divisions of a somewhat different kind are also suggested, as, e.g., into three main sections, each with three or four sub-sections, the subjects for these sections being taken to be the 'problem of life and those to whom it is proposed,' the 'conflict of truth and falsehood without and within,' and the 'Christian life: the victory of faith' (Westcott).

There is more or less truth in these different readings of the plan of the Ep., and there is a certain measure of agreement among them. But even the simplest schemes do not admit of precise application. One can see that there are certain primary thoughts, especially the great ideas that God is light, that God is righteous, that God is love, to which much of the matter of the Ep. naturally relates itself; and that there are certain paragraphs or series of verses that have on the whole distinct subjects. But the ideas which give a special character to some particular section of the Ep. are not confined to that section. They meet us again and again, though it may not be quite in the same form. The Ep. has its introduction, its body, and its conclusion. It has its ruling thoughts, and it passes from one thought to another by points of transition which can often, if not always, be recognized. In its main contents it has a certain order and succession of ideas. But it is an order that follows the way of suggestion, not that of logical connexion. It is not systematically carried out, neither does it show itself upon the surface. It has the freedom that is proper to a letter, the unstudied, non-constructive character that belongs to a series of meditations or practical counsels.

5. Independence.—This is a question of greater importance. Among the NT writings there is one, though only one, that is at once seen to be of the same character as this Epistle. That is the Fourth Gospel. The resemblance is so great and unmistakable as at once to suggest the question, how the two are related to each other. In the Epistle we get the same general style as in the Gospel, the same simplicity of language with the same profoundness and exaltation of thought, the same lofty serenity, the same peculiar structure, the same sententious or aphoristic tone, the same habit of giving a statement both in the affirmative form and in the negative, and of taking up, repeating, and extending an idea already expressed; the same way of conveying truth by the use of contrasts, like that between light and darkness, life and death, love and hate; the same methods of forming sentences and carrying the thought forward. There are the same fundamental conceptions, too, of God, Christ, the purpose of the Son's mission, the nature of His work, His relations to God and to man, the character and standing of His disciples, the world, life, death, the present and the future. Many of the terms which are characteristic of the one are characteristic of the other. Of this class are the following:—ἀληθής, ἀλήθεια, ἁμαρτίαν ἔχειν, ἀνθρωποκτόνος, γεννηθῆναι ἐκ, ἐντολὴ καινή, ζωή, ζωὴ αἰώνιος, θεᾶσθαι, κόσμος, μαρτυρεῖν, μεταβαίνειν ἐκ τοῦ θανάτου εἰς τὴν ζωήν, μονογενής (of Christ), παιδία, παράκλητος, περιπατεῖν ἐν τῇ σκοτίᾳ, πιστεύειν εἰς, παῤῥησία, τὸ πνεῦμα τῆς ἀληθείας, ποιεῖν τὴν ἀλήθειαν, ποιεῖν τὴν ἁμαρτίαν, ὁ πονηρός, σκοτία, σωτὴρ τοῦ κόσμου, τέκνα θεοῦ, τεκνία, τιθέναι τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ, φανεροῦν, φῶς, χαρὰ πεπληρωμένη. Other terms distinctive of the Gospel and the Apocalypse together meet us also in the Ep.; e.g. ἀγαπᾶν, ἀγάπη, ἁγνίζειν ἑαυτόν, ἀληθινός, γινώσκειν, εἶναι ἐκ, θεωρεῖν, μαρτυρία, μένειν, νικᾶν, πλανᾶν, τηρεῖν τὰς ἐντολάς, τηρεῖν τὸν λόγον, φαίνειν. Peculiar syntactical forms, or peculiar uses of familiar formulæ, which occur in the Gospel, occur also in the Ep., as in the case of ἵνα, ἀλλ' ἵνα, etc. There are also many obvious parallelisms of thought and expression. Examples of these may be seen in such passages of the Ep. as—2^{14} 2^{17} 3^{8} 3^{13} 3^{22} 3^{23} 4^{6} 4^{15} 4^{16} 5^{4} 5^{9} 5^{20} when compared respectively with those passages of the Gospel—5^{38} 8^{35} 8^{44} 15^{18} 8^{29} 13^{34} 8^{47} 6^{55} 6^{69} 16^{33} 5^{32} 17^{3}.

In view of all this some have denied the character of independence to the Ep., and have spoken of it as a copy of the Gospel which shows all through the imitative hand (Baur). Others, who have not been disposed to go so far as that, have regarded it as a 'companion' to the Gospel, the second part of the Gospel (Michaelis, Storr, Eichhorn), a kind of dedicatory writing meant to go with the Gospel (Hug, Thiersch, Hausrath, Hofmann, Ebrard, Haupt), a summary or recasting and practical setting of the contents of the Gospel (Hoekstra, Holtzmann), a covering letter designed to serve as a kind of introduction to the Gospel (Lightfoot), etc.

But there are clear and significant differences between the two writings, notwithstanding this remarkable general similarity. There is no such local colouring in the Ep. as we have in the Gospel. There is no such Hebrew stamp in the Ep. as there is in the Gospel. There is not a single quotation from the OT in the former, while in the latter we have both citations from the OT and references to the OT. These differences, indeed, are not conclusive. They may be due to the natural difference between narrative and letter, or to the different circumstances and objects of the writings. But there is much more than these. The ideas which are common to both are, in not a few cases, differently put, and have a different aspect.

In the Ep., e.g., Christ's appearance on earth is presented, as we have seen, in the broad light of a manifestation. The specific function of advocacy or intercession is ascribed to Him. The qualities of faithfulness and righteousness on the side of God, and the grace of confession on the side of man, are given in a particular connexion with the forgiveness and the cleansing of sin; and faith appears in the definite character of a power of overcoming. In the case of certain ideas of the Ep., the affinities are rather with the teaching of the great Pauline Epp. than with the Fourth Gospel. This is true, not only of what is said of God or of Christ as δίκαιος (cf. 1^9 2^2 with Ro 3^{26}), but also of the description of Christ as ἱλασμός (cf. 2^2 4^{10} with Ro 3^{25}), the designation of His Second Coming as a παρουσία (cf. 2^{28} with 1 Co 15^{23}, 1 Th 2^{19} etc.), etc. But, besides this, the Ep. has not a few ideas which it does not share with the Gospel. Such ideas are those, e.g., of a 'fellowship (κοινωνία) with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ,' a 'love perfected' (ἀγάπη τετελειωμένη), an 'Antichrist' and 'Antichrists,' a 'sin unto death' (ἁμαρτία πρὸς θάνατον), a 'Divine seed' (σπέρμα αὐτοῦ), an 'unction from the Holy One' (χρίσμα ἀπὸ τοῦ ἁγίου). Such terms as ἀγγελία and πλάνος, such phrases as ἐπιθυμία τῶν ὀφθαλμῶν, ἐπιθυμία τῆς σαρκός, ἐν σαρκὶ ἐρχεσθαι, ἐν τῷ φωτὶ περιπατεῖν, ποιεῖν τὴν ἀνομίαν, ποιεῖν τὴν δικαιοσύνην, belong to the Ep. and not to the Gospel. Such ideas, again, as those of the 'wrath of God' (ἡ ὀργὴ τοῦ θεοῦ), to 'be from above' (εἶναι ἐκ τῶν ἄνω), 'to be from beneath' (εἶναι ἐκ τῶν κάτω), and such designations as 'the Holy Spirit' (τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον), which are in the Gospel (3^{36} 8^{23} 1^{33} etc.), do not recur in the Epistle. And to these things others might be added. Where the Gospel, e.g., declares God to be 'Spirit' (πνεῦμα, 4^{24}), the Ep. declares Him to be 'love' (ἀγάπη, 4^{16}); where the Gospel speaks of the Son being 'in the Father' and the 'Father in the Son' ($14^{10.\ 11}$ etc.), the Ep. speaks of us as being 'in God' and God 'in us' (ἡμεῖς ἐν τῷ θεῷ 2^5 4^4, ὁ ἐν ἡμῖν 2^5 4^4).

There are also certain minuter differences in usage, as in the preference of the Ep. for the preposition ἀπό after such verbs as αἰτεῖν, ἀκούειν, λαμβάνειν, where the Gospel has παρά. To which must be added the fact that no clear reference to the Gospel is discovered in the Epistle. There is enough, therefore, to show that the Ep. is not dependent on the Gospel, not a second part of it, nor a remodelling of its contents, whether for practical or for polemical purposes, but an independent composition having its own particular occasion, purpose, and character.

6. Purpose and Occasion.—Its purpose is that the readers may have fellowship with the writer and his associates who have been eye-witnesses of the Word of life, and whose fellowship is with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ; that the joy which the writer and his brethren have in them may be made complete by seeing that fellowship realized in their case; and that those addressed may have the comfortable consciousness of possessing eternal life ($1^{2.\ 3}$ 5^{13}). The writer's object, therefore, is to be taken in the breadth which he himself gives it. It is not to be limited to the combating of certain errors, the refutation of certain false teachers, or the reproof of certain shortcomings. The Ep. does deal with certain faults in life, certain errorists and defective doctrines. But its primary purpose is to help these Christians to be partakers with the writer and his fellow-witnesses in the completeness and satisfaction of the Christian life. It is with a view to this that other subjects are introduced, that certain instructions are given, and that counsels are offered against certain infirmities and perils.

The Ep., nevertheless, may have had a particular occasion. That is found by some in a certain critical condition of the Church or Churches addressed (Lücke, etc.); and there are, no doubt, things in the Ep. which point to shortcomings, especially in the matter of brotherly love. But there is nothing to indicate that those addressed were in a peculiarly dangerous or faulty condition, or that the moral life had sunk very low among them. The Ep. is not one of reproof. It is rather written under the sense that writer and readers are living in 'the last time,' and that the Coming of the Lord is expected. Its particular occasion, therefore, may rather be sought in what it says of the appearance of certain false teachers, in which event the writer sees the token of 'the last time.' Who were those errorists that are here spoken of as 'Antichrists'? To this question many different answers have been given. Some of them may be at once dismissed as too large and indefinite. To say, e.g. (with Bleek), that the men in view are Christians, men who had lost their faith or had practised it unworthily, or that they are men who had fallen into Antinomian licence, is inconsistent both with the fact that the 'Antichrists' are described as outside the Church, and with the kind of fault that is attributed to them here. Further, if Antinomian error had been specially in view, we should have expected (so Neander), not such a declaration as 'Every one that doeth sin, doeth also lawlessness; and sin is lawlessness' (3^4 RV), but rather 'Every one that doeth lawlessness, doeth also sin; and lawlessness is sin.' To say that they were Jews (Löffler), or that they were Ebionites, is equally wide of the mark, nothing being found to imply that the error in question was merely a denial of the Messiahship of Jesus, or a reduction of Christ to the rank of a second Moses. There is as little to support the idea that the Ep. has in view more than one class of errorists, Ebionites and Sabians (Storr), or Ebionite and Docetic teachers (Sander).

It is more reasonable to identify them with Docetic teachers of the Gnostic type. They are described as denying that 'Jesus is the Christ,' as denying 'the Father and the Son' ($2^{22.\ 23}$), and as confessing 'not Jesus' (4^3). They are contrasted with those who are of the spirit that 'confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh' (4^2); and, toward the close of the Ep., though they are not mentioned, the note that is still insisted on is belief 'that Jesus is the Christ' (5^1). These terms do not carry us to the particular refinements of Gnosticism that are connected with the name of Basilides, as some think (Pfleiderer). There is no point of contact with the strange Basilidean theories of a tripartite sonship, the division of the world into the Ogdoad and the Hebdomad, and the destiny of Jesus to be the 'first-fruits of the sorting of the things confused.' Nor is there any real analogy between the doctrine of the Son in the Ep. and the vague speculations of these Gnostics about the descent of a light from the Hebdomad upon Jesus the Son of Mary at the Annunciation. There might seem more, perhaps, that resembles the Valentinian doctrine, in which the idea of σπέρματα has a large and prominent place. But the Christology of the Ep. is far removed from any one or all of the three views of the origin of Jesus which are ascribed to Valentinus by Irenæus (i. 11. 15, etc.). The terms point to something more specific, however, than the ordinary Docetic doctrine which bore that our Lord had only an apparent body all through His life on earth, and until His Ascension. They best suit the teachings of the Gnostic Cerinthus, in which Oriental, Jewish, and Christian ideas seem to have been mixed up, and which distinguished between the man 'Jesus' and 'Christ' the heavenly Being, and affirmed that 'the Christ' united Himself with 'Jesus' only at the baptism of the latter, and continued with Him only till His Passion. Beyond this the terms do not seem to warrant us to go. It is probably too much to say (e.g. with Holtzmann) that the error in view all through the Ep. is the dualistic form of Gnosis which was Christologically Docetic and practically Antinomian, or (with Lipsius, etc.) that both Docetism and Antinomianism are intended. It is doubtful whether we can say (e.g. with Weiss, Harnack, etc.) that the Ep. is directed also against men within the Church who misunderstood and perverted St. Paul's doctrine. Such statements as 'he that doeth righteousness is righteous' (3^7), are not enough to bear the weight of such inferences.

7. Authorship.—Who, then, is the author of an Ep. which speaks of a form of Gnostic doctrine like that associated with the name of the traditional opponent of the Apostle John in his old age? The general answer, as has been said, has been: the Apostle John himself. This was the almost universal belief of the early Church, the exceptions being few, of small account, and easily understood. The sect of the Alogi may have rejected the Ep., as they did the Gospel and the Apocalypse. But the statement in Epiphanius (Hær. tom. i. c. 34) amounts only to a perhaps, and the rejection, if it was the fact, would have been, as in the case of the Gospel, for doctrinal reasons. Marcion, we know, refused it a place in his very limited Canon; but his exclusion of it and of so much else in the NT turned, not upon the question of historical testimony, but on that of harmony with his own special views. At a much later period an obscure statement is made by Cosmas Indicopleustes in the 6th cent. (Topogr. Christ. I. vii.), to the effect that some maintained that all the Catholic Epp. were written by presbyters, not by apostles. And Leontius of Byzantium (contr. Nestor. et Eutych. iii. 14) speaks of Theodore of Mopsuestia as 'abrogating' the Ep. of James and the other Catholic Epp.—'Epistolam Jacobi et alias deinceps aliorum catholicas abrogat et antiquat.' This is all. And so the case stood, as far as we know, till late in the 16th cent., when Joseph Scaliger declared all three Epp. not to be by the apostle. Then S. G. Lange, with strange taste, pronounced the first unworthy of an apostle, though he felt the force of the historical testimony for its apostolic origin. Others tried to prove it to be the work of a Jewish Christian author and a Gnostic reviser (Claudius), or ascribed it to the presbyter John (Bretschneider, Paulus). But the severest assault made upon the Ep. in ancient or in modern times is that of Baur and his school. The Tübingen criticism has not been at one in all things. Some of its adherents have held the Gospel and the Ep. to be by the same author (K. R. Köstlin, Georgii); others have held them to be by different hands (Baur, Hilgenfeld, etc.). But the school has been at one in denying the apostolic origin of the Ep., and in ascribing it to a writer of the 2nd cent.

The reasons given for this view of the Ep. are such as the following:—The circumstances, the forms of thought, and the condition of the Church which appear in it, it is said, point to a later period than the apostolic. Different critics fix on different things in support of this contention. Some fix upon the doctrine of the Logos as they suppose it to be expressed here (Bretschneider); of which it is enough to say that in Hebrew thought and in Greek there was a soil prepared for it before the close of the 1st cent. at any rate. Others argue from the acquaintance which it betrays with Docetic error. But it is too much to assert that that type of error does not emerge till the post-apostolic age, and the particular form in view here is, as we have seen, like the doctrine attributed to Cerinthus. Others (Hilgenfeld, etc.) reason from its reference to Gnostic doctrine. But while the riper and more complicated forms of Gnosticism belong to a later time, it is not made historically good that there was not or could not be at the earlier date Gnostic ideas of a simpler and more rudimentary kind, and it is acknowledged (e.g. by Hilgenfeld) that it is only an undeveloped form that appears in this Epistle. But besides that, it has to be said that the things in the Ep. which are supposed to betray the influence of Gnostic thought are not sufficient for the purpose. Of the doctrine ascribed to the 'Antichrists' we have already spoken. But much is made of the use of the terms σπέρμα and χρίσμα, and of the idea that we should only love and not fear God. But the terms σπέρμα and χρίσμα have a totally different application here from what they have in the far-fetched and impracticable speculations of the Gnostic sects. Nor do we require to go to Gnostic sources for their origin. They have their explanation in the ideas of Revelation—the one in the OT idea of an anointing, the other in the NT idea of a birth or a being begotten of God. And that there should be, not the fear that hath torment, but pure love to God, is surely a most Christian idea.

It is further argued that the Ep. cannot be an apostolic composition, because it shows the presence of Montanistic doctrine (Planck, Baur). Traces of Montanism are thought to be found especially in what is said of the moral condition of the believer, of the unction, and of sins 'not unto death' and 'a sin unto death.' With respect to the first, the Ep. speaks, it is true, of the moral condition of the believer in its ideal perfection. But it is not an absolute sinlessness that it ascribes to him, nor does it speak of his perfection at all in the Montanist way. For the Montanists claimed a spiritual perfection above other Christians. The idea of the chrism or 'unction,' as it appears here, is as little Montanistic as it is Gnostic. It rests upon biblical ideas and biblical employments of the act of anointing with oil. Neither does the distinction between two kinds of sin necessarily bear the sense which Baur puts upon it. Even if we were to grant this, it would not carry the late date with it. Hilgenfeld has pointed out that the idea of special mortal sins is found in the Periodi Petri, a part of the pseudo-Clementine literature, and, in his opinion, it is therefore earlier than Montanism. Much more, too, would surely have been made of the doctrine of the Paraclete, if the Ep. had been written by a Montanist or under Montanistic influences. Other arguments adverse to its apostolic origin and its connexion with John the evangelist are of even less importance. The brevity of the reference to the false teachers and the limited refutation of them have been held to be inconsistent with the claims preferred on behalf of the Epistle. But this is to overlook the method of the Ep., which is to present the truth, and to do that authoritatively, rather than to expose error. The vagueness of the introduction, and the want of anything in it to identify the writer with John the apostle, are also adduced. But it is customary with St. John not to name himself directly, and the author associates himself at least with the eye-witnesses of Christ's life, and speaks all through in a tone befitting one conscious of apostolic dignity.

Once more the apostolic authorship is contested on the ground that the Ep. is so different from the Apocalypse. This is, of course, an important argument with those of the Tübingen school, and it is perhaps best put by those of that school who, like Hilgenfeld, hold the Ep. to be older than the Gospel. The Apoc. being by John the apostle, the remarkable way in which it differs from the Ep. in language and conception makes it impossible, it is argued, for the latter to be by the same hand. The differences, indeed, are great, and extend not only to vocabulary, grammar, and phraseology, but to attitude, spirit, and idea. They may be explained so far, however, by difference in circumstance, time of composition, subject, and so far also by the fact that the one writing is an Ep., while the other belongs to the peculiar order of apocalyptic literature which has a form and a method of its own. The difference in idea, too, is in important cases much less than the Tübingen critics are inclined to make it. There is no such antagonism, e.g., as they suppose between the God of wrath in the Apoc. and the God of love in the Ep., or between the view of the divine righteousness as judging evil in the Apoc. and the view of the same righteousness as forgiving sin in the Epistle. That there are many points of affinity, too, between Gospel, Ep., and Apoc., is admitted by critics like Hilgenfeld. But the question of the Apoc. is one by itself. See art. REVELATION (BOOK OF).

The arguments in favour of the non-apostolic origin of the Ep. are far from convincing. Even were they much more so than they are, they could not prevail against the historical evidence. For that is peculiarly strong. The entire witness of antiquity (with the solitary exceptions already referred to in the cases of Cosmas and Leontius) from the time of Eusebius is for the Johannine authorship. Athanasius, Cyril of Jerusalem, Epiphanius, and others attest it. Jerome, speaking of the Apostle John, in his Catalogue of Ecclesiastical Writers (ch. 9), says of him: 'Scripsit autem et unam epistolam, cujus exordium est, Quod fuit ab initio . . . quæ ab universis ecclesiasticis et eruditis viris probatur.' Eusebius himself places it among the Homologoumena (HE iii. 25), and ascribes it to John (HE iii. 24, 25). Travelling back from these declarations, we find Dionysius, the scholar of Origen, citing the words of the Ep. as those of the evangelist, and reasoning against the Johannine origin of the Apoc. from its unlikeness to the Ep. in style and language (Euseb. HE vii. 25). We find Origen himself repeatedly quoting it or referring to it as by John (e.g. Ev. Joh. tom. xiii. 21). It is in the Peshitta, and in the Muratorian Fragment, the latter quoting the words 'Quæ vidimus oculis nostris et auribus audivimus et manus nostræ palpaverunt hæc scripsimus vobis' as John's. Similar testimony is borne to it by Cyprian (Ep. 25), who quotes $2^{3.4}$, by Tertullian (adv. Marc. v. 16; adv. Prax. ch. 13, 28; adv. Gnost. 12, etc.), and by Clem. Alex. (Strom. ii. 15, iii. 4, 5, iv. 16). Irenæus, too, quotes the Ep. several times, and ascribes it to John, the Lord's disciple, who also wrote the Gospel (de Hær. iii. 16; Euseb. HE v. 8). Further, Papias (who is described by Irenæus as Ἰωάννου μὲν ἀκουστής, Πολυκάρπου δ' ἑταῖρος) is reported by Eusebius (HE iii. 39) to have 'used testimonies from John's former Ep.' (κέχρηται δ' ὁ αὐτὸς μαρτυρίαις ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰωάννου προτέρας ἐπιστολῆς). And Polycarp, the disciple of St. John (ad Philipp. ch. 7), has the sentence πᾶς γὰρ ὃς ἂν μὴ ὁμολογῇ Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν ἐν σαρκὶ ἐληλυθέναι, ἀντίχριστός ἐστιν; which so closely resembles 1 Jn 4^3 that few (though Scholten is of the number) have refused to see in it an evidence of Polycarp's acquaintance with the Epistle.

Whether we can carry the chain of witness further back even than Polycarp's letter, is doubtful. It depends chiefly on the date to which the Didaché is referred, and on the view taken of certain sentences in it. The Ep. appears to be known, indeed, to the writer of the Ep. to Diognetus; but the date of that writing, which is placed by Lightfoot (St. Ignatius and St. Polycarp, i. 517) between A.D. 117 and 130, is uncertain. Traces of it have also been found by some in Justin Martyr, the Ep. of Barnabas, the Shepherd of Hermas, and the Epistles of Ignatius. But these are not definite enough to prove acquaintance with the writing. They may indicate no more than the use of terms which were common to all Christians, or to certain circles of Christians, at the time. But in the Didaché we have, perhaps, something more. In chs. x., xi., e.g., we find the phrase τελειῶσαι αὐτὴν ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ σου; παρελθέτω ὁ κόσμος οὗτος; πᾶς δὲ προφήτης δεδοκιμασμένος. These remind us of the τετελείωται ἐν ἀγάπῃ of our Ep. (4^{18}) and the parallel phrases in 2^5 $4^{12.17}$; of the ὁ κόσμος παράγεται of 2^{17} (a very similar form occurs, however, also in St. Paul, 1 Co 7^{31}); and of the δοκιμάζετε τὰ πνεύματα of 4^1. If these are regarded as reminiscences of the words of the Ep., and not simply as proofs of acquaintance with John's teaching, it may be, in oral form, and if the Didaché can be referred to the closing years of the first century or the opening years of the second, we have a witness earlier even than Polycarp.

To this must be added the argument drawn from the relation in which Gospel and Ep. stand to each other. If it can be shown that the two writings are by one hand, then all that goes to prove the Gospel to be the work of the evangelist John goes to prove the Ep. to be his also. This question, whether the author of the Gospel also wrote the Ep., is answered in the negative by the Tübingen critics generally. In support of that position it is urged that the two writings differ radically in their attitude to the OT law, in their view of the person of Christ, in their doctrines of the Holy Spirit and the work of Christ, in their eschatology, and in their general mode of thought. The Ep., it is said, stands 'in a more intimate relationship' to the law than is the case with the Gospel. But in point of fact there is no mention of the νόμος in the Ep., and the passages which are supposed to have it specially in view have another application. It does not appear that in the use of the term ἀνομία in 3^4 it is the Mosaic law that is particularly in view, or that the ἀπ' ἀρχῆς in $2^{7.8}$ refers specially to the OT law of love. The idea of a personal Logos, again, which is found in the Prologue to the Gospel, is thought to be foreign to the Epistle. But if we have not the term ὁ λόγος, we have the phrase ὁ λόγος τῆς ζωῆς in the introduction to the Ep.; and, even if it is allowed to be a question whether the latter phrase has the same sense as the former, we have a similar conception of the superhuman, pre-temporal, personal being of Christ in the terms 'life' and 'Son of God' as they appear in the Epistle. The Holy Spirit, it is further urged, is not presented as He is in the Gospel in personal relations, of which the use of the neuter term χρίσμα is supposed to be a proof. But the term χρίσμα is an easily understood term for a particular gift or operation of the Holy One; and the 'witness' which is said to be borne by the Spirit (5^6), which is also ascribed to the Spirit by Christ in the Fourth Gospel (15^{26}), points to the harmony of the two writings on the subject of the personality of the Holy Ghost.

The designation of Christ as 'Advocate' (2^2) is also held by Baur and others of his school to be in affinity with the Ep. to the Hebrews rather than with the Fourth Gospel, and to indicate a view of Christ's relation to His disciples which 'lay far apart from the evangelist.' But the idea of Christ as Intercessor is not peculiar to any particular Ep., but is found again and again in the NT; nor can it be made out that in anything else that is said of Christ's relations to His disciples there is any difference between the Ep. and the Gospel. Nor is it the case that the Ep. has an eschatology which is not known to the Gospel. The conceptions of a present judgment and a spiritual Parousia prevail, it is true, in the Gospel, but not to the exclusion of the ideas of a future judgment and a Parousia at the end of things (5[28, 29] 6[39, 40] etc.). And the eschatological conception of the Advent and the Judgment is expressed in the Ep., but not to the absolute exclusion of the form of doctrine characteristic of the Gospel. For it speaks of a passing from death to life which is already accomplished, and of eternal life as a present possession. Further, to say, with Baur, Hilgenfeld, and others, that there is a more 'material and external' mode of thought in the Ep. than in the Gospel, is to misjudge and misinterpret the former. The designation, e.g., of God as 'light' is strangely thought to express a more material conception of God than is possible to the writer of the Gospel, and the symbols of the 'water' and the 'blood' are thought to be differently used, more materially in the Ep., more ideally in the Gospel. But these suppositions rest on mistaken interpretations of the passages.

There are differences between the two writings, as we have seen, and these differences are neither few in number nor inconsiderable in weight. They are differences which go to establish the independence of the two compositions. But they are not sufficient to prove a difference of authorship. They can be made to appear so only by forced constructions, and by overlooking the distinct purposes and circumstances of the writings. They can be explained by the differences between the Gospel and the Ep. in the occasions which produced them, the subjects with which they have to deal, and the ends which they have in view, and by the natural difference between an historical composition and a letter. On the other hand, there are similarities of the most remarkable kind in thought, style, and expression, in characteristic ideas, in imagery and symbolism, and in the special type of doctrine. They are similarities which pervade the two writings, and point strongly to identity of authorship.

No explanation of the origin of the Ep., therefore, fits the facts so well as the one that has prevailed. It is to internal considerations that those appeal who reject it; and it is largely on the ground of the supposed impossibility of two writings so different in character as the Ep. and the Apoc. proceeding from one and the same hand, that the Tübingen critics deny the apostolicity of the former. The external evidence is not seriously assailed. It is admitted even by so uncompromising a critic as the late Dr. Samuel Davidson that 'the letter is well attested by the voice of antiquity, and that, as far as external evidence reaches, its authenticity seems to be secure' (Introduction to the NT, ii. 302).

8. Place and Date.—If the Ep. is the work of John, it is most natural to suppose it to have been written in Asia Minor, most probably in Ephesus. It is true that we have no definite statement in early Christian literature to that effect, and some who regard it as intended to form a companion to the Gospel are inclined to refer it to Patmos. But it is with Ephesus that the most ancient tradition connects the composition of the Gospel. What Irenæus says of John the μαθητὴς τοῦ Κυρίου and his Gospel is this: καὶ αὐτὸς ἐξέδωκε τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, ἐν Ἐφέσῳ τῆς Ἀσίας διατρίβων (adv. Hær. iii. 1), and the same is said in effect by Jerome (Prolog. to Matth. vol. vii. pp. 5, 6). If the Gospel and the Ep., therefore, belong to the same period in John's life, as many things go to show, it is reasonable to suppose that the Ep. as well as the Gospel was written in Asia Minor, and most probably in Ephesus, all the more that it is with that territory and that city that ancient tradition connects the closing stage of John's career.

If there is little by which to determine the place where the Ep. was written, there is as little by which to fix its date. Some, indeed, have thought it possible to define the time of its composition precisely, and have been bold enough even to refer it to one particular year. Ebrard ascribes it to the year 95 of the Dionysian era. But his reasoning turns upon the uncertain suppositions that the Ep. is a dedicatory companion to the Gospel, and that the Gospel was written in Patmos, John being in that island, as he holds, in the fifteenth year of Domitian. Ewald, again, puts the writing of the Gospel at 80 A.D., but thinks it was not in circulation till immediately before John's death; while the Ep., according to him, was written later, but circulated earlier. All that can be said with any measure of confidence is that the Ep. belongs to the later apostolic period. This seems the natural, if not the necessary, inference from the general cast of its contents, the condition of the Christian communities which is indicated in it, the errors which it combats, the lack of any reference to the contest between legalism and liberty, and the impression which it conveys that the questions which occupy so large a place in the great Pauline Epp. are no longer the questions of the day. It is in harmony with the traditional account of the period of John's stay in Ephesus, as it appears in Polycrates (cf. Euseb. HE iii. 31), Irenæus (adv. Hær. ii. 39, iii. 1, 3), Origen, and Clement of Alexandria (Euseb. HE iii. 1, 23), as well as in Jerome (de Vir. Illustr. c. 9). It is also in harmony with the tone of the Ep., for it reads like the calm counsel of old age and ripest experience; and with the presumption which is created by St. Paul's declared principle of action (Ro 15[20]), and by the absence of any reference to John or any salutation to him in the Pauline Epp. addressed to Asiatic Churches, that it was written after the death of the great Apostle of the Gentiles. It is most probable, also, that it was written after the destruction of Jerusalem, though how long after that event it is impossible to say. Some, indeed (e.g. Grotius, Düsterdieck, Fritzsche), have held it to be earlier than that catastrophe, on the ground of the mention of 'the last hour' in 2[18], or for the broader reason that an event of so terrible moment could scarcely have passed without some notice, if it had happened. But there may be no allusion to that event, for the simple reason that there was no special call to refer to it, or because it was no longer a very recent thing. Nor can anything be made of the statement in 2[18]. The term 'the last hour' applies, not to the destruction of Jerusalem (how could the 'antichrists' be signs of that?), but to the Parousia, in which connexion we find the phrase ἔσχατοι καιροί used even by Ignatius (Ep. ad Ephes. c. xi.). The Gnostic teaching which is condemned, and the external position of the errorists, combine with other things to point to a period later than 70 A.D., and towards the end of the century. This is in harmony also with the traditional date of Cerinthus, with whose doctrine the view of Christ's Person repudiated in the Ep. is most probably identified, and with the period in John's life to which tradition assigns his connexion with the heretic.

It has been sought to define the time of composition more precisely by determining the chronological relation of the Ep. to the Gospel. But the materials for doing so are far too scanty, and the arguments which have been urged for the one view or the other have little weight. Some hold the Ep. to be prior to the Gospel, on the ground that writings of 'momentary design, like letters, come naturally before writings of permanent design, like narratives or histories' (Thiersch); or on the ground that a letter of warning to particular Churches against particular errors would probably have been written earlier than a composition like the Gospel, which deals with the historical foundations, and appears to be addressed to all Christendom (Huther, al.). Others argue for the posteriority of the Ep. on the basis of certain passages which are supposed to refer to the Gospel, or to presuppose it, or on the ground that the Ep. seems to require the Gospel for its explanation. But, even if the latter were granted, it would not follow that the Ep. was later than the Gospel. Reuss, who thinks that the former needs the latter as its commentary, yet admits that 'as it once had one in the oral instruction of the author, it is not thereby proved that it is later' (Hist. of the NT, Houghton's tr., p. 237). And as to the passages appealed to in particular, the opening verses in their relation to the Prologue of the Gospel, the phrase ἐν σαρκὶ ἐληλυθότα (4^2) as compared with σὰρξ ἐγένετο, etc., they are almost equally applicable or inapplicable as arguments for the priority of the Ep. and for its posteriority. There is, indeed, nothing in the Ep. that can be justly said to presuppose the existence of the Gospel as we have it, or to go beyond what is explainable by the earlier oral preaching and teaching.

9. Destination.—The Ep. being written, then, in the scenes of the closing stage of John's apostolic ministry, it is most reasonable to suppose it to have been written for readers belonging to those parts. It has been supposed, indeed, to have been addressed to Palestinian Christians (Benson). But there is nothing to favour such a supposition, the contents of the Ep. pointing to a Gentile-Christian audience rather than a Jewish-Christian. Some have thought it directed to a single Church, that of Ephesus (Hug), or even that of Corinth (Lightfoot). But its wide scope and encyclical character are inconsistent with that. Others have regarded it as addressed to Christians outside the scene of the life and ministry of John in his old age (Holtzmann), or as an encyclical of the widest scope (Hilgenfeld). But the terms which are said to bear this out do not meet the case. The καὶ ὑμῖν and καὶ ὑμεῖς in 1^3 do not suffice to establish a distinction between the Asiatic Christians among whom John was writing and those to whom his letter is directed; and while the character of the Ep. suits its designation as a Catholic Ep., there are things in it, especially the references to particular forms of error, which so far limit and define its destination.

The most curious thing connected with this question of the readers that are in view, is the fact that Augustine, in quoting 3^2, speaks of the passage as being in John's 'Epistle to the Parthians' (quod dictum est a Joanne in epistola ad Parthos, Quæst. Evang. ii. 39). That is the only certain occurrence, indeed, of this designation in Augustine's works. It is given, however, in the Benedictine edition of his Tractates on the Ep., in the title; in the Indiculus operum S. Augustini of Possidius; in one or two manuscripts; in the contra Varimadum Arianum of Idacius Clarus or Vigilius Tapsensis; and in Bede's (if it is genuine) Prologus super septem epistolas canonicas, where it is said that many ecclesiastical writers, and among them the great Athanasius, affirm this Ep. to be 'written to the Parthians.' Hence it has been supposed by some (Grotius, etc.) that the Ep. was addressed to Jewish Christians living beyond the Euphrates within the limits of the Parthian empire. But we hear of no connexion between John and Parthia, and the designation ad Parthos appears to have been unknown to the Church of the East, and even to the Church of the West before Augustine's time. It is a pure puzzle, a curiosity on which nothing can be based. It has been accounted for as a mistake for ad Pathmios (Serrarius), ad sparsos (Wetstein), adpertius (Semler), ad Spartos (Scholz, on the authority of a 12th century manuscript), πρὸς διασπαρσαμένους (!) (Holtzmann, Mangold), πρὸς πάντας (Paulus), πρὸς παρθένους (Gieseler, etc.). Most favour the last of these explanations. Some think that the title πρὸς παρθένους was given to express the pure condition of the Churches addressed (Whiston); others, that the inscription of the Second Ep. (πρὸς παρθένους) as found in some manuscripts was transferred as more suitable to the First (Hug). Some, again, suppose that the title ran ἐπιστολὴ τοῦ Ἰωάννου τοῦ παρθένου, John having the designation ἀποστόλου καὶ εὐαγγελιστοῦ παρθένου in the inscription borne by the Apoc. in one manuscript (Cod. Guelpher.); others, that Augustine misunderstood what was said by Clem. Alex. (Frag. 1011) about the Second Ep. being written πρὸς παρθένους, and transferred the title to the First (Huther). All is conjecture, and can in no way affect the probabilities of the case (supported as these are by the tradition bearing on John's residence and work in Asia Minor) that the Ep. had in view the Churches that would be naturally addressed from Ephesus. It is therefore with those Asiatic regions in which Gnostic speculations had become rife (Apoc. $2^{6\ etc.}$), and with that great city in which Paul had planted a Christian Church, and in which John had lived on, according to Irenæus (adv. Hær. ii. 22^5, iii. 3^3), into the reign of Trajan, that this majestic Ep., with its heavenly calm and its lofty message of truth and love, is connected in respect both of readers and of writer.

LITERATURE.—Among the numerous Commentaries, special mention may be made of those of Œcumenius, Calvin, Düsterdieck, Lücke, Huther, Ebrard, Rothe (most fruitful of all), Haupt, Alford, Jelf, Westcott, Holtzmann, de Wette-Brückner, Braune, Alexander (in the Speaker's Comm.), Ewald, Plummer; among books on Introduction, especially those by Weiss, Reuss, Bleek, Hilgenfeld, Salmon, S. Davidson, Holtzmann, Jülicher, Zahn; and among works of other kinds, the Expositions by Neander, F. D. Maurice, R. S. Candlish, Lias, and Watson, Erdmann's Primæ Ep. Joan. argumentum, nexus et consilium; Luthardt's de Primæ Joan. Ep. Compositione; Flatt's de antichristis et pseudoprophetis in Ep. Joan.; Gfrörer's Urchristenthum; Besser's Bibelstunden; Pfleiderer's Urchristenthum and Hibbert Lectures; Harnack's Geschichte der altchrist. Literatur bis Eusebius.

THE SECOND EPISTLE.—1. Contents.—This brief Ep., though it touches the First Ep. at several points, and has also something in common with the Third, has an independent value, and a distinct interest. It is unmistakably a letter, and is distinguished from the First Ep. by its personal and private character. It is addressed, not to a wide circle of readers, as is the case with the First, but to a particular individual or Church, and it represents a writer who speaks less with the tone of command, but with more of the earnestness that cares for individual Christians, and seeks to come into direct relations with them. As to its origin and much else belonging to it, we have little or nothing to guide us beyond what can be gathered from its own tenor. It seems to have been occasioned by the pressure of dangers arising from false teaching, and its object is to secure the individual or the Church that is addressed against these perils until the writer could visit the scene in person.

With this object in view the author begins his letter, somewhat in St. Paul's way, with a commendation of the person or persons to whom he writes, and with a large Christian greeting. Again, with a tact and courtesy such as we find in St. Paul's letters, he expresses the joy which he had in the consistent life of her (be it lady or Church) whom he addresses. From this he passes on to an exhortation, couched in terms of entreaty, to fulfil the great law of Christian love—a love explained to imply a life and walk in practical obedience to the divine commandments. His reason for writing in such a strain is, as he indicates, his fear of the possible influence of certain errorists, whom he identifies with Antichrist, because they deny that Jesus is the Christ come in the complete reality of human nature. He counsels watchfulness against the insidious teaching of such deceivers, and speaks of the loss which would follow the acceptance of it. He reminds his reader or readers further of the fact that fellowship with God cannot be enjoyed unless one abides by the true doctrine of Christ. He declares those who deny that doctrine to be men not to be received or welcomed, lest one should make himself partaker in their evil. He adds certain explanations about the shortness of his letter, and his intention to come in person. He closes with a brief salutation from certain Christians with whom he is associated at the time.

2. Authorship.—This Ep. has much in common with the First. It speaks, as the latter does, of 'love,' 'truth,' 'the truth,' 'the commandments,' a 'new commandment' and one 'had from the beginning,' of 'loving in truth,' and 'walking in truth,' of 'abiding in' one, of a 'joy' that may be 'fulfilled.' It speaks, too, of 'Antichrist,' and deals with the same form of error—the denial that Jesus is 'the Christ come in the flesh.' And it uses the same methods of stating a thing—first positively, and then negatively. There are some things, it is true, in which it differs from 1 Jn. It has certain phrases and grammatical forms which do not occur in the First Ep.—e.g. εἴ τις for ἐάν τις, περιπατεῖν κατά for περιπατεῖν ἐν, ἐρχόμενος ἐν σαρκί for ἐληλυθὼς ἐν σαρκί, θεὸν ἔχειν, διδαχὴ Χριστοῦ, διδαχὴν φέρειν, βλέπετε ἑαυτούς, etc. But little can be made of such things as these. They are not enough to establish any essential difference in idea or in style. It is admitted, even by some who dispute the apostolic origin of 2 Jn, that 'these deviations do not destroy the force of the argument contained in the resemblances' (S. Davidson's Introd. to the NT, ii. p. 329).

This being the case, the inference would seem to be that 2 Jn is by the same hand as 1 Jn. This has been in point of fact the general view, and even some of those who have denied the Johannine authorship of 1 Jn have admitted that the two Epp. are by the same writer (Bretschneider, Paulus). But there are some who deny that identity of authorship can be inferred from the similarities which have been noticed, even though these come to so much that more than a half of the smaller Ep. can be found in the larger. They think that these striking resemblances can be explained by the art of a forger, or as the imitative work of a writer who knew 1 Jn well. So some who have recognized 1 Jn to be by the evangelist have ascribed 2 Jn to a different hand—either to the Presbyter John (Erasmus, Grotius, etc.), or to some other John unknown to us. Baur has a somewhat elaborate and far-fetched theory of the origin of this Epistle. He holds it to be of Montanist origin, and to be addressed to the Church to which the Gaius of 3 Jn belongs. He takes it to be indeed the Ep. which is referred to in 3 Jn [9], and to be intended for one of the sections of the Roman Church, in which Church he thinks a schism had taken place. He bases this largely on the statement made by Clem. Alex. in his Hypotyposes as to 2 Jn being written ad quandam Babyloniam electam, supposing that Rome is meant by the Babylonia, and that the term electa, ἐκλεκτή, is a designation given to the Church in harmony with the Montanist idea of the Church as the pure and holy bride of Christ. But all this turns on a fanciful and inconsistent interpretation of Clement's words, and those who agree for the most part with Baur, both in his general positions and in his denial of the apostolic origin of 2 Jn, often decline to follow him here. Hilgenfeld, e.g., rejects this peculiar Montanist account of the Ep., and tries to explain it as an official condemnation, in the form of a letter, of fellowship with Gnostic teachers. That the Ep. cannot be ascribed to John the evangelist, however, is also held by some who are unable to go all the way either with Baur or with Hilgenfeld, and whose general view of it is essentially different. Ebrard, e.g., following Erasmus, assigns it to the Presbyter John, passing lightly over the resemblances to 1 Jn as so many allusions and reminiscences, and regarding the distinctive passages as essentially different from the evangelist's style.

Although the internal evidence, therefore, is held by most to point to the author of the First Ep. as also the writer of the Second, and to the Apostle John as that writer, it is not read in that way by all. How, then, does the case stand with respect to the external evidence? The historical testimony, it must be admitted, is neither very abundant nor very clear. That it should be so need not seem strange when regard is had to the extreme brevity of the Ep. and its private character. What we have is as much as could be expected, and it is on the whole sufficient for the purpose. The Ep. seems not to have been accepted by the school of Antioch. Theodore of Mopsuestia appears to be reported by Leontius of Byzantium as rejecting James and the other Cath. Epp. The words, however, viz. ob quam causam, ut arbitror, ipsam epistolam Jacobi et alias deinceps catholicas abrogat et antiquat, are not very precise. Theodoret makes no reference to 2 Jn. In a homily on Mt 21[23], which is doubtfully ascribed to Chrysostom, it is said of it, as well as of 3 Jn, οἱ πατέρες ἀποκανονίζονται. Jerome (de Vir. Illus. c. 9) contrasts the two smaller Epp. with the First, and speaks of them as ascribed to the Presbyter John. Origen, who quotes 1 Jn, never quotes either 2 Jn or 3 Jn. He knows of the circulation, however, of the two minor Epp., but remarks that 'not all affirm them to be genuine' (Euseb. HE vi. 25). Neither the one nor the other seems to have been included in the Peshiṭta Version. And Eusebius classes both among the Antilegomena. He speaks of them as the 'so-called second and third of John,' and indicates that it was questioned whether they belonged to the evangelist, 'or possibly to another of the same name as he' (HE iii. 25[3]).

On the other hand, Irenæus quotes 2 Jn [10, 11] as the words of 'John, the disciple of the Lord' (adv. Hær. i. 16[3]), and gives the statement about the 'deceivers' and 'Antichrist' (2 Jn [7]) also as by the Lord's 'disciple,' though he refers to it as in 1 Jn instead of 2 Jn (adv. Hær. iii. 16[8]). Clement of Alex. speaks of John 'in his larger Epistle' (ἐν τῇ μείζονι ἐπιστολῇ) as seeming to teach a certain thing; from which it is clear that he knew a shorter Ep. or shorter Epp. (Strom. ii. 15). In a fragmentary Latin translation of the Hypotyposes he speaks of the same Ep. in these very definite terms: Secunda Joannis epistola, quæ ad virgines scripta simplicissima est; scripta vero est ad quandam Babyloniam Electam nomine, significat autem electionem ecclesiæ sanctæ. He is also reported by Eusebius (HE vi. 14[1]) to have commented in his Hypotyposes on the disputed books, viz. 'the Epistle of Jude and the other Catholic Epistles.' Dionysius of Alexandria (in a passage given in Eusebius, HE vii. 25) speaks of John as not naming himself, ἐν τῇ δευτέρᾳ φερομένῃ Ἰωάννου καὶ τρίτῃ, καίτοι βραχείαις οὔσαις ἐπιστολαῖς, but as writing 'anonymously as the presbyter.' Dionysius therefore regarded the anonymity of 2 Jn as quite in John's manner. And the school of Alexandria seems to have generally accepted the Second Ep. as John the apostle's. Alexander, e.g., in quoting vv.[10, 11] says of them ὡς παρήγγει λεν ὁ μακάριος Ἰωάννης (Socrates, HE i. 6). The Muratorian Fragment refers to at least two Epp. of John in the difficult sentence, Epistola sane Jude et superscripti Johannis duas in catholica habentur et sapientia ab amicis Salomonis in honorem ipsius scripta (Routh, Reliq. Sac. i. p. 296). But the text requires emendation, and it is differently interpreted, some (Lücke, Huther, etc.) understanding it to speak for the Johannine authorship, others (reading ut for et sapientia)* taking it to mean that, as the Book of Wisdom was not written by Solomon, so these Epp. were not written by John the apostle.

It should be added that, though the great North African Fathers, Tertullian and Cyprian, do not quote 2 Jn, it is clear that it was recognized in their Church. For Cyprian himself, in reporting the statements made by the bishops at the synod which was held at Carthage in A.D. 256, speaks of Aurelius, bishop of Chullabi, as appealing to 2 Jn[10] in these words: Joannes Apostolus in epistola sua posuit dicens, si quis ad vos venit, etc. In like manner, although the Ep. was not in the great Syriac Version, it appears to have been used by Ephraem in the 4th cent., and that in a way indicating that it was understood to be by John the apostle (de Amore Paup. iii. 52; ad Imitat. Prov. i. 76). And while Eusebius placed it, as we have seen, among the 'disputed' books, he expresses himself differently in his Demonstratio Evangelica (iii. 5), when he gives, as it appears, his own opinion. There he says of John that in his Epistles he 'either makes no mention of himself or calls himself presbyter, but nowhere apostle or evangelist'—ἐν μὲν ταῖς ἐπιστολαῖς αὐτοῦ οὐδὲ μνήμην τῆς οἰκείας προσηγορίας ποιεῖται, ἢ πρεσβύτερον ἑαυτὸν ὀνομάζει, οὐδαμοῦ δὲ ἀπόστολον οὐδὲ εὐαγγελιστήν). It was included, too, in the Old Latin VS.

The most ancient historical testimony, therefore, although it is of limited quantity, is in favour of the authorship by John the apostle. It is testimony that comes from sources so far apart as Gaul, Alexandria, and North Africa. It is confirmed by the resemblance of 2 Jn to 1 Jn; the considerations which go to establish the Johannine origin of the latter being so far available also for the Johannine origin of the former. Nor is any difficulty created by the designation 'the elder.' That title rather supports the apostolic origin. It is still a moot point whether we have historical ground for believing in the existence of a Presbyter John in Ephesus as distinct from the Apostle John. Nor is there anything in the case as regards 2 Jn to make the hypothesis of this shadowy second John either necessary or helpful. It is to the apostle that the earliest evidence points. It is difficult, indeed, to understand how this small private letter could have been accepted as it was, and in due time made part of the Canon, unless the general opinion of the Church had ascribed it to John. And the use of the title, 'the elder,' in the inscription tells for the ordinary view. No one wishing to pass off a writing as by the apostle would have chosen so indefinite a title. No ordinary person, writing with honest intent in his own name, would have called himself 'the elder,' as if there were none but he; while, if the writer so styling himself had been a person of extraordinary importance, it would be strange that we should know nothing of him. There is nothing to show that the title is used to distinguish 'presbyter' from 'apostle.' Apostles could also be called presbyters, as we see from the NT itself (1 P 5[1]), and as is the case in the very sentence from Papias on which the hypothesis of a distinct Presbyter John is founded. It may be a question in what particular sense the title is applied to the writer, whether with reference to his advanced age, as St. Paul speaks of himself as the 'aged,' ὁ πρεσβυτής (Philem[9]), or, as is rather the case, in respect of his peculiar position. But on no lips could this simple title be so fit or so intelligible as on those of the evangelist, the last of the apostles, who for long years had been overseer of the Christian community in Asia Minor. On his lips the name would explain itself, and it would mean more than 'apostle.' It would be the note of the peculiar relation, both official and fatherly, which the apostle had held to the Churches and their members in those parts, and would be at once understood wherever his superintendence had been known.

3. Time, Place, and Destination.—It is impossible to determine with certainty the time when the Ep. was written. It seems to belong to the closing years of the apostle. But whether it is earlier or later than the larger Ep. we have no means of deciding. There are those (e.g. Ebrard) who argue that it must be later, because there are things in it which appear to refer back to the First Epistle. But the similarities and supposed allusions are not of the kind that can be explained only by the priority of the larger Epistle. It is also probable that 2 Jn was written in the parts in which 1 Jn was written, especially as the false teachers in view are of the same order in both Epp. If the visit which is intimated in v.[12] can be taken as an intended tour of inspection, we may go further, and say that, in all probability, the letter was written in Ephesus, the centre of the Asiatic circle.

The destination of the Ep. is also a matter of great difficulty. The most definite statement we have on the subject in early Christian literature is in the Latin fragment (if it be authentic) of the Hypotyposes of Clement of Alexandria, already referred to. But it is a mixed statement, and one that does not help us much. It is to the effect that the Ep. was written ad virgines, and to 'a certain Babylonian, Electa by name' (ad quandam Babyloniam Electam), but that this name Electa signified the election of the holy Church. The question turns upon the address ἐκλεκτῇ Κυρίᾳ, and the difficulty is in determining whether that refers to an individual or to a community. These different renderings of it are proposed: (1) to an elect lady; (2) to the elect lady; (3) to the elect Kyria; (4) to the lady Electa; (5) to Electa Kyria. Grammatically, the first is the simplest and most natural, but it is too indefinite. It is not easy to see how a letter of such a tenor could have been addressed so vaguely. The second interpretation may also be taken as grammatically defensible (cf. ἐκλεκτοῖς παρεπιδήμοις, 1 P 1[1]), and has been followed by the English Versions and by Luther's German der auserwählten Frau. The third, which appears to have been favoured by Athanasius, and has been accepted later by Bengel, Lücke, de Wette, Düsterdieck, Ebrard, etc., is supported so far by the fact that Κυρίᾳ occurs as a proper name (Gruter, Inscript. p. 1127 n. 11), and by the analogy of the address of 3 Jn. But against it is the consideration that the more natural form in that case would have been Κυρίᾳ τῇ ἐκλεκτῇ, as we have Γαΐῳ τῷ ἀγαπητῷ (3 Jn[1]), Ῥοῦφον τὸν ἐκλεκτόν (Ro 16[13]), and in the Ep. itself, ἀδελφῆς σοῦ τῆς ἐκλεκτῆς (v.[13]). The fourth rendering, though favoured by Clement, has the difficulty that, while Electus occurs as a personal name, Electa seems not to be found among the names of women. But, apart from this, there is the fact that the term ἐκλεκτή occurs again in v.[13], and it is most unlikely that two sisters should have had the same name Electa. The least probable interpretation is the last, which, in addition to other difficulties, makes the person in question the bearer of two strange names.

* Et is confirmed, however, by the new MS of the Fragment published in Miscellanea Cassinese, 1897.

On the whole, there is most to favour the rendering 'to the elect lady,' and the idea that the Ep. is addressed to a Christian matron, who was held in high esteem in a wide Christian circle, and about whose children the apostle had something to write, partly in praise, partly in caution. But of this lady we know nothing beyond what is told us here. The supposition that the person addressed may have been Martha of Bethany has nothing to support it but the fanciful idea that Kyria in Gr. is like Martha in Heb., both being feminine forms of the word for 'Lord.' The designation in question, however, has been understood by not a few to be a figurative expression for a Christian society, rather than a literal description of an individual Christian. The reason for this is found partly in John's way of using symbolical terms, partly in the idea that the salutation would come more naturally from a Church to a Church, but chiefly in the fact that there is comparatively little in the Ep. that applies distinctly to an individual, and much that runs in plural terms — loving 'one another,' looking 'to yourselves,' etc. Hence Jerome, followed by Hilgenfeld, Lünemann, and Schmiedel, held the letter to be addressed to the Church generally. But this surely is excluded by the mention of the 'elect sister.' Others, with more probability, have supposed the Ep. to be directed to a particular Church; and some have attempted to identify the Church as that of Jerusalem (Whitby), or that of Philadelphia (Whiston), or that of Corinth (Serrarius). But it is doubtful whether any writer would naturally introduce such a symbolism into a brief private letter like this. And as it admits of no doubt that the Third Ep. is addressed to an individual, it seems most reasonable to suppose that the companion letter is also written to an individual. In this case we have another example, and a very interesting one, of the private correspondence of the apostles, and an instructive instance of John's pastoral concern for an individual believer and her children.

Literature.—Among the Commentaries, especially those by Huther, Düsterdieck, Lücke, Alford, Ebrard, Westcott; among the books of Introduction, those given under the First Epistle; and in addition, Ritmeier, de Electa Domina; Krigele, de Κυρία Joannis; H. G. B. Müller, Comm. in Sec. Ep. Joan.; Rambonnet, de Sec. Ep. Joannea; Knauer, Studien u. Kritiken, 1833; S. Cox, The Private Letters of St. Paul and St. John.

The Third Epistle.—1. Contents.—This Ep. is also very brief. The writer explains that it is so, not because he has little to say, but because he expects shortly to see the person addressed, and to 'speak face to face' with him (vv.[13. 14]) It is occupied mostly with things of personal and circumstantial interest, but it touches some important principles, and gives us glimpses of the condition of the early Christian societies which are of great value. It has all the marks of a letter, in freedom of style, and in the use of inscription, benediction, and salutation. It is written with much point and spirit, with some dramatic force, and also with singular tact. It begins with an expression of the writer's love for the friend addressed, his interest in his welfare, and his joy in the reports brought him by others of his truth and his consistent walk. It then praises him specially for the kindness which he had shown to certain 'brethren and strangers,' and commends these men further to his hospitable care. In strong terms it then condemns the action of a certain Diotrephes who had acted in a very different spirit, setting himself arrogantly against the writer, and grasping at authority, neither himself receiving such stranger brethren, nor allowing others to do so. Such ambitious and unbrotherly conduct, it says, is not to be imitated, and cannot be favoured by one who is of God. Passing from this unwelcome subject, it speaks a good word for a certain Demetrius, with whom perhaps the letter was to go, and closes with some personal explanations, a brief benediction, and mutual greetings.

2. Time, Place, Destination.—This Ep. raises no doubt about its destination. It is addressed to an individual, and is of a private character all through. But beyond the fact that his name was Gaius, that he had the confidence of the writer, and that he had a large and generous sense of Christian duty to strangers, we know nothing of the recipient. There is nothing to identify him with the Gaius or Caius, one of the 'men of Macedonia' who were 'Paul's companions in travel' (Ac 19[29]); with the Gaius of Derbe who accompanied Paul into Asia (Ac 20[4]); with the Corinthian Gaius who was one of the few baptized by Paul (1 Co 1[14]), and is described as Paul's 'host' and that 'of the whole Church' (Ro 16[23]); or with another of the same name who is said to have been made bishop of Pergamos by John (Const. Apostol. vii. 46). The fact that the Gaius of this Ep. and the Gaius of Corinth have both the character of hospitality, is a very slender basis on which to establish the identity of the two. The name Gaius was one of the commonest personal names, and the prominent men in the Churches of Asia Minor may not have been the same in John's time as in Paul's. The Ep. itself, indeed, does not show that this Gaius was a presbyter or held any official position. He may very well have been a simple member, though one of influence and repute. Nor does the Ep. make it possible for us to identify the Church to which he belonged. Some, indeed, have thought it to be the Church of Pergamos, a Gaius being mentioned in the Apost. Const. as bishop of that place (Wolf, Thoma); and some have taken it to be the Church of Corinth, supposing this Gaius to be the Gaius of Corinth referred to in the Pauline Epp. (Koenen). We can only say that in all probability it was one in the Ephesian circle.

Nor have we more to guide us in determining the date of the Ep. and the place where it was written. Its general character and its likeness to 2 Jn point to the close of the apostle's ministry, if it is his composition, and to one or other of the Asiatic Churches over which his superintendence was exercised. As in the case of 2 Jn, Ephesus would most probably be the place, especially if the visit referred to in v.[14] could be understood to mean a tour of inspection. And Eusebius (HE iii. 23), speaking of John's administration of the Churches in Asia after the death of Domitian, quotes from Clement a statement bearing that the apostle 'coming from the isle of Patmos to Ephesus, went also, when called, to the neighbouring regions of the Gentiles; in some to appoint bishops, in some to institute entire new Churches, in others to appoint to the ministry some one of those that were pointed out by the Holy Ghost.'

3. Occasion.—The Ep. appears to have been occasioned by the visits of certain Christian brethren who moved about from place to place, probably as travelling preachers or missionary teachers, and by the different receptions that had been given them. Such men were dependent on the hospitality of their brethren, and deserved to enjoy it. They had visited the Church to which Gaius belonged, and had also come to John. They had received a brotherly welcome from Gaius, but had been rudely treated by another member of the Church, a man of ambitious spirit who disowned the apostle's authority. The letter is written in these circumstances to encourage Gaius in his generous attitude to such strangers, and to intimate the apostle's purpose to visit the Church in person and set matters right. We gather from it, too, that it had been preceded by another short letter, which seems to have had no effect. That letter has been identified by some with 1 Jn (Storr, etc.), by others with 2 Jn (Besser, Ewald, etc.). But the subjects dealt with in these Epp. are so unlike those questions of hospitality to a particular class which make the main contents of 3 Jn, that little can be said for such identifications. The letter appears to be one of the lost Epp. of Apostles.

4. Affinities and Authorship.—It has marked affinities both with 1 Jn and 2 Jn. It has some words, φλυαρεῖν, φιλοπρωτεύειν, ὑπολαμβάνειν as = welcome, which are not found in these others. But they are due to the case which the Ep. has to express. It has other words and phrases, such as προπέμπειν, εὐοδοῦσθαι, ὑγιαίνειν, ἐπιδέχεσθαι, πιστὸν ποιεῖν, which are either peculiar or more after Paul's style than John's. But they are far outweighed by the general resemblance in the case of the two smaller letters; the similarity of the terms in which the closing personal explanations are made (2 Jn [12. 13], 3 Jn [13. 14]); and the occurrence of such parallelisms of phrase between 3 Jn and the Johannine writings as these—ἐν ἀληθείᾳ (v.[1. 3], cf. 1 Jn 3[18], 2 Jn [1. 4]), ἐκ θεοῦ εἶναι (v.[11], cf. 1 Jn 2[29]), θεὸν ὁρᾷν (v.[11], cf. 1 Jn 3[6]), μαρτυρεῖν τινι (v.[12], cf. Jn 21[24]), οἶδας ὅτι ἡ μαρτυρία ἡμῶν ἀληθής ἐστιν (v.[12], cf. Jn 12[24]).

In respect of historical attestation this Ep. stands much in the same position as 2 Jn. The testimony to its recognition in the Church and to its being from the hand of the Apostle John, is on the whole, however, somewhat less in amount and in definiteness. Like 2 Jn, it was omitted by the Peshiṭta, and seems not to have been accepted by the school of Antioch. Like 2 Jn, it was placed by Eusebius among the Antilegomena, and was referred to by Origen as one not admitted by all to be genuine. From the time of Eusebius it appears to have been generally received. With 2 Jn it found a place in the Apostolic Canons, the sixtieth Canon of the Council of Laodicea (A.D. 364), the Canon of Cyril of Jerusalem, the Canon of the third Council of Carthage (A.D. 397), etc. It is referred to by Jerome as among the Catholic Epp., but as said to have been written together with 2 Jn by John the presbyter (de Vir. Illustr. c. 9), to whom it was also attributed in the decree of Damasus (Charteris, Canonicity, p. 24), and by Cosmas Indicopleustes. It is not quoted by Tertullian, Cyprian, or Irenæus. It is not mentioned by Clement of Alexandria when he deals with the Second Epistle. Eusebius, however, speaks of Clement as having explained the Catholic Epp. in his Hypotyposes (HE vi. 14), from which it may perhaps be inferred that he used this Ep. as well as the others. There is no such evidence that this Ep. was recognized by the Church of North Africa as we have in the case of 2 Jn, notwithstanding the lack of any reference to it in the writings of the great North African Fathers. On the other hand, it has a place in the Muratorian Canon (according to the most probable interpretation); it was in the Old Latin Version; it was recognized by Dionysius of Alexandria; and it was quoted by Ephraem the Syrian. The most ancient testimony to its existence and recognition associates it not with the presbyter, but with the Apostle John. This association is in harmony with the Johannine touches which attract our attention in it, while the arguments that go to show this Ep. to be from the same hand as the other two Epp. ascribed to John, go also to prove it to be by the Apostle John. The doubts which overhung it for a time may have been due to its private character and the length of time which a letter of this kind would naturally take before it could become widely known in the Churches.

It has been supposed by some that v.[12] shows that the writer wished to identify himself with the disciple referred to in Jn 21[24] (Pfleiderer). But there is nothing to support this. Ewald (Joh. Schriften, p. 505) was of opinion that of a number of letters written by John to individuals or particular Churches, only 2 and 3 Jn have survived; that both these Epp. were meant for the same Church; and that the Third was written lest the Second should have been prevented by Diotrephes from getting into the hands for which it was intended. Hilgenfeld has a curious theory of 3 Jn as a letter of introduction intended to assert the rights of the Church of John against the exclusiveness of the rigorous Jewish-Christian party in the matter of letters of commendation. Baur's theory is still more curious and fine-spun. He thought that a schism had been caused in the Church to which Gaius belonged by the Montanist movement; that the exclusive party was headed by Diotrephes; and that this Ep. was written under John's name against the Roman episcopate—the Roman bishop, Soter, or Anicetus, or Eleutherus, being aimed at under the pseudonym Diotrephes.

5. Peculiar Interest.—The great interest of this Ep. lies in the insight which it gives us into the ordinary life of the Christian communities of those early times and this wide Asiatic territory, which had enjoyed the oversight of the last of the apostles. It helps us to see what these Churches were, not as we idealize them, but in their actual everyday condition, with their excellences and defects, their noble and their ignoble figures, their meek and their ambitious members, the errors into which they might be betrayed, their varied, mixed, and stirring life. It shows us something, too, of their independence, of the kind of ministry that was in exercise among them, and their relation to it, of their order also and administration. On these latter subjects it has so much to suggest that it seems to mark a notable stage in the growth of the Church and the history of its organization. It discloses a condition of things like that with which the Didaché has made us familiar. It places us at the point of transition from the apostolic age to the post-apostolic, from the primitive simplicity to a more developed constitution. Harnack thinks we can see in it the struggle between the old patriarchal, provincial order of things, with its ministry of travelling missionary preachers, and the rise of the settled, organized Church, with its officials, its rights, and its administration. He finds in it nothing less than the emergence of the Episcopate proper, and recognizes in Diotrephes the first bishop of the monarchical type known to us by name.

JOKMEAM (יָקְמְעָם; B Ἰκαάμ, A Ἰεκμαάν).—A town in Ephraim given to the Levites, near Beth-horon, 1 Ch 6^{68} [Heb. ^{53}]. In Jos 21^{22} it is called Kibzaim (LXX omits). No site answering to either of these names is known. Jokmeam is mentioned also in 1 K 4^{12}, where AV has incorrectly Jok*n*eam (but see next art.). C. R. CONDER.

JOKNEAM (יָקְנְעָם, perh. 'let the people possess' [see Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 218]).—A royal city of the Canaanites, on Carmel and the S.W. border of Zebulun, with a 'torrent-valley' (apparently the gorge of the Kishon, which is dry in parts in summer) to the east, Jos 12^{22} 19^{11}. It was given to the Levites, according to Jos 21^{34}, where it is enumerated as belonging to Zebulun. It is possibly the same as Jok*m*eam of 1 K 4^{12} (B Λουκάμ, Luc. Οὐκάμ), which is mentioned as on the border of one of Solomon's commissariat districts, probably at the boundary between Issachar and Zebulun. The site is found at the present Tell Ḳeimûn, on the E. slope of Carmel, near the Kishon—a conspicuous mound with ruins of a small town. In the 4th cent. A.D. (Onom. s. Camon) it was known as lying 6 Roman miles N. of Legio (Lejjûn), on the way to Ptolemais ('Akka), and in the 12th cent. A.D. it was called Cain Mons or 'Mt. Cain,' from a legend which made it the place where Cain died. It became the centre of a small independent Seigneurie. The ruins include those of a Byzantine building, apparently a chapel. In the Samaritan Book of Joshua it is noticed as the scene of a conflict between the Hebrews and the giants, and Joshua is said to have been here shut up in magic walls of brass, till, on sending a dove to Nabih the Hebrew king of Gilead, he was rescued.

Jokneam appears in Jth 7^{3} under the name Cyamon (Κυαμών) in connexion with the encampment of Holofernes (but see Buhl, GAP 210; Robinson, BRP iii. 339 n.).

JOKSHAN (יָקְשָׁן, Ἰεξάν, Ἰεκσάν, Ἰεκτάν).—Son of Abraham and Keturah, and father of Sheba (Saba) and Dedan, Gn 25^{2} (1 Ch 1^{32}). The name seems quite unknown, and the suggestion of Tuch that it is identical with Joktan seems the most plausible. The two forms might represent respectively the Hebrew and Aramaic pronunciation of the same word (cf. קטר קשא, קטי קשא, where the Aramaic ט is hardened from ת, as in קטל for קתל, קטין for קתין). The Arabic genealogists apparently have no suggestion for his identification; for Yâḳish (or rather Yâfish), who is mentioned by a writer quoted by Yâḳût (iii. 635, Osiander in ZDMG x. 31), owes his existence to a conflation of the names Jokshan and Japheth.

D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

JOKTAN (יָקְטָן, Ἰεκτάν, Ἰουκτάς, Jos. Ant. I. vi. 4).—Son of Eber, and father of a number of races (Gn 10^{26}, 1 Ch 1^{20}). The races mentioned dwelt 'from Mesha to Sephar'; and though the import of these names is doubtful, the occurrence among them of Saba, Ḥadramaut, and Salif makes it certain that Arabia or a portion of Arabia is intended. When the attention of the Arabic genealogists was drawn to the Old Testament by Mohammed's ostensible acceptance of it, they noticed the names that have been quoted, and drew the same conclusion from them. Two lists of identifications made by archæologists of the early centuries of Islam are given in the miscellaneous work called Al-Iḳd al-Farîd (ii. 51). They had to grapple with several difficulties at the outset. The native tradition made Saba son of Yashjub, and Ḥadramaut son of Ḥimyar (Ḥamdani, p. 85). The genealogies were harmonized by the supposition that some links had been omitted in the Hebrew record; hence Saba is made by the Arabic historians 'son of Yashjub son of Ya'rub son of Ḳaḥṭân (Yoktan)'; the insertion of the link Ya'rub being to mark the epoch at which the Hebrews (sons of Eber) became Arabs (Ibn Ḳutaibah's Manual of History, p. 209, ed. Cairo). Moreover, the name Joktan was itself unknown; some genealogist therefore hit on the name Ḳaḥṭân, which really belonged to some tribe or region (Muḳaddasi in Bibl. Geogr. Arab. iii. 104), and thought it near enough to be identified with the Hebrew name; and though this identification was not universally accepted (Tâj al-'Arûs, s.v.), it was till recently generally adopted both in the East and the West. Mas'ûdi, who records another and probably more ancient pedigree for Ḳaḥṭân, says that he found the biblical genealogy accepted by tribal authorities all over South Arabia. What can scarcely be determined now is whether the legend that makes Ḳaḥṭân founder of the S. Arabian tribes is earlier or later than his identification with Joktan; but it seems clear that there is no connexion between the two names. The word Ḳaḥṭân (of which there was a variety, Aḳhât) probably means 'droughty,' and originally applied to some strip of territory. It might have been expected that some of the numerous inscriptions that have been discovered in S. Arabia would throw light on the passage of Gn, but the most important contribution to its interpretation which has been obtained from that source would seem to be the discovery by Glaser of the ancient name of San'â, whence it would appear that the old identification of Uzal with that city is erroneous.

Since, therefore, both the Arabic legends and the inscriptions fail us, we are left to conjecture. The name may be an ethnological invention intended to connect the Arabs with the Hebrews, and in that case the Targum on 1 Ch (published in Lagarde's Hagiographa Chaldaice) is probably right in deriving it from the Hebrew, with the sense 'smaller' or 'shorter,' not, however, with reference to the length of human life, but in comparison with the other 'half' (Peleg) of the sons of Eber. If, however, the name be Arabic and geographical, probably the connexion suggested by Glaser (Skizze, ii. 423) between it and Ḳaṭan, the name of several mountains in Arabia (Yâḳût, s.v.), and also of a tribe mentioned by Ptolemy (Katanitæ), has most in its favour. The Arabs, however, tell us that Ḳaṭan is properly an anatomical term; and if these mountains be named from their resemblance to some portion of the body, the form Yoḳtan remains unexplained. If the name met us in an Arabic genealogy, we should almost certainly have the observation that Joktan was the first who had a fixed residence (Arab. ḳaṭana yaḳṭunu).

With regard to the thirteen names of Joktan's sons, the meagreness of the list forbids us to suppose that it is the intention of the genealogist to give a description of the Arabian peninsula, or indeed of any portion of it; his purpose is rather to localize ethnologically, and to some extent geographically, the races with whose names his readers were already familiar. Hence Saba and Havilah, to which peculiar interest attached, are localized differently in the tables admitted into Gn (10^{7} 25^{3}).

We learn from Ezk 27^{19} that Uzal was famous in connexion with the spice trade; and it is probable that, were more of the old Hebrew literature preserved, we should be able in each case to name the sedes glossæ. The discovery, therefore, of places with identical names in the Arabian peninsula is not sufficient to identify the localities of the table, unless it be shown that the places discovered were of sufficient importance to have been heard of by the Israelites. Glaser's suggestion (l.c.), that the table proceeds geographically from S. to N., seems inconsistent with the mention of Saba near the end; for surely Saba should count as a southern or, at any rate, midland state. We cannot even be sure that all the names which occur in it are connected with Arabia; the Targ. on Chron. hints that the juxtaposition of Saba, Ophir, and Havilah is due to all three being connected with the gold industry (cf. Is 60^{6}), and this fact would to an ancient ethnologist have constituted a claim to affinity independently of local considerations. The more probable suggestions that have been made for the identification of the names that occur only in this passage are quoted in the separate articles.

JOKTHEEL (יָקְתְאֵל).—This name occurs twice in OT as applied to two very different places: one a city or town of the Amorites, the other the capital of Edom. 1. A city described (Jos $15^{33.38}$, B Ἰακαρεήλ, A and Luc. Ἰεχθαήλ) as lying in 'the Shephelah,' along with some others, from which we gather that it was situated on the extensive plain bordering Philistia, bounded on the E. by the tableland of southern Judæa, and on the W. by the Mediterranean. In the general allotment by Joshua it came into possession of the tribe of Judah. Its site has not been recovered. 2. The name (which Wetzstein, in Del. Jes.[3] 703 f., explains from the Arab., 'protection of God') given (2 K 14^{7}, B and Luc. Καθοήλ, A Ἰεκθοήλ) to Sela, the ancient capital of the Edomites, after its capture by Amaziah king of Judah (see Sela). It may have been bestowed by Amaziah in recognition of the aid afforded by J" in the capture of a city of such amazing strength as Sela, and the overthrow of the Edomites in the Valley of Salt. The latter was at the southern end of the Dead Sea, and thus within the territory of the kings of Judah. The name 'Joktheel' did not take permanent hold on the place, because the Edomites in the reign of Ahaz regained their sovereignty (2 Ch 28^{17}), and doubtless restored to their capital its original name of Sela.

JOLLITY.—1 Es 3^{20} 'It [wine] turneth also every thought into jollity (εὐωχία) and mirth'; and Sir 13^{8} 'Beware that thou be not deceived, and brought down in thy jollity' (ἐν εὐφροσύνῃ σου; AVm 'by thy simplicity'; RV 'in thy mirth'). The meaning is 'mirth,' which is the commonest meaning of the word. Thus Shaks., Mid. Night's Dream, v. i. 377—

> 'A fortnight hold we this solemnity,
> In nightly revels and new jollity';

And Milton, PL xi. 714—

> 'And all was turned to jollity and game.'

So Latimer, Sermons (Arber's ed. p. 58), 'Joab and the other company beynge in theyr jolitye, and kepyng good cheare, heard it.' But in a subsequent sermon (p. 113) Latimer has it with the sense of splendour, 'He shewed him al the kyngdomes of the worlde, and all theyr jolitye.' Cf. Jth 10^{3} Wyc. 1382, 'she clothide hir with the clothis of hir jolite,' 1388 'gladnesse.' The adj. 'jolly' is used by Tind., Ex 15^{1} 'His jolye captaynes are drowned in the red see'; and by Coverdale, Job 40^{10} 'up, decke the in thy joly araye, poure out the indignacion of thy wrath.'

Literature.

i. Jonah and 2 K 14^{25}.—The name יוֹנָה (Ἰωνᾶς) is found in the canon. OT only in 2 K 14^{25} and Jon 1^{1}–4^{9} (cf. Mandelkern, Vet. Test. Concord. Heb. et Chald. 1896, p. 1438[a]). In the former of these passages, where it is used of 'the servant of God, Jonah the son of Amittai, the prophet, which was of Gath-hepher,' the expression 'through his servant' (בְּיַד־עַבְדּוֹ) is nothing remarkable, occurring as it does also in 1 K (8^{56}) 14^{18} 15^{29}, 2 K 9^{36} 10^{10} in the same sense as in 2 K 14^{25}. The name Amittai (אֲמִתַּי) is found nowhere in OT except in 2 K 14^{25} and Jon 1^{1} (Mandelkern, loc. cit. p. 1367[b]). Hence all we know of the father of the prophet Jonah is this at most, that he was an inhabitant of the place called גַּת הַחֵפֶר (='press of Ḥepher,' proper names having elsewhere also for certain reasons the article attached to them [cf. König, Histor.-comparat. Syntax d. Heb. 1897, § 295]). It is the same place that is meant by גִּתָּה חֵפֶר in Jos 19^{13}, where the context shows that we have the so-called locative form ('to Gath-hepher,' LXX ἐπί, κ.τ.λ.). There are other instances where the locative, like Gittáh, is accented on the last syllable (cf. Shalíshah, etc., in 2 K 4^{42} etc.).* This accentuation may be determined by the immediately following guttural (cf. Lehrgeb. ii. 517). The חֵפֶר without the article in Jos 19^{13} may have arisen through haplography of the ה, or חַחֵפֶר (2 K 14^{25}) and חֵפֶר (Jos 19^{13}) may be related to each other as הָעֲנָק and עֲנָק, etc. (König, Syntax, § 295*d*). Hence we are neither to find the place-name 'Gath-hepher' in 2 K 14^{25} (G. A. Smith, Twelve Prophets, ii. 496) nor the place-name 'Gittah-hepher' in Jos 19^{13} (ib. note 1). The place Gath (ha)hepher lay in the territory assigned to the tribe of Zebulun, Jos $19^{10.\ 13}$.

In 2 K 14^{25} it is further recorded of Jonah that in the time of Jeroboam II. (c. B.C. 781–741) this prophet predicted the re-conquest of the eastern boundaries of Israel. In this passage 'the sea of the Arabah' (i.e. the Dead Sea) fixes, of course, only *ex*clusively the terminus ad quem. The uncertain expression 'the brook of the Arabah' (נַחַל הָעֲרָבָה) in Am 6^{14} does not contradict this assumption, which is commended also by other considerations (see below, § ii.).

ii. Jonah and Is 15 f.—We should be much better informed regarding the work of the prophet Jonah, if he were the author of the prophecy which forms at least the basis of Is 15^{1}–16^{12}, and to which Isaiah himself added the epilogue, 'This is the word which J" in time past spake concerning Moab, and now hath J" spoken, saying,' etc. ($16^{13f.}$). That earlier prophecy is, in point of fact, attributed to Jonah by Hitzig (Des Proph. Jonah Orakel üb. Moab, 1831), Maurer, Knobel (Der Prophetismus der Hebräer, ii. 124), Riehm (Einleit. in d. AT, ii. 62), Duhm (Theol. d. Proph. 71), Renan (Hist. du peuple d'Israël, ii. 417). But (a) the announcement of Jonah, which is mentioned in 2 K 14^{25}, had certainly a much wider scope than the oracle of Is 15^{1}–16^{12}. (b) If the author of Is 15^{1}–16^{12} was an inhabitant of the Northern kingdom and a subject of Jeroboam II. (which even Cheyne, Introd. to Bk. of Isaiah, 1895, p. 88, regards as possible), he could only ironically have called upon the Moabites to send presents to Zion ($16^{1ff.}$). (c) In the words, 'Send lambs (כָּר) for the ruler of the land . . . to Zion' (16^{1}), such a political relation of the Moabites to Jerusalem is most naturally presupposed as we find in 2 K 3^{4} (נֹקְדִים). In all probability, the Moabites after the time of Mesha became tributary again to the kings of Judah, and Is 15^{1}–16^{12} related to an attack made upon the land of Moab by the Assyrians. From this part of Isaiah, then, no information regarding Jonah ben-Amittai can be derived.

* For the other exceptions see König, Heb. Lehrg-bäude, ii 517^{3}.

iii. JONAH AND THE BOOK OF JONAH.—1. An abundant source of information about Jonah would be opened to us, if the fifth of the twelve minor prophetical books was written by him. The essential contents of this book are as follows:—

(a) Jonah ben-Amittai evaded the Divine commission to go and preach against the city of Nineveh (1^{1-3}). His motive, however, was not 'Bequemlichkeit, Trägheit, Menschenfurcht' (Kleinert, 1893, ad loc.), but the fear that J", on account of His compassionate disposition, would not execute the threatened judgment (4^{2}). Many exegetes have sought to justify this motive by remarking that Jonah will have feared to prove a 'prophet of lies' (נָבִיא הַשֶּׁקֶר) (cf. the Midrash in Jalqûṭ Shim'oni on Jonah,* and the Gesch. d. Proph. Jona by B. Wolf [see below], 1897, p. 12). Others will have it that Jonah did not wish to save a people which threatened destruction to Israel (so the Mechilta to Ex 1^{4}, Jerome, Rashi, Kimchi,† Abravanel). According to Mikhlal Jophi, ad loc., Jonah was afraid that the Ninevites, if they repented at the preaching of a single prophet, would put to shame the Israelites, who did not repent in spite of many prophets (אינם שבים מדרכם הרעה). Yet other interpreters suppose that Jonah was reluctant to make known to a heathen people the knowledge of the true God (Hengstenberg, Christologie^{2}, i. 469, 'weil er den Heiden die Barmherzigkeit missgönnte').

(b) God brought about the punishment of Jonah by means of a great storm (1^{4-16}). Acc. to Philo (de Jona oratio, Op., ed. Richter, vii. 377 ff.), it was the snoring of Jonah that drew the attention of the captain of the vessel to him ('Tradebat eum vox narium stertentium, quum altius reddatur in supinis jacentibus'). On the other hand, the Arabo-Syrian History of the Prophet Jonah makes the latter confess his fault on his own impulse, and Jonah is thus held up as a model of noble love of the truth. Moreover, the casting of lots (גּוֹרָלוֹת 1^{7}) is not introduced till after v.^{14}, somewhat after the example of the Midrash. (For the language of the latter see Wolf, p. 16 f.). In this way the casting of lots would be a last attempt to save the life of the prophet. Also, according to Edm. Hardy (ZDMG, 1896, p. 153), it is related in the Hindu Jat, 439 (ed. Fausböll, iv. 2), how sailors discovered the guilt of Mittavindaka by casting lots three times, and how, using almost the very language of Jon 1^{14}, they exposed him on a raft.

(c) But a merciful God has thus reduced Jonah to straits, not in order to destroy him, but ultimately to rescue him (2^{1-11}).

(d) Thereupon the prophet proclaimed in Nineveh that in forty days the city would be destroyed (3^{1-4}).

The same number 40 (אַרְבָּעִים), which is common to the MT, Targum, Pesh., and Vulg., is given also in one manuscript of the above-named History of the Prophet Jonah (p. viii, l. 3, 'arba 'ina). But the LXX (τρεῖς), Philo (op. cit. § 27, 'civitas ista tres tantum dies habet'), the Arab. (ثَلَاثَة), and the other manuscript of the History (ܬܠܬ) have all the number 3. Perhaps this variation is simply due to the relation between מַהֲלַךְ שְׁלֹשֶׁת יָמִים (3^{3b}) and מַהֲלַךְ יוֹם אֶחָד (v.^{4a}), for it might be supposed that the catastrophe would ensue after the three days' transit through the city. It is less probable that the influence at work was the 'three' of 2^{1} [Eng. 1^{17}]. But the Midrash mentioned a fast of שלשה ימים ושלשה לילות (Wolf, p. 25^{1}). A symbolical sense of the number 'three' is not to be thought of, nor is an interchange of the numbers μ' and γ' (W. Böhme, ZATW, 1887, p. 239) likely. Further, the verb נֶהְפָּכָת, which is imitated in מתהפכא and in the Pesh. ܡܬܐܬܦܟ, was intended to express the sense of outward destruction; hence correctly καταστραφήσεται (LXX), subvertetur (Vulgate), تَنخسف (disparebit), and Mikhlal Jophi, ad loc., רוצה לאמר בכהפכת סדום ועמרה כי מעשיה היו במעשיהם. Wolf, indeed (op. cit. p. 21 f.), contends strongly that the נֶהְפָּכָת of v.^{4} is used 'with intentional ambiguity,' it not being in the plan of an all-seeing Providence to destroy the city. But this argument would be justified only if in other prophetical threatenings also, which remained unfulfilled in consequence of man's repentance, an ambiguous expression had been used. But, e.g., in 1 K 21^{21} it is positively announced to king Ahab, 'Behold, I will bring evil upon thee'; no condition is added, yet the prophet was afterwards told, 'I will not bring,' etc. (v.^{29}).

(e) Then the people, as well as the king of Nineveh, took Jonah for a messenger of the Deity; a general fast was ordained, and the inhabitants turned from their evil ways (3^{5-10}). So universal was the fasting enjoined that even 'cattle and small cattle' were neither to eat nor drink (v.^{7}). Nowack (ad loc.) regards the words הָאָדָם וְהַבְּהֵמָה in 3^{8} as a later gloss; but, even so, the subjects would not be altered, for in v.^{7b} 'cattle and small cattle' have been mentioned. A real participation of animals in the fast has therefore been rightly recognized also, e.g., by Philo (op. cit. § 37 f.) in the passage. His words are, 'Tantum (sic) humiliationem animumque compositum secundum scripturam vestiti sunt, ut pecudes quoque eorum precibus vacantes eos juvarent,' etc. Further, the author of the Arab.-Syr. History of Jonah put in the mouth of the Ninevites the following prayer, 'If this repentance be not accepted of God, transgressors will in future despair of the possibility of return.' He went on to tell how the Divine pardon was announced by the sending of a letter and the dispelling of a darkness which had lain over the city during the fast (Wolf, op. cit. p. 26).

(f) Enraged at the action of God, Jonah was brought, through his own grief at the loss of a 'gourd,'* to see that God had rightly pardoned the Ninevites.

* On ḳikayôn ($4^{6f.\,9f.}$, Targ. קיקיון) cf. Herodot. ii. 94, ἁλίσκατι δὲ χρίωνται, κ.τ.λ., τὸ κελεῦσι μὲν Αἰγύπτιοι κίκι; see also especially Immanuel Löw, Aram. Pflanzennamen, No. 298, 'The Ricinus communis (Linn.), under the name kiki, was, for the sake of its oil, cultivated as largely in ancient Egypt as it is at the present day'; cf. Diod. Sic. i. 34; Dioscorides, iv. 164; Pliny, HN xv. 7. Wolf (p. 52) says, 'In the Talmud (Shabbath 21^{a} ll. 6 ff.) Rêsh Laḳîsh assumes that the שָׁקֵן קִיק of the Mishnah (Shabbath ii. 2) is identical with the קִיקְיוֹן דְיוֹנָה, and Rabbah bar bar (sic) Chanah said that he had seen it (חזה לי קיקיון דיונה).' The ḳîḳayôn, according to the Talmud, resembles the צלוליבא, a tree from whose pith oil and medicines were prepared. It is the Arabic ḫirwa'un, 'ricinus frutex' (Freytag, Lex. Arab.). Kimchi had already cited this explanation, which appears also in Mikhlal Jophi. It was not the κολοκύνθη, عَنْبَل, 'cf.

* ולמה ברח . . . שלחו אל נינוה להחריבה . . . ואמר יודע אני שהגוים קרובי תשובה הם ומשלה רונזי על ישראל ולא די שישראל קורין אותי נביא השקר אלא אף עובדי אלילים קורין אותי נביא השקר;

† ולא חשש (sollicitus est) לכבוד אלהים חשש לכבוד ישראל;

2. The Unity of the Book 'Jonah.'—This book might, at least partially, be a genuine source of information about Jonah ben-Amittai, if it were composed of several strata. The latter position was once maintained by Müller in Paulus' Memorabilien, vi. p. 167 ff., and by Nachtigall in Eichhorn's Allgemeiner Bibliothek, ix. 221–273 (cf. Eichhorn, Einleit. iv. § 577*b*). According to Nachtigall (and Bunsen), among the sacred books of the Hebrews there was 'a prayer of Jonah the son of Amittai,' with the note appended, 'after God had delivered him out of the hand of the king of Assyria.' This prayer is supposed to be preserved in Jon 2^{3-10}, and then chs. 3 and 4 and still later chs. 1 and $2^{1f.\ 11}$ [Eng. 1^{17} 2^{10}] to have been added to it. Nachtigall has started from a correct perception, namely, that the first part of the prayer (Jon 2^{3-10}) cannot have been uttered by a man who has been swallowed by a sea-monster. Jonah could not out of the belly of the fish say to God, 'Posuisti me in securo loco' (Philo, op. cit. § 22). Having regard to his other experiences, and even per se, it was impossible that Jonah should regard his sojourn in the fish's belly as a preliminary to his complete deliverance (Kimchi on 2^3 בחיותו ירע שיצא ממעי הדג בשלום). This prayer could only at best then be uttered after Jonah's deliverance, which is recorded in 2^{11} [Eng. ^{10}]. If now the author of $2^{1f.\ 11}$ had already before him that prayer of thanksgiving (Nachtigall, Bunsen), he would have introduced it after 2^{11}, otherwise he must have placed the origin of the poem within the body of the great fish, in order by this improbability to indicate the didactic purpose of his narrative. But it is more likely that this composition has been supplemented by a later writer who missed the contents of the prayer referred to in 2^2 (Knobel, Der Prophetismus der Hebräer, ii. 377). This older assumption also appears to us the only correct element in the contentions of W. Böhme ('Die Compos. d. Buches Jona' in ZATW, 1887, pp. 224 ff., 234), and it is approved also by Cheyne (Origin of the Psalter, 1891, p. 126), Budde (ZATW, 1892, p. 42), and Nowack (Handcomm. 1897, p. 180). G. A. Smith (Twelve Prophets, ii. 512) opposes it, appealing to וַיְמַן ('and he arranged or ordered') of 2^1 [Eng. 1^{17}], as showing that the author knew that Jonah was to be saved by means of the fish. But the man who was swallowed by the fish did not know this. Hence, if Jonah himself wrote the book, he ascribed to himself by prolepsis a prayer of thanksgiving; while, if it was a later writer who put this prayer in the mouth of the swallowed Jonah, he ascribed to the hero of the narrative an action which in the situation of Jon 2^2 would be a psychological enigma.

Köhler, again (Theol. Rev. xvi. 139 ff.), thinks to discover in the Bk. of Jonah partly signs of an earlier age and partly traces of a later revision (but see G. A. Smith, ii. 510^2). Finally, W. Böhme (op. cit.) has started the theory that four strata can be distinguished within the Bk. of Jonah. But neither his formal arguments nor those based upon the contents can be regarded as valid. This hypothesis has already been examined by the present writer in his Einleitung, p. 378 f., and, as no one has since ventured to defend the assumption that the Bk. of Jonah was composed from different strata, it is unnecessary to go into the question in more detail.

3. Is there a necessary relation between the person and the Book of Jonah? The genetic connexion of Jonah ben-Amittai and the Bk. of Jonah appears to be based upon this much at least: We seem compelled to assume that a tradition existed, according to which Jonah ben-Amittai journeyed beyond his own country, that he was involved in a dangerous situation, and that he was ultimately delivered from this. Without such a tradition, it seems inexplicable why it is to the name of Jonah that the book is attached. Riehm, indeed (Introduction, ii. 167), says, 'The reason why the author selected the name of Jonah was that the only prophet that would serve his purpose was one whose name was on the one hand familiar to the people, but about whom on the other hand they knew nothing more.' This, however, is inconclusive. There were several prophets of that kind. Only in one event would the choice of the name Jonah ben-Amittai (Jon 1^1) be explicable without a historical tradition, namely, if Amittai were meant to be a nomen appellativum, i.e. if 'Jonah filius creduli' were so designated as a representative of believers κατ' ἐξοχήν, the so-called orthodox party. We call attention to this possibility, because in investigating so difficult a question all possibilities must be weighed. It is a fact at all events that, in the case of this ben-Amittai (Jon 1^1), Gath (ha)hepher is not specified as his birthplace (see further, below, 4 c, p. 747^b).

4. The formal character of the Book of Jonah.—Notwithstanding that the book may rest upon a tradition about Jonah, yet the essential character of the book consists in this, that it belongs to the category of symbolical narratives.

(a) There were such narratives. For instance, in Jer $25^{15ff.}$ it is said, 'Take this cup,' etc., and 'I took the cup at the hand of J" and made all the nations drink' (v.^{17}). Thus actions of the prophet are recorded as if they had been outwardly performed, and yet they cannot have really been so. Rather is the story merely a form of representation in which a Divine message is presented in a visible and therefore impressive fashion. This being manifestly the case with Jer $25^{15ff.}$, there is no need in $13^{4ff.}$ to take the name Pĕrath, which everywhere else (15 times) means the Euphrates (so also in Jer 51^{63}), to refer to a place which is not meant anywhere else in OT, nor so understood by LXX (ἐπὶ τὸν Εὐφράτην, κ.τ.λ.), etc., in Jer $13^{4ff.}$, and which stood in no relation to the captivity of Israel. For the same reason it is unnecessary to suppose that the prophet Ezekiel actually lay for 390 days upon his left and for 40 days upon his right side ($4^{5f.}$ etc.). Moreover, in 24^3 the words 'Set on the caldron and pour water into it,' etc., are called by Ezekiel a māshāl (cf. the Arab. miṯlun, similitudo, παραβολή; see König's art. 'Zur Deutung der symbolischen Handlungen des Propheten Hesekiel,' in the Neue kirchliche Zeitschrift, iii. 650 ff.). Similar to the narrative of Jer $25^{15ff.}$ is that of Hos $1^{4ff.}$ and $3^{1ff.}$ (so, inter alios, Hitzig, Simson, Keil, Wünsche, Reuss [Gesch. d. heil. Schriften ATs, 1890, § 223]; see, further, art. HOSEA in this Dictionary). For there it is expressly said, 'Go, take to thee mulierem fornicationis,' and, even if the latter phrase can mean only 'a wife of whoredoms' (Cheyne, Camb. Bible, ad loc.; G. A. Smith, i. 234, 'a wife of harlotry'), it is improperly assumed by some interpreters (e.g. Cheyne, Wellh., Nowack, G. A. Smith) that the woman had not beforehand 'an inclination to infidelity.' Such an interpretation runs counter to the text, according to which at the very outset Hosea was inspired with the idea of marrying a mulier fornicationis (i.e. idololatriæ eorumque vitiorum quæ cum illa cohærere solebant). Besides, an 'inclination to infidelity' was a thing by no means strange to the majority of the nation, with which J" as it were contracted a marriage in the time of Moses (cf. Ex 32^8). Again, if the com mission of J″ was literally carried out, Hosea must have married an adulteress (Hos 3[1]). But, with a view to the visible presentation of a truth, there is no need for such an outward performance of actions which would have been not only in themselves repugnant, but also unnatural for the prophet himself.

cucurbita, pepo' (Brockelmann, Lex. Syr. s.v.), Arab. يقطين (Koran, xxxvii. 146). As Jerome replaced cucurbita of the old Latin by hedera ('ivy'), there arose 'tumultus in plebe' (Augustinus, ad Hieron., Epistola 88).

(b) The above-cited symbolic tales may be imitated in the Book of Jonah (cf. especially the parallelism between Hos 1[2] 3[1] and Jon 1[1] 3[1], also Ezk 3[25] etc.). As Ezekiel was bound, etc., as the representative of the people (3[25] 4[8ff.] 5[1ff.] etc.), so in the Bk. of Jonah it was related how Jonah undertook a mission to the goyîm, etc. This might happen all the more readily that elsewhere the people of Israel and the prophetic order are identified with one another; the servant of J″, who, according to Is 41[8] etc., is the people of Israel, is a designation in 42[1] etc. of the servant of God who is to bring, i.e. proclaim to the goyîm sententiam et normam iudicii or lucem (Is 42[6] 49[6], cf. 43[10]), and so also the people of Israel is called the son of God (Ex 4[22], Hos 11[1]). This servant of God was in many ways also blind, and deaf (Is 42[19]), and dumb (56[10]); cf. Jon 1[3]. Further, the captivity of Israel is several times compared to a grave from which they are to come forth again alive; Ezk 37[11f.] 'These bones are the whole house of Israel' (rightly interpreted even by Hengstenberg, Christologie, ii. p. 588, not 'ii. p. 125' as Bertholet cites it, Kurzer Handcom. zu Hesekiel, 1897, p. 184); cf. Ezk 19[5] 33[10] 39[25]. Again, the captivity of Israel is compared to being devoured, 'Nebuchadnezzar hath swallowed me up like a sea-monster (tannîn), and he hath filled his belly' (Jer 51[34]; cf. v.[44] אֶת־בָּלְעוֹ, and in Is 27[1] the comparison of the secular power to a livyathan (crocodile) and a tannîn; see esp. G. A. Smith, 1898, pp. 523–526). Note also that Israel's deliverance from exile is compared to a new birth (Is 66[8]) and a dream (Ps 126[1]). Further, as pre-exilic Israel was wont to decline its missionary call (Jon 1[3]), so a part of exilic and post-exilic Israel discovered in this mission only a call to threaten the goyîm (cf. Jer 29[10], Ezk 18[29] 33[20], Ps 137[8], Is 34 f. 63[1ff.], Ob 10[ff.], Mal 1[4f.] 3[14], Jon 3[1ff.]). But in this same exilic and post-exilic period there are also voices to be heard calling for prayer to God on behalf of the goyîm (Jer 29[7]) and giving expression to the universalistic tendency of the theocracy (Zec 8[23], cf. Jon 3[10] 4[11]; see below, 7 a). The voice of such a preacher may be heard also in the Bk. of Jonah, whose author may have selected the individualistic presentation of his idea because this was least likely to miss making an impression. This, which for shortness may be called the symbolical interpretation of the Bk. of Jonah, is in the main upheld by Hardt, Kleinert (Commentary, 1874), Bloch (Studien zur Gesch. der Samml. d. altheb. Lit. 1876, p. 72 ff.), Cheyne (art. in Theol. Rev. 1877, p. 214 ff.), C. H. H. Wright (Biblical Essays, T. and T. Clark, 1886, p. 45 ff.),* Ed. König (Einleitung, 1893, p. 380), Kleinert (Commentary, 1893, p. 18 ff.), G. A. Smith (1898, p. 502 ff.).†

(c) The choice of the name Jonah as the subject of this symbolical narrative may also (see above, 3, p. 746[b]) have been favoured by the following circumstance. Jonah was an inhabitant of the kingdom of Samaria, and 'the name Jonah signifies a dove. Ephraim, the Northern kingdom, the kingdom of Israel as distinguished from that of Judah, is termed by Hosea, the only other prophetic writer who belonged to that kingdom, "a silly dove" (יוֹנָה Hos 7[11]); and when that prophet predicts the Return from Captivity, he speaks of Ephraim as returning as "a dove (יוֹנָה) out of the land of Assyria" (11[11]).' C. H. H. Wright, from whose Biblical Essays (1886, p. 45) these words are quoted, has not, however, recalled יוֹנַת אִלֶּם חֲרֹקִים (Ps 56[1]), which is most probably interpreted columba (silentii =) silens peregrinorum locorum = inter et propter peregrinos (on the silence of b after m see König, Syntax, § 330*m*). This expression in Ps 56[1] is already referred by the Talmud to בְּנֶשֶׁקְאָה רִישׁ'ראל וג', by the LXX to ὁ λαὸς ὁ ἀπὸ τῶν ἁγίων μεμακρυμμένης, and so also by the Arabic ('ummatun) and the Ethiopic (chézeb = populus). [Wellhausen (in Haupt's SBOT) changes אלם into אים, but this suggestion lacks probability]. A remarkable coincidence between Israelitish and foreign conceptions may be discovered in the analogy between the sojourn of the dove (יוֹנָה) in the fish's belly, and the descent of the 'dove' Semiramis from the fish-woman (cf. the ancient picture in Vigouroux, Die Bibel und die neueren Entdeckungen, iii. 355) Atargatis or Δερκετώ or Dercetis, who also had a temple at Ashkelon, cf. Ovid, Metam. iv. 45 ff.—

> 'Derceti, quam versa squamis velantibus artus
> Stagna Palæstini credunt motasse figura;
> An magis, ut sumptis illius filia pennis
> Extremos albis in turribus egerit annos.'

I venture also to call attention to the circumstance that the name 'Nineveh' (Herodot. i. 103, 106, 193, ii. 150, iii. 155, Νῖνος) is a compound with the root נין (cf. Assyr. nûnu, 'fish' [Del. Assyr. Handwörterb. 1896, p. 454*a*], Aram. נוּנָא, נִנְוֵא, e.g. Jon 2[1. 11]). For the oft-recurring ideographic way of writing the name of this city characterizes it as Ni-nu-a or Ni-na-a, 'fish-dwelling.' Hence in the first element of the name we should not be disposed to find 'נִי, Fett, Fettigkeit, Ueberfluss' (Frd. Delitzsch, art. 'Ninive' in PRE[2] x. 589). It may be not impossible that nun, which on account of the following nua might be differentiated, or through n (cf. Lehrgebäude, ii. 510 f. and נין) modified to nin, has been combined with nua or naa, and thus arose Ni-nu-a or Ni-na-a.

5. The Date of the Book.—This symbolical narrative was written, not in the 8th cent., but in the post-exilic period.

(a) Literary arguments. The story contains no positive trace that it attributed itself to Jonah. On the contrary, the book speaks of Jonah in the third person everywhere except in the oratio directa of 1[9] 2[3ff.] etc. Of course the circumstance that in any writing a name is used in the third person, is no sure sign that that writing proceeds from a different author (cf. König, Einleitung, p. 314[4] on Is 7). But, all the same, it is not without significance that Hosea, who opens with the third person, in the further course of his story passes to the use of the first person; cf. 'Then spake J″ to me' (Hos 3[1-3]) with 'Then came the word of J″ to Jonah' (Jon 3[1] etc.).

(b) Linguistic indications. The Book of Hosea shows what phase of development the Heb. language had reached in the Northern kingdom in the 8th cent. But the linguistic character of the Book of Jonah is quite different from this. In Hosea the occurrences of anokhî to anî are as 11 : 11, whereas in Jonah the ratio is 2 (1[9] 3[2]) : 5

* Wright cites (p. xxv) the following passages: 2 S 12[1ff.] (Nathan's parable) 14[6f.] (the parabolical narrative of the wise woman of Tekoa), 1 K 20[39-41] (the parabolical tale of the prisoner who was allowed to escape). These, however, do not furnish real parallels to the Bk. of Jonah, for, like all parables, they have an unknown, general subject. Nevertheless, they show that in Israel it was customary to introduce abstract truths in the form of individualistic tales. This disposition is also a factor in the origin of narratives about real visions, like those of 1 K 22[19-22] and of Amos and Ezekiel.

† Similar is the judgment of Augusti (Einleitung, 1827, § 225), Hitzig (in the Preface to his Exposition of the Book of Jonah in Kurzgef. exeg. Hdbch.), Bleek (Einleitung, 1878, § 229), Riehm (Einleitung, 1889, ii. § 81, 'Der Inhalt des Buches ist eine reine Dichtung'), Reuss (Gesch. d. h. Schr. ATs, 1890, § 407), et alii, who have not recognized the analogy of the symbolical narratives of the prophets.

($1^{9.\ 12}\ 2^{5.\ 10}\ 4^{11}$); cf. in Malachi 1 anokhî (אָנֹכִי הִנֵּה 3^{23}) to 8 anî. In Hosea we find only אֲשֶׁר (some eight times), whereas in Jonah שׁ is found (these passages are wanting in Mandelkern's Concordance, 1291 ff., but are given in König's Syntax, § 54) three times, $1^{7.\ 12}\ 4^{10}$, as in Ezr 8^{20}, 1 Ch $5^{20}\ 27^{27}$, Ec 1^{3} etc. But in Jonah there occurs לַ בַּאֲשֶׁר (1^{8}) * side by side with בְּשֶׁל ($1^{7.\ 12}$), while in Ec 8^{17} the secondary form בִּשְׁלֹ אֲשֶׁר already appears (König, Syntax, § 389*e*).——רִבּוֹ ('myriad') has not been recognized by tradition in Hos 8^{12}, probably, indeed, on the authority of MSS (see König, Lehrgeb. ii. 222^{1}); yet in Ezekiel (16^{7}) we have the genuinely Hebrew word רִבָּבָה, whereas רִבּוֹ occurs in Jon 4^{11}, Ps 68^{18}, Ezr $2^{64.\ 69}$, Neh $7^{66.\ 77f.}$, Dn 11^{12}, 1 Ch 29^{7}.——הִתְעַשֵּׁת=cogitare in Jon 1^{6}, cf. Dn 6^{4} and Hos 10^{13} Targ., אִתְעַצַּתוּן.——'J", the God of heaven' is found in Gn $24^{3.\ 7}$ (overlooked by G. A. Smith, ii. 497^{2}), Jon 1^{9}, Ezr 1^{2}, Neh 1^{5}, 2 Ch 36^{23}, and the simple 'God of heaven' in Ps 136^{26}, Ezr $5^{11f.\ 69f.}$ $7^{12.\ 21.\ 23}$, Neh $1^{4}\ 2^{4}$, Dn $2^{18f.\ 37.\ 44}$.——The notion of 'command' (verb) does not occur at all in Hosea, but it is difficult to imagine that he would have expressed it by קָוָה (Jon $2^{1}\ 4^{6-8}$, 1 Ch 9^{29}, Dn $1^{5.\ 10f.}$ [Aram.]. Ezr 7^{25} etc.), for he expresses 'command' (noun) by צִו (5^{11}) and not by כַּעַס (Jon 3^{7} [Aram.], Ezr 4^{19} etc., Dn 3^{10} etc.).—— Cf., further, שְׁתַק=consēdit, siluit (Jon $1^{11f.}$, Ps 107^{30}, Pr 26^{20}) common in Aramaic (Merx, Chrest. Targ. 294; Nöldeke, ZDMG, 1868, p. 499). Taking all this into account, it is an unnatural supposition that the author of the Book of Jonah should have exhibited all the above-mentioned linguistic features to a reader of the 8th cent. B.C. He must have belonged to a period when the written language of the Israelites had already come into close contact with the Aramaic.

(c) Material indications. Nineveh, at the time when the Book of Jonah was composed, was no longer in existence. This is clear from the statement (3^{3}), 'Now Nineveh was (הָיְתָה, cf. König, Syntax, § 362*m*) a great city for God' (i.e. according even to a superhuman standard). Hävernick (Einl. ii. 2, p. 359) declined to accept this interpretation, and appealed to Gn 1^{2} וְהָאָרֶץ הָיְתָה תֹהוּ וָבֹהוּ. But even this passage confirms the above as the correct explanation of Jon 3^{3}. For to the writer of Gn 1^{2} the earth was no longer a chaos. Further, the 'three days' journey' of 3^{3}, taken in connexion with 'and Jonah began to enter into the city one day's journey' (Syntax, § 330*e*), must refer to the distance through, not round, the city (Schrader, KAT^{2} ad loc.). A diameter of such proportions would, however, presuppose a circumference such as even the combination of four cities (Gn $10^{11f.}$, Keilinsch. Bibliot. ii. 117) could not have possessed. Then it would be strange that Jonah himself or a contemporary of his should not have given the name of the 'king of Nineveh' (3^{6}) in question. Besides this, Sayce (HCM 487, quoted by Driver, LOT^{6} 322) is of opinion that the title 'king of Nineveh' could never have been applied to him while the Assyrian empire was still in existence.

(d) Arguments drawn from the history of the formation of the OT Canon. (α) In the so-called prophetæ priores of the Heb. OT there is no word of Jonah's journey to Nineveh (2 K 14^{25}). Nor in the latter passage is there any reference to other words of Jonah, such as is intended to the Book of Micah in 1 K 22^{28} וְאִמַּר שִׁמְעוּ עַמִּים כֻּלָּם (cf. König, Einleitung, 330 f.).——(β) The order of the prophetæ posteriores, and especially of the Minor Prophets, was only in its general principles a fixed one. This order was not meant to be chronological (König, Einleit. 301). The collectors of the Canon did not intend the books which have no chronological superscription to be considered as belonging to the period mentioned in the nearest preceding book which bears a date. For, on the one hand, in the case of the Book of Amos, the chronological superscription of the Book of Hosea is repeated, and, on the other hand, it cannot be meant that Nahum and Habakkuk prophesied at the date assigned to the preceding book (Mic 1^{1}). Therefore it may be assumed that the Book of Jonah was inserted after the Book of Obadiah on the ground, not of its chronology, but of its contents. Might it not have been supposed that the words צִיר בַּגּוֹיִם שָׁלֹחַ ('nuntius ad gentes missus est') found a clear illustration in the story of Jonah? Moreover, in the centuries after the Exile, it was the fate of the Edomites that formed the subject of the liveliest discussion (cf. Mal 1^{4}, 1 Es $4^{45.\ 50}$, Sir $50^{25f.}$). Hence it is probable that the question why the threats pronounced against Edom had remained unfulfilled was intended to be answered in the Book of Jonah.——(γ) Again, the opening words וַיְהִי דְבַר יהוה וְגוֹ appear to the present writer to contain an indirect allusion (Syntax, § 368*a*) to the Book of Obadiah, and to have an adversative force (ib. § 369*f*). This introduction to the Book of Jonah appears, then, to have originated when the book attained its present position in the Heb. and Gr. OT. On the other hand, probability is lacking to the theory of Budde (ZATW, 1892, p. 41) that the Book of Jonah was originally an extract from the 'Midrash to the Book of Kings' (2 Ch 24^{27}). For, in the first place, the story of Jon $1^{1ff.}$ would not have fitted well on to 2 K $14^{25f.}$. In the second place, this story, whose incidents are enacted wholly outside the political history and the land of Israel, would not have been at all suitable in the סֵפֶר הַמְּלָכִים קִוְּרֵשׁ. Not so clear is the justice of the remark of Nowack (1897, on Jon 1^{1}) that the Chronicles do not breathe the spirit which the supposed Midrash would have exhibited.——(δ) The Book of the Twelve Minor Prophets was included among the 'prophets' or 'prophecies' which already lay before Ben-Sirach (Prologue ll. 6 and 14), for 49^{10} reads καὶ τῶν δώδεκα προφητῶν τὰ ὀστᾶ ἀναθάλοι ἐκ τοῦ τόπου αὐτῶν, or, in the recently published Heb. text of the Sirach fragments, גַּם עָנָיִם עָשָׂר הַנְּבִיאִים וְגוֹ. Against the view of Jacob (ZATW, 1887, p. 280) that 49^{10} is an interpolation, Nöldeke (ZATW, 1888, p. 156), Buhl (Kanon u. Text, 1891, p. 11), and Wellhausen (Skizzen, v. 211) have declared themselves. Not without importance is also the question whether the πάππος of Ben-Sirach (to whom we owe the Greek translation of the Proverbs of Sirach) and the Prologue to the book flourished as early as c. B.C. 300. The present writer claims to have proved this in his Einleitung (1893, p. 488), and his conclusions are now accepted also by J. Halévy (Étude sur la partie du texte hébreu de l'Ecclésiastique récemment découverte, 1897) and Baethgen (Hand-commentar zu den Psalmen^{2}, 1897, p. xxvii). This circumstance forbids one to carry down the composition of the Book of Jonah beyond the year B.C. 300, as G. A. Smith (ii. 498) is inclined to do.

In the above sections (3–5) we have sought, from the oldest indications, to characterize the Book of Jonah positively. What follows will give the negative supplement to this.

6. The principal other interpretations of the Book of Jonah.

* It is improbable that the words בַּאֲשֶׁר לְמִי הָרָעָה הַזֹּאת לָנוּ were originally a 'marginal gloss' (so Kautzsch, AT; Nowack, Kl. Proph., ad loc.; G. A. Smith, ii. 513). For if בְּשֶׁלְמִי (v.7) were to be explained, the marginal gloss would have been simply בַּאֲשֶׁר לְמִי, the whole sentence would not have been written on the margin. Moreover, the sentence is not absolutely superfluous in v.8. Rather is the question there quite intelligible psychologically as an indirect introduction to the following questions. It is equally intelligible why the question propter quem hæc calamitas nobis acciderit, being an apparent repetition, should have been omitted in cod. B of the LXX.

(a) The symbolical character of such a narrative, although in all probability this is the character of the Book of Jonah, might readily be missed. For it is psychologically explicable how histories which are related as concrete occurrences should preferably be understood by many as an account of real events. As a matter of fact, this has happened in not a few instances. For instance, has not the story of the dead bones (Ezk 37^{1-14}) been very frequently understood (cf. Hitzig, Bib. Theol. 1880, p. 109) as if we had to do with literal dead bodies? And that notwithstanding the explanation of the bones in v.[11] 'These bones are the whole house of Israel.' How often, again, are the stories of the hiding of the girdle (Jer 13^{3-7}) and of the marrying of an adulterous wife (Hos $3^{1ff.}$) understood as real history! Accordingly, the fact that this may have happened also in the case of the Book of Jonah is no proof of the non-symbolical character of the latter.

(b) Certainly, those who collected the Canon or those who arranged the Δωδεκαπρόφητον may still have rightly regarded the Book of Jonah as a symbolical narrative, for they placed it in a class of writings containing other examples of symbolical character and prophetic tendency. But at a later period the book was frequently treated as if it contained non-symbolical history. At the same time, in examining the evidence on this point, one has to exercise great caution. The authors in question may simply have expressed themselves with a natural brevity, as if they considered the history of Jonah a real affair. This principle may be applied to every instance where some element in the Book of Jonah is merely cited. This may be the case where Jesus Christ (Mt 12^{40}) illustrated his burial by the statement that it would continue only three days, like the sojourn of Jonah in the belly of the sea-monster. But the following saying (v.[41]), that the men of Nineveh would, on the day of judgment, put to shame the contemporaries of Jesus, is most naturally interpreted on the presupposition that the story of Jonah was a non-symbolical one. Still, the question remains whether this presupposition was merely that of the hearers of Jesus (see further, below, 6 d δ, p. 751[b]). The history of Jonah is, however, conceived as non-symbolical when into the mouth of Tobit * are put the words, πέπεισμαι ὅσα ἐλάλησεν Ἰωνᾶς ὁ προφήτης περὶ Νινευή (To 14^{4}), and πάντως ἔσται ἃ ἐλάλησεν ὁ προφήτης Ἰωνᾶς (v.[8]). Philo, too, regarded the story of Jonah as non-symbolical, for he took pains to explain the marvel of the fish (Orat. de Jona, § 16, 21). The same interpretation is followed in 3 Mac 6^{8} (cf. König, Einleit. p. 483) and in Jos. Ant. IX. x. 2. According to the latter, Ἰωνᾶς εἰς Ταρσὸν ἔπλει τῆς Κιλικίας (!), and he reproduces the whole contents of the Book of Jonah, with the exception of the displeasure of Jonah at the sparing of Nineveh. So also in the Mishna, Ta'anît ii. 1,† Bab. Ta'anît 15*a*, Nedarîm 38*a*, where נִזְקְקָה שֶׁכְּרָהּ (Jon 1^{3}) is incorrectly understood as if Jonah had paid the price of the whole ship (של ספינה כולה), and had thus, in contrast to Amos, been a wealthy man. (For other passages see B. Wolf, op. cit. p. 6). Jewish tradition, however, contains also the information that the history contained in the Book of Jonah was enacted in the reign of Osnappar (Ezr 4^{10} [Assurbanipal?]), and, seeing that the date of Jeroboam II. and that of Osnappar were different, the rabbinical tradition spoke of two Jonahs, of whom the first was of the tribe of Zebulun and the second of the tribe of Asher (see, further, Fürst, Der Kanon d. AT nach d. Ueberlief. in Talm. und Midrasch, p. 33 f.). Again, in Numeri Rabbah, sect. 18, the Book of Jonah is called 'a book by itself and counted separately.' This, however, was simply 'because it is exclusively occupied with the heathen, and Israel is not mentioned in it. But that its canonicity was doubted in earlier times there is no evidence' (Wildeboer-Bacon, Origin of Canon of OT, 1895, 70–72). The non-symbolical or externo-historical interpretation of the story of Jonah is the predominating one also among the Christians of the earlier centuries (cf., inter alios, Justin Martyr, Dialog. c. Tryph. cap. 107).

(c) But gradually questions were everywhere raised about the authenticity of the ancient tradition, and in connexion with this began also the examination of the externo-historical interpretation of the Book of Jonah. The natural clearness of Luther's way of thinking is seen in his judgment upon at least the prayer of Jon 2^{3-10} 'So wohl ist ihm nicht gewesen, dass er hätte mögen ein solches feines Liedlein dichten.' Continued examination of the book did not lead all critics (see above, 4 b) to a symbolical interpretation of the story. Some reached, by means of almost ludicrous * attempts, the third of the leading explanations of the Book of Jonah. This attributes a legendary character to the story, and may therefore itself be called, for shortness, the legendary interpretation of the Book of Jonah. Its chief representatives are the following.

Already (in his Einleit.[4] iv. § 576) Eichhorn discovered in the book the presentation of a 'Volksage.' He pointed to the fact that in $2^{1ff.}$, as compared with ch. 1, the narrative is 'quite interrupted, short, incomplete, and unsatisfying.' Hence he held that 'under such circumstances it is no arbitrary hypothesis to assume merely that Jonah, mounted upon the sea-monster, was driven ashore by the storm, and to regard the three days' sojourn in the fish's belly as a popular clothing of this.' 'If the story of Jonah's escape upon the sea-monster . . . was handed on from mouth to mouth . . . for several centuries, how readily might it assume its present form! This is also in harmony with the spirit of the ancient world, as we may gather from the similar clothing given to similar occurrences in Greek history, e.g. to the history of Hercules' (see the Greek quotations in Bochart, Hierozoicon, ii. 5, 12). The legendary interpretation is accepted, further, by Rosenmüller (Scholia in Vet. Test., ad Jonam); Knobel (Der Prophetismus d. Heb. ii. 370ff.); de Wette (Einleit. § 291); Winer (RL, s.v. 'Jona'); Vatke (Einleit., 1886, § 217, 'eine Legende'); Nowack (Klein. Proph., 1897, p. 175, 'Wir haben eine Prophetenlegende vor uns'). Essentially similar is the judgment of von Orelli (1896, p. 93 f.), who says, for instance, 'The marvel of the fish was certainly received from tradition,' but 'the story in its present form was written at the close of the Chaldæan or the opening of the Persian period.' But if the book simply contained a 'Prophetenlegende,' this would in the tradition have involuntarily and unconsciously taken its rise, and then the evident didactic tendency of the book would not be adequately explained. Hence Nowack asserts that 'the author used freedom in moulding the traditional material as suited his aim.' But in that case the contents of the book might be called simply 'the free use of an ancient prophetic legend' (Kautzsch, Abriss d. Gesch. d. alttest. Schriftthums, 1897, p. 120). It is more likely, however, that the book has no ancient history for basis.

* This book was written before the renovation of Herod's temple (König, Einleitung, p. 478).

† לֹא נֶאֱמַר בְּאַנְשֵׁי נִינְוֵה וירא אֱלֹהִים אֶת שַׂקָּם וְאֶת תַּעֲנִיתָם אֶלָּא וירא הָאֱלֹהִים אֶת מַעֲשֵׂיהֶם וגו׳ (Jon 3^{10}).

* Not Abravanel (cf. Wolf, op. cit. p. 6, note 4, against Hävernick, Einleit. ii. 2, p. 327), but H. Ad. Grimm (Der Proph. Jona aufs neue übersetzt, etc.), supposed that Jonah dreamed that he was swallowed by a great fish. Clericus, again, threw out the suggestion (Bibliot. anc. et mod., tome xx. 2, p. 459) that Jonah 'was picked up by a ship whose figurehead was a whale'; while Anton (in Paulus' Neues Repertorium, Bd. iii. p. 36 ff.) supposed that Jonah clung to the belly of the fish. See, for more fancies of the same kind, Eichhorn, Einleit.[4] Bd. iv. § 575.

Many upholders of this legendary interpretation, in dealing with particular features of the Book of Jonah, have appealed to legends and myths of antiquity. In the first place, they have reminded us that it was in the neighbourhood of Joppa that Andromeda, too, was reduced to straits by a sea-monster (Jos. BJ III. ix. 3, ἔνθα τῶν Ἀνδρομέδας δεσμῶν ἔτι δεικνύμενοι τύποι πιστοῦνται τὴν ἀρχαιότητα τοῦ μύθου; cf. on Andromeda also W. R. Smith, RS 159, and Duhm, Kurzer Hdcom., 1897, on Job 7^{12}). But this tale agrees with the story of Jonah in the single point of the locality, Joppa (יָפוֹ, Ἰόππη), and the latter was the natural one to fix upon in the case of a man fleeing from Palestine to the Mediterranean. Still less can the 'legend' of Jonah be derived from the story of the Trojan princess Hesione, who was delivered by Hercules from a sea-monster (Il. xx. 145 ff., xxi. 441 ff.). For the features of this tale, which in some measure resemble the history of Jonah, were all produced at a much later date, and hence it is far easier to see here a modification of the story of Jonah than to suppose that the author of the latter borrowed from that foreign tale (cf. Hitzig's third 'Vorbemerkung' to his Commentar über Jona). Finally, F. C. Baur, above all, has connected (Ilgen's Zeitschrift, 1837, p. 102 ff.) the story of Jonah with the Babylono-Assyrian myth of Oannes. On this see further, below, p. 751, note *.

(d) But even the externo-historical interpretation of the Book of Jonah has found defenders down to the most recent times. Of these we may mention first, Frz. Kaulen, representing the traditionalist Roman Catholic Church (Einleit. in d. heil. Schrift, 1892, § 414), then C. F. Keil (Einleit., 1873, § 89), and J. Kennedy (On the Book of Jonah, 1895). This standpoint may perhaps be best characterized in some such way as the following:—

(a) Features which point to the didactic character of the story of Jonah are not sufficiently taken into account even by the most recent representatives of the externo-historical interpretation. To begin with, the circumstance is significant that the book closes with the presentation of a general truth (against B. Wolf, op. cit. p. 28). Cf., further, what has been said above (p. 746[a]) on the interpolation of the prayer (Jon 2^{3-10}). Again, the repentance of the city of Nineveh is depicted with such grotesque features that the intention of the writer to indicate the didactic tendency of the narrative appears sufficiently clear. For, not to speak of the king sitting in ashes (3^{6b}), the very beasts are also mentioned as partaking in the fast and the mourning ($3^{7f.}$). This command that 'the cattle, the oxen, and the sheep should eat nothing and should drink no water,' and that 'man and beast' (see above, p. 745[b]) should put on sackcloth, is not to be co-ordinated with the custom whereby at the death of Masistios the Persians cut off their own hair and that of the horses and beasts of burden (Herodot. ix. 24; Plutarch, Aristides, cap. 14, ἔκειραν ἐπὶ τῷ Μασιστίῳ καὶ ἵππους καὶ ἡμιόνους), or the custom mentioned by Chrysostom of harnessing horses with black trappings to a hearse. Further, Kleinert (ad loc.) refers to the mourning which, according to the myth (cf. Virgil, Eclog. v. 19 ff.), was held over the death of Daphnis. But by his reference Kleinert himself unconsciously concedes that the representation in Jon $3^{7f.}$ can be compared only with an *un*real occurrence. Moreover, the complaint of Jonah about the gourd (4^{8b}) is put into such hyperbolical language ('for me death is better than life'), that one is compelled to assume that the writer did not mean the complaint to be understood as a serious one. Again, the narrator puts in the mouth of the prophet the statement that he does 'right' (הֵיטֵב) to be angry over the loss of the gourd, 'even unto death.' But is this not to depict him as an ill-natured child who sulks over the loss of a toy? Certainly, it is not without ground that Ant. Baumgarten, in his L'humour dans l'ancien Testament (1896, p. 27^{1}), has adduced 'Jonas, irrité jusqu'à la mort d'avoir vu périr le ricin,' as fit to be included in the category he is dealing with.

(β) Elements in the story, which upon the symbolical interpretation explain themselves, are wrongly weakened by the adherents of the externo-historical interpretation. For instance, the expression 'three days and three nights' (Jon 2^{1}) indicates by its twofold mention of the number 'three' that the writer has in view a small 'numerus rotundus' (cf. Ex 20^{5}, 2 K $11^{5f.}$, Ezk 5^{2}, Zec $13^{8f.}$ etc.; specially 'three days,' Gn $40^{10.12}$ 42^{17}, Ex 10^{22} 19^{11}, Jos 1^{11} $2^{16.22}$, 2 S 24^{13}, 1 K 12^{5}, 2 K 20^{5}, Hos 6^{2}, Jon 2^{1}, Est 4^{16}, Mt 16^{21}; 'three months' or 'years,' Ex 2^{2}, Lv 19^{23}, Is 16^{14} 20^{3}, Dn 1^{5} etc.; cf. Röckerath, Bib. Chronol., 1865, 11 ff., also Rud. Hirzel, 'Rundzahlen' in Abhand. d. sächs. Gessell. d. Wissensch., Leipzig, 1885). The author would not have specified in detail 'three days and three nights,' if he had meant merely one day along with part of the preceding and the following day. Hence his meaning cannot have been 'a period of 37 hours' (Kaulen, Einleit. § 414). Such an interpretation of the text (Jon 2^{1}) can by no means be built upon 1 S $30^{12f.}$, Est 4^{16} 5^{1} (against Kleinert and v. Orelli, ad loc.), which is opposed also by the expression 'seven days and seven nights' of Job 2^{13}.——The representatives of the externo-historical interpretation appeal, further, to narratives according to which the gigantic shark carcharias has been known to swallow a man or even a horse whole—nay, to have vomited up a tunny fish and the body of a sailor undecomposed (Kaulen, Einleit. § 414). In an occurrence of this kind, which is most correctly related by Eichhorn (Einleit.[4] iv. 340 f.), a '"Seehund," after taking a sailor in its jaws, immediately of its own accord threw him out again, and he was picked up alive and only slightly injured.' Here we miss the 'three days and three nights.' Or we read in the Neue Luth. Kirchenzeitung (1895, p. 303 f.), that the whale-hunter, James Bartley, was in February 1891 swallowed by a whale, and that on the following day, when the animal was killed, he was taken alive out of its stomach. 'He lay in a swoon in the belly of the whale. The sailors had much difficulty in restoring him to consciousness. It was not till after three months' nursing that James Bartley recovered his reason.' But, granting the truth of this story, the Jonah of the OT was longer in the belly of the fish than James Bartley, and, so far from there being any word of illness or subsequent nursing, he is said even in the fish's belly to have indited a song of thanksgiving. This point is overlooked also by B. Wolf, op. cit.——Here also, finally, comes in the following point. The text (Jon 4^{10}) says that the gourd 'tanquam filius noctis factus est et tanquam periit (so also Pesh.). The words בֶּן־לַיְלָה הָיָה necessarily imply that the gourd was the product of a single night (Targ. בְּרֵין חַוְיָא ; LXX ἡ ὑπὸ νύκτα ἐγενήθη). But Kaulen (Einleit. § 414) denies this sense to the text. He says, 'The plant simply grew out of the earth overnight, and must otherwise have followed the ordinary course of development.' But in that case the ḳîḳayôn would not have a full claim to the title 'filius noctis.' Further, the verb הָיָה, as the opposite of אָבַד, must have the sense of 'factus est.' Again, the meaning of v.[6] is that the kîḳayôn straightway in the early morning furnished a shade for Jonah; and in any case, according to v.[7], its existence was only for a single day. For at dawn of the following day (לִמָּחֳרָת) it was smitten to death, and, when the sun rose, Jonah was without his shade.

(γ) But even the legendary interpretation of the Book of Jonah has not been refuted by the representatives of the externo-historical interpretation, for they have been unable to explain away the traces of the late date at which the story of Jonah was committed to writing. Can they give an adequate explanation, e.g., of why the name of the Assyrian king is not mentioned, or why he is entitled 'king of Nineveh'? Can they prove that Jonah himself could have penned the statement, 'Now Nineveh was,' etc., or the specification of the extent of Nineveh (3[3])? On the last-mentioned point Kaulen (Einleit, § 414) says, 'The greatness of the city is stated as of three days' journey, either as meaning that a length of three days' journey is attributed to it, or that three days are considered necessary to visit it thoroughly (!). Both meanings are perfectly correct, according as the application of the name "Nineveh" is taken.' But the expression used in 3[3b] can, according to v.[4], refer only to the diameter of the city (see above, p. 748[a]). But the diameter even of the fourfold city (Gn 10[11]) was not equal to a three days' journey. 'The length of the road from Kouyunjik to Nimroud is only some 20 English miles. Hence the prophet after one day's journey would have been exactly at the other end of the city' (Frd. Delitzsch, art. 'Ninive' in PRE[2] x. 598).——Instead of taking into account these indications in the text, B. Wolf (op. cit.) lays emphasis upon the fact that, according to the Arab.-Syr. History of the Prophet Jonah, God announced pardon to the Ninevites by dispersing a darkness which hung over the city. Wolf (p. 32) at once infers that this must refer to the eclipse of the sun, which, according to the Assyrian Eponym list, took place in the year B.C. 763. But that later note about the dispelling of a darkness was an addition that lay ready to hand, whereby a visible token might be given of the appeasing of the Divine wrath. In any case, there is nothing about this in the biblical Book of Jonah. Hence it is an arbitrary assertion of Wolf (p. 31) that 'in the tradition of the neighbourhood the record of the eclipse was combined with the story of Jonah.' The author of the Arab.-Syr. History of Jonah did not mean darkness caused by an eclipse of the sun. Wolf might have recognized this from the fact that Ephraem Syrus says (op. cit. p. 38) that 'the darkness overhung Nineveh during the whole period of penitential mourning.'——In 2 K 8[7ff.], which is cited by B. Wolf (op. cit. p. 13), it is recorded that Elisha was in Damascus. But it is not said that he went there as a missionary, and, besides, 2 K 8[7] furnishes no positive basis for the reality of the details of the Book of Jonah.——Hommel (AHT p. 145) says, 'One sees from names like "Father is Aï (or Ja)" that the Israelitish tradition that Jonah preached Jahweh to the Ninevites is not so absurd as according to our modern critics it appears.' But, instead of abusing the critics, it would have been well if he had read the text accurately. The Book of Jonah says not a word about Jonah's preaching 'Jahweh' to the inhabitants of Nineveh. Rather is the name 'Jahweh' avoided, and it is said, 'They believed God' (אֱלֹהִים, 3[5a], so also [8a. 9a. 10a]).

(δ) The NT passages involved have also frequently an incorrect meaning and an unnecessary scope attributed to them by the upholders of the externo-historical interpretation. First, it may be assumed that Jesus, in regard to the literary history of the OT, attached Himself to the notions of His contemporaries. There are certain proofs that He did so in regard to other notions that prevailed then. Not only did He speak of the rising of the sun (Mt 13[6], Mk 16[2], cf. Ja 1[11]), not only did He call the grain of mustard seed the smallest of all seeds (Mt 13[31] ‖ Mk 4[31], Lk 13[19]), because this was then the popular opinion (Lightfoot, Horæ ad Mt 13[31]), but in other matters too He had regard to the inferior knowledge or positive ignorance of His contemporaries. In particular, he paid the temple tax, ἵνα μὴ σκανδαλίζωμεν αὐτούς (Mt 17[27]). That is to say, although as υἱὸς τοῦ βασιλέως (v.[25f.]) He was free from the obligation, He paid the tax because the priests would not have recognized the right reason of His refusal to pay, and He would thus have given them an occasion of stumbling. For this reason He preferred to make a concession to their opinions. Now, as Christ, in astronomical, botanical, and other matters, placed Himself on the level of His contemporaries, so might He do in regard to the literary conceptions of His age. For the fulfilment of His religious mission, He required to oppose only such opinions as directly concerned the notion of the true kingdom of God—μετάνοια, πίστις, and δικαιοσύνη τοῦ θεοῦ.——Secondly, it is the great εὐσεβείας μυστήριον (1 Ti 3[16]) of the Person of Christ that He was as much true man as true God. He advanced in wisdom (Lk 2[40. 52]), He learned (ἔμαθεν, He 5[8]), He did not know the date of His παρουσία (Mt 24[36], Mk 13[32]); cf. Ph 2[7f.]. These data of the NT must be taken into account, even by a believing Christian. But J. Kennedy (op. cit. p. 57 f.) mentions none of these actual testimonies of the NT.——Thirdly, we have to observe that the Evangelists differ in their report of what Jesus said about the Book of Jonah. In Mt 12[39-41] it is recorded that the Νινευῖται μετενόησαν εἰς τὸ κήρυγμα Ἰωνᾶ. It is not said in Mt that Jonah was a σημεῖον for the Ninevites, a statement which occurs only in Lk 11[30], ἐγένετο Ἰωνᾶς τοῖς Νινευίταις σημεῖον. Matthew's account, however, must be the original one, for Luke also adds afterwards (v.[32]) that the Ninevites repented in consequence of the preaching of Jonah. Matthew's report, further, corresponds exactly to the narrative in the Book of Jonah, in which all that is said is that Jonah was to preach (קְרָא עָלֶיהָ, 1[1] 3[1]), and that by his cry, 'Yet forty days,' etc. (3[4]), he awakened the faith of the Ninevites. But in the Book of Jonah there is not a word to the effect that Jonah exercised any influence upon the inhabitants of Nineveh by the strangeness of his garb or the wonderful experiences he had passed through. All this, again, is silently passed over by J. Kennedy (pp. 27, 50 f.), and yet he assumes as beyond question that Jonah did not come to Nineveh as 'an unknown stranger,' but that 'his entombment in the body of a great fish, and his deliverance from that prison, was known to the people.' If that was so, the narrator of the history of Jonah has omitted a most essential point.* This is not the only instance in which

* The same judgment must be passed on the learned essay of H. Clay Trumbull, Jonah in Nineveh (Philadelphia, 1892). He starts rightly with the question, 'Where in the OT or the NT except in the Book of Jonah is there such a seemingly unnecessary miracle as the saving of a man's life by having him swallowed in a fish, instead, say, of having the vessel that carried him driven back by contrary winds to the place of its starting?' (p. 6). But 'it is well to ask if there is anything in the modern disclosures of Assyrian life and history that would seem to render the miraculous element in the story of Jonah more reasonable and the marvellous effect of his preaching at Nineveh more explicable and natural' (p. 7). Trumbull reminds us that 'prominent among the divinities of ancient Assyria was Dagan, a creature part man part fish' (p. 7), and 'according to Berosus, the very beginning of civilization in Chaldæa was under the direction of a personage, part man and part fish, who came up out of the sea' (p. 9). Trumbull now suggests that Jonah appeared to the Ninevites as one of the 'Avatars or incarnations' of Dagan (p. 10). But this is ab initio improbable, for

J. Kennedy makes alterations on the contents of the Book of Jonah. According to the latter, God said to Jonah, 'Preach the preaching that I bid thee' (3^{1b}), and this preaching was, 'Yet forty days and Nineveh is overthrown' (v.^{4b}). But Kennedy says, 'The preaching of Jonah was not a mere wild monotone, "Yet forty days and Nineveh shall be destroyed." He could find a fresh text in every street and thoroughfare.'

7. The idea of the book.—Whatever view one takes of the formal character and origin of the book, the ideas embodied in it are the same.

(a) The main idea is the following. Israel has been intrusted by God with the mission to call the goyîm also to moral amendment, and is not to look askance or be jealous if the goyîm manifest repentance and if God takes back the threatenings which He had pronounced against them. With this principal idea the book opens, whether one regards 'Jonah the son of Amittai' as the representative of his nation or as an individual, and the same idea is reflected also in the whole course of the narrative and in the closing words of the book. The story of Jonah thus gives expression to those lofty thoughts which are uttered also in Is 40–66. For the 'Servant of J"' (Is 42^{1}) must be the same who in 41^{8} is expressly called יִשְׂרָאֵל עַבְדִּי, and of this Servant of J" it is said, 'I have made him for a light of the goyîm' ($42^{4.\ 6f.}$ 49^{1-6} etc., cf. also Zec 8^{23}, Sir 24^{30} ἐκφανῶ αὐτὰ [the contents of the νόμος] ἕως εἰς μακράν, see above, p. 747[a]). The Book of Jonah was meant, then, to proclaim the universality of the Divine plan of salvation, and to serve as a protest against the particularist tendencies which now and then led many members of the people of Israel to strive to narrow the boundaries of the Divine kingdom of grace. The book is thus a brilliant example of the diametrical opposite of the spirit which condemned the foreign wives (Mal 2^{11}, Ezr $9^{1ff.}$ $10^{1ff.}$, Neh $13^{23ff.}$, cf. Est 9^{13}), and exhibits a lovely dawn preparing the way for the clear day of the gospel (Jn 3^{16}, Gal 3^{28} etc.).—Similar to the above is the idea that has before now been extracted by many from the Book of Jonah. Even Ephraem Syrus discovered the primary purpose of the book to be to bring back the Ninevites to God (cf. B. Wolf, p. 36). Eichhorn (Einleit. iv. 351) expressed the opinion that 'the book is a proof that God has shown his concern also for the heathen by sending them direct messengers.' Essentially the same is the view of Alb. Rebattu (1875, p. 6), 'Docet, Deum non solum Judæis sed omnibus gentibus, dummodo gratia divina dignæ sint, benevolentiam suam præbere'; of Bleek (1878, § 229); of Reuss (Geschichte, 1890, § 408); of Renan (Hist. iii. 512, 'école universaliste'); of Kaulen (Einleit., 1892, § 412); of v. Orelli (1896); of Strack (1898). With perfect correctness also G. A. Smith (ii. 501) remarks, 'The purpose is to illustrate the mission of prophecy to the Gentiles, God's care for them, and their susceptibility to His word.'

Jonah came to Nineveh not as 'a personage part man and part fish.' But the main point is the following:—If God had saved Jonah by means of a fish, in order that the inhabitants of Nineveh might take him for an incarnation of the Dagan, then God would have strengthened the Ninevites in their faith in the fish-god Dagan. This would have been an unjustifiable 'concession' (p. 16). Nor is it the case that God caused the star (Mt 2^{2}) to shine forth on account of the Magi. Besides, Trumbull's attempt (p. 14, note 1) to connect Jonah and Oannes is scarcely possible. In the event of such a connexion, we should rather have expected the form Ἰωνᾶ to be retained. Why should the change have been made from Jonah to יוֹחָנָן (Johanan, Ἰωαννάν)? On the contrary, a more probable derivation of the name Oannes is that proposed by Lenormant (Oannes = Ea-ḫan) or by Tiele (= Ea-vannu). Finally, in his account of the place-name Nebi Yunas (p. 17), Trumbull appears to have turned his attention too little to the Jewish diaspora and the Syrian Christians (see, on Nahum and Habakkuk, König, Einleitung, pp. 333, 352).

(b) Others have asserted that the theme of the book is a magnifying of the compassion of God. Already we hear Philo say (Orat. de Jona, § 2), 'Sicut in arte medicinæ peritissimi salvare ægrotos promittentes, igne et aqua regunt eriguntque, similiter sapientissimus ille, solus salvator, deperditionem indicens ac ruinam, misericordiam construit salutis.' Cf. also § 53, 'Sicut pristina vita duram merebat prædicationem, similiter pœnitentia eorum ex adverso benignitatem.' Upon this view, the Book of Jonah would be an illustration of Jer 18^{7-10}, where the conditional character of predictions is explained. This was the view accepted also by the Midrash Yalkut on Jonah, which closed with the words, באותה שעה נפל על פניו ואמר הנהג עולמך במדת הרחמים רכתיב לה' אלק' הרחמים והסליחות, i.e. 'At that moment Jonah fell upon his face, and spoke [to God], Guide thy world by the norm of mercy, as it is written,' etc. [Dn 9^{9}]. The Yalkut was followed by the above-named Arab.-Syr. History of the Prophet Jonah (Wolf, p. 27). Also D. Kimchi in his Commentary reckons it as a third aim of the book, ללמד שהאל יתברך חומל על בעלי תשובה מאיזה עם שיהיו ומוחל להם וכל שכן בשהם רבים, i.e. 'to teach that God should be praised for sparing the penitents to whatever nation those belong, and more especially, if they are many in number.' Essentially the same is the thought of the book, as given by Keil (Einleit. § 89). Hitzig (Comment. Vorbemerkungen, No. 4) laid special emphasis on the point that the book was intended to vindicate God in the matter of unfulfilled predictions. In like manner, Kautzsch (Abriss, 1897, p. 120) thinks that the narrative desired to give an illustration of the Divine question (Ezk 18^{23} 33^{11}), 'Have I pleasure in the death of the sinner?' So also Nowack (Handkomm., 1897, p. 174). The authors just named thus fail to see that in the Book of Jonah what is pre-eminently depicted is the universality of the Divine plan of salvation, and the duty of Israel to be the missionary to the goyîm.

(c) It is not at all certain that, in addition to the principal idea, the author of the Book of Jonah desired to impress other sentiments on his readers. But Ephraem Syrus (see above, 7 a) found a second aim of the book in this, that it gave to the Israelites an example of the penitent disposition of other nations. This, in fact, was the primary tendency of the book, according to D. Kimchi (נכתבה להיות כוסר לישראל שהרי עם נכרי שאינם מישראל היה קרוב לתשובה וג' ועוד להודיע הפלא הגדול שעשה האל, i.e. 'The book was intended to serve for instruction to Israel, showing as it did how a foreign nation, not belonging to Israel, was ready for conversion, and how at the very first reprimand of the prophet it turned completely from its wickedness, whereas Israel, although reprimanded early and late by the prophets, did not turn from its evil ways'). Kimchi further attributed to the book the purpose 'to make known the great miracle which God wrought upon the prophet.' According to Eichhorn (Einleit. iv. 351), the story was intended also to teach that 'Jahweh rules in all places and over all elements.' Riehm (Einleit. ii. 166) says, 'The author wishes to teach that no prophet can evade the Divine commission.' He is followed by Volck (art. 'Jona' in PRE[2] vii. 85). Again, Vatke (Einleit., 1886, p. 688) found pre-eminent in the book the thought also that 'the honour of the prophet is not impugned if a threatening is not fulfilled, nor inspiration called in question although many predictions are not realized.' Kaulen (Einleit. § 412) goes the length of maintaining that Jon 1^{12} already teaches what was afterwards expressed by the high priest Caiaphas (Jn 11^{50}), συμφέρει ἵνα εἷς ἄνθρωπος ἀποθάνῃ ὑπὲρ τοῦ λαοῦ. Finally, M. Vernes (Précis d' histoire juive, 1889, p. 810) contents himself with the words, 'Jonas est un conte moral plutôt qu'une prophétie.'

iv. OTHER OCCURRENCES OF THE NAME JONAH. —The name Ἰωνᾶς is found in OT Apocrypha not only in To 14[4. 8] and 3 Mac 6[8] (see above, p. 749[a]), but also in 1 Es 9[1.] (B) [23] (see JONAS, Nos. 2. 3). In NT it occurs in Mt 12[39-41] 16[4], Lk 11[29f. 32]; Βαριωνᾶ in Mt 16[17], Ἰωνᾶ in Jn 1[43] 21[15], but in these last two passages the reading Ἰωάν(ν)ου has strong evidence in its favour. See JOHN (FATHER OF SIMON PETER).

JONAM ('Ιωνάμ WH, Ἰωνάν TR, AV Jonan).—An ancestor of Jesus, Lk 3[30].

JONAS.—1. (B Ἰωνᾶς, A Ἰωανάν, AV Joanan), 1 Es 9[1] the son of Eliasib (B Νάσειβος), to whose chamber (παστοφόριον) Esdras betook himself to mourn over the foreign marriages contracted by the people. In Ezr 10[6] called JEHOHANAN; cf. Neh 12[23] JOHANAN. 2. (A Ἰωνᾶς, B Ἰωανᾶς) 1 Es 9[23]. The name corresponds to ELIEZER in the parallel list of Ezr 10[25]. A link between the two forms is given by the Vulg. Elionas; אליעני was perhaps read for אליעוד, as was done in 1 Es 9[32] (cf. Ezr 10[31]), the former name occurring in the previous verse of Ezr. Elionas was then corrupted to Jonas. 3. (Jonas) 2 Es 1[39]. The prophet Jonah.

JONATHAN (יְהוֹנָתָן, יוֹנָתָן 'J" hath given'; comp. Theodore) is a proper name met with from the time of the Judges downwards.

1. A Levite mentioned in a supplement to the Book of Judges (chs. 17. 18),* an adventurer through whom the idolatrous worship in Dan was established, and from whom the Danite priesthood was descended. The narrative in which he figures has a threefold interest, inasmuch as it throws light on the gradual conquest of Canaan, illustrates the low state of religion in the post-Mosaic age, and involves the sanctuary of Dan in discredit by tracing its institution to fraud, violence, and personal ambition.

This degenerate priest is described as the son of Gershom, the son of Manasseh (18[30]). The Heb. text, however, indicates that the n in Manasseh is an interpolation (מְנַשֶּׁה), and that the ancestor's name, as remembered in the Jewish tradition, should be read Moses. From Bethlehem of Judah the youth went forth to push his way in the world (17[9]), and first hired himself as house priest to Micah the Ephraimite for a wage of ten pieces of silver with food and raiment (v.[10])—and this though Micah's household cult had the double taint that he made use in worship of a graven and a molten image (v.[4]), and that these images had been procured from stolen money (v.[2]). (Ewald, with support from LXX, thinks the money was originally got by trading). While living with Micah he was accosted by five Danite spies, who had been sent out by their straitened tribe to explore the northern states; and after consulting the oracle he promised the blessing of God upon their enterprise (18[1-6]). The spies discovered at Laish a large and rich land and a people secure (v.[10]), and on hearing their report an armed band of 600 Danites marched northward to the easy conquest (v.[11]). Arrived at Mount Ephraim, they halted at Micah's dwelling, and, while the troop held the priest in converse, the spies entered the 'house of God' and carried off the costly furniture of the idolatrous worship (v.[17]). It was an easy matter to induce the priest to acquiesce in the robbery, and to accompany them on their expedition. 'Go with us,' they said, 'and be to us a father and a priest: is it better for thee to be priest unto the house of one man, or to be priest unto a tribe and family in Israel'? (v.[19]). Micah pursued the predatory band, but his following was too weak to engage them (v.[26]). The expedition was successful; and the priestly line founded in Dan by J. continued 'until the captivity of the land' (v.[30]). The preservation of the story is doubtless due to the fact that it lent itself to the purposes of the prophets of the Assyr. period in their opposition to the cult practised in Dan and Bethel.

2. The eldest son of Saul (1 S 14[49]), who shared in the perils and enterprises of his father's stormy reign, and was involved in his ruin. The narratives* in which he figures successively celebrate his martial exploits and his romantic friendship with David, and they portray a character which combines in a unique degree the heroism of the Hebrew patriot with the spirit of Christian virtue.

As warrior-prince J. takes rank among the bravest captains of Israel's iron age. Like Saul, he was fleet of foot, and of great physical strength (2 S 1[23]), and, as became a Benjamite, a noted archer (v.[22]). In the familiar speech of the people, he may have been known for his grace and agility as the gazelle. (So Ewald, rendering v.[19], 'the gazelle is slain'). He comes upon the scene as the hero of a campaign against the Philistines, in which the bearing of Saul is little more than a foil to the bold initiative, the rapid movement, and the practical sense of his son. The Philistines, it would seem, had been in effective occupation of the Israelitish territory, and the force collected by Saul had not yet made any considerable impression, when a blow struck by J. (1 S 13[3]),† to whom

* The great value and antiquity of the substance of these two chapters is generally admitted by critics. Budde's attempt to disentangle two independent narratives, of which the chief is J, is approved by Cornill, disapproved by Wellh. and Kuenen, and questioned by Driver (LOT[6] p. 168).

* Of the two main strata in the Books of Samuel distinguished by modern critics (Budde, Driver, Cornill, etc.), the older contributes the account of J.'s military career (1 S 13. 14. 31[2]), while the later develops the theme of the friendship (1 S 18[1-4] 19[1-7] 23[16-18]). The distinctness of the two contributions would be complete if Stade is right in assigning ch. 20 (against Budde) to the later source. The Davidic elegy (2 S 1) commemorates equally the prowess and friendship of Jonathan.

† Probably the slaying of a tyrannical officer. The uncer-

Saul had intr.sted a third of his following (1 S 13[2]), loudly sounded the note of rebellion. The Philistines answered the challenge by invading the highlands with an overwhelming force. The Hebrews, on the other hand, did not respond to Saul's expectation of a general rising; some fled beyond Jordan, some hid themselves in caves, some were pressed into the enemy's service, and he was left to front the invasion with a band which had now dwindled from 3000 to 600 men (1 S 13[15]). The two armies came face to face at the passage of Michmash, and took up their positions on opposite sides of a deep ravine *—the Philistines at Michmash on the north, Saul at Gibeah on the south side. Outnumbered though Saul was, his position at the top of the steep pass was impregnable; and the Philistines, after planting an outpost on their edge of the ravine, set about harrying the surrounding district (1 S 13[17]). The dead-lock was ended by Jonathan. Accompanied by his armour-bearer (1 S 14[1]), he hailed the Philistine garrison, and, having satisfied himself that their reply was a sign that the Omnipotent God was on his side (v.[12]),† he scaled the opposing rocky rampart and fell upon the astonished garrison. As the Philistines fled he struck down twenty men, and where they lay in a row it seemed like a furrow drawn in an acre of land (v.[14], perhaps, originally, 'he went through them like a ploughshare'; on other possible interpretations see art. FURROW). The panic spread to the main camp, which, weakened as it was by the absence of the marauding bands, was unable to resist what seemed an attack in force. Seeing the enemy in confusion, and discovering in it the hand of J., Saul with his men also crossed the ravine, and soon the whole force of the Philistines was in headlong flight. That the Hebrews might reap the full fruits of the victory, Saul made proclamation that none should eat until the evening on pain of death (v.[24]). Ignorant of the prohibition, J., as he passed in hot chase through a wooded district, refreshed himself by eating wild honey (v.[27]); and, on learning of his father's vow, he warmly blamed the short-sighted order that had taken the vigour out of the pursuit (v.[30]). In the evening the oracle revealed that a penalty had been incurred (v.[37]), and the divination of the lot brought the transgression home to J. (v.[42]). Saul declared his life forfeited, but the people intervened, and by a ransom (Ewald, by a vicarious sacrifice) saved their hero (v.[45]).

If the military exploits of J. chiefly impressed his contemporaries, it is his friendship with David which has most strongly appealed to the imagination of the after-world. In truth, it gives an unrivalled example of the essential notes of friendship —namely, warmth of affection, disinterestedness, helpfulness, confidence, and constancy. The love of J. for David is represented as of sudden growth —its birthday the day when they first met after the slaying of Goliath (1 S 18[1-4]). The intensity of his love is described in the language of the strongest of passions: he loved David as his own soul (v.[1]), passing the love of women (2 S 1[26]); and in the parting scene it finds expression in an outburst of true Oriental vehemence: they kissed one another, and wept one with another until David exceeded (1 S 20[41]). Of its spirit, disinterestedness is the merest negative description: not only had J. nothing personally to gain from David, but he was reminded by Saul that he had everything to lose (1 S 20[31]). The friendly services of J. were his first intercession with Saul on David's behalf (1 S 19[1-7]), and his later interposition, as it appeared at the risk of his own life, by which he discovered his father's settled purpose, and conveyed to David a warning to flee from the court (1 S 20). The mutual confidences are frank and full. And, to supply the crowning grace of constancy, there is recorded a last stolen interview in a wood in the wilderness of Ziph, where J., seeking out the friend from whom he had been so long parted by his father's wrath, strengthened his hand in God (1 S 23[16]).* The relations of J. with Saul reveal essentially the same strong and affectionate character. Of their close association in all weighty business, and of their strong mutual affection, there are various direct and indirect testimonies (1 S 19[2] 20[2]). Against this may be set Saul's later suspicion that J.'s friendship with David was of the nature of a conspiracy (22[8])—the design being to set him aside in favour, either of David, or, as is much more likely, of J. himself. But while it is quite credible that David, in view of the danger to the realm of a half-insane king, may have spoken of the desirability of the father giving way to the son (Stade, Gesch. des Volkes Israel, i. 242), it is not probable that such a design was matured, or even communicated to Jonathan.

J. fell with Saul on Mount Gilboa in battle against the Philistines (1 S 31[2]). At this time the fourth brother (1 Ch 9[39]) was 40 years old (2 S 2[10]), and on this basis of calculation J. may have been between 40 and 50 when he died. If 1 S 13[1-3] fixes the date of the battle of Michmash, and if Saul reigned nearly 40 years thereafter (Ac 13[21]), J. cannot have been less than 60 at death, i.e. 30 years older than David (2 S 5[4]). These data are, however, precarious, and it is safer to follow the general impression of the history, and regard him as a contemporary of David. His dishonoured corpse was rescued from Beth-shan by the men of Jabesh-Gilead (1 S 31[11]). He left a son 5 years old (see MEPHIBOSHETH).

3. A nephew of David who slew a giant of Gath (2 S 21[21]), probably the same as the 'uncle' (?) spoken of as a wise scribe (1 Ch 27[32]). 4. A son of Abiathar the priest, who as a courier rendered service to David during Absalom's rebellion (2 S 15[27-36] 17[17. 20]), and brought to Adonijah the report of Solomon's accession (1 K 1[42]). 5. A scribe in whose house Jeremiah was imprisoned (Jer 37[15. 20] 38[26]). 6. One of the line of the high priests in the 5th cent. (Neh 12[11])—also called Johanan (12[-2]), referred to in Neh as introducing a change in the keeping of the genealogical records, and in Josephus (Ant. XI. vii. 1) as bringing profanation on the temple by the murder of his brother Jesus within its precincts. 7. One of David's heroes (2 S 23[32], 1 Ch 11[34]). 8. One of David's treasurers (1 Ch 27[25]) (AV Jehonathan). 9. A Levite (Neh 12[35]). 10. The son of Kareah, a Judahite captain after tainty arises from the ambiguity of נְצִיב, an ambiguity which may be reproduced in English by saying that he destroyed a post, i.e. either a garrison, or a pillar erected in token of the Philistine supremacy (Gn 19[26]), or an official of some kind. The last interpretation is supported by 1 K 4[19].

* The situation may be made clearer by an extract from Robinson, Bibl. Researches, ii. 115. 'We left Jeba' (Gibeah) for Mŭkhmâs. The descent into the valley was longer and steeper than any of the preceding. The path led down obliquely, and we reached the bottom in half an hour. . . . In the valley (Wady es-Suweinit), just at the left of where we crossed, are two hills of a conical, or rather a spherical, form, having steep rocky sides with small Wadys running up behind each, so as almost to isolate them. These would seem to be the two rocks mentioned in connexion with J.'s adventure. . . . Crossing the valley obliquely, and ascending with difficulty for 15 minutes we came upon the slope on which Mŭkhmâs stands.'

† The sign agreed on was that he should attack only if the Philistines invited him to come up. This, it has been pointed out, was not arbitrary, as their refusing to come down indicated want of courage. There is some force in Stade's objection to this feature, that to hail the garrison was to put them on their guard, and thus endanger the chance of success.

* The passages bearing on the friendship have been somewhat roughly handled by modern critics. Ch. 20, it is alleged, is impossible after ch. 19[1-7], the story of the parting contains contradictory elements (the signal and the interview), the last interview is unhistorical, etc. In any case, David himself vouches for the main features.

the fall of Jerus. (Jer 40[8]). 11. Father of Ebed (Ezr 8[6]). 12. One of those who opposed (RV) or assisted (AV) Ezra in the matter of the foreign marriages (Ezr 10[15]). 13. A priest (Neh 12[14]). 14. Jonathan the Maccabee. See MACCABEES.

JONATH ELEM REHOKIM.—See PSALMS.

JOPPA (יָפוֹ, i.e. Yāphō,* in Ezr 3[7] יָפוֹא; Ἰόππη, Ιὸπη; Arabic Yâfa; modern name Jaffa).—The town is built on a whale-back rise of rocky ground, made conspicuous by its being the only eminence of the kind along the level sandy beach which extends in a straight line from Cæsarea to Gaza. To vessels approaching from the north or south, the crest of Jaffa is the first visible object on the coast-line. On nearer approach the appearance of the town is exceedingly picturesque, the closely clustered houses, with their numerous arches and walls of blue, pink, white, and yellow ochre, rising above each other, and all sparkling in the brilliant sunlight. In the low-lying ground, part of which must have once been a marsh, immediately behind the town there are extensive irrigated gardens of orange, apricot, and peach trees, the level mass of deep green foliage being relieved by the tall stems of graceful palm trees. Beyond this, the plain of Sharon, with its rich fields of wheat and barley, stretches away to where the outline of the Judæan hills forms the background of the picture.

The whole eventful history of Joppa is explained by its connexion with the influential city of Jerusalem. Geographically, Joppa was the seaport of Jerusalem; but the distance was too great, and the line of communication too often broken, for the maintenance of established ownership. Politically, it was frequently severed altogether from Judæa; and from the religious point of view the produce of Joppa in corn, wine, and oil was considered to be contaminated by its contact with heathenism, and ceremonially unfit for use at the sacred festivals.

Joppa has owed its existence and importance to the fact that it is the only place on the coast that can offer shelter to shipping between Egypt and Mount Carmel. The harbour is formed by a low ledge of rock running out at a sharp angle in a N.W. direction from the southern end of the town. The space is very limited and the water shallow, but in moderate weather Oriental craft, usually about the size of a modern herring boat, can lie at anchor and discharge cargo near the shore. The harbour is entered either by a narrow opening in the ledge or by rounding the point; but when the sea is disturbed by the prevalent N.W. wind the gap can only be rushed on the crest of a high wave, and to round the point brings a vessel broadside-on close to the edge of the surf.

Mythology points to the rock on the southern side of the gap as the spot where Andromeda was chained when Perseus slew the sea monster and delivered the maiden. Josephus, Pliny, Strabo, Jerome, and some of the travellers in the time of the Crusades, speak of the chains still remaining visible in the rock, the earlier writers also testifying to the size of the carcase that lay or was reported to have lain there.†

* Both AV and RV have everywhere Joppa, except in Jos 19[46] where AV has Japho.

† The incident at Joppa finds a parallel at Beyrout, where for a similar purpose and on similar rocks a maiden is said to have been exposed as a sacrifice, and to have been rescued by St. George. This gives its name to the bay, and forms the beautiful design on the English sovereign. While the body of the slain dragon has been lost sight of, faith in the living beast of the sea has remained undisturbed by the lapse of centuries. A few years ago a Belgian steamer reaching Beyrout at midnight blew her siren whistle to inform the agents of her arrival. The unprecedented shriek startled the town out of sleep, and next day in the bazaars the chief topic of conversation was the visit of the sea monster during the previous night.

The antiquity of Joppa is attested by its mention as Ye-pu on the Karnak lists among the towns of Palestine conquered by Thothmes III. It is also referred to in the journey of the Egyptian mohar (see Sayce, HCM 347). It appears as Ja-ap-pu-u in Sennacherib's annal-inscription (Schrader, KAT[2] 172 [COT[2] i. 160 f.]). In the distribution of the land under Joshua it belonged to the inheritance of the tribe of Dan (Jos 19[46]).

It is referred to in the Bible as the place where the timber from Lebanon was beached for transport to Jerusalem (2 Ch 2[16], Ezr 3[7]). Here Jonah embarked when seeking in vain to escape from the commandment to go to Nineveh (Jon 1[3]). In Joppa, Dorcas laboured among the poor and was raised from the dead (Ac 9[36-42]). Here St. Peter, on the roof of Simon's house, was taught that expansion of the meaning of salvation which has ever since divided the synagogue and the Christian Church (Ac 10[1-23]). Joppa was a constant sufferer during the famous wars of the Jews with Syria, Egypt, and Rome.

In the days of Judas Maccabæus its Jewish inhabitants were invited into boats by the people of the town to join in holiday enjoyment, and about 200 of them were drowned. This treachery was speedily avenged by Judas, who attacked the harbour by night and burned the boats (2 Mac 12[3-7]). About B.C. 148 Joppa was captured by Jonathan, brother of Judas (1 Mac 10[75. 76]), and about six years after it was again captured by Simon, the third of the heroic brothers, who put a garrison into it to ensure its fidelity (1 Mac 12[33. 34]). Shortly afterwards the same leader had once more to occupy it by a force under his officer Jonathan, son of Absalom (1 Mac 13[11]). Pompey, after capturing Jerusalem in the time of Aristobulus and Hyrcanus (B.C. 63), restored Joppa and joined it to Syria (Jos. Ant. XIV. iv. 4). Sixteen years later it was given back to the Jews, being, however, exempted from the tax to Jerusalem, except what was charged on its agricultural produce and the exports to other towns on the coast (Jos. Ant. XIV. x. 6).

One of the principal disasters inflicted on the town was when Cestius Gallus took it and destroyed its Jewish inhabitants to the number of 8400 (Jos. BJ II. xviii. 10). During the Jewish wars with the Romans Joppa became a place of retreat for the lawless and those who had been made desperate by failure and suffering and the loss of relatives and property. These turned to the sea as a means of livelihood, and by their piratical outrages endangered all commerce on the Syrian coast. The town was attacked and captured (A.D. 68) by Vespasian on his way to Jerusalem. The inhabitants who had taken refuge in their ships and boats were driven on the rocks by a northerly gale, and about 4200 of them were drowned or slain by the sword (Jos. BJ III. ix. 2, 3).

During the time of Christ, Joppa was one of the eleven toparchies of which Jerusalem was the chief.

Since the time of the Romans similar vicissitudes have marked the history of this unfortunate seaport. It has often changed hands, and each change of ownership has been a time of destruction and renewal. It has belonged to Saracens, Crusaders, and the Sultans of Egypt; it was conquered and severely treated by Napoleon, and has finally found rest under the Turkish Government.

The modern town of Jaffa has about 8000 inhabitants—Moslems, Christians, and Jews. Its main street leading from the harbour is steep, narrow, crooked, dark, and dirty, with lanes still darker and dirtier leading off among the huddle of houses on each side. As might be expected in such a seaport, many types and nationalities meet and mingle together. Europeans, Egyptians, Soudanese, Northern Syrians, fellahîn of Palestine, and Bedawîn of the desert, are seen lounging about or noisily pushing their way among the baggage animals that throng the narrow street. The thoroughfare from the harbour meets a broad sandy road skirting the landward side of the town and running parallel to the coast-line. It was fitting that a town with such a history of changes should be the starting-point of the first railway in Palestine, by which it is now in daily communication with Jerusalem.

JOPPA, SEA OF (אֶלֵּים יָפוֹא, πρὸς θάλασσαν Ἰόππης, ad mare Joppe, Ezr 3⁷), the portion of the Mediter. near the harbour of Joppa (cf. Ryssel, ad loc.). But RV 'to the sea, unto Joppa,' cf 2 Ch 2¹⁶ AV.

JORAH (יוֹרָה, cf. יוֹרֶה 'autumn rain,' Οὐρά,' Ιωρά). —The name of a family which returned from exile under Zerubbabel, Ezr 2¹⁸. In Neh 7²⁴ the name appears as Hariph, which is probably the true form. 1 Es 5¹⁶ reads Arsiphurith (Ἀρσειφουρεὶθ B, Ἀρσιφρουρεὶθ A), which is probably due to the conflation of a corrupt reading and the correction; read Ἀρειφουρεὶθ = חרפורת. JORDAN, יַרְדֵּן (Yardēn), in prose always with the definite article הַיַּרְדֵּן (as an appellative), so called from descending (יָרַד). The two exceptions to the use of the article are Ps 42⁶ and Job 40²³. In the latter instance this arises from the name being used as a representation of any violent rush of water. (See Davidson and Dillm. ad loc.). The present Arabic name of the Jordan is esh-Sheri'ah, 'the watering-place,' to which the epithet el-Kebîr, 'the great,' is sometimes annexed to distinguish it from esh-Sheri'at el-Mandhûr or Jarmûk, the ancient Hieromax, which joins it from the east about two hours below the Lake of Tiberias. The common name of the great valley through which it thus flows, below the Lake of Tiberias, is el-Ghôr, signifying a depressed tract or plain, usually between two mountains; and the same name continues to be applied to the valley for the whole length of the Dead Sea, and for some distance beyond; it thus corresponds to the Aulon of Eusebius and Jerome (Onomasticon; Robinson, *BRP*² i. p. 537) and 'the Arabah' of OT. The form el-Urdun was used among early Arabic writers (Abulfeda, Tab. Syr.; Edrisi, ed. Jaubert; Schulten's 'Index in Vit. Saladin,' F. Jordanes; Reland, Palest.) before the time of the Crusades.

It is scarcely ever called the 'river' or 'brook' or any other name than its own, 'the Jordan' (Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, 284). Josephus always calls it the Jordan, except once when he calls it 'the river,' without any distinctive name, when describing the borders of Issachar (Ant. v. i. 22).

The derivation of the name Jordan from Jor and Dan has been traced back as far as Jerome (Onomasticon, s.v. 'Dan'), who says (Comm. in Mt 16¹³): 'Jordanes oritur ad radices Libani; et habet duos fontes, unum nomine Jor, et alterum Dan; qui simul mixti Jordanis nomen efficiunt.' This was copied by Arculf, 8; Willibald, 16; Saewulf, 47; Will. of Tyre, 13, 18; Brocardus, c. 3, p. 172; Marinus Sanutus on his map; Andrichomius, p. 109; John of Würzburg, 20. It is also current among the Christians of the country to the present day. There is no basis, however, for this etymology, for the name Jordan is merely the Greek form (Ἰορδάνης) for the Hebrew Yardēn, which has no relation to Dan. The Arabs near Tell el-Ḳâdi (Dan) call it there ed-Dan or el-Leddân (*BRP*² iii. 392). Jerome (Onomast. s.v. 'Dan') considers Jor equivalent to river; but G. Williams points out that יְאֹר is the Hebrew * form of 'river,' while the proper name (Jordan) is יַרְדֵּן, and never יַאְרֵן, as the proposed etymology would require.

Up to the present century most pilgrims and travellers had visited the valley of the Jordan only at Jericho, hence we had no account of its features in the upper portions. Antoninus Martyr at the close of the 6th cent., and St. Willibald in the 8th, passed down through the whole length of the valley from Tiberias to Jericho; and in 1100 king Baldwin I. accompanied a train of pilgrims from Jericho to Tiberias (Fulcher Carnot); but there is nothing more than a mere notice of these journeys. During the present century, Seetzen, Burckhardt, Irby and Mangles, Banks and Buckingham, Thomson, Porter, Molyneux, Lynch, J. Macgregor, Guérin, Liévin, Robinson, have visited and described portions of the Jordan; and in later years the officers of the Palestine Exploration Fund have thoroughly examined, surveyed, and described it (PEFSt, 1869–97, SWP).

GEOLOGICAL FEATURES.—The Jordan flows from north to south in a portion of a deep fissure or crevasse on the surface of the earth, nearly parallel to the eastern coast of the Mediterranean Sea, extending from the foot of the Taurus Mountains, past Antioch, up the valley of the Orontes, through Cœle-Syria, between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, down the valley of the Jordan and Salt Sea, and through the Wâdy el-Arab to the Gulf of 'Aḳabah, from lat. 38° N. to 30° N. This fissure appears as the most remarkable on the face of the earth, owing to its being cut off from the sea, in so dry a climate that the excessive evaporation keeps the surface of water in the Salt Sea about 1300 ft. below the level of the Mediterranean and Red Sea. It was suggested, probably first by Burckhardt, that the river Jordan originally flowed down the whole course of the depression from the Lebanon to the Gulf of 'Aḳabah; but this view has been rejected with reason by Lartet and subsequently by Hull, and the following is the theory of the formation of the valley, deduced from the observations and memoirs of the above learned geologists.

Professor Hull, in his examination of the Wâdy el-Arâbah over a distance of 120 miles from north to south, found that it had been hollowed out along the line of a main 'fault' ranging from the eastern shore of the Salt Sea to that of the Gulf of 'Akabah. He found numerous parallel and branch 'faults' along the Arabah Valley, but there was one main 'fault' running along the base of the Edomite mountains, to which the others are of secondary importance. This is called by him the 'Great Jordan Valley Fault.' Lartet, Tristram, and Wilson had already shown that in the Jordan Valley and Ghôr there was the evidence of a large

* יְאֹר is really an Egyptian loan-word (see Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v.), and is the special designation in OT of the Nile.

'fault' corresponding to the line of this remarkable depression, and Hull considers that the features he observed in the Arâbah Valley are continuous with those of the Jordan. He considers that in this part of the world the Miocene period was one of elevation, disturbance, and denudation of strata, not of accumulation, the Miocene period not being represented by any strata throughout the district traversed by his expedition. To this epoch he refers the emergence of the whole of the Palestine, and the greater part of the Sinaitic, area from the sea, in which the cretaceo-nummulitic limestone formations were deposited. To this epoch also he considers the 'faulting' and flexuring of the strata to be chiefly referable, and notably the formation of the great Jordanic line of 'fault,' with its branches and accompanying flexures in the strata, which are very remarkable along the western side of the Ghôr. These phenomena were accompanied and followed by extensive denudation, and the production of many of the principal features of the region referred to.

From that epoch down to the present day these physical features appear to have changed in a comparatively small degree, as the area referred to slowly rose above from the waters of the Miocene and Pliocene oceans. For a limited time there would have necessarily been a connexion between the waters of this great gulf or valley, 200 miles in length and 10 in breadth, and the southern 'Aḳabah sea through the valley of 'Aḳabah; but, from the time that the outer waters were dissevered from those of the Jordan-Arabah lake by the uprise of the land, there is no evidence that there was any subsequent connexion by means of a stream flowing down from the north into the Gulf of 'Aḳabah. All indications appear to be against this. It would appear that, at a period coming down probably to the prehistoric, a chain of fresh-water lakes existed among the tortuous valleys and hollows of the Sinaitic peninsula. There are still fresh-water shells in the wadis Feiran and es-Sheikh, and these belong to a period when the contiguous oceans were about 200 ft. higher over the land than at present, indicating that during this later period there has been a further rise of about 200 ft. The evidence of this rise was observed also in the Gulf of 'Aḳabah. From the epoch during the Miocene period when the inland sea was dissevered from the waters of the adjoining oceans, its level would entirely depend upon the amount of rain water from rivers which poured into it, balanced against the amount abstracted by evaporation. Lartet has computed that at the present day at least 6,500,000 tons of water are evaporated daily from the Salt Sea.

The occurrence of terraces of marl, gravel, and silt, through which the ravines of existing streams have been cut at an elevation of about 100 ft. above the present level of the Mediterranean, show that the level of the inland sea at one time stood for a period without change about 1400 ft. higher than it does at present; but this can have had no connexion with the chain of lakes about Sinai, which extended to prehistoric times, as this inland sea was dissevered to the south during a remote Miocene epoch; and though there may have been a connexion for some time by way of the Mediterranean through the plain of Esdraelon, yet, as the land continued to rise, the inland sea would eventually have become entirely isolated. The lowering of the water in the inland sea from evaporation is supposed to have taken place at the commencement of the Pliocene period, so that it reached somewhere about the present level long before the prehistoric times, and there cannot have been any change in the course and character of the Jordan during historic or prehistoric times.

At the present time the level of the Salt Sea is about 1300 ft. below the Mediterranean Sea, the lower part of the floor of the Salt Sea again 1300 ft. below its surface level, and the watershed of Wâdy Arâbah 2000 ft. above the SALT SEA, and 700 ft. above the Mediterranean Sea. The plain of Esdraelon at the watershed is about 250 ft. above the level of the Mediterranean, so that on this side there may have been communication with the ocean to a much later period than on the south side; but this point does not seem to have been raised hitherto. Hull brings forward abundant evidence of a Pluvial period having existed through the Pliocene and post-Pliocene (or Glacial) period down to recent times. As it was known from the observations of Hooker, Tristram, and others that perennial snow and glaciers existed in the Lebanon during the Glacial epoch, it is assumed by Hull that the adjoining districts to the south of the Lebanon must have had at that epoch a climate approaching to that of the British Isles at the present day, and that in a region of which many parts were over 2000 ft. above the sea-line there must have been abundant rainfall. Even when the snows and glaciers of the Lebanon had disappeared, the effects of the colder climate which was passing away must have remained for some time, the vegetation must have been more luxuriant down to within the epoch of human habitation. It is considered that the outburst of volcanic phenomena commenced to occur when the waters of the inland sea stretched as far north as the Lake Hûleh, that is to say, at the time they began to be lowered by evaporation, shortly after they were dissevered from the ocean, and that the period of the volcanoes of the Jaulân and Haurân ranged through the Pliocene and post-Pliocene to the recent, when concurrently with the drying up of the waters of the inland sea the volcanic action became extinct.

It would seem, then, that during the Glacial epoch Palestine and Syria presented an aspect very different from the present. The Lebanon throughout the year was snow-clad on its higher region, while glaciers descended into some of its valleys. The region of the Haurân was the scene of some extensive volcanoes; while the district around, and the Jordan Valley itself, was invaded by floods of lava. A great inland sea, occupying the Jordan Valley, stretched from Lake Hûleh on the north to a southern margin near the base of Samrat Feddân in the Wâdy el-Arâbah of the present day, while numerous arms and bays stretched into the glens and valleys of Palestine and Moab on either side. Under such climatic circumstances, we may feel assured, a luxuriant vegetation decked with verdure the hills and vales to an extent far beyond that of the present; and amongst the trees, as Hooker has shown, the cedar may have spread far and wide. As will be shown hereafter, Tristram supposes that the inland sea, now represented by the Jordan Valley, was one of a chain of fresh-water lakes stretching down to Southern Africa. This is a very interesting subject in relation to the practical question as to the amount of salts now deposited in the Salt Sea, and to what extent an increased rainfall would be required to render the Salt Sea habitable by fish, as contemplated in the prophecies of Ezekiel, Zechariah, Joel, and other prophets.

PHYSICAL FEATURES.—The Jordan Valley may be divided into three portions—(a) The Upper Jordan, running through Cœle-Syria to Lake Hûleh. (b) From L. Hûleh to L. Tiberias. (c) From L. Tiberias to the Salt Sea.

(a) The Upper Jordan, although always accounted to have its sources at Bâniâs and Dan, has its most distant prominent source in the great fountain below Hâsbeiya (1700 ft.), running down into the Wady et-Teim, and becoming the turbid torrent of Nahr Hasbâny, receiving on its way numberless springs from the Anti-Lebanon and Hermon, and particularly the stream from Sheb'a, the great fountain of Suraiyit, at the foot of Hermon and el-Ghujar. After rushing through a deep gorge it has worn for itself in the basalt, it penetrates the marsh of Hûleh for about 5 miles, where it is joined by the united streams of the Nahr Leddân from Tell el-Ḳâḍi (which has been joined by the Wâdy Laweizâny) and the Nahr Bâniâs. Of these main branches of the Jordan, the Nahr Hasbâny is the longest by 40 miles, the Nahr Leddân is the largest, and the Nahr Bâniâs is the most beautiful. A considerable stream comes down from the plain of Ijon, the contributions of the Nahr Bareighit, west of 'Abel. Several large fountains also burst out from the hills to the west side of the marsh, and send their streams to the river or lake (Land and Book, ii. 320). At Ghujar the old road from Damascus through Bâniâs to the west crosses the Hasbâny by a bridge of three arches nearly west of Tell el-Ḳâḍi. From the foot of the mound at Tell el-Ḳâḍi (Dan or Laish) gushes out one of the largest fountains in Palestine (505 ft.), called the Nahr Leddân, which, joining the Nahr Bâniâs and the Hasbâny, forms the Jordan. Josephus speaks of the fountains of the lesser Jordan at Dan (Ant. I. x. 1; V. iii. 1; VIII. viii. 4). Speaking of Semechonitis (Hûleh), he says: 'Its marshes reach as far as the place Daphne, which, in other respects, is a delicious place, and hath such fountains as supply water to what is called "Little Jordan," under the temple of the golden calf, when it is sent into Great Jordan' (BJ IV. i. 1), thus clearly identifying Daphne with Dan.

The name Bâniâs is the Arab pronunciation of the ancient name Paneas, a city (Cæsarea Philippi) named from the grotto Panium, which seems to have been consecrated to the god Pan, though there is no historical mention of this deity (BRP[2] iii. 406) at this spot. Josephus states (Ant. XV. x. 3; BJ I. xxi. 3) that Herod erected to Augustus Cæsar a beautiful temple of white marble near the place called Panium. 'This is a fine cave in a mountain, under which there is a great cavity in the earth; and the cave is abrupt and very deep, and full of still water. On it hangs a vast mountain, and under the cavern rise the springs of the Jordan.' There are Greek inscriptions in the votive niches here, one of which contains the designation of the person who consecrated it as the 'priest of Pan,' implying a temple of that god. The spot is now called by the people Mughârat Bâniâs, or Mughârat er-Râs en-Neba. From beneath and through the mass of rocks and stones which fill up and hide the entrance of the cavern, gushes forth the Nahr Bâniâs, a full and rushing river, twice as large as the stream from the fountain near Hâsbeiya. The water is of the purest and finest quality, limpid, bright, and sparkling. Gathering to itself the other streams just below the village, and yet itself distributing its waters over the terrace and portions of the western plain for irrigation, it rushes onward in a ravine of its own, with swift course, towards the south-west, down to the lower plain, and so to the lower Hûleh. It is the most beautiful of all the streams of the Jordan (BRP[2] iii. 407). It may be assumed that this great fountain of the Jordan had some historical associations before Herod built the temple there, and it has been suggested (BRP[2] iii. 409) that it is 'Baal-gad in the valley of Lebanon under Mount Hermon (Jos 11[17] 12[7]), and that the shrine of the Phœnician Baal ultimately gave place to the Grecian Pan' (but see Dillmann on Jos 11[17]).

The little Birket er-Râm (the ancient lake Phiala), which Josephus (BJ III. x. 7) states is the real origin of the fountain of Jordan, and is carried to Panium by an underground channel, is situated in a bowl or crater. It is supplied by surface drainage, and has no outlet; it is on the right of the road leading from Cæsarea to Trachonitis, and its waters are dark, stagnant, and slimy.

The fountain of Bâniâs rises at an altitude of 1100 ft. (600 ft. above that of Dan). It flows as a torrent until it joins the Leddân, 4½ miles below Tell el-Ḳâḍi, and half a mile farther down union is effected with the Nahr Hasbâny.

The morass above the lake of Hûleh was explored thoroughly by J. Macgregor (Rob Roy on the Jordan) in 1869. Starting from Absîs, at the junction of the Leddân and Bâniâs, in his canoe, he passed the junction with the Hasbâny at Tell Sheik Yusûf. He reached a village about 2 miles farther to south. He estimated the river from 30 to 100 ft. wide, with steep banks of reddish clay, rising in places to 20 ft. The waters in flood were 7 ft. deep—turbid, and brown in colour. Beyond this he struggled with his canoe for another mile, only to get firmly entangled in a maze of bushes 8 ft. high, thick-set stumps, and reeds. He was obliged to return and have his canoe carried N.W. along the edge of the morass to the western side of the valley, and on to the 'Ain Melâhah, on the N.W. side of the lake. Here he again launched his canoe, and, exploring the Lake Hûleh, found the mouth of the Jordan about midway across the northern end of the lake. He explored it to the north through a channel in the floating papyrus reeds for about 4 miles, when he came to a barrier of floating jungle, which effectually stopped further progress. It would appear that all the lower portion of the morass for 4 miles is composed of this papyrus, and it is probably encroaching on Lake Hûleh. The waters of Hûleh were found to be considerably less in extent than the morass, and to measure about 3 miles from east to west, and 4 miles from north to south. The surface is about 7 ft. above the Mediterranean. From the southern end of Hûleh to the northern end of the Lake of Tiberias is about 10 miles, and the fall is 689 ft.—a rapid descent of about 70 ft. a mile over a rocky bed.

(b) The Jordan on issuing from Hûleh is about 60ft. broad and 15 ft. deep. At about 2 miles down is the Jisr Benat Yâḳob, the first bridge over the complete Jordan, built of black basalt and with three arches, over which the great caravan route goes from Akka to Damascus. It appears to be of later date than the Crusading period. The canoe was unable to follow this portion of the Jordan, as it partakes of the nature of a torrent, and flows through a rocky glen, shut in by hills, forcing its turbid waters far into the Lake Tiberias, without apparently commingling them with those of the lake for some considerable distance. This has given rise to the legend that the river Jordan passes through the lake intact. It affects the level of the lake somewhat, which stands in the wet season about 6 in. higher than in the dry season.

(c) The Ghôr or lower Jordan Valley.—The Jordan between L. Tiberias and the Salt Sea lies in a deep depression, sloping nearly uniformly from north to south, at about 9 ft. to 1 mile. On either side are the mountains of Western and Eastern Palestine, rising to heights of over 3000 to 4000 ft. (2000 to 3000 ft. above the Mediterranean), and separated by the comparatively flat Jordan Valley, called the Ghôr by the Arabs, the Arabah of the Hebrews, Aulon of the Greeks, which is 3 miles wide at L. Tiberias, 12 to 16 miles wide at the Salt Sea, contracting to a width of 2 miles south of the plain of Beîsan. The Ghôr has a very gentle slope on either side down to the lower plain (the Zôr), in which the Jordan runs, of about five degrees.

The banks of the Ghôr leading down into the Zôr are not regular, but are fretted away by the fervid sun, the strong winds, and occasional heavy rains in January and February. They are very ragged, and during the rainy season are covered with lovely flowers and verdure, but during most seasons of the year are a scene of utter desolation. Towards the lower portion of the Jordan Valley, where the streams (en-Nweimeh, Faseil, el-Aujeh, Kelt, and others) on the west run into the Zôr, the plain of the Ghôr is broken up into a series of valleys, the original plain being left in outline here and there isolated and forlorn. These broken valleys have very steep sides, are about 100 to 200 ft. deep, and at first sight it seems impossible that the small streams which meander through them—at the best not 3 ft. deep or 6 ft. wide—can have scooped out these banks over 150 ft. in height, whose irregularities often extend more than a mile from the stream itself. From the ruins which exist about the plain, it is obvious that this work of denudation has proceeded exceedingly slowly, the features having scarcely altered during the last 2000 years. A heavier rainfall in early days would, however, readily account for a more rapid degree of change.

The plains of the Jordan are sterile only at the southern end for a few miles north of the Salt Sea over that depressed portion, which probably in early days, when there was a greater rainfall, was covered by the Salt Sea. The soil is not impregnated with salt at a height of 200 ft. above the level of the Salt Sea, and will bear plentifully provided there is any rainfall, so much so that during the rainy season the Jordan plains for miles, as far as the eye can reach, are vast meadows, abounding in grasses and flowers. Those who see the country after the sun has burned up the pasturage may well conceive the idea that nothing will grow there, for when the hot winds spring up in May the grasses are broken up and blown away, and there is little left but a few dried stumps in a howling wilderness. During January and February and part of March, flocks are brought down from the mountains to feed on the rich pasturage on the plains of Jordan, and browse within a mile of the river. In February 1868 between Jericho and Jisr Damieh the country was green everywhere, the weather was chilly, flowers of every hue lay in the path, and the lower Jordan plain or Zôr was covered with an early crop of barley, with here and there branches of the overflowing Jordan meandering through it. The plain of Beisan at this time was abundantly watered and covered with verdure.

In the plain of Beisan three distinct levels can be seen—the Zôr, the Ghôr, and an upper plain which is about 300 ft. above the Ghôr at Beisan. Here the Ghôr is cultivated with corn and indigo, watercourses and canals irrigate the crops and supply the mills with water.

At Beisan the Jordan Valley is 8 miles wide, but immediately to the north it is only 1¼ miles wide, and to the south it contracts again to about 2 miles, the hills on the west closing right down to the river. The Ghôr varies in width until at Jericho it is about 16 miles across, the foot of the hills being about 400 to 500 ft. above the Salt Sea.

It is quite evident from the number of aqueducts in all directions that the Jordan Valley about Jericho was once very highly cultivated, and that with a little care and a good government it might again be brought under cultivation, and its malarious and pestilential marshes removed.

The Jordan Valley on the eastern side, between the Zerḳa and Nimrîn, is only barren because there are no streams or fountains led out to water it. North of the Zerḳa, where streams are numerous the valley is clothed with wheat fields and vegetation. South of the Zerḳa there are traces of ancient canals, showing that that portion of the valley between the Zerḳa and the road leading from es-Salt to Nablûs was formerly under cultivation, though it is now a desert. Perhaps more than half the Jordan Valley on the east is now reached by irrigation canals, and in those sections not occupied by wheat fields the thistles and weeds are rank, and form such dense jungles that it is almost impossible to get through them. 'Every square mile not now under irrigation could be watered from the Jordan, and the expense for a dam and canals would be small compared with the large number of square miles of valuable land that would be made productive . . . we should have 180 square miles of land as fertile as any prairie, and which at 20 to 25 bushels of wheat per acre would produce between 2 and 3 million bushels of wheat. Give these plains and deserts water, and you can transform them into gardens' (PEFSt, 1877, 153). The portion of the valley between the Zerḳa and the Mandhôr in February and March resembles New England (U.S.) in the month of June. The soil is then burdened with its own productions. By the last of May the weeds, thistles, and wild mustard have formed an almost impenetrable jungle.

From Wâdy Nimrîn to the Salt Sea, a distance of 15 miles, lies the great Shittim plain, watered by three copious streams, which make it a rich and beautiful oasis. This position is assigned by some authorities for the site of the cities of the Plain.

The Zôr or depressed plain through which the Jordan flows.—The Jordan issues from the Lake Tiberias gently for a mile and then becomes more rapid; although it has a nearly uniform descent throughout its course, yet it is found to have a great number of small rapids, and its descent is not quite so great about the middle. It has through many ages worked out a passage through the floor-bed of the valley or Ghôr (Aulon), which passage is called by the Arabs the Zôr. The Zôr varies from ¼ mile to 2 miles in width, and is a depressed plain about 20 ft. below the Ghôr at the northern end, and 200 ft. below towards the Salt Sea. It appears to have been formed by the changing of the river bed from side to side, breaking down the banks of the Ghôr and carrying the silt into the Salt Sea. The Jordan itself varies in width from 30 to 70 yards. The level of the surface of the Zôr is uniform with the banks of the Jordan, so that in January and February, when the waters overflow the banks, the Zôr is covered, and the total width of river in flood is ½ to 2 miles. The soil is for the most part very rich (except towards the southern end, where it is full of salts), and is highly cultivated, bearing heavy barley crops and vegetables.

The Zôr above the Jisr Mijamia is not continuous; below the bridge the Ghôr is from 50 to 100 ft. above the Zôr. The cliffs of the Zôr are here of white soft marl, about half a mile apart below the bridge, but just above the bridge the hills close in on the west, and the Ghôr disappears. Near the plain of Beisan the crops in the Zôr were being reaped in April (1873). Near the river the soil was covered with gigantic thistles 10 to 15 ft. high. The whole region round about the plain of Beisan is volcanic, and all the rocks and stones about are black and basaltic in their character. This probably accounts for the number of fords across the river in these parts.

From Wâdy Mahleh south of the plain of Beisan to Wâdy Fârah the mountains on the west close in upon the Jordan, narrowing the Zôr, which again widens out opposite to Wâdy Fârah, and gradually increases to 2 miles as it approaches the Salt Sea. The river is hidden for a great portion of its course by the jungle of cane and tamarisk on either side: all rank vegetation except reeds ceases about 2 miles from the Salt Sea. On entering the sea the waters form a muddy marsh covered with drift-wood, too soft to be crossed by man or beast. Although the land for a few miles above the Salt Sea is a veritable desert, having at times been covered by the Salt Sea itself, yet such is the power of the sun that immediately after heavy rain in January and February small green plants and flowers spring up at once all round, even on the edge of the Salt Sea, and flourish so long as the rainy season lasts, but wither in a few hours after the rain ceases.

From L. Tiberias to the Salt Sea the direct distance is 65 miles, and the fall is 610 ft., viz. betwixt – 682 ft. at L. Tiberias to – 1292 ft. at the Salt Sea; a fall of 9·3 ft. per mile.

The Dee of Aberdeenshire runs 72 miles, with fall of 16·5 ft. per mile. The Tweed runs 96 miles, with fall of 16 ft. per mile. The Clyde 98 miles, with fall of 14 ft. per mile. The Thames runs 215 miles, with fall of 1½ ft. per mile. The sinuosities of the Jordan, however, are so great that in the 65 miles' direct course it travels 200 miles at least (Lynch, Narr. p. 265), so that the actual fall is not more than 3 ft. per mile, if this estimate can be accepted.

Molyneux surveyed the Jordan from L. Tiberias to the Salt Sea in a boat in 1847, and Lt. Lynch did the same in 1848. Molyneux found the river when not in flood upwards of 100 ft. broad and 4 to 5 ft. deep near the Jisr Mijâmia; for seven hours they scarcely ever had sufficient water to float the boat for 100 yards together. In many places the river is split into a number of small streams, which consequently have not much water in any of them. Occasionally the boat had to be carried upwards of 100 yards over rocks and through thorny bushes; and in some places they had high, steep sandy cliffs all along the banks of the river. In other places the boat had to be carried on the backs of camels, the stream being quite impracticable. Lynch met with equally difficult experiences. He states, 'we have plunged down twenty-seven threatening rapids, besides a great number of lesser magnitude.' Only one straight reach of any length was noticed. The passage of the 200 miles of twists occupied 8½ days. The width varied with the depth and current, but 70 to 80 yards seems to have been an average width, with a depth of 2 to 3 ft., and current varying from 2 to 8 knots, according to circumstances. The greatest width was 180 yards at the Jordan's mouth, with a depth of 3 ft., and a very slow current.

Almost the only description of the Jordan banks from the river itself is given by Lynch in the account which he has written of his adventurous boat journey. The following are the most important passages.

'The river . . . curved and twisted north, south, east and west, turning, in the short space of half an hour, to every quarter of the compass, seeming as if desirous to prolong its luxuriant meanderings in the calm and silent valley, and reluctant to pour its sweet and sacred waters into the accursed waters of the bitter sea. . . .

'For hours in their swift descent the boats floated down in silence, the silence of the wilderness. Here and there were spots of solemn beauty. The numerous birds sang with a music strange and manifold; the willow branches were spread upon the stream like tresses, and creeping mosses and clambering weeds, with a multitude of white and silver little flowers, looked out from among them; and the cliff swallow wheeled over the falls, or, at his own wild will, darted through the arched vistas, shadowed and shaped by the meeting foliage on the banks; and above all, yet attuned to all, was the music of the river, gushing with a sound like that of shawms and cymbals. The stream sometimes washed the banks of the sandy hills, and at other times meandered between low banks, generally fringed with trees and fragrant with blossoms. Some points presented views exceedingly picturesque — the mad rushing of a mountain torrent, the song and sight of birds, the overhanging foliage, and glimpses of the mountains far over the plain, and here and there a gurgling rivulet pouring its tribute of crystal water into the now muddy Jordan. The western shore was peculiar from the high calcareous limestone hills, which form a barrier to the stream when swollen by the efflux of the Sea of Galilee during the winter and early spring; while the left or eastern bank was low, fringed with tamarisk and willow, and occasionally a thicket of lofty cane, and tangled masses of shrubs and creeping plants, giving it the character of a jungle. At one place we saw the fresh track of a tiger [nimr or cheetah ?] on the low clayey margin, where he had come to drink. At another time as we passed his lair, a wild boar started with a savage grunt and dashed into the thicket; but for some moments we traced his pathway by the shaking cane and the crashing sound of breaking branches. . . . Many islands, some fairy-like, and covered with a luxuriant vegetation, others mere sandbars and sedimentary deposits, intercepted the course of the river, but were beautiful features in the grand monotony of the shores—the regular and almost unvaried scene of the high-banked alluvial deposit and sandhills on the one hand, and the low swamp-like shore, covered to the water's edge with the tamarisk, the willow, and the thick high cane, would have been fatiguing without the frequent occurrence of sandbanks and verdant islands. High up in the sand bluffs the cliff swallow chattered from his nest in the hollow, or darted about in the bright sunshine in pursuit of the gnat and the water fly' (Lynch, Narrative, pp. 211–215).

The Plains. — The words principally used in the OT in connexion with portions of the Jordan Valley are 'ărābāh, midbār, ciccār, gĕlīlōth, jĕshīmon, sādeh, shĕdēmōth, bik̇'ah.

The 'Arābāh. Without the definite article 'Arābāh refers to any desert or wilderness; but with the definite article it is used only for that part of the Jordan Valley which is a desert extending from some miles above Jericho to 'Akabah, and including the Salt Sea, which is often called 'the Sea of the Arabah' (Dt 3^{17} 4^{49}, Jos 3^{16} 12^{3}). It is used 21 times in this extended sense, and is usually tr^{d} in AV 'the plain' or 'the plains': in RV it is invariably tr^{d} 'the Arabah.' In the plural ('ărābōth) it occurs 19 times in the historical books, and with one exception it refers to a definite spot, viz. the uncultivated land at the northern end of the Salt Sea, the steppes of Jericho (Jos 4^{13} etc.), or the steppes of Moab (Nu 22, etc.). The exceptional case is 2 S 15^{28}, tr^{d} in AV as 'the plain of the wilderness.' It is probable, however, that RV, 'the fords of the wilderness,' is correct (reading עברת, not ערבת). See ARABAH.

Midbār, 'wilderness' (pasture land). With the article this word is generally used for the wilderness of Arabia, but sometimes for tracts of pasture land about Palestine, particularly in respect to the wilderness or pasture country east of Jerusalem, and the passing to it is 'the way of the wilderness' (Jos $8^{15.\ 20}$ 16^{1}, Jg 11^{22} 20^{42}, 2 S $15^{23.\ 28}$ 17^{16}).

Ciccār, 'round,' 'circle,' a tract of country (when the article is generally used). The word is used for denoting—(a) the floor of the valley through which the Jordan runs, with reference to the cultivated parts; (b) the oasis which formerly existed in the lower part of the valley around the cities of the Plain. In the former sense it is used 5 times. In 2 S 18[23] it is used to denote the direction taken by Ahimaaz 'by the way of the plain.' In 1 K 7[46], 2 Ch 4[17] it refers to the plain of the Jordan, where was the clay ground between Succoth and Zeredah. In Neh 3[22] 12[28] it refers to the country about Jerusalem, 'men of the plain.' In its restricted sense it is used 8 times to denote the oasis where the cities of the Plain were situated, Gn 13[10] 19[17], Dt 34[3].

Gĕlīlōth, 'circle,' is used to denote the borders of Jordan in two cases. Jos 22[10. 11] (see GELILOTH).

Jĕshīmon, 'wilderness,' refers to a wilderness generally, and not to any particular portion of the Jordan Valley so far as can be judged (see, however, Dillm. on Nu 33[49] and art. JESHIMON).

Sādeh, 'field,' is generally used to denote cultivated ground. It is used for the 'field of Moab,' Gn 36[35], but it is not certain whether this is in the Jordan Valley or upper levels. Stanley (SP 491) suggests that the 'Vale of Siddim' is the 'valley of the cultivated fields.'

Shĕdēmōth, 'fields,' is used for highly cultivated ground. The 'fields of Gomorrah,' Dt 32[32]; of Kidron, 2 K 23[4]; of Heshbon, Is 16[8].

Bik'ah, a broad plain between two mountain ranges, like that of Cœle-Syria. It is used once in apposition with ciccār, 'the Round, even the plain (הַכִּכָּר) of Jericho' (Dt 34[3]). 'All the region round about Jordan' (Mt 3[5], Lk 3[3]) does not appear to be capable of geographical location.

Tributaries of the Jordan.—From the west (1) the Wâdy el-Bireh, rising about Tabor, a mountain torrent; (2) Nahr el-Jalûd, which rises near Jezreel (250 ft.), and passes down the valley of Esdraelon past Beisan to the Jordan. This is the valley by which the inland sea in the valley of Jordan would have been connected with the Mediterranean after the connexion by the Gulf of 'Akabah was cut off, supposing that the rise of the ground was uniform. (3) The Wâdy Fârah, which rises on the east of Ebal and Gerizim, flows in a beautiful perennial stream, fringed with oleanders, to the Jordan. The springs about the plain of Beisan and the Wâdy el-Mâleh—the wâdis Fuseil, el-'Aujeh, en-Nweimeh, and el-Kelt—run for a great part of the year.

On the east are (1) the Sheri'at el-Mandhûr, Jarmûk, or Hieromax, which flows into the Jordan past Gadara and the hot springs of Amatha, mentioned by Pliny, Strabo, Josephus, and the Talmud, but the name does not occur in the Bible. It is a large river, running through a deep gorge into the Jordan, and has its sources in the Haurân. (2) The Wâdy el-'Arab, a mountain torrent, the Nahr es-Zerka or Jabbok, which rises at 'Amman (Philadelphia), and falls into the Jordan near Jisr ed-Damieh. (3) The wâdis Nimrîn, Kafrein, and Hesbân, the last of which rises in the hills near Heshbon.

Communication.—Roads, bridges, and fords. There is an ancient road on the western bank of the Jordan which, apparently coming from Jerusalem, passes Neby Mûsa near the north-western end of the Salt Sea, passes 'Ain es-Sultân (Jericho) and Fûseil (Phasaelus), near which place one branch passes to the west up Wâdy Kerâd to Nablûs (Shechem), and the other skirts Kurn Surâbeh to the east, and at Tell el-'Abied again divides, one branch to the west going up Wâdy Fârah to Nablûs, the other passing along the Umm ed-Deraj, a steep and rocky ascent just above the Jordan, passes through Beisan, and, keeping near to the Jordan, skirts the L. Tiberias to the village Tabarîya (Tiberias). At Khan el-Kerak there is a ruin which was a fort protecting the lake district, at Jisr Mijâmia a branch of this road crosses the Jordan and goes through Gadara to the Haurân, and another branch to Irbed, and probably to Jerasa. This is a Roman road, and the old foundation stones and pavement are visible in many parts.

A good road from Akka passes down the Sahel el-Ahma, and, emerging by the pass at its mouth on to the Jordan, crosses at the Jisr es-Sidd a little below L. Tiberias and passes east to the Haurân; it is used by the Bedawîn and Druses to bring barley to Akka by camel. A branch of this road also on crossing the Jordan to the east runs down along the foot of the hills bounding the Ghôr, and passing Fâhil (Pella) crosses the Zerka at a point where it is a foaming torrent, goes to Nimrîn, and thence by Kafrein to Hesbân.

The road along the coast of the lake from Tiberias also crosses the Jordan near Tarichæa, where there is a ruined bridge, and passes up the east side of the lake and also by a great Roman road to Hippos and the north-east. The Jisr Mijâmia is 6 miles south of L. Tiberias, the point where the old important Roman road from Nablûs and Beisan to Damascus crosses the Jordan: it has one large pointed arch and three small ones.

At Jisr Damieh, below the junction of the Jordan and Zerka, the road from Neapolis (Shechem) runs to es-Salt, Amman (Philadelphia), and the east. This bridge is still in a good state of preservation (one arch), but the Jordan has left it and now passes down another portion of the Zôr; here is a good illustration of the change in direction of the river in a few hundred years. This bridge is said by Conder to be Saracenic: it appears to have been originally of Roman work, with extensive repairs by Moslems or Crusaders. On the east side the bank is quite low, and the wide flat at that point is often overflowed; hence a causeway at great expense and labour has been made across the low ground. 450 ft. of this causeway on the eastern side still remains, supported on arches of which nine still exist. The bridge itself could not have been less than 100 ft. in length (PEFSt, 1879, 139).

No remains of bridges mark the old roads from Jerusalem and Jericho to the east of Jordan, but there are still the remains of the roads which now cross to Nimrîn by the el-Mandesi and Umm Enkhôla fords to Kafrein and Hesbân by the el-Ghôraniyeh ford, and to Hesbân and the east of Salt Sea by the Makhadet Hajlah ford. These are the principal fords in the southern 25 miles of the Jordan's course. In the 40 miles to the north there are enumerated no fewer than fifty fords: probably this difference is owing to the more stony character of the Jordan bottom in the northern portion. Molyneux says of the upper part of its course (p. 115): 'I am within the mark when I say that there are many hundreds of places where we might have walked across without wetting our feet, on the large rocks and stones.' This must have been during a very dry season.

CLIMATE: FAUNA AND FLORA.—For many years past, meteorological observations have been taken at various points in Palestine, and have been tabulated and commented on annually by Glaisher. There are three distinctive climates in Palestine: (1) that of the seashore, which corresponds to other Mediterranean climates in similar latitude; (2) that of the hill-country, which is more hot and oppressive than the hill-country in other parts of the Mediterranean, owing to the vicinity of the Arabian Desert on south and east; and (3) that of the valley of the Jordan and Salt Sea.

The climate of the hill-country, Jerusalem for example, is pleasant in the winter, but hot and trying for six months in the summer. During the heat of summer in a house in Jerusalem the temperature day after day will for two or three hours reach 104° F., and it sometimes does not go below 80° F. all night. The published returns, however, give much lower readings in the air, with a mean temperature for August of 75° F. In the Jordan Valley in summer-time the heat is intense, the temperature being 110° F. after sunset, and scarcely falling during the night when in the vicinity of rocks with a southern aspect. During the first two months of the year the temperature in the Jordan Valley is very pleasant, hot in the daytime and cool at night, often going down to 40° F. except close to the Salt Sea. Much depends, however, upon the direction of the wind. In the month of March there is often snow on the hills. The climate of the Jordan Valley is tropical; that of the region of the Salt Sea is equatorial, probably the most heated in the world, owing to the depressed character of the plain, hemmed in east and west by high mountains. There is a difference of elevation between the summit of Mount Hermon and the level of the Salt Sea of over 10,000 ft., and the difference of temperature and of climate allows of a great variety of animal life. That on the seashore generally is Mediterranean, while that in the Jordan Valley, especially in the lower parts, is principally Ethiopian or Indian, though these parts are cut off from each other by the deserts of Arabia.

The following observations concerning life in the Jordan Valley are extracted principally from SWP, Fauna and Flora (Tristram). Here is a patch of tropical character, containing southern forms so peculiar and unique that their presence cannot be connected with any existing causes or other transporting influences. As it has been found by Humboldt that zones of elevation on mountains correspond to parallels of latitude, so here we find a zone of depression, the only one known to us, producing similar phenomena, and exhibiting in generic correspondence the fauna and flora of much lower latitudes: an Ethiopian flora identical with that now existing in Ethiopian regions in the midst of a Mediterranean district.

Tristram considers that the whole of Syria and Arabia Petræa must have emerged from the Miocene ocean while the coast of the Mediterranean was the bed of a Miocene sea, and that during this period Palestine was connected with Ethiopia; that during the Miocene and Pliocene periods the Jordan basin formed the northernmost of a long system of fresh-water lakes, extending from north to south, of which, perhaps in the earlier part of the epoch, the Red Sea and Nile basin, Nyanza, Nyassa, and Tanganyika lakes were members.

During that warm period, fluviatile ichthyological fauna were developed suitable to its then conditions, consisting of representative and perhaps frequently identical species, throughout the area under consideration. The advent of the Glacial period was, like its close, gradual, and, while many species may have perished, the hardiest would have survived, and have gradually modified to meet the changed conditions. But however severe the climate may have been, that of the Lebanon with its glaciers probably corresponding to the Alps at a proportional elevation (due regard being had to latitude), the fissure of the Jordan lay, as we know, as much depressed as at present, and there must have been an exceptionally warm temperature in its waters in which the existing ichthyological fauna could survive.

According to Slater's definition of boundary lines laid before the Linnæan Society in 1858, Palestine forms an extreme southern province of the Palæarctic region. An analysis of each class of its fauna and of its phanerogamic flora shows that while an overwhelming majority of its species in all cases belong to the Palæarctic region, there is in each class a group of exceptions and peculiar forms which cannot be referred to that region, and the presence of many of which cannot be explained merely by the fact of the Palæarctic infringing on the Ethiopian region, and not very distantly on the Indian, but can be satisfactorily accounted for only by reference to the geological history of the country. These species are almost all strictly confined to the area of the Jordan Valley and Dead Sea basin.

Of the mammalia, 55 are Palæarctic, 34 Ethiopian, 16 Indian, and 13 peculiar out of 118. The Indian include 9 which are also Ethiopian, and the Ethiopian 9 which are equally Indian. Of the 13 peculiar forms, 3 are modifications of Palæarctic types and 6 are Ethiopian in their character. One species, Lepus judææ, the hare of the Dead Sea basin, differs from either the European or Syrian species in the form of its skull. The Hyrax syriacus belongs to a strictly Ethiopian genus, and no theory of immigration or dispersion can account for its presence. Fish of small size abound in the Jordan and its tributaries down to the entrance to the Salt Sea; they bear a strong affinity to many of the species of the Nile, though with far less admixture of species than is found in other rivers of the Eastern Mediterranean. Out of 35 species, 2 are Nilotic, 1 Mediterranean, 7 common to the Tigris and Euphrates, 10 common to Syria and the Damascus lakes, and 16 peculiar to the Jordan. There is a great affinity between these fish and those of the rivers and lakes of tropical Africa. These fishes probably date from the earliest times after the elevation of the country above the Eocene ocean, and they form a group more distinct and divergent from that of the surrounding region than can be found in any other class of existing life. The affinity is very close to the forms of the rivers and fresh-water lakes of east Africa, even as far south as the Zambesi; but while the genera are the same, the species are rather representative than identical. The solution lies in the theory of the Jordan basin having been one of a system of fresh-water lakes, extending from north to south as already proposed. There are no fish in the Salt Sea.

The Avifauna of Palestine, out of 348 known species, present 271 Palæarctic, 40 Ethiopian (10 of these also Indian), 7 Indian, and 30 peculiar to Syria. But they are not equally diffused over the whole area. The Palæarctic species almost all belong to the coast area, and the highlands east and west of Jordan, while the Ethiopian and Indian types are almost exclusively confined to the deep depression of the Jordan and Dead Sea basin, which, with the exception of some winter migrants, affords us very few Palæarctic species. There are 11 species belonging to as many different genera peculiar to the Jordan and Dead Sea basin, and not yet traced beyond its limits. Some of these belong to genera exclusively Ethiopian, most of them common to the Ethiopian and Indian regions. The avifauna of the Jordan and Dead Sea basin is decidedly distinct and typical in its species, revealing sometimes Indian, more generally African affinities.

Of the 3000 species of phanerogamic plants, the larger proportion consists of the common Mediterranean forms. Sir J. Hooker has remarked that though a vast number are common to the whole country, yet there is a great and decided difference between the floras of such localities as the tops of (1) Lebanon, (2) Carmel, and (3) the hills bordering the Jordan. Of 162 species of plants in Wâdy Zuweireh (S.W. corner of Dead Sea), 27 are common European forms extending to Northern India, the remaining 135 are African. Although the Dead Sea flora bears a very strong general similarity to that of Arabia Petræa, yet there can be no question of its distinctness from the adjacent floras of the same latitudes east and west of it.

In the Jordan Valley the Cyperus papyrus is locally abundant, and covers many acres in the marshes of Hûleh, though long since extinct in Egypt, and not known in Africa farther north than on the White Nile, lat. 7° N. Calotropis procera and Salvadora persica are never found except close to the Dead Sea, at En-gedi, Safieh, and Seisaban, and are separated by many degrees of longitude and latitude from their other known habitats.

The flora of the Salt Sea area is remarkable for a small average number of species distributed through a large number of orders. We may infer that in this borderland of Europe, Asia, and Africa, the more hardy and accommodating plants of each area hold their own, while those more readily affected by variation of soil or climate disappear.

The following plants and trees of the Jordan Valley are most common: the Zyzyphus Spina Christi, or nubk or dôm tree of the Arabs (which seems to correspond to the 'wait a bit' bushes of South Africa in its power of detaining the unwary traveller). It has a small sub-acid fruit like a thorn apple, very agreeable to the taste. The Retm or Genista Rœtem, broom plant, grows freely on the plain. There is also the Balanites Ægyptiaca, a thorny tree with large olive-like fruit, which affords the oil called zukkûm or Zuk by the Arabs, supposed to be balm of Gilead, and sold to the pilgrims as such. It is highly prized among Arabs and pilgrims as a remedy for wounds or bruises; the latter call it 'Zaccheus oil' (BRP[2] i. 560). The castor-oil plant and the oleander flourish about Jericho. Tamarisks grow everywhere, on the banks of the streams and in the dry desert; and the Agnus Casti, a large flowering bamboo. The acacia tree grows in great variety, also the Populus Euphratica on the banks of the Jordan. The caper plant hangs down from the rocks, with its delicate white blossoms, and the Solanum Sodomæum or Dead Sea apple, with its bright yellow fruit, is very conspicuous. Numbers of thoroughly tropical plants and trees abound—the Zygophyllum coccineum, Bœrhavia, Indigofira; also on the shore of the Salt Sea the Calotropis procera ('ösher among Arabs), a beautiful green fruit the size of a peach, with nothing inside but the silky coma of the seeds; it reaches a height of 15 ft., and grows freely in Upper Egypt, Nubia, and Arabia Felix.

The principal larger wild animals of the Jordan Valley are the jackal, fox, hyæna, boar, ibex (beden), and leopard. The leopard (nimr, felis pardus) is found in the Jordan jungle; the writer sent one to England from the banks of the Jordan in 1867. The cheetah (felis jubata) is found among the hills, and is tamed by the Moslems of Syria and used in hunting gazelles. Lions are said not to exist in Palestine, though they are found not far to the east in the desert and in the jungle of the Euphrates. They are still, however, supposed by the inhabitants of the Anti-Lebanon to pay visits periodically to the neighbourhood; and in 1869, owing to the loss of four children, one by one, at the village of Burkush, search was made for the supposed lion by the inhabitants without avail (PEFSt, 1870, 226). The lion coming up from the thickets of the Jordan is spoken of in Jer 49[19] 50[44].

The birds in the Jordan Valley vary very much according to the time of year, those of the hill-country being driven down there for a short time in the cold season. During a winter visit of Chichester Hart (PEFSt, 1879, 286), the following were seen at Jericho: a few sun birds, 'hopping thrush,' shrikes, palm dove, collared turtle, English robins, jays, chaffinches, wheatears, blackbirds, wagtails. The larger birds, such as eagles, vultures, bustards, flamingoes, water birds of various kinds, belong to Palestine or to a larger area, and not particularly to the Jordan Valley.

A review of the botany as well as the zoology of the Jordan basin reveals the interesting fact that in this isolated spot, comprising but a few square miles, a series of forms of life are found differing decidedly from the species of the surrounding region, to which they never extend, and bearing a strong affinity to the Ethiopian region, with a trace of Indian admixture.

Cultivation.—The plains about Lake Hûleh are highly cultivated, and yield heavy crops of wheat, barley, Indian corn, sesame, and even rice. The plains about L. Tiberias wave with corn, and the plains of Beisan and valley of Jezreel are very productive, and stand thick with corn or indigo. Stunted palms grow wild, but no large ones now exist, except the single large date palm at Jericho. There are many cucumber and vegetable-marrow gardens at the foot of the hills, irrigated by fountains. In the Zôr, barley and simsim flourish. The olive, figs, bananas, oranges, sugar-cane, tobacco, grapes, millet (dhurah), cotton, indigo, melons, cucumbers, and marrows are cultivated at Jericho, and the soil for miles around if supplied with water is yet, as of old, capable of the highest cultivation: all that is wanted is irrigation and weeding. The harvest in the Jordan Valley is fully a month in advance of that in the highlands.

Jordan as a Boundary. — Stanley remarks (Sin. and Pal. 286): 'The tropical temperature to which its whole plain is thus exposed, whilst calling out into almost unnatural vigour whatever vegetation receives the life-giving touch of its waters, withers up every particle of verdure that is found beyond their reach. As a separation of Israel from the surrounding country, as a boundary between the two main divisions of the tribes, as an image of water in a dry and thirsty soil, it played an important part; but not as the scene of great events or the seat of great cities. Its contact with the history of the people is exceptional, not ordinary, confined to rare and remote occasions, the more remarkable from their very rarity.' This is the general view taken at the present day, with Palestine under a feeble government and an enervated race inhabiting the Jordan Valley. The valley was, however, once 'well watered everywhere as the garden of the Lord, and like the land of Egypt,' and this may very well occur again under a stable government and a more energetic race of people. The levels about Jericho and Kafrein are about 200 ft. below that of Lake Tiberias, so that the whole of the Jordan Valley might be irrigated by the Jordan waters if the matter were taken in hand as a Syrian national enterprise.

The terms 'this side Jordan,' or 'the other side Jordan,' are of constant occurrence in the early history, denoting that the Jordan was regarded as a physical feature of demarcation or boundary. The original boundary of the Promised Land was to reach 'unto the side of the sea of Chinnereth eastward. And the boundary shall go down to Jordan, and the extremity shall be at the Salt Sea' (Nu 34[12]). But the tribes of Reuben and Gad and half Manasseh saw that the eastern side of the Jordan, as now, was good for cattle, and they acquired their inheritance there (Nu 32[19]), outside the Promised Land, on condition of going armed over Jordan and fully assisting the people of Israel to conquer the land. On the completion of this work they were permitted to return to the eastern side with a blessing, after building an altar by Jordan, 'a great altar to see,' that might be a witness between them that they were one people, and that the tribes living west of Jordan should not in the future say to those on the east, 'What have ye to do with the Lord God of Israel? for the Lord hath made Jordan a boundary between us and you, ye children of Reuben and children of Gad' (Jos $22^{10ff.}$). See ED.

THE CITIES OF THE PLAIN.—The earliest account of the Jordan Valley describes it as very different in appearance from its aspect at the present time. From the high ground near Bethel, 'Lot lifted up his eyes, and beheld all the plain (ciccār) of Jordan, that it was well watered everywhere, before the LORD destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah, even as the garden of the LORD, like the land of Egypt, as thou comest into Zoar. So Lot chose him all the Plain of Jordan; and Lot journeyed east' (Gn $13^{10ff.}$). This would indicate a position for the cities of the Plain at the northern end of the Salt Sea, as proposed by Sir George Grove. The Arab geographers, however, place these cities at the southern end of the Salt Sea; and recently M. Clermont-Ganneau (PEFSt, 1886) has taken the same view, giving identifications for the several cities (see SODOM). On the other hand, Strabo (Judæa) in relating that Judæa is full of fire, places these cities on the western side of the Salt Sea within a radius of 60 stadia, close to Masada, and refers to the rocks there bearing the marks of fire, with a soil like ashes, pitch falling in drops from the rocks, rivers boiling up and emitting a fetid odour to a great distance; dwellings in every direction overthrown,—a description very suitable to this spot at the present day, where there are hot sulphur springs and every appearance of volcanic energy near at hand. Strabo describes the overthrow of the cities as due to shocks of earthquake, eruptions of flames, and hot springs, containing asphaltus and sulphur, causing the lake to break its bounds and the rocks to take fire. Josephus states that the country of Sodom bordered upon the Lake Asphaltitis (Salt Sea), and that the cities were burnt by lightning, in consequence of which there are still the remainders of that divine fire, and that the traces of the five cities are still to be seen (BJ IV. viii. 4; V. xiii. 6; Tac. Hist. v. 6; Diod. ii. 48, xix. 98; Curt. v. 16). He would appear (BJ IV. viii. 2) to place Sodom at the western side of the Arabah, near 'the utmost limits of the Asphaltitis southward,' and to place Somorrhon (Gomorrah?) on the eastern side, on the bounds of Petra in Arabia. Sir W. Dawson (Egypt and Syria) supposes that the overthrow of these cities may have been due to underground reservoirs of inflammable gases, and petroleum escaping through a fissure along an old line of 'fault,' causing bitumen and sulphur to rain upon the cities. There is no indication that the overthrow of these cities was accompanied by any earthquake or displacement of the level of the Salt Sea (Gn $14^{3.\,8.\,10}$), though the passage 'in the vale of Siddim, which is the Salt Sea,' would appear ambiguous. The reference to the whole land which 'is brimstone, and salt, and burning, that it is not sown, nor burneth, nor any grass groweth therein, like the overthrow of Sodom' (Dt 29^{23}), etc., would appear to apply more to the southern end of the Salt Sea than the generally accepted site on the northern end. Assuming, however, that there was no disturbance affecting the level of the Salt Sea, it may be questioned whether the physical effect of the substitution of arid plains in lieu of the well-watered district which existed previously may not have seriously affected the fertility of the Jordan Valley. It is known that the level of the Salt Sea varies yearly many feet, according to the rainfall in the adjacent district, as is attested by the lines of driftwood which can be seen at successive levels around the Salt Sea. A change from moisture to dryness over a large area in the valley would essentially affect the surrounding country, and reduce the rainfall, lower the surface of the sea, and expose more and more dry soil. Now, supposing the effects of the overthrow of the cities of the Plain resulted in a fall of 50 ft. in the level of the waters of the lake, it is interesting to remark that the whole of the mud flat at the south of the Salt Sea for about 10 miles (Anderson, Official Report, p. 182) would have been covered with water, also a considerable portion of the peninsula of Lisan and the low-lying portions of the shore on the western side, while to the north the Zôr would have been covered over nearly as far as the Makhadet Hajlah. If this is so, the area over which the cities of the Plain can be found is very much circumscribed (Anderson, Official Report, p. 182). Assuming that the cities of the Plain were situated at the N.E. end of the Salt Sea, it is suggested (PEFSt, 1879, 144) that the following tells on the Abel-shittim plain were the five cities of the Plain: (1) Tell Kafrein (Abel or Abila), (2) Tell er-Rama (Beth-ramtha or Beth-haran, Julias or Livias), (3) Suweimeh (Beth-jesimoth or Besimoth), (4) Tell el-Hamman, (5) Tell Ektanu ('the little one,' or Zoar). Ganneau (PEFSt, 1886), however, identifies Jebel Usdum as Sodom, and Gomorrah with 'Ain Ghamr, at the entrance of Wâdy Ghamr, about 20 leagues south of the Salt Sea, and Zoar in Wâdy es-Safi. This would appear closely to agree with the traditional sites given by Josephus, already mentioned.

PASSAGES OF THE JORDAN.—It was at the northern extremity of the Jordan that Abram (Gn $14^{13ff.}$), in his pursuit of Chedorlaomer, came up with him at Laish (Dan), and rescued his kinsman Lot.

The first record of a passage of the Jordan is that by Jacob (Gn 32^{10}). On the return journey (Gn 33^{17}) he crosses on his road from Succoth to Shalem (RVm; but there can be little doubt that RV 'in peace' is the correct translation), a city of Shechem; but as Succoth has not been satisfactorily identified, the ford of passage cannot be conjectured. The passage of Elijah (2 K 2^{8}) and the return of Elisha (2^{14}) over the Jordan took place over against Jericho; but there is nothing further to indicate the position, though there is a traditional spot on the east of Jordan from which the ascent of Elijah is said to have been made. The point of the Jordan where David crossed when warring against Helam (2 S 10^{17}) also cannot be conjectured. Again, when a fugitive to Mahanaim (2 S 15^{28} 17^{16} 19^{18}), he probably escaped by the quickest route over the Jordan; but this depended upon the road he took from Jerusalem, and whether he wished to avoid Jericho. The two fords which would be most suitable would be that of el-Ghôranîyeh, which would necessitate his passing by Jericho, and the Makhadet Hajlah ford, which he could have reached by the road passing the present M. Neby Mûsa.

The number of fords between Jisr Damieh and Lake Tiberias exceeds 50, and it would be futile to suggest any particular one which may have been used in that portion of the Jordan, in the passings over between the east and west. There was the ford or passage of the Jordan (Jg $12^{5ff.}$), taken by the Gileadites, when the Ephraimites were discovered by the pronunciation of the word 'Shibboleth.' There was Beth-barah ('even Jordan,' RV), which the Ephraimites (Jg 7^{24}) took possession of when they slew the Midianites, and which may be the ford 'Abarah discovered by Conder (SWP ii. 89). The occurrence probably took place near this ford, as 'Ain el-Helwah (Abelmeholah) is on the southern end of the plain of Beisan (Bethshean).

Passage of the children of Israel over Jordan.—This is the most important event recorded in the Bible connected with the passage of the Jordan. The people were gathered together in the plains ('ărābōth) of Moab, extending from Abel-shittim ('the meadow of the acacia'), now probably Kafrein, to Beth-jesimoth ('house of the wastes'), now probably 'Ain Suweimeh near the Salt Sea (Nu 33^{49}). And they came to Jordan and lodged there for three days. The plains of Moab, where they had been staying, were from 200 to 400 ft. above the Salt Sea, and the ground which they had occupied for the last three days was probably somewhat on a lower level, but certainly not the Zôr or lower terrace of the Jordan as it was in flood, 'overflowing all his banks at the time of the barley harvest' (Jos 3^{15}), probably about the month of April. The description states that the waters which came down from above stood and rose up upon a heap very far from the city of Adam, that is, beside Zaretan; and those that came down toward the sea of the Arabah, even the Salt Sea, were wholly cut off (Jos 3^{16}). The RV has 'at Adam,' and Stanley (304 note) has 'high up the river, very far, in Adam, the city which is beside Zaretan.' The site of Adam is not sufficiently identified, but it is supposed by some to be represented by Tell Damieh, near the bridge of that name. Conder has pointed out (SWP ii. 14) that somewhat higher up, where the mountains come down and overhang the Jordan, a landslip could readily block up the Jordan for a period, and T. Drake (PEFSt, 1874, 182; 1875, 30) suggests that Adam ('red earth') may be Khan el-Hamrath, the Red Ruin, situated opposite Fahil (Pella), on the west side of the Jordan in the plain of Beisan, and that adherents of the theory that the waters of the Jordan were suddenly dammed by a landslip might perhaps point to the present appearance of the banks at this point and the curious bends of the river here to support their idea. M. Clermont-Ganneau has brought to notice that the historical stoppage of the Jordan in A.D. 1257, while the bridge Jisr Damieh was being repaired, is to be found in the history of Sultan Bibars. A landslip in the narrow part of the valley, some miles above Jisr Damieh, kept the Jordan dammed up for several hours, allowing the bed of the river to become dry by the water below running off to the Salt Sea. Stanley (Sin. and Pal. 304 n. 6) mentions that the appearance of the drying up of the Jordan seems to be described by Antoninus Martyr in the 6th cent., as if it occurred yearly at the visit of the pilgrims. See also King, Morsels of Criticism, i. 281.

The Mounds in the Jordan Valley.—All over the Jordan Valley mounds or 'Tells' are found, of artificial formation, from 50 to 100 ft. in height. They stand at the entrance to every wâdy where there is a passage for traffic, and appear in these cases to have been placed there to guard the dwellers in the plain from marauders from the hill-country. They appear usually to be formed of remains of sun-dried bricks, probably in some cases the ruins of ancient walls and castles, and in other cases the sites where the bricks were moulded and dried. Near Beisan alone there are 20 of these tells, apparently of the same character as those at Jericho. They usually occur in the vicinity of water.

The mounds of Jericho were examined by the present writer in Feb. 1868. Nine mounds were cut through—two at Wâdy Kelt, three at 'Ain es-Sultân, and four within a short distance of the spring head. The trenches were cut across from east to west to get shelter from the sun as much as possible. During the daytime the sun was scorching, at night it was bitterly cold. After the trenches were cut 8 ft. deep, the work was continued by shafts 8 ft. square at intervals of 4 to 6 ft., as the clay composing the mounds would not stand the cutting of one deep trench. Very little was found except pottery jars, and stone mortars for grinding corn. The general result was that the mounds were artificial, of sunburnt brick in a very friable condition, abounding in fragments of pottery. A few solid-looking jars were found (now in the PEF Museum). The pottery in the upper portion of these mounds was Roman and later (SWP iii. 225).

Scene of our Lord's Baptism.—When John the Baptist was preaching in the wilderness of Judæa, 'Then went out to him Jerusalem and all Judæa, and all the region round about Jordan, and were baptized of him in the river Jordan. Then cometh Jesus from Galilee to Jordan unto John to be baptized of him.' 'These things were done in Bethabara (RV Bethany, in some MSS Betharabah *), beyond Jordan, where John was baptizing' (Jn 1^{28}). 'Then was Jesus led up of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil' (Mt 4^{1}). 'And straightway the Spirit driveth him forth into the wilderness' (Mk 1^{12}).

There is not sufficient information here to fix the position on the Jordan of the scene of the baptism, but it leads to the inference that it was on the east side of the Jordan opposite to the desert of Judæa, and not so far north as Samaria. This place, Bethabara [which see] (or Bethany), beyond Jordan, was again visited by our Lord, and He abode there (Jn 10^{40}). The word 'ăbārāh occurs in the OT in connexion with the Jordan. In 2 S 19^{18} EV tr. it 'ferry-boat' (Gesenius 'a ferry-boat' or 'raft'); 2 S 15^{28} 17^{16} AV reading (ערבת) 'in the plains,' RV reading (עברת) 'at the fords,' Ewald, Gesenius, Grätz, 'at the fords'; Jg 7^{24} Beth-barah, 'house of passage,' (?) Gesenius. There are also three cases in which the word ma'bārāh ('a ford'; Gesenius, from the root 'ābar, 'to pass over') is tr^{d} 'the fords' (of the Jordan), Jg 3^{28} 12^{5}, Jos 2^{7}. The inference is that Beth-abarah is the resting-place on the other side.

Stanley (Sin. and Pal. p. 311) gives 'the house of a ship' (אֲנִיָּה) as the meaning of Bethania (Bethany); the meaning given by Simonis is preferred by many, viz. בֵּית עֲנִיָּה, locus depressionis, which seems to agree exactly with the conditions, a depressed plain beyond the fords of Jordan. The other word is Beth-arabah (the name of a town west of Jordan, Jos 15^{6} etc.). The Arabah, however, is the term used for the desert plain of the Jordan, extending from near Jericho to the Gulf of 'Akabah (Gesen.) and Arabah = desert. Conder proposes (PEFSt, 1876–77) to identify Bethania (Bethany) with Batanea or Bashan, and the ford of the Jordan east of Beisan called 'Abâra with Bethabara, or at least with the place of baptism, and points out that among the fifty fords of the Jordan this is the only one retaining the ancient name.

This ford of 'Abara is north of the Samaritan border, about 16 miles south of Lake Tiberias and a day's journey from Nazareth, and 22 miles from Kefr Kena (Cana). It does not, however, fulfil the conditions of being near to the wilderness of Judæa, and so placed as to be accessible to the multitudes from Jerusalem and the parts about Judæa.

The line of route taken by king David in his passage from Jerusalem across Jordan to Mahanaim and back does not give much assistance, but is certainly against the 'Arabah ford site. It appears probable, however, that he would pass over Jordan, when in flight, by the very nearest ford, viz. that over against Jericho, either the Makhadet Hajlah or the Ghôranîyeh; in coming back he may have used any crossing most convenient, and thus have had recourse to the ferry-boat. There appears therefore to be nothing against the traditional site of our Lord's place of baptism being placed on the Jordan near Kasr el-Jehûd, and not far from the 'Ain el-Kharrar on the eastern side of the Jordan, as has been current since 4th cent. Beth-nimrah ('house of the panther'?), Nu 32^{36}, identified as Nimrîn, lies about 8 miles to the east of the Ghôranîyeh ford, and is supposed by some to be the site of Bethabara: in the LXX (B) it takes the form Βαιθαναβρά, and Eusebius calls it Βηθναμβρίς; he also speaks of a town called Nabara (or Abara) as identical with Nimrah near Heshbon. Epiphanius reads Bethamara for Bethabara (Rel. Pal. p. 627). The Bordeaux Pilgrim (A.D. 333) places it east of Jordan, 5 miles north of the Salt Sea, close to the hill where Elijah was caught up to heaven (Itin. Hieros.). Jerome (Per. S. Paulæ) identifies the place of baptism with the spot where the priests that bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord stood firm on dry ground in the midst of Jordan (Jos 3^{17}), and also the spot where Elijah and afterwards Elisha smote the waters and passed over dry-shod. The following also speak of the place of baptism at this spot: Theodosius, Antoninus, and Arculf.

In later years the knights of St. John built a monastery here in order to enable them to carry out one of their threefold duties, viz. escorting pilgrims down from Jerusalem to Jordan. This duty is still carried out once a year by the Turkish governor of Jerusalem, who, on Monday in Passion week, escorts thousands of pilgrims to the Jordan to bathe.

Ancient Writers on the Jordan Valley.—The Antiquities and Wars of Josephus are full of references to this valley. (Ant. I. x. 1 and I. xi. 1) The spring of Jordan called Dan is spoken of, and the destruction of the cities of the Plain. (Ant. IV. viii. 1) Moses gathered the congregation together near Jordan where the city Abila now stands, a place full of palm trees. (Ant. V. i. 1) Abila to Jordan 60 furlongs. (Ant. V. i. 2) Joshua was in fear about their passing over, for the Jordan ran with a strong current, and could not be passed over by bridges, as there never had been any bridges laid over it hitherto, and ferry-boats they had none. (V. iv. 3) The Israelites seize the ford of the Jordan (Jg 3^{28}). (VII. xi. 2) A bridge of boats laid over Jordan to enable king David to return from Mahanaim to Jerusalem. (IX. ii. 2) Elijah disappeared from among men, and no one knows of his death to this very day. (Ant. XV. x. 3, V. v. 1, III. x. 7; BJ IV. i. 1, I. xxi. 3) The Jordan's sources at Dan and Panium described. The lake Semechonitis (Hûleh) is 30 furlongs in breadth and 60 in length; its marshes reach as far as the plain Daphne, under the temple of the golden calf at the lesser Jordan. Jordan's stream from Panium divides the marshes and fens of the lake Semechonitis; when it has run another 120 furlongs it first passes the city Julias, and then passes through the middle of the Lake Gennesaret, after which it runs a long way over a desert, and then makes its exit into the lake Asphaltitis. Around Gennesaret the soil is so fruitful that all sorts of trees are grown upon it, particularly walnuts; also palm trees, fig trees, and olives; it supplies men with figs and grapes 10 months in the year. Some have thought it to be a vein of the Nile, because it produces the coracine fish as well as that lake does which is near Alexandria. (BJ IV. viii. 2. 3. 4, V. xiii. 6) The Jordan and Jericho are described. Jericho is situated on a plain, with naked and barren mountains overhanging it; these mountains extend from Scythopolis in the north to Sodom in the south at the utmost limits of the Salt Sea. Somorrhon is also spoken of, the Great Plain, the Salt Sea, and the plantations of palm trees near the Jordan. He speaks of the fountain of Jericho being healed by Elisha; and also of the excellent gardens of Jericho, 70 furlongs long and 20 broad, abounding in palm trees, yielding honey and bees, the balsamum, that most precious of all fruits, the cypress tree, and myrobalanum. He states that it is not easy to light on any country in the world equal to it. The lake Asphaltitis is also described. (BJ IV. viii. 4) He describes the aqueduct from Nerea to water the palm trees of Jericho.

Strabo (XVI. ii. 16, c. A.D. 19) gives a short account of the Jordan and Jericho. Cœle-Syria, a hollow plain between the mountains of Libanus and Antilibanus. Rivers run through it, the largest of which is the Jordan, which waters a country productive and fertile of all things. It contains also a lake, which produces the aromatic rush and reed. In it are also marshes. The name of the lake is Gennesaritis. It produces also balsamum. The Lycus and the Jordan are navigated upwards chiefly by the Aradii, with vessels of burden. At Jericho is the palm plantation, which contains various other trees of the cultivated kind producing excellent fruit, but its chief production is the palm tree; it is 100 stadia in length; the whole is watered with streams, and filled with dwellings. Here also is a palace and the garden of the balsamum. Strabo has not only given a confused account of the Jordan, but he has mixed up together the account of the Salt Sea with that of the Lacus Serbonis, and he places Tarichæa on the Salt Sea instead of on L. Tiberias.

Tacitus (Hist. V. 6, A.D. 97) sums up the Jordan in a few words: 'Nec Jordanes pelago accipitur: secundum atque alterum lacum integer perfluit: tertio retinetur.'

Galen (A.D. 164) and Pausanias (V. vii. 4, A.D. 174) speak of the disappearance of the Jordan in the bitter lake.

Pliny (Hist. Nat. V. 15, A.D. 74) speaks of the rise of Jordan at Panium fountain, 'qui nomen dedit Cæsareæ.'

Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s.v. 'Dan') describe Dan as being 4 R. miles distant from Paneas on the way to Tyre; and here, too, they say the Jordan breaks forth.

The Targum of Jerusalem writes, 'Dan of Cæsarea' (Targ. Hieros., Gn 14^{14}).

The name of the Salt Sea adopted by Josephus (Ant. I. ix.), viz. Asphaltitis Lacus, is first found in Diodorus Siculus (ii. 48, B.C. 45). He gives an account of the neighbourhood: 'It is, however, well fitted for the cultivation of palms wherever it is traversed by serviceable rivers or fountains available for the purpose of irrigation. In a neighbouring valley grows the plant called balsam, which yields an abundant income, as the plant grows in no other part of the world. It is much used by physicians as a medicine.'

Justin (XXXVI. iii. 6) and Pausanias (V. vii. 4) call it θάλασσα ἡ νεκρά, 'the Dead Sea.'

'As the Jordan in the time of harvest' (Sir 24^{26}; Aristeas, Epist. ad Philocratem).

Josephus, BJ IV. vii. 6, speaks of Ἄβιλα, Ἰουλιάς (Julias), Βησιμώ, near the lake Asphaltitis.

In the LXX (B) of Jos 13^{27} the name Beth-nimrah is given as Βαιθαναβρά, and the LXX (A) of Jos 13^{20} gives Βηδιμούθ for Beth-jesimoth.

JOSEPH (יוֹסֵף, in Ps 81^{6} יְהוֹסֵף 'May [God] add'; cf. Gn 30^{24}).*—The second youngest son of the patriarch Jacob, Rachel's firstborn, and ancestor of the two northern tribes Manasseh and Ephraim.

Sources.—The history of Joseph is contained in Gn 30^{23} (E), ^{24} (J); and in Gn 37. 39–50. In these chapters the body of the narrative is derived from J and E, the parts which belong to P being only 37^{1-2a} 41^{46} 46^{6-27} $47^{5-6a.\ 7-11.\ 27b-28}$ 48^{3-6} $49^{1a.\ 28b-33}$ 50^{12-13}.

The structure of JE, in the parts where the distinction of sources is most important, will appear most clearly from the following table:—

 Except 45^{24b} 'whom ye sold unto Egypt,' ^{5} 'that ye sold me hither,' 10^{a} 'and thou shalt dwell in the land of Goshen,' with perhaps one or two unimportant clauses elsewhere.

†† From 'in the land of Goshen.'

* In 30^{23}, from another source (E), a different etymology is given, as though the word were connected with אָסַף to take away.

For the grounds of this analysis, reference must be made to the Comms., or, more briefly, to LOT p. 16 f. (^{6}17 ff.). The history of Joseph must have been told at length in J and E alike, in substantially the same form in both, but with occasional variations in details; and the method mostly followed by the compiler, esp. in chs. 39–47, has been to excerpt long passages from J and E alternately, and at the same time to incorporate in each short notices embodying the characteristic differences of the other. It may assist the reader to place here a synopsis of the principal differences between the two narratives. According to J, Joseph, when his brethren plot to kill him, is rescued by Judah, and then sold by his brethren to Ishmaelites, who in their turn sell him to an Egyptian of position, whose name is not given: after the charge brought against him by his master's wife, he is thrown into the state-prison; and the keeper of this makes him overseer of the other prisoners. In the sequel, the brethren only tell Joseph about their younger brother in answer to his inquiry (43^{7} 44^{19}); nothing is said about Simeon being detained as a hostage in Egypt; the brethren open their sacks and discover the money in them, at the lodging-place by the way; Judah offers to be surety to his father for Benjamin's return; and Goshen is named as the district allotted to Jacob and his sons. According to E, Joseph is rescued from his other brethren by Reuben, and thrown into a pit, from which he is drawn up by Midianites without his brothers' knowledge: he is sold by them to Potiphar, captain of the guard, who appoints him to wait on the prisoners confined in his house: the brethren, when taxed with being spies, volunteer the information about their younger brother ($42^{13.\ 32}$); Simeon is left in Egypt as a hostage; the brethren open their sacks at the end of their journey home; Reuben offers to be surety for Benjamin's return; and there is no mention of Goshen.* Thus, while both versions bring Joseph into relation with a prison, he is a prisoner himself only in J; in E he is merely appointed to wait on the prisoners: further, while in J the keeper of the prison (who is distinct from Joseph's master, $39^{20.\ 21}$) commits the other prisoners into his charge, in E his own master, the 'captain of the guard' (37^{36} $40^{3a.\ 4}$), appoints him to wait upon the prisoners. In the existing (composite) narrative the two versions are harmonized (though imperfectly) by Potiphar being represented as both Joseph's master and also 'captain of the guard.'

After the account of his birth ($30^{23f.}$), the next notice of Joseph's life which occurs is when he has grown into a lad, and (according to P) is 17 years old (37^{2a}). His father's favourite,† he excites the envy of his elder brothers, which is increased by his imprudence in communicating to them the dreams,—both too manifestly suggestive of future greatness (37^{3-11}),—of his brethren's sheaves bowing down to his, and of the sun, moon, and eleven stars making obeisance to him. Shortly afterwards, his brethren are keeping their father's flocks at Shechem; and Joseph is sent by his father from the broad 'vale,' in which Hebron lay (37^{14}; cf. 35^{27}), to inquire after their welfare. He finds them at Dothan (2 K 6^{13}), now Tell Dothan, about 15 miles N. of Shechem, where the pasturage is still even richer than it is at Shechem (Robinson, BR iii. 122). As they see him approaching in the distance, they plan to kill him, and so to frustrate for ever the, to them, unwelcome future portended by his dreams. At this point ($37^{21ff.}$) the composition of the narrative becomes apparent, and there are two divergent accounts of the manner in which Joseph was rescued from their hands, and came to be sold into Egypt.‡ According to J, Judah dissuades his other brethren from carrying out their purpose, and induces them to sell Joseph to a caravan of Ishmaelites, who happened at the time to be passing by, on their way from Gilead to Egypt;§ and the Ishmaelites, upon their arrival in Egypt, sell him

* This last distinction agrees with that which appears in Exodus, where similarly it is only J who describes the Israelites as living apart in Goshen (8^{22} 9^{26}).

† The כְּתֹנֶת פַּסִּים (also 2 S $13^{18f.}$, as worn by princesses), the 'coat of many colours' of AV (so LXX χιτὼν καρπωτός, Vulg. polymita), was more probably (Pesh. Aq. Symm.; also LXX Vulg. in 2 S [χιτὼν καρπωτός; tunica talaris]) a tunic having sleeves for the arms, and reaching to the feet (cf. RVm), lit. (if the Aram. sense of פַּס may be adopted, for the word does not occur otherwise in the Heb. of the OT) a tunic of palms (of the hands) and soles (of the feet),—the tunic ordinarily worn having no sleeves, and reaching only to the knees.

‡ See, above, the parts which belong to the two narratives.

§ Dothan, it is to be observed, lies upon the caravan-route leading from Beth-shean and Jezreel to Ramleh and Egypt (Rob. l.c.); it was thus a natural spot for the Ishmaelite dealers, travelling from Gilead, to pass.

as a slave to an Egyptian of rank. According to E, Reuben,* Joseph's eldest brother, dissuades the others from carrying out their plan; at his suggestion they cast Joseph into a pit, and Midianite merchantmen, passing by,† draw him up out of the pit, without his brothers' knowledge, and sell him into Egypt to Potiphar, the 'captain of the guard.'‡ Reuben upon returning, after the meal (v.[25a]), to the pit, in the hope, no doubt, of being able now to send Joseph home secretly, is disconsolate to find it empty. His father's grief, upon receiving the blood-stained coat, which his brethren bring to him, as evidence of Joseph's death, is graphically portrayed (vv.[32-35] J).

How Joseph meanwhile fared in Egypt is recounted by J in ch. 39, and by E in ch. 40 (in each case, with the exceptions noted above). The Egyptian, to whom the Ishmaelites sold him,§ finding him to be quick and trustworthy, appoints him 'over his house,'—i.e. makes him superintendent of his establishment, or his major domo,—and intrusts to him the whole of his domestic arrangements, so that 'with him—i.e. beside him—he knew not ought, save the bread that he did eat,' which, on account of religious scruples, would not in Egypt be naturally intrusted to the care of a foreigner (cf. 43[32b]). Under Joseph's administration, everything prospered in his master's house; and the blessing of heaven rested visibly upon it (39[1-6]). But Joseph was 'comely and well-favoured,' and attracted the notice of his master's wife: she makes advances to him, which he rejects, saying nobly that he will neither betray the trust which his master reposes in him, nor sin against God. The advances are repeated, but still meet with no response. In the end, enraged at what she considers as a slight received at Joseph's hands, she brings a false accusation against him before her husband; and he is cast into the state-prison.‖ There, however, J″ is still with him: he wins the favour of the keeper of the prison, who finds he can place in him implicit confidence, and even commits the other prisoners to his charge (39[7-23]).

Shortly afterwards (ch. 40 E), two of the Pharaoh's officers, the chief of his cupbearers, or butlers, and the chief of his bakers, offended the king, and they were placed in custody¶ in the house of the 'captain of the guard,'—i.e. Potiphar, who, according to 37[36] (also E), had bought Joseph of the Midianites. Joseph is appointed to wait upon them (40[4]); and, coming in to them one morning, he hears from them about their two dreams. Unable to interpret them themselves, they recount them to him; and he interprets them correctly. Three days after, on the Pharaoh's birthday, the chief butler, as Joseph foretold, is restored to his office, and the chief baker is hung (40[5-23]).

Ch. 41 (with the exceptions noted, E) tells the story of Joseph's elevation in Egypt. After two years, during which time his position remained unaltered (the chief butler having forgotten his promise to mention him to the king), the Pharaoh had his two dreams, of the fat and lean kine, and of the full and withered ears; and much significance being attached in Egypt to dreams, he was disturbed to find no one able to interpret them. The chief butler, reminded by the occurrence of Joseph's skill in his own case, mentions him to the Pharaoh. He is sent for; and, being brought before the king,* declares to him what his dreams signify, viz. seven years of plenty, to be succeeded immediately by seven years of famine: in view of the future, he further suggests the practical measure of making provision for the years of famine by storing up in advance a fifth of the produce of each of the years of plenty. The Pharaoh, impressed by his sagacity, and recognizing it as of God (41[38f.]), forthwith invests him with authority over the entire land of Egypt, for the purpose of giving effect to this proposal, and confers upon him other signal marks of the royal favour (41[40-44]): he further, as a mark of his admittance into the Egyptian bureaucracy, bestows upon him an Egyptian name, Zaphnath-pa'anea'h, and marries him to Asenath, a daughter of Potiphera, priest of the great national temple of the sun (Ra), at On (Heliopolis, 7 miles N.E. of the modern Cairo). A notice from P (41[46]) states that Joseph, at the time of his elevation, was 30 years of age. During the 7 years of plenty, Joseph amassed corn in the granaries of every city from the surrounding district: in the 5th of these years, we are told, Asenath bore him two sons, who were named, respectively, Manasseh in allusion to his forgetting now his past troubles, and Ephraim on account of his fruitfulness in the land of his affliction. When the years of famine began, the Egyptians all came to Joseph to buy corn (41[54-56]).

Famines in Egypt are due commonly to the failure of the annual inundation of the Nile. The famine in which Joseph is concerned is stated, however, to have extended to all the earth (41[57]); and this circumstance is the fact upon which the entire sequel of the story hinges. 42[1-37] (E, except vv.[27. 28]) tells how, as the famine became severe in Canaan, Jacob sends all his sons except Benjamin to buy corn in Egypt. Introduced into Joseph's presence, they prostrate themselves before him (cf. the dreams, 37[7-9]), but do not recognize him: during the years of separation† he has grown from a youth into a man, and his Egyptian dress and shaven face further disguise him. He receives them roughly, and accuses them of being spies, sent to discover the 'nakedness of the land.' The charge throws them off their guard; and they seek to disarm his suspicions by volunteering information ‡ about their family, of which Joseph at once takes advantage: desirous, namely, of ascertaining the truth about Benjamin, he insists that one shall be left bound in Egypt, while the others go home, and bring back their youngest brother with

* At least, if (as most critics suppose) 'Judah' stood originally in v.[21] (J) for 'Reuben' (as the text stands, v.[21b] and v.[22a] are tautologous). But even if that be not the case, we have 'Reuben' in vv.[22. 29] (E), and 'Judah' in v.[26] (J).

† In v.[28] the absence of the art. before 'Midianites' shows that the reference cannot be to 'the Ishmaelites,' mentioned specifically in v.[27].

‡ Properly, 'captain (or superintendent, chief) of the slaughterers' (of animals [not 'executioners']), a Heb. title, though always, as it happens, applied to foreigners (elsewhere only, with רַב for שַׂר, of Neb.'s 'captain of the guard' Jer 39[9ff.] 41[10] 43[6] 52[12ff.], 2 K 25[8ff.], and Dn 2[14]). The royal butchers came in some way to form the royal bodyguard; cf. W. R. Smith, OTJC[2] 262 f. LXX ἀρχιμαγειρος,—in itself a perfectly possible rendering (see 1 S 9[23. 24]), but not probable in view of Jer 39, etc.

§ Identified in the existing text with Potiphar (37[36]) by the harmonizing insertion in 39[1b].

‖ The expression is a peculiar one (not the ordinary Heb. term for 'prison'), and is found only here (39[20-23]) and 40[3. 5]. Understood as two Heb. words, it might mean 'house of roundness,' i.e. a circular tower, such as might be used as a prison; but sōhar is perhaps the Hebraized form of an Egyp. word [cf. Ebers, Aeg. u. die Bb. Mos. 318 f.: the very special character of the suhan at Thebes (see Maspero, Struggle, 271 n. 5) is an objection to Sayce's view (EHH 87) that it may be this word].

¶ According to the insertions in vv.[3b. 5b. 15b] (J), in the state-prison, where Joseph was bound. In vv.[14b-15a], according to E, Joseph prays to be released, not from imprisonment, but only from servitude in a foreign land, after having been 'stolen away' from his native country (in agreement with E's representation in 37[28a. c]).

 Cf. 41[12] (also E). In 39[22] (J) Joseph is made overseer of the other prisoners; and he receives this appointment, not from his master (as here), but from the keeper of the state-prison.

them. Their conscience, the narrator remarks, smites them: they recognize in their misfortunes a nemesis for their treatment of Joseph; and Reuben—who regularly takes the lead in E—reminds them how he had sought to divert them from their purpose. Joseph understood all the time what they were saying, and was much moved by it: he adheres, however, to his terms, and retains as hostage, not indeed Reuben, his former protector, but the next eldest of his brethren, Simeon. Having secretly given orders for each man's money to be restored into his sack, and having given them provision for the way, he lets the others go, and they return to Canaan. Arrived there, they report to their father what had befallen them: the surprising discovery of the money in their sacks * adds to their and his anxiety; and he bitterly reproaches them for their inconsiderate treatment of him. Reuben steps forward, and offers his two sons as surety for the safe return of Benjamin from Egypt.

The narrative is now continued by a long extract from J (42^{38}–44^{34}, with the exceptions noted). The famine continuing in Canaan, Jacob is obliged a second time to send to Egypt for corn: he is reluctant at first to let Benjamin go as well: but after the representations of Judah,—who takes the lead in J (cf. $37^{26f.}$), as Reuben does in E,—and his offer to be surety for his safe return (cf. the similar offer of Reuben in E, 42^{37}), he consents, sending at the same time a present, to conciliate, if possible, the favour of the great Egyptian governor. Joseph, seeing Benjamin with his other brothers, and perceiving thus that they have spoken the truth, prepares to show them friendliness, and invites them to a feast in his house. E mentions at this point that Simeon was released to them. They make ready their present for Joseph; and as he comes in, a second time (cf. 42^{6b}) fulfil unconsciously his dreams ($37^{7.9}$): he inquires tenderly for his father, and expresses his satisfaction at seeing Benjamin. At the feast, they are surprised to find themselves seated according to their ages, and Benjamin honoured with a 'mess,'—or honorary portion (cf. 2 S 11^{8}),—five times as large as any of theirs.

The dénoûment now approaches. The brethren depart, with their sacks filled with corn, Joseph having privately given orders for his divining-cup to be hidden in Benjamin's sack. Before they can have gone far, he sends messengers after them, who overtake them, and tax them with the theft. Their consciences are clear; and they voluntarily offer the offender to justice. Dismay and despair seize them, when the cup is found in Benjamin's sack. With affected indignation, Joseph reproaches them with what they have done: Judah, in reply, speaking on behalf of them all, attempts no excuse; for no excuse seems to be possible: a just retribution has overtaken them (cf. 42^{21}); they will all remain bondmen in Egypt. But Joseph presses his advantage home: he will only retain Benjamin. Judah now steps forward, and in a speech of striking beauty, remarkable not less for grace and persuasive eloquence than for frankness and generosity, intercedes on Benjamin's behalf: explaining how all had happened from the beginning, he entreats Joseph to have compassion on the feelings of an aged father, and to allow him to remain as bondman himself in his brother's stead (44^{18-34}). Overcome by the pathos of Judah's appeal, and convinced at last of his brethren's altered mind, Joseph discloses himself to them (ch. 45 E*). His first inquiry is for his father. For a while they can give no answer for amazement; but he reassures them, and allays their fears: in what they have done, they have been, after all, the unconscious instruments of Providence, for 'God did send me before you to preserve life' ($45^{5.7.8}$). And he sends an affectionate message to his father, to come and settle in Egypt, and be supported by him there.

Upon Jacob's arrival in Egypt, Joseph hastens to meet his father in Goshen (46^{28-30} J). He presents five of his brethren to the Pharaoh, who upon learning from them that they are shepherds, agrees to grant them an abode in GOSHEN (wh. see), a pastoral district about Saft el-Henneh, some 40 miles N.E. of Cairo (46^{31}–$47^{4.6b}$ J; cf. 47^{5-6a} P).† (According to P (47^{7-11}) Jacob himself is introduced by Joseph to the Pharaoh; and Joseph assigns him, at the Pharaoh's command, an abode in the 'land of Rameses,'—probably a name for the E. part of the Delta, which Ramses II., the Pharaoh of the oppression, beautified by many new buildings, and often made his residence.) ‡

There follows a paragraph (47^{13-26} J), describing a permanent change in the Egyptian system of land-tenure, which was attributed to Joseph. The famine continuing in Egypt, the people first gave away all their money for corn, then they gave away their cattle, finally they offered themselves and their land. The result was that all the land in Egypt, except that of the priests (who received a fixed revenue in kind from the crown, and thus had no occasion to sell their possessions for food), became the property of the Pharaoh, the previous owners becoming tenants of the king, paying him, as it were, an annual rent of $\frac{1}{5}$ of the produce.

According to P (47^{27b-28}) Jacob lived with Joseph in Egypt 17 years. As the time drew near for him to die, Joseph hearing of his sickness, brought in his two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim to see him. Upon hearing that they were there, the aged patriarch blessed them, giving Ephraim, the younger, against their father's desire, the first place, in view of the future greatness of the tribe descended from him (vv.$^{1-2.8-20}$ JE), at the same time (vv.$^{21.22}$ E) conferring upon Joseph, as a special gift, 'one shoulder—or mountain-slope—above his brethren' (with allusion to Shechem; see JACOB, p. 532). A parallel text of P (48^{3-7}) describes Jacob's adoption of his two grandsons, in virtue of which he places each on the same level with his own sons.

After Jacob's death, Joseph, as was natural, made suitable provision for his burial ($50^{1-11.14}$ JE, probably J; $50^{12.13}$ P). His brethren fear now that he will exact retribution for their past treatment of him, and send accordingly to crave his forgiveness. He replies generously that he is not in God's place, viz. to exact vengeance for actions which, however intended, have been overruled by God's providence for good ('to save much people alive'), and that he will continue to make provision for their nourishment and welfare (50^{15-21} E).§ He lived, we read, to the age of 110, surviving even the birth of his great-grandchildren.‖ Before

* In J (see 43^{21}) this discovery is made at the lodging-place by the way; and $42^{27.28}$ is an extract from J's account of it (notice האחר 'the one,' implying others to follow, not אחר. Observe also that the unusual word אמתחת sack, occurring 13 times in ch. 43–44 (J), occurs also twice in $42^{27.28}$, and not elsewhere in the OT).

† The sequence in $47^{5.6}$ is much better in LXX than in the Heb. text.

‡ The expression is thus proleptic, even if it be not actually an anachronism.

§ The terms of v.^{21a} (cf. 47^{12}), and the expression, 'as it is this day,' in v.^{20}, seem to show that the writer pictured the famine as still continuing (cf. 45^{11}). E must have placed Jacob's death earlier than P (47^{28}).

‖ V.^{23} 'the sons of Machir, son of Manasseh,' are specified, on account of the importance attaching later to the corresponding clans of the tribe of Manasseh, on the E. of Jordan (see his death he expressed his assurance that God would ultimately bring up the children of Israel out of Egypt, and gave solemn directions for his bones to be brought up with them (50[22-26] E). The fulfilment of this injunction is described in Ex 13[19], Jos 24[32] (both E); in the latter place it is added that Joseph's bones were buried finally in Shechem, in the plot of ground bought there by Jacob (Gn 33[19]) in the centre of the territory owned by his descendants, the 'children of Ephraim.'

The character of Joseph is one that is singularly amiable and free from faults. He is the true son, the true brother, the true servant. Loyal and faithful, disinterested and sincere, modest and considerate, he wins the esteem of all right-minded persons with whom he has to do. He is obedient to duty in whatever position he finds himself—whether feeding his father's sheep, or attending to his master's house, or acting for the keeper of the prison, or invested by Pharaoh with authority over Egypt. 'J" was with him' is the significant phrase by which the narrator indicates the Divine approval of his conduct (39[2. 3. 21. 23]). In misfortune he is resigned, and does not complain. He resists temptation. In his elevation he neither presumes upon his position nor forgets his humbler relations: in spite of their cruel treatment of him, he bears his brethren no grudge; even after his father's death he is as generous and magnanimous as before (50[17-21]). He has deep and true affection: his younger brother and his father are ever foremost in his thoughts.* His attitude towards his other brethren, and the humiliation which he imposes on them, are, of course, dictated by the desire to prove them, and bring them to acknowledge their sin; as soon as they have done this (cf. 42[21. 22] 44[16]), and he is satisfied that they are treating his father and Benjamin with genuine affection, he discloses himself, excuses them for what they had done (45[5-8]), and, to assure them of his forgiveness and goodwill, makes provision for their residence near himself in Egypt. He has a lively sense of dependence upon God and of his duty towards Him (39[9] 41[16] 50[24]). He is conscious that he is in God's hands, who overrules evil that good may come, and effects His purposes even though it may be without the knowledge and against the wishes of the actual agents (50[20], cf. 45[5. 7. 8]). As a righteous man, persecuted and sold by his brethren, wrongfully accused and humiliated, but afterwards exalted, and using his position for the good of others, submissive, forgiving, and tender-hearted, it is not surprising that he should often have been regarded as a type of Christ. Only the measures adopted by Joseph for the relief of the famine might be thought to strike a discordant note in his character. To appropriate the surplus produce of the seven years of plenty, and then to compel the Egyptians to buy back, even to their own impoverishment, what they had themselves previously given up, does not seem consistent with our ideas of justice and equity. It must, however, be remembered, that, in this respect, Joseph was not, and could not be expected to be, in advance of the public morality of his age. The economic conditions of Egypt are, and always have been, peculiar. The fertility of the soil is dependent upon a system of irrigation, which can only be kept in proper order by the central government; and the cultivator falls into a state of dependency and indebtedness to it at the same time. Moreover, the Egyptian fellaḥ lacks inherently the spirit of independence, and, even to the present day, is content to enrich others by his labour rather than himself. Of course such considerations as these do not justify in the abstract the oppressions to which Egypt has habitually been exposed at the hands of Oriental viceroys and pashas; but they tend to show that Joseph did not do more than was consistent with the condition of the country, with the age in which he lived, and with the position in which he found himself placed at the time.* Nevertheless, as Delitzsch observes, the remark of Niebuhr remains true: 'the history of Joseph is a dangerous precedent for designing ministers.'

Joseph was the reputed ancestor of the two tribes Manasseh and Ephraim, the latter being the most powerful and important in Northern Israel. In the blessings of Jacob (Gn 49[22-26]) and Moses (Dt 33[13-16]), 'Joseph' manifestly represents these two tribes, though no doubt in each the poet is thinking more particularly of Ephraim; in each he descants upon the blessings of soil and climate, of populousness and military strength, enjoyed by the tribe; and in each Joseph bears the title נְזִיר אֶחָיו 'the separate (or crowned) one of his brethren,' i.e. the tribe distinguished from the others by the possession, in a pre-eminent degree, of such distinctions as wealth, and influence, and political and military power. The terms of these blessings, and the enthusiasm which in each the poet displays for 'Joseph,' show that both spring from the period during which Ephraim was the leading tribe in Israel.† The two tribes are also grouped together elsewhere under the same common designation: not only in the expression 'children of Joseph,' Jos 16[1] 17[14. 16] (J), Nu 1[10. 12], Jos 14[4] 18[11] al. (P), but also in 'house of Joseph,' Jos 17[17] 18[5], Jg 1[22.‡ 23.‡ 25] 2 S 19[20]‡ 1 K 11[28], and (like Ephraim in Hos) à potiori of Northern Israel generally, Am 5[6], Ob [18] (‖ 'house of Jacob'), Zec 10[6], and in 'Joseph' alone (sometimes representing N. Israel generally), Dt 27[12] 33[13. 16], Am 5[15] 6[6], Ezk 37[16. 19] 47[13] 48[32], Ps 77[17] ('the sons of Jacob and Joseph') 78[67] 80[1] (‖ 'Israel'), 81[5].

Date of Joseph.—The period of Egyptian history at which the events of Joseph's life are to be placed, cannot be determined except inferentially. As in the Book of Exodus, the name of the Pharaoh is not mentioned; and in view of the general fixity of Egyptian institutions, the allusions to Egyptian manners and customs, as Dillm. remarks, are not sufficiently distinctive to constitute a clue to the age in which he lived.§ The biblical dates, both of the Exodus and of the patriarchal age (which is dependent upon it, Ex 12[41]), are too uncertain to form a secure basis for further chronological calculations (see CHRONOLOGY, vol. i. p. 398). There are, however, strong reasons for supposing Ramses II. of the 19th dynasty (B.C. 1275–1208, Petrie) to be the Pharaoh of the oppression (Ex 1[8ff.]); and arguing back from this datum, it is probable that Joseph's MACHIR and MANASSEH). 'Born upon Joseph's knees,' i.e. recognized by him as his descendants; cf. 30[3], Odyss. xix. 401.

* Gn 41[51] end is naturally not to be taken au pied de la lettre. It is an old difficulty that Joseph did not, immediately after his elevation, take steps to inform his father of his welfare; but perhaps separations of this kind were taken in those days more as a matter of course than they would be by us; and certainly, if Joseph had done this, both the interest and the moral of the narrative would have been greatly impaired.

† In 2 S 19[43] (44) LXX (בְּכוֹר for גְּבוֹר), 'I am also the firstborn more than thou,' the men of Israel claim the birthright—no doubt on account of the prestige enjoyed by Ephraim; cf. 1 Ch 5[1. 2]: Ew. i. 422.

§ Sayce's statement (EHH 90, cf. 83), that the Egypt which the narrative brings before us is that of the Hyksos age, is not warranted by the facts: not one of the illustrations quoted by him is distinctive of the Hyksos age, and the great majority are not drawn from that period at all.

elevation in Egypt is to be placed under one of the later Hyksos kings.* The Hyksos (i.e. Hykshasu, 'prince of the Shasu,' or 'spoilers,' i.e. desert-hordes, or Bedawis) were a race of Asiatic invaders, who (according to Manetho) held possession of Egypt for 511 years (B.C. 2098–1587, Petrie), at first devastating and destroying, but afterwards settling down, and assimilating much of the culture of the conquered Egyptians (cf. vol. i. p. 659 f.; Maspero, Struggle of Nations, 50 ff., 72 ff.). Zoan (Tanis), in the N.E. of the Delta,† (as excavations have shown) was one of their chief cities. George the Syncellus speaks of a general consensus of chronographers to the effect that the Pharaoh of Joseph was Aphophis,‡ i.e. Apepa (II.), the last important Hyksos king.§ As it happens, if we place the Exodus at about B.C. 1204 (Petrie), this would agree with the date given in Ex 12^{41} (1204 + 430 = 1634 B.C.).

Historical Character of Joseph.—Taken in the abstract, it cannot be said that there are serious historical improbabilities in the substance of Joseph's biography. Certainly the narrative contains many dramatic situations. Both Joseph and his brethren pass through a series of crises and adventures, any one of which might readily have closed the drama, though all, in fact, lead on happily to the final dénoûment. Truth is, however, proverbially stranger than fiction. There have been many remarkable biographies in history, and we must beware of making probability too absolutely the test of credibility. In the general fact of a foreigner, by a happy stroke of cleverness, winning the favour of an Eastern despot, and being in consequence invested by him with high powers, there is nothing unprecedented; and in the case of Egypt, in particular, the monuments supply explicit evidence of foreigners rising there to positions of political distinction. The question assumes, however, a different aspect when account is taken (1) of the fact that the narratives about Joseph are plainly not the work of a contemporary hand,‖ but were in all probability only committed to writing 700–800 years afterwards, and (2) of the further curious fact that 'Joseph' (like many of the other patriarchal names) is also a tribal name, the name of that subdivision of the nation which was also called after his two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim. The first of these facts at once destroys all guarantee that we possess in the Joseph-narratives a literal record of the facts. The outline, indeed, may still be historical, but for details or particular episodes popular imagination will very probably be responsible: the improbabilities which certainly attach to some of the details connected with the famine and the measures by which it was relieved ($41^{47-49.\ 54.\ 56.\ 57}$ 47^{14-26})* may thus, for example, be accounted for. The second fact raises the further question whether the figure of Joseph, in part or even as a whole, is a reflection of the history and characteristics of the tribe, projected upon the past in an individual form.

According to Ewald (cf. above, p. 534), the twelve sons of Jacob represent corresponding subdivisions of the nation: the smaller part of it, distinguished in the extant tradition by the name and fame of Joseph, and consisting essentially of the two tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh (which afterwards separated), migrated into Egypt first; Joseph, who was a real person, was a leader or distinguished member of the immigrants; he rose to power in Egypt, and conferred there great benefits both upon his own people and upon the country, and in the end also attracted the remaining and stronger part of his people to the E. frontier of Egypt. His personality was a remarkable one; and in after ages it was transfigured in the memory of his people: under the influence of Israel's religion it became an ideal of filial and fraternal affection, a high example of goodness, devotion to duty, sincerity, and love. The fundamental idea of the story consists in the happy reunion in Egypt of the long separated members of Jacob's family, at the call of the son and brother who has risen there to high station; this, in the narrative of Genesis, as we possess it, has been gradually elaborated by successive writers until it attained 'the mature and attractive form in which it was worthy to become an heirloom of the human race.'† The view of Dillm. (introd. to ch. 39) and Kittel (i. 168 f.) is similar: behind the individual, Joseph, there stands the tribe (Dillm.); the tribe, migrating to Egypt, acquired there power and pre-eminence over its 'brethren,' and its leader is known to tradition by the same name, Joseph (Kittel). It is an objection to this view that it duplicates the name at one and the same time: 'Joseph' denotes both an individual and a tribe, not at different times, but in Egypt itself. Stade and others see in Joseph (as in his brethren) merely the imaginary eponymous ancestor of the tribe, in whose life and experiences are reflected the political and other relations of a later age.

Any judgment upon a question of this kind must be more or less 'subjective'; but to the present writer the amount of personal incident and detail in the narrative appears, as in the case of JACOB (p. 534b), to be an objection to both these views. It seems to him to be more probable that there was an actual person, Joseph, afterwards—rightly or wrongly—regarded as the ancestor of the tribe, whose biography, during the time that it lived only in oral tradition, may have been embellished and made more dramatic in details, but who underwent substantially the experiences recounted of him in Gn, and who, having risen to power in Egypt, succeeded in obtaining for his fellow-tribesmen a home in the pastoral land of Goshen. This view, amongst other things, does justice to the Egyptian colouring of the narrative (see below). This colouring, it is true, is seldom specific; it is never of a character to prove close and personal cognizance of the facts described;‡ nevertheless, its presence in the narrative — as indeed the entire Egyptian episode in Joseph's life — is difficult to account for, if the whole were nothing but a legend, woven by popular fancy upon the hills of Ephraim.

From 47^{13-26}, however, more cannot be inferred than that the agrarian conditions described prevailed in the age of the narrator: the details of the narrative, such as the connexion with the seven years of famine, the exhaustion of the Egyptians' money, etc., will, as Dillm. remarks, 'belong merely der naiven Sage.' The benefit derived in consequence by the crown must have been attributed popularly to Joseph's statesmanship; but if it be true that he rose to power under Aphophis, at the very time when the native Theban princes were beginning the war of independence, it is difficult to think that an innovation of this kind, introduced by him, could have survived the expulsion of the Hyksos Pharaohs.

It is, moreover, important to observe, as Kittel has pointed out, that this colouring is common to both J and E: as it is improbable that two writers would have added it independently, it may be inferred that it was inherent in the common † Zoan would be not more than about 35 miles from Goshen; and it is true that the court of the Pharaoh in Gn is represented as being not far from Goshen (for Joseph was near to both: $45^{10.\ 16}$ 46^{29-34} 477), whereas the residence of the Pharaohs, both before (12–14 dyn.) and after (18–20 dyn.) the Hyksos period, was far up the Nile, at Thebes. However, an argument in support of Joseph's Pharaoh being one of the Hyksos kings could be based upon this coincidence, only if it were already certain that the narrative was the work of a contemporary hand, which might be trusted to reproduce accurately geographical facts of this kind.

Maspero, Struggle of Nations, 71) has made it probable that this date was arrived at by a combination of the 430 years of Ex 12^{41} with Egyptian data.

tradition which both represent. This is a circumstance tending to show that in its origin the Egyptian element was considerably anterior to either J or E, and increases the probability that it rests ultimately upon a foundation in fact. At the same time, it is difficult to deny that the narrative (like those of ISHMAEL and JACOB) has been coloured in some of its details by later events, and even that particular episodes may have originated in the desire to account for the circumstances and relations of a later age. The hostility of the brethren to Joseph, the leadership in one narrative (E) of Reuben, in the other (J) of Judah, the power and pre-eminence of Joseph as compared with his father and brothers, the fact that Benjamin, afterwards the smallest tribe, is the youngest brother, the 'adoption' of his two grandsons by Jacob (i.e. their elevation to the same rank as his own sons), and the priority so pointedly bestowed by him upon the younger, are, for instance, points at which it is very possible that popular imagination has thus been at work, colouring or supplementing the historical elements of the Joseph-tradition by reference to the facts and conditions of later times. And naturally the literary form of the narrative, with its charms of style and other characteristic traits, will be due to the different writers, who, severally, cast the original tradition into a written shape.

The acquaintance shown by the authors of the Joseph narratives, esp. J and E, with Egyptian customs and institutions has been long observed ;* and the principal instances deserve to be noticed here, references being added to authorities where the subject may be more fully studied.

37^{25} (cf. 43^{11}). There would be demand in Egypt for resinous substances, such as 'gum tragacanth,' 'balm,' and 'ladanum' (the exudation of the Cistus or Rock-rose),† partly for medicinal purposes, partly for the composition of incense to be used in religious rites, and partly for embalming ; see Ebers, Aeg. 289–293. For Syrian trade with Egypt (in the 18th dyn.), including slaves, see ib. 292 ff., Erman, Life in Ancient Egypt, 516 ff.

39^{4} 'and he appointed him over his house.'‡ Such a position can hardly be regarded as distinctively Egyptian (see note ‡) : nevertheless the monuments show that large Egyptian households were organized with superintendents of their different departments (the fields, the cattle, the kitchen, etc.), the mer-per, or 'superintendent of the house,' being in particular often mentioned.§ The 'bread which' his master 'did eat' (39^{6}) would not be left in Joseph's hand, on account of the scruples which the Egyptians had against eating food prepared by foreigners (cf. 43^{32}). To the story of Joseph and his master's wife ($39^{7ff.}$) there is a remarkable parallel (which has been often compared) in the Egyptian romance, commonly called 'The Tale of the Two Brothers,' written for Seti II. (19 dyn.), and preserved in the d'Orbiney Papyrus. Two brothers, Anpu and Bata, lived together in one house : the elder, Anpu, one day sent Bata back from the fields into the house to fetch some seed ; Anpu's wife there made advances to him, which he repelled : when Anpu returned home in the evening, his wife accused Bata to him falsely. Anpu, enraged, at first sought to slay his brother, but in the end he was convinced that he was innocent and had been accused falsely, and he thereupon slew his unfaithful wife.*

$40^{1ff.}$ A 'butler,' or 'cupbearer' (the word in the Heb. is the same, מַשְׁקֶה, lit. the one giving to drink), was, naturally, not an institution peculiar to Egypt, being found also in Persia (Neh 1^{11}, cf. 2^{1}), and elsewhere (cf. οἰνοχόος) : we meet, however, with a very similar title in lists of Egyptian court officials ; Chabas, for instance (Mél. Egypt. 3rd ser. 131 ff.), publishes such a list, including 'le grand des appartements ou grand supérieur de la maison' (the major domo, mentioned above), 'le saigneur de bœufs, le boulanger, le cuiseur de mets, le conducteur des contrôleurs (abu-u), qui goûtent le vin,' etc., the last of whom is considered by Chabas and Ebers to have corresponded to the 'chief of the butlers' here.† In the tomb of Ramses III. (20 dyn.) there is a representation of a royal bakery, showing a number of figures employed in various processes of bread-making, and amongst them one carrying a tray containing rolls of bread upon his head (v.^{16}).‡ A 'superintendent of the bakery,' corresponding to the 'chief of the bakers,' is mentioned by Erman, pp. 105, 187 (cf. Ebers, 333 bottom). The custom of squeezing grapes into a cup (v.^{11}) is illustrated by Ebers§ from a text published by Naville from the temple at Edfu, where it is said that grapes squeezed into water formed a refreshing beverage, which was drunk by the king. The birthday of the Pharaoh (v.^{20}), at least in the Ptolemaic period, as we learn from the Canopus and Rosetta decrees (B.C. 239 and 195), was celebrated with a great assembly of priests of all grades, and a granting of amnesties to prisoners.‖

In ch. 41 Pharaoh's dreams, both in themselves and in their subject-matter, are appropriate to the country. In Egypt (as in Babylon, and indeed in other ancient countries) much importance was attached to dreams. Thothmes IV., while sleeping under the shadow of the great Sphinx, was commanded by Râ Harmakhis to clear away the sand by which it was encumbered. A vision of the god Ptah, appearing in a dream, encouraged Merenptah to attack the Libyans. On the 'Dream-stele' discovered among the ruins of Napata, the ancient capital of Ethiopia, it is related how the Ethiopian king, Nût Amen, saw in a dream two serpents, one on his right hand and the other on his left, which were explained to portend that he would conquer Egypt, and wear on his head the two crowns, of the north as well as of the south.¶ Strange nostrums were even in vogue for the purpose of obtaining significant dreams. Egypt is dependent for its fertility upon the annual rising of the Nile : the cow-headed goddess Hat-hor,†† the personification of fruitfulness (with whom Isis, the goddess of the fertile soil of the Delta,* was often identified), is described in inscriptions, cited by Ebers, as 'causing the Nile to appear in its season,' 'giving life to the living with her hands,' 'pouring forth fruitfulness upon the land,' etc.† The cow being sacred to both these deities, kine emerging from the Nile would be a natural emblem of fruitful seasons. Seven was also a sacred (and magical) number in Egypt.‡ Among the priestly classes § in Egypt were the 'writers of sacred writings' (saχ-u neter šat: in the Greek text of the Canopus decree, πτεροφόραι,—depicted on the monuments with a feather [quill] on their heads, and a book in their hand ‖), and the 'knowers of things' (reχ χet-u), or, as we might say, 'wise men' (in the Greek, ἱερογραμματεῖς, or 'sacred scribes'), of whose superior knowledge the Egyp. king would avail himself in any difficulty.¶ To these correspond, no doubt, the *ḥartummim and 'wise men,' summoned by Pharaoh to interpret his dreams.

Joseph's shaving himself, and changing his raiment (41[14]), before appearing in the presence of Pharaoh, is in agreement with Egyptian customs: all respectable Egyptians shaved themselves: on the monuments, only foreigners, and natives of inferior rank, are represented as wearing beards; cleanliness of clothes, as well as of person, was also de rigueur.†† With the reference to God in 41[16] (cf. v.[39] 40[8]), comp. Herod. ii. 83. Joseph's plan for laying up corn in storehouses (41[34f.]) at least falls in with Egyptian institutions: in all important cities granaries were established, partly for the reception of the corn-tax (an important item in the revenue), partly to provide maintenance for soldiers and other public officials: the 'superintendent of the granaries' was one of the highest officers of the state; it was his duty to see that they were properly filled, and to report to the king annually on the harvests.‡‡ On 41[40] ('over my house,' i.e. palace), cf. p. 772 note ‡, and Erman, pp. 69, 77: the terms of 41[41] suggest the important office of T'ate, or governor, ib. 69, 87–89 ('the second after the king in the court of the palace'), 473. The signet-ring (41[42]) was in other countries also a mark of authority (Est 3[10] 8[2], Tob 1[22], 1 Mac 6[15]); but it was notably so in Egypt, where the 'keeper of the seal' (mer chetam) was the king's deputy.* The golden collar put round Joseph's neck (ib.) was a peculiarly Egyptian form of decoration: it was called 'receiving gold';† Ahmes, the captain-general of the marines, who freed Egypt from the Hyksos, 'received gold,' on seven different occasions, for various acts of valour.‡ Linen was prized in Egypt as a material for dress, especially for men of rank;§ but the plural 'garments of fine linen' makes it doubtful whether (as Ebers supposes) there is a specific reference to the shendi-t, or shend'ot, the royal apron-garment, worn under the Old Empire only by royal personages, but under the Middle and New Empires, by other dignitaries as well.‖ Horses and chariots are first represented on the Egyptian monuments under the 18th dyn.: it is probable, therefore, that they were introduced into Egypt during the Hyksos period; the words for both chariot (merkobt) and waggon ('agolt) are palpably of Semitic (Canaanite or Hebrew) origin (עֲגָלָה, רֶכֶבָה).¶ The king in earlier times was carried by soldiers on a sedan-chair. Erman (p. 64) describes a scene from a tomb at Tel el-Amarna, in which Amenôphis IV. (18 dyn.), his queen and daughters, and the ministers in attendance, appear riding in chariots of state; but it throws no light on the expression, 'the second chariot which he had.' The monuments supply illustrations, at least in and after the 18th dyn., of foreigners (including slaves from Syria) rising to positions of political importance in Egypt, and adopting there a change of name: Mery-Rê' ('beloved of Rê'), the armour-bearer of Thothmes III., and the priest, User-Min ('Min is strong'), were sons of a foreigner, the judge Pa-'Emer'eu (the Amorite); and under Merenptah, a Canaanite, Ben-Mat'ana, son of Jupa'a, from D'arbasana,†† holds the office of 'first speaker of His Majesty' (who acted as an intermediary between the king and his attendants), and receives the name of Ramses-em-per-Ra, 'Ramses in the temple of Ra.'‡‡ In fact, 'change of name was usual with parvenus whom the king wished to honour' (Ebers). On (ib.) is well known to have been the chief centre of the worship of the sun-god (Rê or Râ), possessing a famous temple, and a large body of priests (cf. Herod. ii. 3).

Famines of long duration, due to the Nile failing to overflow, are not unknown in Egypt: not only is one attested by El-Makrizi, the Arabic historian, for A.D. 1064–1071, §§ but the sepulchral inscription of one Baba, found at El-Kab in Upper Egypt, represents the deceased, in an enumeration of his virtues, as saying, 'I collected corn, as a friend of the harvest god. I was watchful at the time of sowing. And when a famine arose, lasting many years, I distributed corn to the city each year of famine.'* The age of Baba (end of the 17th dyn.) would coincide approximately with that of Joseph; and it has even been supposed that the famine referred to may be the same. Ameni (or Amony), governor of the 'nome of the Gazelle,' under Usertesen II. (12 dyn.), tells us that he made provision for his people, very much as Joseph did: 'In my time there were no poor, and none were hungry. When the years of famine came, I ploughed all the fields of the nome, I kept the inhabitants alive, and gave them food, so that not one was hungry.'†

§§ See Smith, DB, s.v. FAMINE. The terrible effects of a one year's famine (A.D. 1199) are described at length by Abdollatif (ed. White, 1800, p. 210 ff.: extracts in Stanley, Jewish Church, i. 79 f.; Vigouroux, 174 ff.).

42[9]. The charge of being spies was a natural one: Egypt was exposed on its E. side, and liable to be invaded by Asiatics; under the 12th dyn. fortresses had been erected along the Isthmus of Suez, and under the 19th dyn. officers were stationed there to take the names of all passing in either direction.‡ The oath 'by the life of Pharaoh' (42[15]) is known from Egyptian monuments: in an account of criminal proceedings (20th dyn.), a thief has administered to him an oath by the king's life, to prevent him speaking falsely: § in a similar document, published by Chabas, the expression 'il fit un Vie du Seigneur royal' occurs more than once.‖

43[16]. The expression 'steward of his house' (אשר על ביתו) is explained above, on 39[4]. Every great man in Egypt had such an overseer for his establishment. On Egyptian feasts, cf. the Plates in Erman, opposite pp. 250, 255, or Wilk.-B. i. 431: the guests did not sit round a table, as with us, but on rows of chairs, facing a sideboard; the viands, interspersed with rich floral decorations, were arranged on this, and carried round to the guests by servants. On Egyptian houses, which were often on a large scale, Erman, 174 ff. In explanation of v.[32b], see ABOMINATION, No. 1; and cf. (Ebers) how it is said, after Pianchi's conquest of Egypt (B.C. 766), that the defeated kings 'did not enter the king's house, because they were unclean (i.e. uncircumcised), and they ate fish, which is an abomination to the king' (Brugsch, p. 404, l. 150 f.).

43[21] 'in full weight' (lit. in its weight). Egyptian money consisted of rings of gold (probably unstamped), which were weighed by scribes who made this their business (Erman, 109, 464; Wilk.-B. i. 285, 286). However, the practice of 'weighing' money was also usual among the Hebrews, even to a late date (Jer 32[9. 10], Zec 11[12] etc.).

45[8] 'a father ('āb) to Pharaoh,' v.[9] (cf. 42[30. 33]) 'lord ('ādōn) of all Egypt.' Brugsch has pointed out that both 'āb and 'ādōn were official titles in Egyptian.

Āb (or ābū) does not mean 'father' in Egyp., but denotes primarily the overseer of a kitchen, wine-cellar, bakery, etc.; then in the 19th dyn. the ābū of the king becomes an important person in the state, and takes part in judicial investigations, etc.: see Brugsch, Hist. (1891), 101, 357, Steininschrift, 82; and esp. Dict. Hiérogl. v. 37–39, Aegyptologie, p. 225 f., and Erman, who represents ābū by the peculiar term Truchsess, rendered in the Eng. tr.—as badly as possible—by 'slave,' p. 105, l. 11, 10, 7, 6, 4 from bottom, p. 106, l. 1, 11, 14, 18, by 'vassal,' pp. 131–136, 141, 143, 144 (cf. Z. f. Aeg. Spr. 1879, pp. 73 ff., 148 ff.), by 'serfs,' p. 187 f. (3 times), and by 'vassal' again, p. 475.

'Ādōn (or Aten) was the title given to the viceroy (of the Pharaoh), or the deputy of a governor or other official (like the Arab. vakil): thus we read of the 'ādōn of a city, of a district, of a regiment, of a treasury, of the grand-chancellor, etc., and even of the whole country. See Brugsch, Rev. Égypt. i. (1880) 28 ff. (many examples cited); also Hist. 101, 124, 125 (Hor-em-ḥeb (18 dyn.) was 'Adon of the whole land' for some years before he became king: see p. 231), 281, 290, 339 bottom, 344 bis, 347, 348; and Virey in Records, 2nd ser. iv. 3 ff. (where the same word is spelt 'tennu').

In view, however, of the fact that both 'āb and 'ādōn are common Heb. words (with 45[8] cf. esp. Is 22[21]), it must be regarded as exceedingly doubtful whether, in using them, E had really in mind the Egyptian offices to which Brugsch has referred.

On 46[34b] see ABOMINATION, No. 1: there is independent evidence that cow-herds and swine-herds (Herod. ii. 47) were looked down upon by the Egyptians, but not that shepherds were. 47[6] 'overseers of cattle over that which I have.' Much attention was paid to cattle-rearing in Egypt; and there were many fine breeds.* The Pharaoh possessed large herds; and the mer, or superintendent, of the royal cattle is often mentioned in the inscriptions.† There are parallels for parties of foreigners receiving permission to settle in Egypt: see Z. f. Aeg. Spr. 1889, p. 125, or Tomkins, p. 81 (Mentiu, or nomads, expelled from their homes, appeal to Ḥor-em-ḥeb, of the 18th dyn., and receive permission to settle in a prescribed locality); and the remarkable inscription cited by Brugsch, ch. v. (p. 100), from the reign of Merenptah (Shasu or Bedawis, allowed to pass a border-fortress of Egypt, and to settle on the property of the Pharaoh). In 47[14] the 'house' meant is, according to Ebers, the treasury, usually called per-ḥet, the 'house of silver': the head-treasurer was a high officer of state, having many subordinate officials under him.‡ The peculiar system of Egyptian land-tenure, which (47[26]) is attributed to Joseph, is so far in accordance with the evidence of the monuments, that, whereas in the Old Empire the nobility and governors of the nomes possessed large landed estates, in the New Empire (which followed the expulsion of the Hyksos) 'the old aristocracy has made way for royal officials, and the landed property has passed out of the hands of the old families into the possession of the crown and the great temples.'§ The monuments do not, however, furnish any explanation of the origin of the new system: there is a conjecture in Erman, p. 102 f.‖ for embalmers (who belonged in fact to a distinct profession). Seventy days appears to have been a more usual period for the entire process than forty; but, in point of fact, it varied.* In 50^{7-9} a considerable funeral procession is described, such as are often represented on the tombs,—only (Ebers) without 'horsemen': see Plates LXVI. LXVII. LXVIII. in Wilk.-B. (iii. 444, 446, 449), or Erman, p. 320 f. The 'coffin' of 50^{26} is the mummy-case, or sarcophagus: the same word (אָרוֹן) is used in Phœn. of a sarcophagus.† It is remarkable that 110 (ib.) appears to have been regarded in Egypt as the ideal age for a man, and as the most perfect age to be desired. 'In the most ancient MS we possess, the Papyrus Prisse,‡ a life of 110 years is declared to be the best; and in the Papyrus Anast. iv. (T. iv. l. 4) we read "Fulfil 110 years on the earth, whilst thy limbs are vigorous."' On a granite statue at Vienna there is a prayer to Isis to grant health and happiness for 110 years. 'Many similar passages speak of 110 years as the most perfect age to be desired, and therefore by the number 110 is inferred an especially blessed and prosperous life' (Ebers).

On the Egyptian names found in 41^{45}, see above, vol. i. 665[b]; the same explanations are accepted, and cordially approved, by Ebers (DB[2] 1798 f.).§ It is singular that the three types of name are otherwise not common till an age much later than that to which Joseph must be referred: those of the type Zaphenath-pa'aneah appear first at the end of the 20th dyn. (one instance), and are frequent only in the 22nd (the dyn. of Shishak); of those of the type Potiphera,‖ Mr. Tomkins cites one (though not borne by a native Egyptian)¶ in the 18th dyn., but otherwise they appear first in the 22nd, and are frequent only in the 26th dyn. (B.C. 664–525); those of the type Asenath are found now and then earlier, but are frequent only in the 21st dyn. and become common afterwards. It is, of course, unwise to build too much upon a negative argument; but the combination of names, otherwise all either rare or unknown at an early period, is certainly remarkable; and Steindorff, Brugsch, and Ebers all agree in inferring from the facts mentioned that the names in question did not originate before the 9th cent. B.C.†† On ABRECH (41^{43}), see vol. i. p. 18: the explanation of Renouf, there given, is likewise that of Brugsch (Steininschrift, 83 f.).‡‡

There are also four or five Egyptian words in this part of Gn: but they are all words which were naturalized in Hebrew; they occur in other parts of the OT, and consequently afford no clue to the date of the narratives in which they are found. § Brugsch also (Steininschrift, 83) agrees in those of Potiphera (Potiphar), and (against his former view, Hist. 122) Zaphenath-pa'aneah: Asenath he does not here mention.

‖ Of which 'Potiphar' is usually regarded as a merely Hebrew variant.

¶ Petu-baal, 'gift of Baal'; Life and Times of Joseph, p. 184: see Brugsch, Hist. i. 255 (ed. 1891, p. 118). The name is evidently that of a Semite (Lieblein, Recherches sur Chronologie, 129 ff.), and not improbably (Sayce, EHH 85) formed in imitation of the Phœn. Mattanbaal ('gift of Baal').

 See Steindorff, Z. f. Aeg. Sprache, xxxiii. (1892), 50–52.

†† Hommel (Aufsätze, 1892, p. 4) follows Lagarde in using the same facts as a clue to the date of the document E (c. 700 B.C.).

‡‡ Lieblein (PSBA, 1898, p. 202 ff.) proposes a different explanation of Potiphar (not of Potiphera) and Zaphenath-pa'aneah: he also explains 'Abrech' as à gauche, toi! i.e. 'go to the left!'

* רְבִיד collar, 41^{42} (also Ezk 16^{11}†) is not the Egyp. name of the decoration mentioned on p. 773[b]; and whether it is Egyptian at all is extremely doubtful: Harkavy (Journ. As. Mars-Avril, 1870, p. 182 f.) suggested 'sous toutes réserves' that it might be the Egyp. repit, 'image qu'on porte sur le cou, collier en forme d'image,' which occurs in ch. 162 of the Book of the Dead,—in Budge's tr. p. 290, '[This chapter] shall be recited over the image (repit) of a cow, which shall be made in fine gold, and placed at the neck of the deceased' (cf. Budge's Vocab. p. 194). This is slender evidence that repit (or erpit) means a 'collar.' There is a Sem. root, Arab. rabada, one meaning of which is to tie.

† TR of Mk 6^{3} speaks of our Lord as 'the son of the carpenter' (= ‖ Mt 13^{55}), but the true reading is 'the carpenter' (see below).

‡ ἐξ οἴκου καὶ πατριᾶς Δ. Possibly the former term is the wider, and includes even those adopted into the household, while the latter refers more strictly to those of the line of the πατήρ.

§ Canon Gore (Bampton Lects., 1891, p. 78) points out that Mt narrates everything from Joseph's side, Lk from Mary's, and adds that this suggests that the narrative of Mt is ultimately based on Joseph's account, Lk on Mary's. If this be true we may conjecture that Mt's was derived mediately through James the Lord's brother.

‖ Dr. G. Dalman writes to the author of the present article as follows: 'Edersheim (Life and Times of Jesus, i. 154) is wrong in stating that Joseph had a choice in legally divorcing her either publicly or privately. Divorce has always been a private act. No public act of divorce exists. The gêt (bill of divorce, which is given solely in the woman's interest), never contains reasons for the divorce. Two witnesses are only necessary that they may state that the gêt was really handed over by this man to this woman. Keth. 74[b], 75[a], quoted by Edersheim, does not refer to divorce itself, but to doubts about the formal legality of an act of divorce which arose afterwards, and could become a reason for hearing the decision of a court of justice. Some Rabbis believed that no husband would be likely to resort to a measure which would expose his former wife to the shame of having to do with a court of justice.'

JOSEPH THE HUSBAND OF MARY.

I. IN THE NEW TESTAMENT.—(1) He is not mentioned by name in Mk,† and only indirectly in Jn 1^{45} 6^{42}. (2) Nor are the meagre accounts in Mt and Lk easy to reconcile. Both evangelists state that he was a descendant of David (Mt 1^{20}, Lk 2^{4}‡), and that the Virgin Mary was already espoused to him when she became with child of the Holy Ghost (Mt 1^{18}, Lk $1^{27.35}$), and that he lived at Nazareth after the birth of our Lord (Mt 2^{23}, cf. 13^{55}, Lk 4^{22}, cf. ^{16}); but they treat each of these details differently.

(a) The Davidic Descent.—Mt, making Joseph the son of Jacob, traces his relation to David through kings, Lk through Heli and private persons (Mt 1^{1-17}, Lk 3^{23-38}).

(b) The Conception.§—Lk tells us of the Angelic Annunciation, and of Mary's meekness and faith (1^{26-38}); Mt begins at a later period (1^{18}), and lets us see Joseph's character under a sharp trial. He was a man who strove to conform to the precepts of the law (δίκαιος, cf. Lk 1^{6} 2^{25}), and had a keen sense of personal honour, yet was not so bound by law as to be unmoved by kindly feelings. He did not 'proclaim' Mary (δειγματίσαι), though it seemed to be his duty, but resolved to divorce her in as quiet and secret a way as possible.‖ Yet though he had already come to this decision, the appearance to him, in a dream, of an angel of the Lord, with the assurance of the true origin and the work of the Child, fully in accordance as the former was with the words of prophecy ('Quod si dubitas Isaiam audi,' Ephraem on Tatian, cf. Iren. iv. 23. 1, ed. Massuet), convinced him of his mistake. He therefore took Mary, and in full faith 'was dwelling in holiness with her' (Tatian's Diatess.) until she bare a son.

(c) Nazareth.—Lk tells us in $1^{26f.}$ that Mary lived in Nazareth, and was espoused to Joseph; and in 2^{4} that Joseph went up out of Nazareth to Bethlehem with her. He therefore presumably (not quite necessarily) also himself lived in Nazareth before the birth of our Lord. Yet Mt $2^{22.23}$ gives no hint that Joseph had had any relation with Nazareth before his return from Egypt, and implies that he would have settled in Judæa but for fear of Archelaus and the direct warning that he received by dream. Assuming the truth of the inference from Lk's language, we must suppose that Mt was not concerned with matters of merely private importance, and that in accordance with his scheme of showing publicly the Messianic character of Jesus, he omitted everything that did not illustrate this. The significance of the birth being at Bethlehem (in the relation of that town to David and to the prophecy of Micah, and in its nearness to Rachel's tomb, Gn 35^{19} 48^{7}, with the midrashic application of Jer 31^{15}), and the interest of the removal to Egypt, make it natural that Nazareth should not be mentioned until this town in its turn affected the public life of Jesus. Mt then, in reference to our Lord's familiar name ('Jesus the Nazarene') being derived from it, characteristically connects it with prophetic words (2^{23}, Is 11^{1}).

(3) We further learn from Lk that Joseph was present when the shepherds came to Bethlehem (2^{16}); that he as well as Mary brought up the Babe to present Him to the Lord, and marvelled at the things that were being said about Him ($2^{22.\ 33}$); that he used to go every year to Jerusalem at the passover ($2^{41.\ 42}$), certainly with Mary, and perhaps with the Child; and that when the Boy was twelve years old and stayed on after the days of the feast were over, he shared with Mary in the anxiety, and, like her, did not understand the naive wonder of Jesus at their searching for Him ($2^{41\text{-}50}$); yet his and Mary's authority remained unquestioned in the daily life of the home at Nazareth (2^{51}).

(4) We gather from the remaining references to Joseph that (a) our Lord was commonly known as Jesus ben-Joseph, Jn 1^{46} (? at Bethsaida), Lk 4^{22} at Nazareth, and Jn 6^{42} at Capernaum; and (b) Joseph was known, or remembered, as the carpenter (Mt 13^{55}).

(5) Nothing is said about Joseph's death. But the command to St. John at the Cross (Jn $19^{26.\ 27}$), and the reference to 'Mary the mother of Jesus, and His brethren' (Ac 1^{14}) immediately after the Ascension, imply that his death took place at least before the Crucifixion. Further, the fact that he is not mentioned with Mary and His brethren when they sought Him (Mt 12^{46} and parallels), suggests that he was already dead before the middle of our Lord's ministry. Probably the usual opinion is right, viz. that he was dead before our Lord's ministry began.

II. *THE LIFE OF JOSEPH FROM APOCRYPHAL SOURCES.—The account of Joseph is put into our Lord's mouth as He sat on the Mt. of Olives with His disciples (Death Jos., Boh. § i.). He is from Bethlehem, and marries his first wife when 40 years old, living 49 years with her in wedlock (ib. § xiv.). He has four sons and two daughters, his wife dying when James is still young. He and his two sons work as carpenters (Death Jos., Boh. § ii.). They, however, and his two daughters are married, and he dwells with James his youngest son (ib. Boh. § xi. 1). He is one year alone before Mary is given to him (ib. Boh. § xiv.). The priests seek a widower to whom they may espouse Mary (who has been in the temple from the age of three to twelve, to fourteen according to others); the heralds proclaim this through all Judæa, and Joseph, throwing away his axe, goes to meet them. The high priest takes the rods of all, enters into the temple, and prays, and returns the rods to each. There is no sign till Joseph receives his rod, the last of all, when a dove comes out of the rod and flies upon his head. The priest says, 'Thou hast been chosen by lot to take into thy keeping the virgin of the Lord.' But he refuses, saying, 'I have children; and I am an old man, and she is a young girl. I am afraid lest I become a laughing-stock to the sons of Israel.' But he receives her (Protev. §§ 8, 9). After two years (Death Jos. § xiv.), or four months (Niceph. Call. ii. 3, cf. Forbes Robinson, p. 187), the Annunciation takes place. The 'righteous old man,' coming in from his house-building in districts near the seashore (Pseudo-Matt. § 10), wishes to put her away privily, but on Mary's statement of her innocence hesitates, and is assured by the angel in a dream (Protev. §§ 13, 14). Yet both he and Mary are accused by Annas the scribe, and by the priest, and are tried by the ordeal of drinking water and going to the hill-country. But they return to the priest unhurt (Protev. §§, 15. 16) and go home.

Having heard of the order for enrolment, Joseph sets Mary upon an ass; his son leads it, and he himself follows (Protev. § 17). On arriving at Bethlehem he writes his name by a scribe, 'Joseph the son of David, and Mary his wife, and Jesus his son are of the tribe of Judah' (Death Jos., Boh. § vii.). He brings her to a tomb (Lord Crawford's MS), an inn (Death Jos., Sah. vii.), a cave (Protev. § 18), where he leaves her while looking for a midwife. He sees all nature stand still in wonder (Protev. § 18). He is mentioned as being present at some of the many miracles performed during the flight to Egypt and the sojourn there (Pseudo-Matt. § 19 sqq.; Arab. Gosp. §§ 10–35). Also after returning to Nazareth he is necessarily an actor in the painful tricks and precocious miracles ascribed to our Lord. He lives by his daily toil, 'never eating bread for nought, but doing according to the law of Moses' (Death Jos., Boh. § ix.). When he was an hundred and eleven years old his body was that of a youth, and he works at his trade of carpenter till the last day of his life (Hist. Jos. Carp. § 29), yet he is told that he is to die that year.* He goes up to Jerusalem, into the temple, repents before the altar, and prays. He returns to Nazareth, and laments. He is in great fear of death, and confesses to Jesus his sin in doubting Mary at the first, and in rebuking Him for His childish behaviour. Mary pleads with Jesus that Joseph may not die. While he himself is making the same request, his soul comes up to his throat. His children come and weep over him. Death comes with devils, who depart, rebuked by Jesus. Death is afraid (in Death Jos., Sah. III. § xxiii. Jesus is obliged to go out before Death will come in). Jesus prays. Angels take Joseph's soul (on Epepi 26 = July 20), putting it into silk napkins of fine texture. Michael and Gabriel watch it; the angels sing before it till they give it to God. The inhabitants of Nazareth and Galilee gather together and mourn for him till the 9th hour, when they are put forth by Jesus, who pours water on the body and anoints it with oil. At Jesus' prayer two angels shroud the body. The body becomes incorrupt even until the banquet of the thousand years (Hist. Jos. Carp. § 26). Jesus promises blessing to those who commemorate each anniversary of Joseph's death, give bread in his name to the poor, and wine to strangers and others on the day of his commemoration; who write out the book of Joseph's going-forth from the body, or, if they are too poor, call their sons by the name of Joseph (Death Jos., Boh. § xxvi.). The great ones of the city coming to bury Joseph find his shroud already fastened to his body. They dig at the door of the cave to place his body there. Jesus prays and embraces Joseph, who is then buried.

* These are especially The Book of James (Protevangelium), The Life of the Virgin (Sahidic Fragments. published in Forbes Robinson's Coptic Apocryphal Gospels, 1896), The Death of Joseph (Bohairic and Sahidic, do.) which = The History of Joseph the Carpenter (Arabic), Liber de Infantiâ (Gospel of Pseudo-Matt.), The Gospel of the Nativity of Mary, The Arabic Gospel of the Childhood, The Gospel of Thomas.

For the dates of these see Lipsius in Dict. Christ. Biogr. ii. 700. The Protevangelium dates in its present form from perhaps the latter part of the 3rd cent. The rest from perhaps the 4th to the 6th cent. Many of these narrate the same incident, but one reference seemed to be sufficient here. It did not seem necessary to mention all minute variations of the legend.

* From here onwards the Death of Joseph (Boh.) is almost the sole authority.

III. The Cult of St. Joseph.—Any notice of Joseph can in these days hardly be complete without some mention of his Cult, which has of recent years attained to such an extraordinary development.

(1) The latter part of the preceding section shows that to some writers, especially to those who lived in Egypt and occupied themselves with religious romances, Joseph's attractive personality afforded scope for religious devotion. But very little, if any, trace of this is to be seen in the Fathers.* St. Bernard of Clairvaux is the first writer to show it clearly. He says (if Mgr. Ricard's quotations may be trusted), 'Joseph alone among all men was, here below, the faithful co-worker of her who was the greatest of the works of God'; † and again, 'Remember the ancient patriarch who was sold into Egypt, and know that this man (Joseph) not only inherited his name, but possessed, moreover, his chastity, his innocency, and his grace.' ‡ Thomas Aquinas also writes strongly.§ But the Roman Church has given much credit to the writings of female mystics, who from the 14th cent. onwards have spoken much of the veneration with which St. Joseph is honoured. Thus Gertrude the Great († 1310) saw in her revelations, when the name of Joseph was pronounced 'all the saints bowed their heads with respect, as a sign of honour to that glorious patriarch, and congratulated him, and rejoiced with him on his incomparable dignity.' ‖ St. Bridget of Sweden († 1373), Marie d'Agreda († 1665), Catherine Emmerich († 1824), give innumerable details of Joseph's life seen by them in visions, which are combined in popular lives of St. Joseph for Roman Catholic use to-day. Even Gerson at the Council of Constance (1414) says of Joseph's powers of intercession, 'non impetrat sed imperat.' St. Teresa († 1582), St. Francis de Sales, and Bossuet vie in exalting him.

(2) Further, the growth of the Cult may be seen in the public honours allotted to his feast, and in the status that he holds among the saints by the express decree of the pope. 'In Western Martyrologies of the 9th cent. the name of Joseph is found, and from the same time the Greeks commemorated him along with other saints of the Old Testament on the Sunday before Christmas, and along with Mary, David, and James the Less on the Sunday in the Octave of Christmas' (Cath. Dict. s.v. 'Joseph'). In the breviary of Sixtus IV. (1471–1484) the feast of St. Joseph (Mar. 19) is a simple rite; in that of Innocent VIII. (1484–1492) a double rite. Pius V. (1566–1572) ordered that the office of St. Joseph should be in that of confessors who were not popes. Gregory XV. in 1621 made it a feast of obligation for the whole world.* Urban VIII. in 1642 renewed this order. Clement XI. (1700–1721) arranged the hymns and all the parts of the office peculiar to St. Joseph, and raised it to the double degree of the second class. Much discussion was held as to the place in the Litany of the Saints which Joseph's name ought to take; but it was decided by Benedict XIII. in 1726 that it should precede the names of the Apostles and Martyrs, and follow immediately that of St. John the Baptist.

Two other feast days were added in honour of St. Joseph. One is the day of the Patronage of St. Joseph, which was fixed for the 3rd Sunday after Easter by the Congregation of Rites in 1680, and after being observed in a gradually increasing number of places was established throughout Roman Catholic Christendom by Pius IX. in 1847. The other is that of the betrothal or marriage of Mary and Joseph (for which an office was drawn up by Gerson), and allowed (with a different office) by Benedict XIII. in 1725 to be observed in all churches on Jan 23. 'The feast is kept in England as a greater double.' †

Lastly, Pius IX. in 1871 proclaimed St. Joseph Patron of the whole Church as follows: 'Our most Holy Lord, Pius IX., Pope, moved by recent deplorable events, was pleased to comply with the desires of the Prelates, and to commit to the most powerful patronage of the Holy Patriarch, Joseph, both Himself and all the faithful, and solemnly declared him Patron of the Catholic Church, and commanded his festival, occurring on the 19th day of March, to be celebrated for the future as a double of the first class, but without an octave, on account of Lent.' ‡

But however much we may respect the faith of Joseph, and gladly recognize, not only Paul the tent-maker and Peter the fisherman, but also Joseph the carpenter, as confessedly high examples of the dignity of work, and of the spiritual reward that it receives, we can have little sympathy with teaching that stands in such lurid contrast to the reticence of the Gospels and of the early Church.

JOSEPH OF ARIMATHÆA (Ἰωσὴφ [ὁ] ἀπὸ Ἀριμαθαίας).—A wealthy Israelite and member of the Sanhedrin (βουλευτής); a 'good man and a righteous' (Lk 23[50]), who 'was looking for the kingdom of God' (Mk 15[43]). On the situation of his native place, see Arimathæa and Araunah. He was 'Jesus' disciple' (Mt 27[35]), 'but secretly, for fear of the Jews' (Jn 19[38]). He had not consented to the judgment of the Sanhedrin against Jesus (Lk 23[51]), having either absented himself from the meeting (as Mk 14[64] suggests) or refrained from giving a vote. After Christ's death, the approach of sunset made it difficult for the apostles—unprepared as they were, even if they had recovered their courage—to arrange duly for His reverent interment before the Sabbath began. Joseph, hitherto faint-hearted, rose to the occasion. He appears to have been present at the crucifixion, and his possession of a tomb, new and yet unused, hewn out of a rock in a neighbouring garden, suggested to him the thought of himself obtaining and burying the body of Jesus. The spectacle of the crucified Saviour had quickened his faith and love, and combined, doubtless, with his shame for past faint-heartedness, to raise him above the fear of man. His boldness is the more notable, because, to all human appearance, he was showing sympathy with a ruined cause, at the risk of persecution to death.* His request for the body from Pilate was successful, and he took or saw it taken down from the cross. According to the Acts of Pilate, Joseph sought the favour with tears and entreaties; but even if Pilate's humanity were not stimulated by a timely bribe, he would be disposed to show his sympathy with a councillor who had taken no part in constraining him to condemn Christ.† Joseph's example, presumably, moved Nicodemus to similar courage. Together they received the body and laid it in the tomb, Joseph providing the fine linen (σινδών) and grave-bands (ὀθόνια), Nicodemus the abundant spices (Mt $27^{57ff.}$, Mk $15^{42ff.}$, Lk $23^{50ff.}$, Jn $19^{38ff.}$, Gosp. of Pet. 3 f., 23 f., Acts of Pil. 11. 12).

* Roman Catholic writers (e.g. Mgr. Ricard, St. Joseph, sa vie et son culte, Lille, 1896) mention Irenæus, Origen, Eusebius, Epiphanius, Gregory of Nazianzus, Gregory of Nyssa, Hilary of Poitiers, Ephraem the Syrian, Cyril of Jerusalem, Chrysostom, Jerome, Augustine, Cyril of Alexandria, and Hilary of Arles as supporting the Cult of St. Joseph. But they seldom give references or distinguish between genuine and spurious works. Thus Augustine is quoted as saying, 'Rejoice, Joseph, that by the merit of the virtue of the angels you live so angelically as to be justly called the father of the Saviour.' This is doubtless from a spurious sermon in Migne, v. p. 2110. Irenæus says Joseph 'served Jesus with a continual joy' (adv. Hær. iv. 40, ed. Grabe, = 23. 1, ed. Massuet); but Irenæus really says, 'Joseph joyfully yielded obedience [to the angel] in regard to all the rest of the education of Christ' (Joseph et Mariam accepit et in reliqua universa educatione Christi gaudens obsequium præstitit).

The minuteness of the Gospel record, its preservation by all the four evangelists, and its later apocryphal expansion, are due not so much to the fulfilment of Is 53^{9}, still less to the growth of a myth (Strauss, New Life of Jesus, ch. xcvi.) based thereon (for the parallel, obscured by the Sept., is noted by no writer either of the apostolic or of the sub-apostolic age),‡ but to the desire, probably, (1) to signalize the adherence of a member of the hostile Sanhedrin; (2) to render prominent an incident so closely connected with Christ's Resurrection. None the less the correspondence with 'They made (or appointed) his grave with the wicked, and with the rich in his death,' if not exact, is striking; and even if a different original reference be adopted, it is difficult to regard as accidental the fresh significance given to the verse by the circumstances of our Lord's burial.§

A legend, which first appears in William of Malmesbury (de Ant. Glast. Eccl. i.), represents Joseph as sent by St. Philip from Gaul to Britain, along with eleven other disciples, in A.D. 63; as obtaining from a British king a small island in Somersetshire (afterwards the site of Glastonbury) engirt by the river Brue; and as building there, 'with twisted twigs,' the earliest Christian oratory in the land. Malmesbury, however, introduces the narrative with an 'ut ferunt,' in marked contrast to his reference of other statements in the same chapter to earlier historians. The absence, also, of any allusion to Joseph's advent in the histories of Gildas and Bede is significant. Probably some other Joseph, who founded Glastonbury, has been confounded with Joseph of Arimathæa. The story of Joseph bringing the Holy Grail to England dates from about 1200 A.D., and was probably composed by Walter Map. Ussher (Ant. Eccl. Brit. c. 16) mentions a tradition that Joseph freed Ireland from poisonous reptiles, a service usually attributed to St. Patrick.

JOSEPH BARSABBAS (AV Barsabas), surnamed Justus; one of the two disciples who had been followers of Jesus during the whole of His public ministry, and were therefore deemed suitable candidates for the apostolic office vacant by the treachery and death of Judas Iscariot (Ac 1^{23}). Barsabbas means 'son of Sabba.' It has been variously interpreted 'son of an oath,' 'son of an old man,' 'son of conversion,' 'son of quiet' (see Lightfoot, Hor. Heb.; Winer, Realwörterb.); but it was probably a patronymic, Joseph's father being named Sabba. If so, we must reject Lightfoot's suggestion, that he and Judas Barsabbas (Ac 15^{22}) were brothers of James the son of Alphæus. His Roman surname Justus was doubtless assumed after the manner frequent among the Jews at that time (cf. Ac 12^{12} 13^{1}). We have no information concerning him beyond what is implied in the one passage where he is mentioned. He is certainly to be distinguished from Joseph Barnabas (Ac 4^{36}) and from Judas Barsabbas (Ac 15^{22}); though it is not improbable, from the identity of the patronymic, that he and Judas were brothers. Eusebius (HE i. 12) makes him to have been one of 'the Seventy' (Lk 10^{1}), and this is not improbable. Eusebius (3^{39}) also relates from Papias a legend that Joseph Barsabbas 'drank a deadly poison and yet, by the grace of the Lord, suffered no harm.'

JOSEPH, PRAYER OF.—A lost Jewish apocryphon, mentioned in several catalogues of extra-canonical books. For information as to its contents we are indebted almost exclusively to a few quotations in the writings of Origen. In all the extant passages Jacob (not Joseph) is the speaker. He narrates a conversation he held with the wrestling angel Uriel; and claims to have read the tablets of heaven, and thus to know what is about to befall mankind. The work is said by Origen to have been in use παρ' Ἑβραίοις, and his quotations show it to have had an antichristian animus. It is a representative of a remarkable trend in Jewish theology, which led the Jews to claim for the three great patriarchs the same sublime and supernatural characteristics as the Christians claimed for the Lord Jesus. For instance, Jacob claims to be 'an angel of God and a ruling spirit'; 'the first-begotten (πρωτόγονος) of every creature animated by God'; 'an archangel of the power of the Lord'; and 'the first servant in God's presence.' The wrestling angel, whom Christians claimed to be the Messiah, is told by Jacob that he is only eighth in rank among the angels, Jacob himself being first of all; and in the same strain Abraham and Isaac are said to have been 'created before every (other) work.'

The Bible Annotée paraphrases, 'He has been interred with criminals, but after his death he has been put by the Eternal (in Sheol) in the ranks of the most honourable.' Delitzsch^{4}, Urwick, etc., retain the meaning 'rich' (literally), and emphasize the similarity between OT prophecy and NT history. The interpretation, 'his sepulchral mounds,' instead of 'in his death' (adopted by Lowth, Ew., Duhm, Ch. in Intr.), renders the parallel more conspicuous, but is not essential to its maintenance; 'in his death' may='when he died.'

JOSHAPHAT (יְהוֹשָׁפָט = יוֹשָׁפָט).—1. One of David's heroes, 1 Ch 11^{43}. 2. A priest in David's time, 1 Ch 15^{24}.

JOSHAVIAH (יוֹשַׁוְיָה).—One of David's heroes, 1 Ch 11^{46}.

JOSHBEKASHAH (יָשְׁבְּקָשָׁה).—A son of Heman, 1 Ch $25^{4.\ 24}$. There is reason to believe that this and five of the names associated with it are really a fragment of a hymn or prayer (see GENEALOGY, III. 23 n.; and cf. Kittel in SBOT, and W. R. Smith, OTJC^{2} 143 n.).

JOSHEB-BASSHEBETH (יֹשֵׁב בַּשֶּׁבֶת) occurs in RV of 2 S 23^8 as a proper name in place of the utterly meaningless 'that sat in the seat' of the AV. It is evident that the text is corrupt, and that the original name Jashobeam must be restored from the parallel passage, 2 Ch 11^{11}, just as the 'Hachmonite' must be substituted for the 'Tahchemonite.' (Cf. Driver, Heb. Text of Sam., ad loc.). Budde and others would go further. In Jashobeam itself they find a corruption of the original name, and they recover the latter by the following steps. In B we find Ἰεβόσθε, and in Luc. Ἰεσβάαλ, from which it is inferred that ישבבשבת = ישבעל (אשבעל) = ישבשת, so that the name of David's commander was really Eshbaal. (See notes on 2 S 23^8 in Haupt's Sacred Bks. of OT, and in Kautzsch's AT). J. A. SELBIE.

JOSHIBIAH (יוֹשִׁבְיָה 'J" causeth to dwell'; Oxf. Heb. Lex. compares Phœn. ישבעל perhaps = ישבבעל). —A Simeonite chief, 1 Ch 4^{35}. See GENEALOGY.

JOSHUA (on forms and meaning of the name see next art.).—1. The successor of Moses. See next article. 2. The Bethshemite in whose field was the stone on which the ark was set, on its return from the land of the Philistines, 1 S $6^{14.\ 18}$. 3. The governor (שַׂר) of Jerusalem in the time of Josiah, 2 K 23^8. 4. The high priest who along with Zerubbabel directed affairs at Jerusalem after the restoration, Hag $1^{1.\ 12.\ 14}$ etc., Zec $3^{1.\ 3.\ 6}$ etc. In the books of Hag and Zec he is called Joshua, in Ezr and Neh Jeshua (which see).

i. THE NAME.—1. The English form Joshua is an abbreviation of the Heb. יְהוֹשׁוּעַ (only in Dt 3^{21}, Jg 2^7) or יְהוֹשֻׁעַ (the usual form, e.g. Ex 17^9, Dt 1^{38} etc., 1 K 16^{34}), later abbreviated to יֵשׁוּעַ (of Joshua himself, Neh 8^{17}) in order to avoid, it is said, the sequence of the vowels ô, û (SK, 1892, 177, 573; WZKM iv. 332 ff.). In Nu $13^{8.\ 16}$, Dt 32^{44} the form is הוֹשֵׁעַ, the same as that of the king of N. Israel (2 K 15^{30} etc.) and the prophet (Hos $1^{1.\ 2}$); but Dt 32^{44} is probably a textual error for יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, so Sam., Gr., Vulg., and Syr. (cf. Driver, in loco), and on Nu $13^{8.\ 16}$ (P) no reliance can be placed. The LXX give it as Ἰησοῦς, and so it occurs in the NT both as Joshua's own name (Ac 7^{45}) and that of our Lord (Mt $1^{21.\ 25}$). The name, Stade (Gram. 93) suggests, may be a Hiphil. More probably it is a compound 'J" is salvation.' The parallel forms אבישוע and אלישוע favour this (on this and the antiquity of the name see Gray, Heb. Proper Names, 155, 259). Cf. the Heb. אֱלִישָׁע, still more אֱלִישׁוּעַ and יְשָׁעְיָ, the Phœn. ישע, and the Himyarite יהשע, which Derenbourg transliterates Yuhashi.

Joshua the son of Nun, the successor of Moses in the leadership of Israel, is mentioned several times outside the Book of Joshua; but as the traditions concerning him are mainly found in the latter, it will be more convenient to examine its contents and composition before treating of his life.

ii. CONTENTS OF THE BOOK. — The Book of Joshua consists of twenty-four chapters, of which the first twelve take up the history of Israel from the point reached by the end of Deuteronomy, the death of Moses, and continue it through the conquest of Western Palestine; while the next nine record the division of the land among the tribes (12–21). An appendix gives Joshua's speech to Reuben, Gad, and half-Manasseh, his dismissal of them to E. Palestine (22^{1-9}); the controversy about the altar of Ed (22^{10-34}); the last days of Joshua and his death (23–24^{31}); the burial of Joseph's body (24^{32}), and the death of Eleazar son of Aaron (24^{33}).

iii. RELATION TO THE PENTATEUCH.—The Book of Joshua thus proves to be the necessary supplement and completion of the Pentateuch, of whose promises and obligations it records the fulfilment in the settlement of Abraham's descendants in Canaan (cf. Gn 12^7 etc.); in the execution (told in Deuteronomic language) of the Deuteronomic commands to Israel to take possession of the land and extirpate the Canaanites; and even in such details as the burial of Joseph's bones, which the patriarch made Israel swear they would carry up with them from Egypt (Gn 50^{25}).*

Notwithstanding this continuity of historical material and of plan, the Heb. Canon sharply separated the Book of Joshua from the Pentateuch: the Pentateuch comprises the first and earliest part of the Canon—the Torah; the Book of Joshua heads the later Canon of the Prophets, more especially the series of historical works, concluding with the Books of Kings and known as the Former Prophets. Besides, the book in its present form is an independent whole, with a definite beginning and conclusion; its orthography differs in several important details from that of the Pentateuch (e.g. it does not continue the epicene הוּא and נָעַר of the Pentateuch, nor the form האל for האלה, and spells Jericho יְרִיחוֹ not as always in the Pentateuch יְרֵחוֹ); while in consequence of its later adoption into the Canon its text (cf. the numerous deviations of the LXX) is in a less certain form. For some time, therefore, the book was not brought under the methods of criticism and analysis to which the Pentateuch was subjected in the end of last and beginning of this century. But in 1792 the Scotsman, Father Geddes, in his translation of the Bible, wrote (vol. I. Preface, p. xxi): 'To the Pentateuch I have joined the Book of Joshuah (sic), both because I conceive it to be compiled by the same author, and because it is a necessary appendix to the history contained in the former books.'† But it was de Wette, Bleek, and Ewald who were the first to extend to Joshua the documentary theory of the composition of the Penta-teuch. De Wette (see list of literature below), after vacillating, in successive editions of his Introduction, between the fragmentary and documentary hypotheses of the composition of the Pentateuch, finally adhered to the latter, and traced through Joshua the Elohist and Deuteronomic documents. In 1822 Bleek distinguished the basis of the book as Elohist, additions to it as by the Jahwist, and its final redaction as from the hands of the Deuteronomist. Soon after Bleek began his criticism, Ewald traced up to the end of Joshua all the documents into which he had already analysed the Pentateuch. The work was continued by other critics, the most prominent of whom have been Knobel, Schrader, Nöldeke, Hollenberg, Wellhausen, Vatke (whose results appear in his posthumous lectures on OT Introduction), Budde, Albers, Driver, Bennett, and Addis. Amid many varieties of opinion as to details, the analyses of this long list of scholars reveal a wonderful agreement, not only as to the presence in Joshua of all the Pentateuchal documents, but even as to the approximate proportions in which they stand to each other.* It is because of these results that OT criticism prefers to speak of the Hexateuch rather than of the Pentateuch.

† Hollenberg, in his account of the criticism of Joshua (SK, 1874, p. 463), is, therefore, so far wrong in naming de Wette as the first to recognize that the analysis of Joshua must follow the lines of that of the Pentateuch.

iv. The Constituent Documents. — Critics, then, agree that all the chief documents of the Pentateuch are present in Joshua, and indeed this is obvious to any reader of the original who is familiar with the characteristic style and favourite topics of these documents. But the documents are present with certain ambiguities and complications, and these present a number of problems unsolved and perhaps insoluble, which are peculiar to the criticism of Joshua, as contrasted with that of the Pentateuch.

In the following analysis we start with the Deuteronomic elements, the spirit and style of which are so readily recognized. We have seen that the book is faithful to the spirit of the Deuteronomic code—even to the extent of idealizing the facts—in so far as Deuteronomy commands Israel to take full possession of the land and extirpate the native inhabitants. But the Deuteronomic dialect is also frequently observed. The following is a list and analysis of the Deuteronomic passages. They are found chiefly in chs. 1–12, and in the Appendix, chs. 21–24.

(a) The Deuteronomic Passages in Joshua.—It is not without significance that the introduction is one of the most plainly Deuteronomic passages of the Book. Ch. 1 is not only written in manifest continuation of the end of the Bk. of Deuteronomy (as completed, critics now take for granted, by a Deuteronomic editor), but it is composed almost throughout in the Deuteronomic style. Vv.$^{3\text{-}5a}$ are expanded from Dt 11$^{24.\ 25a}$; Dt 31^{23} is echoed in vv.$^{5b.\ 6.\ 17b.\ 18b}$; Dt 4^{6} 29^{8} (Heb.) in v.^{7}; Dt 1$^{29.\ 30}$ 20^{3} 31^{6} in v.^{9}; Dt 11^{31} in v.^{11b}. Terms used only in Dt, or in the meaning in which they are employed in Dt, are scattered through the chapter (e.g. the intransitive ערן, and שטרים in the sense of officers who communicate the orders of the chief to the people). The appeal to the Law and the Book of the Law are also Deuteronomic, and so, too, the number of the tribes settled E. of the Jordan as 2½ (cf. v.^{12} with Dt 3$^{13\text{-}21}$), while JE (Nu 32$^{1\text{-}5.\ 20f.}$) states them as 2. At the same time there are complications. The phrases משרת משה (v.^{1}), חמשים and גבורי החיל (v.^{14}), are not phrases of the Dt style, which has other terms for the two latter; the details in v.^{11a} might have been stated by any writer. These facts have led some to conclude that a JE narrative underlies this Dt introduction to the Book. It should be observed that the Dt parallels and echoes in the chapter are all taken from the historical and parenetic portions of the Bk. of Dt which most critics now assign to another hand than that which drew up the legal kernel of the Book, chs. 12–26. 28.

In ch. 2, vv.$^{10.\ 11}$ (and perhaps v.^{24}) are not only Deuteronomic in language, but express a favourite thought of the Deuteronomist—the fear which Israel and the wonderful deeds of J″ produced on the inhabitants of W. Palestine. Chs. 3 and 4, on the Crossing of Jordan, are obviously compiled from several sources, for they contain not only differences of style, but of substance. There are, firstly, clauses in the Dt dialect deducing from the events described the Dt doctrines (3^{7} 4^{14} the magnifying of Joshua in the eyes of Israel; 4$^{21.\ 24}$ the duty of teaching future generations the meaning of the events, and the impression of these on the Canaanites); and, secondly, in other parts of the narrative, characteristic Dt phrases occur (3$^{2\text{-}4}$ הכהנים הלוים, etc.); but, thirdly also, there are traces of an original Dt account of the monument raised to commemorate the passage (4$^{2.\ 3a.\ 8}$, cf. vv.$^{21.\ 24}$), which differs from the two JE accounts of the same (see below), in so far as it makes the monument to consist of 12 stones brought by 12 men from the bed of Jordan, and places it at Gilgal. In chs. 5 and 6 (the Taking of Jericho), 5^{1}, the fear of the Canaanites has an echo of Dt, as also 6$^{2.\ 27}$ are supposed to have (cf. v.^{2} with Dt 2^{24} 3^{2} etc., and v.^{27} with Dt 2$^{7\text{-}25}$). In ch. 7 (Achan's Trespass) no Dt elements can be detected with certainty (though some seem to occur in vv.$^{12b.\ 14.\ 15}$) till the obvious Dt redaction of v.$^{24f.}$, on which see below among the JE passages. In 8$^{1\text{-}29}$ (the Taking of Ai) touches of the Dt style may be detected in vv.$^{1.\ 2.\ 27b}$.

Ch. 8$^{30\text{-}35}$ is a passage of peculiar difficulty. The linguistic evidence proves it to be in the main from the hand of a Deuteronomist editor, but besides containing, as the Dt redaction sometimes does, a trace of the priestly writer (in the phrase כנר כאורה v.^{33}), it records a fact, the building of an altar at Mt. Ebal, which conflicts with the principal law of Dt, that there shall be only one sanctuary in the land. It apparently refers to two passages in Dt (11$^{29.\ 30}$ which orders blessing to be set on Gerizim, but cursing on Ebal, and the very composite 27$^{1\text{-}13}$, which enjoins the erection of plastered stones, when Israel crosses Jordan, and the inscription on them of the Torah vv.$^{2.\ 3}$; that this shall be at Ebal v.^{4}, and that an altar of unhewn stones shall be raised there for sacrifice to Jehovah; and that the tribes shall be divided to bless opposite Gerizim and curse opposite Ebal), yet it does not wholly agree with either of these (for it records a reading of the whole law where 11^{29} speaks only of the blessing and cursing, and 27$^{1\text{-}13}$ speaks only of the writing of the Law). Jos 8$^{30\text{-}35}$ appears therefore not to have been composed with the mere view of recording the fulfilment of the aforesaid Dt injunctions (and indeed it ignores Dt 27$^{14\text{-}26}$ altogether), but to be an independent* writing based on documents, part of which, the building of the Ebal altar, cannot be Deuteronomist, but is more likely to belong to E, whose interest in northern sanctuaries is constant.† (It is to E that the corresponding passage Dt 27$^{5.\ 6}$ is assigned: on the historical questions raised by the passage, see below).

In ch. 9 (the Guile of Gibeon) the introduction

* In opposition to these analyses, defenders of the unity of the book, and (to a greater or less degree) of its independence, have appeared in J. L. König (1836), and Keil in his Commentary. See also Lex Mosaica, and Principal Douglas in his handbook on Joshua.

* The Dt passages, the first of which is an interpolation, the second an extraordinarily composite paragraph (in parts contradictory of itself), may, indeed, have been inserted in Dt subsequent to the appearance of the passage in Joshua

† The description of the altar is very like Ex 20^{25}

(vv.[1. 2], cf. Dt 1^7, Jos 1^4) and the closing words (v.[27b] the Dt formula 'the place which He shall choose') are Deuteronomic; so, too, vv.[9b. 10] (the reference to Sihon and Og) and vv.[24. 25] (cf. Dt 20^{10-18}). In ch. 10 (The Victory of Gibeon and Conquest of the South), which is covered by the Dt introduction $9^{1. 2}$, there are many fragments of the Dt style, vv.[8. 12a. 14b] (the introduction and close of the story of J which is gathered round the quotation from the Bk. of Jashar: the phrase in v.[12a] 'in the day . . . Israel' is used 9 times in Dt, and nowhere else in the Pent.; the phrase in v.[14b] יהוה נלחם לישראל is also Dt, but there is no reason why it might not have been used by another writer), and vv.[19b] (perhaps), [25]; besides vv.[28-43], the summary of the Conquest of the South, which by other documents, Jos 15^{14-19}, Jg 1^{10-15}, is attributed to Judah and Caleb. Ch. 11 (the Conquest of the North) is also treated in the summary arrangement of the Deuteronomist, and mainly in Dt language; while ch. 12 is assigned by virtually all critics to a Deuteronomic hand on the ground that vv.[1-6] follow Dt $3^{9-12. 14-17}$ rather than the parallel Nu 21^{1-31} (Og is again joined with Sihon), and that Dt touches appear in the following verses. The list of kings vv.[9-24] might be from any source.

In the Second Section of the Book, the Division of the Land, chs. 13–21, the Dt passages are few. Here again the introduction is one of them, 13^{1-14}, a summary description of the land still unconquered, and a charge to divide what is conquered among the 9½ tribes; and a description of E. Palestine studded not only with phrases but facts peculiar to the Deuteronomist (e.g. v.[14] || Dt 18^1; v.[7] 2½ tribes; v.[12] Og; cf. also vv.[7-14] generally with the Dt passage Jos 12^{1-6}). There are, too, signs of an attempt to harmonize two differing accounts of the conquest (cf. Wellh. Comp. des Hex. p. 129; Kuenen, Onderz. i. 1, § 7, n. 27). Ch. $14^{6. 7}$ is Deuteronomic; so, too, chs. $18^{7. 10b}$ 21^{41-43}, which represent the conquest of the Holy Land as in complete fulfilment of the Divine promise: a representation not consistent with other passages nor borne out by the subsequent history, but in harmony with the Deuteronomist's ideal treatment of the subject. It is remarkable that in ch. 20 the Dt additions do not occur in the LXX. In the Appendix chs. 22–24, Joshua's charge to the 2½ tribes (ch. 22^{1-8}), and his last charge to the nation (23^{1-16}), are in the well-known hortatory style of Dt.

(b) The Priestly Writing in Joshua.—It is most convenient to take this next. In the First Section, chs. 1–12, the passages from P are few and fragmentary, and consist either (a) of additions to the narrative of dates and statistics (about which, however, there is this difficulty, that, though such things are characteristic of P in the Pentateuch, they do not in Joshua always agree with other statistics given by P, and being but bare figures cannot be proved on evidence of language to belong to P); or (b) of the substitution of characteristic terms of P for the corresponding terms of other documents; or (c) of statements with regard to the ritual and enforcement of the Law. Of the first of those three classes are 3^4 (?) $4^{13. 19}$; of the second 5^4 הזכרים כל אנשי המלחמה (6^4), and the evident expansion of 7^{24} and 7^{25} וירגמו אתו כל ישראל אבן, 10^{27} עד עצם היום הזה (11^{13}); of the third class 5^{10-12} the account of the Passover, 6^{23b} 7^1 9^{17-21} 11^{13}.

In the Second Section, on the Division of the Land, the bulk is from P (all, in fact, except the Dt passages already cited, and a few from JE which will be cited immediately). This is clear from the presence of the characteristic marks of P's style, and the agreement of the injunctions with those laid down in the Priestly Legislation in the Pentateuch. Besides the bulk of the contents, the opening and closing formulas of the various paragraphs of this section are from P. In short, in this section, as in the Pentateuch, P furnishes the framework. In the Appendix, ch. 22^{9-34} (which emphasizes the centralization of the worship by the account of the altar that was 'by Jordan') displays many of the characteristic marks of P's style. There are, however, other features which suggest an independent author.

(c) The Jahwist-Elohist Documents in Joshua.—As in the Pentateuch, the bulk of the narrative in Joshua belongs to the double document, known to critics as JE. To the trained eye the style is easily distinguished from that of Dt or P. When, however, we seek to discriminate its two constituents, which in the Pentateuch are so often discernible from each other, we receive little or no assistance from the style or the language. It exhibits, however, another and far more decisive difference. Again and again in the JE portions of Joshua it becomes evident that two accounts of the same event have been welded together, for the statements not only repeat each other with a redundancy utterly foreign to the crisp style of either of the two documents J and E, but in details often conflict with each other. In ch 1 there are only fragments of JE. Ch 2 is all JE, except vv.[10. 11]. So, too, chs. 3. 4, the Crossing of Jordan, except the Dt fragments noted above. But when these have been put aside, the remainder reveals the presence of two narratives (as Wellhausen was the first to point out); according to one of which a monument to commemorate the Passage was built at Gilgal with stones taken from the river's bed by the people, but according to the other was set up in the river's bed, and consisted of 12 stones carried by 12 representatives of the tribes. This difference (in addition to the 3rd story of the Deuteronomist referred to above) is apparent not only from the statements in $4^{8. 9}$, but from the fact that while 3^{17} describes the people as having all passed over, $4^{4. 5. 10b}$ treat them as still about to cross. Again, 3^{12} and 4^2 cannot belong to the same narrative, for they are simply 'doublets'; yet 3^{12} is presupposed by 4^4. The two narratives may be thus distinguished—(1) $3^{1. 5. 10. 11. 13-17}$ $4^{1-3. 8}$; and (2) 3^{12} $4^{4-7. 9-11a}$. Of these two accounts it is not easy to say which is J and which E.

Ch. 5 (events between Jordan and Jericho) is one of the most complicated parts of the text of Joshua. V.[1], as we have seen, is Dt. Vv.[2. 3. 8. 9] (the record of the circumcision of the people by Joshua), are from JE. But into v.[2] words have been inserted—they are not found in the LXX—implying that Joshua did this a second time; and vv.[4-7] (the LXX here offers a widely different reading) interpolate an account of the reasons of the operation, which is not consistent with JE's statement in v.[9], that it was undertaken for the purpose of 'rolling away the reproach of Egypt.' These words are in themselves an obviously wrong interpretation of the term Gilgal, i.e. 'stone-circle,' and can only mean that in the opinion of the writer Israel had been uncircumcised in Egypt, and that this neglect, which had excited the reproach of the circumcised Egyptians, was now at last repaired. In contradiction to this, vv.[4-7] declare that the Israelites while in Egypt were circumcised, but that generation had all died, and those who were born after the Exodus had not been circumcised, which neglect Joshua now made good. The phraseology of these four verses is partly P's, but most critics take them, along with the words interpolated in v.[2], to be the addition of a later writer, who was anxious to harmonize JE's account with previous reports of P about circumcision. The end of ch. 5 (vv.[13-15]) also presents a difficulty. It is generally assigned to JE; but some critics, on the alleged ground that the phrases צבא יהוה and שר as applied to an angel are found only in late writings, take the passage to be one of the very latest additions to the Bk. of Joshua. So Kuenen. This reason is not conclusive. It was an early belief that Jehovah had a heavenly host (cf. 1 K 22^{19}), the belief in individual angels with special functions was also early, and we need not take שר in the special sense in which it is intended when applied to angels in the Bk. of Daniel, but simply in its early signification of a military officer. Vv.$^{13\text{-}15}$ may therefore very well be left to JE.

The whole of ch. 6 (the Fall of Jericho), except vv.$^{2 \text{ and } 27}$, belongs to JE, but we meet in it the same phenomenon as in chs. 3 and 4, the presence (again first detected by Wellhausen) of two differing accounts—one (vv.$^{3.\ 7a.\ 10.\ 11}$ partly $^{14.\ 15a}$ 'and it came to pass . . . manner,' $^{15b.\ 20}$ 'and the people shouted') which relates that Israel marched round Jericho on 7 successive days, the first 6 silently, but on the 7th they shouted at the word of Joshua, and the walls fell; and the other (vv.^{4} partly, $^{5.\ 7b.\ 8.\ 9}$, parts of vv.$^{13.\ 15}$, vv.$^{16a.\ 20b}$) which relates that a portion of the armed men marched round the city 7 times on one day, having in their midst the ark and priests with trumpets, and that at the 7th round the people shouted at the signal of the trumpets, and the walls fell. Cf. especially vv.^{16} $^{\text{and } 20}$; in the latter the people shout both before and after the trumpets, though v.^{16} enjoins them not to shout till the trumpets give the signal. As in chs. 3. 4 it is not easy to assign these double accounts, present in ch. 6, respectively to J and E.

In ch. 7 (the Defeat before Ai and Achan's Sin and Doom) all is from JE except v.^{1} and parts of vv.$^{24.\ 25}$. The latter verses afford so instructive an example as to how the original JE narrative has been worked upon by subsequent editors that it is worth examining their details. To begin with, the LXX omits in v.^{24} the words ואת־הכסף—הוהב, and in v.^{25} וירגמו—באש. Moreover, in v.^{24} the term 'and all Israel' has been separated from its fellow-nominative 'Joshua' at the beginning of the verse * by the words omitted in the LXX, and by the rest of the catalogue of Achan's property, while in v.^{25} not only does the phrase beginning וירגמו 'and they stoned him with stones,' which is in the language of P, form a mere doublet to the phrase introduced by ויסקלו 'and they stoned them with stones,' but when we remove the former, the latter is still preceded by the words 'and they burned them with fire,' an impossible order: we cannot conceive of Achan and his property as first burned and then stoned. Besides, while v.^{26}, which is JE, speaks of a cairn being raised over Achan alone, v.^{24} describes them as brought up to the valley of Achor, and v.^{25} describes them as being burned and stoned. Of this confusion Albers has given the following reasonable explanation. The original JE narrative recorded the punishment only of Achan, but a Deuteronomic editor, wishing to bring the process into conformity with Dt $13^{16.\ 17}$, which enjoins that goods subject to the Ḥerem or Ban shall be burned, has added to v.^{24} the catalogue of Achan's property, which we have already seen to be an evident intrusion, and to v.^{25} the notice of the burning which we have seen to be impossible before that of the stoning. This editor must have also changed the 'him' of both these verses into 'them'; it is remarkable that in both the LXX has 'him.' If, now, we take out of the verses those intruded elements of Dt and P, the JE remainder reads consistently: 'And Joshua, and all Israel with him, took Achan the son of Zerah, and brought him (LXX A) to the valley of Achor; and Joshua said, "Why hast thou brought trouble upon us? Jehovah will bring trouble upon thee." And they stoned him (LXX BA; αὐτούς F) with stones.'

* Though in AV they have been brought together.

In ch. $8^{1\text{-}29}$ (the Taking of Ai) everything except the Dt fragments already noticed is from JE. But as in chs. 3. 4. 6, two accounts appear to have been fused (though it is not certain how we are to divide them between J and E). This is clear not only from the reduplication of certain details (vv.$^{14.\ 18}$ etc., see below), and awkward connexions (v.^{14}, and v.^{18} with v.^{19}), but still more from a double and contradictory story of the ambush, as well as from an attempt in the Massoretic text to reconcile these, and from the omission by the LXX both of the attempt and of the contradictory data. The first of the two accounts starts with v.^{3} (perhaps earlier, for though vv.$^{1.\ 2}$ are mainly Dt, they contain other elements). According to this, after Joshua and all the army started from Gilgal for Ai, he chose and sent forward * 30,000 (? 3000) men by night to conceal themselves on the opposite or western side of Ai, and charged them to wait there till the army should pretend to flee from Ai, and drawing its inhabitants out of it, leave it empty, when the ambush were to take possession. The men chosen go forth and effect this movement, while Joshua passes the same night in the valley (in v.^{9} for עם read with Ewald עכא). At this point the second account starts from v.^{10}, or at least from v.^{11}, which relates that all the people (omit for grammatical reasons the words 'of war') which were with him came over against Ai,† and (v.^{12}) Joshua took about 5000 men and 'set them as an ambush between Bethel and Ai, westward of Ai.' Then comes the difficult v.^{13}, which seems an attempt to combine and summarize the two accounts. The Greek translator, or the editor of the texts he used, feeling that the combination was impossible, has substituted for 8^{11b} the word 'eastward,' and for ^{12b}, with its contradictory data, the words 'the ambushes of the city from the sea (i.e. westward)'; and has omitted all v.^{13}. To this explanation the only alternative is that the data in v.^{12}, which conflict with those of the previous account of the ambush, and v.^{13} have been added to the Massoretic text after the LXX translation was made, which is hardly possible. V.^{14} alike by its repetitions, in different words, of the same actions and the awkward grammar by which they are combined, is obviously the fusion of two accounts—one: 'And it came to pass, when the king of Ai saw, that he and all his people hastened to the . . .‡ in front of the Arabah, not knowing of the ambush against them behind (to the west of) the city'; the other: 'And the men of the city rose up early, and came forth to meet Israel in battle.' The Israelites flee, and draw the men of Ai§ after them. Here, again, in vv.$^{16.\ 17}$ there are small doublets, and so, in fact, to the end of v.^{29} (e.g. in v.^{20b} the people fleeing to the wilderness 'turn on their pursuers,' omitted by LXX; yet in v.^{21} 'Joshua and all Israel see that the ambush have

* V.^{3a}. Some scholars think that according to this first account Joshua sent his ambush ahead from Gilgal. This can be maintained only by denying that v.^{3a} belongs to the first account. But there is no cause in the clause itself for separating it from what follows. And it is not probable that any account would have made Joshua send the ambush ahead from Gilgal, for this place is 6 or 7 hours distant from Ai, and if the main body had remained there during the night in which the ambush took up its position west of Ai, starting next morning, it would not have reached Ai till the ambush had been exposed for several hours to the daylight. Take v.^{3a} with what follows it, and we find the first account imply that the ambush was not chosen and despatched till the whole army had gone up towards Ai, which does not contradict the second and more detailed account, that it started after Joshua and the army had arrived in the neighbourhood of Ai.

† This still may be, though not probably, the first account.

‡ למועד 'to the appointed place.' Dillmann's theory, that one of the two narratives had previously described this tryst, is surely impossible, for the men of Ai did not know of Israel's arrival. Bennett emends למורד 'to the descent.'

§ Heb. adds 'and Bethel,' but LXX omits; it must be the addition of a late scribe inserting an allusion to Jg 1.

taken the city, and that smoke goes up, and turn and smite the men of Ai'; and in v.[24] במדבר בשדה). These are quite enough (without supposing that a different use has been imputed to Joshua's javelin in v.[18] from that in v.[26]) to prove the fusion of two tales of the same event. V.[27] is of course Dt. In the Dt passage vv.[30-35] the part that must have been taken from E has been already pointed out.

In ch. 9 (the Guile of Gibeon), after the Dt introduction in vv[1. 2], the JE narrative commences independently in v.[3]. Its style is distinguishable from the Dt portions, vv.[9b. 10. 24. 25. 27b]; and both in style and substance it differs from the P account, vv.[15b. 17-21]. But even within JE a double account is as discernible as it was in the JE portions of chs. 3. 4. 6 and 8: cf. the doublets in vv.[6-9a].* In ch. 10[1-27] we have the JE account of the defeat by Joshua of the kings of Jerusalem, Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish, and Debir, all with territories that afterwards became Judah's. Vv.[1-11. 16-27] read continuously, and relate fully how God smote the Canaanites before Israel by a great hailstorm. Vv.[12-15] break into this with a story suggested by an ancient verse of poetry, a prayer of Joshua for a day long enough to slay his foes; they add that this prayer was answered by God commanding the sun to stand still for a whole day in the heavens, and that Joshua and his force returned to their camp; while vv.[16ff.] relate that they continued the pursuit of the 5 kings whose forces had been beaten by the hailstorm recounted in v.[11]. Vv.[12-15] are plainly an interpolation by another, who finding in the Bk. of Jashar this poetical ejaculation of Joshua for a day sufficient for his big task, prosaically added, vv.[13b. 14], that this actually happened. This account of the defeat of the southern kings is not compatible with that in ch. 15[13ff.] and in Jg 1[1ff.] (see below, § vii.). In ch. 11[1-10. 13] we have the JE account of the conquest of N. Canaan.

In the Second Section, chs. 13–21, on the Division of the Land, the portions by JE are comparatively few, some of them mere fragments: in ch. 13, vv.[1-13], in ch. 15, vv.[14-19. 63] (see below, § vii.), in ch. 16, vv.[1-3], the boundary of Joseph; v.[10] the Canaanite enclaves at Gezer and in Ephraim, the latter assigned to E; in ch. 17, vv.[1-2] details on Manasseh, and vv.[16b-18] Manasseh's difficulties with the Canaanites and Joshua's treatment of the house of Joseph; in ch. 18, vv.[2-6. 8-10] Joshua's allotment of land to 7 tribes, by casting lots; in ch. 19[9] a detail about Simeon, vv.[47. 48] the removal of Dan to Laish (see below, § vii.), and vv.[49. 50] the tribes take possession and Joshua gets Timnath-serah.

In the Appendix (chs. 22–24) the whole of ch. 24, except a few insertions from Dt and P, is assigned to E.

v. Problems of the Relation and Composition of the Documents. — The evidence thus collected from the text itself of the Bk. of Joshua, may be ambiguous in this or that detail; but its cumulative force and its main direction are unmistakable. Were it only by the 'doublets' it contains on the various episodes of the conquest, and by the different degrees of completeness to which various passages describe the division of the land to have been carried, the Bk. of Joshua is amply proved to be a compilation from several sources. Of these, the oldest, which supplies the bulk of the narrative of the conquest in chs. 1–12, and gives the conclusion of Joshua's history in ch. 24, but also supplies some details concerning the division of the land, belongs by linguistic evidence to the document entitled by critics JE. This document is itself composed from two narratives; for, as we have seen, in those parts of it which run through chs. 3, 4, 6 and 8, two accounts of the same episodes, the crossing of Jordan and the taking of Jericho and of Ai, have obviously been combined;* and in chs. 13–21, later passages (18[2-6. 8-10] and perhaps others) have been added to it, whether by the hand that combined its constituents it is impossible to say. Alongside these written traditions in JE of the Conquest and Division of the Land, there appears to have existed, either in whole or part, at least one other written tradition, and perhaps two. The passages in chs. 1–12, which on linguistic evidence are assignable to P, seem to have been taken from a Priestly narrative of the Conquest, and there was certainly a Priestly account of the Division of the Territory from which the bulk of chs. 13–21 is taken. But there are also accounts of some events of the Conquest, notably that of the monument at Gilgal (4[2. 3a. 8], cf. vv.[21-24]), and the summary of the Conquest of the South (9[28-43]), which seem to imply that there was, in addition to the two other accounts just noted above, one independent Deuteronomic account of the Conquest.

But if the existence of an original Dt narrative of the facts of the Conquest be uncertain, there was another hand at work of the same spirit and style of language. In chs. 1–12 the great majority of the Dt passages do not give evidence of belonging to an independent account of the same events as are described in JE, but consist of introductions to the various sections, the bulk of the narrative in which is JE, and of connexions and transitions; or they point out how the events related in JE illustrate the favourite doctrines of the Deuteronomic writers and enforce the Deuteronomic legislation. All these passages are easily separable from the narratives to which they have been added, and sometimes (as in ch. 7[24. 25]) it is clear that their insertion has not been accomplished without the modification of the original text. And, besides, single phrases characteristic of the Dt style have been scattered over most of the chapters. All this points to one conclusion. A Deuteronomic writer has 'edited,' not only chs. 1–12, but the whole book. His is the framework of the whole, his its connexion with the Bk. of Deuteronomy, the modification of the JE narratives, and the lessons deduced from them. Who he was, whether he can be identified with the author of the original Dt law-book (which is improbable), or the author of the historical supplements to the latter, or was another writer of the same spirit and style, are questions that divide critics, and depend on the still unsettled problems as to the composition of the Bk. of Deuteronomy itself.† It would be misleading, however, to take for granted that this Deuteronomic redaction was completed by one hand at one time. The reasons for supposing that various strata (though all in the Deuteronomic spirit and style) are represented in it will appear from the next paragraph.

The question of the relation of this Deuteronomic redaction (or redactions) to the elements of P which appear in Joshua is a very difficult one. Was the Dt redaction (or redactions) completed upon JE and the independent Dt traditions (described above), and was the whole only then

* The attempt by Budde, p. 50, to get rid of the differences by emending the text, has not convinced critics.

* We have also seen that it is not possible to assign these, on linguistic evidence, respectively to J and E.

† See the discussions in the works, cited below, of Hollenberg, Kuenen, Dillmann, and Kittel. Hollenberg's conclusion is that not the original Deuteronomist, but the Deuteronomic editor who combined Deuteronomy with the rest of the Pentateuch and added to it chs. 1–4. 27. 29–31, is the writer of these passages in Joshua. Dillmann assigns them in the main to the author of the Bk. of Deuteronomy; Kuenen, either to a writer or writers akin in spirit and style to the author of Dt 1–4, etc.; so virtually Kittel, to a D^2 whom (not certainly but on the whole) he takes to have been different from D^1. There is a curious difference between the Dt passage Jos 1[3-5] and D^2 11[24. 25a]; but it is not very great, and does not carry us far in the discussion of the question.

combined with the passages from P? Or did the Dt redaction take place subsequently to P? The former of these alternatives is accepted by Driver (Introd.[6] p. 104). But there is important evidence in favour of the latter. In the Bk. of Joshua, P does not occupy the regulative position, nor supply the framework, as it does in the Pentateuch. And in the Massoretic text of Joshua portions of P have apparently been subjected to the Dt revision; in ch. 20, for instance, the substance is from P, the additional matter is Deuteronomic (see vv.[4-6]). Again, while most of the Dt passages appear in the LXX translation, and are therefore to be regarded as prior to it, a number are not found in it. For example, in ch. $7^{24.25}$ we saw that the LXX reproduces only some of the Dt modifications of the JE account of Achan's punishment, and the verses ch. 20^{4-6} (just cited), in which Deuteronomic additions are manifest, are not found in the LXX (B). It is also probable that ch. 22^{9-34} was written subsequently to the Priestly Code (cf. W. R. Smith, OTJC[2] 413, and Bennett, Primer, 90). Throughout the book, too, we find some words from a very late stage of the language (Dillmann, p. 442). All this implies that what Bennett (Bk. Jos. p. 22) calls 'very probable' is a certainty: the Deuteronomic redaction of the Bk. of Joshua is from more than one hand. Some of it, according to the evidence of the LXX, must be very late. Accordingly we understand why no author's name has been assigned to the Bk. of Joshua:* it takes its title from its subject and is an anonymous work. The points upon which an early author, or even one contemporary with the events described, has been assumed, are either illusory (e.g. the reading of 5^1 עברנ should be עברם), or can only prove the date of one or other of the constituent documents. The final redaction affords no historical allusion by which its date might be fixed.

vi. Separation from the Pentateuch, and Date.—Another set of problems is raised by the relation of Joshua to the Pentateuch. Most critics have held that the Bk. of Joshua was separated from the rest of the Pentateuch after JE, D, and P had been combined, but Bennett (A Primer of the Bible, 1897, p. 90) thinks that the JE, D, and P portions of Jos were combined by another and later editor than the editor who combined the same documents in the Pentateuch. This is certainly borne out by the different rank, alluded to above, which is assigned to P in the Pentateuch and in Joshua. But, whatever be the answer to these questions, the reason of the separation of the Book of Joshua from the Pentateuch when the latter became canonical in Israel in Ezra's time is very intelligible. The legislation really closes with Deuteronomy and the account of Moses' death, and it was legislation which Ezra and Nehemiah were anxious to enforce. That the Bk. of Joshua was not regarded in Israel as what we call canonical till long after the Torah or Five Books of Moses had reached that rank, is clear from the difference between it and them in the LXX translation. While it is evident, from the comparatively few discrepancies between the Massoretic text and that of the LXX, that the text of the Torah had long been guarded with care before the LXX translation was made, the many discrepancies in the Bk. of Joshua, the freedom with which the Greek translator or translators allowed themselves to omit and to modify, prove that when the LXX translation of it was made Joshua was not regarded as of canonical rank. The admission to the Canon of the Prophetical Books, to which it belongs, is generally held to have been about 200 B.C.

vii. Relation to the Book of Judges.—But the problems of the analysis of the Bk. of Joshua cannot be fully stated without some comparison of its data of the Conquest with those furnished in the opening chapters of the Bk. of Judges. We have seen that in the Bk. of Joshua there are two different conceptions of how the Conquest was achieved. One is that shared by both D and P: that the Conquest of the Land was completed and the inhabitants exterminated by Joshua, and thereupon the various territories were occupied by the tribes to which he allotted them. The other, very evident from the fragments of J, in the second half of the book, takes the Conquest to have been gradual and partial. This, the older conception, is that which is supported by the Bk. of Judges. In Jg 1–2^5 we have fragments of an account of the Conquest, which an editor has found irreconcilable with the conception that dominates the Bk. of Joshua, and has therefore, by an introductory clause, Jg 1^{1a}, transferred to the days after Joshua's death. This, however, is impossible: we cannot conceive that Israel having gained full possession of Western Palestine and exterminated the Canaanites, was after Joshua's death driven back upon Jericho and began a second series of campaigns which gradually restored the country to them. In itself this is impossible; and that the campaigns in Jg 1 happened in Joshua's lifetime is implied not only by the account of his death which follows them in Jg 2 ff., but proved by the fact that the same episodes (e.g. Hebron and Caleb, Debir and Othniel) which are related in Jg 1 as happening after Joshua's death are in the Bk. of Joshua itself related as happening while he still directed the allotment of the territories. Omit Jg 1^{1a} and several other verses in the same chapter which are obvious insertions by an editor and some of which flatly contradict verses that stand next them, and what is left affords an account of the Conquest which is in harmony (as already said) with the older of the two conceptions, contained in the Bk. of Joshua.*

The relation to each other of these parallel passages in the Bk. of Joshua and in Jg 1 has been differently estimated by critics. Yet the facts appear to shut out all the alternatives but one. Not only do the parallels agree (as has just been said) in their general conception of the conquest—that it took place through the efforts of separate tribes, and with incomplete results rather than (as the view of P and D which prevails in the Bk. of Joshua conceives it) by all Israel acting together and with a complete extermination of the 'inhabitants of the land'; but in parts the parallels agree word for word, and they both contain the same characteristic terms and phrases.

The following table represents the agreements and differences:—

Jg $1^{1.}$ (except the first clause)$^{2.3.5.6.7}$: The beginning of Judah's and Simeon's campaign, and their defeat of Adoni-bezek. Jos $10^{1ff.}$: After Joshua's capture of Ai and treaty with Gibeon, Adoni-zedek (LXX Adoni-bezek; the reading Adoni-zedek has perhaps arisen as some echo of another ancient king of Jerusalem, Melchi-zedek), king of Jerusalem, with the kings of Jarmuth, Lachish, and Eglon, having attacked Gibeon, is defeated by Joshua and all Israel in the battle of Beth-horon, and afterwards slain.

Jg $1^{19.20.10-15}$: After Judah receives the hill-country for an inheritance, Caleb in obedience to a command by Moses receives Hebron, and takes it, slaying its Anakite lords;

* That Joshua is the author is asserted in the Talmud, 'Baba bathra,' 14^2. It has been maintained by a few Rom. Cath. and Protestant scholars, and even in this century by, e.g., J. L. König, AT Stud. i. 1836. But see Calvin's sane words in his Argt.

* On Jg 1 f. consult Wellhausen, Comp. d. Hex. 213–215; E. Meyer, ZATW i. p. 135 ff.; but especially Budde, both in ZATW vii. p. 94 ff., and Richt. u. Samuel, pp. 2 ff., 84–89; and Moore, Judges, in the Internat. Crit. Comm. p. 3 ff. The verses to be eliminated from Jg 1–2^5 are $1a.\ 4.\ 8.\ 9.18.\ 36\ 21b\text{-}5a.\ 8$. Of these 14 is redundant in face of vv.[5-7]; v.[8], intimating the capture of Jerus is contradicted by later history and the rest of the narrative.

he offers his daughter to the conqueror of Kiriath-sepher. This is 'Othniel. 'Othniel receives Achsah, Caleb's daughter, and with her the 'upper and lower Guloth.' Jos $15^{13ff.}$: Caleb, in obedience to a divine command by Joshua, receives Hebron, slaying its Anakite lords; then from v.16 the story of Debir, 'Othniel, and Achsah follows exactly as in Jg $1^{12ff.}$.

Jg $1^{16.\ 17}$: The settlement of the Kenite and conquest of Simeon's land find no parallel in Joshua.

Jg 1^{21}: The continued hold of the Jebusite upon Jerusalem, the sons of Benjamin do not drive him out. Jos 15^{63}: The same, but it is the sons of Judah who are said not to have been able to drive out the Jebusite.

Jg 1^{22-26}: The house of Joseph go up to Bethel, and with them Jehovah (an unusual expression, and not found in the relation of the other campaigns; for Jehovah LXX reads Judah; Budde reasonably conjectures Joshua as the original reading); the house of Joseph takes Bethel. To this there is no parallel in the Bk. of Joshua; but a reminiscence of the capture of Bethel crops up in the story of the taking of Ai, Jos 8^{17} 'Ai and Bethel' (but this is omitted by the best MSS of LXX).

Jg $1^{27.\ 28}$: Manasseh did not dispossess the inhabitants of Beth-shan, Taanach, Dor, Ibleam, Megiddo, and their subject villages. But the Canaanite resolved to dwell in that land. When Israel grew strong they forced Canaanites to work for them. Jos $17^{12.\ 13}$: The Bene-Manasseh were not able to dispossess the inhabitants of Beth-shan, Ibleam, Dor, En-dor, Taanach, Megiddo, but the Canaanite resolved to dwell in this land; when the Bene-Israel grew strong they forced the Canaanites to work for them.

Jg 1^{29}: Ephraim did not dispossess the Canaanite of Gezer, but the C. dwelt in his midst in Gezer. ‖Jos 16^{10}: And he (Ephraim) did not dispossess the Canaanite who dwelt in Gezer, but the C. dwelt in the midst of Ephraim to this day, and 'had to take up the forced service of a labourer.'

Jg 1^{30-33}: Zebulun, Asher, and Naphtali did not dispossess the Canaanites of certain towns. No parallels to this in Jos.

Jg $1^{34.\ 35}$: The Amorites forced the Bene-Dan into the hill-country, and did not allow them to come down into the 'emek. And the Amorite resolved to dwell in Mt. Heres in Aijalon and in Sha'albim, and the hand of the house of Joseph was heavy, and they were reduced to forced labour. Jos 19^{47}: And the Bene-Dan went up and fought with Leshem and took it, and smote it at the edge of the sword, and took possession of it, and dwelt in it, and called Leshem Dan after Dan their father. From these two passages Budde proposes to restore the full text of the original in this order: Jg 1^{34}, Jos 19^{47a}, (LXX) ^{47b}, Jg 1^{35} (cf. the LXX additions to Jos 19^{47b}).

This comparison, besides revealing the similarity of general conception and identity of several passages and characteristic phrases, shows that the passages in Jg 1, besides being set under a wrong date (v.1a 'after the death of Joshua'), have been 'edited' to serve the purpose of the compiler of this part of the Bk. of Judges, which as revealed in ch. 2^{1b-4} is that the failure to dispossess all the Canaanites is the reason why Jehovah proceeded now to punish Israel. For instance, the passages in Joshua generally declare that the tribes were not able to drive out certain Canaanite communities; in Jg 1 the words in italics are omitted.* And in v.21 the Benjamites have been substituted for Judah, which is given in the parallel Jos 15^{63}. From all this it is clear that in the Bk. of Joshua we have the more original text of these passages; it is impossible that the editor of that book took them from Jg 1. Nor is the converse probable; for in the Bk. of Joshua, as we have seen, these passages have been inserted in a setting, the whole tendency of which is to give a conception of the conquest different from that to which they testify. There remains possible, therefore, only this conclusion, as Budde has clearly exhibited, that the editors, both of the Bk. of Joshua and of Jg 1 f., have taken them from a common source. This source, with its conception of the conquest so different from that of D and P, must, in our ignorance of any other sources of the Hexateuch, be assigned to JE. Can we decide whether it belongs to J or E? It so happens that in ch. 24 we have a piece which, for very obvious reasons, critics are agreed in assigning to E. But its conception of the conquest approaches too nearly to that of the Deuteronomic redaction of Joshua to allow us to assign to its author the passages in question. We have therefore no alternative but to regard them as the work of J, or at least of the series of writers designated by that letter. So, for instance, Kittel, Driver (in Smith's Dict. of the Bible[2], vol. i. pt. ii. p. 1816), and especially Budde (ZATW vii. 155 ff.), who assigns them, not to the original J, but to the Jahwistic redactor. And to the same hand we must assign, of course, a number of other passages in the Bk. of Joshua which, though they are not found among the parallels present in Jg 1, plainly supplement the latter, and are ruled by the same conception of the conquest, viz. that it was partial, for there were many Canaanite communities and groups of communities whom the tribes could not drive out. These are Jos 13^{13} 17^{14-18}, and probably the simpler forms of the doublets in the JE portions of chs. 1–12, and among them we must also include the additional matter which ch. 19^{47} contributes to the story of Dan as related in Jg $1^{34.\ 35}$. See, further, art. JUDGES (BOOK OF), where on several points a different view is maintained from that represented in the present article.

viii. THE HISTORICAL VALUE OF THE BOOK OF JOSHUA. — We have seen — upon evidence afforded by itself, philological and textual—that the final redaction of the book must be placed very late in the history of Israel: certainly after Ezra's time, perhaps not till the 3rd cent. B.C. We have seen, too, that this redaction includes widely differing accounts of how the conquest and division of the land were accomplished: a Deuteronomic writer and the Priestly writer represent it to have been thorough, and effected in one generation by the whole nation acting together; the Jahwistic document (with ch. 1 of the Bk. of Judges) represents it as the work of separate tribes, and to have been far from complete. When we accept the latter alternative, not only as that of the older record, but as the only one in harmony with the data of the subsequent history under the Judges and Kings, our difficulties are not at an end. For, first, the Jahwistic document cannot be proved to be earlier than the 9th cent. B.C.; and, second, before being used by the editor of the whole book, it has been combined with the Elohist document in a form which contains such varying accounts of the different episodes of the Conquest as were likely to arise in the many centuries of tradition between the Conquest and the dates of the two constituent documents. These present, too, other difficulties. They are defective: it is remarkable that neither says a word about the conquest of the midlands of Western Palestine, the lands afterwards occupied by Manasseh and Ephraim, although one of them (E) appears to have related the celebration of a solemn service at Shechem, the centre of that region, soon after the crossing of Jordan and in obedience to a word of Moses; while both of them appear to contain a few data that could not have been inserted till long after Israel's settlement in W. Palestine.* All these facts, presented to us, be it observed, by the biblical record itself, oblige us to subject the JE narrative to examination upon the ordinary principles of historical criticism. The first question we have to ask is: are there any signs in JE of the employment of older documents? In the early books of the OT such ancient material is usually found in the citation of poetical fragments. Of such the Bk of Joshua contains only one ($10^{12.\ 13}$)

* In v.19b the omission of the words is very plain; the infinit. להוריש cannot be construed without them.

* e.g. in the history of the treaty with Gibeon, though, as we shall see, there is no reason for denying the main fact of such a treaty at the time of Joshua. The contradiction with later history, which is alleged by some to exist in Jos 6^{26}—the abandonment of the site of Jericho (cf. Jg 3^{13}, which represents Jericho as an inhabited town)—may be explained by a change of site.

which may be assigned (though this is not the opinion of all critics) to J. 'Thus Joshua spake to Jehovah . . . and said in presence of all Israel—

> Sun stay upon Gibeon, and moon on the valley of Aijalon.
> And the sun stayed, and the moon stood till the people took vengeance of their enemies.

Is it not written in the Book of Jashar?'* This ancient fragment witnesses to two facts: (a) that Israel had to fight at this particular point of their advance into W. Palestine, and (b) the presence there of Joshua. But the fragment stands alone in the book; on all other points we have to argue upon considerations of a general kind.

The first point which appears to be sufficiently established is the national unity of Israel, before and when they crossed the Jordan. This, it is true, has been denied. Stade (GVI i. 134 ff.) and others suppose that the Israelite occupation of W. Palestine proceeded gradually and peacefully—by the drifting across Jordan, one by one, of various Israelite clans, before the pressure of their increasing numbers and in desire for room and food. But the theory of a peaceful invasion is contradicted no less by the general force of tradition than by the historic probabilities; while the national unity is certified, not only by the earliest memories of the people (Bk. of Jg, passim) and the unanimous voice of later tradition, but by the fact that the great cause and reason of such a unity, the possession by the tribes of a common faith and a common shrine, had already been achieved by the labours of Moses. The later unity of Israel, accomplished among the separating influences of W. Palestine, geographical, social, religious, would not have been possible unless Israel had already been united before entering these. Nor do the accounts in the Bks. of Jos and Jg relate, before the capture of Jericho, anything contradictory to the theory of such a unity; it is only from Jericho onwards that J describes the tribes as separately undertaking the conquest of their respective territories. Moreover, although J represents separate conquests after Jericho, it assumes, and even explicitly states, that these were preceded by a common understanding of how the work of conquest was to be divided and the territories assigned (Jos 15^{13} $17^{14ff.}$, Jg 1^{1}). If we accept this evidence of J (as against Dt and P), that the conquest was achieved by separate tribes, we should surely receive its testimony that the direction and plan proceeded from a common centre; especially when the unity of Israel, at the time of crossing Jordan, is rendered so probable by the considerations quoted above. (See Smith, HGHL, Appen. II.; McCurdy, HPM ii. 112).

ix. The Person of Joshua.—We are now able to consider the person of Joshua himself. The attempt has been made to relegate, not only the deeds, but the personality of this great leader to the domain of legend and myth. Stade (GVI i. p. 135) and others† have fastened on the undoubted fact that in each successive stratum of the tradition Joshua is made to play a more active and regulative part in the allotment and conquest of the territory. They assert that he is not mentioned by J, and that we can trace the origin of him to E. E is an Ephraimitic document, Joshua an Ephraimitic hero. And the inference is drawn by these critics, that, to begin with, Joshua is no more a person than, say, the 'Judah and Simeon his brother' of Jg 1^{3}; but only the personification of a Josephide clan, whose centre was Timnath-serah (Jos 19^{50} 24^{30}) or Timnath-heres (Jg 2^{9})* in the S.W. of the hill-country of Ephraim.†

But, as Kuenen says, the fact that Joshua appears with increasing importance through the later strata of tradition, so far from being a proof that he did not appear in the earliest stratum, strongly supports the presupposition that he was present there. And, as a matter of fact, Joshua does appear in J (Jos 17^{14-18}), not merely as the leader of Ephraim or of a part of that tribe, as E represents him, but as the arbiter over all Israel to whom the tribes appeal when they are disappointed with the territory allotted to them. Nor is it possible to deny that Joshua appears in the simpler form of the double JE narratives of the taking of Jericho and Ai, and of the treaty with Gibeon; which form Budde has very successfully argued to belong to J (ZATW vii. pp. 134–146, 155–157). Budde has also proposed the restoration of Joshua's name to Jg 1^{22} 'And the house of Joseph went up to Bethel, and Joshua with them.'‡ Moreover, Joshua is the speaker in the ancient poetical fragment (ch. $10^{12.13}$). And in conformity with these descriptions of all Israel acting under one leader, at least up to the taking of Ai, ch. 10^{6} states that the army returned to Gilgal after Ai was taken, and, similarly, v.^{15} brings them there again after the battle of Beth-horon. These verses probably belong to E.

There is, then, no point in the development of the tradition at which we can say, Here Joshua was added for the first time to the story. So far back as we can trace it, Joshua is part of the tradition, and he appears upon that line of it, the Judæan J, in which there was no temptation to create him as a tribal hero, for he does not belong to Judah but to Ephraim. On the other hand, the rest of the data of the tradition and the historical probabilities require Israel to have been under one head. In the absence of contemporary evidence, these are all the proofs of his historical reality which it is possible to obtain. But surely they are sufficient. If, as is probable, the poetical fragment is genuine, Joshua's existence as the Captain of all Israel is put beyond doubt.

x. Joshua's Work. — Joshua, then, was the successor of Moses, and led all Israel across Jordan. All the documents appear to agree that the crossing took place opposite to Jericho,—appear, for even here a difficulty arises. As we have seen, one of them, E, makes a statement, found both in Dt and Jos, to the effect that Israel were summoned by Moses to celebrate their arrival in W. Palestine by setting up a monument, with the law written upon it, at Shechem. Now Shechem, besides being the centre of the land, would naturally be the first goal of any invasion of W. Palestine from the other side of Jordan. No one can doubt this who is familiar with the aspect which W. Palestine presents to an observer from the site occupied by Israel in the N. of Moab. A wall of mountain, broken only by narrow gorges, runs far N. of Jericho; the first break in it, the first invitation to invade W. Palestine, is the great pass, the Wady Fera'a, which leads up from Jordan to Shechem; and it is at its mouth that the fords across Jordan are most easy. Take this geographical fact along with the evidence furnished by E, and at first sight it is hard to resist the inference of at least the probability of an invasion

* The rest of v.^{13} is a prose statement that the prayer of Joshua for a long day in which to complete the rout of the enemy, was fulfilled by the literal halt of sun and moon in their courses.

‡ MT and B read the meaningless 'and Jehovah with them'; A has 'and Judah with them.' See Budde, op. cit. p. 144. by Israel of the midlands of W. Palestine by the fords near Tell Adami and up the Wady Fera'a. Such a conclusion, too, would fill the great gap which yawns in all the other records: the absence of all account of the conquest of Ephraim and Manasseh.

But, attractive as this conclusion appears, there are many objections to it. The crossing of all Israel opposite Jericho is not only confirmed by the earliest traditions, one of which is E itself, but is supported by historical probabilities. The centre of Israel's power in E. Palestine was immediately opposite Jericho.* Nor was the crossing in face of the one fortified city which the Jordan Valley contained south of Beth-shan so improbable as it seems. Jericho, as we shall presently see, was never able to resist a siege; and many subsequent invaders of W. Palestine from the E. have even gone out of their way to take the city before attempting the hill-country behind her, even by the open passes to the N. Their strategy is intelligible. Once captured, Jericho became a well-stocked and well-watered base for campaigns in the comparatively barren hills to the west of her. The oldest traditions assert that Joshua made himself acquainted with the defencelessness of this single fortress on the W. bank of Jordan, by a means of espionage frequently employed by commanders of invading armies. His spies were aided by a harlot among the enemy. The same documents, and P, record that Israel were demoralised by the vicious women of the land (Nu $25^{1ff.}$); JE ascribes to the same frailty the land's betrayal to Israel.

Joshua, then, led Israel across Jordan opposite to Jericho. All the traditions assign the passage to a miracle, similar to that by which the people escaped from Egypt across the Red Sea. The waters of the river were stopped in a great heap, not at the place of the passage, but, as appears from a somewhat corrupt text (3^{16}), higher up, where the valley of Jordan is narrower, and where it is not without interest to remember that an Arabic chronicler records the sudden damming of the river by a landslip in A.D. 1267.† The miracle was commemorated by a stone monument, according to three lines of tradition which, however, vary as to where it was erected (see above, § iv. a, c). On the story of the Circumcision see above, § iv. c. Soon after this, Jericho became an easy prey to the invaders; and here again, as we have seen (§ iv. c), the traditions differ as to details. But the fact on which they agree, that the city fell to the mere challenge of her besiegers, is an issue singularly in harmony with the fate of Jericho before every subsequent attack which history records, and is also very explicable by the effeminate character of her inhabitants (see Historical Geogr. pp. 266–268). The city was razed, the site cursed, and Israel's camp continued to be at Gilgal, which is represented as the starting-point and return of the subsequent campaigns (see above, § ix.).

The Bk. of Joshua represents these as undertaken by Joshua in person with all Israel behind him; but, as we have seen, the oldest traditions describe the invasion as prosecuted from this point by different tribes in different directions. Jg 1 indicates these directions as two, in uniformity with the geographical position of Jericho and Gilgal, from which there are roads, S.W. into what was afterwards Judæa, N.W. into what became the territory of Manasseh and Ephraim. According to Jg 1, Judah and Simeon followed the first of these; and the double tribe of Joseph, still under the leadership of Joshua, the second. But the independent action of Judah and Simeon is not incompatible with Joshua's continued headship over all Israel; for, as we have seen, the same document, J, which relates their campaign, still sees in him the arbiter of the tribes, and assigns to him the allotment of their spheres of conquest (Jos 17^{14-18}). Ai and Bethel, both of them on the easiest road from Jericho to the backbone of the range, were taken by Joshua, and his army returned to Gilgal (10^{6}).

At this point, the most natural in the course of events, occurs the narrative of the service at Shechem (ch. 8^{30-35}), founded on E, which event, however, presupposes the conquest or occupation of the hill-country of Ephraim and Manasseh; and about this not a word, as we have seen, is said. It has been supposed that the story was missing in the documents; and if so, this would be an argument in favour of the reliability of the later tradition and redactions, which abstained from inventing a story, even if the event had happened, when they had no materials for it. But why was this one event missing on all the lines of tradition? The problem is one for which no satisfactory solution has yet been offered. It is to the same point in the course of conquest that the Bk. of Joshua assigns the treaty with Gibeon. That this treaty was made in Joshua's time has been denied by many critics on the evidence of the later history. There is, however, nothing in the latter which makes so early a treaty with Gibeon an impossible thing. Budde (ZATW vii. p. 135 ff.) marks the fact that in Deborah's time Judah was cut off from the tribes to the N. of her by a belt of territory in possession of the Canaanites, and argues that Gibeon's independence of Israel was necessary to make that belt continuous between Jebus and Gezer.* But the geographical data do not make this a necessary conclusion; the northern Israelites may very well have been in alliance with Gibeon and still unable to maintain connexion with Judah; and Kittel (Gesch. i. p. 272 ff.) has plausibly argued that the story of Joshua fighting the Canaanites near Gibeon, if historical, renders his treaty with Gibeon extremely probable. But, as we have seen, there is ancient evidence in the poetical piece, ch. 10^{12-14}, for the battle of Beth-horon and Joshua's defeat of the Canaanites there. The oldest tradition, which makes him return after it to Gilgal, is of course to be preferred to the Deuteronomic summary, which follows and assigns to him the conquest of the south: this must rather be assigned, as J assigns it, to Judah and the Calebites, who undertook it independently from Jericho, while Joshua himself led the house of Joseph against Ai, Bethel and the midlands. To Joshua are also assigned by fragments of E a campaign and victory in the N. of the Jordan Valley, and against the probability of this there is no conclusive argument: the narrative as it stands, however, in ch. 11 is largely the work of the Deuteronomist. For details of the question see Dillmann's Comm.; Budde, ZATW vii. p. 149 ff.; and Moore's Comm. on Jg 4.

xi. THE RELIGIOUS TEACHING OF THE BK. OF JOSHUA.—As was to be expected, the religious teaching of the book is mainly found in its later strata—the Deuteronomic and the Priestly. We have seen how they fulfil the scheme of the destiny of Israel on the lines laid down in the Pentateuch, and how the Deuteronomist enforces the law as prescribed in the Bk. of Dt, or records instances of its execution. But it is also to the Deuteronomist sections that we owe the fervent religious exhortations to Joshua and the people, which are the

* Stade has indeed attempted to show that this territory opposite Jericho was Moabite, but he can do so only after transferring the song (Nu 21) which celebrates the defeat of Sihon to the 9th cent. portions of the book most frequently employed in Christian preaching and teaching. The story of Achan, as it has passed from the hand of the latest redactor, is a lesson of great power, on the possibility of individual selfishness and avarice wrecking the enterprises of the whole community. But to one of the earlier sources, probably E (see above, § iv. c), we owe the finest religious conception in the book, that of the appearance of the Angel to Joshua (ch. 5^{13-15}). It is a noble illustration of the truth, that, in the great causes of God upon the earth, the leaders, however supreme and solitary they seem, are themselves led. There is a rock higher than they; their shoulders, however broad, have not to bear alone the awful burden of responsibility. The sense of supernatural conduct and protection, the consequent reverence and humility which form the spirit of all Israel's history, have nowhere in the OT received a more beautiful expression than in this early fragment.

G. A. SMITH.

JOSIAH (יֹאשִׁיָּהוּ, יֹאשִׁיָּה, 'J" supports').—1. A king of Judah. He was the son of Amon and grandson of Manasseh. His mother's name is given as Jedidah, the daughter of Adaiah (2 K 22^{1}). His father was killed by conspirators after a brief reign of two years. His murderers were brought to justice, and Josiah placed on the throne at the age of eight (2 K 21^{24}). The date of his accession was probably B.C. 639, and his reign lasted thirty-one years, till B.C. 608. During the early part of his reign matters seem to have gone on much as before, the king being too young to introduce any change, if he had been disposed to do so. It was not till the eighteenth year of his reign that the reformation took place which marked an epoch in the history of the national religion. The prophetic party, which had attained great influence under Hezekiah, had lost it under Manasseh, who carried his fanatical attachment to lower forms of religion to the point of persecuting the pure faith. The reformers could only work for the future, and wait till their opportunity came. It is not unlikely that the Scythian invasion gave it them. Hordes of Scythians burst into Western Asia about B.C. 630. The prophets (Jer 6^{1}, Zeph 1^{14-18}) saw in them the instruments of God's judgment on sinful Judah. They invaded Palestine, and came down the sea-coast towards Egypt. Contrary to expectation, they did not attack Judah. In the relief at so great a deliverance, the reformers found themselves once more in favour. The first sign of this was a movement for the repair of the temple (2 K $22^{3ff.}$). Money was collected from the people, and the work was begun in the eighteenth year of Josiah's reign. Very soon the high priest Hilkiah announced to Shaphan the scribe that he had found the Book of the Law in the temple. Shaphan read it, and informed the king of its discovery. On hearing it read, J. was so alarmed at the threats made against disobedience to its commands, and the knowledge that they had been so often transgressed, that he sent an influential deputation to the prophetess Huldah. As her prophecy is given in 2 K 22^{15-20}, she predicted that the threats against Jerus. should be fulfilled, but that the king should not live to see it, but be gathered to his grave in peace.

The next step was to bring the religious practice into conformity with the law. This could be accomplished only through a drastic reformation. The elders and people of Judah and Jerusalem were summoned to a meeting in the temple, and the law was read to them (2 K $23^{1ff.}$). The king made a covenant to obey the law, and all the people assented to it. The reform consisted in the cleansing of the temple from idolatry, in the suppression of idolatry throughout the kingdom, and, most important of all, in the abolition of the high places or local sanctuaries. After it had been carried through, a great passover was celebrated. It is difficult to overrate the importance of this reformation. The abolition of the local sanctuaries centralized the worship. This in itself was a death-blow to idolatry. Even where J" alone was nominally worshipped at the local shrines, heathenish elements both in belief and practice inevitably crept in. One temple implied one God. Then, as a corollary of centralization, radical changes took place throughout the cultus, while the priests of the local sanctuaries were degraded into inferior ministers, without the rights of priests. Nor was this all. The acceptance of a written code as binding law was the first step in the formation of a Canon of Scripture, which was to have such immense developments later. Then for the first time Judah became a people of the law.

Critics are agreed that the law on which the reformation was based was the Deuteronomic Code, but how much of our present Book of Deut. was discovered by Hilkiah is a question on which they are divided (see DEUTERONOMY). In one respect it was found impracticable to carry out the Deuteronomic law. The priests of the high places were not admitted to the same privileges as the priests of the temple (2 K 23^{9}, contrast Dt 18^{6-8}). It is probable that J. found it impossible to carry through this reform on account of the opposition of the Jerus. priesthood. It has been inferred from this that Hilkiah the priest can have had no share in the composition of the work

We know scarcely anything of the thirteen years that followed the reformation. But it seems to have been a period of peace and prosperity. One very significant fact that comes out in the narrative of J.'s measures to enforce the new law is that they were extended to Samaria, which was not strictly part of his kingdom. The explanation is that the Assyr. empire, though not yet overthrown, was so much weakened that J. was not only practically independent himself, but could interfere in an Assyr. province. And we must probably start from this in solving the riddle why he opposed the advance of the king of Egypt against Assyria. In 608 Cyaxares and Nabopolassar joined in an attack on Assyria. This gave Egypt the opportunity of seizing Syria. J. saw in this a menace of subjection to the Egyp. yoke, and naturally was unwilling to lose his independence. He was no doubt ill-advised in taking the initiative, but he probably expected that Judah would be victorious, now that it had become a people of the law. This ill-grounded confidence cost him his life and Judah her freedom. He fell in the battle at Megiddo (2 K 23^{29}).

J.'s character is very highly estimated by the editor of the Book of Kings, on account of his earnestness in the work of reform; and the ferocity with which it was carried through (2 K 23^{20}) need not, in that age, be urged against him. Jeremiah contrasts his equity in the administration of justice with Jehoiakim's oppression of the weak and shedding of innocent blood (Jer 22^{15-17}).

The account in Chronicles (2 Ch 34. 35) varies in some respects from that of Kings. It places Josiah's religious reforms almost entirely before the discovery of the law, no doubt because it seemed strange that so good a king should have waited till the eighteenth year of his reign before rooting out idolatry. It also states that the Egyp. king warned J. not to oppose him, since God had sent him against Carchemish (2 Ch 35^{21}). This was perhaps intended to account for the death of so righteous a king: he had refused to obey God's warning.

2. A son of Zephaniah (Zec 6^{10}) living at Jerus. in the time of Zechariah. The text of this passage appears to have been tampered with and to need radical correction. See Wellh., Now., and G. A. Smith, ad loc. A. S. PEAKE.

JOSIAS (B Ἰωσείας, B^bA -σίας).—JOSIAH king of Judah. 1 Es $1^{1.\ 7.\ 18.\ 21-23.\ 25.\ 28.\ 29.\ 32-34}$, Bar 1^8.

JOSIPHIAH (יֹאסִפְיָה 'J" adds,' Ezr 8^{10}).—The father of one of Ezra's companions. The name of the son is not given in MT, which reads 'and of the sons of Shelomith, the son of Josiphiah'; but the text may be corrected by the help of LXX (ἀπὸ υἱῶν Βαανί A; 1 Es 8^{36} ἐκ τῶν υἱῶν Βανί A, Βανιάς B, Βαναιάς Luc.), and we should read 'and of the sons of Bani, Shelomith,' etc., בָּנִי having fallen out after וּמִבְּנֵי. See GENEALOGY.

JOT.—Tindale rendered the ἰῶτα ἕν of Mt 5^{18} 'one iott' (perhaps under the influence of the Vulg. iota unum), and his rendering was accepted by all subsequent translators (Cov., Cran., 'iott'; Gen., Rhem., Bish., AV 'iote'; RV 'jot,' which is the mod. spelling in AV also). The ἰῶτα is the smallest letter in the Gr. alphabet; but the corresponding letter in Heb. (י yod) is more distinctly the smallest, so that an argument is found in this verse in favour of Aramaic as our Lord's tongue. (See also TITTLE). After Tind. 'jot' was used to denote any minute thing, and Shaks. uses it even of a drop of blood, Merch. of Ven. IV. i. 302—

> 'This bond doth give thee here no jot of blood.'

Wyclif's tr^n (1380) is, 'oon i, that is lest lettre.' The Germ. tr^n is still (Stuttgart Bible Soc. ed. 1898) that of Luther, 'der kleinste Buchstabe'; but Weizsäcker has 'ein Jota'; and the Fr. translators give 'un (seul) iota.' J. HASTINGS.

JOTBAH (יָטְבָה 'pleasantness').—Named only in 2 K 21^{19}, where we are told that king Amon's mother was 'Meshullemeth, the daughter of Haruz of Jotbah.' It was probably in Judah, but the site is unknown.

JOTBATHAH (יָטְבָתָה, Jotbath in AV of Dt 10^7, where the Targ. has the same form. LXX has in Nu Σετεβάθα corrected to Ἐτέβ- in B, Ἰεταβάθαν A; in Dt Ταιβάθα B, Ἰετάβ- A, Ἰτέβ- F; Vulg. Jetabatha).—A station in the journeyings of the Israelites mentioned only in Nu $33^{33f.}$, Dt 10^7, and described as 'a land of brooks of waters.' Its position is unknown, but cf. § iv. of art. EXODUS (ROUTE OF). Whether it should be identified with Jotbah, or with Ἰωτάβη, the seat of a bishopric in the 6th cent. (cf. Reland, Pal. p. 533) whose site is unknown, is doubtful. A. T. CHAPMAN.

JOTHAM (יוֹתָם 'J" is perfect,' or possibly 'solitary one,' Ἰωθάμ).—1. The youngest son of Gideon (Jg $9^{5.\ 7.\ 21.\ 57}$). The citizens of Shechem were met in assembly to make Abimelech king, when Jotham suddenly appeared on a spur of Gerizim, and delivered in their hearing a parable with a pointed application. The parable is not consistently applied; the author had several points in his mind, such as these: (a) the contrast (though this is not fully worked out) between Gideon's refusal of the kingship ($8^{2-f.}$) and the arrogant claim of the worthless son of his concubine. The other sons had qualities which might have given them the right to rule; it was left to the mean and useless 'bramble' to claim the rank of king (cf. 2 K 14^9). (b) A warning to the Shechemites of the dangerous character of their upstart chief. Not only was his protection worthless if they trusted him, but he would bring destruction on them if they did not. (c) A rebuke of the Shechemites for their base ingratitude towards the house of Gideon. The application of the fable is most inconsistent at vv.$^{15.\ 16}$. The point in v.^{15} is the relation between the Shechemites and Abimelech, but in v.^{16} between the Shechemites and the family of Gideon. Such inconsistencies are not uncommon in fables of this kind; they are found in the parables of the NT. There is no need, therefore, to suppose that Jotham's parable was borrowed from some earlier popular collection, where it had quite a different moral. Jotham's 'curse' was accomplished when Abimelech burnt down the tower of Shechem and met with a violent death himself (vv.$^{56.\ 57}$ [RJE]).

It is worth noticing that there is nothing distinctively religious in Jotham's parable. Judgment is passed upon Abimelech and the Shechemites on purely moral grounds; and the consequences of their deeds are predicted, not in the form of a prophecy or a message from God, but by the moral sense of a private individual.

2. King of Judah, son of Uzziah and Jerushah (2 K 15^{32-38}, 2 Ch 27^{1-9}). He is said to have reigned 16 years in Jerusalem (751–735); but during the greater part of his 'reign' he was regent in the lifetime of his father (2 K 15^5, 2 Ch 26^{21}). He was sole king from about 737 to 735. The historians represent his character in a favourable light. In 2 K it is recorded that he built the upper gate of the temple. The formidable combination of N. Israel and Syria began to show the first signs of hostility against Judah in this reign. According to 2 Ch, Jotham waged a successful war against the Ammonites. The great prophets Hosea, Isaiah, and Micah prophesied in his days.

3. A Calebite (1 Ch 2^{47}). G. A. COOKE.

JOY.—The following are the principal Heb. and Gr. words of which 'joy' is the tr^{n} in AV :—

גִּיל, גִּילָה (vb. גִּיל or גּוּל, very common), the primary meaning of which, judging from the cognate Arab. jāl, may be to go round or about, be excited to levity, etc. (see Oxf. Heb. Lex. p. 162^{a}). It would be difficult to differentiate exactly the similar terms שָׂשׂוֹן and שִׂמְחָה, רִנָּה, (both from root שׂוּשׂ, שָׂמַח). In general, it may be said that they all include not only a mental emotion but some outward expression of this, such as shouting, singing, leaping, dancing, sometimes with the accompaniment of musical instruments (e.g. Ps 132^{9}, Is 49^{13}, 2 S 6^{16}, 1 S 18^{6}, Is 24^{8}).

In NT we have the verb ἀγαλλιάω (-ά*ομαι*), in LXX = גִּיל, עָלַץ, רָנַן, שׂוּשׂ, and the noun ἀγαλλίασις. The latter is unknown to classical Greek but frequent in LXX, and occurs in NT in Lk 1$^{14.\ 44}$, Ac 2^{46}, Jude ^{24}, He 1^{9} (quoted from Ps 45^{8} where it renders שָׂשׂוֹן). This word expresses vehement joy or exultation (cf. Lk 1^{44}). The common NT word for 'joy' (noun) is χαρά (in LXX used for שִׂמְחָה and שָׂשׂוֹן); the verb (see next art.) is χαίρω (in LXX for שָׂמַח, גִּיל, and שׂוּשׂ).

It is important to recognize the identity as well as the difference in religious experience between OT and NT believers. The difference is in circumstantials, the identity in essentials. If joy is not as prominent in OT as in NT, it is still prominent. Its presence is implied in the numerous beatitudes of the Psalms, such as 1^{1} 32^{1}. Such passages imply conscious possession of the blessings mentioned. But explicit references to the subject are numerous and emphatic, especially in the book of Psalms. A striking point of similarity between OT and NT piety is that, in both cases, God Himself is the object and ground of the believer's joy: 'My soul shall be joyful in the Lord, it shall rejoice in his salvation' (Ps 35^{9}, see also 43^{4}, Is 51^{16} etc.). Here religious joy reaches its highest, purest expression, With this may be compared NT passages like Ph 3^{1} 'Rejoice in the Lord'; 4^{4}, Ro 5^{11} 'We also rejoice in God through our Lord Jesus Christ.' A suggestive parallel is found in Ph 3^{3} 'We . . . glory in Christ Jesus.' Among the subordinate aspects or grounds of joy OT significantly emphasizes the divine law or word: 'His delight is in the law of the Lord' (Ps 1^{2} 19^{10} 119^{162} etc.). As we might expect, NT is richer in its exposition of the several aspects of religious joy. Faith is a source of joy (Ph 1^{25}, Ro 15^{13}); so also hope (Ro 5^{2} 12^{12}); the testimony of a good conscience (2 Co 1^{12}). Christian joy is 'in the Holy Ghost' (Ro 14^{17}), i.e. 'in connexion with, under the indwelling and influence of the Holy Ghost' (Alford); the Holy Spirit is the sphere or element in which it lives and moves; see also 1 Th 1^{6}. It is also a participation in Christ's own joy (Jn 15^{11} 17^{13}). Persecution and suffering for Christ's sake, instead of hindering, enhances it (Mt 5$^{11.\ 12}$, Ac 5^{41}, Ph 1^{29}). A Christian rejoices in tribulation because of the fruit it bears (Ro 5$^{3.\ 4}$). For the same reason, temptation may be an occasion of joy (Ja 1^{2}). The repentance of sinners causes joy in heaven (Lk 15$^{7.\ 10}$). The joy of Christians should be unbroken (1 Th 5^{16}). The power, permanence, and exuberant fulness of a believer's joy here and hereafter are often dwelt on (Ps 4^{7} 16^{9}, Is 35^{10} 51^{11} 61^{7}, Jn 15^{11} 17^{13}, Ac 13^{52}, 1 P 1^{8}, Jude ^{24}). The Redeemer's joy in the certain prospect of the success of His work is mentioned in He 12^{2}. The final reward of the Christian is participation in that joy (Mt 25^{21}): 'that joy of the Lord arising from the completion of his work and labour of love, of which the sabbatical rest of the Creator was typical (Gn 1^{31} 2^{2}), and of which his faithful ones shall in the end partake; see He 4$^{3-11}$, Rev 3^{21}' (Alford). As believers rejoice in God, so God rejoices in His people (Ps 147^{11} 149^{4}, Zeph 3^{17})—a sentiment re-echoed by a modern Christian psalmist: 'He views His children with delight.' If the reading in RV be accepted, the same sentiment is found in Lk 2^{14}. Rejoicing in the good of others is mentioned as the distinctive feature of Christian sympathy (Ro 12^{15}). The 'joy of the godless' (Job 20^{5}) is 'not so.'

JOY.—As a verb 'joy' is used by Shaks. both transitively [=(1) gladden, as Rich. III. I. ii. 220, 'Much it joys me to see you are become so penitent'; (2) enjoy, as II Henry VI. IV. ix. 1, 'Was ever king that joyed an earthly throne?'] and intransitively; but in AV it is always intransitive, with the meaning 'rejoice.' Sometimes 'joy' and 'rejoice' come together, as Ph 2$^{17.\ 18}$ 'I joy, and rejoice with you all. For the same cause also do ye joy, and rejoice with me' (χαίρω καὶ συνχαίρω . . . χαίρετε καὶ συνχαίρετε), there being no difference in meaning.

In most places of its occurrence, Tindale translated καυχάομαι, to boast, by the verb to rejoice, and he was followed by AV in Ro 5^{2}, Ph 3^{3}, Ja 1^{9} 4^{16}. Once (Ro 5^{11}) he rendered it 'joy,' and was again followed by AV as well as by Cran. and the Bishops, though the Vulg. is glorior (Wyc., Rhem., and RVm 'glory,' the others having 'rejoice'). Even RV gives 'rejoice,' which is plainly inadequate. If 'boast' was felt to be unsuitable, 'exult' would have served.

JOZABAD (יוֹזָבָד, another form of יְהוֹזָבָד, Jehozabad, wh. see).—1. 2. 3. Three of David's heroes, 1 Ch 12$^{4.\ 20.\ 20}$. 4. The eponym of a Levitical family, 2 Ch 31^{13} 35^{9}. 5. A priest who had married a foreign wife, Ezr 10^{22}. 6. A Levite, Ezr 8^{33} 10^{23}, Neh 8^{7} 11^{16}. See Genealogy.

JOZABDUS (Ζάβδος B, Ὠζάβαδος A), 1 Es 9^{29} = Zabbai, Ezr 10^{28}.

JOZACAR (AV Jozachar) is mentioned only in 2 K 12^{21}, where we are told that Joash, king of Judah, was murdered by his servants 'Jozacar ben-Shimeath and Jehozabad ben-Shomer.' According to 2 Ch 25^{3} Amaziah put to death his father's murderers. MSS of MT vary between יוֹזָכָר Jōzākhār, יוֹזָבָד Jōzābhādh, יוֹזָבָר Jōzābhār (1 MS of Kenn. cited by de Rossi), and (one of de Rossi's) יוֹזָכָד Jōzākhādh; LXX, B Ἰεζεχάρ (Swete; Tisch. gives B's reading as Ἰεζιρχάρ), A and Luc. Lag. Ὠζαχάρ; Vulg. Josachar; Syr. Jozabar. The parallel 2 Ch 24$^{5-6}$ has 'Zabad ben-Shimeath the Ammonitess, and Jehozabad ben-Shimrith the Moabitess.' LXX, B has Ζαβέλ, A Ζαβέθ for Zabad. In 2 K Oxf. Heb. Lex., Kautzsch (AT), Baer, etc. יוֹזָכָר Jōzākhār, as AV. [יוזבר in Ginsburg's Heb. Bible is stated by the editor to be a misprint for יוזבר—S. R. D.].

Kittel (on Chronicles in SBOT) not only reads Jōzākhār in Kings, but emends 2 Ch 24^{26} to Zakhar on the strength of the parallel in Kings. The various readings turn upon the very slight differences between ב and כ, ד and ר, which in some MSS are practically imperceptible; especially in the case of ד and ר, where Raphe is not used. The proximity of the very similar Jehozabad would facilitate corruption of the text. But the Ch text—which here, as often elsewhere, may be based on an older reading than that in our text of Kings—suggests that, in the original, there was only one name; that this was accidentally written twice over; and that, in process of further copying, the present readings in K and Ch grew out of this doublet.

Jōzākhār = 'J" remembers,' Jōzābhādh = 'J" bestows gifts,' must be a simple error. See also Zabad.

JUBILEES, BOOK OF, or LITTLE GENESIS (τὰ Ἰωβηλαῖα, ἡ κλειὼ Γένεσις, ἡ λεπτὴ Γένεσις; Leptogenesis; in Ethiopic Kufâlê).—Under these names there is extant one of the most curious and interesting of the OT Apocrypha. It is preserved complete only in an Ethiopic translation (first edited by Dillmann in 1859), but a considerable portion of a Latin version has been published by Ceriani from an Ambrosian MS, and fragments of the Greek are contained in the Byzantine chronologists, who made large extracts.

The book contains the narrative of Genesis, rewritten from the point of view of the age of the author. It gives the narrative as a later Jew might imagine or desire that it should have happened. The chief characteristics of this rewriting of the book are—(1) the narrative is put into the mouth of the 'angel of the face,' who is represented as telling Moses on Mt. Sinai all that they (the angels) had done, and the legends of Creation, and of the Lord's dealings with mankind. (2) The narrative is arranged throughout in a chronological system of years, weeks of years, and jubilees. Every event is dated; as, for example, 'and in the first week of the third jubilee Cain slew Abel.' (3) Many legends of the class known as Midrashim are added to the narrative. (4) Great stress is laid on all the Jewish feasts, and their institution in patriarchal times is asserted (the Feast of Weeks, the Feast of Tabernacles, the Day of Atonement, and the Passover). For example (ch. 16), Abraham institutes the Feast of Tabernacles, 'on this account it is ordained in the tablets of heaven concerning Israel that they shall celebrate the festival of the tabernacles seven days in joy.' (5) Great stress is laid on ordinances of the Mosaic law, which are written in the 'tablets of heaven' and connected with events in the life of the patriarchs—such are new moon and sabbath, the offerings, the laws concerning blood and fornication and war. The sun was created for the sake of enabling the feasts to be calculated. (6) Some passages very derogatory to Edom are introduced.

The date of the book may be approximately fixed by the fact that it is used in the Testimony of the XII Patriarchs, and makes no mention of the fall of Jerusalem. On the other hand, it apparently makes use of the Book of Enoch. The reference to Edom shows also that it was written after the rise of the house of Herod. Ewald placed it towards the end of the 1st cent. B.C.; but hatred of Edom could exist just as well at a later date, and other indications seem to suggest a time when troubles that preceded the fall of Jerusalem were beginning, the chief eschatological passage seeming to refer to them (ch. 23).

The author was not a Herodian, not a Sadducee (for he believes in the resurrection), not a Pharisee (for he lays no stress on the written tradition), not an Essene (for he does not condemn the sacrifices), not a Hellenist (for he attacks the laxity of Hellenism). He was a Jew who, in a time of laxity and of falling away, tries to restore the authority of the fundamental principles of his faith, and represents the evils which are crowding on his people as the punishment for disobedience. He has quite clearly in his mind a definite falling away from Jewish ordinances, 'they have deserted the ordinances which the Lord had covenanted between them and him.' These ordinances particularly which they had neglected were probably the ones on which stress is laid—the sabbath, the feasts, circumcision, avoiding fornication (i.e. mixed marriages). It may be suggested that 'they' are really the Christians, and that the book is written by a fervent opponent of the new faith between the years A.D. 50 and 60, when disorder is beginning to break out, and the effect of the people's falling away is, as he thinks, apparent.

In any case, the book is of great value in illustrating, partly by resemblance, partly by contrast, the New Testament. We have an example of the 'Law given by angels.' The theology of the book is exactly what St. Paul protests against when he condemns 'days and months and seasons and years.' There is a curious resemblance to three out of the four points insisted upon in Ac 15, and it may be noted, as perhaps helping to throw some light on that passage, that fornication is used of 'mixed marriages.'

JUDÆA (Ἰουδαία) was the most southern of the three districts—Galilee, Samaria, and Judæa—into which Palestine west of Jordan was divided in the time of Christ (Mt 2^{1}, Lk 2^{4}, Jn $4^{3.\ 4.\ 47.\ 54}$, Ac 8^{1} 9^{31}). In several passages (Mt 4^{25}, Mk 1^{5} 3^{7}, Lk 5^{17}, Jn 3^{22}, Ac 1^{8}) Judæa is distinguished from its capital, Jerusalem, which, according to the Talmuds (Neubauer, Géog. du Talmud, p. 56), formed a division by itself (cf. Neh 11^{3}).

After the Captivity the tribal possessions of Judah, Benjamin, Dan, and Simeon were reoccupied by Israelites. Most of the 'children of the captivity' who returned from Babylon belonged to the tribe of Judah, and the limits of the reoccupied district were almost the same as those of the old kingdom of Judah. Thence the district was called Judah, and the people received the name of Jews (Jos. Ant. XI. v. 7). Afterwards the two names were used in a wider sense. All Israelites were called Jews, and Judæa, or 'the land of Judah,' sometimes stood for the three districts of Western Palestine (Lk 4^{44} [?]* 23^{5}, Ac 10^{37} 26^{20}. See art. CHRONOLOGY OF NT, vol. i. p. 406^{b} f.).

Under the Persians, Judah was a district (OT 'province,' מְדִינָה) of the 5th satrapy of the Empire (Herod. iii. 91), administered by a governor (פֶּחָה) who was generally, at least, a Jew, and was apparently assisted by a council of Jewish elders. The governor and elders dwelt at Jerusalem, the seat of government (Hag $1^{1.\ 14}$ 2^{2}, Ezr $5^{1.\ 8}$,† Neh 11^{3}).

The name Judæa first occurs in To 1^{18}, where it is applied to the old kingdom of Judah. The later Judæa (1 Mac 3^{34} 10^{43}, 2 Mac 1^{10}), or 'land of Judah' (1 Mac $10^{30.\ 33.\ 37}$, cf. Is 19^{17}), extended from Samaria on the north to the desert of Arabia Petræa on the south, and from the Mediterranean on the west to the Jordan Valley on the east. Its limits, which varied at different periods, cannot be more clearly defined. In the time of Judas Maccabæus, Hebron was in the hands of the Edomites (1 Mac 5^{65}); and in the time of his brother Jonathan, three nomes, or toparchies of Samaria—Aphærema, Lydda, and Ramathaim—were added to Judæa (1 Mac $10^{30.\ 38}$ 11^{34}). According to Josephus (BJ III. iii. 5), Judæa extended from Anuath-Borkeos ('Aina-Berkit) on the north to Iardas, a village on the confines of Arabia (perhaps Tell 'Arâd) on the south, and from Joppa to the Jordan. The sea-coast as far as Ptolemais (Acre), and the coast towns, with the possible exception of Cæsarea, also belonged to it. The country was divided into toparchies—a division recognized by Pliny (HN v. 14), though his list does not completely agree with that of Josephus. There is some authority for the view that certain districts east of Jordan were included in Judæa. Strabo describes Judæa as being 'situated above Phœnicia, in the interior between Gaza and Antilibanus, and extending to the Arabians' (XVI. ii. 21). Tacitus (Hist. v. 6) says the borders of Judæa on the east were formed by Arabia. Josephus (Ant. XII. iv. 11) countenances an extension beyond Jordan, and so does the NT in Mt 19[1] ('the borders of Judæa beyond Jordan'). In Mk 10[1], where AV (following TR) reads 'the coasts of Judæa by the further side of Jordan,' RV (following WH, etc.) has the 'borders of Judæa and beyond Jordan.' In the time of Ptolemy (v. xvi. 9) some places east of Jordan belonged to Judæa. Possibly the boundary included the valley, and the slopes of the hills east of Jordan. The Talmudists allude to the 'mountain,' or 'king's mountain,' the Shephēlah, or 'low hills,' and Daroma, or 'the south,' as different portions of Judæa. Daroma was divided into Upper and Lower (Neubauer, p. 62).

On the division of the country after the death of Herod the Great, Judæa was given to Archelaus with the title of ethnarch. A few years later, on the deposition of Archelaus, it was added to the province of Syria, and administered by a procurator subordinate to the governor of Syria. The procurator resided at Cæsarea (Ant. XVII. xiii. 5, XVIII. i. 1, ii. 1), which, according to the Talmuds, was not in Judæa. This view is said to have been held by St. Luke, but it seems doubtful whether his intention is to do more than draw a distinction between Judæa and the seat of government, Cæsarea (Ac 12[19] 21[10], cf. 'Judæa and Jerusalem,' as above). In the division of Palestine at the beginning of the 5th cent. Judæa formed part of Palestina Prima.

The physical features of Judæa are described in the art. on PALESTINE. It will suffice to say here that the Romans covered the country with a network of roads.

JUDÆA, THE WILDERNESS OF (ἡ ἔρημος τῆς Ἰουδαίας, desertum Judææ).—The district in which John the Baptist made his first appearance as the Forerunner of Christ (Mt 3[1]). In Mk 1[4], Lk 3[2], it is called simply 'the wilderness.' It is prob. the same as the wilderness of Judah (Jg 1[16], Ps 63, title), in which were situated En-gedi and five other cities (Jos 15[61. 62])—the Jeshimon or desert tract west of the Dead Sea. It perhaps included the western bank of the Jordan to the north of the Dead Sea (Jos. Ant. III. x. 7, IV. viii. 2, 3).

JUDAH (יְהוּדָה yĕhûdâh, 'praised' (?), Ἰούδας, Juda; in Assyr, inscriptions Ia-u-du, Ia-u-dai, see Jastrow, JBL xii. (1893) 61 ff.). — 1. The fourth son of Jacob and Leah. He was born in Paddan-aram (Gn 29[35]). In J he is very prominent. He suggests to his brethren that they should sell Joseph to the Ishmaelites (Gn 37[26f.]), pleads for Benjamin to be sent into Egypt, and becomes surety for his safety (43[8f.]). He thus takes the place corresponding to that assumed by Reuben in E (37[21f.] 42[37]). So in Gn 44[14] we read of Judah and his brethren, and it is he who makes the impassioned appeal to Joseph for Benjamin's release (Gn 44[18-34]). In consequence of Reuben's misconduct (Gn 35[22] 49[4]) and the treacherous violence of Simeon and Levi (34. 49[5ff.]), Judah receives the firstborn's privilege (49[8ff.]). According to Gn 38 he went to Adullam and married the daughter of a Canaanite, Shua. By her he had three sons, Er, Onan, and Shelah. Er married Tamar, but died without children, as did his brother Onan, who refused to perform the duty of raising up seed to his brother. As she was not given to Shelah, she by artifice became the mother of two children by Judah, Perez and Zerah.

This narrative reveals very clearly what is true in part at least of the others, that Judah is the eponymous ancestor of the tribe of Judah, and that the history of the tribe has been thrown into the form of a personal history. Gn 38 thus becomes of great value for its information on the composition of the tribe. Under the metaphors of marriage and paternity the union and origin of various stocks are expressed. The most important fact that emerges is that the tribe of Judah, as we know it in the historical period, was largely of Can. origin. After the Hebrews entered Canaan, Judah left the main body, and struck out in a southerly direction to conquer a district to settle in (Jg 1[1-20]). In consequence of its union with Hirah and Shua, and later with Tamar, clans near Adullam, five Judahite clans were in course of time formed, but the two oldest of these, Er and Onan, became extinct. But Gn 38 does not exhaust our information as to the composition of Judah. In Jg 1[16] we find that the Kenites accompanied Judah into the wilderness of Judah, and then went on and dwelt among the Amalekites (reading 'the Amalekite' for 'the people'), where at a later period we find them (1 S 15[6], cf. Nu 24[20-22]). Perhaps they were of Amalekite origin. Generally they are regarded as Midianites, but this rests on a combination of J and E. Besides the Kenites we find two Kenizzite clans, Caleb and Othniel (Jg 1[12-15. 20], Jos 14[6-15] 15[13-19]). As Kenizzite, they would appear to have been originally Edomite tribes (Gn 36[11. 15. 42]). Caleb remained a distinct tribe till the time of David (1 S 30[14]). It lived in the hill-country of Judah, and Hebron was its chief town. It seems to have been the most powerful clan of Judah. Nabal is regarded as a typical Calebite (1 S 25[3]). The chief town of Othniel was Kiriath-sepher or Debir. Closely connected with Caleb was Jerahmeel, who in the highly important lists 1 Ch 2 appears as his brother. According to Wellhausen, who investigated these lists and those in 1 Ch 4[1-23] in his de Gen. et Fam. Jud., Jerahmeel was older than Caleb, dwelt farther south, and adopted a less settled mode of life. It will be clear that Judah not only absorbed Canaanite, but, to a still greater extent, Edomite and kindred elements. These perhaps imparted the fanaticism which was later so characteristic of the tribe.

Originally, Judah seems to have been a smaller tribe than Reuben, Simeon, and Levi. But Reuben began to dwindle at an early period, and Simeon and Levi were broken up in consequence of a treacherous attack upon the Canaanites, with whom they had made an alliance (see SIMEON). Partly as a result of this, partly through the fusion with other clans already mentioned, and probably with the remnant of Simeon, Judah obtained the premier position among the Leah tribes. After the Jordan had been crossed, J. was accompanied by Simeon alone on its invasion of its portion. A victory was gained over Adoni-bezek, and Hebron and Kiriath-sepher were captured (Jg 1[3ff.]). We are also told that Jerus. was taken (v.[8]) and burnt, and three Philistine cities captured by Judah (v.[19]). But these latter statements are inconsistent with others in the same narrative, and do not well agree with the subsequent history. Judah found it impossible to make good its claim to the 'valley' (i.e. probably the coast plain), since it could not cope with the war-chariots of the natives. The extent of Judah's 'lot' is given in Jos 15 (P), but this chapter teaches us much less than it seems to do, partly because a very large number of the places it mentions have not been identified, partly because the description is ideal, and at no time corresponded, even approximately, with the actual facts. According to this account, Judah was bounded on the E. by the Dead Sea, on the N. by the southern boundary of Benjamin (see BENJAMIN for details), on the W. by the Mediterranean, on the S. by a line drawn from the southern tongue of the Dead Sea to the brook of Egypt, and passing through or by the ascent of Akrabbim, Zin, Kadesh-barnea, Hezron, Addar, Karka, and Azmon. Judah never reached the Mediterranean; the Phil. lay between, and so did Simeon, till the latter tribe was exterminated. As to the southern border, apart from the difficulty of fixing some of the sites mentioned, it must be observed that the territory of Judah shades off imperceptibly into the desert to the south. The portion of Judah is divided into four districts, the Negeb (RV South), the Shephelah or Lowland, the Hill Country, and the Wilderness of Judah. The Negeb is the largest portion. It is dry and barren, except in the brief spring-time; thinly populated, chiefly by nomads. The Shephēlah is undulating country, fertile and beautiful, separated from the sea by the Phil. plain. It was the most valuable district; but Judah could not hold it against the Philistines, who kept it in their own hands through a great part of the history. The Hill Country belongs to the great Central Range of Pal., and is separated by a valley from the low hills of the Shephelah. It was, historically, the most important part of Judah—rugged and barren, but with fertile valleys, and, owing to the system of terrace-cultivation, more productive than it could be now. The Wilderness of Judah (Jeshimon) lies between the Hill Country and the Dead Sea, a waste of unspeakable dreariness and desolation, 35 miles long by 15 broad. See, further, arts. HILL COUNTRY, and JESHIMON.

Judah was far more inaccessible than the Northern tribes. Protected on the E. by the Wilderness, on the S. by the Negeb, itself more or less of a wilderness, on the W. by the low hills of the Shephelah, by the valley that divides it from the Central Range and the slopes of the Central Range itself, on the N. by Benjamin with its fortresses, it lay far less open to invasion. When it was held by real defenders, it was necessary that the invaders should first master the surrounding country, and then deliver their attack across three of its borders (G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. ch. xiv.). Judah was not impregnable, indeed, for it lay comparatively open from the N., and the Negeb could be crossed from the S., while passes led up to the central tableland from both E. and W., though very difficult to force against opposition. But the very poverty of the country combined with the natural difficulties of invasion to secure it, since it offered little prize to tempt an attack. It was a very little province. Even if it had reached its ideal boundaries, it would have covered no more than 2000 square miles; actually its usual extent was nearer 1300, of which about half was desert.

The isolation of the territory was reflected in that of the tribe. After it had settled in its lot, it had but little to do with the Northern tribes. It is not even mentioned in the Song of Deborah, as if it were not recognized as belonging to Israel; and it appears in the story of Samson as surrendering him to the Philistines (Jg $15^{9ff.}$). It seems to have drawn more closely to Israel in the time of Saul, as we see from the history of David. But Saul's persecution of David must have strained the loyalty of the tribe, and it is not surprising that on his death a kingdom of Judah was formed with David at its head, in opposition to the kingdom of Ishbaal, Saul's son (2 S $2^{4, 8}$). Both of these kingdoms seem to have been tributary to the Philistines. The union of the two was due to the evident fact that David was the only man who could hope to lead Israel in successful revolt from the Phil., and was only hastened by the defection of Abner and the murder of Ishbaal (2 S $3^{12ff.}$ $4^{5ff.}$). Judah, as the king's own tribe, was more closely attached to Israel than when the king belonged to another tribe. One of David's greatest and most far-sighted acts was the selection of Jerus. as his capital and the home of the ark ($5^{6ff.}$ 6^{12}). Jerus. did not actually lie in Judah, except possibly to a slight extent, but it was on the border, and the possession of it, with the ark and temple, guaranteed the survival of the Southern kingdom, after the loss of the Northern tribes. But in the latter years of David it is Judah, perhaps because it profited less by its connexion with the king than it expected, that seems to have been foremost in supporting Absalom, whose rebellion broke out in Hebron, the old capital of the tribe (2 S 15^{7}). After its suppression Judah hung back, till its allegiance was won by the ill-timed appeal of David to its kinship with him ($19^{11ff.}$); ill-timed because David's favouritism to Judah provoked jealousy in the Northern tribes, and the abortive rising of Sheba (19^{41}–20^{22}), which anticipated the successful revolt of Jeroboam. Solomon also showed an unwise partiality to Judah, as we see from the fact that it was excluded from the division into twelve districts for purposes of taxation (1 K 4). It is, accordingly, not wonderful that Judah remained loyal to Rehoboam, while the Northern tribes rejected him ($12^{16 f.}$).

The Kingdom of Judah seems to have consisted simply of the tribe of Judah with very little of Benjamin (see BENJAMIN), and not of Judah and Benjamin. Only a brief outline of its history is here necessary; for fuller details the articles on the individual kings may be consulted. After the disruption caused by the senseless folly of Rehoboam, war was carried on between the two kingdoms (1 K 14^{30}), but not in a very energetic way. In fact the treasure which Solomon had accumulated was taken by Shishak of Egypt when he invaded Judah ($14^{25ff.}$), and the superiority in wealth of the Southern kingdom would thus be lost. War continued through the reign of Abijam (15^{6} RVm), but it seems not to have been prosecuted with vigour till Baasha succeeded Nadab the son of Jeroboam. He pressed Judah so hard that Asa took the unhappy step, fraught with future mischief, of calling in the aid of Syria. A diversion was thus effected in his favour, and Asa employed the materials of Baasha's fortress, Ramah, in erecting fortresses of his own ($15^{17 ff.}$). It was possibly with the accession of Omri that the relations between the two kingdoms were changed. He perhaps formed an alliance with Judah, as with Tyre (16^{31}), probably in view of the dangers that threatened from Damascus. Ahab and Jehoshaphat were certainly allies (1 K 22), and Jehoshaphat's son, Jehoram, married Athaliah the daughter of Ahab (2 K $8^{18, 26}$). Jehoshaphat's reign was probably prosperous, though his trading vessels were wrecked (1 K 22^{48}). The relations between Judah and Edom after the reign of Solomon are obscure. Edom seems to have been subject to Judah, at any rate in Jehoshaphat's time (2 K 3^{9}), but it revolted from his son Jehoram

(2 K 8^{20}). The good understanding with Israel continued while Omri's dynasty was on the throne, but Jehu murdered Ahaziah, Jehoram's son, and forty-two of his brethren (9^{27} 10^{14}). Thereupon the queen-mother, Athaliah, massacred all that remained of the royal family, except the infant Joash, and reigned six years. She was put to death by Jehoiada the priest, who made Joash king (2 K 11). Apparently, towards the end of his reign, Hazael, king of Syria, who had severely crippled the Northern kingdom, threatened Jerus., but was bought off by Joash, who perhaps in consequence of this was murdered ($12^{17ff.}$). His son Amaziah, after a successful war with Edom, challenged Joash of Israel, who inflicted a disastrous defeat upon him (14^{1-14}). Amaziah's son Azariah, or Uzziah, had a more successful reign. Syria had been exhausted in wars with Assyria, and now Assyria itself had a half-century of inactivity, and this left both Israel and Judah time to build up powerful states. Azariah recovered the port of Elath (14^{22}), and from the early chapters of Isaiah we can see how wealthy Judah had become. But the signs began to be ominous before his death. Assyria resumed her old career of conquest, and Syria and Israel formed a coalition against her. When Ahaz refused to join it, they sought to compel the adhesion of Judah; whereupon Ahaz, in a panic and against the earnest warning of Isaiah, took the fatal step of calling in Tiglath-pileser, the king of Assyria (2 K 16, Is 7). The latter suppressed the coalition, but Ahaz paid too dearly for the relief, since he became tributary to Assyria. The heavy yoke was borne till Hezekiah thought himself strong enough, in alliance with other revolting states, and on the promise of help from Egypt, to throw it off (18^{7}). Although the overthrow of Sennacherib saved Jerus. from capture, and the religion of Israel from destruction, yet Judah sustained very heavy loss and had to pay an enormous tribute. The reign of Manasseh seems to have been externally prosperous, so far as this was possible after the exhaustion of Judah in the Assyr. war; but it was marked by fierce reaction against the reforms of Hezekiah and the prophetic policy as a whole, by religious syncretism, and by gloomy and superstitious fanaticism (21^{1-18}). But Josiah instituted a reform on the basis of Deuteronomy, the people being prepared for it by their deliverance from the dreaded Scythian invasion. His happy reign was cut short by Pharaoh-necho, whose invasion of Syria he had opposed, probably because it threatened the loss of the independence that the decrepitude of the Assyrian Empire gave him (2 K 22. 23). After a brief reign Jehoahaz was removed by Egypt ($23^{31ff.}$), and Jehoiakim put in his place. He changed masters, Egypt for Babylon, but revolted (24^{1}), and, in consequence of this, his son, who succeeded him, was taken captive to Babylon with the flower of the nation ($24^{14ff.}$). His successor, Zedekiah, might have reigned in peace as the vassal of Babylon, but revolting, in defiance of Jeremiah's warning, he saw his capital besieged and captured ($24^{18ff.}$). Jerus. and the temple were destroyed, and a large part of those who remained were taken into exile, where they remained for fifty years. So fell the kingdom of Judah, B.C. 586. Many of those who were still left went down into Egypt, in fear of vengeance for Gedaliah's murder (25^{26}), and thus in Babylon and Egypt Jewish colonies were planted, which were destined to be of immeasurable importance.

As compared with the Northern kingdom, Judah was through most of its history of little account. When it held Edom in subjection its power was strengthened, yet even then the scornful fable, in which Joash set Judah against Israel as a thistle against a cedar, was not without justification. In other things than size and strength the advantage lay with Israel. Life was richer, fuller, and deeper, and that not only social but, what is more important yet less recognized, religious life. It was not in Judah but in Israel that the great prophets Elijah and Elisha did their work, the schools of the prophets flourished, and the earliest (?) history of the Hebrews was written. Amos, it is true, belonged to Judah, yet even he prophesied to Israel, and his junior contemporary, Hosea, was a Northern prophet. It was not till Israel went under that Judah attained its great significance. Yet Judah had advantages of its own. The prestige of the Davidic monarchy secured a permanence of dynasty that was of untold blessing, and saved it from the frequent revolutions and usurpations that tore Israel asunder. Further, while Judah was poorer in great religious teachers, its religion was probably simpler and less corrupt than that of Israel, though its superiority may be easily exaggerated. Its possession of the temple made for greater purity of worship. Yet it was rather the respite granted after the captivity of the Northern tribes, than any religious superiority of Judah, that left it the sole depositary of the higher religion of the prophets. This had not struck its roots deep enough into the life of Israel to survive the transplanting to Assyrian soil. But between 722 and 586, under the fostering care of Isaiah and his successors, it had grown strong enough not merely to survive, but to benefit from the shock, and thus Judah became especially the people of revelation.

On the character of the tribe little need be said. It was profoundly modified by its comparative isolation and the independence this conferred, and by the large foreign elements that it had absorbed. It was narrow and provincial, fanatical and tenacious. To slay the prophets and build monuments to them was characteristic of it, as of so many other peoples; for while it was slow to learn and hostile to new truth, yet the truth when learned was changed into hard dogma and erected as a barrier against fresh revelation. The obstinacy with which an old doctrine was insisted on, when no longer applicable, and new truth opposed for its inconsistency with the old, is shown in the opposition to Jeremiah's teaching that Jerus. would be captured and the temple destroyed, based on Isaiah's doctrine of the inviolability of Zion. Yet Judah had this qualification for its task,—it produced many who were fit vehicles of revelation; it was, in fact, surprisingly rich, especially in its later history, in religious genius, a lovely flower springing, indeed, from a dry and unattractive root.

In NT the tribe of Judah is mentioned in Lk 1^{39} (?), He 7^{14}, Rev 7^{5}.

JUDAH, 'upon (AV) or at (RV) Jordan' is named in Jos 19^{34} in the statement of the boundaries of the tribe of Naphtali. The MT בִּיהוּדָה is unrepresented in the LXX, and Bennett (SBOT, ad loc.) remarks, 'The clause is apparently an unintelligible gloss which has crept into the text. The context implies that the tribe of Judah is referred to, and this is geographically impossible.' Ewald suggests (Gesch. ii. 380) that the passage is corrupt, and that 'Chinneroth,' or some other word, originally occupied the place of 'to Judah.' Conder (PEFSt, 1883, p. 183) suggests an interchange of ד and ר, and of ה and ח, so as to read חוּרָה for הוּדָה, when the passage would run וּבְחוֹרָה הַיַּרְדֵּן, the 'Hollow of (?) Jordan,' equivalent to the Ghôr, or valley of the Jordan. Thomson (Land and Book, i. p. 389) suggests that the tomb of Seîd Yehûda (supposed by Arabs to be son of Jacob) marks the 'Judah on Jordan, toward the sun-rising.' It is suggested in Speaker's Comm. that the Havvoth-jair were colonized by men of Judah, and might be called 'Judah upon Jordan.' Von Raumer (Pal. p. 405 ff.) had contended strongly for this identification of 'Judah' with Havvoth-jair; and Keil (Bib. Comm.) adopts the same theory, pointing out that, according to 1 Ch $2^{5.\ 21}$, Jair on his father's side was descended from Judah through Hezron. It cannot be said that any of the last mentioned theories has the slightest probability. Dillm. (ad loc.) thinks Ewald's view is the best, but allows that it leaves the origin of the present text unexplained.

JUDAISM.—See RELIGION.

JUDAS ('Ιούδας, Judas), the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew name יְהוּדָה JUDAH.

1. The third son of Mattathias, called Maccabæus (1 Mac 2^{4}, Jos. Ant. XII. vi. 1). See MACCABEES.

2. The son of Chalphi, one of two captains (ἄρχοντες τῆς στρατιᾶς) who stood by Jonathan when the main part of his army had been scattered by an ambush at the beginning of a battle against the Syrians at Hazor (1 Mac 11^{70}, Jos. Ant. XIII. v. 7).

3. A Jew holding some important position at Jerusalem, who is named in the title of a letter sent from the Jews of Jerusalem and Judæa and the Jewish Senate to their brethren in Egypt and to a certain Aristobulus (2 Mac 1^{10}). The latter, who is termed the teacher (διδάσκαλος) of king Ptolemy, is doubtless to be identified with a Peripatetic philosopher who lived at the court of Ptolemy VI. Philometor (B.C. 180–145); so Clem. Alex. Strom. v. xiv. 97; Euseb. Præp. Ev. viii. 9 fin. This Judas is often supposed to be Judas Maccabæus; so Grimm, Rawlinson, Zöckler. The purport of the letter (2 Mac 1^{10}–2^{18}), which is probably not genuine, is to invite the Egyptian Jews to keep the Feast of the Dedication. Like the preceding epistle (ib. $1^{1\text{-}10a}$), it stands in no connexion with 2 Mac, and seems to have been prefixed to this book by a later hand. See Schürer, HJP II. iii. 213.

4. A son, probably the eldest, of Simon the Maccabee (1 Mac 16^{2}). He, with his brother John Hyrcanus, took the command against the Syrian army under Cendebæus, and was wounded in the engagement (ib. $16^{1\text{-}10}$, cf. Jos. Ant. XIII. vii. 3). In B.C. 135, he, with his father and another brother named Mattathias, was murdered at the little fortress of Dok by Ptolemy, the son of Abubus (ib. $16^{11\text{-}17}$). According to the representation of Josephus, Judas was not murdered at the same time as his father, but made prisoner, and subsequently put to death, when Hyrcanus raised the siege of Dagon (? Dok); see Jos. Ant. XIII. viii. 1; Wars, I. ii. 3–4. 5. 1 Es 9^{23}=Judah of Ezr 10^{23}. 6. An ancestor of Jesus, Lk 3^{30}. 7. One of the brethren of the Lord, Mt 13^{55}, Mk 6^{3}. See art. JUDE THE LORD'S BROTHER.

H. A. WHITE.

JUDAS BARSABBAS (AV Barsabas) is mentioned in Ac $15^{22.\ 27.\ 32.\ 33}$ as one of the two prominent members of the Jerus. Church who were sent to Antioch with Barnabas and Saul, bearing the letter of the apostles and elders to the Gentile Churches. The personal presence of these brethren was intended to give additional weight to the assurances of fellowship which the letter contained. Judas and Silas his companion are described as chief men among the brethren (ἡγουμένους: no doubt presbyters; see He $13^{7.\ 17.\ 24}$). They were also prophets, i.e. men whom the Spirit inspired to communicate His truth and will to the Church. Judas, with Silas, remained in Antioch to strengthen the brethren there, and then returned to Jerusalem (v.^{34} in AV is spurious). We hear no more of Judas Barsabbas. Barsabbas is a patronymic (see JOSEPH BARSABBAS). He may have been a brother of Joseph (Ac 1^{23}). He is not to be identified with Jude the author of the Epistle, because the latter's brother James (see JUDE) was either the son of Joseph, the foster-father of Jesus, or the son of Alphæus. Neither can he have been the Apostle Judas, 'not Iscariot,' both because he is in Acts clearly distinguished from the apostles, and because the Apostle Judas was 'the son of James' (Lk 6^{16} RV).

JUDAS OF DAMASCUS.—In Ac 9^{11} Ananias is told to go to the street called 'Straight,' and seek in the house of Judas a man of the name of Saul, of Tarsus. Nothing further is known of Judas. Tradition has found a house for him in Damascus, not, however, in the street called Straight, but only a few paces out of it, in a lane to the right, as one goes from west to east.

A. C. HEADLAM.

JUDAS OF GALILEE, mentioned by Gamaliel (Ac 5^{37}) as the leader of a popular revolt 'in the days of the taxing' (RV 'enrolment'), which ended, however, in his destruction and the dispersion of his followers. The 'enrolment' was the one conducted by Quirinius (which see), when in A.D. 6 or 7 he was a second time (cf. Lk 2^{1}) made governor of Syria. It was intended to be a basis of Roman taxation, and excited fierce opposition among the Jews, which was quieted only by the influence of the high priest Joazar (Jos. Ant. XVIII. i. 1). Judas, however, with a certain Pharisee, Saddoc, called the people to defend their liberties, bidding them acknowledge no Lord but God. Josephus (Ant. XVIII. i. 1, 6, XX. v. 2; BJ II. viii. 1, xvii. 8, 9, VII. viii. 1), like Gamaliel, usually calls him a Galilæan, but in one passage (Ant. XVIII. i. 1) a Gaulonite from Gamala, which lay east of Galilee. It is not clear whether the insurrection broke out in Judæa and the title 'Galilæan' was given to Judas because Gaulonitis was loosely identified with Galilee, or whether it broke out in Galilee and thus the title 'Galilæan' was attached to him. That it was a considerable movement appears both from Gamaliel's notice of it and from the frequency with which Josephus refers to it. According to the latter, from it there arose 'the Zealots,' the most fanatical and patriotic of the Jewish sects, whose violence under Gessius Florus (A.D. 64–66) hastened the war with Rome. Josephus mentions them, after the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes, as the fourth sect of the Jews, and as founded by Judas. He does not mention, however, the death of Judas, or the fate of his insurrection. Gamaliel agrees with Josephus in the date and in the strength assigned to the revolt; nor is there any sufficient reason to question his statement that the leader perished and his followers were dispersed.

Descendants of Judas were also conspicuous for their fanatical violence. Two of his sons, James and Simon, were crucified by Tiberius Alexander (A.D. 46?–48). Another son, Menahem, a leader of the 'Sicarii' in Jerus. shortly before the war with Rome, acquired for a time much power, but was finally slain by the high priest's party.

Still another descendant was Eleazar, who, after the fall of Jerus., defended the fortress of Masada, and persuaded his followers to die by their own hands rather than submit to Rome (BJ VII. viii. and ix.).

Schürer (HJP I. ii. 4, 80) identifies Judas with the person of the same name who, after the death of Herod the Great, raised an insurrection near Sepphoris in Galilee (Jos. Ant. XVII. x. 5; BJ II. iv. 1); but Josephus does not identify them, and the earlier Judas appears to have been simply a marauder. G. T. PURVES.

JUDAS ISCARIOT.—This is his usual designation in the Synoptic Gospels: Ἰούδας Ἰσκαριώτης (Mt 26^{14}), Ἰούδας ὁ Ἰσκαριώτης (Mt 10^{4}), Ἰούδας ὁ καλούμενος Ἰσκαριώτης (Lk 22^{3}), Ἰούδας Ἰσκαριώθ (Mk 3^{19} 14^{10}, Lk 6^{16}). St. John calls him 'the son of Simon' (Σίμωνος), thrice giving the epithet 'Iscariot' to Judas (12^{4} 13^{2} 14^{22}), and twice (according to the best texts) to Simon (6^{71} 13^{26}). All four stigmatize him as ὁ παραδοὺς αὐτόν (Mt 10^{4}), or ὃς καὶ παρέδωκεν αὐτόν (Mk 3^{19}), or ὃς ἐγένετο προδότης (Lk 6^{16}), or ἔμελλεν παραδιδόναι αὐτόν (Jn 6^{71}), when they mention him for the first time. At the actual time of the treachery they use ὁ παραδιδοὺς αὐτόν, 'who was betraying him' (Mt $26^{25.\ 46.\ 48}$, Mk $14^{42.\ 44}$, Lk 22^{21}, Jn 13^{11} $18^{2.\ 5}$). See Ac 1^{16}.

Besides (1) his names, we are told (2) that he was called with the rest of the Twelve to be an apostle; (3) that he was covetous and dishonest, and sold his Master to the hierarchy; (4) that he effected the betrayal immediately after the Last Supper; and (5) that on realizing the consequences of his act he destroyed himself.

Every one of these points has given rise to a large amount of discussion, and the real or apparent uncertainty thus produced has led some to the desperate expedient of rejecting the whole story as a myth. Judas is a Christian fiction to represent the treacherous Judaism which put Jesus to death; and no one among the Twelve was really guilty of this enormity (Volkmar, Noack). Keim justly remarks that it is incredible that Christians should invent such a crime for an apostle. From Celsus onwards the foes of Christianity have made capital out of the sin of Judas (Orig. c. Cels. II. xii.); and to prove that he never committed it, would remove a weight from the heart of Christendom. The statements in the Gospels and Acts are inexplicable; however, if Judas, 'one of the Twelve,' never betrayed the Christ.

1. The name Ἰούδας is a common one, being the Gr. form of the Heb. name Judah. There are six persons before the time of Christ who bear this name, and six in the NT. But there is no confusion respecting the traitor. Discussion has been frequent merely as to the meaning of 'Iscariot,' and this question is practically settled. All other explanations may be rejected in favour of the view that it means 'man of Karioth' or 'Kerioth'; 'Ish Keriyoth becoming Ἰσκαριώτης, as 'Ish Tob becomes Ἰστοβός or Ἴστωβος (Jos. Ant. VII. vi. 1). This explains how both father and son have this name, Kerioth being the home of the family. This also explains the reading ἀπὸ καρυώτου which ℵ* and some other authorities have in Jn 6^{71}, and which D has in Jn 12^{4} $13^{2.\ 26}$ 14^{22}. (See papers on 'Iscariot' by Nestle and Chase in Expository Times, December 1897, and January, February, and March 1898). Kerioth (LXX Καριώθ) in Judah (Jos 15^{25}) is commonly assumed to be the place referred to in 'Iscariot.' It is generally identified with the ruins el-Ḳarjetein south of Hebron. See KERIOTH-HEZRON. In any case Judas is of S. Palestine, while the other eleven were of Galilee; and this may have been one cause of estrangement between him and the rest. Judæans had a tendency to look down on Galilæans.

The life of Judas previous to his call, like that of all the Twelve, is hidden from us; and it is remarkable that the apocr. gospels make so little use of this attractive field of speculation. The Arabic Gospel of the Infancy makes the boy Judas a demoniac who bites (? the kiss), and the demon takes flight when Judas comes into contact with the boy Jesus (xxxv.); but this passage stands alone.

2. The Synoptists indicate that Judas was called with the remainder of the Twelve, and in all their lists his name stands last in the last group of four, while in Ac his place is vacant (Mt 10^{4}, Mk 3^{19}, Lk 6^{16}, Ac 1^{13}). Mt and Mk place him next to Simon the Cananæan, Lk next to the other Judas; and it is possible that one of these was the traitor's companion when the Twelve were sent out two and two (Mk 6^{7}). Like the others, he received power to cast out demons and heal diseases (Mt 10^{1}, Lk 9^{1}); and, like them, he seems to have been successful (Mk 6^{13}, Lk 9^{6}). Lange conjectures that the enthusiast who said, 'I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest' (Lk 9^{57}), was Judas. But Mt calls this man 'a scribe' (8^{19}), and it is most improbable that he was one of the Twelve, who seem to have been chosen before this took place.

But it is in connexion with their election that the chief difficulty respecting Judas is found. Why was such a man chosen to be an apostle? Unless we are prepared to throw aside the express statements of St. John, we cannot here have recourse to the limitation of Christ's knowledge. He tells us, not only that Jesus 'knew all men, and . . . himself knew what was in man' (2^{24}), but that 'Jesus knew from the beginning . . . who it was that should betray him' (6^{64}), and that a year before the Passion he said, 'Did not I choose you the Twelve, and one of you is a devil?' (6^{70}) The parable of the Barren Fig-tree suggests that Christ wished to give Judas every opportunity of bearing good fruit. Or, He may have desired to prevent him from becoming even worse; or, to lessen his powers of mischief; or, to prove to all that no one is safe or constrained, and that even an apostle can rebel to the uttermost; electus enim a Christo sud libertate et vitio corruit (Toletus). Some maintain that Christ selected Judas because He knew that He would betray Him and thus fulfil the divine decrees. None of these suggestions removes the difficulty, which runs up into the insoluble problems of the origin of evil, and of divine omniscience combined with human free-will. See Westcott, Add. Note on Jn 13^{8}.

3. We may assume that Judas had some good qualities which led to his admission to the apostolic body. Among these, practical ability and energy seem to have been found. Hence, when the company begins to have funds (Lk 8^{3}), he is selected to administer them (Jn 13^{29}). This he did dishonestly (Jn 12^{4-6}); and the same greed led him to betray his Master to the priests for thirty shekels (Mt 26^{15}, Mk 14^{11}, Lk 22^{6}). His pilfering from the money-box is the one thing to his discredit that is told us previous to his great crime, and the Synoptists are silent as to this preparatory course of sin. But, no doubt, he yielded to other forms of temptation; and it has been much debated *whether covetousness was the sole or the chief cause of his treachery. It was certainly a cause. He sought the priests, not they him; and his question is, 'What are ye willing to give me?' But disappointed ambition probably helped. He looked, like the rest of the disciples, for an earthly kingdom with profits and honours, and he may have been the first to see that

* We must not argue that so small a sum as thirty shekels could not have induced him to commit such a crime. Matricide has been committed for a few shillings. Thirty shekels was the price of a slave (Ex 21^{32})=about £4 according to the present value of silver, but in purchasing power perhaps double that amount. The power of avarice is almost limitless.

nothing of the kind was in store for him. Jesus had refused to be made a king (Jn 6^{15}); and it was soon after this that the presence of a diabolical character among the Twelve was announced (6^{71}). The triumphal entry into Jerusalem led to nothing; and then the compact with the hierarchy was made. Resentment probably contributed something, at any rate as the end drew near. During the last year Judas would feel that to some extent his conduct was suspected or known. Christ's strong warnings against avarice, and His denunciations of hypocrisy, would seem at times to be aimed at him, and no doubt were in part meant specially for him. Such passages as Mt 6^{19-21} 13^{22}, Mk 10^{25}, Lk 16^{11-13} acquire additional meaning when we remember that Judas was among the hearers. His hypocrisy after the pilfering began must have been conscious, and seems to have been successful; for to the last the other apostles did not suspect him (Jn $13^{22.\ 28}$). But Christ declared that hypocrisy is always exposed in the end (Lk 12^{2}). It was 'to the disciples first of all,' and (we may believe) to Judas most of all, that He said, 'whatsoever ye have spoken in the ear in the inner chambers shall be proclaimed upon the housetops' (Lk $12^{1.\ 3}$). And who more than Judas needed the warning, 'Look whether the light that is in thee be not darkness'? (Lk 11^{35}). His chagrin at the 'waste' of the ointment, and Christ's public rebuke of his hypocritical lament, seem to have been among the incidents which completed his determination to betray Christ. Constant contact with a goodness to which he would not yield had generated a fierce hate. See Swete on Mk 14^{10}.

Attempts have been made both to darken and to brighten what is told us of Judas. Was he a plotter from the first? May he not have sought admission to the inner circle of Christ's disciples in order to overthrow this revolutionary Teacher? But even St. John, whose horror of him is most clearly expressed, gives no hint of this; and, if it were true, it would be amazing that Judas should share in the general success of the Twelve as preachers and workers of miracles. On the other hand, may not his motive have been much less evil than is commonly supposed? Some would represent him as a brave man who believed that patriotism required him to deliver Jesus to the rulers. Others, with more plausibility, suggest that, like the Baptist, he may have been impatient at the slow progress of the Messiah; and he may have intended merely to precipitate a crisis. If the hierarchy were encouraged to arrest Jesus, His miraculous power would defeat them, the populace would declare for Him, and His triumph would be complete. The Passover was an opportunity which must not be allowed to pass. In arguing and acting thus, Judas was presumptuous and wrongheaded, but he was not a sordid traitor. This view also, which is advocated by De Quincey and Whately, has no support in Scripture, not even in the record of his remorse. If there was nothing worse than this, would Christ have denounced him as devilish, and called him a 'son of perdition'? And granting that διάβολος in Jn 6^{70} is not much stronger than Σατανᾶ in Mt 16^{23} and Mk 8^{33}, yet of no one but Judas did He say: 'Good were it for him if that man had not been born' (Mt 26^{24}). After this it is hardly necessary to point out that both Luke and John regard Judas in the last stages of his career as becoming the abode of Satan (Lk 22^{3}, Jn $13^{2.\ 27}$), who then 'entered into him,' an expression which is unique in Scripture in this spiritual sense. With Keim we reject these hypotheses in defence of Judas as impossible and unworthy inventions which have nothing noble to excuse them.

The enormity of the sin of Judas consisted in its being against all bonds of discipleship and friendship; against light, against mercies, affection, trust, and warnings; against his own promises and preaching. And it was committed deliberately, not under sudden strain, like Peter's denials, but with skilful and persistent calculation. He was not surprised by a violent temptation, but he carefully sought an opportunity, which he used with unswerving pertinacity, in spite of the tenderness of the feet-washing, the solemnity of Christ's public condemnation of the traitor, and the proof given to him privately that Christ knew who the traitor was. The demonstrative kiss (κατεφίλησεν) has no parallel in history, and could hardly have been invented; all the less so, because the narrative tells us that by going forward to meet His captors, and declaring Himself to be the person whom they were seeking, Jesus rendered the signal unnecessary. But the sin of Judas is unique only in its opportunity and its form; in kind it may be repeated. It is possible to 'crucify the Son of God afresh' (He 6^{6}), and therefore it is possible to betray Him afresh.

4. All the Gospels represent the traitor as effecting his purpose immediately after the Last Supper, at which he was present; but the point at which he left the upper room is much disputed. Did he, or did he not, receive the eucharistic bread and wine? The first two Gospels seem to imply that Judas received with the rest; but they are indefinite, for they do not mention his exit. St. John is equally indefinite; for he omits the institution of the Eucharist, and we do not know where it should be inserted. St. Luke places the words, 'But behold the hand of him that betrayeth me is with me on the table,' after the distribution of the eucharistic bread ($22^{19.\ 21}$), and apparently after the eucharistic cup also, whether or no we accept as original the disputed words ($^{19b.\ 20}$). It is possible to hold that Judas went out between the partaking of the eucharistic bread and that of the eucharistic cup (Westcott on Jn 13); but the view mentioned by Theophylact, that Judas partook of the cup, but concealed his portion of the bread to show to the hierarchy, need only be mentioned. The majority of patristic and mediæval commentators, with some Reformation writers, adopt the view taken in the Anglican Liturgy, that Judas partook of the Eucharist (see Bynæus, de Morte Christi, i. pp. 443–448, Amst. 1691; Cornelius a Lapide and Maldonatus on Mt 26^{20}). The majority of modern commentators hold that he did not.

5. The perplexities respecting the career of Judas continue to the end. We have two accounts of his death in Scripture, and they differ both from one another and from a third which is obviously legendary. Can we accept any as historical?

In Mt 27^{3-10} we are told that Judas, on learning that Jesus was condemned to death, was stricken with remorse: perfecto demum scelere magnitudo ejus intellecta est, as Tacitus says of Nero's murder of his mother (Ann. XIV. x. 1). He took back the thirty shekels to his employers, saying, 'I have sinned in that I have betrayed innocent blood.' But they had no further interest in the vile instrument which they had used. 'What is that to us? See thou to it.' There are several remarkable words in what follows: καὶ ῥίψας τὰ ἀργύρια εἰς τὸν ναὸν ἀνεχώρησεν—he hurled the silver pieces into the Holy Place and went into solitude. Into the ναός the priests alone might go (Lk $1^{9.\ 21}$, Mt 23^{16} 27^{40}, Mk 14^{58}, Jn 2^{19} etc.). It included both the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies (Mt 27^{51}, Mk 15^{38}, Lk 23^{45}). It is never used like ἱερόν for the whole temple. Either this is a strange exception, or Judas in his desperation rushed into the sanctuary, or (most probably) he hurled the money from a distance. The use of ῥίπτειν εἰς and not βάλλειν ἐν points to this, but is not conclusive. Again, ἀνέχωρησεν means more than 'departed'; it is commonly used of those who shun company, retire from observation (Mt $2^{14.\ 22}$ 4^{12} 12^{15} 14^{13} 15^{-1}, Mk 3^{7}, Jn 6^{15}, Ac 26^{31}). So also in LXX (Ex 2^{15}, Jos 8^{15}, Jg 4^{17} etc.). Yet it is putting a great deal of meaning into it to interpret, 'he lived as a solitary, became a hermit.' But, if this be adopted, then ἀπελθὼν ἀπήγξατο means, 'he left his place of retirement and hanged himself.'

It is from this point that we can compare Matthew's account with that put into the mouth of Peter in the Acts, and with the legend. Matthew seems to mean that Judas hung himself before his betrayed Master was hanged on the cross. He plainly states that Judas left the money, and that the priests, with characteristic scrupulosity about trifles after unscrupulous breach of the gravest commandments (cf. Jn 19^{31}), would not put the polluted silver into the sacred treasury,* but bought with it the potter's field, to bury aliens in. This field was afterwards known as 'the field of blood,' because it was bought with blood-money. Thus a prophecy of Jeremiah (? Zechariah) was fulfilled.†

The narrative in the Acts ($1^{16\text{-}20}$) is strangely different. Nothing is said about the priests or the restoration of the money. On the contrary, Judas himself is said to have 'procured a field with the reward of his iniquity.' There he fell headlong in such a way that 'his bowels gushed out'; and hence the field was called 'the field of blood.' Thus a prophecy of David (Ps 69^{25} 109^{8}) was fulfilled. It is possible to harmonize the two modes of death. Judas hung himself over a precipice, the rope broke, and he was dashed to pieces. The Vulgate of Ac 1^{18} suggests this method: suspensus crepuit medius. But why should Matthew give only one half of the tragedy, and Luke only the other? And even so there still remain grave discrepancies between the two narratives. In the one Judas restores the money, in the other he keeps it; in the one he procures the field, in the other the hierarchy do so; in the one the name of the field comes from the blood-money, in the other from his bloody death. Moreover, in the one he plainly commits suicide, like Ahithophel ($2\,S$ 17^{23}), in the other his death may be accidental. In the Middle Ages two different spots were pointed out, one as 'the potter's field,' and the other as Akeldama; and the 'tree of Judas' is still shown.

It is better to recognize the fact that we have here two different traditions, of which that in the Gospel is nearer in time to the event, and probably nearer to the truth; but even that may have been influenced by the desire to harmonize facts with a supposed prophecy. The tradition learned by St. Luke is later; and popular fancy has guessed at the meaning of 'the field of blood.' But it is an excess of scepticism to say that nothing is known about the end of Judas. We may safely affirm that he came to a violent end, probably by his own hand. And the story of the return of the money and of the priests' treatment of it has every appearance of truth. But it may be admitted that, in the absence of evidence, a horrible end would inevitably have been invented for Judas. We may compare the cases of Dositheus the heretic and his successor Simon Magus, both of whom are represented as perishing by a violent death, and, like Judas in the Acts, by a fall (Clem. Hom. II. xxiv.; Apost. Const. VI. ix.). The accounts of the death of Arius exhibit a similar feeling (Socrates, HE I. xxxviii.; Sozomen, II. xxx.).

This tendency is seen still more clearly in the legendary account of the end of Judas, preserved in a fragment from the fourth book of Papias (Theophylact on Ac 1^{18}, Catena ad Acta S. App.; Cramer, Oxford, 1838, p. 12; Patr. Apostolic Opp., Gebh., Harn., Zahn, I. ii. app.; Suicer, Thesaurus, s.v. ἀπάγχω). This story is an amplification of ἐλάκησεν μέσος καὶ ἐξεχύθη πάντα τὰ σπλάγχνα αὐτοῦ (Ac 1^{18}), with details which seem to be borrowed from the death of Antiochus (2 Mac $9^{4ff.}$). Papias had heard that Judas became so enlarged by inflammation that where a waggon could easily pass he could not;—not even his head, which was so swollen that even the physician could not find his eyes. Worms and corruption proceeded from his body, and he suffered horrible torments until he died ἐν ἰδίῳ χωρίῳ. The spot was shunned by every one, and for years afterwards an offensive smell tainted the neighbourhood, intolerable to all who passed by. Another addition makes the narrative more harmonious with Ac 1^{18}, by stating that he was crushed by a waggon, ὥστε τὰ ἔγκατα αὐτοῦ ἐκκενωθῆναι (Oecumenius, ad loc.). But we can hardly say that the story without this detail shows that Papias knew the Acts. He knew a story which seems to have grown in part out of the narrative preserved in the Acts. But, in any case, here, as often, we are able to contrast the sobriety and probability of the Gospel narrative with the grotesque and revolting exaggerations in non-canonical sources.

It is not necessary to enlarge on the contrast between Peter and Judas in their fall and in their repentance. The one yielded to a sudden temptation, was at once touched by his Master's reproachful look of love, and returned to his Lord in affectionate confidence at the earliest opportunity. Judas deliberately sought and persisted in evil in defiance of all loving influences, and, in his dismay at the results of his act, tried to ease his conscience, without turning to Christ or to God for forgiveness. He thus ended, not in repentance, but in despair. See Euthymius Zigabenus on Mt 27^{5}.

But as early as Origen quite another view was taken of the suicide of Judas. He was hurrying to do in the other world what he failed to do in this. Knowing that Jesus would soon be in Hades, and that He was the source of salvation, he determined to be there before Him, and with bared soul to meet Him and implore His forgiveness (Origen, Tract. in Matt. xxxv., Migne, xiii. 1767. Suicer, s.v. Ἰούδας, quotes the same idea from Theophanes, Hom. xxvii. p. 202. See also Theophylact on Mt 27^{5}).

The impious sect of the Cainites had a small composition which they called the Gospel of Judas. They regarded him as the true Gnostic, who with supreme insight accomplished the excellent work of overthrowing the power of the Demiurge by causing the death of Christ (Iren. I. xxxi. 1; Epiphan. Hær. I. xxxviii. 1; Theodoret, Hær. Fab. I. xv.; Pseudo-Tert. adv. omn. Hær. ii.).

Representations of Judas are rare in ancient art. Kraus knows of only three of the traitor's kiss. These are a sarcophagus at Verona (Maffei, Verona illustr. iii. 54), a sarcophagus of southern Gaul (Faillon, Monum. de S. Madeleine, i. 462), and a mosaic of the 6th cent. in S. Apollinare at Ravenna, of which Kraus gives a sketch. In Smith's Dict. of Chr. Ant. i. 891 is a drawing of Judas hanging from a tree. This is from the Syriac MS of Rabula, A.D. 586. Kraus gives another from an ivory in the British Museum, which is perhaps of the 5th cent. The crucifixion is part of the same picture, so that Judas hangs side by side with Christ (Real-Enc. d. Christ. Alt. ii. 74, 75).

* They were perhaps arguing by analogy from Dt 23^{18}. The wages of sin could not be offered to God. But if Judas had sinned, how could they be guiltless?

† The difficulty about the prophecy is not solved by assuming that by a slip of memory St. Matthew has written 'Jeremiah' for 'Zechariah' (cf. 'Barachias' for 'Jehoiada,' 23^{35}). Zec $11^{12.\ 13}$ does not agree with the evangelist's quotation. Hebrew, LXX. and Matthew differ widely; but there must be some connexion, and perhaps through a Targum.

JUDAS ('Ιούδας), 'NOT ISCARIOT,' one of the twelve (Jn 14^{22}), who is also described as 'Judas of James' (Lk 6^{16}, Ac 1^{13}). His identification with the disciple who is also called Lebbæus (Mt 10^{3} AV) and Thaddæus (Mt 10^{3} RV, Mk 3^{18}) is generally accepted, although it has been suggested that Judas really took the place of Thaddæus, who had died during the ministry of our Lord. He is not to be identified with Judas or Jude, the Lord's brother. Nothing whatever is known about him or his ultimate career, except the question recorded by St. John, who is careful to distinguish him from his namesake the traitor. See, further, JUDE, LEBBÆUS, THADDÆUS.

W. MUIR.

JUDE THE LORD'S BROTHER.—A Judas is named as one of the Lord's 'brethren' in Mt 13^{55}, Mk 6^{3}. He has commonly been identified by tradition with the Apostle Judas, 'not Iscariot' (Jn 14^{22}). But the latter is described by St. Luke (6^{16}, Ac 1^{13}) as the son (AV has improperly the brother) of James. Those who deny that the 'brethren' included any apostles, of course reject this identification also, and regard Judas the brother of Jesus as the son of Joseph either by a former wife or by Mary (see BRETHREN OF THE LORD). Assuming the latter view, we know of Judas merely that he belonged to the Nazarene household, and, like the rest of his brethren (Jn 7^{5}), did not believe in Christ till after the resurrection (Ac 1^{13}). He was doubtless also the author of 'the Epistle of Jude,' styling himself in v.[1] 'a servant of Jesus Christ and brother of James' (i.e. James the Lord's brother, Gal 1^{19}). This indicates that his spiritual relation to Jesus was felt to be more important than the fleshly one; also that Jude was less known in the Churches than James was. In v.[17] he apparently distinguishes himself from the apostles. The Ep. indicates that he was familiar with the OT and Jewish tradition, and specially indignant against those who introduced immorality under cover of the gospel.

The only mention of Jude in ecclesiastical history is the story related from Hegesippus by Eusebius (HE iii. 19, 20, 32), that Domitian, having commanded the descendants of David to be slain, certain heretics made accusation against the grandchildren of Jude,* 'said to have been the Lord's brother according to the flesh'; but that, when they were brought to the emperor, he found them to be poor, hard-working men, who described Christ's kingdom as heavenly, and destined to appear at the end of the world; so he dismissed them with contempt. The historian adds that they afterwards ruled the Churches, being both witnesses (i.e. for the faith) and relatives of the Lord; and that they lived until the time of Trajan. Nicephorus Callisti (c. A.D. 1350, Hist. Eccles. i. 33) reports a tradition that Jude's wife was Mary the mother of James and Joses, and (ib. ii. 3) that his mother was Salome; but the statements of Niceph. are inconsistent with respect to these relationships, and his testimony to them is of small value.

G. T. PURVES.

* That Jude was married may be inferred from 1 Co 9^{5}. The names of his grandchildren are said to have been Zoker and James (Hegesip. ap. Phil. Sedet., TU v. 169).

1. TRANSMISSION OF THE TEXT.—The authorities are (1) MSS (a) Uncial: ℵABC ('primary' MSS, Hort, Introduction, p. 192) $K_2L_2P_2$; the relative character of all these MSS has been elaborately investigated by B. Weiss, Die Kath. Briefe, in 'Texte u. Untersuchungen,' viii. 3; (b) Cursive: the chief are 13 (=33 evv.), 40, 44 (=221 Scriv.), 137: (2) Versions: (a) Latin: vg. (on Old Latin texts see below under 'Fathers'): (b) Syriac: Harklean; the Syriac Vulgate (Peshiṭta) did not contain 2 P, 2 3 Jn, Jude; in modern editions they are supplied after a text taken from a Bodleian MS printed by Pococke in 1630: (c) Egyptian: Bohairic (Memphitic), Sahidic (Thebaic): (d) Ethiopic: (e) Armenian: (3) Fathers: (a) Greek: the chief are Clem. Alex., Origen, Didymus (chiefly Latin trans.), Ephraem (not Syriac works), Cyril Alex., the commentators Œcumenius and Theophylact, the Fragments in Cramer, Catena: (b) Latin: Tertullian does not quote from, but refers to, Jude (de Cult. Fem. i. 3, 'Enoch apud Iudam apostolum testimonium possidet'): his words seem to imply that the Ep. was known to his readers, and therefore current in a Latin translation. There are important quotations in Lucifer of Calaris, de non Conv. cum Hær. xv. (p. 33 f. ed. Hartel)—vv.[1-3. 5-8. 11-13. 17-19.]; in Priscillian, Tract. i. iii. v. (pp. 29, 32, 44, 64, ed. Schepss)—vv.[12f. 14f. 23]; also in the Speculum commonly known by the symbol m (pp. 455, 647, ed. Weihrich)—vv.[6. 7. 12]. These quotations supply relics of pre-Hieronymic texts. An examination of them shows (1) that Lucif. and m give substantially the same text in vv.[6f. 12], Lucif. being rather fuller and slightly nearer to the Greek; (2) that Lucif. and Prisc. give different texts. Sabatier quotes also from Jerome, Augustine, Vigilius, and Fulgentius small fragments of Latin texts. The whole subject needs further investigation.

The text in several places seems uncertain, and 'primitive' errors are probable. On vv.[1. 5] see WH, Introduction, Notes on Select Readings, p. 106 f. In v.[12] (οὗτοί εἰσιν οἱ . . . σπιλάδες συνευωχούμενοι), unless the writer himself after οἱ changed his construction, the οἱ appears to be an early insertion (see the two types of sentences in vv.[16. 19]). In v.[22] either the first ἐλεᾶτε is intrusive (cf. WH), or (in view of St. Jude's fondness for triplets) οὓς δέ should be inserted before σώζετε (so ℵ). In the latter case the three clauses rise to a climax, and each has its characteristic idea—hopeful compassion, desperate effort, compassion paralyzed by fear of contamination.

2. RECEPTION IN THE CHURCH.—Little or no stress can be laid on supposed coincidences with this Ep. in sub-apostolic writings—Ep. Barn. 2^{10} (cf. 4^{9}), Jude [3f.]; Ep. Polyc. iii. 2, iv. 2, Jude [3. 20]; Mart. Polyc. xx. (doxology), Jude [24f.]. The similarity, however, of Didaché ii. 7 (οὐ μισήσεις πάντα ἄνθρωπον, ἀλλὰ οὓς μὲν ἐλέγξεις, περὶ δὲ ὧν προσεύξῃ, οὓς δὲ ἀγαπήσεις κ.τ.λ.) to Jude [22f.] in thought and still more in form is too striking to be accidental (cf. iv. 1 ἡ κυριότης, Jude [8]); it need not, however, imply direct borrowing, for on other grounds it seems likely that the two documents had their origin within the same circle of Christian thought, and it is conceivable that parts of the Didaché are ultimately the work of the author of the Epistle.

There is clear evidence that at the end of the 2nd and at the beginning of the 3rd cent. the Ep. was accepted as authoritative in three important Churches. (1) Alexandria. Clement quotes it as the work of Jude in Pæd. iii. 8 (p. 280, ed. Potter), Strom. iii. 2 (p. 515); he cites words from it (v.[22f.]) as a 'commandment' in Strom. vi. 8 (p. 773); his Hypotyposes contained 'short explanations' of this as of other Catholic Epistles (Eus. HE vi. 14. 1, Photius, Biblioth. 109; see at end of this art.). The witness of Clement is carried on by Origen. If in one place he hints at doubts about its reception (in Matt. tom. xvii. 30, εἰ δὲ καὶ τὴν Ἰούδα πρόσοιτό τις ἐπιστολήν), yet in another (in Matt. tom. x. 17), speaking of Jude as one of the Lord's brethren, he commends the Epistle as 'full of strong words of heavenly grace though it be but a few lines in length,' and he repeatedly quotes from or alludes to it (in Joh. tom. xiii. 37, in Matt. tom. xv. 27, in Rom.* lib. iii. 6 [Scriptura sacra], in Rom.* lib. v. 1 [J. Apostolus in epistola catholica], in Ezek.* hom. iv. 1, Ep. ad Alexandrinos*, xvii. p. 7f. (ed. Lommatzsch), de Princip.* iii. 2. 1; the passages marked * are extant only in a Latin translation). It was also commented on by Didymus (Migne, Pat. Gr. xxxix. 1811–1818). (2) Carthage. It was accepted by Tertullian (see above, under 'Text'). (3) Rome. It is included in the Muratorian Canon, not improbably the work of Hippolytus (Lightfoot, Clement, ii. p. 405 ff.).* The writer mentions certain writings which cannot be 'received into the Catholic Church: for gall may not be mixed with honey.' He then continues, 'Epistola sane iude et superscrictio iohannis duas in catholica habentur.' The context and the introduction of the sentence by sane ('to be sure') imply that doubts existed which he expressly puts aside (cf. Zahn, Gesch. des NT Kanons, II. i. p. 93). The evidence then justifies Zahn's verdict (ib. I. i. p. 321) that at the meeting-point of the 2nd and 3rd cent. the Epistle was accepted 'in the Catholic Church, the Church of all the countries round the Mediterranean,' a verdict with which Harnack (NT um Jahr 200, 79, 86) substantially agrees. On the other hand, the following facts must be noticed. (a) Though accepted by Tertullian, the Ep. does not appear to be quoted by Cyprian. Like He and Ja, it is omitted in the Canon Mommsenianus (an African list of the middle of the 4th cent.), unless we accept the somewhat precarious suggestion of Harnack (Theol. Ltzg. 1886, col. 173) that a reference to the Epp. of St. James and St. Jude is intended in the una sola which stands after the mention of the three Epp. of St. John and again after that of the two Epp. of St. Peter (see Zahn, Gesch. II. i. p. 155 n.; Sanday in Studia Bibl. et Eccles. iii. p. 243 ff.). It is not unlikely that after the time of Tertullian the Ep. fell out of use in the N. African Church. It should be added that it has no place among the Books contained in the Latin Antiqua translatio referred to by Cassiodorus (de Instit. Div. Lit. xiv.). (b) It was not included in the Syriac Vulgate (cf. Amphilochius, Iambi ad Seleucum (Migne, Pat. Gr. xxxvii. 1593)), nor is it quoted in the Homilies of Aphraat or in the Syriac works of Ephraem (cf. Stud. Bibl. et Eccles. iii. p. 138). None of the Catholic Epistles is mentioned in the Doctrine of Addai (ed. Phillips, p. 44) among the Books publicly read in the Syrian Church. (c) There is no evidence that it was accepted in the School of Antioch. The passage commonly quoted from the Letter of the bishops who condemned Paul of Samosata (τοῦ καὶ τὸν θεὸν τὸν ἑαυτοῦ [καὶ κύριον] ἀρνουμένου καὶ τὴν πίστιν, ἣν καὶ αὐτὸς πρότερον εἶχε, μὴ φυλάξαντος, Eus. HE vii. 30. 4) can hardly be considered as a decisive reference to Jude[3f.], especially if, according to the best MSS, the words in brackets are omitted. In later times the Ep. does not seem to be quoted in the voluminous works of Chrysostom or Theodoret, and the phrase used (τῶν καθολικῶν ἐπιστολαὶ τρεῖς) in the Synopsis (Migne, Pat. Gr. lvi. 313 f.) which bears the name of the former appears to show that Jude, 2 P, 1 Jn, 2 Jn were known and deliberately excluded. Theodore of Mopsuestia (who made his view of the character of a Book a criterion of canonicity), according to Leontius of Byzantium (Migne, Pat. Gr. lxxxvi. 1365), rejected (ἀποκηρύττει) this Epistle, as also Ja, 2 P, 2 Jn, 3 Jn (see especially Kihn, Theod. von Mops. pp. 67, 75 f.). This is confirmed by the fact that Junilius (Instit. regularia, 6, 7), whom Kihn (p. 358 ff.) shows to represent Theodore's views as to the Canon, reckons these Epistles as mediæ auctoritatis.

* The de Consummatione Mundi, in which (c. x.) Jude[18] is quoted, is not a genuine work of Hippolytus (see Hippolyt's Kleinere Exeg. u. Hom. Schriften, ed. Achelis, p. vii).

We learn from Didymus, though his words in the Latin translation in which they reach us are somewhat obscure, that the Ep. was questioned by some on account of the strange reference to the dispute about Moses' body. We learn from Jerome (de Vir. Illustr. 4) that it was rejected by many ('a plerisque') because it quoted from the Book of Enoch. Eusebius (HE iii. 25, cf. ii. 23), reflecting the average opinion of his time, ranks it among 'the disputed Books, which yet are known and acknowledged by most.' The Ep. has a place in the list of Canonical Scriptures set forth by the Third Council of Carthage in A.D. 397. This Canon, supported by the authority of Jerome and Augustine, gained universal acceptance in the W. Church.

To sum up: considering the brevity of the Ep. and its special character, it had received, by the beginning of the 3rd cent., a remarkably wide acceptance in the Church. This early acceptance, representing the voice of tradition, supports its authenticity. From the beginning of the 3rd cent., when tradition was to some extent checked by criticism, and when (in view of the Gnostic controversies) all apocryphal writings were regarded with suspicion, the internal character of the Ep., its quotation from Enoch, and its reference to the Assumptio Moysi, tended to become a bar to its recognition as an authoritative document of the apostolic age. Even when the question of the NT Canon was virtually settled by the general opinion of the Church, such doubts and suspicions, based on internal evidence, found occasional expression.

3. Vocabulary, Style, Literary Indebtedness.—In the vocabulary of Jude there are three elements. (a) There is the obvious Christian element. A Christian dialect has arisen. Certain words, e.g. κλητοί, σωτηρία, πίστις, have attained, largely through the teaching and the writings of St. Paul (see below), a fixed and recognized meaning among Greek-speaking Christians. (b) The writer is steeped in the language of the LXX. In this short Ep. occur several words and phrases derived from the LXX which are not used independently by other NT writers—ἐκπορνεύειν, ἐμπαίκτης (2 P), ἐνυπνιάζεσθαι, θαυμάζειν πρόσωπα, λαλεῖν ὑπέρογκα. Moreover, it should be noted that he uses words which do not occur in the canonical books, but are found in the Book of Wisdom, ἄϊδιος (Wis 7[26], cf. 4 Mac 10[15] var. lec.), ἄλογα ζῷα (Wis 11[15], cf. 4 Mac 14[14, 18]), σπιλοῦν (Wis 15[4]). Further, with Jude [6f.] compare 3 Mac 2[4f.]. (c) He has at his command a large stock of stately, sonorous, sometimes poetical words, e.g. ἀποδιορίζειν (Aristot.), ἄπταιστος (Xen., adverb Plat.), ἐκχυθῆναι (Aristoph., Polyb.), ἐπαφρίζειν (Moschus), ζόφος (Hom., Hes., Pind., Polyb.), παρεισδύεσθαι (Hippocr., Plut., Philo), σπιλάδες (Hom., Anthol., Joseph.), συνευωχεῖσθαι (Aristot., Joseph., Lucian), φθινοπώριος (Aristot., Polyb., Plut.). Moreover, such phrases as πᾶσαν σπουδὴν ποιεῖσθαι (Herod.), προκεῖσθαι δείγμα, δίκην ὑπέχειν (Herod., Soph., Eur.), κρίσιν ἐπιφέρειν, have a true Greek ring about them. It is interesting to note that more than once he adopts and presses into the service of Christian thought a recognized Greek phrase—ἡ κοινὴ σωτηρία ('the safety of the state,' see Wetstein's note), οἱ προγεγραμμένοι ('the proscribed,' Polyb.).

The vocabulary then of the Ep. proves that the author, though a Jew, was yet a man of some culture and, as it would seem, not without acquaintance with Greek writers. Writers, however, of the 'common' dialect, embodying older strata of the language, would suffice to supply him with his vocabulary.

From vocabulary we turn to style. Here we mark an entire lack of flexibility. There is indeed in the Ep. a strong rhetorical element. But the writer is never carried away. There are no rugged, broken sentences (v.[16] is no exception to this statement) as in St. Paul's Epistles. We miss entirely the power of epigram which is so strong a weapon with St. James, and the oratorical persuasiveness of the Ep. to the Hebrews. The powerful effect of the Epistle is due entirely (on the literary side) to the writer's ability πυργῶσαι ῥήματα σεμνά. The richness of the writer's vocabulary stands in marked contrast to his poverty in ways of connecting and manipulating sentences. The general structure is characterized by a certain formality and stiffness. His fondness for triplets (vv.[2. 5-7. 8. 11. 12. 19. 22f. 25]) has often been noticed. The reiteration of οὗτοί εἰσιν (οἱ) at the beginning of sentences (vv.[12. 16. 19], cf. [8. 10. 14]) is especially marked.* As the Ep. draws towards its close, there is a twice-repeated contrast between the false and the true members of the Church; in either case over against a οὗτοι is set a ὑμεῖς δέ (vv.[16f. 19f.]), an arrangement unfortunately obscured in WH. Thus the writer's Greek is a strong and weighty weapon over which, however, he has not a ready command. The elaborate and balanced doxology (cf. also v.[4] καὶ μόνον . . . Χριστόν) recalls passages in the Epistle of the Roman Clement, and suggests that the writer's words took that liturgical form which was familiar to him in his ministrations in the Christian assembly. Indeed, the impression produced by the carefully-compacted arrangement of the whole Epistle is that in it we not improbably have a résumé of words spoken by an elder in the assembly which, often repeated and pondered over, gradually formed themselves into the elaborate denunciation and exhortation of this Epistle.

The literary affinities of the Ep. are important both for the light which they throw on its history and also for purposes of interpretation.

(i.) We have seen that the writer was familiar with the LXX. There are one or two indications, hardly perhaps decisive, that he was acquainted with the Hebrew OT. In v.[12] ἑαυτοὺς ποιμαίνοντες probably comes from Ezk 34[2] cf. [8], but it is closer to the Heb. (רֹעִים אוֹתָם . . . קלעים) than to the LXX μὴ βόσκουσιν οἱ ποιμένες ἑαυτούς.† In v.[12] νεφέλαι ἄνυδροι ὑπὸ ἀνέμων παραφερόμεναι may be a reminiscence of Pr 25[14] (נְשִׂאִים וְרוּחַ וְגֶשֶׁם אָיִן), but the LXX has no resemblance to Jude. In v.[22f.] it is not improbable that the two phrases ἐκ πυρὸς ἁρπάζοντες and τὸν ἀπὸ τῆς σαρκὸς ἐσπιλωμένον χιτῶνα are derived from Zec 3[2f.], from which passage the phrase ἐπιτιμήσαι σοι Κύριος (v.[9]) is clearly taken (perhaps through the medium of the Assumptio Moysi). But there are no points of contact between Jude and the LXX rendering. On the other hand, the Hebrew word (צֹאִים) used here, meaning 'filthy,' is connected with the words צוֹאָה, צֹאָה, both meaning 'excrements,' and thus Jude's phrase alludes to the associations of the Hebrew word. The probability of these references taken together is greater than their probability when each is taken separately. So far as they go, they suggest that the writer of the Ep. was a Jew of Palestine.

(ii.) The discovery of the text of the Greek version of the Book of Enoch (1–32) among the Akhmîm fragments has supplied new and important material for the criticism of Jude. As this material does not appear as yet to have been fully utilized for this purpose, no apology is needed for the subjoined table giving coincidences of thought and language. On the quotation in v.[14f.] from Enoch (1[9]), see the art. on ENOCH IN THE NT.

(iii.) There is every reason to believe the assertion of Clement, Origen, and other Patristic writers (see the passages conveniently collected together in Charles, The Assumption of Moses, p. 105 ff.), that the writer derived the legend referred to in v.[9] from a document called The Assumption of Moses. This document was indeed, as Charles shows, part of a book whose true title was probably The Testament of Moses, a fragment of which is known to us in a Latin translation under the title of The Assumption of Moses; and this Testament, as Burkitt has shown (Guardian, June 1, 1898), is probably the epilogue of the Book of Jubilees, which claims to be the record of a revelation made to Moses on Sinai by the Angel of the Presence. In view of Jude's use of this Mosaic literature the number of allusions in so short an Epistle to matters connected with Moses is noteworthy: the deliverance and punishment of Israel (v.[5]), the murmuring (v.[16], cf. 1 Co 10[10]), the episodes of Balaam and of Korah (v.[11]).

Between the Latin fragment of the Assumption (cf. Charles, p. 62) and Jude there are coincidences in thought and (to some extent) in language. With Jude[3] compare Assump. iv. 8, 'permanebunt in præposita fide sua.' With Jude[12] cf. Assump. vii. 4, 'qui erunt homines dolosi, sibi placentes, ficti in omnibus suis et omni hora diei amantes convivia, devoratores, gulæ.' With Jude[16] cf. Assump. vii. 9, 'et manus eorum et mentes immunda tractantes, et os eorum loquetur ingentia'; v. 5 'mirantes personas locupletum et accipientes munera.' With Jude[24] cf. Assump. i. 10, 'ut facias quemadmodum sine querellam sis Deo' [MS est ideo].

(iv.) There can be no doubt that the writer was acquainted with and influenced in language and thought by St. Paul's Epistles. In the salutation to τοῖς ἐν θεῷ πατρὶ ἠγαπημένοις we have parallels in 1 Th 1[4] 2 Th 2[13]; the κλητοῖς here is precisely similar to the κλητοῖς of Ro 1[7], 1 Co 1[2]. In v.[20] the words ἐποικοδομοῦντες . . . πίστει recall Col 2[7]. To different points in the closing doxology (v.[24f.]) we have a remarkable series of parallels in St. Paul—Ro 16[25ff.] (τῷ δὲ δυναμένῳ ὑμᾶς στηρίξαι . . . μόνῳ σοφῷ θεῷ διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ), Eph 3[20], 1 Th 5[23], 2 Th 3[3], 1 Co 1[8], Eph 1[4], Col 1[22]. Besides these verbal coincidences there is a close parallel to 1 Co 10[1-13] in the prominence given (vv.[5. 11. 16]) to the deliverance and punishment of Israel regarded as a warning to the Christian body.

The investigation, then, under this head has shown that the writer was influenced in vocabulary, style, and thought by the OT (certainly by the LXX, probably also by the original Hebrew), by the Book of Enoch to a remarkable degree, by another apocryphal document embodying the history of Moses, and lastly by Epistles of St. Paul (including probably Col and Eph). His vocabulary, moreover, proves him to have had at least some acquaintance with the literature of the 'common' dialect, while at the same time his stiffness in the manipulation of sentences seems to stamp him as a man whose knowledge of Greek was acquired in later rather than in earlier life.

4. THE RELATION OF JUDE TO 2 PETER.—That there is a close literary connexion between the two Epistles is clear when the following passages are compared: Jude[3] ‖ 2 P 1[5. 15]; [4] ‖ 2[1-3]; [5] ‖ 1[12f.] 3[1]; [6] ‖ 2[4. 9]; [7] ‖ 2[6. 10]; [8] ‖ 2[11]; [9] ‖ 2[11f.]; [10] ‖ 2[12]; [11] ‖ 2[15f.]; [12f.] ‖ 2[13. 17]; [16] ‖ 2[18]; [17f.] ‖ 3[2f.]. The hypothesis that both writers borrowed from a third document, though it has found stray advocates, may be put aside at once, as being destitute of any shred of external evidence, and as having no support in the peculiar phenomena of the two Epistles. The direct question therefore remains—which of the two writers is the borrower?

The priority of 2 P has found within the last few years an intrepid and resourceful champion in F. Spitta (Der Zweite Brief des Petrus u. der Br. des Judas, 1885).* The considerations are of three kinds: (i.) The general alleged historical connexion. Spitta supposes that 2 P was written by St. Peter shortly before his death; that according to his promise (1[15]) he made provision for his correspondents being reminded of his teaching; and that St. Jude wrote his Ep. by way of carrying out St. Peter's undertaking. Accordingly, in Jude, Spitta finds direct references to 2 P. In v.[5] πάντα, and in vv.[4. 12] the article (οἱ), refer respectively to facts and persons well known to St. Jude's readers through 2 P † (but on the phrase οὗτοί εἰσιν οἱ see above). Lastly, he holds that in Jude 17[f.] there is a specific reference to 2 P 3[3]. In regard to this last, the crucial point, it is incredible that St. Jude, * Spitta (Zur Geschichte u. Litteratur des Urchristentums, ii. pp. 409–411 (1896)) has lately reaffirmed his position as to the relation of Jude and 2 P, and supported it by a fresh argument. He holds that the Shepherd of Hermas is a Christian recension of an older Jewish work. Of that Jewish work Jude and 2 P contain reminiscences. But he urges that investigation shows that the echoes of it in Jude must be derived through the medium of 2 P. On Zahn's position see footnote to Literature.

† In v.[19] there is a similar article, but no reference to 2 P can be made out. Spitta therefore supposes that the allusion is to St. Paul's Epistles.

writing with the special purpose of reminding his readers of St. Peter's Epistle, should smother his reference to the words of that Epistle in an appeal to the habitual oral teaching (ἔλεγον) of the apostles generally (τῶν ἀποστόλων), and that he should omit the chief count of his master's indictment.

(ii.) Connexion of thought. It must suffice to apply this test to two pairs of passages:—

(a) In 2 P 2[11] (ὅπου ἄγγελοι κ.τ.λ.) we have an example of forbearance answering to that adduced in Jude[9] from the Assumptio. It has often been pointed out that the reference in 2 P is so general that it has no meaning until it is interpreted in the light of Jude. Spitta, however, maintains that Jude has mistaken the allusion in 2 P. Adopting the reading παρὰ Κυρίου, he supposes that 2 P refers to Enoch (10[4ff.] 12[4] 13[1]), where God is described as sending Raphael to the fallen angel Azazel, and Raphael and his fellows as executing the commission by sending Enoch to Azazel with a message of judgment. The objections to this ingenious suggestion are many, and, it seems, insuperable. It necessitates the adoption of the inferior reading παρὰ Κυρίου.* Again, the allusion could not have been surmised by the original readers of 2 P. Its discovery was reserved for a scholar, who, studying 2 P with Jude, had Enoch brought prominently before him. Again, no stress is laid in Enoch on the message being sent through the patriarch; and indeed there is something grotesque in finding an example of forbearance in the angels sending a man to do what, ex hypothesi, they shrank from doing themselves. Lastly, a message of judgment from God could not be described as βλάσφημος κρίσις. The passages, therefore, remain decisive witnesses against the priority of 2 P. (b) An argument of a different kind is supplied by Jude[10] ‖ 2 P 2[12]. The verse in Jude fits into the context (see v.[8]), and is itself well compacted, the μὲν . . . δέ marking a simple and forcible contrast (cf. v.[8]). The phrase φυσικῶς ἐπίστασθαι is a very natural phrase,† and the word φυσικῶς is necessary to limit the kind of knowledge. The clause ὡς τὰ ἄλογα ζῷα (note art.) stands after φυσικῶς, which it further defines. Lastly, φθείρονται answers to μιαίνουσιν in v.[8], just as βλασφημοῦσιν of v.[10] to βλασφημοῦσιν in v.[8]. The Petrine verse, on the other hand, is but loosely connected with the previous context; there is something artificial in the paronomasia φθορᾶν, φθορᾷ, φθαρήσονται (cf. 1[4] 2[19]), and the use of the adjective φυσικά is, to say the least, strange. All the expressions in Jude (except ὅσα . . . ἐπίστανται) have something corresponding to them in 2 P, and it is almost impossible to conceive that the ill-compacted and artificial sentence of the latter should have been the original of the terse, orderly, and natural sentence of the former. The investigation of other parallels would lead to the same conclusion; see especially Jude[13] ‖ 2 P 2[17], the phrase οἷς ὁ ζόφος, κ.τ.λ. in Jude referring to the stars, and being a reminiscence (see above) of passages in Enoch.

(iii.) Vocabulary and style. (a) Positive arguments. The verdict must be arrived at not by drawing up statistics as to words, but by estimating the naturalness of the use of words and phrases in the parallel passages.

In 2 P we find elaborated expressions, containing sometimes favourite words of the author, corresponding to forcible, simple expressions, sometimes echoes of Enoch, in Jude. Thus, for example, εἰδότας ἅπαξ πάντα (cf. Enoch), Jude 5‖ καίπερ εἰδότας κ. ἐστηριγμένους (cf. 3[17] 2[14] 3[16]) ἐν τῇ παρούσῃ (1[9]) ἀληθείᾳ (2[2]), 2 P 1[12]; ὑπὸ ζόφον (cf. Enoch), v.[6]‖ σειροῖς ζόφου, 2[4]; ἐν ταῖς ἀγάπαις ὑμῶν σπιλάδες (the meaning 'hidden rocks' being certified by the fact that it is followed by a series of images from the natural world), v.[12]‖ σπίλοι καὶ μῶμοι (cf. 3[14]) ἐντρυφῶντες (cf. τὴν . . . τρυφήν, just above) ἐν ταῖς ἀπάταις αὐτῶν (the addition of αὐτῶν confirming ἀπάταις as against the reading ἀγάπαις), 2[13].

(b) Negative arguments. It must be remembered that, on the hypothesis of the priority of 2 P, Jude had the whole of 2 P before him. St. Jude wrote, according to Spitta's theory, to St. Peter's correspondents to remind them of the apostle's teaching in his letter. It is strange, therefore, that he does not refer explicitly to St. Peter or to his letter, especially as St. Peter had in that letter referred explicitly to St. Paul's letters; strange that, since he must have regarded the whole letter with peculiar reverence, there are large tracts of it which had no influence at all over him; equally strange that he does not in any way catch the strongly marked literary style of his master; and further, that words which would fix themselves in the mind of an attentive student of 2 P are not found in his letter.

These words are such as the following:—ἄθεσμος, 2 3[17]; ἀπεφιώγειν, 1[4] 2[18. 20]; ἀστήρικτος, 2[14] 3[16] (cf. στηρίζειν, 1[12]; -γμός, 3[17]); διό, 1[10. 12] 3[14]; εἰ γάρ, 2[4. 20]; ἐντολή, 2[21] 3[2]; ἐπάγγελμα, 1[4] 3[13] (ἐπαγγέλλεσθαι, 2[19]); ἐπίγνωσις, 1[2. 3. 8] 2[20] (verb 2[21 bis]; γνῶσις, 1[5f.] 3[18]); ἐπιχορηγεῖν, 1[5. 11]; εὐσεβής, 2[9], -σέβεια, 1[3. 6. 7] 3[11]; ἡγεῖσθαι, 1[13] 2[13] 3[9. 15]; ἥπαρ, 2[14]; ὑπάρχειν, 1[8] 2[19] 3[11]; οὐ φιδέσθαι, 2[4f.]

To sum up: If Jude wrote first, then the author of 2 P, with the Ep. of Jude in his mind rather than actually before him, altered the sequence of its imperfectly remembered thoughts and expressions, elaborated and, with the aid of a phraseology peculiarly his own, made variations on phrases which clung to his memory. If, on the other hand, Jude wrote with the express purpose of recalling his master's letter to his readers, we must yet suppose that with rare skill he eliminated harsh and tortuous phrases, brought together scattered ideas, infused reminiscences of Enoch, and wrought the whole into natural compact and harmonious paragraphs. It is not too much to say that to have composed under such conditions a letter so forcible, so clearly and neatly expressed, and so bound together by interdependence of thought and phrase as is St. Jude's Epistle, would have been little short of a miracle of literary skill.

These various lines of argument converge and, so far as demonstration is possible in literary questions, demonstrate the priority of Jude.

5. Date of Composition and Authorship.—A convenient statement of the dates assigned to the Ep. by German critics is given in Holtzmann, Einleitung, p. 329. The older critics of the Tübingen school, regarding the letter as a forgery of the Judaists against the Paulinists, placed it late in the 2nd cent. More recent critics place it about the middle or in the first half of the 2nd cent. Thus Pfleiderer (Urchristenthum, p. 835 ff.) holds that it was written against the Carpocratians of Alexandria, and therefore not before A.D. 150. Jülicher (Einleit. p. 147) gives the limits as 180 and 100, and urges that, since the writer's tone of wonder and anger implies that he is dealing with a new form of error, it must not be placed very late in this period. With this verdict Harnack (Die Chronologie, p. 466) substantially agrees.

The superior limit is fixed by the evidence as to the reception of the Epistle; the inferior by internal evidence. The latter turns on the following points: (1) the way in which 'the faith' is spoken of as a formulated deposit (vv.[3. 20]); (2) the language as to the apostles (v.[17])—the apostolic period is long passed; (3) the use of Apocryphal writings; (4) the existence of Gnosticism, either that of the Carpocratians or, as Harnack thinks, such as Epiphanius under various names describes as infesting Syria and Palestine, and which (apparently at a later time) found expression in the Coptic Gnostic literature edited by Schmidt ('Texte u. Untersuch.' viii. 1, 2).

These points must be briefly examined. (1) The use of πίστις in Gal 1[23] 3[23] 6[10], Ro 10[8], Eph 4[5], Ph 1[27], closely approximates to that of our Ep., while the thought does not go beyond that of Gal 1[6], Ro 6[17]. (2) The language of v.[17] implies that the recipients of the Ep. had been wont to receive oral instruction (ἔλεγον) from the general body of the apostles (τῶν ἀποστ.), and that this period of intercourse was now over. It may well be that some of the apostles had been removed by death, but the requirements of the language are satisfied if we suppose that the apostles were now scattered. (3) The argument from the use of Apocryphal books is serious only when it is vaguely put, as by Spitta (p. 166) among the authorities for (2) gives 'syr^{p} syr^{c*}.' He has mistaken Tischendorf's 'syr^{p} c.*' and has evolved a new Syriac version.

† Cf. Xen. Cyrop. ii. 3. 9 (inaccurately quoted by Wetstein in loc.), μάχῃ, ἣν ἐγὼ ὁρῶ πάντας ἀνθρώπους φύσει ἐπισταμένους, ὥσπερ γε καὶ τἆλλα ζῷα κ.τ.λ.

McGiffert (Hist. of Christianity in the Apost. Age, p. 587), 'He makes use of two late apocryphal works.' As a matter of fact, Enoch is assigned by almost all scholars to a date B.C. (Schürer, HJP II. iii. p. 59 ff.). The Assumption of Moses was probably written within the first 30 years of our era (Charles, § 11; Schürer, ib. p. 78 f., with Ewald and others, places it within the first decade after Herod's death). (4) The Gnostic character of the persons attacked in the Ep. is deduced from three passages.

(a) In v.[4b] the words τὸν μόνον δεσπότην κ. κύριον ἡμῶν Ἰ. Χρ. ἀρνούμενοι are supposed to point to a denial of God as the Creator and Governor of the world, and to a docetic view of Christ's Person. The common article, however, together with ἡμῶν placed after κύριον, proves that Christ alone is meant—a conclusion confirmed by τοῦ θεοῦ ἡμῶν in v.[4b]. The combination δέσποτα κύριε occurs several times in the LXX (e.g. Gn 15[2. 8]; cf. Is 1[24]). The denial is a denial in life (cf. Tit 1[16]) of Christ's sovereignty (1 Co 6[20], Ro 16[18], Ph 3[18]). (b) The ἐνυπνιαζόμενοι of v.[8] is thought to point to visions as the source of Gnostic speculations. The word, however, in itself connotes nothing more than the wilfulness and falseness of their principles of conduct (cf. frag. in Cramer and Bengel, in loc.). (c) In v.[19] it is urged that Jude retorts upon Gnostic teachers their own language of disparagement; they are the ψυχικοί. But this is to force an elaborate meaning into simple words. A phrase in v.[16] (θαυμάζοντες πρόσωπα ὠφελείας χάριν) shows that the 'distinctions' they made were largely social (cf. Ja 2[1ff.], 1 Co 11[18. 22]). The οἱ ἀποδιορίζοντες (which Jude interprets by his antithetical ἐποικοδομοῦντες ἑαυτούς) is equivalent to St. Paul's οἱ τὰς διχοστασίας . . . ποιοῦντες in Ro 16[17] (see above). The best commentary on our passage is 1 Co 3[1-3], Gal 5[19f.]

The arguments therefore for assigning the Ep. to the 2nd cent. break down on examination.

Other critics place the Ep. in the latter half of the 1st cent. To this class belong most English scholars (Plumptre, Lumby, Salmon, Plummer), and among recent German writers Spitta (who places Jude shortly after St. Peter's death), von Soden (who, holding that there is nothing to show that the Ep. was not written by a younger brother of the Lord, gives 80–90 as an approximate date), Kühl (who places it 65–80).

We are brought therefore to the problem of authorship. The Ep. begins with the words Ἰούδας Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ δοῦλος, ἀδελφὸς δὲ Ἰακώβου. Those who place the Ep. in the 2nd cent. either suppose that it is pseudepigraphic (so Pfleiderer, who suggests that some local traditions influenced the writer to take the name of 'Jude the brother of James'), or hold that it was written by someone bearing the name Jude,* and that (to quote Harnack's view) possibly the words Ἰησοῦ Χρ. δοῦλος, and certainly the words ἀδελφὸς δὲ Ἰακώβου, were added at a later time (i.e. 150–180) to enhance its value as a weapon against Gnosticism. If it is objected that such an interpolator would have made Jude to be the apostle, Jülicher suggests that ἀδελφὸς Ἰακώβου is a 'synonym for the title of bishop.' Those who find in the Ep. itself no evidence to show that it could not have been written in the apostolic age need not criticise these speculations. The simplest interpretation of the salutation, which identifies the writer—not with the apostle (cf. Wordsworth), nor with Judas Barsabbas (cf. J. Lightfoot, Plumptre), but—with the brother of the Lord (Mt 13[55], Mk 6[3]), is the best.† It appears that the Lord's kindred had a position of authority accorded them, especially among Palestinian Christians (Eus. HE iii. 11. 20, 33. 6, iv. 22. 4). At a much earlier date St. Paul, writing to a Gentile Church, appeals to the case of 'the brethren of the Lord' as having a decisive bearing on the question of his own rights (1 Co 9[5]). The name of James was influential in distant Churches (Gal 2[12], Ja 1[1]). There is then every reason to believe that the words ἀδελφὸς Ἰακώβου would win a hearing for the writer, whether St. James were living or dead, especially in churches which were in constant communication with the church at Jerusalem. That Palestinian Jews, especially those who, like St. James and St. Jude, had been brought into constant communication with Jews of the Dispersion, would be likely to have a command of Greek has been shown by Mayor, St. James, p. xli f., Zahn, Einleitung in das NT, § 2 (see especially p. 31 f.).

The limits of date are now greatly narrowed. The superior limit is the death of St. Jude. The language of Hegesippus (ap. Eus. HE iii. 20) shows that the interview of Domitian with St. Jude's grandsons can hardly be placed late in that Emperor's reign (μέχρι Τραιανοῦ περιμεῖναι αὐτοὺς τῷ βίῳ), and that St. Jude had been dead some time before it took place (ἔτι δὲ περιῆσαν). Hence we cannot place the letter later than 80. As to the inferior limit, we must allow time (a) for the apostolic college to have been broken up by the separation of its members, and probably by the death of some; (b) for such Pauline phraseology as we find in 1 Co, Ro, Col, Eph to have become known to a Hebrew Christian probably of Jerusalem, partly perhaps through personal intercourse (Ac 15. 18[22] 21[15ff.]), certainly (as the kind of evidence shows) through a study of those Epistles. We cannot then place the Ep. earlier than the composition of Col and Eph. The general tone of the Ep. harmonizes best with a date somewhat late in the apostolic age. We shall not be far wrong if we suppose that it was written within a year or two of the Pastoral Epistles (assuming their genuineness), the Apocalypse (assuming the earlier date), the First Epistle of St. Peter, and the Ep. to the Hebrews.

6. Place of Writing, Destination, Circumstances of Composition.—Many critics, who regard the Ep. as directed against a developed Gnosticism, hold it probable that it was written in Egypt (e.g. Jülicher), or even more definitely in Alexandria (Mayerhoff's conjecture, adopted by, e.g., Schenkel, Holtzmann, Pfleiderer). We have already considered the ground for this conjecture. The 'brethren of the Lord' would naturally have a prominent place among 'the elders' closely connected with St. James at Jerusalem. There is no reason to doubt that the Ep. was composed either there or at least in Palestine.

As to its destination, the salutation is quite general. From this fact some critics have deduced the conclusion that the Ep. is a circular letter (so Ewald), others that the letter-form is purely artificial (so Jülicher, Deissmann, Bibelstudien, p. 244). But although the destination is not named in the salutation, the situation with which the letter deals is too concrete to be universally applicable.

A brief examination of the evidence which the letter supplies as to the condition of its intended readers will supply a clue—probable, not certain—to their identification. (1) The doctrine of God's grace had been taught among them (v.[4]). They were probably, therefore, men among whom St. Paul had worked. (2) They had received oral instruction from the apostles generally (v.[17]). They probably, therefore, lived at no great distance from Jerusalem. (3) They were in danger of being leavened by certain false brethren, against whom the Ep. is designed to warn them. What was the character of these false brethren? (a) There is nothing in the Ep. to lead to the supposition that they were teachers, or that their error was doctrinal; (β) they were grossly immoral in life,

* Grotius, Annotationes (on Jude [1]), gives it as his opinion that 2 P was the work of Symeon the successor of James, and that our Epistle was written by Jude, the last Jewish Bp. of Jerusalem in the reign of Hadrian (Eus. HE iv. 5. 3; Epiph. Hær. ii. 66. 20).

† This conclusion is confirmed by the fact that Jude uses the Assumption of Moses. We know that his brother James the Just had much in common with what was highest in the teaching and practice of the Pharisees. To such men the Assumption, the work probably of a Pharisaic Quietist (Charles, Introd. § 10), would naturally appeal.

vv.[4. 8. 10f.] (Βαλαάμ) [13. 23]; (γ) they were essentially ἀσεβεῖς,—wholly destitute of godly fear,—and in particular they profaned the ἀγάπαι (v.[12]) and the associated Eucharist by their reckless participation (συνευωχ. ἀφόβως; cf. 1 Co 11[27ff.]) and their selfish greed (ἑαυτοὺς ποιμαίνοντες; cf. 1 Co 11[20ff.]); (δ) in word and deed they were insubordinate against divinely constituted authority,* vv.[8. 10. 11] (Κορέ) [16] (γογγυσταί); (ε) they fomented schisms, v.[19]; (ζ) they practically perverted the doctrine of grace, v.[4] (cf. Gal 5[13], Ro 6[1. 15]).

All these points (except the last) have parallels in St. Paul's picture of the Corinthian Church. The same dangers from pagan associations and surroundings are emphasized also in Ac 15[20. 28], 1 Th 4[1-8], Ro 16[17ff.], Ph 3[2. 17ff.], Eph 4[17ff.], Rev 2[14. 20] 3[4], and again in the Didaché (iii. 3, 6). The men, therefore, against whom St. Jude warns his readers appear to have brought the vices and the unchastened selfishness of paganism within the Christian body. The Church, accordingly, to which the letter is addressed was, it would seem, predominantly a Gentile Church. This is confirmed by an incidental phrase, which yet has a conspicuous place in the Ep.—περὶ τῆς κοινῆς ἡμῶν σωτηρίας (v.[3]). Jude writes as a Hebrew Christian to Gentile Christians. The Church which best fulfils these conditions is the Church in the Syrian Antioch (cf. Beyschlag, Neutest. Theol. ii. p. 484), where St. Paul taught early and late in his missionary career, a Church in constant communication with the Church at Jerusalem (e.g. Ac 15[1], Gal 2[12]), visited, as we learn incidentally, by one of the older apostles (Gal 2[11]), and exposed to the same dangers from heathenism as the Church at Corinth. It is of course quite possible that the Ep., with its general salutation, was intended to be circulated among a group of Churches connected with Antioch (cf. Ac 15[23]).

It is not hard to conjecture the circumstances under which the letter, such being its scope and such its probable destination, was written. We may suppose that members of the Church of Antioch came to Jerusalem with news that the leaven of heathen lawlessness was spreading there. St. Jude, one of the original 'elders' of the mother Church, and therefore now (especially if St. James was dead) in a position of peculiar authority, feels the gravity of the occasion, the danger attending a perversion of St. Paul's doctrine of grace, as St. James had realized that involved in the perversion of the true doctrine of faith. The messengers are returning. St. Jude would gladly have sent by them a letter dealing with the blessings of salvation common to Hebrew and Gentile Christians alike. The crisis, however, of which he has heard forces him to narrow his subject to an earnest appeal that, in the present accentuation of the perils which were inseparable from the position of a Gentile Church, they would preserve the purity of the faith in matters of life and conduct.

7. SUMMARY OF THE EPISTLE.—A necessarily brief paraphrase will bring out the connexion of thought.

The salutation of Jude (v.[1f.]). The treacherous entrance into your Church of certain depravers of God's grace in Christ and practical deniers of Jesus as Lord, force me to make my letter a simple call to you to contend for the one faith (v.[3f.]). I need only remind you of the ancient examples of the danger of faithlessness and fleshly sin—Israel (the primary type of the Christian society), the angels who fell, and (like these last in sin and punishment) the Cities of the Plain (vv.[5-7]). Despite such examples, these men, ever yielding to their own wayward fancies, are guilty both of fleshly sin and of rebellion. They deny the principle of authority; they malign those set to rule. Unlike the archangel in his controversy with the devil, they do not fear to malign even the dread realities of authority which are too high for their comprehension, while in the low region of their own animal instincts they corrupt themselves (vv.[8-10]). Scripture (v.[11]) and nature (v.[12f.]) prefigure their manifold sins and their doom. Nay, they are the true subject of the ancient patriarch's prophecy (v.[14f.]). Be not as they are. They are unrestful—discontented, selfish, boastful, intriguing flatterers. Do you be calm, remembering that the apostles, when they visited you, used to tell you that such men would arise (vv.[16-18]). Again, these men, having only natural aims, cause divisions. Do you build up your society on the foundation of the faith, the Spirit helping your prayers, the love of the Father being your protection, the final mercy of Jesus Christ being your hope (vv.[19-21]). Such is your duty to yourselves. What is it to these men? Towards some, still wavering, cherish a hopeful compassion; others you must try to save by desperate effort; towards others you can only feel a compassion paralyzed by fear of contamination (v.[22f.]). To God the Father, who can preserve you from these snares, and finally place you in His own presence untainted and exultant, to Him through the mediation of Jesus Christ be glory for ever (v.[24f.]).

* In v.[8] κυριότητα (cf. Didaché iv. 1) is abstract: it is the principle of authority in general which they rejected. * The second vol. of Zahn's Einleitung appeared after this article was in print. It contains (pp. 42–110) a very full discussion of the questions connected with Jude and 2 P. The chief conclusions at which Zahn arrives are as follows. 2 P was written by St. Peter before, about the autumn of A.D. 63, he visited Rome, i.e. 60–63. It was addressed to Churches mainly Jewish in or near Palestine. Ep. Jude was the work of the Lord's brother, and was addressed to the same Churches as 2 P. The libertines of Jude are false teachers, and exactly correspond to the picture drawn by anticipation in 2 P, to which, indeed, reference is made in Jude[4. 17]. Zahn takes Jude[5] to refer to the deliverance of a people (anarthrous λαόν) by 'Jesus' (best supported reading) from the spiritual Egypt of sin, and to the subsequent judgment on the unbelieving in the destruction of Jerusalem. The date, therefore, of the Ep. must be after 70, and is probably about 75. It may be added that Zahn thinks that Jude used the Hebrew or Aramaic original of Enoch.

The writer of the article would gladly have considered Zahn's position in greater detail. But he does not find any reason to modify his own arguments or conclusions.

F. H. CHASE.

JUDGE, JUDGING.—Among the early Israelites the official organization of the administration of justice was entirely unknown. There were no courts of law, no official judges, no codified laws. Disputes were settled by the natural heads of families and tribes, in accordance with the customs that had grown up in the course of their development. These customs were connected with (a) the family, and (b) religion. In the earliest book of Hebrew history (JE) the pictures of patriarchal times represent the father or head of the family as possessing supreme power over his property (Gn 27), his slaves (Gn 21), and the members of his own family (Gn 22. 38[24]). Disputes between families were settled by an appeal to force, or by an amicable covenant between the heads of the families (Gn 21; cf. the story of Jacob and Esau in Gn 32). But J″ Himself is also represented as acting as supreme judge, and that not only in the case of peoples (Babel, Sodom), but also of individuals (Gn 20[3]). So also refractory members of a family were solemnly dedicated to God's wrath (Gn 49[5ff.]).

The beginnings of the history of Israel as a people were dominated by the strong personality of Moses. During the nomad period, family disputes were still settled by the head of the family; but Moses himself was the supreme judge to whom appeals were brought (Ex 18[13]), and he is represented as himself bringing the matters to J″ for decision (Ex 18[19]), though we are not told how he gained his knowledge of the will of the Deity. Moses had no officials to execute his sentences, but seems in case of division of opinion to have appealed to those who agreed with him to carry out his punishments by force (Ex 32[26]). This work, however, proved too much for one man, and on the advice of his father-in-law he selected a number of the heads of families—already accustomed to judging in matters pertaining to their own families—to judge the intertribal disputes, reserving for himself the right of settling the more difficult questions that arose (Ex 18[20ff.]; cf. the parallel account in Nu 11[16. 24ff.]).

It was in accordance with this appointment that the later 'Book of the Covenant' was represented as given by Moses to these elders as a body of customs for their guidance (Ex 21[1] 24). The active participation of the Deity in judging is still prominent all through this period. To seek a judgment was to 'seek Jahweh' (Ex 33[7ff.]). It was J″ Himself who punished Miriam (Nu 12[10]), Dathan, and Abiram (Nu 16), and the Israelites themselves (Nu 21). Achan was detected by J″ (whose will on this occasion was ascertained by the drawing of lots), and the punishment was carried out by the people (Jos 7).

The settlement in Canaan, and consequent change from nomad to settled life, led to the emphasizing of local rather than family and tribal authority. The ancient customs were continued, but the 'elders of the city' (זִקְנֵי הָעִיר) took the place of the elders of the tribe (Jg 8[16] 11[7], and see below for Deut.; cf. Nowack, Arch. i. 322, and see ELDER IN OT), though the claims of the latter were not overlooked even in the 7th cent. (cf. Dt 16[18]). During this period the term 'judges' was applied to the local heroes, who delivered and ruled the tribes of Israel. (For the use and meaning of שָׁפַט in the Book of Judges, see the following two articles).

The institution of a monarchy also modified the previous customs, inasmuch as the king and his officials were in a better position than most to enforce their decisions by means of the power they possessed. The administration of justice in the country naturally remained in the hands of the city elders and men who had gained a reputation for wisdom; and the settlement of disputes was by arbitration rather than by royal justice; but where a royal officer was stationed, there he would often be appealed to. The king was the most powerful (at any rate in the best days of the monarchy), and therefore the supreme judge. The person of the king was usually accessible to the poorest of his subjects. The men of Israel brought their troubles regularly to David (2 S 15[2ff.]). The power of the king enabled him when present to override or overawe the local courts (1 K 21, 1 S 8[20], 2 S 15[2] etc.). It was during this period (in the 9th or 8th cent.) that a short book of 'judgments' מִשְׁפָּטִים (Ex 21–23[9]; cf. EXODUS in vol. i. p. 810) was edited to guide the decisions of men who were called upon to decide certain cases. How far it obtained any authority we cannot tell, but it is very short and incomplete. Judges are mentioned only once in this code, viz. in 21[22], but the word פְּלִלִים used here is a rare word; the sentence in which it occurs is difficult to construe as it stands, and Budde has suggested a different reading, which contains no mention of judges (ZATW xi. 106 ff.). In Ex 21[6] 22[8. 9] RVm reads 'judges' as a translation of הָאֱלֹהִים, but the word seems to be used here as usual with the meaning 'God' given in the RV text.*

Towards the end of the 7th cent. (in 621) another code of laws—the Deuteronomic—was proclaimed, but the unfortunate death of Josiah seems to have rendered it ineffective from 608 until after the Exile. (See DEUTERONOMY). In judicial matters it confirmed for the most part the already existing customs. Judges and officers (שֹׁפְטִים וְשֹׁטְרִים) are to be appointed in all the cities, according to the tribes (Dt 16[18]).† The ordinary judges are as before the 'elders of the city' (Dt 19[12] 21[18] 22[15ff.] etc.). In difficult matters, where men had formerly had recourse to the more immediate judgment of the Deity, the priests the Levites are to be associated with the usual judges (Dt 17[8ff.] 19[17] etc.), and the law as a whole is represented as having been delivered by Moses to the priests the sons of Levi, and unto all the elders of Israel (Dt 31[9]). The curse of J″ still remains the heaviest of punishments (Dt 28[15ff.]). The greatest fault in the administration of justice during this period was due to bribery, a sin which specially excited the indignation of the preacher of moral righteousness (Am 5[12]; cf. Mic 7[3], Zeph 3[3]). In Am 2[3] and Mic 5[1] the word 'judge' שֹׁפֵט seems to be used of the king (see Driver on the former passage in the 'Cambridge Bible for Schools'), but in Micah the LXX have a different reading, and in Amos Nowack refers the word to the officials of the Moabites (Die kleinen Propheten, p. 126).

* Dillmann thinks that judges who gave judgment in a sanctuary were called אֱלֹהִים in the older Hebrew; cf. his note on this passage in the Kurzgefasstes exegetisches Handbuch zum AT, but Marti refers the word to the household gods (Geschichte der israelitischen Religion, pp. 29, 48).

† Of the שֹׁטְרִים little is known. They first appear as Israelitish superintendents of forced labour in Egypt (Ex 5, JE), then as 'officers' associated with the elders in the wilderness (Nu 11[16], JE). After this they are not mentioned until Deuteronomy. They seem to have been police officials. See note in Driver's commentary on Dt 1[15].

The destruction of the monarchies and the exile of both the kingdoms limited the judicial power of the people. In their captivity they were entirely subject to their conquerors. The study of their own law increased, indeed may be said now to have seriously begun, but what little they could carry into practice was only by an act of grace on the part of their masters. The return from exile led to the constitution not of a political power, but of a religious community. The Deuteronomic code was received by it as binding (Neh 8–10), and its provisions were observed as far as was consistent with the laws of the Persians, and afterwards of the Greeks and Romans. Under the Persians the Jews were allowed to follow their own laws in purely internal matters (the elders of the city are mentioned in Ezr 7^{25} 10^{14}), but quarrels with neighbouring powers were submitted to the Persian court (Ezr 4 and 5). In Judæa the Priestly code was soon added to the Deuteronomic, but as this is chiefly religious it scarcely affected the ordinary administration of justice. It was probably during the time of the Greek domination that further organization led to the establishment in Jerusalem of the Sanhedrin as the supreme court of the Jewish community (see SANHEDRIN). In the small towns and villages justice was administered by a council of seven (Jos. Ant. IV. viii. 14; cf. Schürer, Zeitalter Christi, ii. 132 ff., 3rd ed. ii. 176 ff. [HJP II. i. 163 ff.]), and in larger places by one of twenty-three members (Mishna, Sanh. i. 4). It is to one of these councils that Christ refers in Mt 5^{22}, and to their members in v.^{25}. For further details as to the courts in the time of Christ, see the articles ROMAN LAW and SANHEDRIN.

viii. Parallel with the Maccabæan Period.

i. The period extends from the death of Joshua to the anointing of Saul as king over Israel.

ii. Our main authorities are the Book of Judges (specially ch. 5, 'the Song of Deborah') and 1 S 1–10. In addition to these the blessing of Jacob (Gn 49) was formerly reckoned to belong to this period; but the more modern view is that, while vv.$^{5\text{-}7.\ 14f.\ 16f.}$ point to the period of the Judges, other verses transplant us to a later time (Kuenen, Hex. p. 240, Eng. tr.; Dillmann, Gen. vol. ii. p. 447, Eng. tr.). The Book of Ruth has reference to this period, but its composition is referred to post-exilic times by recent critics.

iii. CHRONOLOGY.—The whole period is devoid of certain dates; the most that can be said is that its close may be assigned with probability to within fifty years of B.C. 1000. The length of the period is also very doubtful. If we follow what seems to be the Chronology of the Book of Judges itself, we have to conclude that the Judges (exclusive of Eli and Samuel) occupied a period of more than 410 years. No critic, however, has ever accepted this high total, and there are three good reasons why it should be rejected. (1) It contradicts 1 K 6^1 (480 years from the Exodus to the building of the temple). (2) It has always appeared probable that some of the Judges were contemporaries and not successors or predecessors of the rest. (3) It is improbable that Israel could have existed in the disorganized condition which was hers under the Judges for so long a period as 400 years without being absorbed and lost in the surrounding Canaanites. Moreover, several of the details of which the number 410 is made up do not inspire confidence; the number 40 (representing a generation) or its multiples occurs frequently, and the writer of the book seems to be giving merely a rough reckoning by generations. In the present article it is assumed that the period of the Judges was relatively short, perhaps about 200 years. See CHRONOLOGY OF OLD TEST. vol. i. p. 399.

iv. POLITICAL GEOGRAPHY.—A careful study of Jg, particularly of chs. 1 and 4, shows that the Israelites on entering Palestine did not conquer it, but only overran the inland part of it. A broad strip of land along the coast remained in the hands of the Philistines (cf. Moore on Jg $1^{18.\ 19}$) and of the Zidonians (Jg 1^{31}). The fortresses which girdled the plain of Esdraelon (Jg 1^{27}), and consequently the plain itself, remained unconquered. Moreover, scattered over the land there were cities, e.g. Jerusalem (Jg 1^{21}), Gezer (1^{29}), and probably Shechem (Jg $9^{1\text{-}4}$; Kittel, ii. 74), in which apparently the Israelites had a footing, but not the supremacy. No doubt some cities came at an early date into the hands of Israel or of their allies (Hebron, Jg 1^{10}; Bethlehem, Jg $12^{8\text{-}10}$; Bethel, Jg 1^{22}), but it may be said generally that the Canaanites still kept their fortified cities while the Israelites occupied the villages. It was indeed only to be expected that Israel on ceasing to be a nomadic people, would pass through a stage of free village life before they could accustom themselves to the restricted life of cities. These villages were fixed encampments, collections of tents, rather than houses ordered in streets. 'To your tents, O Israel,' was the earlier form of the signal for dispersion, as 'every man to his own city' (1 K 22^{36}) was the later. The heaviest blow which could fall on Israel at this period is described in the Song of Deborah in the words, 'The villages (or 'villagers') ceased in Israel' (Jg 5^7 AV and RVm). The only refuge of the people was in dens and caves and natural strongholds (Jg 6^2 1 S. 13^6). They had destroyed such fortresses as they had won.

Had the Canaanites possessed any real cohesion among themselves, the Israelites must have been chased out of the country as the Midianites were chased out by Gideon; but the Canaanites were hopelessly divided. They were, in fact, a mixed population, whether we reckon them as exactly seven nations or not.

v. HISTORY.—Owing to the doubtfulness of the chronology, a formal division of the epoch of the Judges into periods is impossible. Three great crises, however, stand out in the history—(1) the union of the tribes against Sisera and the Canaanites (Jg 4. 5); (2) the assertion of Israel's individuality (or nationality) against the Midianites; (3) the appearance of the Philistines.

(1) All writers recognize the importance of the Israelite rising under Deborah and Barak. Israel had been checked in its conquests by the fortresses which girdled the plain of Esdraelon and by the chariots of iron which controlled it. Once checked they sank into helplessness, and the Canaanites of the plain turned upon their former assailants. Their success was great. The Israelites of the north and of the centre would have become the helots of the Canaanites, if Deborah had not prophesied and if Barak had not fought. Nor did the battle of the Kishon give Israel freedom only; it also gave life to the idea of national unity. Six tribes, viz. Ephraim, Benjamin, Manasseh (Machir), Zebulun, Issachar, and Naph-tali, united to fight the battle of the God of Israel; and four others, Reuben, Gad (Gilead), Dan, and Asher, are reminded in the Song of Deborah of their failure to realize the duties of their kinship with the rest. The sole literature of this period* (so far as we know) is this song of a people struggling to assert its freedom and its nationality.

(2) Gideon represents a crisis hardly less acute than that at which Deborah appeared. Israel was passing from nomadic to settled life; but if the fruits of agriculture were snatched from them by the Midianites, the temptation to return to a wandering (and perhaps marauding) life, would be very great. At another time, under circumstances of stress, Jephthah and David did actually return to the condition of 'children of the East.' From any such retrograde step Israel, as a whole, was saved by Gideon, the farmer called from the threshing-flail to save his people.

The deliverance wrought by Gideon brought up the question of appointing a permanent head, to judge Israel and fight their battles (cf. 1 S 8^{20}). The Midianites invaded the land every year (Jg $6^{1.3}$), so that the crisis demanded some permanent organization to meet the standing danger. Gideon, on the invitation of the people, established a rule which was a theocracy according to his own profession, but it was administered by himself as earthly vicegerent. He established at his home at Ophrah, in addition to the rest of his state, a golden ephod (see EPHOD) of the God whose government he (and his sons after him) professed to administer (Jg $8^{22-27.30}$ 9^{2}).

(3) The appearance of the Philistines was a matter of grave importance. If, as seems probable (but see art. JUDGES [BOOK OF], p. 818[b]), this event was contemporaneous with the beginning of Ammonite assaults on Israel, this importance is greatly enhanced. Attacked on the east by Ammon, reduced in part to subjection on the west by the Philistines, the Israelites fell into a disorganized and helpless state, from which nothing, perhaps, but the establishment of the kingdom could rescue them.

But the period of the Judges was remarkable, not only for the three crises just mentioned, but also for a slow and silent revolution which went on during the whole of its course.

It was at this time that Israel assimilated to itself a large Canaanite population. Wellhausen (Isr. u. Jüd. Ges.[2] 46 ff.) points out that this fusion would begin in the country, since the Canaanite peasant would find more in common with the Israelite settler than with his own fellow-countrymen in the cities. This incorporation of the original population into Israel explains the striking growth of the population which took place under the Judges, which, indeed, made Jacob so much stronger than the kindred tribes, Moab, Ammon, and Edom, and rendered the empire of David and Solomon a possibility.

vi. TRUSTWORTHINESS OF THE HISTORY OF THE JUDGES.—This history is so natural a preface to the period of the Kings, that no charge of improbability can be fairly laid against it as a whole. Many details, however, have been referred with more or less probability to myth or misunderstanding, and not to history.

Cushan-rishathaim (Jg 3^{8}) of Mesopotamia (Aram-naharaim) is a shadowy and uncertain figure. The Shamgar of Jg 3^{31} is supposed to be irreconcilable with the Shamgar of Jg 5^{6}; 'he was no deliverer of Israel,' writes Kittel (ii. 66 note), 'as the context [of Jg 5^{6}] shows.' The minor judges Tola and Jair (Jg $10^{1.3}$), and Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon (Jg 12^{8-15}) are generally said to be merely personifications of leading families. Our present account of Jephthah is open to the objection that Jephthah's 'message to Ammon' (Jg 11^{12-27}) seems to be really a document having reference rather to Moab; cf. the mention of Chemosh (v.[24]) and of Balak (v.[25]). On the other hand, Jephthah's vow and its fulfilment are defended as natural in Jephthah's age (and therefore as probably historical) by Kittel (ii. 81). The story of Samson, finally, has not been proved a sun-myth, but many will agree with Kittel's dictum (ib.): 'Samson wavers between myth, saga, and history, belonging altogether to no one of them, but in part to each.' See, further, JUDGES (BOOK OF), p. 819.

vii. RELIGION.—In speaking of the religion of this period it is necessary to regard only the statements of the ancient part of the book, avoiding the so-called 'margin.' Inquiry was made of God (Jg 1^{1}), probably by means of the ephod (see EPHOD); war was made in the name of J″ (Jg 3^{28} 4^{6}), who was regarded as the national God whose dwelling was on the Arabian peninsula (Jg $5^{4.5}$; cf. Moore); the angel of J″ presented himself in human form in order to make his revelations (Jg 6^{11} $13^{3.6.10}$); prophecy was rare (Jg 4^{4}, 1 S 3^{1}); the ark was regarded as equivalent to the presence of J″ Himself (1 S 4^{3}).

Canaanite influence on religion was strong during this period, for the process of fusion of Canaanite and Israelite was going on. Israel, new to the land, was introduced to the old sanctuaries by the old inhabitants, and thus learned to worship the local Baal, the native god of corn and wine, with the corrupt and corrupting forms of that lascivious shedder of blood, the Canaanite. Of Israel's morals during this period little good can be said. A time of anarchy always impairs the vitality of virtue; and in Israel when 'every man did that which was right in his own eyes' (Jg 17^{6}), very strange things were done (Jephthah, Samson, Danites, Gibeah). There was no lack of courage in this period, and hospitality was evidently regarded by the mass of the people as inviolable. The sacredness of an oath is strangely illustrated by Jg 11^{35} and 21^{7}.

Taken as a whole the period may be characterized, in the words of Amos (8^{11}), as days in which there was 'a famine in the land; not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the words of the Lord.' The redactor of Jg is indeed continually drawing lessons from the experiences of his people under the Judges, but it seems that at the time itself the events were left for the most part to deliver their own message uninterpreted by any prophet. We may compare the period with the years of 'silence' which preceded the coming of our Lord.

viii. PARALLEL WITH THE MACCABÆAN PERIOD.—There are several points of resemblance between the Maccabæan period and that of the Judges. (1) The form of government (if it could be called a 'form') was the same at both periods. The Maccabees were Judges* (שֹׁפְטִים shōphĕṭīm) like Gideon, Jephthah, and the rest, i.e. not administrators, but champions both against the enemy and against the unfaithful of their own people (cf. 1 Mac $2^{65.66}$ $9^{29-31.73}$). If some of the Maccabees were also priests (Jonathan, 1 Mac 10^{20}; Simon, 1 Mac 14^{47}), so were the ancient judges, Eli and Samuel. (2) Both periods were periods of almost continual struggle (if the chronology of the Judges has been rightly understood above), and the very life of Israel as a distinct people was threatened. (3) There was the same want of unity among the people at both periods (cf. 1 Mac 1^{52} 6^{21} 7^{5}). (4) There was the same absence of 'open vision' (1 S 3^{1}; cf. 1 Mac 4^{46} 14^{41}). (5) Even the language used of the Maccabæan period recalls the time of the Judges (cf. 1 Mac 9^{73} ἤρξατο κρίνειν; 2^{42} πᾶς ὁ ἐκουσιαζόμενος; 14^{4} ἡσύχασεν ἡ γῆ πᾶσας τὰς ἡμέρας Σίμωνος).

* If the blessing of Jacob (Gn 49) in its present form also belongs to the period of the Judges, we have a second document in which is realized the unity of the tribes.

* The Carthaginian sufetes resembled the shōphĕṭīm chiefly in name.

1. THE NAME OF THE BOOK. — The seventh component of the Hebrew Old Testament is named Book of Judges (סֵפֶר שׁוֹפְטִים) in the oldest sources with which we are acquainted (cf. the Talmudic Tract Baba bathra 14ᵇ, edited separately by Marx-Dalman in 'Traditio rabbinorum veterrima de librorum veteris testamenti ordine atque origine,' 1884, p. 14). The same expression סֵפֶר שׁוֹפְטִים is found in the Dikdûkê ha-tê'amîm of Aharon ben-Asher (10th cent.), ed. Baer and Strack, p. 58. The self-evident term 'Book' is also frequently dropped, and thus the simple שׁוֹפְטִים employed (so the usual reading in above-cited passage from the Talmud). If one compares, for instance, הַשּׁוֹפְטִים (Ru 1^{1}) and οἱ κριταί (Sir 46^{11}), it is remarkable that the article is dropped before שׁוֹפְטִים when the latter is used as the title of the Book. But in the course of transition of a nomen appellativum to the force of a nomen proprium, the article was frequently omitted (for analogies see König's Syntax, § 295, h–k). The Heb. title of the Book was either simply transcribed (cf. e.g. ܫܦܛܝܡ in Ephraem Syrus [acc. to Brockelmann, Lex. Syr. 383ᵇ] and Σωφετίμ in Origen [acc. to Euseb. HE vi. 25]), or it might be translated (cf. e.g. dayyânê in the Peshiṭta, or κριταί, e.g. in Melito of Sardis [acc. to Euseb. HE iv. 26]), or (liber) iudicum, e.g. in Hieronymus, Prologus galeatus (=præfatio regnorum).

2. THE CONDITION OF THE TEXT.—The history of the Text of a literary product needs above all to be considered, in order that a basis may thus be laid for all further investigation. In the case of the Book of Judges this rule is all the more to be observed because of the very complicated history of its text.

(a) The Heb. text, as one finds it, notably in the editio Baeriana libri Josuæ et iudicum (1891), in the excellent Biblia hebraica of Ch. D. Ginsburg (1894), and in the well-known collections of various readings by Kennicott and de Rossi, is, of course, in substantial agreement with the Targum, the Peshiṭta, and the Vulgate.*

* Felix Perles (Analekten zur Textkritik des AT, 1895) suggests the following emendations on the text of Judges: 3^{23} (p. 85) תַּמְסְכָּרוֹנָה 'privy,' cf. 'posticum' of Vulg.; 3^{28b} (p. 33) וַיֵּרֶד פִּי; 5^{8} (p. 91) M. Lambert's conjectural לַחֲמֵשׁ שְׁעָרִים 'to five doors' (but see König's Syntax, § 330 m); 11^{37} (p. 51) וְהָרַדְתִּי, but it is more natural to suppose that in וְיָרַדְתִּי (cf. Hos 12^{1}, Jer 23^{31}) the ו was not distinctly written, and that י has thus arisen; 12^{6} (p. 33) from יכ which was meant for כָּל may have arisen יכין; 13^{12} (p. 35) עַת (cf. König's Syntax, § 385 k); 20^{33b} (p. 34) ממער is supposed to have been written for ממערב.

(b) But the Greek version of the Book of Judges is an extraordinarily manifold one. This is already shown by the number and the nature of the variants which the Alexandrian (A) and the Vatican (B) MSS of the LXX present in this book. For instance, in 1^{1b} A reads τὸν χαναναῖον (הַכְּנַעֲנִי) and πολεμήσεσαι (sic) ἐν αὐτῷ (בּוֹ), but B has τοὺς χαναναίους and πρὸς αὐτούς. Further, in 1^{3} A reads καὶ πολεμήσω (to represent the plur. וְנִלָּחֲמָה) ἐν τῷ χαναναίῳ (הַכְּנַעֲנִי), but B has καὶ παραταξώμεθα πρὸς τοὺς χαναναίους. In 1^{4b} the respective readings confront one another, ἐπάταξε (A; cf. the plur. וַיַּכּוּ of MT[1]) and ἔκοψαν (B). In 1^{16} חֹתֵן of the MT is reproduced in A by πενθερός, but in B by γαμβρός, which last is the reading also of Jos. Ant. v. ii. 3. But the differences in the Greek translation of the Book of Judges are above all brought to view by de Lagarde, who, in his Septuaginta-Studien (Bd. i. 1892, p. 1 ff.) places side by side all the most important variants occurring in the first five chapters of Jg. His judgment is completely substantiated by the thorough investigations of G. Moore in his Commentary on the Book of Judges, 1895, pp. xliv–xlvi. Budde (Kurzer Handcomm. z. Richterbuch, 1897, p. xvi) has simply reproduced Moore's results. For instance, in 1^{7} the MT as well as AB have 'seventy,' but L(ucian) ἑβδομήκοντα δύο (so Jos. Ant. v. ii. 2, δυοῖν καὶ ἑβδομήκοντα).* But, e.g., in 8^{10} both AB and L offer the same reading, 15,000, as the MT, and only Josephus (Ant. v. vi. 5) has μύριοι καὶ ὀκτακισχίλιοι. Hence, in spite of the scepticism of A. Mez (die Bibel des Josephus, 1895, p. 57) it is quite possible that יה was read as יח (טו=15 is found for the first time in Origen; cf. König, Einleit. p. 90, note 1). Regarding the two main branches of the Greek version of Jg, Moore has said very judiciously, 'It would probably be going too far to affirm that they are independent; the author of the younger of them may have known and used the older' (Judges, p. xliv).

(c) Further, A. Mez (die Bibel des Josephus, 1895, pp. 11–18, 56–61, 80 f.) has shown, in regard to Jg, that 'the text of Josephus belongs to the most valuable relics of the history of the text of the OT.' For in the case of Jg, Josephus follows the Lucianic text (L) not in the same high degree of dependence as in the Books of Samuel (with four exceptions). In Jg the bond connecting the text of Josephus and that of Lucian is weaker and in many passages even broken. For instance, in 1^{16} the MT has קֵינִי חֹתֵן מֹשֶׁה, L has Ἰωβὰβ τοῦ Κειναίου, but Jos. (Ant. v. ii. 3) Ἰέθρου τοῦ Μαδιανίτου ἀπόγονοι, Μωυσέως γὰρ ἦν γαμβρός (see above for the reading of B). Again, e.g., the expression וַיִּלְכֹּד in 1^{18} is reproduced not only in AL, but also in B by ἐκληρονόμησεν (Itala, hereditavit), but Jos. v. ii. 4 offers rightly εἷλον. Finally, e.g., the king כּוּשַׁן רִשְׁעָתַיִם (Jg 3^{8}) is called in L Χουσαρεσαμώθ, in AB (by an easily intelligible omission of the n, cf. König, Lehrgebäude, ii. 466) Χουσαρσαθάιμ, and in Jos. v. iii. 2 Χουσαρσάθου, etc. What right Mez has to say in reference to this, 'L ist corrigirt,' we cannot see. Still this investigation has confirmed the present writer's view (Einleit. p. 114 ff.) that the traditional Massoretic text is the relatively best source from which to ascertain the words of the Old Testament. This judgment is also entirely substantiated by the investigation into the text of Samuel which Löhr has carried out in the 'Kurzgef. Exeg. Hdbch.' on Samuel, 1898, pp. lxix ff.

3. THE CONTENTS AND ARRANGEMENT OF THE BOOK.—(a) The book begins with (a) the enumera-

* Cf. the same variation of 70 and 72 in the number of the nations (1 Ch $1^{5\text{-}23}$: 14+30+26=70; but in the Clement. Recogn. ii. 42 we find 72); also in the number of the disciples, Lk 10^{1}, where Codd. BD, etc., have ἑβδομήκοντα δύο. Moreover, the number of the Greek translators of the OT came to be reduced from 72 to 70.

tion of the districts in Palestine which at the death of Joshua had not yet been conquered, and with the description of the operations undertaken by several of the tribes of Israel, in part unsuccessfully, for the complete subjection of their territory (1^{1-36}).—(β) This partial failure is traced to the Divine requital of Israel's religious disobedience, and on the same account it was announced that the Canaanites and other enemies of Israel would continue for a time to maintain their independence, with a view to the chastisement and the probation of Israel. The messenger of J″, mentioned in 2^{1}, was wrongly identified with Phinehas (Jos 24^{33}) in Jalḳuṭ Shim'ôni, vol. ii. ch. 40: מלאך ה' והלא פנחס היה.—(γ) Once more it is told how the Israelites, soon after the death of Joshua, were guilty of religious disloyalty. The author's object was to explain why the Israelites suffered repeated defeats in conflicts also with the surrounding nations (2^{6}–3^{4}, see below 4 b).

(b) The history of the individual judges is related. They belonged for the most part to the tribe which suffered most from the particular oppression at the time (3^{5}–16^{31}).—(α) Othni'el of the tribe of Judah, who first came upon the scene immediately after the death of Joshua (3^{7-11}).*—(β) Ehud, the Benjamite (3^{12-30}), broke the yoke of the neighbouring Moabites by the assassination of their king, Eglon. According to Nazir 23^{b} Ruth was a granddaughter of Eglon: רות בת בנו של עגלון מלך מואב. Seder Olam rabba, ch. 12 (ed. Meyer, p. 34), combines Jg 2^{15} with Ru 2^{13b}, cf. 1 Ch 2^{11}, Ru $4^{20f.}$.—(γ) Shamgar (3^{31}) smote the Philistines. —(δ) In conjunction with Deborah, of the tribe of Ephraim, the hero Barak, of the northern tribe of Naphtali, defeated the Canaanites, who had again assembled a strong force in the north of Canaan (4^{1}–5^{31}). Sisera, the commander of the army of the enemy, was slain by the woman Jael. Many of the Talmudists took offence at the words 'between (AV at) her feet (בֵּין רַגְלֶיהָ) he bowed' (Jebamoth 103^{ab}, Nazir 23^{b}), but other Talmudists, appealing to Gn 31^{29ab}, rightly found in the expression 'between her feet' nothing to the discredit of Jael.—(ϵ) Gideon, of the town of 'Ophrah in Ephraim' (?), expelled the Midianites and reigned for long in peace (6^{1}–8^{35}; cf. Γεδεών, ὃς ἑρμηνεύεται πειρατήριον. Ὅμοσε γὰρ, κ.τ.λ., 8^{9},—Philo i. 424, ed. Mangey). But his son Abimelech, who seized the reins of power in Shechem, was speedily overcome (9^{1-57}).—(ζ) Tola, a man of Issachar, defended Israel ($10^{1f.}$). —(η) After him Jair, a Gileadite, judged Israel (10^{3-5}).—(θ) Jephthah, the Gileadite, smote the children of Ammon (11^{1}–12^{7}).—(ι) Ibzan, of Bethlehem, judged Israel (12^{8-10}); cf. Baba bathra 91^{a}: אבצן זה בעז 'Ibzan is Boaz' (Ru 2^{1}).—(κ) Elon, a Zebulunite ($12^{11f.}$), and (λ) 'Abdon, of Pirathon in Ephraim, judged Israel (12^{13-15}). At last (μ) Samson 'began to deliver Israel out of the hand of the Philistines' (13^{5b}), and judged Israel twenty years (13^{1}–16^{31}).† It is only up to this point that Jg gives a continuous series of narratives. This was already noted in the Dikdûkê of Aharon ben-Asher, for in § 70 it is said, 'The Book of Judges (extends) from Othniel, the son of Kenaz, to the death of Samson, the son of Manoah, the Danite' (מעתניאל בן קנז עד שֶׁמֶת שמשון בן מנוח הדני).

(c) The last five chapters of Jg do not continue the preceding history, but add two episodes to it. (α) The first episode is as follows: a part of the tribe of Dan wandered from south-western Canaan to the sources of the Jordan. There they conquered the town of Laish, and called it, after the name of their tribe, Dan. In this town they established as priest a Levite from Mt. Ephraim, whom they had persuaded to accompany them (17^{1}–18^{31}). (β) The second episode tells how the inhabitants of Gibeah which belonged to Benjamin (20^{4}) abused to death the concubine of a Levite (19^{25}), and how all the other tribes of Israel punished the tribe of Benjamin for refusing to deliver up the miscreants of Gibeah (19^{1}–21^{25}).

The Book of Judges does not state precisely at what parts of the period of the judges these two episodes happened. The first episode is certainly assigned to a time when there had not fallen to the tribe of the Danites anything as a possession (18^{1b}), i.e. they had been unable to make themselves real masters of the territory assigned to them on the S.W. coast of Canaan (Jos 19^{40-48}, Ezk 48^{1b})—even Budde (on Jg 18^{1b}) regards this as not mere theory. But it is uncertain how long after Joshua's death the oppressions (1^{34} 10^{11b} 14^{4}) continued which prevented the tribe of the Danites from completely conquering their territory. In any case, neither in $1^{34f.}$ nor elsewhere is it implied that 'the southern Dan never dwelt by the sea, not to speak of itself having possessed ships' (Budde on Jg 5^{17}), and this southern Dan was nearer to the ships than the northern. Nevertheless the date of the history narrated in chs. 17 f. can be limited. For according to 18^{30} it was a grandson of Moses that was priest in the city of Dan, מְנַשֶּׁה being indicated as the original reading through the Nún suspensum of מְנַשֶּׁה (cf. the Talmudic statements and the discussion with L. Blau in König's Einleitung, pp. 34, 84^{1}). It is thus intelligible how the oldest author who outside the Bk. of Jg has described the period of the judges,* namely Josephus, has inserted the two episodes immediately after the narratives of the first chapter of Jg. He further transposes the order of the two narratives, introducing (Ant. v. ii. 8–12) the contents of chs. 19–21 as an illustration of a στάσις δεινή, and with the words ὅμοια δὲ τούτοις παθεῖν καὶ τὴν Δανίτιν συνέβη φυλήν, he appends (Ant. v. iii. 1) the history contained in chs. 17 f. Seder olam rabba (ch. 12) says, בימי כושן רשעתים היה פסלו של מיכה וגו' ובימיו היתה פילגש בגבעה, i.e. 'in the days of Cushan-rishathaim was the graven image of Micah, etc. (cf. 18^{30}), and in his days was a concubine in Gibeah.' Moore (on chs. 17 f.) also says rightly that the migration may be assigned to a time not very long after the Israelite invasion of Canaan. Are we now perhaps to suppose that the two episodes stood originally after the first chapter? This is not likely. For in that case we should not expect to read, 'in those days there was no king in Israel, but every man did that which was right in his own eyes' (17^{6} 18^{1} 19^{1} 21^{25}). At all events it is not without a special aim that the two narratives are placed at the end of Jg. They are intended to show the negative results which during the period of the judges showed themselves in the sphere of religion and morals.

Referring again to the arrangement of the Bk. of Jg, it is interesting to note the ancient division of the Massoretic sections (Baer, Josua et Jud. p. 125). These are fourteen, and they begin with the following verses of the book: 1^{1} 2^{7} (ויעבדו) 3^{31}

* Sanhedrin 105^{a} כושן רשעתים הוא לבן הארמי 'Cushan-rishathaim is Laban the Aramæan,' i.e. he was of the descendants of Laban.

† In 'Philonis sine præparatione in Sampson oratio' (Philonis Opera, ed. Lips. 1830, vol. vii. pp. 351-376) it is said, 'Sampson vires sumpsit ad monstranda opera magna' (§ 12), but also 'quum, a gurgite luxuriæ raptus, illuviem passus fuerit inque abyssum immersus cupidinis, non amplius compos erat sursum aspiciendi, sed totus voluptati deditus, ut verum diceret, tanquam a iudice, a muliere coactus fuit' (§ 1).

* 'The days of the judges' are mentioned in Ru 1^{1}, but passed over in silence between 1 Ch 9^{44} and 10^{1}, and ben-Sirach's only allusion to them is in the two verses Sir $46^{11f.}$. Cf. the words of Justin (Hist. xxxvi. ii. 7): 'Post Mosen etiam filius eius Aruas, sacerdos sacris Ægyptiis, mox rex creatur, semperque exinde hic mos apud Judæos fuit, ut eosdem reges et sacerdotes haberent, quorum institia religione permixta incredibile quam tum coaluere.'

(ואחריו) 6^1 7^1 8^4 (ויבא גדעון וגו׳) 9^7 (ויגידו וגו׳) 10^1 (ויקם וגו׳) 11^{32} (וילכו וגו׳) 14^1 (וירד שמשון וגו׳) 16^4 (ויהי וגו׳) 18^7 (ויעבר יפתח וגו׳) 19^{20} (ויאמר האיש), and with 20^{27} (וישאלו וגו׳). It will be observed that several of these beginnings (e.g. 14^1 instead of 13^1) are not without much interest.

4. The Inner Harmony, or the Unity of the Book.—(a) In 1^8 it is recorded that the members of the tribe of Judah took Jerusalem; but according to 1^{21} this city lay in the sphere of the Benjamites, and by no means can we agree that 'doubtless the author wrote Judah' (Moore, ad loc.). For, since at a later period the Judahite David conquered the city of the Jebusites (2 S $5^{6ff.}$), and since, after the so-called disruption of the kingdom, Jerusalem was the capital of the kingdom of Judah, it was natural to reckon Jerusalem to the territory of the Judahites. Hence there must have been a reliable tradition that Jerus. originally belonged to the sphere of the Benjamites, else it would not have been in Jg 1^{21} assigned to Benjamin (this also against Budde, ad loc.). Further, it is quite an unwarranted assertion that in 1^{34} on account of its difference of form 'the continuation of the Dan history is to be found, whose beginning was still read by Josephus' (Mez, l.c. p. 11). That is to say, Josephus makes the remark, Χαναναῖοι . . . τῆς Ἰούδα φυλῆς, τὴν Ἀσκάλωνα καὶ Ἀκκάρωνα παρεσπάσαντο ἄλλας τε πολλὰς τῶν ἐν τῷ πεδίῳ καὶ Δανίτας εἰς τὸ ὄρος ἠνάγκασαν συμφυγεῖν (Ant. v. iii. 1). But Mez has not noticed that the ἅρματα and the πεδίον, κ.τ.λ., previously mentioned by Josephus, point to 1^{19b} as the source of his words quoted above.

(b) The two sections 1^1–2^5 and $2^{6ff.}$ were not written by one author as parts of one and the same work. For 1^1 begins by mentioning the death of Joshua, but 2^6 mentions something that happened while he was still alive, וַיְשַׁלַּח (καὶ ἐξαπέστειλεν; Hieron. 'dimisit ergo') referring in its present context to the assembly of the people in 2^4. Neither can we say with P. Cassel, ad loc., that the author meant to 'quote' the words of Jos 24^{28}, nor is the imperf. consec. meant as a plusquamperfect (Keil, ad loc.). (See a discussion of all the analogous instances in König's Syntax, § 142). Hence, not the original sense of the passage $2^{6ff.}$ but only its present position may be explained as follows: the first section (1^1–2^5) is meant to show why the internal enemies of Israel continued after the death of Joshua, and the second to explain why Israel during the same period was beaten by foreign foes. This intention of the section $2^{6ff.}$ appears to reveal itself especially in the expressions employed in $2^{14ff.}$ (cf. 3^3). It is not till 3^5 that the Bk. of Jg returns to the mention of internal foes of Israel, on whose account no shôphĕṭîm were raised up (2^{16}). Hence it appears to the present writer that the new section begins with 3^5 and not with 3^7 as is now generally assumed. Further, 2^{10} is not in contradiction with 3^9 (1^{13}, Jos 15^{17}), if Kenaz was the brother of Caleb; and this is not only possible but even almost probable, because in 1^{13} 'the younger,' etc., stands nearer to 'brother' and 'Kenaz' than to 'Othniel.' If so, Othniel was a nephew of Caleb and did not belong to the generation of Joshua; and the Κενίαζος ἔνομα which is read in Jos. Ant. v. iii. 3 (ed. Niese) is not 'the earliest of all the ingenious attempts that have been made to reconcile 3^9 with 2^{10}' (Mez, l.c. p. 12).

(c) There are irreconcilable differences, too, within the history of Deborah and Barak. For in 4^2 there is mention only of 'the king of Canaan,' but in 5^{19} of 'kings of Canaan.' Further, according to $4^{6.\ 10}$ Barak collected his army only from the two tribes of Naphtali and Zebulun, but according to $5^{14ff.}$ warriors joined him also from the tribes of Ephraim, Benjamin, etc. On the other hand, the sleep of Sisera (4^{21}) appears to the present writer to be presupposed also in 5^{26} (cf. vv.$^{26b.\ 27a}$), and its express mention seems to be omitted merely owing to poetic brevity. Otherwise it would be improbable that a woman should have slain the warrior. Budde says, of course, that '5^{27} shows that Sisera was struck while standing'; but this interpretation overlooks the words, 'where he bowed there he fell' ($5^{27b\beta}$).

(d) ש used as the relative is read only in 5^7 6^{17} 7^{12} 8^{26}, and in the last three passages cannot be regarded as interpolated (Giesebrecht, ZATW, Bd. i. 280; see all the instances of this ש in König's Lehrgebäude, ii. 322).

(e) The same author would not have written both the introductions to the narrative of the invasion of the Ammonites, contained in $10^{17f.}$ and $11^{4f.}$.

(f) In ch. 14 a great many very important points are passed over in silence of the most unnatural kind, if all the elements of the text that have come down to us are in their original form. For instance, after v.$^{8f.}$ the statement would be wanting that this journey of Samson did not lead to the marriage intended (לְקַחְתָּהּ, v.^{8a}), and that the father of Samson had got over his initial repugnance to a Philistine daughter-in-law. Probably, then, it is a later addition that the parents of Samson were present at his marriage. Josephus also relates* that Samson presented the honey to the Philistine maid, and not that he shared it with his parents (14^{9a}).

(g) Like a so-called red thread there runs through chs. 2–16 a series of passages in which the constant interchange is described between Israel's religious and moral lapses and her punishment, between Israel's repentance and God's help; cf. especially 2^{11-19} $3^{7.\ 12a}$ 4^{1-3} 6^1 8^{33-35} 10^{6-16} 13^1.

(h) Also the two episodes which close the book (chs. 17–21) have their peculiar character (e.g. the formula 'in those days there was no king in Israel,' etc., 17^6 18^1 19^1 21^{25}), and these two narratives also are wanting in a complete inward unity. For if $17^{10f.}$ $18^{17f.}$ $21^{12.\ 19}$ proceeded from one and the same author, they would contain unnatural repetitions.

5. Relation to the Pentateuch 'Sources.'—The question of the unity of the book as well as that of its date, depends upon the relation of Jg to the different strata embodied in the Pentateuch. Hence it will be of advantage for the following investigation, if we first of all make an attempt to fix this relation. Now it is well known that in the Pentateuch there are four main strata to be distinguished: the Jahwistic (J; Gn 2^{4b}–3^{24} etc.), the Elohistic (E; Gn 20, etc.), the Deuteronomic D), and the Esoteric-Priestly (P; Gn 1^1–2^{4a} etc.;) cf. König, Einleitung, p. 188 ff.); and there is the possibility in abstracto that these four works continued the post-Mosaic history of Israel. But that as a matter of fact these four sources of the Pentateuch continue to flow also into the extant Bk. of Jg, can be established only by positive proofs. This proof is all the more necessary in view of the impossibility of making true progress in critical science if a number of results are assumed as already proved, and one makes it his main object always to pile up higher storeys on the building of the literary criticism of the Old Testament. Besides, the relation of the Bk. of Jg to the 'sources' of the Pentateuch is one of those questions which are differently answered even by decided friends of criticism.

(a) Is the Jahwistic stratum (J) of the Pent. continued in Jg? To begin with, the first chapter of Jg has points of contact in several passages with expressions contained in the preceding book of the OT. For instance, Jos 15^{14-19} is substantially iden tical with Jg 1[10-15]; Jos 15[13] resembles Jg 1[20]; Jos 15[63] is substantially the same as Jg 1[21]; Jos 17[11-13] (cf. Nu 32[39. 41f.]) resembles Jg 1[27f.]; and Jos 16[10] is substantially the same as Jg 1[29]. The opinion of the present writer is that these postscripts in both books are drawn from a common source of earlier origin, and this judgment is based upon the following observations: (a) The two series of passages in Jos and Jg are in only a very few instances actually identical. (β) In particular the tradition (Jg 1[21]) that Jerusalem belonged to the ideal sphere of the tribe of Benjamin, is to be considered the older, in opposition to the note (Jos 15[63], Jg 1[8]) that Jerus. was the object of an attack by Judah. See above, 4 a; and cf. the mât ('land' or 'district') or mâtât of Urusalim in the Tel el-Amarna letters (Keilinsch. Bibliothek, Bd. v. 180[25. 63] 181[49] 183[14] 185[1f.]). (γ) The ancient source from which the identical sentences in the two series of passages named are drawn, was not the Jahwistic. For these sentences contain a somewhat artlessly connected series of facts, and do not possess the life and the variety of colouring which mark the Jahwistic style (cf. Gn 18 f., 24, etc.). (δ) Precisely in the passage, Jos 15[14-19] (substantially = Jg 1[10-15]), which in some measure shows the lifelike style of the Jahwist, there is a deviation from Gn 24[64]. In the latter the rapid descent from the beast ridden is expressed by wattippōl (AV 'she lighted off'), but in Jos 15[18] and Jg 1[14] by wattiẓnaḥ (AV 'she lighted [from] off'), and this verb ẓānaḥ occurs nowhere else but in Jg 4[21]. If one takes all this into account, it will be found what degree of certainty attaches to the position of Budde, who in the Kurzer Hdcomm., 1898, p. xxii, without positive argument, assigns to the Jahwistic work the following: Jg 1[1aαβb. 2f. 5-7. 19. 21 (10. 20). 11-16. 36. 17. 2*a*-29. 30-34]. Again, the view that the passages in question in the Bk. of Jos are borrowed from Jg 1 (Bertheau, Commentar[2], pp. 3, 37 f., 42) is, in the first place, unnecessary. For the circumstance that those passages in Jos have an 'inorganic' position in their context is explained as well by the view contended for above, that a common source of older origin is used in both books. But the view of Bertheau labours under at least one positive difficulty. In Jos 13[13] we find the same formula used, and yet this remark is not drawn from Jg 1.

* Ant. v. viii. 6: Καὶ ἀνελόμενος τρία μέλιτος κηρία, σὺν τοῖς λοιποῖς δώροις, οἷς ἐκόμιζε, δίδωσι τῇ παιδί.

To the Jahwistic source Budde (p. xxii) would attribute also, e.g., 6[12b] and 11[1a], although in these sentences the expression gibbôr ḥayil (AV 'a mighty man of valour') is read. This expression is uniformly avoided in the Pent. (cf. the simple gibbôr in Gn 6[4] 10[8f.] †), but it meets us in Jos 1[14] 6[2] 8[3] 10[7], Jg 6[12] 11[1] etc. (cf. König, Syntax, § 267d). Winckler (Untersuchungen zur altorient. Geschichte, 1893–1897) speaks of the 'Quellen-Zusammensetzung der Gideon-Erzählungen' (pp. 42 ff.), and finds, e.g., 7[9-14] and 7[15]–8[3] irreconcilable, because it is impossible that Gideon could have played the spy upon the Midianites (7[9ff.]) and yet have attacked them in the beginning of the middle watch (7[19]). But all that is related in 7[9ff.] might take place in a matter of four hours. The main point, however, is that Winckler adds (p. 49), 'Having thus to assume two different sources for the two narratives, it is most natural (!) to find in these E and J.' He thinks this suggestion is commended by the use in 7[14] of הָאֱלֹהִים 'the God.' But he has not observed that in 7[14b] it is the words of a Midianite that are reported. — The three passages in which שׁ is used as the relative (6[17b] 7[12b] 8[26b])—a notable idiom of the history of Gideon —Budde (p. xxii) assigns thus, to J 8[26], to E 6[17b], to R[P] 7[12] (see below), only in the notes to the first two passages he sets these also down, on account of the שׁ, as additions of a glossator. Also 11[3] belongs, according to Budde, to J, and yet the concept of 'assemble themselves' is expressed only in this passage by הִתְלַקֵּט; cf. נאספו, etc., Gn 29[3] 34[30] (both these passages are assigned to J also in Kautzsch's AT), Ex 32[26] (J also according to Ryssel, Ex-Lv, 1897, p. 370). Further, 15[1-19] is from J, according to Budde (pp. xxii, 92). But in those portions of the Pentateuch which are attributed to J, עִנְיָ is used before the objects enumerated, Gn 9[22] 19[1] (27[9]) 34[25], Ex 4[9] etc. (see König, Syntax, § 311c), but עֶנְיָם before such objects is found nowhere but in Ex 25[18a], Dt 17[6], Jos 2[1] 6[22], Jg 11[37. 39] 15[13] etc. (see l.c.).

(b) Can the Elohistic stratum (E) of the Pent. be traced in the Bk. of Jg? Budde has, to begin with, assigned 2[6. 8f.] to E (also 2[7] is = Jos 24[31], but as a whole it is ascribed by Budde [p. 21] to the Deut. redactor). This is correct in so far as the verses named are substantially identical with Jos 24[28-30], and that Jos 24 has indeed marks of the source E has been acknowledged by the present writer in his Einleitung (pp. 203 f., 248). The words of Jg 2[8-9] attach themselves to the Elohistic narrative of Joshua's end. But this does not prove that the Elohistic source has also supplied other elements in the Bk. of Jg. Budde attributes to this source, e.g., 4[4-22], appealing (p. 33) to אִשָּׁה נְבִיאָה (4[4]; see the analogous expressions in König's Syntax, § 306o), etc. But he himself adds the judicious remark that he does not feel certain of his inference. At all events the use of קָשַׁח in 4[6] (where AV offers rightly 'draw') cannot be regarded as evidence. For even if Ex 12[21] could be certainly put down to E, the מֹשְׁכִים of Jg 5[14] (active, 'grasping the staff [of the commander]'—König, Syntax, § 212h ex.; LXX ἕλκοντες; Targ. and Pesh. כתבין, scribentes!) would have been a source nearer to hand for 4[6]. Further, Budde assigns 20[37a] to E, but not v.[37b] in spite of the מִשּׁוּךְ, which is found also in Job 21[33]. To an author denominated E[2] he ascribes Jg 6[7-10]. But, e.g., עַל אֲרוּחַ (6[7]) is found, not only in Gn (Samarit. 20[3]) 21[11. 25] 26[32], Ex 18[8], Nu 12[1] 13[24], Jos 14[6], but also in Jer 3[8]. Here then identity of expression does not prove identity of authors.

(c) Is a successor of the Deuteronomic author who, e.g., wrote Dt 1[1f.]–4[40] etc. (see König's Einleitung, pp. 212–214) to be admitted also for the Bk. of Jg? The passages which repeatedly refer to Israel's disloyalty and Jahweh's anger, Israel's repentance and Jahweh's help (2[11-19] 3[7 12a] 4[1-3] 6[1] 8[33-35] 10[6-16] 13[1]), have points of contact with the passages that are attributed with probability to the Deut. author, not only in their religious and moral tendency, but even in their form. For the verb הִכְעִיס ('to provoke or vex') is found with God as the object only in Dt 4[25] (9[18]) 31[29] (32[16. 21]), Jg 2[12], and the verb מָכַר ('to sell' = 'deliver') is read in Dt 28[68] (התמכר) 32[30], Jg 2[14] (3[8]) 4[2. 9] 10[7]. But the same use of הִכְעִיס meets us also in 1 K 14[15] 15[30] 16[2. 7. 13. 26. 33] 21[22] 22[54], 2 K 17[11. 17] 21[6] 23[26], Is 65[3], Jer 7[18f.] 8[19] 11[17] 25[6f.] 32[29f. 32] 44[3. 8], Ezk 8[17] 16[26], Ps 78[58] 106[29], 2 Ch 28[25] 33[6] 34[25] (‖ 1 K 22[54], 2 K 17[17] 22[17]). Here again, then, this use of the verb הִכְעִיס is no guarantee of the identity of the author of Dt 4[25] etc. with the author of Jg 2[12]. (Compare here the words of C. Niebuhr [Studien u. Bemerkungen z. Gesch. d. alten Orients, 1894, p. 1], 'Die wirkliche Nothwendigkeit einer sachlichen Unterscheidung von Dt and D (oder gar D[1] and D[2]) vermögen wir bisher nicht nachzuempfinden').

(d) To an R[P], i.e. a redactor having affinities with the priestly stratum of the Pent., Budde (p. xxii) assigns the following passages in Jg: 1[1aα] 2[17] 7[2-8a. 12. 14*]. + 2[3] 8[10aβb. 21bβ. 27aζb (30-32)] 9[16b-19a (?)] 10[1-5] 11[1b. 2] 12[7b (?)· 8-15] 16[31b] 20[18 (?)· 23 (?)· 27b. 28aα. 37b].

† By an asterisk Budde means to indicate that he regards the passage in question as having been worked over.

39. 42b. 43. 44b-46 $21^{4a\beta}$. 14b. $19a\beta$-20a. But regarding $1^{1a\alpha}$ he remarks merely that the words 'after the death of Joshua' are in direct contradiction to $2^{6ff.}$. Yet this does not prove that these words are due to a redactor (R^P). As little certainty appears to attach to the attributing of 2^{17} to this source. For לֹא עָשׂוּ כֵן 'they did not so,' reminds us not only 'strongly of P' (namely Gn 6^{22} etc.), but one may compare also Gn 29^{26} $42^{20.\ 25}$ 45^{21}, Ex 7^{6} etc., 1 K 20^{25}, 2 K 15^{12}, Jer 39^{12} 42^{5}, Zec 1^{6}, Neh 8^{17}. Further, on 7^{2-8a} Budde remarks (p. 58) that צָרַף 'try' (Jg 7^{4}), comes into use for the first time from Jer 9^{6} onwards, and that the suffixless לְבַד (7^{5}) has parallels only in Ex 26^{6} 36^{6} (this last should be ^{16}), Zec 12^{12-14}. But in Jg 7^{5} it is not the usual idea 'alone' (solus) that is meant to be expressed, but the stronger idea of 'apart' (LXX κατὰ μόνας, Hieron. seorsum). Again, 7^{12}, which contains שׁ used for the relative, is ascribed by Budde to R^P, but in the Pent. stratum P this שׁ is not found.

One might continue to criticise the views of Budde (cf. once more König's Einleitung, pp. 253 f.).* But we cease to test these in detail, and add merely a general remark. Budde says (p. xiv) that by J and E he understands, not persons, but schools.† But this was not the sense originally intended by the terms J and E, and the earlier meaning is not quite obsolete even with Budde. For he speaks still of the 'Zeitalter der Quellen J and E,' and places these sources in relation to the Hexateuch (p. xii). But according to his new view one ought to speak in the plural of 'J's' and 'E's,' and no longer of 'J' or 'E' (Budde, p. xiii), as if there were only 'the' Jahwist; we should say 'a' J(ahwist), etc. But far more important is the circumstance that upon the theory of a plurality of Jahwists the difficulty of tracing the family likeness is very seriously increased. Who has fixed the character of each J, and who can determine it? Then, indeed, is there a danger that such a J is an imaginary quantity, and that one still speaks of J but no longer has him. In any case the judgment of the present writer is to the following effect. Since the different sources from which, according to No. 4 of this article, the present Book of Judges is drawn, cannot be with certainty identified with the main strata of the Pentateuch, nothing results from the relation of Jg to these regarding the age of the materials of which Jg appears to be composed, or regarding the date of the book itself.

6. The Character and Age of the Sources of the Book of Judges.—(α) If any one of the components of the present Bk. of Jg is an independent whole, and reveals itself as a source, it is the Poem in which the victory over Sisera is celebrated (Jg 5). Its verses go tumbling on, foaming like the waves of the Kishon (5^{21}), upon whose banks that victory was gained. Like the gallop of war-horses (5^{22}) ring the anaphora (vv.$^{3b.\ 7b.\ 12a.\ 23a}$), the epizeuxis ($^{12a.\ 22b}$), and the symploke ($^{7a.\ 24ab}$, cf. $^{19a\alpha\beta.\ 20a\alpha\beta}$) in this poem, towards removing whose difficulties the present writer has contributed his part, he trusts not quite unsuccessfully in his Syntax (cf. p. 645). This song gives so detailed (vv.$^{6.\ 10a.\ 14-18.\ 23}$) and so lively a picture of the historical situation (vv.$^{24-27.\ 28-30}$) which is commemorated in it, that it must have been born of that situation, even if it has not come down to us quite intact. This is the judgment rightly passed upon it even by such free critics as, e.g., Th. Nöldeke (Untersuch. z. Kritik d. AT, p. 181), H. Steiner (die Heb. Poesie, 1873, p. 24), Ed. Meyer (Gesch. d. Alterthums, i. § 167), B. Stade (Gesch. Isr. i. 49), Aug. Müller (in Königsberger Studien, 1887, p. 7), E. Renan (Hist. du peuple d'Israël, i. 136), J. Wellhausen (Comp. d. Hex. p. 23), H. Cornill (Einleitung, § 16, 3), G. Moore (Judges, p. 132 f.), J. Marquart (Fundamente, etc., 1896, p. 2), K. Budde (Comm. p. 39), Ch. Piepenbring (Hist. du peuple d'Israël, 1898, p. 85: 'ce vieux cantique').

Nor can this judgment be shattered by the arguments which are brought forward by L. Seinecke (Gesch. d. Volkes Israel, i. 243–245). Neither (α) are the political presuppositions of the Song wanting in historical reality, nor do (β) its form or (γ) its contents render a high antiquity impossible for it. For (α) even if the northern Canaanites sustained a defeat in the time of Joshua (see below, 8 a, on Jos 11^{10-14}), their strength might have recovered itself. (β) The use of שׁ for the relative (5^{7}) has analogies in OT passages of a more northern Palestine origin (see further, 6 d). The plur. ending -îm (5^{10}) may have the same origin, or it may be an element in the poetical dialect as in Pr 31^{3} etc. (see König, Lehrgebäude, ii. 434). To the same category belong also תָּנָה (5^{11}: (?) 'im Wechselgesang vortragen,' 'repeat,' 'relate'; cf. the Aram. תְּנִי in the Targ. on Ps 9^{12} etc., and the Assyr. šunnû, 'communicate' (Del. Assyr. Wörterb. 1896, p. 674a). (γ) The heights of Seïr (5^{4}), which lay north of the Peninsula of Sinai, are named as the starting-point of Jahweh who manifested Himself on Sinai (v.^{5}). This tallies with the ancient conception that the seat of the gods was in the northern region of the earth, Lv 1^{11} 4^{24} etc., Is 14^{13} (Jer 1^{13}), Ezk 1^{4} (28^{14}), Ps 48^{3} (133^{3}), cf. Job 26^{7}. This theophany is also intended as a past one. For the temporal sphere of an infin. depends upon its context (Gn 28^{6b} etc.; see König's Syntax, § 216), and בְּצֵאתָהּ, etc. (Jg $5^{4a\alpha}$) is followed by the perfects רָגְזָה, etc. Then יָעֵל (v.^{6}) may, coming after בִּימֵי, have arisen from עַל (cf. [א ארח] עַל 1 Ch 7^{39}), the name of a descendant of Asher. It is probable that, as a parallel to שַׁמְגַּר, a man is intended (cf. Bertheau, ad loc.).* But even if the words בִּימֵי יָעֵל are a gloss (Moore, Marquart, Budde), the antiquity of the poem itself is not thereby endangered. Finally, the assertion that 'from heaven forces took part in the battle' (5^{20}), contains a religio-poetical clothing of the conception that God assisted the Israelites (cf. Ex 14^{24}, Jos 10^{11}). The assertion is not then to be called a 'gross exaggeration' of a later author.†

* W. Frankenberg (die Composition des deuteronom. Richterbuches, 1895, p. 1) remarks, 'A deeper insight into the original contents and the historical origin of the Bk. of Jg is sufficient of itself to convince one of the futility of the attempts that are ever being made afresh to build a literary bridge between the Hexateuch and our Bk. of Jg, and to discover the sources of the Hex. in the latter.'

† 'J und E sind mir durchaus nicht Personen, sondern umfassende, neben einander herlaufende schriftstellerische Schulen.'

* Marquart (Fundamente, etc., 1896, p. 2) takes Shamgar to be 'der fremde Oberkönig,' and combines him with 'Sangara of Carchemish, in the time of Aśurnāẓirabal, c. B.C. 880,' and Sisera with 'Pîziri the last king of Carchemish' (c. B.C. 740). What an amount of error in the Hebrew tradition is thus assumed without any sufficient reason!

† H. Winckler in his Altorient. Forschungen (1893–1897) offers the following remarks on Jg 5: שׂרה in v.^{4}='height' (p. 192, cf. Assyr. šadu, 'to be high'). This is possible. But it is more probable that סיני זה in v.^{5} is an intermediate exclamation (see König, Syntax, § 414a) than that זה has arisen from רנו (p. 192). The substitution of שָׂרַר 'row' for שָׁרִיר in v.^{13} (p. 291) is not probable. In v.$^{14a\alpha}$ he reads (p. 193), מִנִּי אפרים שָׁרוּ בעמק 'from Ephraim they came down (cf. שׁוּר) into the valley,' and he deletes v.$^{14a\beta}$ entirely. We would rather suggest that the gibbōrîm of v.$^{13\ ex.}$ are 'heroes from Ephraim,' and that then מִשָּׁרְשִׁים is meant to signify 'eradicantes, i.e. delentes inter Amalek' (cf. LXX ἐξερίζωσεν). Also the reading וְשָׁרוּ בִי׳ עִם דברת 'and there came down in Issachar the people of Dabrat' (p. 292), is extremely precarious. For it would be unnatural if after the princes, etc. (v.^{14b}), the population of a single city (Jos 19^{12}) should be mentioned. Finally, instead of נַחַל קְדוּמִים (v.^{21a}) Winckler suggests (p. 193) the sentence, 'the stream of Kishon was [dyed, or the like] with blood' (דָּמִים). But the cir-

M. Vernes (Précis d'histoire juive, p. 210) holds that at the very outset (péremptoirement) it must be regarded as a settled point that at this epoch we have to do, not with a campaign undertaken by the tribes of Israel in common. But why might not an extraordinary danger have brought about an extraordinary coalition of many tribes of Israel for common defence against the enemy? Some tribes, indeed, declined to be stirred up from their phlegmatic condition (5$^{15-17}$). Further, Vernes finds in the mention of Sinai and of Seir 'l'ignorance ou, si l'on préfère, la negligence de l'homme qui écrit librement à grande distance de son sujet.' But he has himself failed to observe that the mention of Mt. Seir had reference to a northern starting-point of the theophany of Jahweh (see above, regarding the idea of the northern sphere as the seat of deity). Again, the days of Shamgar, although he defeated the Philistines (3^{31}), might still be a time of oppression (4^{4}), and, besides, the note in 4^{4} may be primary, and that in 3^{31} secondary. Further, if the Kishon is called in 5^{21} 'l'antique fleuve' (but see König's Syntax, § 261d), this expression could be used even in the days of Deborah. According to Vernes, the sentence 'Dan יָגוּר אֳנִיּוֹת' (v.^{17}) is also an unnatural one, for 'jamais les Danites n'ont touché à la mer.' But even if we are not to think, with Mikhlal Jophi, of אֳנִיּוֹת תַּיָּרִין, the Danites might 'dwell' as strangers, i.e. serve on board ships. Finally, Vernes will have it that even the address to kings and princes in v.^{3} 'indique une époque de relations internationales.' Well, such an epoch was to hand already at the date of the Tel el-Amarna letters! In the Rev. des Études juives, xxiv. (1892), p. 249, Vernes calls sarai (v.^{15}) an 'état construit ou (!) pluriel de forme araméenne,' and co-ordinates with it 'tsavrè, plus exactment, tsavrai'! (v.^{30}). He denies the existence of 'marques du dialecte hébreu septentrionale' (p. 249^{2}); but see below, 6 d. He thinks 'que la terminologie familière au Cantique est celle des livres de la Bible dont on admet le plus volontiers l'origine post-exilienne.' But he has failed to notice that poetry, even in the earliest times, may have preferred expressions which, owing to their rarity or their more foreign cast, lend to the Song of Deborah a special charm. Thus, e.g., the verb פרע (v.^{2}) will not have been 'emprunté aux Nombres et au Lévitique' (p. 249), even if is not to be translated with M. Lambert (p. 141), 'se dépouiller (pour Dieu), offrir généreusement (cf. en himyarite la locution פרע פרע 'faire une offrande').'

H. Winckler (Gesch. Israels, Bd. i. (1895), p. 34) admits first that the Song (Jg 5) goes back to the pre-Davidic era, because 'it knows nothing of Judah.' But he adds that 'the form in which the Song has come down to us is a product of a much later age, which transformed it for its own ends, and made of it something quite different from what it originally was.' On what grounds does he rest this judgment? All that he says is, 'vv.$^{4f.}$ are manifestly an interpolation, and form the beginning of a hymn to Jahweh which has nothing whatever to do with the Song of Deborah. Also v.^{31} belongs to the same.' It is clear, he says, that the Song is a compound from a hymn to J" which is full of mythological allusions ('the stars fought'), and from a piece intended to glorify a battle fought by the Northern tribes. It would scarcely be possible to find weaker arguments than these. Are vv.$^{4f.}$ 'manifestly' an interpolation? Was it not natural that the words 'I will sing praise to the Lord God of Israel' (v.^{3}) should be actually followed by some lines in praise of this God? Was it not natural that at the beginning of a poem meant to celebrate a notable action of the Deity, there should be a recalling of a well-known manifestation by which Jahweh established His renown? Would it have been more natural if, after the mention of the determination to praise the Deity (v.^{3}), the Song had proceeded 'in the days of Shamgar,' etc.? (v.^{6}). Further, the wish 'so perish all thine enemies, J"!' (v.^{31}) could not, it is said, be uttered by a pre-Davidic poet. But must not a poem on a decisive defeat of the northern Canaanites quite naturally burst into such a wish? Consequently Winckler has by no means established his contention, and the poem contained in Jg 5 remains one of the most important sources for the earliest history of Israel.

(b) Another ancient source for the present Bk. of Jg is found springing up in the first chapter. In favour of this judgment is first of all the primary character of the tradition that 'Urusalimu' belonged to the sphere of the Benjamites (Jg 1^{21}, Dt 33^{12} contrasted with Jg 1^{8}, Jos 15^{63}). The following circumstance is at the same time not to be overlooked. What is the meaning of the words 'with the Benjamites' in the sentence 'and the Jebusites dwelt with the Benjamites in Jerusalem unto this day'? (1^{21b}). The meaning must be 'within the territory of the Benjamites,' i.e. in the sphere which was assigned to the Benjamites as object of the conquest, and was also in the main actually occupied (cf. 'the Jebusites, the inhabitants of the land,' 2 S 5^{6} ‖ 1 Ch 11^{4}). This sense is suggested for the words 'with the Benjamites' by several considerations, one negative and several positive. In the first place, immediately before 1^{21b} it is remarked, 'and (= but) the Benjamites did not drive out the Jebusites, the inhabitants of Jerusalem.' The direct consequence of this failure of the Benjamites in their attack on the Jebusites (1^{21a}) was that the Jebusites dwelt alongside of the Benjamites in Jerusalem (v.^{21b}). Further, the Jebusites are called simply 'the' inhabitants of Jerusalem (Jos 15^{63}, Jg 1^{21a}), and Jebus is simply identified with Jerusalem (יְבוּס הִיא יְרוּשָׁלִַם Jg 19^{10}, Jos 18^{28}, or conversely in 1 Ch 11^{4}). Again, in the remark that the Levite (Jg 19$^{16ff.}$) was in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem (v.^{10}), the latter is called simply 'this city of the Jebusites' (19^{11b}), and it is expressly added that it was 'the city of a stranger that was not of the children of Israel' (19^{12}). In any case the author of 1^{21} did not record merely the failure of the Benjamites to conquer Jerusalem. Had this been all, he might in his account of the period of the judges have passed over in silence the victory of the Judahite David (2 S 5$^{6ff.}$) and yet have written after this victory. No, he must have added that the Jebusites were the—sole—inhabitants of Jerus. down to his own day. Now, it is quite true that even after David's victory (2 S 5$^{6ff.}$) Jebusites continued to live in Jerusalem (24$^{16ff.\ 24}$). But at that period the Jebusites were no longer 'the' inhabitants of Jerusalem (see above), but were oppressed (1 K 9^{20}, Zec 9^{7}). But also most of the other portions of Jg 1 are trustworthy reflections of an ancient situation. For it was very natural that in later times there should be a disposition to represent the success of Joshua's invasion as absolute (see below, 8 a, on Jos 11$^{10-14}$). All the more do the narratives which record the defeats sustained by Israel in their attacks upon the Canaanites, bear the stamp of antiquity. This is confirmed by the wealth of details in the first chapter regarding individual occurrences of this kind which cannot be traced to a certain or probable tendency of later times.

(c) Now a similar dry enumeration of particulars is found also in the passages concerning Shamgar (3^{31}), Tola (10$^{1f.}$), Jair (vv.$^{3-5}$), Ibzan (12$^{8-10}$), Elon cumstance that no trace of such a text has been preserved in exegetic tradition (see König's Syntax, § 261a) is a formidable objection.

(v.[11f.]), and 'Abdon (vv.[13-15]). The modern view of these passages is that they were first introduced into the Bk. of Jg at its final redaction (Budde, p. x). What is there to allege in favour of this position?

(α) It is said that this late redactor (R^P, see above, 5 d) wished to obtain the number twelve for the judges (Budde, p. x). For 'in the light of 10^1 the sections 10^{1-5} and 12^{8-15} recognize Abimelech also as a judge' (pp. ix, 19). Thus 'Abimelech, Tola, Jair, Ibzan, Elon, and 'Abdon were for R^P the minor judges.' But was Abimelech really reckoned one of the shôphĕṭîm? What is said in 10^1? 'And after Abimelech there arose, to defend Israel, Tola,' etc. This implies, it is said, that Abimelech was reckoned among the 'judges' or 'saviours' of Israel. One might also say that this method of argumentation is typical of a certain modern school of historiography. The express statements of the sources are absolutely ignored, and new and extremely doubtful ones are sought out. For instance, is it not related in 8^{23} and 9^2 that the kind of rule (מֹשֵׁל) which was declined by Gideon because Jahweh was the true king of Israel (Ex 15^{18} יְהוָה יִמְלֹךְ), was desired by Abimelech? Did not the latter surround himself with a body of armed men? ($9^{4.\ 29b}$, cf. Absalom 2 S 15^1). Is it not expressly said that the men of Shechem made Abimelech king (9^6); and is this not confirmed by the fable of Jotham? (9^{8-18} 'the trees went forth to anoint a king,' etc.). Again, Abimelech is further called a 'prince' (9^{22} וַיָּשַׂר; cf. the corresponding 'that we should serve him' vv.[28. 38]), but not a 'judge.' Nor does his history contain any trace of his having sought to free (הוֹשִׁיעַ) Israel from the yoke of foreign enemies. All the less can the 'to deliver Israel' (לְהוֹשִׁיעַ אֶת־יִשְׂרָאֵל 10^1) be referred to Abimelech. Further, it is extremely questionable whether a late redactor desired to establish twelve as the number of the judges. For not only is Samson, to whom 'delivering Israel' is attributed (13^5, cf. 14^4 $15^{3ff.}$ $16^{23f.\ 30}$), counted amongst the judges (15^{20} 16^{31}),* but also Eli (1 S 4^{18b}) and Samuel (7^{15}). This could not be unknown to a later redactor of the Bk. of Jg. How then can the disposition be ascribed to him to make the number of the judges twelve? Besides, Budde himself remarks that in the Bk. of Jg thirteen 'judges' are mentioned, if Abimelech as well as Shamgar is included in the number. But he is not so much inclined to give up Abimelech as Shamgar, in order to reduce the thirteen to twelve. This is quite an arbitrary procedure, for the attribute of 'delivering Israel' which belonged to the character of a shôphēṭ (2^{16}) is ascribed to Shamgar (3^{31}) but not to Abimelech. Or is Shamgar no real historical figure because in a series of MSS of the LXX and in the Itala (cf. Mez, die Bibel des Josephus, p. 81 note) he is named not only in 3^{31} but also after 16^{31}? This vacillating of the textual tradition as to the right place for mentioning Shamgar is explicable by reason of the 'and after him' and the 'Philistines.' But it does not disprove the historicity of an Israelitish hero Shamgar who came upon the scene at a stormy period (5^6).

(β) Another ground on which the passages $10^{1f.\ 3-5}$ $12^{8-10.\ 11f.\ 13-15}$ are assigned to a very late redactor (R^P), is the following:—In these five sections it is not recorded that Israel was false to its religion, and on that account had to suffer oppression for a term of years, and was delivered from this by a hero. 'The extreme attenuation of the Deuteron. formula is exhibited in 3^{31}. There is mention, indeed, of an act of deliverance, but of no number of years' (Budde, p. 19). But what if those circumstances of which there is no notice did not exist, or were partly not remembered? Can their absence bring into question the historical character of the persons themselves? In the section concerning Othniel (3^{9-11}), which by Budde and others is separated from the above six passages, are there any more real elements? It is quite true that something had 'faded,' but this was the recollection of those personages, and not the 'Deuteronomistic formulæ.' What could have prevented the introducing of those formulæ even at a late period into the biography of the persons named. Hence the conclusion appears more certain that it was not the 'formulæ' that were wanting, but the disposition to modify historical reminiscences in accordance with these formulæ. That has been handed down regarding those persons which was known of them, and this was not little: the name of the man himself and that of his father or his tribe, or it may be the place of his birth and his burial ($10^{2.\ 5}$ $12^{10.\ 12.\ 15}$), or the remembrance of some notable deed done by him (3^{31}), etc. Why should all this be set down to invention? Not because of a wish to reach the number twelve for the judges, as we have seen already. Or was it, perchance, to give a judge to each tribe? The tribes of the individual judges were as follows: Judah (Othniel 3^9), Benjamin (Ehud 3^{15};? Shamgar 3^{31}), Naphtali (Barak 4^6), Ephraim (Gideon 6^{11}), Issachar (Tola 10^1), Gilead (Jair 10^3), ?Gilead (Jephthah 11^1), Judah (Ibzan 12^8), Zebulun (Elon 12^{11}), Ephraim ('Abdon 12^{13}), Dan (Samson 13^2). One may observe that in this list some tribes occur twice, and that a few tribes are wanting altogether. If an explanation of the local origin of these judges is to be sought for, it is most natural to find it in the circumstance that the hero sprang up from the tribe which felt most the weight of the invader's oppression. Finally, how came poetic fancy and constructive historiography to distribute in their present fashion the six passages 3^{31} 10^{1-5} 12^{8-15}? It is impossible for the present writer to consent to see in this arrangement simply an arbitrary procedure.

(d) But there are in the Bk. of Jg also such life-like and vivid narratives as cannot be set down to the ideas or tendencies of a later age.

(α) The history of Abimelech (Jg 9) even M. Vernes (Hist. juive, p. 218) calls 'un récit d'une précision, d'un relief étonnant.' But it is not the only one of this class in Jg, as he adds, but it is the only one that is almost wholly secular in its character. It is the only narrative in Jg which is true to the life—only for those critics to whom the secular life is the only real life of ancient Israel. Critics who occupy such a standpoint will not deny the attribute of antiquity to such a story as that of the Benjamite Ehud, who with his left hand stabbed the tyrant Eglon (Jg $3^{15ff.}$). Such critics will not be disposed to deny the historicity of the bold figure of Jephthah, or of the tragic end of his only child (11^1–12^7). As a 'héros d'aventures privées' even Samson has found grace in the eyes of M. Vernes (p. 238), according to whom the exploits of Samson belonged to the 'disputes qui devaient naître fréquemment à l'époque historique des relations établies entre populations antipathiques.' *

* And this not without reason, as M. Vernes (Hist. juive, p. 237) supposed when he said, 'Laissons de côté l'étrange prétention de nous faire voir dans Samson un juge d'Israël.' For from the words, 'the Lord raised up judges, which delivered them out of the hand of those that spoiled them' (Jg 2^{16}, cf. 1 S 8^{5b}), it results that the term shôphēṭ had assumed the more general sense of 'hero,' or 'leader.'

* M. Vernes adds the following note: 'Il s'agit là, ce nous semble, d'une antipathie comme entre Anglais et Français à tant d'époques de notre histoire. On est en paix officielle, on s'unit par des marriages, etc., mais de temps en temps la haine nationale se fait jour par des explosions violentes. Il reste à remarquer que Samson ne se bat pas une seule fois avec l'épée ou la lance; jamais il n'est à la tête d'une troupe quelconque.

(β) But the religious life also was a real one in ancient Israel. As early as the time of Moses and during the following centuries zeal for the cause of Jahweh could burn (Ex $32^{25ff.}$), and enthusiasm be aroused for the defence of His honour. For, if the flame of reverence for J″ had not been kindled by Moses, why should he and not Samuel have been named as the greatest hero of the religious development of Israel? If the fire of enthusiasm for the religion of J″ was not lighted at the great epoch of the deliverance from Egypt, how could this fire have burst out just at a period of the deepest depression (1 S $4^{16ff.}$), and why should Israel have felt convicted of impiety against Jahweh? (1 S 7^{6b}). Hence there is no reasonable ground for doubt that Gideon (Jg $6^{11ff.}$) contended for the cult of Jahweh in opposition to the preference for Ba'al, or that he could have taken for his battle-cry, 'For Jahweh and for Gideon (will we fight),' Jg 7^{18b}. Besides, it is in the highest degree worthy of notice that it is precisely in the history of a hero belonging to the tribe of Ephraim, i.e. to central Caanan, that the use of שׁ for the relative appears (6^{17} 7^{12} 8^{26}). For it is of the tribe of Ephraim alone that it is recorded in the OT that its dialect differed from that of other Hebrews (Jg 12^{6}); cf. on the speech of Ashdod as a Hebrew dialect, etc., König, Lehrgebäude, ii. 349, 353. Further, it is a fact that in the narratives concerning Elijah and Elisha the following linguistic peculiarities appear: אוֹת 'with,' 2 K $1^{1.\ 15}$ $3^{11f.\ 26}$ $6^{16.\ 19}$ 8^{8}; the shorter form Eliyya (and Ahazya), $1^{2-4.\ 8.\ 12}$; אַתִּי ('attî, 'thou,' fem.) $4^{16.\ 23}$ 8^{1}; the corresponding לְכִי ('to thee,' fem.) 4^{2}; כִּי ('thy," fem.) $4^{3.\ 7}$; שׁ, relative, 6^{11}; cf. אֵיכָה 'where'?, 6^{13}, so elsewhere only in Ca 1^{7} (Kethîbh); בהשׂרה 2 K 7^{12}, and the same phenomenon shows itself in ancient histories like those of 1 S 13^{21}, 2 S 16^{2}. Therefore it is a sufficiently well-grounded judgment that the present narratives concerning Gideon are compiled from materials which, so to say, bear a local colouring. This judgment is at least supported, further, by two material circumstances. For it is a fact, admitted even, e.g., by Wellhausen (Prolegom. p. 71), that the description of the offering contained in Jg $6^{17f.}$ corresponds to the earliest stage of the history of the cultus in Israel. Another point has hitherto not been emphasized, but it is of no less importance. The disinclination manifested by Gideon to accept of the offer made to him to be ruler (מֹשֵׁל Jg 8^{23} 'the Lord shall rule over you') is perfectly in place in the period before Samuel. For it was not till his time that Israel rejected the kingship of Jahweh (Ex 15^{18}) ('they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them,' 1 S 8^{7}).

(γ) In like manner the antiquity of the narrative contained in Jg 17 f. is witnessed to. For the possession by the Ephraimite Micah of a private house of gods (17^{5a}) tallies with the circumstance that in the earlier period a plurality of places of worship was allowed (Ex 20^{24-26}). Further, we see a Levite wandering about, ready to settle down wherever he found office and bread ($17^{8ff.}$ $18^{19f.}$ 19^{1}). This situation of the members of the tribe of Levi was an actual one as long as a number of the Levitical cities were not yet conquered, such as Gezer (Jos 21^{21} 16^{10}, Jg 1^{29}), and those remarks of the Bk. of Jg about the Levites would have possessed no probability if they had proceeded from a period when Jeroboam selected priests from among the people at large (1 K 12^{31}). For the Levite spoken of in Jg $17^{8ff.}$ wandered from Judah to the territory of Ephraim, etc., but after the time of Jeroboam many members of the tribe of Levi, on the contrary, moved from the territories of the Northern tribes to the kingdom of Judah (2 Ch $11^{13f.}$). Finally, the note that the priests of the city of Dan were descendants of Moses (Jg 18^{30}), must be borrowed from an ancient source. Later generations were so little disposed to invent such an item, that they sought rather to convert the name of Moses in this passage into Manasseh.

(δ) But also the moral life of ancient Israel did not lack its characteristic aim and peculiar vigour. Even in early times Israel was conscious of a certain sum of moral principles, for we read, 'no such thing ought to be done in Israel': 'do not thou this folly,' and the like (cf. Gn 20^{11} 34^{7b}, Jg 19^{30} 20^{6b}, 2 S 13^{12}). And, since these principles of morality in the most central parts of Israelitish tradition are traced back to the time of Moses, why should we seek for a different origin for them? Is it at all probable, for instance, that they originated at periods which do not give themselves out as creative, but as secondary? Now these ancient principles of the morality of Israel lived in the conscience of this nation, and when they were trodden underfoot, as in the instance of Gibeah (Jg $19^{23ff.}$), the voice of the moral conscience of the nation spoke out loudly (20^{6-8}). Hence it is quite precarious to pronounce the storm of indignation that broke loose upon the Benjamites (v.$^{9ff.}$) fictitious. Finally, the assertion that in the time of the judges a 'common acting on the part of the twelve tribes of Israel is excluded' (Budde on chs. 19–21), is quite ungrounded. Nay, it has not yet been taken into account that the Song of $5^{1ff.}$ contains an indirect proof to the contrary effect. For if in the period of the judges one could not entertain the notion that a common danger to Israel must be warded off by the common action of all the tribes, one could not have blamed those tribes which kept aloof from the struggle against the northern Canaanites (Jg 5^{15-17}).

(ε) There is a series of passages in the Bk. of Jg in which the declension of the national prosperity is brought into causal connexion with the religious and moral falling away of the people (cf. especially $2^{11ff.}$ $3^{7.\ 12a}$ 4^{1-3} 6^{1} 8^{33-35} 10^{6-16} 13^{1}). It has been shown above (5 c) that these passages cannot with certainty be attributed to a definite Deuteron. author, but we now add the following observations, by way of an attempt to fix positively the character and the age of these passages. (α) There was a religious-moral consciousness on the part of Israel (cf. 6 d, δ) before the period to which the origin of Dt is traced by a large number of critics, i.e. the reign of king Josiah. (β) During the centuries that elapsed between Moses and Samuel, 'the knees which have not bowed unto Baal' (1 K 19^{18}) were not quite wanting. Let us recall, for instance, Deborah and Gideon. (γ) In addition to that series of passages which now are assigned by several critics to a Deuteronomist (Budde's D^{2}), are there not others in the Bk. of Jg in which the same causal nexus between religious unfaithfulness and national decadence is emphasized? cf. 2^{1-5}. (δ) May not such passages have been formulated in the guilds of nĕbi'îm which gathered around Samuel? (1 S 10^{5-7} etc.). (ε) Nor can it be denied that a kernel of farewell addresses of Moses existed before these assumed their present form in Dt (cf. König, Einleitung, pp. 214–216). (ζ) Those passages of Jg which are now by many scholars called Deuteronomistic, are even in relation to their contents not really allied to the passages of the Books of Kings which have points of contact with Dt (1 K $3^{2f.}$ 11^{6} etc.; see König, Einleitung, p. 267). For it is extremely interesting that in Jg the cove-

Les éléments de son histoire nous semblent, en conséquence, appartenir à une époque relativement peu ancienne.' But this is nearly the opposite of the real course of things. It is precisely in olden times that heroes signalize themselves in single combat. Recall, for instance, the giant figures of the Greek world of legend, the heroes of Homer, or the giants of the German pre-historic era.

nant of J″ is mentioned only in $2^{1.\ 20}$ and the commands of J″ only in $2^{17.\ 34}$, but these things are mentioned in 1 K 2^{2} $3^{3.\ 14}$ $6^{12.\ 38}$ $8^{31.\ 55.\ 58.\ 61}$ $9^{4.\ 6}$ $11^{11.\ 33f.\ 38}$ 13^{21} 14^{8} 18^{18} $19^{10.\ 14}$, 2 K 10^{31} 13^{23} 14^{6} $17^{8.\ 13.\ 15f.\ 19.\ 34.\ 37f.}$ $18^{6.\ 12}$ 21^{8} $22^{8.\ 11}$ $23^{2f.\ 21.\ 24f.}$. Further, the idea of the centralization of the cultus is not emphasized in that series of passages which it is usual to call Deuteronomistic. No word of censure is uttered against the bāmóth as in 1 K $3^{2f.}$ 15^{14} $22^{44.\ 47}$, 2 K 12^{3} $14^{3f.}$ $15^{3f.\ 34f.}$ $18^{5.\ 22}$ $23^{5.\ 8.\ 25}$. Besides, when the remark is made that D^{2} 'den Begriff des Richter geschaffen hat' (Budde, p. xvi), in support of which Jg 2^{16} is cited, we miss here a recollection of the words, 'since the time that I commanded judges to be over my people Israel' (2 S 7^{11}).

(f) There are only a few passages in Jg which possess sufficiently clear marks of a late origin.

(α) We do not venture to reckon among these elements those passages where the intervention of a supernatural power is described, as in the expression 'an (see König's Syntax, § 304 e) angel of the LORD' (2^{1} $13^{3f.*}$), or 'the Spirit of the LORD came upon him,' etc. (3^{10} 6^{34} 11^{29} $14^{6.\ 19}$ 15^{14}). For 'there are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio, than are dreamt of in your philosophy.'

(β) But we find, undoubtedly, a series of so-called 'round numbers'; 'seven' ($6^{1.\ 15}$ 8^{26} 12^{9} $16^{7f.\ 13.\ 19}$ 20^{15}), or 'seventy' (1^{7} 8^{30} [repeated in $9^{2.\ 5.\ 18.\ 24.\ 56}$] ^{4} 12^{14}), or 'seventy-seven' (8^{14}), or 'forty' (3^{11} $5^{8.\ 31}$ 8^{28} 13^{1}). There are, indeed, also instances where the number 'seven' is meant in an exact sense, as in the case of the seven days of the marriage feast ($14^{12.\ 17}$); for such a feast even at the present day actually lasts, as a rule, for seven days, and is called 'the king's week' (Wetzstein, Zeitschrift f. Ethnologie, v. 291, 293). But the numbers 'seven,' 'seventy,' and 'forty' are unquestionably intended frequently in an approximate sense; cf. 'seven' in Gn 4^{15} 31^{23} 33^{3}, Ex 7^{25}, Lv $26^{18.\ 24.\ 28}$, Dt $28^{7.\ 25}$, 1 S 2^{5} etc., Is 4^{1} etc.; 'seventy' in Gn 46^{27}, Ex 1^{5} 15^{27} $24^{1.\ 9}$, Nu $11^{16.\ 24f.}$ 33^{9}, Dt 10^{22}, 2 K 10^{1}, Is 23^{15}, Jer 25^{11} 29^{10}, Ezk 8^{11}, Ps 90^{10}, Lk 10^{1}; 'seventy-seven' in Gn 4^{24}; 'forty' in Gn 6^{3}, Ex 7^{7} 16^{35} etc., Dt 34^{7}, 1 S 4^{18} 17^{16}, 2 S 5^{4} 15^{7}, 1 K 2^{11} 11^{42} 19^{8}, Ezk 4^{6} 29^{11-13}, Am 2^{10} 5^{25}, Jon 3^{4}, Ps 95^{10}, Neh 9^{21}, Mt 4^{2}, Ac 1^{3}; cf. the Egyp. and the Gr. parallels in Gn 50^{3} and Herodot. ii. 29, iii. 23, iv. 73. The psychological origin of the employment of these numbers lies in this, that naturally it was only approximately and by a familiar expression that one could or would indicate a smaller or a larger quantity. Cf. Adrianos, Εἰσαγωγὴ εἰς τὰς θείας γραφάς, § 85: 'Τὸν ἑπτὰ ἀριθμὸν ἐπὶ πλεονασμοῦ λέγει (ἡ γραφή).'

To the same category may be assigned also the numbers 'eighty' (3^{30}), 'twenty' (4^{3} 15^{20} 16^{31}; from 40+20 arose the 60 which in Jg 12^{7} is assigned by the LXX B, etc., as the length of the sway of Jephthah), 'ten' (6^{7} 12^{11}, cf. Gn 31^{7}, Lv 26^{26}, Nu 14^{22}, 1 S 1^{8} etc., Is 6^{13}, Am 5^{3} etc., the ten temptations of Abraham in the Book of Jubilees, ch. 19), and the 'fifty' which is read by LXX A, etc., in 3^{11} (cf. Gn 18^{24}, Jos 7^{21}, 1 S 6^{19} etc.). Also the number 'three' in the three years' reign of Abimelech (Jg 9^{22}) might bear the same character, because 'three' sometimes designates an approximate quantity (Gn 30^{36} $40^{10.\ 12}$ 42^{27}, Ex 2^{2} etc., Is 16^{14} 20^{3}, Jon 2^{1}, Est 4^{16}, Dn 1^{5}, 1 Ch 21^{12}). But then the history of Abimelech possesses in other respects many marks of exactitude (see above, 6 d, α). It is certainly, however, an unjustifiable procedure to include in this class of numbers the 'eighteen' of Jg 3^{14}, the 'twenty-three' of 10^{2}, or the 'twenty-two' read by a few Gr. minuscula MSS in 10^{2}, probably in imitation of the following number 22, the 'eighteen' of 10^{8}, the 'forty-two' of 12^{6}, the 'six' of 12^{7}, or the 'eight' of 12^{14}.*

This last procedure would be justifiable only upon the assumption that these numbers may be regarded as the arbitrarily chosen parts of a previously fixed total. In point of fact, the following observation has been made: the sum of the interregna ($3^{8.\ 14}$ 4^{3} 6^{1} 10^{8}: 8+18+20+7+18=71) almost exactly corresponds to the sum of the years of the so-called minor Judges ($10^{2f.}$ $12^{9.\ 11.\ 14}$: 23+22+7+10+8=70). Wellhausen, who was the first to note this correspondence (in Bleek's Introd.[4] p. 185, and in Prolegom.[2] p. 240), afterwards confessed (Comp. of Hex. p. 356) that he had no longer much faith in his former attempt. But Budde, in the Kurzer Hdcomm. (1897, p. xviii), still regards the observation as pertinent in spite of the difference of the two totals that are said to correspond with one another. But if a redactor of Jg had any thought of this correspondence, would he not have been capable of making it an exact one?

Hence the approximate character can be emphasized only in the case of the number 40 and its actual double (80) or its half (20). This is commended further by the following three considerations. The number 40 occurs with relatively great frequency as a round number (see the series of passages cited above). Further, the 480 years which, according to 1 K 6^{1}, elapsed between the Exodus and the beginning of the building of the temple (in the 4th year of Solomon's reign), are probably a product of 40×12. Again, the length of a generation (דּוֹר, Arab. dârun, lit. περίοδος) was probably, in the view of the Israelites, 40 years. For a generation, with few exceptions, was doomed to die in the wilderness (Nu $14^{22f.}$ 26^{64}), and this sojourn in the wilderness lasted for (about) 40 years (Nu $14^{33f.}$ $20^{22ff.}$ 32^{13} $33^{38f.}$, Dt 2^{7} 8^{2} 29^{5}, Jos 5^{6} etc.).† Besides, Bertheau (Comm.[2] p. xvi) rightly observes that in 1 Ch 5^{29-34} 6^{35-38} twelve generations are counted from Aaron to Ahimaaz the contemporary of David and Solomon. Kessler (Chronol. iudicum, etc. p. 12) remarks that no one can prove that twelve generations actually lived in the period from Moses to Solomon. But all we need is proof that Israelitish tradition ever reckoned twelve generations between a contemporary of Moses and a contemporary of Solomon, and this tradition is actually found in 1 Ch 5^{29-34} and 6^{35-38}. Consequently, it can be maintained with sufficient certainty that the chronology of the Bk. of Jg is a product of secondary combination in so far as the approximate number 40 (3^{11} 5^{31} 8^{28} 13^{1}), its double (3^{30}), and its half (4^{3} 15^{20}‖ 16^{31}), are employed as factors in this chronology (so, essentially, Bertheau, p. xiii; Oettli, p. 212; Moore, p. xli f.). Further, it appears to the present writer that the chronological problem of the Bk. of Jg has to be examined in the following direction:—(α) The number 480 (1 K 6^{1}) is an uncertain total, and cannot be used as the standard in estimating the chronological data of Jg. (β) The round numbers of Jg are really to be treated only as approximate figures equally with the 300 years which Jephthah (Jg 11^{26}) says elapsed between

* Budde (p. xx): 'die beiden Zahlen 18, die 23 und die 22 stellen leichte Abweichungen von 20 dar'; but even he (p. xviii) derives 'die von der Regel so weit abweichende Zahl 6 für Jephthah (127) aus einer Vorlage.'

† The round character of the number 40 has been contested by J. C. A. Kessler (Chronologia iudicum et primorum regum, 1882) in the words, 'fides historica numeri 40 annorum non dubia est; nam sæpius huius spatii partes commemorantur et in eo singuli anni vel menses numerantur: Dt 2^{14}, 2 S 5^{5}, 1 K 2^{11}, 1 Ch 29^{27}, Ex 19^{1}, Nu 10^{11} 20^{1}, Dt 13^{3}' (p. 12). But Röckerath (Bibl. Chronologie, 1865, p. 22) already remarks that the round numbers were partly supplied in place of numbers that had become indistinct, and in any case it is inadmissible to suppose that a period of 40 years could have emerged so frequently by accident.

Israel's entrance into Canaan and his own days. Hitherto no attempt (cf. Seder olam rabba, ed. Meyer, p. 384 f.) that has been made has succeeded in bringing this number 300 into harmony with the other chronological statements of Jg. (γ) Both the principles just stated appear to the present writer to be more correct than the view (Nöldeke, Untersuch. z. Kritik d. AT, p. 173 f.; Moore, p. xli; Budde, p. xviii) that an author of the Bk. of Jg did not count the years of foreign domination ($3^{8.\ 14}$ 4^{3} 6^{1} 10^{8}: 8+18+20+7+18=71 years) in addition to the years of rest, or the years of the hero who destroyed this foreign domination. This is at least not the meaning of the text of 3^{8-10}; for after it has been mentioned that the Israelites served Cushan-rishathaim 8 years (3^{8}), it is added by means of an imperf. consec. 'and (hence) the Israelites cried unto the LORD, and the LORD raised up a deliverer, etc. (v.^{9}), and (hence) the land had rest 40 years, and Othniel died' (v.^{10}). The exegesis which reckons the 8 years of the foreign domination to the years of Othniel, which, it is self-evident, could begin only with the shaking off of the foreign yoke, is not in harmony with the text although it was a favourite with Jewish interpreters.* As little is it the case in 3^{14}, for the 18 years during which Israel groaned under the yoke of the Moabites cannot be included in the 80 years of rest (3^{30}). Nor are the 20 years of oppression (4^{3}) reckoned among the 40 years of rest (5^{31}). As little are the 7 years of invasions by the Midianites (6^{1}) reckoned among the 40 years during which the Midianites could not lift up their heads, and the country was in quietness; and these forty years are expressly identified with the days of Gideon (8^{28}). And was Jephthah chosen to be leader at the beginning of the 18 years of the oppression (10^{8})? Then he must have long deferred his victory; and yet the text ($11^{4ff.\ 12ff.}$) presents the choice, the attack, and the victory of Jephthah as a continuous succession of incidents. Budde, indeed, says (p. xviii) that 'R^{P} has not counted the times of the foreign domination as elements in the chronology of his people.' But whence does he derive this conclusion? From the circumstance that in the case of the 'minor Judges' only the length of their office is noted; and that in $10^{1.\ 3}$ $12^{8.\ 11.\ 13}$ we find 'after him.' But it is by no means an unquestionable fact that this 'after him' is meant to indicate a 'lückenlose' succession. In any case it is a false generalizing from the data to attribute to the author of $10^{1.\ 3}$ $12^{8.\ 11.\ 13}$ the opinion that 'during the whole period of the judges, judge followed judge in direct succession.' And because of this opinion is he to be supposed to have rejected the years of foreign domination and to have replaced these by the years of the minor judges? As the text ($3^{8-10.\ 14}$ etc., see above) shows, he has neither rejected the one nor substituted the other, for the sum of the years of the foreign domination (71) and the sum of the years of the so-called minor Judges (70) are different. (δ) As little ground is there for the assumption that the Bk. of Jg meant several incidents to be synchronistic. The words 'he (the LORD) sold them into the hands of the Philistines and into the hands of the children of Ammon' (10^{7}), give only an appearance of right to the view that the invasion of the Ammonites ($10^{8ff.}$ $11^{4ff.}$) and that of the Philistines ($13^{1ff.}$) occurred at the same time. But in truth it is recorded in the Bk. of Jg that the attack of the Ammonites which, following the statement of 10^{7}, is described in $10^{8ff.}$ $11^{4ff.}$, was warded off by Jephthah, that then came the judges Ibzan, etc. ($12^{8ff.}$), and that the people of Israel on account of new unfaithfulness were oppressed by the invasion of the Philistines. For the text reads, 'and the children of Israel did evil again in the sight of the LORD, and the LORD delivered them into the hand of the Philistines' (13^{1}). Hence it is not the thought expressed in Jg itself (13^{1}) that is seized by Kessler, who, following Keil and others, again assigns to the same date the incidents related in 10^{8}–12^{15} and those spoken of in $13^{1ff.}$ (Chronol. iudicum, p. 29 f.). Now, the question might still arise, whether the order of events in the period of the judges was better known to the sources of the Bk. of Jg or to M. Vernes, who (p. 199) reproaches the 'auteur du livre des Juges' with having placed 'bout à bout des évènements qui ne s'enchaînent en aucune façon.' The present writer for his part prefers the order indicated in the Bk. of Judges.

(γ) Little as the round numbers of the Bk. of Jg positively point to a very late date, this is as little the case with the expression עַד יוֹם גָּלוּת הָאָרֶץ (18^{30}). It may indeed be somewhat bold to assume הארן as the original reading, and to find in this passage an allusion to the גלה which indirectly is asserted of the 'aron, 'ark (of the covenant)' in 1 S $4^{21f.}$. It is true that it is not precisely ארן of which the verb גלה is elsewhere predicated. This may, however, be accidental, for גלה has for subject not only the people (Is 5^{13}, Am 1^{5}), or Israel (Am $7^{11.\ 17}$, 2 K 17^{6} etc.), or persons in general (2 K 24^{24}, Mic 1^{6}, Ezk 12^{3} etc.), but also Judah (Jer 13^{19}, La 1^{3}, 2 K 25^{21} ‖ Jer 52^{27} etc.), or a city, as גלגל (Am 5^{5}) or Jerusalem (Jer 1^{3}) or Damascus (2 K 16^{9}).—Besides the period during which the descendants of Moses officiated as priests in Dan, in v.^{31} a period is named of the worship of Micah's graven image, namely, the period of the existence of the temple in Shiloh. There is no mention of this temple after the time of Eli (1 S 14^{3}). In Ps 78^{60} the overthrow of Shiloh is placed before the choosing of Mt. Zion (v.^{68}), and from Jer $7^{12.\ 14}$ it cannot be inferred that it was laid waste during the Assyrian wars (Moore, p. 369). Hence there is not such a serious departure from reality when in Dikdûkê ha-tĕ'amîm, § 70, it is said, 'on the day when Eli died, Shiloh was laid waste' (יום שָׁמַת עלי חרבה שילה). —What is now the meaning of the remark in v.^{31}, and why are the two dicta of v.^{30} and v.^{31} placed side by side? In v.^{31} it must be intended to say that the end of the cult of the graven image of Micah stood in a causal connexion with the destruction of the sanctuary of J″ at Shiloh, and the two notes of v.$^{30f.}$ would best harmonize if there was a reference to the destruction of the Shiloh sanctuary also in the words עד גלות וגו׳ (v.^{30}). Now, let it be observed that Eli died when he heard that the ark of the covenant was taken (1 S 4^{19-22}). But if, in spite of all this, it remains uncertain whether in Jg 18^{30} a statement which raised scruples was changed into an easier reading (cf. the interpolated ג in v.[31]),* yet the expression 'until the day of the exile of the land' does not point further down than the time when Tiglath-pileser 'took Kedesh, and Hazor, etc., and Galilee, all the land of Naphtali, and carried them captive to Assyria' (2 K 15[29]), i.e. about B.C. 734. And if this is the meaning of v.[30], then from the period of time indicated in v.[30] a shorter period is selected in v.[31]. For it was desired to add how long the cult of the graven image of Micah lasted, because this image was a principal subject in the preceding narrative.

* The words 'and after him (Joshua) [was raised up] Othniel, the son of Kenaz, forty years [but] subtract from them the eight years of the oppression under Cushan-rishathaim' (Seder olam rabba, ch. xii.), contradict the text of OT. But it is a very interesting circumstance that Seder o. r. does not always adopt the same exegesis. It does so with the 18 years of 3^{14}, and of the 40 years of 5^{31} two years are subtracted for the oppression of Jabin and Sisera (שני שעבוד לבין וסיסרא ב׳ שנים); but after the mention of the 40 years of Gideon it is expressly said 'and (=but) the 7 years of Midian (6^{1}) are not reckoned to them' (ושבע שני מדין לא עלו מחוכן). Further, how is one to explain the statement, 'from Othniel to the death of Samson are 324 years'? (Dik. ha-tĕ'amîm, § 70 מעתניאל עד שָׁמַת שבשין שלוש מאות ועשרים וארבע שנים). The numbers 40+80+40+40+23+22+6+7+10+8+20 ($3^{11.\ 30}$ 5^{31} 8^{28} $10^{2f.}$ $12^{7f.\ 11.\ 14}$ 15^{20} ‖ 16^{31}) make up a total of only 296 years. But if 28 be added, the number 324 is obtained. May we perhaps have recourse to the 28 years which in Seder olam rabba (ch. xii.) are attributed to Joshua? At the end of § 70 of Dikdûkê comes the statement, 'from Othniel to the rise of Eli as judge were 324 years.' But this also occasions an insoluble problem. Neither of these dicta of Jewish tradition is either noticed or explained in any of the helps accessible to the present writer (Biblia Heb. et Rabbin.; Seder olam rabba; Jewish and modern commentaries).

(δ) In the middle of the second episode of Jg (chs. 19–21), where, e.g., we read 'Jebus which is Jerusalem' (19[10], cf. 2 S 5[6ff.]), Wellhausen (Comp. 233 ff.) and some others discover a passage of very late origin, namely, 20[1]–21[14]. What opinion are we to form of this? Now, in any case, this section must have displaced another narrative, for between the end of ch. 19 and 21[15] there is a lacuna. But common action on the part of the Israelites was not impossible shortly after the death of Joshua. Let us consider, in addition to what has been said above (6 d, δ), the story of the building of an altar beside Jordan (Jos 22[10ff.]). Was this not a protest on the part of the Israelites settled on the east of Jordan against the idea of separation from their nation? And does the unity of the Israelites, which shows itself in 1 S 7[2ff.] 8[4ff.] 11[3] ('that we may send messengers unto all the coasts of Israel'), etc., ever appear as a new phenomenon? The present writer believes that there are more traces of the unity of ancient Israel than are wont at present to be recognized by some scholars. Were there not 'elders' in Israel before Samuel? (1 S 8[4ff.]). Could these not then assemble themselves on account of the unheard of scandal perpetrated by a Benjamite city (Jg 20[1]), as readily as in connexion with the choice of a king? (1 S 8[4b]). It is quite true the expression mishkab zakhar (cf. 'that hath not lain by man') is found only in Nu 31[17f.] and Jg 21[11f.]; but this is no proof of the late origin of the latter verse, for the expression in question had very probably also an earlier existence. Hence the judgment of the present writer is that not the section 20[1]–21[14] as a whole, but only single elements in it bear a secondary character. Such elements are, above all, the round numbers like 400,000 (20[17]), and there is no department where hyperbole more readily comes in than the department of numbers. We do not believe that tradition required many centuries—for Budde's R[P] wrote 'perhaps about the year 400' (p. xvi)—in order to create these figures.

(ε) Only legend, and not mythology, has played a rôle in the filling out of the history of Samson. Traces of the so-called 'Folk-lore' are probably to be found, e.g., in the thirty men (14[19]), the 300 jackals (15[4]), and the 1000 men (v.[15f.]) whom he slew with the jawbone of an ass. Nay, it is not improbable that this exploit of Samson and the name Ramath-lehi, i.e. 'height of jaw,' are connected with each other. Rather may this deed of Samson's have been simply placed here, for the localizing activity of popular tradition shows itself elsewhere, or the narrative of the deed may even have been occasioned by the name of the place. The same is probably the case with the story of 'En-hakkôrē (15[18f.]), in which the two homonyms kôrē', 'partridge,' and kôrē', 'caller,' appear to be mixed up. But, all the same, the Samson narratives are no product of mythology. The mythological explaining away of the person of Samson is discountenanced even by M. Vernes (Hist. juive, p. 238 f.); and as we have quoted from him several statements which appear to be unfounded, it is but right that we should quote a passage of which we can thoroughly approve. He says, 'l'interprétation mythologique de l'histoire de Samson échoue au port; sans compter qu'on ne sait trop comment y faire rentrer l'aventure du lion et de l'essaim d'abeilles, des chacals, de la mâchoire, de la porte de Gaza, c'est-à-dire ce qui précède les ruses et le succès de Dalila, le Samson du dernier épisode ne saurait être tenu pour le jeune soleil du printemps. S'il se sert, en effet, du retour de sa vigueur pour triompher de ses adversaires (les ténèbres, l'hiver?), il succombe lui-même sous cet effort, et si les deux piliers du temple doivent être tenus pour les colonnes d'Hercule, elles sont mises à une très mauvaise place.'

7. The Author of the Book.—The author of Jg is not named in the book itself. In the Talmud (Baba bathra 14[b]) it is said, 'Samuel wrote (or edited [the sense of the verb kāthab is examined in König's Einleitung, p. 445]) his book and the Bk. of Jg and the Bk. of Ruth' (cf. Marx-Dalman, Traditio rabbinorum veterrima, p. 14). Similarly in Dikdûkê ha-ṭe'amîm, p. 57, it is said, שמואל הנביא כתב ספרו וספר שופטים ורות וזכרו לברכה. But the tradition which becomes fixed in Baba bathra 14 f. is of such late origin, and contains such absolutely impossible elements (see the whole passage in König's Einleitung, p. 445 f.), that on these grounds alone no weight can be attached to it. But it is further shown by the above (No. 6) discussion to be an impossible position.

8. The Spirit of the Book and its place in the History of Revelation.—Of more importance is it to examine the spirit that pervades the Bk. of Jg, to draw the picture which, framed in this book, exhibits to us a momentous period in the development of Israel. What are the leading features of this picture?

(α) The period of the judges was a time of local settlement and physical self-assertion on the part of Israel. When this people had shaken off the Egyptian yoke—which the Israelites can never have invented as a factor in their history—and were on the point of conquering the homeland of their forefathers, they encountered a uniformly violent opposition. Nevertheless, it is unquestionable that the Israelites under Joshua's leadership gained some fundamental victories. The positive tradition to this effect (Jos 6–11) is not upset by any statement to the contrary effect.

The story of the defeat of the northern Canaanites (Jos 11[10-14]) may contain some natural hyperboles (e.g. 'neither left they any to breathe'), but when these are set aside, the narrative is not set aside. Further, the statements, 'nevertheless the children of Israel expelled not the Geshurites,' etc. (Jos 13[13] 15[13-19. 63] 16[10] 17[11-18] 18[3ff.] 23[4ff.]), and the parallel statements of Jg 1[19ff.] presuppose that the foundation was laid for the conquest of Canaan, otherwise they would have neither motive nor meaning. These statements add nothing but this, that in the time of Joshua, within the conquered kingdoms, many districts still retained their independence. The interposing of these sentences shows also in what sense the partition of the land is to be understood (Jos 13[1ff.]). The territories which were assigned to the different tribes are thought of not as places of quiet possession, but rather as meant to be completely subdued. The sense of Jos 13[1-13] etc., is not that 'la terre promise est considérée comme une table rase' (M. Vernes, Essais bibliques, p. 297). Finally, neither in Jos 14[6-15] nor in Jg 1[1ff.] is the idea contained that the different tribes of Israel only in an isolated fashion made their attacks upon Canaan (Budde, Richt. u. Sam. 1890, p. 84, Hdcomm. 1897, p. 2). Budde himself admits (ad loc.) 'the remote possibility' that in Jg 1^{22} 'a short word about Ai' has fallen out. This 'word about Ai,' however, has not fallen out, nor was it a 'short' one (cf. Jos $7^{5ff.}$ 8^{1-29}). It is a groundless assertion that the record of Jg 1 'excludes' the narrative of the Bk. of Jos, and that the Jg narrative is the 'older' (Budde, 1897, p. 2. Charles Piepenbring [Hist. 1898, p. 69] accepts but does not prove this thesis). If the narrative of Jg $1^{1a\beta b.\ 2f.\ 5-7}$ etc. (Budde, 1897, p. xxii), had been the older and the only correct one (Budde, p. 2), how then could Judah speak of 'his lot'? (1^3). 'The narrative, according to v.^{3}, presupposes an earlier division by lot of the yet unconquered land,' as Budde himself (p. 1) has to notice; and Charles Piepenbring says (p. 75) on Jos $18^{2-6.\ 8-10}$: 'Nous y rencontrons une nouvelle preuve qu'on assigna d'avance, par le sort, aux différentes tribus, le territoire que chacune devait conquérir'; cf. the words of Budde on Jg 18^1 'es ist Dan wohl ein Gebiet zugefallen, aber es hat sich nicht darin behaupten können, und dass dieses nicht blosse Theorie ist, beweisen die danitischen Reste in den südlichen Wohnsitzen, die uns in der Samsongeschichte begegnen.' A positive representation that Canaan was thus divided is also implied in other passages of Jg 1. Finally, the 'older' narrative contained in Jg 1 is pronounced to be also the 'historically more credible' (Budde, p. 2). But is it, in point of fact, probable that the tribes of Israel, which under Joshua's lead crossed the Jordan, should not have attacked with their whole force the common foe, in order to inflict upon him some decided defeats? To what end, then, is the narrative (Nu $32^{28ff.}$, Dt 3^{18-20}, Jos 1^{12-16} 22^{1-6}) invented of how the tribes of Reuben, etc., which had their settlements east of the Jordan, crossed this river with the other Israelites, and did not return until the opposition of the western Canaanites was — essentially — broken? Joshua led the host only until the conquest of Jericho (Jos $6^{\S}$; so Budde, p. 1). Did he, then, withdraw from the leadership of Israel? This is 'historically credible.' But if this was really the case, why will Budde (p. 11) substitute 'and Joshua was with them' for the traditional 'and Jahweh was with them'? (Jg 1^{22}). And if the existence of Joshua was assumed in the narrative of Jg 1, would he have been mentioned in this passim fashion?

The truth lies in the middle position, and this true relation of things is exhibited in Jos and Jg; in spite of the foundation-laying victories gained under the lead of Joshua over the inhabitants of Canaan, some centuries were still needed to make the Israelites complete masters of Canaan (Jg $1^{19.\ 21}$ etc.).

(b) The need for external or political conflict was coupled with the task of spiritual self-assertion on the part of Israel against the genius of the Canaanitish nation. The period that followed the migration to Canaan was for the Hebrews the time of the severest struggle of ideas. For it was then that the danger was greatest that Israel should lose the consciousness of her uniqueness, seeing that many tribes with other conceptions and ideas dwelt in her midst. (Cf. on this contrast, e.g. Pietschmann, Gesch. der Phön. p. 292 f.; Niebuhr, Gesch. des ebr. Zeitalters, p. 317 ff.; Winckler, Gesch. Isr. p. 133[1]; Wildeboer, Jahvedienst en Volksreligie in Israël, 1898, p. 10 ff. But when Piepenbring (Hist. etc. 1898, p. 96) remarks, 'au moment où les Hébreux s'emparèrent de la Palestine, les Cananéens leur étaient bien supérieurs sous le rapport de la culture,' he must be thinking merely of outward culture, such as the art of building cities, the art of war, etc.).

During this period the great matter was to defend the heritage of religious ideas and moral principles to which Israel had fallen heir (see above, 6 d, β, δ). The men who were then called to deliver the people belonged to the category of true souls by whom the most important prerogatives of the Jahweh religion were maintained. Then did Gideon defend the monolatry of Jahweh against the adoration of the Canaanite Baal ($6^{11ff.}$). The same hero kept unimpaired the principle (8^{23}) that Israel was under the rule only of a heavenly king (Jahweh, Ex 15^{18}). He pre-eminently exhibits the characteristic which ben-Sirach attributes to the judges when he says, καὶ οἱ κριταί, ἕκαστος τῷ αὐτοῦ ὀνόματι, ὅσων οὐκ ἐξεπόρνευσε ἡ καρδία, καὶ ὅσοι οὐκ ἀπεστράφησαν ἀπὸ Κυρίου, εἴη τὸ μνημόσυνον αὐτῶν ἐν εὐλογίαις, κ.τ.λ. (Sir $46^{11f.}$). Then was the conscience of the nation of Israel sufficiently awake to stir them up to energy when danger threatened that the Canaanite immorality (Gn $9^{23.\ 26b}$ $19^{5ff.}$ 34^{2b}, Lv 18^{25} etc.) might gain a footing in Israel (Jg 19^{30} 20^{6b}).

True, indeed, all the acts of the Israel of those days cannot bear to be tried by the standard of an enlightened humanity, or the ideal of evangelical Christianity. We shudder at the cutting off of thumbs and great toes (Jg 1^6). But not only were the Athenians once guilty of the same conduct towards Æginetan prisoners (Ælian, Var. Hist. ii. 9), but even the Christian Abyssinians of our own day are given to this terrible practice (cf. Flad, Zwölf Jahre in Abessinien, etc.). Moreover, in the pre-Christian history of Divine revelation, stages of progress are not wanting; cf. e.g. on the history of prophecy (1 S 9^9), or the Divine name (Ex $6^{2f.}$, 1 S 1^3, Is 1^4, Hos 2^{18}), or the idea of retaliation (Ex 20^5, Jer 31^{29}, Ezk 18^{20}). Although then a Deborah had not advanced to the stage of an Isaiah, and although a Samson (cf. on the Nazirites, Am 2^{12}) did not stand upon the same plane as the Sermon on the Mount (Jg 16^{28} compared with Mt 5^{44}), yet the Bk. of Jg stands, not without right, in the series of the nĕbî'îm (Dikdûkê, § 70, etc.). This book is a monument of that Divine Providence which sustained the people of Israel, so that they maintained their national existence, and during a time of the strongest temptations kept safe their religious-moral ideals, which had a most important end to serve in pointing to the perfect religion and morality.

JUDGING (Ethical).—The practice of judging, against which we have so many warnings in the NT, consists not so much in the characterizing of particular actions or modes of life, as in making these the basis for a sweeping, and, in some cases, a final verdict on the character of those to whom they are rightly or wrongly attributed. The warnings are given in the interests both of the critic and the criticized. The practice is equally hurtful to both, and therefore if it is not absolutely condemned, it is surrounded by so many safeguards and limitations as to be practically forbidden. On the one hand it is an infringement of the royal law (Ja 2^{13}), on the other, it stands in the way of that self-criticism which is necessary to amendment of morals and progress in religion (Mt 7^{3}). The chief objection to judging, however, is that it must be based on partial knowledge; we are necessarily ignorant of the inner life, the motives and principles of other men; we are not acquainted either with the antecedent conditions of their actions, or the possibilities of justification, or progress, or amendment, that their future may contain. This is the position taken up by Jesus Christ in opposition to Jewish legalists. He declared that the latter judged according to appearance (Jn 7^{24}), according to the flesh (Jn 8^{15}). As their religion consisted in the performance of certain prescribed duties, and the avoidance of outward offences, they had a rough and ready standard by which to estimate character. Christ and St. Paul had a more righteous because more complete standard; they took into account the inner thoughts and motives, and, knowing the complexity of these, deliberately refrained from judging, even where the outward evidence seemed absolutely convincing (Jn 8^{11}, 1 Co 4^{5}). One last motive in the prohibition of judging must not be overlooked. It was necessary to exercise patience and forbearance, not only in the interests of the individual, but in those of the Church. This is at least indirectly taught in the Parable of the Tares (Mt 13^{24}), which cannot be limited exclusively to ecclesiastical discipline, and it is a prominent motive with St. Paul. It appears especially in his treatment of the 'strong' and 'weak' parties in Rome (Ro 14), and of the rival possessors of gifts in Corinth (1 Co 13). In one word, while self-judgment is enjoined, the judgment of others is discountenanced throughout the NT. J. MILLAR.

JUDGMENT.—1. The truth that God will come to the world for judgment is part of the burden of OT prophecy. The rule of God, partially realized over Israel in the days of the prophets, is destined to be made perfect, and it is to extend over all the nations of the earth. This consummation will necessitate a 'day of the Lord,' i.e. a judgment of the faithless in the chosen nation and of the heathen (Is 2^{12}, Jl 1^{15} 2^{1} etc.); but Israel will be saved and enjoy the blessings of a new and everlasting covenant (Is 61^{8}, Jer $31^{31ff.}$ etc.). See Day of the Lord, under ESCHATOLOGY, vol. i. pp. 735 ff.

2. When in later times the belief in a resurrection of the dead was developed (Dn 12^{2}), till in the time of Christ it was firmly rooted in the minds of all but the Sadducees, our Lord revealed a great universal judgment of the living and the dead, the issue, represented in figurative and therefore indeterminate speech, being now the establishment of the Messianic kingdom on earth, now the complete transformation of all that at present appears, and the advent of new heavens and a new earth. The people of Christ will be called in the judgment to an everlasting participation in the glories of His heavenly kingdom, and His enemies will have the sentence of eternal condemnation pronounced on them (Mt $13^{36ff.}$ $47ff.$ 25, Mk 13, Lk 21).

3. In accordance with the spiritual nature of the kingdom of God, and with the fact that it is even now begun on earth, we find, especially in the Johannine writings, that the judgment in one aspect or stage of it is a present act. For judgment Christ is come into this world (Jn 9^{39}). There is an actual separation of men in progress here and now, and to a great extent they themselves may see that there is nothing arbitrary in the awards which are made; the spiritual blessings bestowed on the one hand and the mental sufferings or want endured on the other, commend themselves to the enlightened conscience as just and inevitable. Christ is as a present light in the world, discerning between the souls of men, attracting and gladdening some, those who do truth, and repelling others who do evil, multiplying for them the pains of darkness, hatred, and sin (Jn $3^{18ff.}$ 12^{31}). The former are called even now to everlasting life (Jn 3^{36} 6^{47}, 1 Jn 3^{14}), and should know that they have it (1 Jn 5^{13}); the latter know not life, but abide in death, and have an immediate experience of the wrath of God (Jn 3^{36}, 1 Jn $3^{14f.}$ 5^{12}).

4. This judgment, which is in progress now, is destined to be perfected, though there is necessarily obscurity as to the future existence. In the last assize Christ will be the Judge as before (Mt $25^{31ff.}$, Ac 10^{42} 17^{31}, 2 Co 5^{10}, 2 Ti 4^{1}). Mankind will all appear before His judgment-seat. The righteous will thus have in His presence a perfect vision and possession of the goodness they have chosen in Him (2 Ti 4^{8}, 1 Jn 3^{2}); the wicked will see with dismay into what an abyss of sin and woe they have fallen (Rev 1^{7}). It may be said men will hereafter judge themselves. Those who are unlike Christ will find themselves as such to be separate from Him. The two classes of people are parted because they have acquired distinct natures like the sheep and the goats (Mt $25^{31ff.}$). The future judgment will thus be 'just,' determined by what people made of themselves when they were in the body (2 Co 5^{10}). Or the books will be opened, and men will be judged out of those things which are written in the books, according to their works (Rev 20^{12}). The character of each person is a 'book' or record, preserving, in moral and spiritual effects, all that he has been and done and loved; and in the judgment these books will be 'opened,' or each man's character will be manifested as the light of Christ falls upon it. The people of Christ themselves receive different awards at the last, according to what their life has been (Lk $19^{11ff.}$, 1 Co $3^{12ff.}$). A test like fire will try every believer's work. Some have acquired a close likeness to Christ by their lives of true holiness and love; and the greater the likeness, the more He will be known, loved, and enjoyed, or the richer they themselves will be.

G. FERRIES.

JUDGMENT HALL is the AV translation in Jn $18^{28.\ 33}$ and Ac 23^{35} of the Greek πραιτώριον, though this word contains no reference to judging. In the RV it is rendered 'palace' or 'prætorium.' See PRÆTORIUM.

JUDGMENT SEAT.—The usual word employed for this in the NT is βῆμα (Mt 27^{19}, Jn 19^{13}, Ac $18^{12.\ 16f.}$ $25^{6.\ 10.\ 17}$, Ro 14^{10}, 2 Co 5^{10}), properly a 'tribune.' Two of these were provided in the law-courts of Greece, one for the accuser and one for the defendant (cf. Liddell and Scott's Greek Lexicon under βῆμα), but in the NT the word is used of the official seat (tribunal) of the Roman judge. The word κριτήριον used in Ja 2^{6} occurs also in 1 Co $6^{2.\ 4}$, where it is translated in RVm by 'tribunals.' See, further, art. GABBATHA.

JUDITH (יְהוּדִית 'Ιουδίν, 'Ιουδίθ, 'Ιουδείθ).—1. A wife of Esau, daughter of Beeri the Hittite (Gn 26^{34}) (cf. Gn 36^{2}, and see OHOLIBAMAH).

2. Heroine of the BOOK OF JUDITH; daughter of Merari, of the tribe of Simeon (8^{1} [cf. Nu 1^{6}] 9^{2}); widow of Manasses of the same tribe. See following article. F. C. PORTER.

JUDITH, BOOK OF.—1. CONTENTS.—The story of the Book of Judith in the LXX is as follows:—Nebuchadnezzar, king of the Assyrians in Nineveh, in his 12th year made war against Arphaxad king of the Medes, summoning all nations to his aid; and in his 17th year was victorious and destroyed the Median capital, Ecbatana. The next year he sent Holofernes with 132,000 men to take vengeance on the western lands which had refused to come to his help. Holof. laid waste the lands of those who resisted, and required the destruction of their sanctuaries and gods, and the sole worship of Nebuchadnezzar. The Jews feared for Jerusalem and the temple, just reconsecrated after their recent return from exile. Joakim, the high priest, and the Sanhedrin resolved upon resistance, and ordered the fortifying of certain mountain towns of Samaria which commanded the entrance into Judæa from the north. The people gave themselves to fasting and prayer. An Ammonite general, Achior, warned Holofernes, with an appeal to history, that the God of heaven protected this people unless they sinned against him, and for his counsel was delivered to the enemy. Bethulia was the point of attack, and upon the issue of its siege depended the fate of the Jewish land and religion. The three elders of the city, Ozias, Chabris, and Charmis, yielded to the demand of the famished people and promised surrender after five days. Judith, a rich young widow of the tribe of Simeon, confident of the righteousness of her people, believed that God would deliver them by her hand. Prepared by prayer, and protected by strict observance of legal rites, she made her way to Holofernes, predicted the speedy destruction of her people because she foresaw that in their hunger they would eat unclean and consecrated food, captivated him by her deceits and by her beauty, and beheaded him as he lay in a drunken stupor after a banquet in her honour. 'Her beauty took his soul prisoner; the scimitar passed through his neck.' She returned with the head to Bethulia. Achior recognized it, and at sight of it was converted to Judaism. Confusion and fear fell upon the leaderless army of the Assyrians, and the Jews slaughtered them in their flight and gained great spoils. Judith was richly rewarded and honoured, and in a song celebrated the deliverance. Peace reigned during her long life of 105 years, and for a long time after.

2. TEXTS AND VERSIONS.—The LXX text exists in three recensions, (1) B A ℵ, etc., the ruling text; (2) cod. 58, to which Old Lat. and Syriac are closely related; (3) cod. 19, 108, similar to (2).

A Hebrew original is commonly accepted, not only on the ground of Hebraisms in language and ideas, but also because of errors of translation (see 1^{8} 2^{2} $3^{1.\ 8.\ 9.\ 10}$ 4^{3} 8^{21} $11^{7.\ 11}$ $16^{3.\ 17}$, Fritzsche, Ball). Origen, indeed, says that he learned from Jews that they did not possess Tobit and Judith even among their 'Apocrypha' (Ep. ad Afric. 13), and there are no allusions to Jth in the older rabbinical literature. Yet it does not follow that the later Jewish versions are retranslations from the Greek. If the story had an independent history among Jews it is historically important to trace it. Jerome is the first witness to a Heb. (Aram.) original, and his testimony deserves attention.

The Vulgate.—Jerome (Pref. to Jth.) says that the Hebrews had Jth among their Apocrypha, and reckoned it among histories. His Jth he affirms to be a translation of this 'Chaldee' version, which he regarded as the original. He put into Latin 'only those things which a sound understanding could find in the Chaldee words.' His work was indeed hastily done, in one night, and carelessly, 'aiming to give sense for sense rather than word for word.' Probably, as in the case of Tobit, an interpreter rendered the Chaldee into Hebrew, and Jerome dictated a Latin version of the Heb. to a scribe. He, of course, had the Old Lat. before him.

Jerome's testimony is commonly set aside, and it is assumed, after Fritzsche, that his modifications of the Old Lat. were mainly arbitrary, and that we can know nothing of his Chaldee text. Is this a just verdict? The Vulg., in comparison with the Old Lat. and Greek, omits many geographical details (e.g. LXX 2^{28} $3^{9.\ 10}$ $4^{4.\ 6}$ 15^{4}) and many concrete incidents (e.g. LXX $1^{13\text{-}16}$ $2^{7\text{-}10}$ $7^{6.\ 17\text{-}19.\ 32}$ $10^{20.\ 3b.\ 9.\ 10b.\ 17.\ 18.\ 20.\ 22}$ $11^{3b.\ 4}$ $12^{3b.\ 15b}$ $14^{8.\ 9}$ 15^{11b} 16^{24b}, and parts of $8^{2.\ 3.\ 6.\ 29.\ 31}$ 9^{1} $13^{12.\ 13}$ $14^{2.\ 3.\ 11.\ 12}$ $15^{12.\ 13}$). Jth.'s achievement is made less sensuous and more simply religious in character (cf. LXX 10^{4} 11^{17} $12^{13.\ 15.\ 16}$). The deceptions are less bald (LXX $11^{5\text{-}7}$ 13^{3}). Homiletical additions are made (Vulg. $4^{10\text{-}13}$ $5^{11\text{-}15}$ $9^{6\text{-}8}$ $5^{16\text{-}19}$, parts of $6^{12\text{-}21}$ $7^{19\text{-}22}$ $8^{21\text{-}26}$). Changes such as these mark a secondary form of the story. But are they due to Jerome? Against that supposition it is to be argued, (1) that it was not his way to edit, but to translate; (2) that he did not in this case take time for such revision. It is therefore probable, apart from the confirmation of the Midrash, that even such deviations of Vulg. from LXX as these were due in the main to the Chaldee version. Still more probable is this in the few cases of additional concrete detail (Vulg. $7^{6.\ 7}$ 11^{11} $14^{9\text{-}12}$ 16^{31}).

Further, it is probable that in Jerome's Chaldee, Bethulia was identified with Jerusalem. The Vulg. never gives a clear description of the situation of Bethulia (cf. LXX $4^{6.\ 7}$ $6^{7.\ 10.\ 11}$ 7^{3} 8^{3} 10^{13} 11^{2}); it omits or changes all passages which clearly distinguish Bethulia and Jerusalem up to 15^{9} (cf. LXX $4^{6.\ 7}$ 11^{19} 11^{13} 15^{8}; and Vulg. omits LXX $8^{21.\ 22.\ 24}$ 9^{1b} $11^{14.\ 15}$). Further, Vulg. contains some positive suggestions that Jerusalem is the besieged city (Vulg. 3^{14} [cf. LXX $3^{9.\ 10}$] $7^{3.\ 6.\ 7.\ 9}$ 15^{4},; and Ozias is 'prince of Judah,' Vulg 8^{34} 13^{23}). Only in 15^{9} and perhaps $16^{22\text{-}25}$ does Vulg. require the distinction. This suggests that the identification is not due to Jerome but to his source.

Hebrew Versions.—The story of Jth exists in several forms in Hebrew, none of them from early sources (Jellinek, Beth ha-Midrasch, i. 130–141, ii. 12 ff. [translations in Lipsius, Zeitschr. f. wissens. Theol. (1867), p. 337 ff.; Ball in Wace's Apocrypha, i. p. 252 ff.; Scholz, Commentar, 2 ed., Anhang i. and ii.]; Gaster, 'An unknown Hebrew Version of the History of Jth' [PSBA (1894), p. 156 ff.]). Lipsius distinguishes two forms of the story, one of which is closely related to our book. In both the scene is Jerusalem, the time that of the Maccabæan wars. Judith is in some way related to the Hasmonæan house. It is Nicanor who is beheaded; and the deed is celebrated in connexion with the Feast of Dedication. Names are often omitted, and details vary widely. The long Midrash (Jellinek, ii. 12–22; Scholz, Anhang i.) summarizes chs. 1–5 briefly, but in chs. 7–14 follows the Vulgate so closely that a relationship between them is certain.* The indications of the Chaldee original in the Vulg. pointed out above are strongly confirmed by this version. The phenomena would be explained by supposing that the Midrash is a later form of Jerome's Chaldee text, still less concrete, still more general and homiletical in character. Jerusalem entirely displaces Bethulia; Holofernes is king of Greece, and Nebuch. disappears; Chabris and Charmis are priests, Ozias is prince of Israel (= Vulg. 13^{23}), and Joakim is not mentioned.

The older Form.—Scholz argues for the greater originality of the Vulgate against the LXX, and

* Vulg. and Midrash agree, i.e., in omissions (LXX $7^{17\text{-}19.\ 32}$ $8^{21\text{-}23.\ 24b}$ 9^{1} $10^{9.\ 10f.}$ 17a. 18. 22 $11^{4.\ 14}$ 12^{13b} $15^{3.\ 4.\ 5.\ 11b}$) and in additions (Vulg. $6^{16\text{-}18}$ $7^{6.\ 10.\ 11.\ 19\text{-}22}$ $8^{23\text{-}25}$ $9^{6\text{-}8}$ $10^{16\text{-}18.\ 20}$ $11^{12.\ 14.\ 15}$ 12^{6} $13^{6.\ 16.\ 23}$ $14^{7.\ 8\text{-}14}$), as well as in a multitude of lesser details.

of the short Midrash (Jellinek, i. 130 f.; Lipsius, p. 355 f.; Ball, p. 252 f.; Scholz, Anh. ii.) against the long. So Gaster confidently claims originality for his Hebrew version, and is followed with surprising unreserve by Cornill (Einl. in d. AT[4], p. 272). 'It seems undoubted that here lies the simplest and most original form of the story, out of which the Greek romance grew' (cf. Ginsburg). But is the simple always the original form of a story? Gaster's argument, 'If it were an abridged text, names and situations would have been retained, and only the rhetorical portions omitted,' substitutes the interests of a modern historian for those of an ancient story-teller. On the other hand, in favour of the greater originality of the LXX version, apart from the general fact of its far greater age, it is to be urged that it is more natural to suppose (1) that elaborate but not especially significant geographical and historical details, aside from the main story, should be omitted rather than added by later editors; (2) that edifying and rhetorical embellishments, speeches, prayers, etc., should be added, not omitted; (3) that references to the Maccabæan period should be added, not removed to give place to an impossible or an unknown historical setting; (4) that the scene should be changed from Bethulia to Jerusalem, not the reverse; (5) that Greeks should take the place of Assyrians as Israel's enemy; (6) that Jth.'s lineage should be changed from the tribe of Simeon to the family of the Hasmonæans, not the reverse; and perhaps that she should be first a widow, afterwards a maiden. (She is a widow in the long Midrash).

The originality claimed for the LXX, or its Hebrew text, is, however, relative. The story may have had a long previous history.

3. PLACE OF THE STORY.—Bethulia (Betylua) cannot, in the LXX, mean Jerusalem. Its situation is so well described (in Northern Samaria, near Dothan, $4^{6.7}$; cf. $3^{9.10}$ 5^{1} $6^{7.10.11}$ $7^{3.18}$ 8^{3}) that few doubt its existence, though it is not otherwise known. 'To hold it for a pure fiction belongs to the gross fictions of the learned' (Fritzsche). 'He would not have built his story geographically in the air' (Schürer). It is as clearly distinguished from Jerusalem as words permit ($4^{2.6.7}$ $8^{21.24}$ 11^{19} $15^{5.8}$ $16^{18.20.21.23}$, cf. 8^{3}).

4. TIME OF THE STORY.—The historical setting of the LXX is impossible. Nineveh and Assyria fell 608 B.C. Nebuch., king of the Chaldæans in Babylon, destroyed Jerusalem in his 18th year (586), and died 562. The return from exile was not before 536, and the rebuilding of the temple was in 520–516. But the confusion of these events could hardly be due to ignorance. What Jew would not know the place of Nebuch. in relation to the Assyrians and to the Exile? It is possible that a copyist or translator put familiar biblical names in the place of names strange to him (Kaulen). It is also possible that the author used Nebuch. and the Assyrians as symbols, and that he meant to tell (1) no history at all but a story ('poem,' Luther), teaching that Judah is safe from all enemies if it keeps the law; or (2) future history prophetically set forth (an apocalypse, Scholz); or (3) present or recent history disguised under significant names. Thus Volkmar (1860) elaborately defended the equations: Nebuch. = Trajan, Nineveh = Rome (or Antioch), Medes = Parthians, Ecbatana = Nisibis, Holofernes = Lusius Quietus, etc. But the parallels are forced, and 'the arguments which place the Epistle of Clem. in the 1st cent. are a hundredfold stronger than those which place the Bk. of Jth in the second' (Lightfoot). More commonly the Maccabæan history is found veiled in our story. Ball suggests (not always consistently) that Nebuch. = Antiochus IV., Assyrians = Syrians, Holofernes = Nicanor, Arphaxad = Arsaces, Medes = Parthians, Jth = Judas, Bethulia = Jerusalem, Joakim = Alcimus, etc. He says, 'The Bk. of Jth is a free composition in the manner of the Haggada, principally based upon recollections of the facts of the heroic Judas, and more especially upon the facts related in 1 Mac 3^{27}–4^{61} 6^{1-7} 7^{26-50}, 2 Mac 9^{1-3} 10^{1-8} 15' (cf. Holtzmann, Neutest. Zeitgeschichte, 16). But the book does not readily yield to allegorical treatment. If it was written in the reign of Alexandra (B.C. 79–70) concerning the Maccabæan wars (Ball), why is the scene Bethulia, not Jerusalem? why are Judith and Ozias Simeonites? why should Judas and his exploits be so completely veiled in a book meant to glorify him and his house?

In fact, the indications of the Maccabæan age are of a general and doubtful character. The history 'points to a time when danger threatened not only the people but also its faith. . . . This reminds us of Daniel and the Maccabæan period' (Schürer). The ritualism of the book has some late marks (8^{6}). The high priest did not command Samaria (4^{4-6}; cf. $15^{5.8}$) until John Hyrcanus. Hellenistic cities were not independent after the Roman period. But, on the other hand, a writer may attempt to describe past conditions, and may make mistakes in doing so. This writer professes to tell of a time long past (14^{10} 16^{25}). That he wrote in the late Maccabæan or in the Roman period is quite probable. That he wrote primarily of the Maccabæan wars there is little sign.

Schürer now (Herzog[3], 1896) attaches importance to an early view, not mentioned in his HJP. 'The presupposed historical background answers more to the time of Artaxerxes Ochus. In one of his expeditions against Phœnicia and Egypt, about B.C. 350, he took also some Jewish prisoners, and among his most conspicuous generals in that campaign were the satrap (king) Holofernes of Cappadocia and the eunuch Bagoas.' Sulpicius Severus (Chron. ii. 14–16) first argued that Jth was an actual history of that time. Gutschmid (Jhb. f. Klas. Phil. 1863, p. 714) says, 'Severus seems to me to have proved as much as this, that the author of the Bk. of Jth actually meant to put her history in the time of Ochus' (so Nöldeke; Keil; W. R. Smith, OTJC[2] 439; Wellhausen, Isr. u. Jüd. Gesch. 186). True, Holofernes was the title of other Cappadocian kings (Ball), but no other is known to have had anything to do with the Jews (Keil). True also that Bagoas is Persian for 'eunuch.' Yet force remains in the association of the two names in Jth and in this historical assault upon Judæa under the king of the great Eastern empire. It is possible, then, that the writer lived in the 1st cent. B.C. and wrote of an event three centuries earlier. It would be possible then to think of a century or more of peace after the deliverance (16^{25} (cf. [23])), and to speak of the return from exile as recent (4^{3} $5^{18.19}$). There was no king (5^{3}), and the Joiakim of Neh $12^{10.26}$ might possibly be supposed to have been high priest. See also a Persian custom in 2^{7}, and compare 16^{10}.

5. HISTORICAL CHARACTER.—The early chapters of the book contain historical and geographical impossibilities, and the later chapters much self-evident romance. With the geography of Palestine, however, the writer shows great familiarity.* The historicity of Bethulia does not prove the actuality of Judith and her deed, though it is a serious obstacle to the allegorical interpretation of the book and also to the supposition that the story originally concerned the Maccabæan age.†

* Schlatter thinks Jth gives a true picture not only of the geographical, but also of the political, social, and religious conditions of the isolated Jewish hill towns of Northern Samaria before the time of the Maccabees.

† Cf. the part played by Bethsura in 1 Mac.

Nevertheless 'it is possible that in some Palestinian town a popular festival was celebrated in memory of the heroic deed of a woman, and that after the true occasion was forgotten and had given place to a manifoldly embellished legend, a history was composed in honour of Judith, probably before the destruction of the temple' (Zunz, Gottesdienstliche Vorträge, p. 124). One is reminded of the little city besieged by a great king and delivered by a poor wise man (Ec $9^{14.15}$), perhaps also an incident of the Persian period.

Josephus is silent both as to the invasion of Ochus and as to Jth, and his silence speaks against the antiquity of the book and its firm place in the Greek Bible of the 1st century. The NT has no reference.* The earliest reference is in Clem. Rom. i. 55, where Judith is put before Esther as an example of womanly heroism. The book was therefore classical, probably scriptural, about A.D. 90 among Christians. That Jewish tradition should come to connect the story with the Maccabæan period is natural.

6. LITERARY CHARACTER.—The book is a work of literary skill, 'as a work of art quite perfect' (Ewald). 'The representation contains nothing diffuse, bombastic, forced, but is short, simple, natural, and betrays originality. . . . Appropriate, in part admirable, are the particular descriptions. . . . Extraordinarily successful is the song of praise at the close of the book. . . . I put it unhesitatingly by the side of the best poetical products of the Hebrew spirit' (Fritzsche, 127 f., 209).

7. RELIGIOUS AND ETHICAL TEACHINGS.—The religious ideas of the book are of the Pharisaic type, particularistic and legal. Patriotism centres in zeal for the temple ($4^{2.3}$. $^{11-15}$ $8^{21.24}$ $9^{8.13}$; cf. 5^{19} 9^{1} 11^{13} 16^{18-20}). Israel can suffer no harm unless it sin against God (5^{17-21} 11^{10-19}). The fatal sin might be the most excusable of ritual transgressions ($11^{12ff.}$), though Judith's confidence rests chiefly on the freedom of her race from idolatry (8^{18-20}). In the account of Judith's own piety the food laws (10^{5} 11^{12-15} $12^{1-9.19}$), fasts (8^{6}), washings ($12^{7.9}$), and prayer (9. 11^{17} 12^{8} $13^{4.5}$) are emphasized. Her persistent widowhood is praised (16^{22}; cf. $8^{4.8}$). Social virtues are wanting, except the freeing of her slave (16^{23}).† The Pharisaic union of determinism and freedom is to be observed. Salvation comes from God, and all is in accordance with His will (8^{11-27} 9^{5-14} 16^{13-17}). Yet it is not through angel or miracle, but through the wisdom and boldness of Judith that deliverance is wrought (cf. 8^{32-34} 10^{9} $15^{9.10}$). But she gets her strength by prayer (9. 12^{8} $13^{4.5}$), and the glory of God is greater because of the weakness of the means through which so great a triumph was achieved (9^{11} $16^{6.7.11.12}$). The absence of angels and miracles (cf. Tobit) and of future life and Messianic hope is to be noted. A proselyte is welcomed (14^{10}).

JULIA ('Ιουλία).—One of those greeted by St. Paul in Ro 16^{15} with Philologus, Nereus, Olympas, and others. It has been suggested that Philologus and Julia were husband and wife, and the others members of the family. The name was the commonest of all Roman female names, commonest of all among slaves of the imperial household, and nothing can be proved by it. The following inscription is interesting (CIL vi. 20416): D.M | IVLIAE NEREI · F · | CLAVDIAE.

A. C. HEADLAM.

JULIUS ('Ιούλιος).—The name of the centurion in whose custody St. Paul journeyed to Rome (Ac $27^{1.3}$). When it was determined that St. Paul with his companions should sail to Italy, he was delivered with his companions 'to a centurion named Julius of the Augustan cohort.' Throughout the voyage the centurion is represented as treating his prisoner with some kindness and distinction. He was allowed to go ashore and see his friends at Sidon. Although the centurion does not attend to the apostle's warnings at first (vv.$^{9-11}$), it is at his instigation that he orders the soldiers to cut away the boat (v.$^{31f.}$), and it is to save him that he prevents the soldiers from killing the prisoners (v.$^{42f.}$). On arrival at Rome, St. Paul was allowed to live by himself with the soldier who guarded him (Ac 28^{16}).

Two points in this narrative demand close attention, the Augustan cohort and the statement last made. We will take the latter first. There is an interesting variation of text. The best of the MSS (ℵABI) and Vulg. Pesh. Boh. read in Ac 28^{16} 'And when we entered into Rome, Paul was suffered to abide by himself with the soldier that guarded him.' This is adopted by WH and by Blass in his α text. The latter in his β text on the authority of HLP$^{etc.}$ Harcl.$^{cor.}$ Gig, reads, 'the centurion handed over the prisoners to the head of the camp, while Paul was allowed to remain by himself without the camp with the soldiers that guarded him.' The word translated 'head of the camp' is in Greek στρατοπεδάρχης, while the one representative of the Old Latin we have here reads principi peregrinorum. It must be remembered that D and most Old Latin authorities are defective in this place. A portion of this latter reading is found in the TR, and has always been interpreted as referring to the præfectus prætorio; stress has been laid on the singular, and it has been supposed necessarily to refer to a date before 62 while Burrhus filled the office alone. Prof. Mommsen tells us that neither the term nor the duty is consonant with Roman usage, and suggests another interpretation based primarily on the technical Latin word, which appears in the version princeps peregrinorum. In order to perfect the organization of the Roman army and the communications with the legions on the frontier, there was a body of troops detached from the foreign legions called frumentarii. At some date or other they were organized under a head of their own, and had a camp on the Cælian hill. It was called the castra peregrinorum, and the head of it the princeps castrorum peregrinorum or princeps peregrinorum. This is represented in the Greek apparently less correctly, or at least less technically, by στρατοπεδάρχης. To this body of messengers, constantly travelling backwards and forwards, it would be natural that prisoners should be entrusted, and there is evidence to that effect. It had been usual in the absence of evidence to refer this organization to the time of Hadrian, but Mommsen thinks it more probable that it dates from the time of Augustus, and would use the Acts for evidence to that effect.

But the question now arises—What is the authority of the text? for this may be a crucial instance of the value of the β text. How, on Blass's theory, did it come about that St. Luke substituted a vague phrase for the technical language he had previously employed? If his theory be incorrect, which reading is intrinsically likely to be altered? It has become the fashion to hint that the β reading is here correct; but it may be pointed out that the phrase which is most correct technically, that of the Latin MSS, is the work of a translator who, being a Roman, would presumably have more accurate knowledge than the original writer, giving precision in his translations by employing a technical word. Following that line of argument it might be suggested that perhaps here we have an instance in which the more precise text of β arose from the influence of the Latin version and possibly bilingual MSS. At any rate, the β text is here very definitely connected with Rome.

† The question of the morality of Judith's deed should not be discussed without reference to the existing state of war, and to such examples as Jael and Esther.

But what is the meaning of the σπεῖρα Σεβαστή? The cohortes of the Roman legion had no special designation, and therefore in this case we must have a cohort of auxiliary troops; and many such were named Augusta. But then we should have an auxiliary used for services for which, as far as we know, they were not employed. Mommsen seems to suggest a connexion with the cohors peregrinorum, although confessing that this name and that of the Italian band are still unsolved. Ramsay, starting from this suggestion, develops it as follows: 'But when we recollect (1) that Luke regularly uses the terms of educated conversation, not the strict technical terms; and (2) that he was a Greek who was careless of Roman forms or names, we shall not seek in this case to treat the Greek name (σπεῖρα Σεβαστή) as a translation of a correct Roman name; but we shall look for a body in the Roman service which was likely to be called "the troops of the Emperor" by the persons in whose society Luke moved at the time . . . we conclude, then, that "the troops of the Emperor" was a popular colloquial means of describing the corps of officer-couriers; and we thus gather from Acts an interesting fact, elsewhere unattested but in perfect conformity with the known facts' (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 315).

The conclusions of Professors Mommsen and Ramsay, which are almost always full of interest, are given with this warning, that a superstructure, however ingenious, is built on a slight foundation when it is based on a reading which on external grounds has no claim to acceptance, and may easily be a correction of the 2nd century introducing the precise phraseology and writing of the later date.

The attempt of Schürer (HJP I. ii. 53) to connect the Augustan band with a σπεῖρα Σεβαστηνῶν does not give any assistance to the problem, and is based on a confusion of ideas.

JUNIAS (or JUNIA).—In Ro 16[7] St. Paul greets Andronicus and Junias (or Junia); the name being in the accusative, the sex is not determined (Ἀνδρόνικον καὶ Ἰουνίαν). If masculine, the name is a shortened form of Junianus; if feminine, Junia is a common name. As has been pointed out under ANDRONICUS (wh. see), there is a little doubt as to whether the two are to be included among the apostles—probably they are to be, the word being taken in its wider signification. In that case it is hardly likely that the name is feminine, although, curiously enough, Chrysostom does not consider the idea of a female apostle impossible: 'And, indeed, to be apostles at all is a great thing. But to be even amongst those of note, just consider what a great encomium this is. But they were of note owing to their works and their achievements. Oh! how great is the devotion of this woman, that she should be even counted worthy of the appellation of apostle.'

JUNIPER (רֹתֶם rōthem). — Rōthem occurs three times in the Bible. Elijah sat under a rōthem (1 K 19[4]). The LXX transliterates this Ῥαθμέν. The poor are said to cut up the roots of the rōthem for food (Job 30[4]), LXX ῥίζας ξύλων. The tongue is compared (Ps 120[4]) to coals of rōthem, LXX τοῖς ἀνθραξιν τοῖς ἐρημικοῖς. It is clear from these references that the LXX did not understand what was meant by rōthem. The Arab. happily furnishes the clue. Ratam is a sort of broom, Retama Retem, L., which grows in all the deserts of Egypt, Sinai, and the Holy Land. The tr. (AV in all, and RV text 1 K 19[4], Ps 120[4]) 'juniper' is incorrect. 'Broom' (RV text Job 30[4], and marg. in other passages) is somewhat misleading. The particular species of plant not growing in other lands should be called by its indigenous name ratam.

The ratam is a glabrescent shrub, with a few linear leaves, 3–4 lines long, purplish white flowers, half an inch long, 1–5 together in subsessile clusters along the twigs, and obliquely ovate, 1-seeded, beaked pods, half an inch long. The shrub gives the poorest kind of shade, and yet it is often the only refuge from the blazing sun of the desert. Its roots are suitable for burning, and are used for making charcoal. They would be poor eating indeed. This has led some to suppose that שֹׂרֶשׁ shōresh (Job 30[4]), may mean the seeds which are said to be eaten by sheep. For this, however, there is no etymological warrant. The LXX tr. is against it.

G. E. POST.

JUPITER in 2 Mac 6[2] is Zeus, the supreme god in the Greek pantheon. Zeus Xenios (ib.), i.e. Zeus the god of hospitality and protector of strangers, was worshipped throughout the Greek world. Zeus Olympios (ib.), Olympian Zeus, was probably so called because first worshipped on Mount Olympus in North Thessaly; but owing to the influence of the Homeric poetry the epithet became familiar wherever Greek was spoken, and the god was widely worshipped under that name, e.g. at Athens, Chalcis, Megara, Olympia, Sparta, Corinth, Syracuse, Naxos, and Miletus (Farnell, Cults of the Greek States, I. iv.). The juxtaposition of the two cults by Antiochus Epiphanes, who specially honoured Zeus Olympios (Nestle, Marg. p. 42), would imply to the Greek mind that the supreme God who ruled the whole world, whether of Greeks or foreigners (Xenios), was not J", but the Zeus Olympios who had been a Greek god from the earliest, i.e. Homeric, times.

The Jupiter of Ac 14[12. 13] though called Zeus, was not the Greek god, but the native god of the Lycaonian population, whose Lycaonian name was represented in Greek as Zeus. The reading of Codex Bezæ in v.[13] is τοῦ ὄντος Διὸς πρὸ πόλεως, and is to be translated 'of Zeus, who is called Zeus Propoleôs,' i.e. 'Jupiter-before-the-town'—the epithet Propoleôs being given to the god because his temple was outside the town; cf. the inscription in Claudiopolis of Isauria to Διὶ Προαστίῳ (Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, pp. 51–53). The remains of this temple have not yet been discovered; but, in the opinion of Ramsay, they might be identified with but very little excavation.

In Ac 19[35] ('the image which fell down from Jupiter,' τὸ [ἄγαλμα] διοπετές) the phrase 'from Jupiter' is simply='from the clear sky' (see Ramsay, p. 604 n. of vol. i. of this Dictionary).

F. B. JEVONS.

JUSHAB-HESED (יוּשַׁב חֶסֶד 'loving-kindness is returned').—A son of Zerubbabel, 1 Ch 3[20].

JUSTICE is in Scripture essentially identical with Righteousness (wh. see). The same words (צַדִּיק, צֶדֶק, צְדָקָה, δίκαιος, δικαιοσύνη) are rendered now by one and now by the other term, but chiefly by 'righteous,' 'righteousness.' The tendency in RV is to replace 'just' by 'righteous'; see Ps 89[14], Pr 4[18]; in Pr 10[6. 7] the same word is rendered both 'just' and 'righteous.' Referring, therefore, to the art. on Righteousness for detailed exposition of the meaning and development of the idea, we need here refer only to general considerations.

The Eng. word 'justice,' in addition to the broad sense in which it denotes moral excellence in general and is equivalent to righteousness, has acquired the special sense of honesty, fairness to others, and then judicial righteousness, whereas 'righteousness' has kept to its original meaning. In Scripture it is the broad sense that is almost exclusively meant in reference both to God and man. Or, put in another way, the justice or righteousness of Scripture denotes almost exclusively moral and religious perfection, of which every other moral excellence is a necessary corollary. There are indeed the beginnings of a special meaning, but little more; thus 'just balances' (Lv 19[36]), 'One that ruleth over men righteously' (2 S 23[3]), 'Whatsoever is right I will give you' (Mt 20[4]). But, in the main, Scripture refers only to absolute, essential righteousness; in demanding this it demands all.

Such absolute, universal righteousness is everywhere affirmed of God: 'Just and right is he' (Dt 32[4]), 'A just God and a saviour' (Is 45[21]), 'The Lord is righteous; he loveth righteousness' (Ps 11[7]), 'That he might himself be just' (Ro 3[26]). God is indeed spoken of as a Judge, Gn 18[25], Ps 7[11], Is 33[22] (שֹׁפֵט), but it is in the general sense of ruler, sovereign. It is evident, on the principle that the greater includes the less, that every special form of justice — legislative, retributive — is included in and follows from the general idea. The justice ascribed to God is absolute, perfect. 'Thou that art of purer eyes than to behold evil, and that canst not look on perverseness' (Hab 1[13]).

The term is used in the same comprehensive sense of men. The good are the just or righteous in contrast with the wicked (Ps 37[12] etc.). The Lord Jesus is so described (Ac 3[14], 1 P 3[18]). 'Whatsoever things are just' (Ph 4[8]). 'A just man' is the comprehensive description given of individuals (Gn 6[9], Mt 1[19], Mk 6[20], Lk 2[25] 23[50], Ac 10[22], 2 P 2[7]. 'A bishop must be just' (Tit 1[8]).

Assuming that justice and mercy are the two complementary aspects of holiness, justice is the aspect emphasized in the OT. It may be regarded as distinctively the OT attribute or virtue. Not that this aspect is superseded in NT. The entire teaching of the Sermon on the Mount goes to show that Christianity immensely deepens OT ideas. But in the gospel mercy takes the central place. This is the natural order of revelation. 'The law was given by Moses; grace and truth came by Jesus Christ' (Jn 1[17]). Justice as righteousness forms the solid substratum of moral character in God and man, and must come first; but this point being secured, mercy lifts us to a higher stage (Ro 13[10]). The revelation of righteousness is crowned by the revelation of love (1 Jn 4[8]). Thus the two testaments each play a distinct part in the revelation of moral truth. J. S. BANKS.

JUSTIFICATION.—To 'justify' means to set right, or to put on a right footing, one whose relation, either in consequence of misunderstanding or misrepresentation, or because of misconduct, has been what it should not be. Where there has been no real wrong-doing, 'justification' is simply vindication or declaration of innocence or rectitude; where there has been real wrong-doing, it presupposes the fulfilment of some condition by which the wrong-doing is made good or expiated. In both cases a relation more or less abnormal is changed into one that is normal,—in the one by means of more light, in the other by means of more right.

Neither the Heb. צדק (Pi. and Hiph.) nor the Gr. δικαιοῦν mean to make righteous, but simply to put in a right relation. It is a question primarily of relationship, not of character or conduct; though the relationship is conceived as conditioning both character and conduct.

The fundamental meaning of δικαιόω is 'to settle or recognize as right.' In Class. Lit. it means (1) to hold or deem right, Herod. i. 100; Eur. Supplic. 526; Thuc. i. 140. 2; ii. 41. 2, etc.; (2) to do a man justice, i.e. in general, to judge or punish, Herod. iii. 29, and so frequently in later Greek, especially Dio Cassius (cf. the Scots use of 'justify'). δικαιοῦν came to be a technical term in ecclesiastical Greek in sense (1), used of the decree of councils, ἐδικαίωσεν ἡ ἁγία καὶ μεγάλη σύνοδος, Can. 17, Conc. Nic.

In LXX (OT and Apoc.) it is used to translate the Piel and Hiph'il of צדק (Qal = δεδικαιῶσθαι), almost always with a personal object: so Ex 23[7]. The root meaning everywhere seems to be, 'to set forth as righteous,' to justify, in a legal sense. This may signify either (1) to show one to be righteous, Ezk 16[51. 52], Jer 3[11]; or (2) to declare righteous, Dt 25[1], 1 K 8[32]. Similarly in the Pseudepigraphical Books, e.g. Ps.-Sol ii. 16, ix. 3, where it means to justify God.

In NT the sense is determined largely by the usage of LXX. We have (1) to show one to be righteous, 1 Co 4[4], Lk 7[35]; (2) to pronounce righteous, as a judicial act, Lk 16[15] 7[29]; (3) in Pauline usage δικαιοῦν denotes the judicial act of God whereby those who put faith in Christ are declared righteous in His eyes, free from guilt and punishment, Ro 4[5], Gal 2[16] et passim. (3) is thus an expansion and Christian application of (2). In Ro 8[30] δικαιοῦν is specifically mentioned as an element in the divine work of saving the individual. Cremer points out that while in Hebrew Hiph. presupposes Qal, — justification, the being just,—the converse is true in Greek (δικαιοῦν—δεδικαιῶσθαι).

In general we may say that in Bibl. Lit. the word δικαιοῦν is used always, or almost always, in the forensic sense, and that its proper meaning is to pronounce righteous. Of itself it does not affirm or deny the real righteousness of the person so declared, or treated as, righteous, and in so far as he is not really righteous it implies forgiveness. But it may be taken as certain that it cannot mean to make righteous, not even in 1 Co 6[11]. Verbs in -όω, derived from adjectives of moral meaning, never have this efficient signification. Godet (Com. on Rom. Eng. tr. i. 157) goes as far as to say that there is not a single example in the whole of Class. Lit. where the word = to make righteous. And the usage of the NT is unmistakable. See esp. Morison, Crit. Expos. of the Third Chap. of the Ep. to the Rom. pp. 163–198.

A word may be added on two other terms. δικαίωμα is the declaration or decision, either (1) that a thing is δίκαιον, or (2) that a person is δίκαιος. (1) gives us the common meaning of 'ordinance' or 'precept,' Lk 1[6], Ro 8[4], He 9[1]; (2) the technical Pauline sense in Ro 5[16. 18]. δικαίωμα is the act of justification regarded as complete; δικαίωσις (a word occurring only twice in NT, elsewhere replaced by the verb δικαιοῦν) is the act as in process, which, therefore, when relating to sinners = the act of acquittal, as is especially clear from Ro 5[18].

See also under RIGHTEOUSNESS.

Put into a sentence, the point of view of this article may be stated as follows:—God has ever been seeking to establish normal personal relations between Himself and sinful men; and so far as men have responded to the divine movement, as befitted that movement, on the one hand, and the stage of their personal and moral development to which the movement accommodated itself, on the other, such a normal relation was established. That relation was justification. The first step was thus taken to God's being to man that without which man could not be to God, still less in himself, what he was designed to be.

I. The act of justification may affect various relations.

1. A man's relation to himself.—A man may seek to set himself right with himself, in other words, to justify himself to himself. Something of this kind is implied in 1 Co 4[3. 4] 'I judge not mine own self. For I know nothing against myself; yet am I not hereby justified: but He that judgeth me is the Lord'; and in 1 Jn 3[19. 20] 'Hereby shall we know that we are of the truth, and shall assure our heart before Him, whereinsoever our heart condemn us:

because God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things.' Such justification is, of course, exclusively the vindication or clearing up of one's own innocence or rectitude before or to oneself. There is such a thing as mistaken self-judgment: it may be either for the better or the worse.

2. A man's relation to his fellow-man.—Men set themselves right with their fellow-men, whether regarded individually or corporately. If a man have been misrepresented, to justify himself is to clear or vindicate himself in the particular respect in which he has been misjudged; if, on the other hand, he is guilty of wrong in thought or word or act, the wrong relation thence arising or thereby constituted, has to be rectified by some sort of expiation or good-making of the wrong. It may be by confession of fault, or an expression of regret, or the payment of a fine, or loss of liberty, or endurance of suffering. In the legislation of Israel, as set forth in OT, provision was made both for the vindication of innocence (Nu $5^{18ff.}$) and the making good of real wrong-doing (Ex 21^{19-30} 22^{14}).

3. Men are sometimes set right or justified by others; that, too, in both senses, namely, the vindication of innocence or rectitude, and atonement for wrong. The former is referred to in Dt 25^{1} 'If there be a controversy between men, and the judges judge them; then they shall justify the righteous and condemn the wicked.' Justification of the wicked for a reward, on the contrary, is denounced in Is 5^{23}. In Ezk $16^{51.\ 52}$ Jerus. is satirically represented as justifying her sinful sisters, i.e. causing them to appear righteous, by her own abominations (cf. Jer 3^{11}). Amends might also be made for evil-doing within certain limits. Elihu is represented as challenging Job to make clear his rectitude, as, e.g., in Job 33^{32}, where we read: 'If thou hast anything to say, answer me: speak, for I desire to justify thee'; and it is said of God in Ps 37^{6} 'He shall make thy righteousness to go forth as the light, and thy judgment as the noonday' (cf. Is 54^{17}).

4. The justification of men before God is often referred to, but only to be characterized as impossible; that, too, in both respects. Such failure is distinctly pronounced inevitable in Ps 143^{2} 'Enter not into judgment with Thy servant: for in Thy sight shall no man living be justified.' See also Job 25^{4} 'How then can man be just with God?' In NT the same thing is both everywhere implied and often expressly affirmed, as, e.g., in Gal 2^{16} 'because by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified' (cf. Ro 3^{20}), Ac 13^{39} 'by him every one is justified from all things from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses.'

Not only is the impossibility of vindicating their righteousness before God denied to men, but also that of setting themselves right by making amends for or expiating unrighteousness. That it cannot be effected by works, is clear from declarations like Is 57^{12} 'as for thy works, they shall not profit thee'; and especially Is 64^{6} 'For we are all become as one that is unclean, and all our righteousnesses are as a polluted garment . . . and our iniquities like the wind have taken us away.' Further, to say, 'The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord are these,' is to 'trust in lying words' (Jer 7^{4}). But equally out of the question is it to purchase the divine favour by mere sacrifices; for 'In sacrifice and offering He has no delight' (Ps 40^{6} 51^{16}); 'I desire mercy, and not sacrifice' (Hos 6^{6}; cf. Ps 4^{5}); a multitude of sacrifices is nothing to Him (Is 1^{11}); 'the solemn meeting,' 'new moons,' 'appointed feasts,' His 'soul hateth' (Is 1^{13}); yea, 'The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord' (Pr 15^{8} 21^{27}).

As to NT—the impossibility either of vindicating righteousness or making amends for sin by works of the law and by sacrifices, is the burden of the Epp. of St. Paul and of that to the Hebrews, besides being everywhere else implied (cf. e.g. Gal 2^{16}, Ro 3^{20}, He 10^{5-8} where Ps 40 is quoted: 'Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not . . . in whole burnt-offerings and sacrifices for sin thou hadst no pleasure').

5. The impossibility of justification in the sight of God, thus explicitly affirmed in the particular cases adduced, is implicitly assumed throughout OT and NT. In point of fact, the idea that men should either vindicate their own innocence or rectitude, or that they of themselves, or any creature for them, should establish a right relation between God and themselves, by acts or sacrifices, or anything of their own, is totally alien from the spirit and life that produced the writings which constitute our Bible.

Passages, indeed, in which all manner of good deeds are required, whilst contempt is cast on sacrifices and the like, may seem and are often taken to imply that by right conduct men can set themselves right with God; but this is by no means their import. As fruits of a right relation, both sacrifices and right conduct are obligatory and pleasing to God; as means of establishing a right relation, the one is an abomination, the other utterly insufficient (cf. Ps 51^{15-17} with v.^{19} of the same psalm).

II. 'Justification,' however, understanding it as previously defined, is undoubtedly recognized both as possible and as a fact. Men are actually set right with God, notwithstanding their sin, and their utter inability to expiate or make amends for sin.

1. 'Justification' is in some sense ascribed even to Gentiles. In this respect the case of Cornelius is typical. 'Of a truth,' says St. Peter regarding him, 'I perceive that God is no respecter of persons: but in every nation he that feareth Him and worketh righteousness, is acceptable to Him' (Ac $10^{34.\ 35}$; cf. Ps 15^{2}, He 11^{33}, Mt 8^{5-13}, Ro 2^{14}, Ac 28^{28} 15^{17}). To be 'acceptable' is to be on the footing with God, in the relation to Him, which conditions the bestowal of such grace as a man is capable of receiving, i.e. to be justified. In a certain respect Abraham may be regarded as an example of Gentile 'justification'; for, as St. Paul emphatically affirms, his faith was 'reckoned for righteousness . . . when he was in uncircumcision'; 'that he might be the father of all them that believe, though they be in uncircumcision' (Ro 4^{9-11}). When he believed, he was neither Jew nor Christian.

2. 'Justification' was, further, a common experience under the Old Covenant. The proof of this lies first and foremost in the fact of forgiveness, which St. Paul treats as constituting an integral part of justification, even if he does not, as some hold, identify the two. Forgiveness followed on the offering of appointed sacrifices, and is represented as an experience which many had, and all might have, at the hands of God. The frequent injunctions to trust in the Lord, and the many declarations that it is a good thing to trust in Him, point in the same direction. How otherwise shall we account for the consciousness of righteousness which is expressed by men who at the same time make confession of sin? And the confidence placed in God as the hearer and answerer of prayer, as a refuge and stronghold, as a support and a defence, and so forth? These are either justification itself or its fruits.

3. It scarcely needs saying that the fact of justification before God is the great theme of NT, especially of the Epistles to the Galatians, Romans, and Hebrews. Whilst, as was pointed out, the self-rectification of man's abnormal relation to God, whether by 'works of law,' i.e. by a self-generated righteousness, or by means of sacrifice and offerings or other religious services (Gal 3[9-12]), is treated as almost ridiculously impracticable, the blessed news is brought that though all have sinned, all may find justification through faith in Christ, whom God has set forth as a propitiation (Ro 3[21-26]).

III. But by what right, it will be asked, can 'justification' be affirmed, not only of Israelites, but even of Gentiles? The Apostle Paul's correlation of Abraham with believers in Christ (Ro 4[20-25]), has puzzled commentators enough; how then can it be right to correlate with them those whom St. Paul is supposed to represent as having been shut up under a law which brought the knowledge of sin (Ro 3[20]), and therefore the certainty of judgment (Ro 2[5-11]); whilst the sacrifices which were offered are said to make no one perfect as pertaining to the conscience? (He 9[9]). And is it not still less admissible to extend 'justification' to those who are characterised as 'sinners of the Gentiles'? (Gal 2[15]).

The difficulty now touched upon affects all the three aspects of the subject, viz., first, the divine action (Ro 3[20-26] et passim); then, the human faith, which, no less than divine action, is necessary to justification; and, finally, the very nature of the relation itself, which is termed justification.

It can only be met by the recognition, on the one hand, of the distinction between implicit and explicit justification; and, on the other, of the fact that between implicit and explicit justification there are or may be stages which are not subjected to the limits of earth and time.

The three points just referred to can be represented by means of concentric spheres, the outermost of which shall stand for the Gentiles, the two inner ones respectively for the Israelites and Christian believers; though it needs to be noted that since the break-up of the Jewish system—perhaps, also, largely prior thereto—the distinction between the Israelites and the Gentiles, so far as justification is concerned, has gradually been becoming less and less; their two spheres have therefore been merging into one. For there is no nation now that can be said to have legal, sacrificial, and religious institutions to which God stands in the same relation, or which discharges the same function relatively to God, as those which are summarily designated the Jewish Dispensation or Covenant. Let us consider the three points in relation to the three classes of cases specified.

1. In the case of the Gentiles, the divine action consists in the opening of the human eye to the sacredness and absoluteness of the right. This takes place ordinarily in connexion with some specific duty. 'I am under a sacred or absolutely binding obligation to do this or not to do that,' the man feels, or possibly says to himself. His eye or ear has been opened: a revelation has been made to him. If he respond, yea, and is ready to do what he sees to be right or avoid what he sees to be wrong, he has attained to a footing which for his stage of personal development is right,—in other words, he has exercised that element of faith which is possible at that stage, and attained implicit justification.

If he continue faithfully to say, yea, with the same purpose of obedience, even though he have to confess many failures of execution, he is destined one day to stand face to face with Christ, and, by the exercise of full, explicit faith in Him, to become partaker of that conscious peace with God of which previously he had and could have only glimpses and foretastes.

2. Speaking generally, the purpose of the Jewish Dispensation was, negatively considered, to check the decrease in humanity of the sensitiveness which conditioned justification of the kind just described; positively considered, on the one hand, to develop a moral personality that should be capable of justification at ever higher stages; and, on the other hand, prepare the way for the coming and work of the Son of God, by which justification in its highest potence was to be rendered possible.

Abraham was a morally faithful man of the type of Cornelius. The special command and promise given him by God, and his ready obedience, both taken together, rendered possible a higher relation than was open to Gentiles under the conditions previously described.

In and through Abraham, God took the principles of heredity and sociality into the service of the higher spiritual development of the race, instead of leaving them to subserve, almost exclusively, its degradation. For the positive purpose referred to, that is, of developing the moral personality, two methods were pursued; first, institutions were regulated or called into existence, and laws were enacted or sanctioned, by which the moral consciousness was quickened, or, as St. Paul puts it, the knowledge of sin was increased (Ro 3[20]); and, secondly, along therewith sacrifices were sanctioned or ordered, by which a way of forgiveness was provided. Still further, with a view to checking the too natural tendency to the conception of righteousness and sacrifice which eventually dominated the mind of the vast majority of the Jewish nation,—the protest against which, be it remarked, largely colours, not only St. Paul's two great Epp. to the Galatians and Romans, but also the Ep. to the Hebrews,—prophets were commissioned, on the one hand, gradually to develop the law and unfold its true significance; and, on the other, to denounce perfunctory sacrifices, offerings, and observances.

The Israelite who loyally recognized the 'law,' that is, the entire complex of duties arising out of his national relationship, as God's means of showing him how to be holy as He was holy (Lv 19), and who availed himself of the divinely provided means of atoning for his failures, exercised faith, so far as it was then possible and required. Ipso facto, he thus behaved as one who belonged to the covenant, notwithstanding the sins he might commit. As such his relation was a right one; he was justified to the degree then attainable. If he were ever condemned, it was not for sins, but for open disloyalty to the covenant, with its obligations and sacrifices, i.e. for defiant refusal to recognize right as right and grace as grace. But even true Israelites had to wait for the new covenant which God was to make with the house of Israel, when the law should be written in their hearts (He 8[10]); though their attitude grew to be ever more completely that which we find in Simeon, who, when Jesus was presented to him in the temple, exclaimed, 'Now lettest Thou Thy servant depart, O Lord, according to Thy word, in peace; for mine eyes have seen Thy salvation' (Lk 2[29, 30]).

3. 'Justification' reached its culmination through Christ. The realization of the idea and the adoption of the term coincided. The Gentile had no proper sense even of forgiveness, much less of justification; but then his sense of sin was not keen enough to cause him real despair because of the lack. The Israelite had a profounder sense of sin, and therefore, unless he was to despair, needed an assurance of forgiveness as objective as the command which condemned him; but he never got beyond sins, and therefore never realized justification, in the proper sense; nor had he the term. It was reserved for Christianity to produce the consciousness of sin, and to meet what would otherwise have generated despair, by opening the way to justification. The apostle who faced sinfulness most directly, was the one to gain the profoundest insight into justification; and it is worthy of note that whilst St. Paul stretches a bridge from forgiveness to justification by once interchanging the terms (Ro 4^{6-8}), he nowhere else substitutes the one term for the other, except in Col 2^{13}, where he uses, not ἀφείς, but χαρισάμενος.

First of all, the divine action for the rectification of man's relation to Himself culminated in Christ. Through Him, law, revealed alike in life and suffering, and sacrifice both by and to God, were presented in their supremest form. Opportunity was thus given, nay more, potential ability was also generated, to respond with a response in which loyal assent to the right, trustful surrender to love, and, finally,—so far as those are concerned who have not seen Christ with the fleshly eye,—belief that realizes the invisible, are all blended, i.e. a response which is what NT understands by 'faith.'

Such a response under such conditions,—what is it but 'a beginning in spirit' (ἐναρξάμενοι πνεύματι, Gal 3^{3-5}; cf. 3^2 4^6 $5^{5ff.}$, He 8^{8-12}), a 'receiving of sonship' (ἵνα τὴν υἱοθεσίαν ἀπολάβωμεν, Gal 4^{1-5}), and therefore the ability to look up to God as a son, 'crying, Abba, Father' (Gal $4^{6.7}$); in other words, what is it but, ipso facto, 'justification,' that is, a rectified relation, a being put on a right footing, in a right relation? The Christian believer is related rightly to God; accordingly law ceases to be mere law, and sacrifice ceases to be a means of purchasing grace; and though he may fall into sin, he can still look up to God as one whose relation has once for all been made right in and through Christ.

(Neither the Roman Catholic and other present-day kindred doctrines which represent justification as in some sense imparting real righteousness; nor the traditional or 'orthodox' doctrine of an imputation of the righteousness of Christ, are true to Scripture, though each of them embodies a certain aspect of the truth.)

How Christ by His work on our behalf empowered man to fulfil the conditions devolving on him, i.e. to exercise faith, as well as to do that which faith of moral necessity presupposed, is a point which belongs to the doctrine of the atonement; but if justice be done to NT hints on the subject, propitiation, justification, and sanctification will be found to constitute the distinguishable though inseparable factors of one great spiritual whole.

JUSTLE.—Nah 2^4 'The charets shall rage in the streets, they shall justle one against another in the broad wayes.' Thus the verse appears in AV of 1611. In mod. edd. 'charets' is spelt 'chariots,' but 'justle' is retained (and accepted by RV) though 'jostle' is the usual spelling now. Cf. Golding, Calvin's Job, 580, 'if we be pinched with adversitie, the passion of sorow is so vehement, as it cannot be ruled: for then a man skirmisheth in such wise, as he justleth against God, and that is to his owne destruction in the end.' T. Fuller, Holy Warre, II. ii. p. 45, 'He was infected with the humour of the clergie of that age, who counted themselves to want room except they justled with Princes.'

JUSTUS (Ἰοῦστος).—1. In Ac 1^{23} we are told that two names were put forward for election to the place vacated by Judas, Joseph called Barsabbas, who was called Justus, and Matthias. Justus is, of course, the Greek name assumed by a Hebrew. See JOSEPH BARSABBAS. 2. In Ac 18^7 we learn that St. Paul when at Corinth lodged with one Justus, or Tit(i)us Justus, a proselyte (σεβόμενος τὸν Θεόν) whose house was near the synagogue. There is some variation in the MSS. The name is Titius Justus in B, the Vulgate, and Memphitic versions (in Codex Amiatinus 'Titus nomine Justus'), Titus Justus in ℵE, Titus alone in the Sahidic version and Peshitta, Justus alone in AD and later MSS; two MSS omit the name altogether. According to Ramsay, 'Titius Justus was evidently a Roman or a Latin, one of the coloni of the colony Corinth. Like the centurion Cornelius, he had been attracted to the synagogue—his citizenship could afford Paul an opening to the more educated class of the Corinthian population' (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 256). 3. In Col $4^{10.11}$ St. Paul speaks of Aristarchus, his fellow-prisoner, Mark the cousin of Barnabas, and Jesus, which is called Justus. They were all 'of the circumcision,' and were his only fellow-workers for the kingdom who were a comfort to him. The name is a Gentile surname assumed by a Jew, as in 1.

JUTAH or JUTTAH (in Jos 15^{55} יוּטָה [Hahn, followed by RV; AV has Juttah, which is the punctuation of Michaelis, יוּטָּה], in Jos 21^{16} יֻטָּה [hence AV and RV both have Juttah]).—A town of Judah (Jos 15^{55}) mentioned in connexion with Maon, Carmel, and Ziph in the mountains, given to the priests, the sons of Aaron (Jos 21^{16}), as a city of refuge for the man-slayer. It has been left out of the catalogue of cities of refuge in 1 Ch 6^{59}, but QPB adds note, 'Insert, Juttah with her pasture grounds.' In the time of Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s.v. Ἰεττάν) it was a large village 18 MP. from Eleutheropolis, and in Daroma-ad-australem. Reland (Pal. p. 870) suggests that Juttah was probably the residence of Zacharias and Elisabeth, and the birthplace of John the Baptist, the πόλις Ἰούδα ('a city of Judah') of Lk 1^{39} being so written by a corruption, or from a softer pronunciation, instead of πόλις Ἰούτα (so also Robinson, BRP^{2} ii. 206). Seetzen (1807) appears to have identified the modern village of Yutta as Juttah, and Robinson (BRP^{2} i. 495, ii. 206) corroborated the identification. It is a large Moslem village, standing high on a ridge 16 miles from Beit Jibrîn (Eleutheropolis), and in the vicinity of Maon (Main), Carmel (Kurmul), and Ziph (Tell ez-Zif). It is built of stone, and the water supply is from cisterns. On the south there are rock-cut tombs, and rock wine-presses are found all about the village. The country around is stony, but the inhabitants are very rich in flocks (SWP iii. 310).

KABZEEL (קַבְצְאֵל, B Καιβαισελεήλ, A Κασθεήλ).—A town in the extreme south of Judah, on the border of Edom, Jos 15[21]. It is mentioned in 2 S 23[20] (B Καβεσεήλ; cf. 1 Ch 11[22]) as the native place of Benaiah, the son of Jehoiada. In Neh 11[25] it appears under the name Jekabzeel as reinhabited after the Captivity (LXX omits in this verse both Jekabzeel and Dibon). Its site has not been identified.

KADESH, KADESH-BARNEA (קָדֵשׁ Gn 14[7] [where it is also called עֵין־מִשְׁפָּט 'well of decision'] * 16[14] 20[1], Nu 13[26] 20[1. 14] et al.; קָדֵשׁ בַּרְנֵעַ in Dt 1[2. 19] 2[14] 9[23], Nu 32[8] 34[4], Jos 10[41] 14[6. 7] 15[3] [all]; LXX Καδής, Καδὴς [τοῦ] Βαρνή).—With the exception of Sinai, no spot is more memorable in the history of the wanderings of the Israelites than Kadesh-barnea. It was here that the host camped during the 38 years that intervened between the sending out of the spies and the entrance into Palestine (Nu 20[1. 16] JE). It would appear, indeed, from Dt 2[14] as if the time was spent away from Kadesh. We may perhaps infer † that at Kadesh the tabernacle with the ark of the covenant was set up; that it was the abode of Moses and the chiefs of the tribes, and that it was the general centre to which the people resorted for worship and for judgment on disputed questions. But it by no means follows that the whole multitude with their flocks and herds congregated in the immediate neighbourhood; such a multitude of people and animals would, for the sake of pasturage alone, require a wide field in which to pitch their tents. It was at Kadesh that Miriam died (Nu 20[1]); it was the scene of the rebellion of Korah and his company (Nu 16); it was from Kadesh that the spies were sent in advance to ascertain and report to Moses on the physical character and the inhabitants of Canaan (Nu 13[26]); and it was at Kadesh that the miraculous supply of water was obtained (Nu 20[1-12]), when, apparently, the fountains which had caused the spot to be selected as camping ground were dried up; caused either by a prolonged drought, or by the blocking up of the underground channels by the falling in of the limestone strata. Whatever may have been the cause, the restoration of the flow of water was clearly miraculous, as it occurred at the moment of the interposition of Moses by command of God; though in a manner at variance with precise directions, which were to 'speak unto the rock' (Nu 20[8]), not to strike it with the rod. This departure from his instructions cost Moses his doom.

The position of Kadesh-barnea has been the subject of much controversy. By a comparison of various passages the site is brought within very narrow limits. It was on the borders of the Wilderness of Zin (Nu 20[1]), a tract which lay along the western margin of the valley of the Arabah; it was also near the southern boundary of the territory of Judah and of the land of the twelve tribes (Nu 34[4]). It was eleven days' journey from Horeb (Mt. Sinai) by way of Mt. Seir, or, in other words, by the route of the Arabah,—doubtless the number of days occupied by the Israelitish host in their journey between these two important camps; and it was not far distant from the border of Edom and the base of Mt. Hor, a site which has been recognized as indisputable by many competent authorities. It was from Kadesh-barnea that Moses on the expiration of the 'forty years,' and the resumption of the journeys of the Israelites, sent messengers to the king of Edom asking permission to pass through his land so as to reach the tableland of Moab on their way northwards; which request was refused (Nu 20[14-21] E).* All these passages lead us to infer some position in the Badiet et-Tîh—the great expanse of treeless limestone plateau which intervenes between the valley of the Arabah, opposite Mt. Hor on the east and the coast of Philistia about Gaza on the west. These conditions appear to be fully satisfied in the site discovered by the late Rev. John Rowland in 1842, to which he was guided by some Arabs when resident at Gaza. Here he found a lofty wall of limestone, at the base of which issued forth a copious spring, or several springs, which emptied themselves into a large artificially constructed basin, then into another of smaller size; and, continuing to flow down the valley, spread fertility on either hand until the waters ultimately disappeared beneath the sands of the desert. The spring is known amongst the Arabs by the name of 'Ain Ḳadis, or Holy Well, a name which seems to preserve the original biblical one. It was clear from the stone troughs and the marks of cattle and sheep around that the well was a favourite resort of the tribes for water, and doubtless was so even prior to the visit of the Israelites. The presence of water is a first necessity of life in those districts, and such a copious supply pointed it out as one suitable for the camping ground of the host. This spot was afterwards visited by Dr. H. Clay Trumbull, who confirms Rowland's identification, and who is the author of the most important work yet published on the subject.† The term 'city' applied to this spot probably means a camp or village of the Midianites (Nu 20[16]).

KADESH ON THE ORONTES.—See TAHTIM-HODSHI.

KADMIEL (קַדְמִיאֵל). — The name of a Levitical family which returned with Zerubbabel, Ezr 2[40]= Neh 7[43] (cf. 1 Es 5[26]). The expression which follows, namely, 'of the children of Hodaviah' (or Hodevah), is apparently meant to limit the Kadmiel family to those members who belonged to the Hodaviah branch. In Ezr 3[9] (cf. 1 Es 5[58]), in connexion with the laying of the foundation of the temple, as well as in Neh 9[4f.] (the day of humiliation) and 10[9] (the sealing of the covenant), Kadmiel appears to be an individual. The name occurs further in Neh 12[8. 24]. In the last of these passages we ought certainly to read, on the strength of parallel passages, 'Jeshua, Bani (or Binnui), Kadmiel' instead of 'Jeshua ben-Kadmiel.' This emendation is supported by the fact that אBA as well as Luc. have vioì Καδμιήλ, implying an original בני not בן. See, further, Smend, Listen, p. 10, n. 10; Ryle, Ezra and Nehemiah, ad ll. citt.

* The name Ḳadesh implies that the place was a sanctuary; no doubt it bore this character before its occupation by Israel. See, further, Driver on Dt 33[2], where Wellh. would read 'from Meribath-Kadesh' (מִמְּרִיבַת קָדֵשׁ) for מִרְבַבַת קֹדֶשׁ 'out of holy myriads,' of MT.

† But see Driver on Dt 2[14].

* In Dt 1. 2-8 there is no mention of these negotiations with Edom (Moore on Jg 11[16]).

† Kadesh Barnea (New York, 1884); also PEFSt (1881) p. 210. The site discovered by Rowland is supported by Ritter, Schultz, and Palmer; objected to by Robinson, Stanley, and others. It was not visited by the expedition of the Pal. Explor. Fund of 1883-4, as it lay to the westward of the Arabah, beyond the line of survey by Major Kitchener, R.E., now Lord Kitchener of Khartoum.

KADMONITES, הַקַּדְמֹנִי, Κελμωναῖοι, 'men of the East,' only in Gn 15^{19}, inhabitants of the Syrian desert, possibly descendants of Kedemah, the twelfth son of Ishmael (Gn 25^{15}). Mentioned after the Kenites and Kenizzites, the K. are represented as occupying the district along the eastern border of Palestine, near the Dead Sea, which was also called the East Sea, הַיָּם הַקַּדְמֹנִי (Ezk 47^{18}). Their name occurs in the longest list of the nations which originally held possession of the territories promised to Abraham. Usually seven, sometimes only six, but here ten such nations are named. Ewald and many following him regard the K. as equivalent to the Bĕnê Ḳedem, children of the East (wh. see), descendants (? Gn 25^{6}) of Abraham by Keturah (Gn 29^{1}, Jg 7^{12}, 1 K 4^{30}, Job 1^{3}, Is 11^{14}, Jer 49^{28}, Ezk $25^{4.\ 10}$). In that case, K. would be the designation of no particular tribe, but of the Keturæan Arabs, as distinguished from the Ishmaelites. The children of the East are represented in the passages referred to as occupying Paddan-aram, associated with the Midianites and Amalekites, inhabiting Kedar, neighbours and conquerors of the children of Ammon, coupled with the Egyptians in their fame for wisdom, and as Easterns contrasted with the Philistines who possessed the extreme west. Job is described as one of them. It seems better to regard the K. as a particular tribe like the other nations named in this list. Whether they are to be viewed as a branch of the Ishmaelitish or of the Keturæan Arabs is not clear.

J. MACPHERSON.

KAIN (קַיִן), properly Hakkain, AV Cain; A Ἀκείμ, Jos 15^{57}.—A town of Judah in the Hebron mountains, probably the present ruin Yukîn, on a high knoll S.E. of Hebron, overlooking the Jeshimon. It is visible from Minyeh (see BETHPEOR), and may be the 'nest of the Kenite' on a cliff (Nu 24^{21}), visible from the top of Peor. The Kenites inhabited this region. The tomb of Cain is now shown at this spot. Near it is the village of Beni N'aim, the old name of which was Kefr Barakah, which is the Caphar Barucha of the fourth cent. A.D. (Jerome, Paula), supposed to be the place where Abraham 'blessed' God (Gn 18^{22}), and whence he saw the destruction of the cities of the Ciccar. See SWP vol. iii. sheet xxi. C. R. CONDER.

KAIN (קַיִן 'lance,' 'spear'). — A clan name = Kenites (wh. see), Nu 24^{22}, Jg 4^{11}. In 1 S 15^{6b} Wellh. reads קֵינִי instead of קֵינִי, and the same change is proposed by Meyer (ZATW, i. 137, n. 3) for בְּנֵי קֵינִי in Jg 1^{16} (but see Moore, ad. loc. and on 4^{11}, and cf. Budde, Richt. u. Sam. 9, 68).

KALLAI (קַלַּי; A Καλλαί, B om.).—The head of the priestly family of Sallai, in the time of Jeshua the high priest, Neh 12^{20}.

KAMON (קָמוֹן; B Ῥαμνών, A Ῥαμμώ, Luc. Καλκών). —The burial-place of Jair, Jg 10^{5}. The site has not been recovered. It was probably east of the Jordan; probably identical, Moore thinks, with Kamûn mentioned by Polybius (v. lxx. 12) in connexion with Pella. Eusebius is certainly wrong in identifying it with Kammōna (modern Tell Ḳeimûn), 6 miles N.W. of Legio (Lejjûn). See JOKNEAM.

KANAH (קָנָה).—1. A wâdy (נַחַל), forming the boundary between Ephraim and Manasseh, terminating on the W. at the sea and on the E. at En-tappuah (Jos 16^{8} 17^{9}). This eastern limit must have been near Shechem lying to the S.E., but it has not been identified with any certainty. The modern Wâdy Ḳanah, the channel of a small stream rising near Nâblus (Shechem), is regarded by Conder as representing the ancient Ḳanah (Handbook to the Bible, 263); but Thomson (Land and Book, 'Southern Pal.,' 56) considers that this tributary of the 'Aujeh would put the boundary too far to the south (so also Dillmann). In connexion with the brook Ḳanah a difficulty arises in locating the Me-jarkon and Rakkon (Jos 19^{46} *), if these three under different names are all represented by the 'Aujeh immediately to the north of Jaffa. The discovery of Tell Rakkeit near the mouth of the 'Aujeh makes the supposition not impossible that Me-jarkon and Rakkon were names of that river after being joined by the brook Ḳanah. All the streams crossing the northern half of the plain of Sharon are reedy and discoloured. Thomson is in favour of the Falik as representing Ḳanah, and its divided mouth would account for the two names Me-jarkon and Rakkon. Farther north, on each side of Cæsarea, are two streams that suggest the Bible names mentioned, namely, el-Akhdar (Yellow River) and el-Azraḳ (Blue River). These streams would give Dan the coast-line up to Dora, and coincide with the territory assigned to that tribe by Josephus (Ant. v. i. 21).

2. A town on the northern boundary of Asher (Jos 19^{28}). The English reader must be careful to distinguish it from Cana of Galilee (wh. see). It is very probably the modern Kana, a considerable village lying a few miles S.E. of Tyre (cf. Robinson, BRP^{2} ii. 456; Guérin, Galilée, ii. 390 f.; Baedeker-Socin, Pal.^{3} 262 f.). In its neighbourhood there is a large Phœnician sepulchral monument known as 'Hiram's Tomb' (PEF Mem. i. 61). Ḳanah is possibly referred to in the journey of the Egyptian mohar in the time of Ramses II. under the name Pa-Kana-na. G. M. MACKIE.

KAREAH (קָרֵחַ 'bald'). — Father of Johanan, who was a Judæan contemporary of Jeremiah, and one of the captains of the forces in the open field who escaped the deportation to Babylon at the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadrezzar (2 K 25^{23}, Jer $40^{13.\ 15.\ 16}$ $42^{1.\ 8}$ $43^{2\ 4.\ 5}$). In Jer 40^{8} MT reads 'Johanan and Jonathan, sons of Kareah,' but here LXX (47^{8}) makes mention only of Johanan, as in the other passages above cited. Probably therefore יוֹנָתָן in MT is due merely to mistaken repetition of יוֹחָנָן. C. F. BURNEY.

KARIATHIARIUS (A Καριαθιαριός, B Καρταθειαρειός; RVm 'Kiriath-arim or Kiriath-jearim'), 1 Es 5^{19} for Kiriath-jearim (wh. see).

KARKA (הַקַּרְקַעָה, with ה locale, hence AV Karkaa).—An unknown place on the south border of Judah, apparently in the Tîh plateau, Jos 15^{3}. The LXX has κατὰ δυσμὰς Καδής.

KARKOR (קַרְקֹר).—A place apparently in Gilead, Jg 8^{10}. The site is unknown.

KARTAH (קַרְתָּה).—A city of Zebulun given to the Levites, Jos 21^{34}. It is not mentioned in the parallel passage, 1 Ch 6^{77}. The site is unknown. It might be for Ḳaṭṭath (קַטָּת) by a clerical error.

KARTAN (קַרְתָּן).—A city of Naphtali given to the Levites, Jos 21^{32}. The parallel passage, 1 Ch 6^{76}, has Ḳiriathaim (wh. see). While Luc. reads Καρθάν in harmony with MT, B has Θεμμών, A Νοεμμών.

* There are suspicions as to the correctness of the MT (see Dillm.'s and Bennett's notes). Rakkon (רַקּוֹן), which is omitted in LXX, may have arisen by dittography from the preceding הַיַּרְקוֹן.

KATTATH (קַטָּת, B Καταν́άθ, A Καττάθ, Luc. Κοττάθ).—A city of Zebulun, Jos 19^{15}, perhaps to be identified with Ḳartah (wh. see) or with Kiṭron (wh. see) of Jg 1^{30}, a place from which the Zebulunites were unable to expel the Canaanites. The site is unknown. Van de Velde suggests Tell Ḳerdaneh, N.E. of Ḥaifa, at the source of the Nahr Na'aman. According to the Talm. (Bab. Megillah 6*a*) Ḳiṭron is the later Sepphoris (Seffûrieh). This is opposed by Neubauer (Géog. du Talm. 191).

C. R. Conder.

KEDAR (קֵדָר, Κηδάρ).—The name of Ishmael's second son (Gn 25^{13}=1 Ch 1^{29}). 'The earliest reference to Kedar of which the date is certain is Jer 2^{10}' (Cheyne, Introd. to Isaiah, p. 131), where Kedar is made the type of a distant and barbarous tribe, being there coupled with Citium as it is with Meshech in Ps 120^{5}. The import of the name is better known to the author of Jer 49^{23}, where Kedar is identified with the Bĕnê-ḳedem, and their nomad life, with their sheep and camels, tents, curtains, and belongings, is described; by Ezekiel (27^{21}) they are coupled with 'Arab,' and described as trading with Tyre in cattle; and the author of the second part of Isaiah couples them with Nebaioth (60^{7}), alludes to their pursuit of sheep-breeding (ib.), and to their unwalled settlements (42^{11}). In Ca 1^{5} the tents of Kedar are made typical of blackness, with perhaps an allusion to the Hebrew sense of the root קדר, 'to be turbid or black.'

While the name Kedar is unknown to Arabic traditions, it is said to be preserved in some Minæan inscriptions (Glaser, Skizze, ii. p. 439), and is known in various forms to the Greek geographers, who, indeed, locate the tribe very differently (the passages are collected by Gesenius, Thes. s.v.). Our chief source of information about it is to be found in the inscriptions of Assurbanipal (George Smith, History of Assurbanipal, pp. 256–298; S. A. Smith, Keilschrifttexte Assurbanipal's, i. 58–75; Cuneiform Inscriptions of W. Asia, iii. plates 24–28, v. plates 7–10). The land of Ḳi-id-ri (G. Smith, p. 283), Ḳa-ad-ri (ib. p. 290), or Ki-id-ri (S. A. Smith, p. 60), and the people called Kid-ra-ai (G. Smith, p. 271), have been justly identified with Kedar by G. Smith and all who have commented on this king's annals (Delitzsch, Paradies, p. 299; Glaser, Skizze, ii. 267–274, etc.), as being mentioned in close proximity to A-ri-bi (the Arab) and Na-ba-ai-te (Nebaioth), and described as possessors of 'asses, camels, and sheep' (S. A. Smith, l.c. p. 67); moreover, some people mentioned with them are, according to one interpretation of a difficult word, described as 'dwellers in tents' (S. A. Smith, l.c. p. 103).

It is plain that the identification of Kedar with the Arabs, which is clearly found in Ca 1^{5}, and prevails in the later Jewish literature, had already commenced in Assyrian times; thus whereas Esarhaddon calls a certain Hazael king of Aribi (Cylinder A of the Esarhaddon Inscriptions, ed. Harper, p. 8), Assurbanipal, who repeats this passage, calls him king of Kedar (G. Smith, p. 283);* and though U-ai-te' is ordinarily styled by Esarhaddon 'king of the Arabs' (WAI iii. pl. 24. l. 11, 108, etc.), the Kedarites are particularly styled 'his men' (l. 107), and likewise the Arab general A-bi-ya-te' is called a Kedarite (l. 121). Nevertheless, a special country of Kedar existed, and from the detailed account of Assurbanipal's Arabian campaign it ought to be possible to locate it accurately. This monarch's army marched 100 Kash-bu Ḳaḳ-ḳa-ru from Nineveh, crossing the Tigris and Euphrates, to the wilderness of Mas, and 6 Kash-bu Ḳaḳ-ḳa-ru from Azalla in Mas to Kurasiti, where they besieged the Kedarites. It is not, however, clear whether the distance from Nineveh to Azalla, or to the border of Mas, is given in the first figure; and views differ as to the length of the measure employed (Glaser, l.c. p. 279 n.; Delitzsch, l.c. p. 177). Since the captives are sent to Damascus (l. 113), it seems probable that the direction of the king's march was towards Hauran (as Delitzsch, l.c., suggests) rather than Yemamah (where Glaser, l.c., endeavours to locate Kedar on what seem inadequate grounds). The fact, too, that the Kedarite kings invade Syria viâ Moab (WAI v. col. vii. 112; G. Smith, p. 288), points the same way.

With regard to the history of Kedar, we learn from the inscription that the gods of Hazael, king of Kedar, had been plundered by Esarhaddon (see above), but that Hazael, having sued for them, received them back (the chief being called Adarsamain), and was made vassal-king of Arabia. His son, called by Esarhaddon Ya'il, by Assurbanipal Ya'u-ta' (WAI iii. 21, col. viii. 37), more frequently U-ai-te' (ib. 21, col. viii. 7, etc.), probably on account of the heavier tribute exacted from him (Esarhaddon, l.c. 8, 20–24) in the next reign joined the party of Samas-sum-ukin, and invaded Syria; but being defeated by the Assyrians, fled to the friendly tribe Nebaioth, who, however, appear to have given him up to Assurbanipal. Another king of Kedar, named Ammuladi, thereupon invaded Syria a second time, but was also defeated, and taken together with Adiyah, wife of U-ai-te'. Simultaneously with the expedition into Syria, U-ai-te' had despatched a force to Babylon under the Kedarites Abiyate' and Aimu, the former of whom, after defeat, sued for pardon, and obtained the sovereignty of Arabia: this, however, he quickly resigned in favour of the cousin and namesake of the former king, who with the king of Nebaioth organized a fresh revolt, against which Assurbanipal's expedition was directed. The Kedarite nest was destroyed, and severe punishment inflicted on Arabia. The date of this invasion is probably B.C. 648 (cf. Lehmann, 'Samas-sum-ukin,' Assyriologische Bibliothek, viii. p. 6).

While the inscriptions of Assurbanipal thus explain the co-ordination of Kedar with 'Arab' and 'Nebaioth,' it is not probable that the blow dealt to Kedar by this monarch is that to which Is $21^{16,17}$ refers. Cheyne (l.c.), who thinks this passage may be Isaianic, seems inclined to connect it with an attack on the Arabs by Sargon; but this monarch nowhere mentions Kedar, and it seems doubtful whether this oracle can have been written before the hegemony of Kedar, which may have existed before the time of Hazael and Esarhaddon, but has not been shown to have been anterior to it. After two invasions of Syria by Arabs led by Kedarite kings, the name of the tribe could be made to stand for the nation, and this suggests that the oracle is later than the events described by Assurbanipal, since its author appears to reckon the Dedanim among the sons of Kedar (vv.^{13,17}); and the oracle in which they are threatened with an attack by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer $49^{3,28}$) is similarly loose in its application of their name.

Interesting as are the Kedarite names recorded in the inscriptions, they are evidently too carelessly transcribed to render identification safe; the name Ammuladi (like Amme'ta', S. A. Smith, l.c. ii. 38) is clearly Arabic, whereas Hazael is doubtless Aramaic. The name of the tribe itself is probably derived from the Arabic root Ḳdr, which gives a verb meaning 'to be able or powerful,' but derivatives of which have various senses, suitable for personal names. The name of their chief god

* In the corresponding plate of WAI this passage is obliterated.

(whence either they or a neighbouring tribe were called, Glaser, l.c. 278), A-tar-sa-ma-ai-in, seems to be either Phœnician or Aramaic הדר שמין (as it is analyzed by Delitzsch, l.c.) rather than a form of Athtar (as Glaser, l.c., suggests). Further suggestions for the derivation of these names are given by E. Sachau, ZA, 1897 (xii.), p. 44 ff.

D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

KEDEMAH (קַדְמָה 'eastward'). — A son of Ishmael, Gn 25^{15}=1 Ch 1^{31}. The clan of which he is the eponymous head has not been identified. Ball ('Genesis' in SBOT, ad loc.) considers that in both the above passages קַדְמָה is a mistake for נוֹדָב (Nodab), which is read in 1 Ch 5^{19}. He remarks that Kĕdĕmah, 'eastward,' is a singular name, that נו might be misread ק, while ב and מ are often confused. Neither the LXX (Κέδμα) nor Luc. (Κέδεμα) lend any support to Ball's proposed emendation.

KEDEMOTH (קְדְמוֹת).—A place apparently on the upper course of the Arnon, assigned to Reuben, Jos 13^{18}, and a Levitical city, 21^{37} (= 1 Ch 6^{79} [Heb. ^{64}]). The 'wilderness of Ḳedemoth' is mentioned in Dt 2^{26} as the point from which messengers were sent by Moses to Sihon. The exact site is unknown, although it has been suggested that it may be the ruin Umm er-Raṣâṣ, N.E. of Dibon (Dhibân).

LITERATURE.—Tristram, Land of Moab, 140 ff.; Baedeker-Socin, Pal.^{2} 193; Dillm. on Nu 21^{13}; Driver on Dt 2^{23}; Buhl, GAP 268.

C. R. CONDER.

KEDESH (קֶדֶשׁ).—1. A city in the south of Judah (Jos 15^{23}) whose site is uncertain. It is to be distinguished from Kadesh-barnea (see Dillm. ad loc.). 2. A city in Issachar, 1 Ch 6^{72} [Heb.^{57}], where, however, Kedesh is not improbably a textual error for Kishion (which see) of the parallel passage Jos 21^{28}. 3. See KEDESH-NAPHTALI.

KEDESH-NAPHTALI (קֶדֶשׁ נַפְתָּלִי Jg 4^6, also called 'Kedesh in Galilee,' Jos 21^{32}, 1 Ch 6^{76}; called simply 'Kedesh' in Jos 12^{22} 19^{37} 20^7, Jg $4^{9.\ 10.\ 11}$, 2 K 15^{29}, 1 Mac $11^{63.\ 73}$).—A city of refuge (Jos 20^7), and likewise a Levitical city (Jos 21^{32}). In early times it was fortified like a number of other cities in that region (Jos 19^{37}). Its full history would reveal, (1) a sacred city of the earliest inhabitants, (2) a stronghold of unusual importance, conquered by the Hebrews, conquered in turn by the Phœnicians, and a centre of great political influence down to the time when Titus encamped with his army before its walls. From its importance in many ways, and the wonderful fertility of the region, it could never have sunk into a condition of poverty or insignificance.

It is noted in biblical history as the residence of Barak, and here the warriors of Zebulun and Naphtali were assembled by Deborah and Barak before the battle with Sisera, and it was near the city that Sisera met his death (Jg $4^{6.\ 10}$; cf. Moore, ad loc.). During one of the many invasions of W. Asia by the Assyr. armies K., with many neighbouring cities, was captured by Tiglath-pileser (2 K 15^{29}). This was in the reign of Pekah, king of Israel, B.C. 734. In Maccabæan times, c. B.C. 150, it was here that Jonathan routed Demetrius, king of Syria, with his army (1 Mac 11^{63-73}; Jos. Ant. XIII. v. 6). At the beginning of our era it belonged to Tyre, and was hostile to the Galilæans (Jos. Wars, II. xviii. 1; IV. ii. 3).

Strong foundations and walls still surviving at the modern village called Ḳedes, lying to the north-west of the Lake of Hûleh, indicate the character of the ancient city, and among the remains several of the finest sarcophagi of the country have been recovered, one of which is double, i.e. made to contain two bodies under one lid, the stone pillows in each loculus being at alternate ends. K. was situated on a small plain surrounded by gentle forest-covered hills from which there was a wide outlook, and for picturesqueness and beauty it had few equals among the cities of Upper Galilee.

SELAH MERRILL.

KEHELATHAH (קְהֵלָתָה, Μακελλάθ, Luc. Μακελλάδ, Ceelatha, Nu $33^{22.\ 23}$).—One of the twelve stations in the journeyings of the children of Israel which are mentioned only in Nu 33. It follows Haẓeroth. Nothing is known about its position. The word is from the same Hebrew root (קהל) as Makheloth in v.^{25} [note that in the LXX the two words are very similar], and means 'assembly or congregation.'

A. T. CHAPMAN.

KEILAH (קְעִילָה) the Garmite (1 Ch 4^{19}). — See following art. and GENEALOGY.

KEILAH (קְעִילָה, Κεειλά, in Josephus Κίλλα, the inhabitants being Κιλλανοί or Κιλλῖται).—This city is interesting principally for its connexion with the history of David. Shortly after he began to gather men around him he defeated the Philistines, who had been raiding Keilah, and robbing the threshing-floors. In Keilah he remained for a while. Thither came to him Abiathar, the representative of the priestly house of Ithamar, bringing the ephod, after Saul had slain the priests at Nob. By consulting the ephod, David knew that Saul would come down to capture him, and that the men of Keilah, notwithstanding the service he had done them, would hand him over to Saul, and he therefore left the town (1 S 23^{1-13}). Apart from this incident, the OT mentions the name of Keilah in three other passages. It is in one of the groups of cities assigned to Judah in the Shephelah (Jos 15^{44}). The two halves of the 'district of Keilah' were represented in Nehemiah's wall-building work (Neh $3^{17.\ 18}$). And in a genealogical fragment (1 Ch 4^{19}), in connexion with certain other names that connect themselves with the geography, mention is made of 'the father of Keilah the Garmite' among the kindred of Caleb the son of Jephunneh.

In the time of David, Keilah was an important place, a city of gates and bars (1 S 23^7). Nehemiah hints at its importance in his time, by speaking of it as a double district. And it was a very important place many centuries earlier, when Ebed-tob and Su-yardata of the Tel el-Amarna tablets wrote of it (under the name Kilta) to the Egyptian king along with Gedor, Gath, and Rabbah (PSBA, June 1888, Bab. Tab. from Tel el-Amarna, iii.), and again along with Gezer, Gath, Rabbah, and Jerusalem (Mittheilungen aus der Orientalischen Sammlungen, part iii. Nos. 100, 106).

Keilah is commonly identified with Khurbet Kîla, about 7 miles east of Eleutheropolis, and 1575 ft. above the sea. This is reconcilable with the statement in the Onomasticon, that it is 17 miles (perhaps it should be 7, Jerome has it 8) from Eleutheropolis, on the road to Hebron; but it is difficult to think of so elevated a region as in the Shephelah (cf. Dillm. on Jos 15^{44}). The Onomasticon is cited, as well as later writings (Nicephorus, Hist. xii. 48, and Cassiodorus in Sozomen, Hist. vii. 29), as giving the tradition that the prophet Habakkuk was buried at Keilah, though other traditions say at Hukkok.

W. J. BEECHER.

KELAIAH (קְלָיָה).—A Levite who had married a foreign wife, Ezr 10^{23}, called in 1 Es 9^{23} Colius. In Ezr the gloss is added 'which is Kelita' (in 1 Es, 'who was called Calitas' [which see]). Kelita appears in Neh 8^{7} as one of the Levites who assisted Ezra in expounding the law (cf. 1 Es 9^{48}, Calitas), and his name occurs amongst the signatories to the covenant, Neh 10^{10}. It does not follow, however, that, because Kelaiah was also called Kelita, he is to be identified with this Kelita. Siegfried-Stade think not.

KELITA.—See KELAIAH.

KEMUEL (קְמוּאֵל).—The son of Nahor and father of Aram, Gn 22^{21} (contrast 10^{22} where Aram is son of Shem, and see Dillm. ad loc.). Knobel proposed to connect Kemuel with Kamula in N. Mesopotamia, but this is pronounced by Dillmann to be out of the question. 2. The prince (נָשִׂיא) of the tribe of Ephraim, one of the twelve commissioners for the dividing of the land, Nu 34^{24} (P). 3. The father of Hashabaiah the ruler (נָגִיד) of the Levites, 1 Ch 27^{17}.

KENAN (קֵינָן). — Son of Enoch and father of Mahalelel, Gn $5^{9.\ 12}$ (AV Cainan; but AVm, like RV, Kenan), 1 Ch $1^{1.\ 2}$. LXX has Καινάν, which reappears in Lk $3^{37t.}$ (WH read Καινάμ), giving Cainan (which see) of EV. The name Kenan is simply a variation of Cain (קַיִן 'spear'). 'Halévy (Recherches Bibl. ix. 219) calls attention to the fact that Kênân was the name of a god among the Sabæans' (cf. Baethgen, Beiträge, 127 f.). See Dillm. on Gn 5^{9}.

KENATH (קְנָת) is mentioned (Nu 32^{42}) as having been captured by a clan of Machir, which then gave it their own name of Nobah. Their occupation was only temporary, for Geshur and Aram (1 Ch 2^{23}) reconquered Kenath with its daughter towns.

The Onom. (Lagarde, 269. 15, 296. 109) speaks of a village 'now called Καναθά, lying ἐν Τραχῶνι πλησίον Βοστρῶν'; and Jos. (BJ I. xix. 2) mentions a Καναθά which in his time belonged to Coele-syria. In accordance with these indications, the site has been generally identified with el-Ḳanawât, a place on the western edge of the Hauran range which contains important ruins from the Roman and Christian periods. The fullest description of its present condition is found in Merrill (East of Jordan, 36–43). If this be correct, Kenath offers an instance of the persistence of a native name during and in spite of a temporary alien occupation. The accuracy of this identification has been recently contested by, e.g., Socin (Bäd.[2] 313) and Moore (Comm. on Judges 8^{11}). See, further, Dillm. on Nu 32^{42}.

A. C. WELCH.

KENAZ (קְנַז).—The eponym of the Kenizzite clan, variously described in OT as the son of Eliphaz and grandson of Esau (Gn 36^{11} R), as a 'duke' of Edom (Gn 36^{42} P), as the father of Othniel (Jos 15^{17} JE), and as the grandson of Caleb (1 Ch 4^{15}). The Kenizzites (AV Kenezites), who are named amongst the inhabitants of Canaan in patriarchal times (Gn 15^{19} R), had probably their original settlements in Mt. Seir (which would account for K. being called a grandson of Esau or Edom), and from thence a branch migrated to the S. of Canaan (see CALEB). The Chronicler makes K. a descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4^{13-15}).

KENITES (הַקֵּינִי, הַקֵּינִים; in Nu 24^{22}, Jg 4^{11} קַיִן, οἱ Κεναῖοι, Κιναῖοι, Cinæus, Kain), first mentioned in Gn 15^{19} along with the Kenizzites and Kadmonites of Edom. Balaam 'looked upon' them from the mountains of Moab, and punning upon the likeness of their name to the Hebrew ḳên, 'nest,' declared that though their 'nest' was 'in a rock' (Ṣela', perhaps the later Petra), they should be 'wasted'* until Asshur should carry them away captive (Nu $24^{21.\ 22}$). Acc. to Jg 1^{16}, Hobab, the father-in-law of Moses, was a Kenite, and his descendants 'went up out of the city of palm trees with the children of Judah into the wilderness of Judah, which is in the south of Arad; and they went and dwelt among the people.' It was in this direction that the Jewish town of Kinah stood (Jos 15^{22}). We find one of the Kenites, Heber, separating himself from the rest of the tribe and camping in the northern part of Israel, near Kedesh, at the time of the overthrow of Sisera (Jg $4^{11.\ 17}$). The Chronicler includes them among the ancestors of the great houses of Judah (1 Ch 2^{55}); and Saul forewarned the Kenites of his intended attack on the Amalekites or Bedâwin, as they had 'showed kindness to all the children of Israel when they came up out of Egypt' (1 S 15^{6}). Similarly, when David pretended to Achish of Gath that he had raided the enemies of the Philistines, he associates together the Israelites of S. Judah, the Jerahmeelites (1 Ch 2^{25}) and the Kenites (1 S 27^{10}). Subsequently he sent presents out of the spoil which he had acquired to 'the elders of Judah' who 'were in the cities of the Kenites' (1 S 30^{29}). Hammath, the ancestor of the Rechabites, is also stated to have been a Kenite (1 Ch 2^{55}).

It is thus clear that the K. were regarded as closely allied to the Isr., or at all events to the tribe of Judah. As the father-in-law of Moses was priest of Midian, it would seem that they were also connected with the Midianites. Like the Bedâwin, they were nomads, and the description of the Rechabites (Jer 35^{6-10}) shows that even under the monarchy those who lived in the land of Israel still inhabited tents and clung to all the nomadic habits of their forefathers. As was natural, they were chiefly to be found in the south of Judah, and more especially in the desert to the south of it. They thus resembled the gipsies of modern Europe, as well as the travelling tinkers or blacksmiths of the Middle Ages.

Indeed, it is not improbable that they really represent a tribe of smiths. The word Ḳênî or 'Kenite' means 'a smith' in Aramaic, from a root which has given ḳayin, 'a lance,' in Hebrew. We know that the smiths of the ancient world formed a corporation which was regarded as possessing special secrets, and whose members led wandering lives. We also know that in the time of Samuel the Israelites had no smiths of their own, all having been removed by the Philistines 'lest the Hebrews make them swords or spears' (1 S $13^{19.\ 20}$). It would appear, therefore, that the blacksmith's art was confined to a particular corporation, and that the Israelites were unacquainted with it. Yet the art of working in iron as well as bronze was known in Canaan at an early period: in the Travels of the Mohar, a story written in Egypt in the time of Ramses II., the hero of the tale finds an iron-smith ready to hand when an accident happens to his chariot.

Josephus, who elsewhere calls the Kenites Κενεῖδες, speaks of them as 'the race of the Shechemites' (Σικιμιτῶν) in his account of Saul's expedition (Ant. VI. vii. 3). The Targums transform the name into Salmaite, from Salma, 'the father of Beth-lehem,' who seems to be termed a Kenite in 1 Ch $2^{54.\ 55}$. The Sam. VS of Gn 15^{19} inserts the same name before 'Kenite.'

* Hommel (AHT 245 n.) follows Klostermann in reading לְעֵבֶר for לְקֵנִי, 'Kain shall belong to the 'Eber.' The emendation is not a happy one, any more than Hommel's explanation of Ash(h)ur in the same passage.

KENIZZITE.—See KENAZ.

KENOSIS (Lat. inanitio, exinanitio, evacuatio; Eng. 'self-stripping,' 'self-divesting,' 'self-emptying'). — This is not a biblical word, occurring neither in the LXX nor in the NT (though once in its literal sense in Theod.'s tr^{n} of Is 34^{11}). It is a technical word of later theology found in some fragments of the κατὰ Βήρωνος καὶ Ἡλικος, wrongly attributed to Hippolytus, in Gregory of Nazianzus (Or. 31), Cyril of Alexandria (Ep. 2 ad Nest. 70A), and later writers, to express the action implied in the use of the cognate verb in Ph 2^{7} ἑαυτὸν ἐκένωσεν ('semetipsum exinanivit,' Vulg.; 'exhausit semetipsum,' Tert. adv. Marc. v. 20; 'made himself of no reputation,' AV; 'emptied himself,' RV).

In this passage the extent of the self-emptying is explained by the following participle, μορφὴν δούλου λαβών: that of which He emptied Himself, by the preceding words, τὸ εἶναι ἴσα θεῷ: so that the meaning is 'He emptied Himself' of His position of equality with God, of 'that condition of glory and majesty which was the adequate manifestation of the divine nature' (Gifford, ad loc.; cf. κενώσας ἑαυτὸν ἀπὸ τοῦ εἶναι ἴσα θεῷ, Synod of Antioch, ap. Routh, Rell. Sacr. iii. p. 298) by 'taking on Himself the form of a servant.' The phrase means little more than that He accepted the limitations implied in incarnation (cf. ἐπτώχευσεν πλούσιος ὤν, 2 Co 8^{9}), and was probably suggested to St. Paul as the antithesis to the conception of the fulness (πλήρωμα) of God which dwelt essentially in His Son. In correspondence with this, kenosis in its earliest theological use is little more than a synonym for the Incarnation, but it emphasized the Incarnation as a divine act, human nature being saved from above rather than by self-development from below, and hence it is a favourite word with Cyril in his argument against Nestorius; it emphasized also the free voluntary condescension of the preincarnate Son, and the fact that there were real limitations imposed by Himself upon Himself during the incarnate life. It is put forward by St. Paul as an example of the way in which men should not look only each to his own things, but each also to the things of others. But mediæval and Reformed theology attempted to define more exactly what these limitations were, and with this there followed a change in the exact meaning of the word kenosis.

(a) It was applied to the limitations upon the Christ in His incarnate human life; to the limitations imposed upon divine omnipotence and divine omniscience within the human sphere of action, in order to allow a real growth and action of human will and human knowledge; and the word was sometimes used widely to apply to all such limitations, sometimes (e.g. in the discussions of the 17th cent.) it was used, in antithesis to κρύψις, of a virtual surrender of such attributes, as opposed to a possession but conscious restraint in the use of them. On these exact points the Bible does not define, but it supplies the factors that have to be reconciled, viz. the reality of a divine oneness between the Father and the Son (Jn 1$^{1\text{-}18}$ 10^{30}, He 1^{3}), certain limitations of perfect intercourse between the Father and the Incarnate Son (Mt 27^{46} ἵνα τί με ἐγκατέλιπες;), certain statements of the Lord Himself as to the limitations of His own knowledge (Mk 13^{32}) and of His own 'glory' (Jn 17^{4}), and statements of NT writers as to the reality of temptation, and of growth in wisdom and learning in Him (Lk 2$^{40\text{-}52}$, He 4^{15} 5$^{7.\ 8}$). The analogy of the primary use of the word by St. Paul also suggests that the kenosis was always a self-kenosis; that as the original Incarnation was an act of voluntary self-restraint, so the whole state of the incarnate life implied a constant voluntary limitation imposed upon a power or a knowledge that was His by right (cf. Gore, ubi infra, p. 218; Ottley, Incarnation, ii. 291), 'He willed not to use His power, not to use His knowledge,' is a surer formula than 'He could not.'

(b) It has been also applied to limitations imposed upon the Incarnate Christ with respect to His divine attributes as exercised within the divine sphere of action during the incarnate life; so that kenosis will imply the absolute or partial cessation of the Word's cosmic functions while He was incarnate. On this point, again, the Bible supplies no clear teaching, though the language of He 1^{3} (ὢν . . . φέρων . . . ἐκάθισεν) seems to imply a permanence of cosmic functions; and such a cessation conflicts not only with the general stream of Christian theology, but with the conception of the unchangeable character of the divine nature.

LITERATURE.—The best exegesis of Ph 2^{7} is to be found in Gifford, The Incarnation (1897), (cf. also Lightfoot, ad loc.). For the later theological usage, cf. KERAS (Κηράς, AV Ceras), 1 Es 5^{29}.—Head of a family of temple servants who returned with Zerubbabel; called KEROS (קֵרֹס, A Κήραος, B Καδής), Ezr 2^{44}, Neh 7^{47} (ℵA Κειράς, B -ρά).

KERCHIEFS (מְקִפָּחוֹת, ἐπιβόλαια) are mentioned only in Ezk 13$^{18.\ 21}$, where a woe is pronounced upon the false prophetesses 'who sew bands (or fillets, not pillows as in AV, RV) upon all joints of the hand, and make kerchiefs for the heads of (persons of) every stature, to hunt souls.' The passage is somewhat obscure, but the reference appears to be undoubtedly to some species of divination practised in order to obtain oracles. The מְקִפָּחוֹת seem to have been large veils or coverings thrown over the head and reaching down to the feet (and this is the original meaning of the Eng. word), and were adapted to every stature. The wearer of the fillets and 'kerchiefs' was in this way introduced into the magical circle (cf. Davidson's and Bertholet's notes in their Comm. ad loc.). Hitzig notes the analogy of the later practice of wearing tĕphillîm and putting on the large ṭallith at prayer (cf. Mt 23^{5}).

In the Wyclifite Bible of 1382 occurs the form 'couercheues' (Is 3^{23}, changed in 1388 into 'kercheues'), which shows the derivation from Fr. couvre-chef (couvrir to cover, chef the head). The Geneva version has 'vailes upon the head' in the text, but in marg. 'kerchefes to couer their heades.' The Bishops' Bible first gives 'kerchiefes' in the text. When the derivation of the word was obscured, it came to be used more generally for any small piece of dress. In this sense the word is still familiar in 'handkerchief,' though both 'kerchief' itself and its other compound 'neckerchief' are nearly gone out (see Craik, Eng. of Shaks. 176).

KERÊ.—See TEXT OF OLD TESTAMENT.

KEREN-HAPPUCH (קֶרֶן הַפּוּךְ, literally 'horn of antimony,' so Vulg.; LXX strangely 'Αμαλθείας κέρας, 'horn of Amalthæa,' i.e. plenty). — The youngest daughter born to Job in his second estate of prosperity (Job 42^{14}). The name is indicative of beautiful eyes, from the dye made of antimony, used to tinge the eyelashes (cf. Dillm. or Davidson, ad loc.; and see 2 K 9^{30}, Jer 4^{30}).

KERIOTH (קְרִיּוֹת).—A place in Moab, Jer 48^{24} (in v.^{41} with art. הַקְּרִיּוֹת, RVm 'the cities'), Am 2^{2}. It is mentioned on the Moabite Stone, l. 13, where Mesha declares that he dragged 'the altar-hearth of Davdoh (?) before Chemosh * in Ḳeriyyoth'. Its site is uncertain, but weighty arguments have been adduced in favour of identifying it with Ar (wh. see), the capital of Moab (Is 15[1]), which was probably situated in the valley of the Arnon, somewhere on the N. or N.E. border of Moab (see Driver on Am 2[2] and Dt 2[9. 18], and cf. Buhl, GAP 270, who identifies Kerioth, however, not with Ar, but with Kir—the latter of which again he identifies with Rabbath-moab, while he considers Ar to be the name not of a city, but of a district, that, namely, to the south of the Arnon). J. A. SELBIE.

KERIOTH-HEZRON (קְרִיּוֹת־חֶצְרוֹן, LXX αἱ πόλεις Ἀσερών, AV 'Kerioth [and] Hezron).—A place in the Negeb of Judah (Jos 15[25], where it is added, 'which is Hazor.' See HAZOR, No. 4, and HEZRON, p. 379[b]). Kerioth-hezron should probably be identified with the modern Ḳarjetein, N.E. of Tell 'Arâd. In all probability this was the birthplace of the traitor disciple Judas (wh. see), the name Iscariot being=אִישׁ קְרִיּוֹת 'man of Kerioth.' This is much more plausible than the conjecture which connects Iscariot with Azkaroth of Midrash Bereshith rabba, ch. 98, which Schwarz (Das heil. Land, p. 128) identifies with el-'Askar (Sychar ?).

KESITAH.—The ḳĕsîṭāh (קְשִׂיטָה) is mentioned only three times in the OT (Gn 33[19], Jos 24[32], Job 42[11]). In the first and primary passage—to which one of the other passages certainly, and both probably (cf. Budde's 'Hiob,' Einleit. p. xliii) refer—Jacob is represented as paying a hundred ḳĕsîṭāhs for the 'parcel of ground where he had spread his tent' at Shalem. The ḳĕsîtah therefore must have been a standard of value, probably metallic (cf. Job 42[11]). Its meaning and value in modern currency, however, are entirely unknown. The oldest versions (LXX, Onkelos, Vulgate) give 'lamb' or 'sheep,' on what grounds we do not know. In our Eng. VSS the rendering is 'piece of money' (AV once 'piece of silver,' Jos 24[32]). Ball, in Haupt's SBOT (Genesis, p. 91), proposes for philological reasons to point קְשִׁיטָה ḳĕshîṭāh. Spurrell (Notes on Gen.[2] p. 288) has a good note (wh. see). Cf. Madden. Coins of the Jews, p. 11; Jacobé, 'La Kesita' in Rev. de l'hist. et de litt. Bibl. i. 6, pp. 515–518 (not seen); and see art. MONEY in this Dictionary.

KETAB (Κητάβ, AV Cetab), 1 Es 5[30].—Head of a family of temple servants who returned with Zerubbabel. There is no corresponding name in the lists of Ezr and Neh.

KETHIBH.—See TEXT OF OLD TESTAMENT.

KETTLE.—See FOOD, p. 40, V. 2.

KETURAH (קְטוּרָה 'incense').—According to Gn 25[1] (probably J), Abraham, after the death of Sarah (this is certainly the meaning intended by the compiler of Gn in its present form), again took (וַיֹּסֶף וַיִּקַּח) a wife (אִשָּׁה), Keturah, who bore to him six sons, who became the ancestors of Arab tribes. In v.[6] (R) she bears the less honourable designation of פִּילֶגֶשׁ 'concubine' (cf. 1 Ch 1[32]). The Keturah episode in Abraham's life is an evidence at once of the presence of different documents in Gn, the hopelessness of discovering a consistent chronology in that book, and the tendency of personal to shade off into tribal history. In the light of Gn 17[17] 'Shall a child be born to him that is a hundred years old?' it would be strange if the same writer, according to whose chronology Abraham was 137 years old at the time of Sarah's death (Gn 23[1]), should relate, without remark, the birth of six sons to him after that event. Of course the difficulty disappears when we observe that a tradition independent of P and P's chronology is preserved by J in Gn 25[1-5], relating to Keturah. Further, as has been shown already in art. ABRAHAM (p. 16[a]), it is impossible to resist the conclusion that the Keturah story is really an embodiment of the Israelitish belief of the relationship of Arabian clans and tribes to the Hebrew stock rather than the record of personal history.

From the meaning of the name Keturah, 'frankincense,' Sprenger (Geog. Arab. 295) suggests that the 'sons of Keturah' were so named because the author of Gn 25[1ff.] knew them as traders in that commodity. A tribe Ḳatûrâ, living in the neighbourhood of Mecca, is named by the later Arab genealogists (Ritter, Erdkunde, xii. 19 ff.). On the various Keturah tribes of Gn 25 see sep. articles on the names of these. J. A. SELBIE.

KEY, LOCK.—Many of the old houses in Lebanon have still the ancient wooden lock commonly known in England as the Egyptian lock. It is generally fixed on the outside of the door, but in large villages and towns it is often put on the inside, a hole being cut in the door to allow the arm with the key to be inserted.

The Syrian lock consists of two pieces of wood set at right angles to each other. The upright piece is nailed to the door, and has in its upper part four or five holes bored, into which headed pins, or nails with the points cut off, are dropped; the upper part of these holes is then plugged with wood. When the cross-bolt is pushed rapidly into the socket in the door-post these pins fall into holes made in the bolt to receive them, and so prevent its withdrawal. The bolt is hollow from the outer end for rather more than half its length, and into this hollow end the key (כַּפְתֹּר) is inserted. The latter is a piece of wood about 9 in. long, with pins inserted in its upper surface at one end, to correspond with the holes in the bolt. When the pins in the key enter the holes in the bolt the key is pressed upwards, and the pins of the lock are thus raised above the bolt, which is then set free, and is withdrawn by the key. The length of the bolt is usually about 8½ in., but there are locks very much larger. The key, owing to its size, is generally stuck in the girdle, but is sometimes tied to a handkerchief and slung over the shoulder. The principle of this lock is really the same as that of Bramah's and Chubb's locks. See, further, art. HOUSE, p. 434 f.

Doors or gates are sometimes barred on the inside. The bar often extends from post to post across the door, but frequently the bar is inserted into a recess in the wall from which it is partly withdrawn, and so secures the door.

For use of 'keys' in Mt 16[19] see art. POWER OF KEYS. W. CARSLAW.

KEZIAH (קְצִיעָה, i.e. cassia, or 'fragrant as cinnamon').—The name of the second daughter born to Job after his restoration to prosperity (Job 42[14]).

KIBROTH-HATTAAVAH (קִבְרֹת הַתַּאֲוָה).—A station in the wanderings of the Israelites on the journey from Sinai to Kadesh, and within one day's journey from Sinai, Nu 11[34] 33[16], Dt 9[22]. Its identification depends, therefore, on those of Sinai and Kadesh (which see). The traditional site, as early as the days of St. Sylvia of Aquitaine (c. A.D. 388), was a little to the north of the Nuḳb el-Hawa, or 'Pass of the Wind,' by which travellers are wont to reach expeditiously the plain at the foot of the traditional Sinai ('hic autem locus, ubi se montes aperiebant, iunctus est cum eo loco quo sunt memoriæ concupiscentiæ'). The name, 'graves of lust,' seems to imply something of a monumental character (? cairn, cromlech).

KID.—See GOAT.

KIDNEYS.—The Heb. word kĕlāyôth (כְּלָיוֹת, LXX and Rev 2[23] νεφροί) has received two distinct renderings in our EVV according as it is used literally or figuratively.

1. In the literal sense kĕlāyôth is used only of the kidneys of animals offered in sacrifice (except in three poetical passages, Job 16[13], Ps 139[13], La 3[13], where it refers to the human organs), and is so rendered. By the law of the Priests' Code, 'the two kidneys and the fat that is upon them, which is by the flanks' (RV loins*), along with certain other parts of the viscera, were J"'s special share of all the sacrificial victims. Special instructions to this effect are given (Lv 3[4. 10. 15]) for the various victims in the case of the peace-offering—the remaining portions of the carcase being consumed by the worshippers, the blood, of course, always excepted—for the sin-offering (4[9]), the trespass-offering (7[4]), and, in narrative form, for the special consecration sacrifices (8[16. 25. 28], Ex 29[13. 22]). In the case of sacrificial victims burnt entire upon the altar, such instructions were unnecessary. The raison d'être of the peculiar sanctity attaching to these parts of the viscera is to be found in the idea, common to the Semitic and other ancient peoples, that these parts were, next to the blood, the seat of life (see esp. ES[1] p. 359 ff.), and accordingly, with the blood, to be given back to the Author of life. With the advance of reflexion and speculation on the mystery of life, the practice found its justification rather in the thought that the parts specified, and the kidneys in particular, were the choicest portions of the victim, and therefore appropriately devoted to J". This point of view led to the poetical figure in the comparatively late 'Song of Moses,' the 'kidney-fat of wheat' (Dt 32[14], EV 'the fat of kidneys of wheat') to express the finest variety of that cereal (cf. Is 34[6] 'the kidney-fat of rams').

2. A natural extension of the idea of the kidneys as an important seat of life led to their being regarded as one of the organs of feeling, as the seat not only of impulse and affection, but of the moral sentiments (see Delitzsch, Biblical Psychology, § xiii.; Dillmann, Handb. d. AT Theologie, p. 359). In this, to us figurative, sense our translators have adopted the rendering 'reins' (from Lat. renes, 'kidneys'), as also in the three poetical passages cited above (under 1). Jeremiah in particular is fond of this use of the word kĕlāyôth as a synonym of lēbh, the heart. Thus J" is said to be 'near' in the mouth of the wicked, but far from their 'reins' (Jer 12[2]), a thought expressed by Isaiah (29[13]) and Ezekiel (33[31]) by the contrast of 'mouth' and 'heart.' Jeremiah also repeatedly emphasizes J"'s character as the supreme Judge who 'tries the reins and heart' of men (Jer 11[20], with slight variations 17[10] 20[12]; cf. Ps 26[2], Rev 2[23]). The kidneys or reins are also represented in poetry as the seat of conscience, man's moral teacher (Ps 7[9] 'my reins instruct me'), monitor (73[21] 'I was pricked in my reins'), and approving judge (Pr 23[16] 'my reins shall rejoice, when thy lips speak right things'). With this thought may be compared the late Jewish conceit that of man's two kidneys, 'one prompts him to do good, the other to do evil' (Talmud, Berakhoth 61*a*; cf. Ro 7[19ff.]).

KIDRON, THE BROOK (נַחַל קִדְרוֹן [i.e. 'the torrent-valley or wady of Kidron']; LXX ὁ χειμάρρους Κεδρών, but twice (2 S 15[23a] [B][b] [A], 1 K 15[13] AB) ὁ χειμάρρους τῶν Κέδρων, once (Jer 31 [Gr. 38][40]) νάχαλ [B; A χειμάρρους] K.; NT, only in Jn 18[1] ὁ χειμάρρους τῶν Κέδρων, or according to some MSS, τοῦ Κέδρου or τοῦ Κεδρών).—A deep depression in the ground on the east side of Jerusalem, which is dry not only in summer but also during the greater part of the winter season, but in which after heavy rains a torrent sometimes flows.

The generally accepted explanation of the name (קִדְרוֹן from root קדר 'become black') is from the dark colour of the stream or the ravine.

Baur, who has been followed by Hilgenfeld, has made this the basis of an elaborate attack on the Fourth Gospel, arguing that the writer has imagined Κέδρων to be the genitive plural of κέδρος, 'a cedar,' and therefore cannot be the Apostle John, who as a Jew would have known that the name was derived from קִדְרוֹן 'dark.' Lightfoot, who in his Biblical Essays discusses this objection, dwells upon the fact, already alluded to, that in two passages in the LXX (2 S 15[23], and 1 K 15[13]) the reading which has the support of AB is τῶν κέδρων; yet the LXX translators cannot have mistaken the meaning of the word, otherwise they could not have written, as they generally do, ὁ χειμάρρους Κέδρων, which on this supposition would be a solecism. Lightfoot also calls attention to the great uncertainty as to the actual reading in Jn 18[1]; and, though the preponderance of MS evidence is either for τῶν Κέδρων or τοῦ Κέδρου, he believes the true account to be that the original reading was τοῦ Κεδρών; because this reading will explain the other two, whereas neither of the other two will explain either this or each other; and also because it is much more probable that τοῦ Κεδρών would be changed into τῶν Κέδρων and τοῦ Κέδρου, than conversely, the tendency being to assimilate terminations. This solution was adopted by Griesbach and Lachmann. Westcott and Hort, however, in their 'Notes on Select Readings' defend the reading τῶν Κέδρων, and regard it as probably preserving 'the true etymology of קִדְרוֹן, which seems to be an archaic

*See the coloured illustrations in Driver and White's Leviticus Haupt's SBOT), facing p. 4.

(? Canaanite) plural of קדר, "the Dark [trees]"; for though no name from this root is applied to any tree in biblical Hebrew, some tree resembling a cedar was called, by a similar name in at least the later language (see exx. in Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. 1976); and the Greek κέδρος is probably of Phœnician origin.' WH rightly maintain that נַחַל denoted not so much the stream as the ravine through which it flowed, and remark that isolated patches of cedar-forest may well have survived from prehistoric times in sheltered spots.

The Valley of Kidron (modern Wady Sitti Marjam) begins towards the north-west of Jerusalem at the foot of Mount Scopus, where the rocks appear to have been hollowed out by quarrying for stones for building tombs; afterwards it turns to the right towards the south, separating Jerusalem by a deep depression of the ground from the Mount of Olives. It is here at the east side of the city that the name Kidron was specially applied to it, for the descent is here much steeper than at the north side of Jerusalem; but the whole forms one continuous channel. Near the site of Gethsemane, where the ravine may have been crossed by our Lord and the eleven apostles on the evening of the betrayal, the bottom of the Kidron is about 150 ft. below Gethsemane, but nearly 380 ft. below the platform of the temple. The bed of the river becomes more perceptible as it turns towards the south, though it is only on rare occasions that water flows in it. There is, however, a curious spring which rises in a cave on the west side of the Kidron, and which appears to have originally flowed into the Kidron valley, but to have been diverted later through a tunnel cut in the rock through the ridge that forms the southern part of the Temple hill. A remarkable inscription was discovered in 1880 which records in pure Hebrew the making of this tunnel; and though it unfortunately gives no information about its date other than what can be inferred from the language and the characters in which it is written, it is conjectured with great probability that it may refer to the engineering work which was carried out by Hezekiah at the time of Sennacherib's invasion of Judæa, when 'he took counsel with his princes to stop the waters of the fountains which were without the city, and they helped him. So there was gathered much people together, and they stopped all the fountains, and the brook that flowed through the midst of the land' (2 Ch $32^{3.4}$). Robinson had suggested long before this discovery that the Kidron might very possibly flow beneath the present surface of the ground; and Barclay asserted that at a point in the valley about two miles below the city the murmuring of a stream could be distinctly heard, which stream on excavating he actually discovered. There may, therefore, before the time of Hezekiah, have been a flow of water in the now dry valley of the Kidron.

On leaving the city, the Kidron valley turns south-east towards the Dead Sea, and as it proceeds becomes deeper and more precipitous, its bed being more than 300 ft. deep. It passes here through a barren and desolate region, where many of the Essenes and anchorites made their homes in grottoes which have been excavated in its sides.

The name Kidron does not occur in the earlier books of the Bible; but after David had made Jerusalem the capital of the kingdom, the physical geography of the country in its immediate neighbourhood naturally became more closely connected with the history of Judah than it had hitherto been.

The first mention is in 2 S 15^{23}, where in the story of David's flight from Absalom it is recorded that he passed over the brook (nahal) Kidron. The next mention is in 1 K 2^{37}, in the prohibition to Shimei against his ever crossing Kidron. This passage has been relied on by some scholars (e.g. Sir G. Grove) as showing that the name of Kidron was sometimes given to the ravines on the west of Jerusalem; since otherwise Solomon's prohibition would not have been trangressed by Shimei's journey to Gath to recover his fugitive slaves; for whether Gath be identified with Tell es-Safieh or with Beit Jibrîn, it would in either case be by the western or Bethlehem gate that Shimei would leave the city, and the valley on the east side would be altogether out of his way. The narrative, however, does not assert that he actually passed over Kidron; and indeed, when it is carefully examined, it rather suggests the contrary. In the prohibition Shimei is commanded, 'Go not forth thence any whither,' and then the king adds, 'For on the day thou goest out and passest over the brook Kidron, know thou for certain that thou shalt surely die.' But in the recapitulation of the prohibition made after Shimei's journey to Gath, it is the general command 'not to walk abroad any whither' which alone is dwelt on, and there is now no mention of Kidron at all. The reason for its having been expressly mentioned in the original probibition probably was because it was on the direct road to Shimei's home at Bahurîm, and was the boundary of the city on that side.

The later references to the Kidron in the historical books of the OT all without exception occur in the accounts given of the destruction of heathen images and altars which were either burned at Kidron, or, when broken or ground to powder, were cast into its valley or on the graves which studded it. In 1 K 15^{13} and in 2 Ch 15^{16} it is recorded that Asa burned at Kidron the idol which his mother had set up; and in 2 Ch 29^{16} and 30^{14} that Hezekiah cast into the Kidron the pollutions which had been found in the temple, and the altars that were in Jerusalem; and in 2 K $23^{4.6.12}$ that Josiah burned at Kidron the Asherah that had been in the house of the LORD, and stamped it small to powder, and cast the powder thereof upon the graves of the children of the people. As graves were regarded as polluting all who walked over them or came in contact with them, the intention of these reforming kings was clearly to dishonour thus the images to which worship had been paid, and the altars which had been used in that worship; but from the words of 2 Ch 34^{5} 'it would appear that in Josiah's case at least there was some intention of also dishonouring the graves,' for it is there expressly said that he strewed the dust of the images upon the graves of them that had sacrificed unto them.

The neighbourhood of Kidron would seem to be referred to in Jer 26^{23}; but the only place in the prophetical writings in which it is mentioned by name is in Jer 31^{40}. The passage is a remarkable one. 'And the whole valley of the dead bodies, and of the ashes, and all the fields unto the brook Kidron, unto the corner of the horse gate toward the east, shall be holy unto the LORD, it shall not be plucked up, nor thrown down any more for ever.'

The popular name for the Kidron valley, the Valley of Jehoshaphat (wh. see), is not found in the Bible or in Josephus, and cannot be traced earlier than the 4th cent. after Christ. It appears first in the Onomasticon of Eusebius (272, 89), and then in Jerome's Onomasticon (145, 13), and in his Commentary on Joel. It is derived from a supposed identification of the valley of the Kidron with the valley spoken of in Joel's prophecy (Jl $3^{2.12}$). The identification of the two is clearly an error (but see Driver, ad loc.). The narrow ravine of Kidron would be a most unsuitable place for the gathering of the nations; and it is to be noted that the word twice used by Joel for the Valley of Jehoshaphat is עֵמֶק, which denotes a wide spacious valley fit for cornfields and suitable for a battlefield, whereas the word habitually employed for the Kidron valley in the OT is נַחַל, denoting a narrow valley or ravine (the modern wady); and these words are never interchanged. There is, however, one passage—2 K 23[4]—in which the expression shadmôth Ḳidrôn (Heb. שְׂדְמוֹת קִדְרוֹן, LXX σαδημὼθ [A; σαλημὼθ B] Κεδρών) occurs, which is translated both in AV and RV 'fields of Kidron' (prob. a point at the junction with the Valley of Hinnom), but the usual term, naḥal, is again used in 2 K 23[6].

It has been suggested that the name, 'the Valley of Jehoshaphat' in Jl may be a purely imaginary name, and may represent a locality which had no existence except in the vision of the prophet. Robinson (BRP[2] i. 269) conjectures that it may be a metaphorical allusion to the significance of the name Jehoshaphat, 'J" judgeth.' This view appears to be favoured by the tr[s] of Theodotion, χώρα κρίσεως, and by that of Targ. Jon. 'The place of the decision of judgment.' Michaelis takes this view, and supposes it to be a prediction of Maccabæan victories. It has also been suggested that the frequent mention by Joel of Mount Zion, Jerusalem, and the Temple, may have led to the belief that the valley spoken of in the same prophecy was in the immediate neighbourhood.

This characteristic of the prophet Joel may, however, suggest a somewhat different conclusion. His frequent use of the names of real localities in his prophecies may be appealed to as making it probable that the vision of the Valley of Jehoshaphat may also be connected with a real locality. It may be noted that the word used by the Chronicler (2 Ch 20[26]) to describe the valley in which Jehoshaphat assembled the people after his victory over the combined forces of the Edomites, Ammonites, and Moabites is the same word (עֵמֶק) which is twice used by Joel to describe the valley of Jehoshaphat. The author of Ch is, of course, one of the later writers of the OT, but he is more ancient than the other authorities quoted. The historical event is recorded in Kings as well as in Chronicles, though the account in Ch is fuller. The defeat of so many nations, and the great deliverance thus granted to Judah in the past, might have seemed to the prophet a not unapt type of the future gathering of the nations, and of the victory over them which he foretold. This might help to explain the transference of the title the 'Valley of Jehoshaphat' to the Kidron valley in later times: for the valley which was the scene of Jehoshaphat's victory stretches very near that part of the Kidron which turns towards the Dead Sea.

At the present time the Jewish as well as the Christian and Mohammedan population of Palestine identify the valley of Kidron with the scene of Joel's prophecy, and believe that the Last Judgment will be held there. It is the dearest wish of every Jew to obtain a grave at Kidron.

One of the four monuments by the Kidron at the foot of the Mount of Olives is associated by popular tradition with Jehoshaphat, though it is recorded in 1 K 22[50] that Jehoshaphat was buried in the city of David. This is repeated in 2 Ch 21[1].

The title given to Kidron in Jer 31[40] 'the valley of the dead bodies,' suggests that Ezekiel, who so often repeats more fully notes which had been struck by Jeremiah, may have intended to represent Kidron by the valley of dry bones to which he was carried out in the spirit of the Lord (Ezk 37). The imagery, indeed, of the vision may have been suggested by sights which he had seen in Mesopotamia, in the desert track where, as Stanley remarks, bones and skeletons of man and beast, the remnants of some vast caravan or the burial-place of some mighty host of ancient days, dry and bleaching in the yellow sands, would form a sight familiar to travellers through the wilderness; yet, as in a dream, imagery taken from one place is often transferred to another and a distant locality, so it may have been with the prophet whose spirit was so often in the land of Israel while his body was by the banks of the Chebar (cf. Ezk 40[2]), and who by the words with which ch. 37 opens seems to represent the locality to which he was carried out as a distant one.

KIDRON (in 1 Mac 15[39] τὴν Κεδρών [Καιδρ-] A, ℵ om. τήν; in v.[41] τὴν Κεδρώ A, Κεδρών ℵ*, Χεβρών ℵ[c. a. c. b]; in 16[9] Κεδρών Aℵ).—A place fortified by Cendebæus (1 Mac 15[39. 41]), and the point to which he was pursued after his defeat by the sons of Simon the Maccabee (16[9]). It is named in connexion with Jamnia, and may be the modern Ḳatrah near Yebna. It is possibly the same town that is called Gederoth in Jos 15[41], 2 Ch 28[18].

KILAN (A Κιλάν, B Κειλάν, AV Ceilan), 1 Es 5[15].—Sixty-seven sons of Kilan and Azetas returned with Zerub. from captivity. There are no corresponding names in the lists of Ezr 2 and Neh 7.

KINAH (קִינָה).—A town in the extreme south of Judah, Jos 15[22]. The site is unknown. The common noun ḳînah means 'wailing song,' 'lament for the dead'; but it is possible that the name of the above town is derived from the Ḳenites (קֵינִי), who settled in the Negeb (Nu 10[32]), and had several cities in that quarter (1 S 30[29]). See Dillm. Josua, p. 525.

KINDNESS (חֶסֶד [see careful study of this term in W. R. Smith, Proph. of Isr. 160 ff. 406]; χρηστότης).—1. Religion is and ought to be determinative of human life in general, and so in particular it moulds the grace of kindness. God was kind to the people of Israel, looking upon their affliction in Egypt and delivering them (Ex 3). The people were frequently reminded of this merciful intervention of J", and it was set before them as the ground of obedience and of action resembling His. Israel was not to oppress or vex a stranger, but to love him, for they knew the heart of a stranger, having been strangers in Egypt (Ex 22[21] 23[9], Lv 19[33f.]). The laws in the Book of the Covenant are specially marked by the requirement of kindness to the poor and needy, and the succeeding laws and the exhortations of the prophets continue to press the obligation. Indeed, God's pardon for sin and His rich spiritual blessings are made dependent in part on the suppliant's kindness to others in distress (Is 1[15-17] 58[6ff.]).

Christ revealed God as the Father of men, and the kindness and mercy He enjoined on His followers resemble the type of these which is manifested by God. The divine Father regards men as potentially His true sons, and yearns for the prodigal's return (Lk 15[20]). To effect His merciful purpose He uses the instruments of kindness—even His severity is kind. He makes His sun rise on the evil and the good (Mt 5[45]), and blesses even the unbelieving with rain and fruitful seasons and gladness of heart (Ac 14[17]), and He sent Christ to reveal Himself by miracles of kindness, and by opening up a way of spiritual salvation. Love to God will dispose men to view others as He does, i.e. as persons who are laden with suffering, but capable of the highest things, and as most likely to be influenced for good by love and kindness (Lk 6[35f.], 1 Jn 3[17]).

2. (a) Intensively, kindness is limited, or at least its form is regulated, by the condition that righteousness must be maintained and developed. A holy God cannot bestow complete happiness on the unholy. Penitence, faith, and new obedience are therefore demanded in men, and the misery endured while they are absent or deficient is but a proof of God's kindness. So, if man's brother sin against him, he must be induced to repent and turn from the wrong (Mt 18[15ff.]). He who only showers promiscuous benefits on the evil-doer shows no true kindness to the latter or to the community, but rather encourages the sinner in sin, and so shares in it. Here kindness is manifested in reclaiming the offender from evil (which must be clearly represented as such), and in particular by the manner in which he is approached, by signs of goodwill, by patience, forbearance, timely speech, and timely silence, and all those nameless, conciliatory arts which can spring only from that love which suffereth long and is kind, and seeketh not her own (1 Co $13^{4ff.}$). The ends of righteousness and of true kindness further require that man shall be just before being generous (although when a material debt is paid we still fail to give others their due if it is discharged without love, Ro $13^{7ff.}$), and that there be no indiscriminate or injudicious bestowal of aid, such as would tend to lessen another's self-respect and reliance on self-help (2 Th $3^{7ff.}$), not to speak of actions which are only to be described as officious (1 P 4^{15}). So, too, it is needful to adhere to the truth, at the risk of an apparent want of kindness. The Christian should endeavour to rise to the height of Christ's example, so as to be able, on occasion given, to speak the truth to those who are in trying circumstances, with such a spirit of faith and glad confidence in the fatherly love of God that the announcement will have, not a hurtful but, as far as may be, a soothing and bracing effect (Eph $4^{15.\ 25}$). Kindness, therefore, is based on righteous Christian love as its principle and motive; and our Lord's golden rule (Mt 7^{12}) and parable of the Good Samaritan furnish guidance for the practical application of the principle.

(b) Extensively, kindness is due to all men with whom one has to do, and even to the lower animals, the example and care of God being again our standard (Jn 4^{11}, Mt 6^{26}). People of one's own faith, as being nearer than others, and furnishing more points of contact, and yielding many services which merit gratitude, have special claims (Gal 6^{10}). But the ungodly and sinful also call for compassionate care in view of their spiritual possibilities. Even the minor courtesies of life in general human intercourse are of value (Mt $10^{12.\ 42}$). G. FERRIES.

KINDRED (in AV 1611 nearly always kinred) occurs in the plur. in the sense of 'families,' 1 Ch 16^{28}, Ps 22^{27} 96^{7} (all מִשְׁפָּחוֹת), Ac 3^{25} (πατριαί, RV 'families'), Rev 1^{7} 7^{9} 11^{9} 13^{7} (φυλαί, RV 'tribes'). Tindale has the sing. in the same sense, Dt 29^{18} 'Lest there be amonge you man or woman kynred or trybe that turneth awaye in his hert this daye from the Lord oure God' (AV 'family'). Cf. Elyot, Gouvernour, ii. 99, 'And also for his endeavour, prowesse, and wisedome, [Moyses] was moche estemed by Pharao and the nobles of Egipte; so that he moughte have lived there continually in moche honour and welth, if he would have preferred his singular advaile before the universall weale of his owne kynred or familie.' KINE.—See Ox.

KING (THE OFFICE OF, IN ISRAEL).—I. ORIGIN.—1. Of the origin of the king (מֶלֶךְ melek) among Semitic peoples only uncertain inferences can be drawn from the meaning of the word and from facts more or less disputed.

MLK in Assyr. and Aram. = 'advise,' 'decree'; Arab. = 'possess,' 'rule'; Heb. and Eth. = 'rule.' This suggests that the term arose rather from the intellectual than the merely physical side, from counsel rather than prowess. He whose counsel was found best, eventually became king. Further, the term seems to have arisen after the purely nomadic stage of the Semitic nations (in which the Sheikh rules)* had ceased, yet before any had gained large territories. For king seems to be closely connected with city life, in contrast alike to unsettled wanderings and to permanent possession of large tracts of country. Thus we find in the time of Abraham several kings in a small space round the Dead Sea, and many throughout Palestine at the time of the conquest, each ruling a town with its adjacent lands, and presumably such villages as were dependent on it. The office in such cases appears to have been normally (apparently not in Edom, Gn $36^{31ff.}$) hereditary.†

2. Side by side, however, with this there existed in each Semitic city the conception of a divine King who was supreme over the whole people, and from whom it had come into being. The frequency with which the gods of Semitic nations have an appellative of which MLK forms a part (e.g. Melkart of Tyre) or the whole (Milkom of Ammon), shows that this was one of their primary conceptions of Deity.

We may explain the fact of both God and ruler possessing the same title by supposing either that the root idea of MLK suited both alike, the term being given to the Deity as signifying Him who gives counsel (e.g. by oracle); or that the title was given to the human ruler in accordance with his claim to be descended from, or to represent, the Deity; or (though this is very improbable) that the roots are different and the identity of the words as applied to God and to the president of a city is accidental. But, whatever the cause, the fact of the identity of titles tended to strengthen enormously the king's position.

3. Of the origin of the office (not the title) of king in Israel itself we have comparatively full particulars. We see the preparation for it and its inauguration. At the Exodus Moses supplied the place of a king,‡ centralizing in himself all the visible power. We know much less of Joshua, but the same appears to have been the case with him. But after the first flush of victory was over, when the tribes were divided by whole districts of unconquered Canaanites, and the sense even of religious unity was weakened by compliance with local religious customs, the inroads of various foes produced (at God's call) guerilla chiefs who released the parts where they lived from foreign attacks. One of these, Gideon, was invited by 'the men of Israel' to 'rule' over them,§ and though he verbally refused, saying, 'The LORD shall rule over you,'‖ he appears to have ruled over his city Ophrah, for on his death his son Abimelech kills all his brothers (except Jotham) and has himself made king in Shechem (Jg 9^{6}).¶ Abimelech acted as prince (נָשִׂיא Jg 9^{22}) 'over

* 'Das Königthum ist in Arabien eine fremde Pflanze,' G. Jacob (Das Leben der vorislamischen Beduinen, 1895, p. 164).

† Even Ebed-Tob (c. B.C. 1400) of Urusalim implies that this was the norm, when he contrasts his own case: 'It was not my father who installed me in this place nor my mother, but the arm of the mighty king has allowed me to enter into my ancestral house' (Hommel, Ancient Heb. Trad. p. 155). Observe that in the MLK, being properly the ruler merely of a city, we have perhaps the explanation of the fact that the term was not used by the Assyrian monarchs of themselves. They may have already found this title belonging to the kings of the various cities that they had conquered, and therefore they called themselves Sar (perhaps Is 10^{8} has a satirical allusion to this nomenclature).

‡ Dt 33^{5}, however, 'and he was king in Jeshurun,' probably refers to God.

§ Mĕshōl bānū. From a comparison of Jg 9^{2} with $9^{8.\ 10.\ 12.\ 14}$ this seems to be here synonymous with MLK.

‖ Jg $8^{22.\ 23}$. To say that such a contrast between an earthly and the heavenly king is an anachronism, and that, therefore, these verses belong to a later date (Moore), is with our present knowledge of the sources of Jg much too drastic a treatment. See, further, art. JUDGES (BOOK), p. 815a.

¶ We do not know the relation of Ophrah to Shechem. It is possible that they were the same place, the latter representing the Canaanite part of it, which rebelled against the Israelites.

Israel' (i.e. apparently Shechem, and a few towns near), but his death after three years prevented a prolongation of a kingship in Israel after the Canaanite form. Jephthah had a kind of headship in Gilead (Jg 11^{6-11}), but no more was done in the direction of the formal kingdom till the time of Samuel. Samuel had indeed conquered the Philistines at Ebenezer, and had recovered the district that had been formally taken over by the Philistines (1 S 7^{11-14}); but, as it seems, as he became older and less energetic, the Philistines became stronger, and by their superior weapons and organization were reducing the Israelites to a condition little better than that of serfs (1 S $13^{19ff.}$). The danger of extinction as a nation at the hands of the Philistines was imminent, and unity in feeling and action was absolutely essential if Israel was to be preserved. It was the sense partly of this and partly of the declension of Samuel's sons from their father's uprightness in the internal administration of the district round him that led the elders of Israel to ask Samuel for a king.

The words attributed to Samuel in reply are very difficult. On the one hand, if Dt 17^{14-20} (cf. 28^{36}) is Mosaic, the principles that ought to guide the election of a king must, one would suppose, have been well known, and it is so far worthy of notice that in at least three out of the four points (no stranger, not multiplying horses, not multiplying wives, the study of the Law) Saul satisfied these principles. But with our present knowledge it seems impossible to reconcile Samuel's fears with a knowledge by him of the sanction given to the king in Dt. For Dt assumes that the kingdom need not be opposed to the theocratic government of the nation, but may rather become a form of it. On the other hand, Samuel's words are such as could hardly fail to suggest themselves to every far-seeing religiously-minded patriot.*

Nothing but the strongest necessity could justify (as by God's answer to Samuel it did justify) the commencement of a system which tended to repress the development of the free life of the individual Israelites, a life which might otherwise have attained much sooner the realization of the perfect liberty of the ideal believer in God. A king, however, was better than destruction by the Philistines or absorption by the Canaanites.

II. The Method of Appointment. — 1. The Choice.—(a) In the case of Saul. The subordination of the 'lay' to the 'religious' element in Israel is clearly seen in the action of the elders. Even if (as is hardly probable) any of them had an idea of a king possessing merely secular authority, no trace of such a feeling is shown, as they unite in seeking the sanction and the power of the religious authority. Further, Samuel even after consenting to their wish gives them strictly no voice in the appointment. He is guided to anoint Saul privately, and the public decision is made by lot, after which Saul is presented to the people as 'him whom the Lord hath chosen,' and they shout 'God save the king' (1 S 10^{24} [E^2]). Naturally, after the first success, a public assembly is called by Samuel to ensure the ratification by the people of the choice already made (1 S 11^{14} [J]), he taking the opportunity of convincing the people that a visible king would not have been necessary had they served God fully, and of urging them to serve Him faithfully under the new arrangement (1 S 12 [E^2]).†

(b) In the case of David also the appointment was from above (1 S 16^{13} 'midrashic'), but effect was not given to it until after Saul's death, when the men of Judah anointed him as their king (2 S 2^4), and not fully until seven years later, when 'all the tribes of Israel' anointed him king over all Israel. They did this, however, only after receiving certain stipulations from David (2 S 5^3). The virtual omission of these by Solomon, and their definite rejection by Rehoboam, caused the division of the kingdom.

(c) In other cases in David's line of which particulars have come down to us, the reigning king freely chose his successor from among his sons (1 K 1^{33-35}, but this was preferably the firstborn, 2 Ch 21^3).* Naturally, on the restoration of Joash to his rights, Jehoiada the priest took the opportunity of obtaining from him and the people an agreement to serve the Lord, the observance of whose worship was bound up with the national constitution and national prosperity (2 K 11^{17}). So again (also after conspiracies by others) the people appointed Azariah-Uzziah (2 K 14^{21}), Josiah (2 K 21^{24}), and, on the untimely death of Josiah, his son Jehoahaz (2 K 23^{30}). The appointment of Ahaziah by the people was due solely to his being the only son left to his father, Jehoram having apparently designated another son before both his and his own death (2 Ch 21^{17} 22^1).

2. The Anointing.†—Besides the reference given above, see Anointing, §§ 8, 9. The only king of the northern dynasty whose anointing is mentioned is Jehu (2 K 9^6), where the act is strictly private, like that of Saul and of David by Samuel. Many have thought from the absence of all mention in other cases that only those kings were anointed whose claims to the throne were disputed, but this is very unlikely. The cases of private anointing are mentioned as showing to the recipient God's choice and purpose: the public anointing is mentioned only on special occasions, just in the same way as the words 'God save the king' are recorded (1 K 1^{39} 2 K 11^{12}). The frequency of the term 'the Lord's anointed' confirms this (1 S 24^{10} 26^9, 2 S 1^{14} 19^{21} [Heb. ^{22}]). It has been suggested that kings were anointed in order that they might fulfil priestly functions (see below), but there is no hint of this. The ceremony was perhaps already purely archaic in Saul's time. The writer, however, of 1 S 16^{13} ('midrashic') connects it with the gift of the spirit.‡

III. The External Marks.—(a) Sceptre (שֵׁבֶט). —This very primitive sign of supreme authority is used of the Israelitish king in Ps 45^7, and perhaps nowhere else. See Sceptre.

(b) Spear (חֲנִית).—This, both among pre-Mohammedan (W. R. Smith, Kinship, p. 171) and modern Arabs (Tristram, Land of Israel, p. 259), marks the presence of the sheikh. It was in the hand of Saul when David played to him (1 S 18^{10} [J^1]), by his side at meal-time (20^{33} [J^1]), in his hand when he sat at council (22^6 [J^1]), planted by his pillow as he slept in camp (26^7 [E^1]). He is also said by the Amalekite to have leaned on it when he was dying (2 S 1^6 [E^1]).§ These examples suggest that Saul did not use the sceptre; but it should be noticed that in the first three passages the more offensive

* It is, of course, still possible that the form of the objections attributed to Samuel is one 'moulded by the experiences of a later age' (Driver, Dt. p. 213), but the narrative as it stands probably represents his actual feelings.

† Such is the general result we appear to reach by combining all the data in 1 S; but see OTJC^{2} 135 ff.

* In the maintenance of the hereditary principle we may see, probably, the chief cause of the longer duration of the Southern kingdom.

† For the existence of this practice in Egypt at coronations, cf. T. T. Perowne in Smith's DB^{2} i. 137.

‡ W. R. Smith (RS pp. 215, 364) conjectures (a) from Ps 45^8, compared with Is 61^3, that the anointing of kings was part of the ceremony of investing them in the festal dress and ornaments appropriate to their dignity (cf. Ca 3^{11}); (b) from the original use of animal fat, that anointing meant the transference of the living virtues of the animal slain. He also sees in the very act of applying the ointment originally a form of homage.

§ Cf. Kirkpatrick on 1 S 18^{10}. Perhaps the javelin (כִּידוֹן) in the hand of Joshua was as much a symbol of authority as a weapon (Jos 8^{18}).

use of the spear comes into question, and in the fourth and fifth he was engaged in war.

(c) Crown or diadem (נֵזֶר), of Saul on the battlefield (2 S 1[10] [E[1]]), therefore light and probably a fillet of silk; and of Joash (2 K 11[12] ‖ 2 Ch 23[11], cf. Ps 89[39] 132[18]); with stones (Zec 9[16]). See, further, CROWN, §§ 3, 4, and DIADEM.

(d) Bracelet (צְעָדָה), also of Saul (2 S 1[10]), and in plur. prob. (by emendation) of Joash (2 K 11[12]). See BRACELET.

(e) Throne (כִּסֵּא), presupposed in numerous promises and commands (e.g. Dt 17[18], 1 S 2[8], 2 S 3[10] 7[13. 16] 14[9], 2 K 10[3], Jer 13[13]). David's is used by Solomon (1 K 2[12]), who in audience places another throne for his mother (v.[19]), but afterwards has a costly new one made for himself (1 K 10[18-20]), as well as a porch for it (1 K 7[7]).

(f) A place of honour in the temple (Ezk 46[1. 2] and perhaps 2 K 23[3]).

(g) Palace (בַּיִת, הֵיכָל, אַרְמוֹן).—Solomon's (1 K 7[1-12]) had apparently three chief parts, the Great Hall (or House of the Forest of Lebanon), the porch of judgment, and the porch or ordinary reception room, besides the private apartments, rich with cedar beams and pillars. So Jehoiakim's was cieled with cedar and painted with vermilion (Jer 22[14]). Ahab's was of ivory, i.e. probably panelled with it (1 K 22[39], cf. Ps 45[8]).

(h) The royal chariot (רֶכֶב).—Nowhere expressly included among the insignia of the king, but perhaps implied by the analogy of Egypt (Gn 41[43]), and the importance that chariots held in the establishment both of the king and of the nobility (1 S 8[11], 1 K 9[19] 10[26], Is 22[18], Jer 17[25] 22[4]). Hence the fact that Absalom and Adonijah set up a chariot and attendant runners (2 S 15[1], 1 K 1[5]) indicated their claim to semi-royal state. See CHARIOT.

(i) The royal harem (2 S 16[21]).

(j) The bodyguard, primarily of Philistine mercenaries (Cherethites, Pelethites, and Gittites, 2 S 8[18] [J[1]] 15[18] [J[1]]) and perhaps Carians (2 K 11[4. 19]), who may also have been the royal butchers (see W. R. Smith, OTJC[2] pp. 260–263, and art. CHERETHITES). They were apparently identical with the 'mighty men' (1 K 1[8. 10. 38]).*

IV. DUTIES OF THE KING.—1. In war.—As preparations for war called the kingdom into existence, so it continued to be the principal function of the king to direct warlike operations, and to see that the land was well defended by fortresses and possessed the material of war (e.g. 1 K 12[21ff.], 2 Ch 17[2] 26[9. 15] 32[2-5]). Naturally the nucleus at least of a standing army was always maintained, probably the bodyguard (see above), the whole fighting force of the nation being called out only as needed (see ARMY). Sometimes also the king employed a large force of mercenaries (2 Ch 25[6]).

2. Judicial.—In Eastern even more than in Western lands the supreme court of appeal is the sovereign in person, and in Eastern lands more particularly each litigant, however humble, has the right of bringing his cause before the king if the latter has time to hear it (cf. 2 S 14[5ff.] 15[2], 1 K 3[16ff.]). Hence the fact that Jotham judged the people was a sign that he completely took his father's place (2 K 15[5]). So, too, right judgment is almost equivalent to a good rule (Is 16[5]). Sometimes, perhaps, the king was called 'the judge' (so of Moab, Am 2[3]).†

Through this concentration of the judicial functions it is probable that the powers of the 'elders' diminished, and that thus there was the more need for the royal judges whom Jehoshaphat sent throughout Judah, whose head was 'the ruler of the house of Judah' (2 Ch 19[5. 11]). They seem, however, to have become even more amenable to bribery than the elders (see below). Solomon, as stated above, built a special porch for judgment (1 K 7[7]). It is also worthy of note that the king seems to have had no power to originate laws (even Josiah's reform is based on the book that had been found, 2 K 23[1-3]), and that he himself was under law (1 K 21[4ff.], Dt 17[19]).

3. Religious.—In all early Semitic nationalities, and especially in Israel, religion was bound up with the unity of the people. For a king to neglect the worship of the national god would be to alienate a large proportion of his subjects, who, believing themselves to have sprung from their god, felt that his honour was their own, and also that their own welfare depended upon the treatment he received. Hence the maintenance of the religious establishment was necessarily an important part of the king's duties.* A further question arises whether the early Semitic custom of the king being the religious head of the nation and the chief sacrificing priest obtained also in Israel. It has been asserted that this was the primary object of the anointing of the Israelitish kings, but no hint to this effect is given in the OT (see above). Yet there are certainly traces of the old custom, whether it is to be regarded as held legitimate by the Israelites themselves (till quite late times) or not.

Thus we find the following examples:—(a) Sacrifices are offered by Saul against the wish of Samuel (1 S 13[9. 11] [J[2]] 14[33ff.] [J[1]]), but are evidently regarded by Saul himself as his right in Samuel's absence. Also, perhaps, by David himself (2 S 6[13. 17] [J[1]] 24[25] [J[1]]), but in these cases the sacrifices may merely have been offered by the priests at David's order (comp., too, Ezk 45[17b. 22]). (b) David wears the linen ephod (2 S 6[14], cf. 1 Ch 15[27]), which was a priestly garment (1 S 2[18] 22[18]) (see EPHOD), and he and Solomon bless the people (2 S 6[18], 1 K 8[14]). (c) It is more important that David and Solomon dismiss and appoint the chief priest at their pleasure (2 S 8[17], 1 K 2[26. 27. 35]).† This may have been due to a desire to have a royal priesthood distinct from the priests of other sanctuaries (cf. 1 Ch 6[10], 1 K 4[2] with 1 Ch 16[39. 40]). It is possible that the officials manifestly not of the Levitical line who are called priests (כֹּהֲנִים), viz. David's sons (2 S 8[18] [J[1]]) and Ira the Jairite (2 S 20[26] [R[P]]),‡ represent those royal officials who saw to the maintenance of such royal priests, unless perhaps they were the intermediaries between the king and the whole body of the priests for certain functions, e.g. to supply the royal sacrifices, to superintend the royal expenditure upon the preparations for the Temple, etc.§

V. MAINTENANCE AND ESTABLISHMENT.—1. Taxation.—(a) Ezk 45[7. 8] 48[21] speak of a royal

* But surely not with 'the governors of the people' mentioned in 2 Ch 23[20], as Smith's DB[2] i. 1245, suggests.

† Not in Dt 17[9. 12] (Benzinger, Arch. p. 306), for the singular there is either generic and=plural in 19[17. 18], or it refers to a president of lay judges (so Driver).

* Ezk 45[17] expressly orders that the prince shall provide the sacrifices (cf. 46[4-6] and 2 Ch 30[24] 35[7]).

† That David gets the choir appointed (1 Ch 15[16-24]) proves nothing, for, apart from the question of the historicity of the Chronicler's narrative, even the closest sacerdotal body may depend on the laity for money. 1 Ch 16[4-6] is more to the point, but need not imply more. So also with Solomon building the Temple, which Nowack (Arch. i. p. 310) strangely compares to Ahaz building the altar in wilful opposition to the type sanctioned by the nation's religious laws.

‡ I.e. dated by Budde 440–400 B.C., therefore (on the same principles) not much earlier than the Chronicler (see next note).

§ The Chronicler evades the difficulty by paraphrasing 'the sons of David were chief about the king' (1 Ch 18[17]). In 1 K 4[5] the title is given to Zabud as well as 'the king's friend' (see below).

The word 'priests' in 2 S 8[18] 20[26] has been explained to mean, on the one hand, spiritual counsellors, or the king's highest officials, or his daily companions (which is against usage); and, on the other hand, 'priest' in the fullest sense. But to believe that the sons of David and Ira the Jairite actually exercised priestly functions requires much more evidence than has yet been adduced (but see Driver on 2 S 8[18]). The act of Uzziah is represented by the Chronicler as monstrously illegal (2 Ch 26[16-18]), and has no parallel in Israelitish history.

domain with which God's 'princes' will be so satisfied that they will no more oppress the people, but even with this the 'prince' is still to receive large supplies of food (45[13-16]). Such a royal domain is also hinted at in 1 S 8[12] (E[2]), and actually possessed by David (1 Ch 27[25-31]).

(b) Presents, more or less compulsory, were given by subjects (to Saul 1 S 10[27] 16[20]), and by foreigners (to David 2 S 8[10], to Solomon 1 K 4[21-23] 10[10-25], and to kings of Israel from Moab 2 K 3[4], cf. Is 16[1]). The king would also certainly have his share of booty (David 2 S 8[11] 12[30], 1 Ch 26[27]).

(c) The king had apparently the right to the first cut of the pasture land (Am 7[1]) for his many horses (1 K 18[5]). The land-tax was, as it seems, unknown in Palestine. Yet there was probably a property-tax of some kind (1 S 17[25] [E[1]]), perhaps the tenth of all produce (1 S 8[15. 17] [E[2]]). Naturally, for extraordinary needs extraordinary requisitions were levied (2 K 15[20] 23[35]). Caravans paid toll (1 K 10[15]), and much profit must have been derived from what was in Solomon's days the royal monopoly in horses and, apparently, chariots (1 K 10[28. 29]), as well as from the commerce by sea (1 K 10[11]). Apparently also the property of condemned persons (1 K 21[1. 3. 7]), and of those who had left the country (2 K 8[3. 6]), passed to the king. That he also sometimes seized property unjustly is implied in Ezk 45[7. 8].

(d) We are not told the reasons why the census was taken by David (2 S 24[1] [J[1]]), but perhaps one was the desire to equalize taxation, as was evidently that of Solomon's division of the country into twelve districts (1 K 4[7]),* which were only partly named after the twelve tribes, though roughly coextensive with them.

2. Officials (שָׂרִים 2 S 8[16]).—Perhaps the more important of these were those 'that saw the king's face' (2 K 25[19] = Jer 52[25]). It should be noticed that the details are almost confined to the time of David and Solomon (2 S 8[16ff.] 20[23ff.], 1 K 4[2ff.], 1 Ch 18[15ff.]), and that in only a few cases can we affirm the continuance of the office throughout the monarchy.

(a) Military.—(α) The captain of the host, i.e. commander-in-chief (under the king) of the whole available fighting strength of the nation, exclusive, perhaps, of the bodyguard (see above). This position, the consolidation and concentration of an older usage (Dt 20[9]), was held by Abner under Saul and Ishbosheth (1 S 14[50], 2 S 2[8]), by Joab (2 S 8[16]) and for a short time by Amasa in Judah (2 S 19[13], 1 K 2[32]), and, on Joab's removal, by Benaiah (1 K 2[35]). In the northern kingdom the king appears to have divided the office into that of the two captains of his chariots (1 K 16[9. 16]). (β) The captain of the bodyguard (see above), Benaiah (2 S 8[18] 20[23]).

(b) Civil.—(α) The mazkîr (מַזְכִּיר), lit. = 'he who brings to remembrance,' viz. Jehoshaphat in the time of David and Solomon (2 S 8[16] 20[24], 1 Ch 18[15], 1 K 4[3]), Joah ben-Asaph in the time of Hezekiah (2 K 18[18. 37] = Is 36[3. 22]), Joah ben-Joahaz in the time of Josiah (2 Ch 34[8]). This is usually rendered 'recorder,' his duties being supposed to be those of chronicling the chief events; but this would hardly appear to be a sufficiently influential position. Perhaps his duty was rather that of reminding the king in matters of state, and he represented the Grand Vizier of modern times (cf. Benz. p. 310).

(β) The sôphēr (סוֹפֵר) or 'scribe' (AV, RV), apparently the writer of the royal correspondence, the Secretary of State (2 S 8[17] 20[25], 1 Ch 18[16]). Solomon had two, who were apparently the sons of David's 'scribe' (1 K 4[3]). His duties appear to have been partly financial (2 K 12[10] 22[3-9]), and he sometimes is mentioned before the Recorder (2 K 18[18. 37] = Is 36[3. 22], 2 Ch 34[8], cf. 2 K 22[3]). See, further, Riehm, s.v. 'Kanzler.'

(γ) The officer over the household, אֲשֶׁר עַל הַבַּיִת (1 K 4[6] 18[3]), i.e. the head of the palace, intrusted with 'the key' (Is 22[22]). Apparently = כֹּהֵן (Is 22[15]), but this may be a general term for 'official.' He perhaps stood for our High Chamberlain or Steward. Not mentioned in David's time. In the time of Hezekiah he is mentioned before both Scribe and Recorder (2 K 18[18. 37] 19[2] = Is 36[3. 22] 37[2]), and certainly held a superior position to that held by the Scribe (cf. Is 22[15. 20] with 36[3]).

(δ) The overseer of the forced labour (אֲשֶׁר עַל הַמַּס) first seen in the latter part of David's reign. Adoram (Adoniram) held the office from then till his murder in the revolt from Rehoboam (2 S 20[24], 1 K 4[6] 5[14] 12[18] ‖ 2 Ch 10[18]).

(ε) The king's servant (עֶבֶד הַמֶּלֶךְ) is mentioned with other high officials in 2 K 22[12]. The same title is on the seal of one Obadiah (figured in Nowack, Arch. i. p. 262; Benzinger, Arch. p. 258), but nothing is known of it. Perhaps it is the same as

(ζ) The king's friend (1 K 4[5], 1 Ch 27[33], cf. 2 S 15[37] 16[16]).

(θ) The prefect of the twelve commissariat districts (1 K 4[5], see above).

(ι) Minor officials, e.g. the head of the wardrobe (2 K 22[14], and perhaps 10[22]); heads of various departments of royal properties (1 Ch 27[25-31]); eunuchs (סָרִיסִים) or perhaps chamberlains (1 S 8[15], 1 K 22[9], 2 K 8[6], and often; in 2 K 25[19] = officer); the governor of the city (שַׂר הָעִיר, 1 K 22[26], 2 K 23[8], 2 Ch 34[8], cf. Neh 11[9]).

(κ) Although these officials were necessary for the working of the monarchical government, which probably always tended to obliterate the old landmarks of the tribal system, with its semi-independent elders (these are still mentioned under the monarchy, 1 K 20[7], 2 K 23[1]), yet by the very severance of the ruling class from the soil it tended also to increase the difference between class and class. The Mosaic legislation, though perhaps hardly suitable for great commercial enterprises, was admirably fitted to maintain comparative equality, but the rule of the king in both N. and S. Israel produced crying injustice on the part of the rich and misery for the poor (e.g. Am 2[6. 7], Is 5[8], Jer 5[28], Mic 3[11]).

VI. Lastly, it may be noticed briefly that the king, both by success and by failure, played an important part in preparation for the future. His success showed the necessity for organization and concentration; his failure, in his degeneration from the nearly ideal David to the worthless Zedekiah (relieved, though the crown temporarily was, by godly representatives), showed that a kingdom as such and alone was an ineffectual protection. A wholly ideal David was hoped for (Ezk 34[23] 37[25]), and in due time given. But before then the title of king was borne by members of the Hasmonæan dynasty from Aristobulus I. (B.C. 105–104) to Aristobulus II.

* It is hardly accurate to say that Judah is omitted (e.g. Benzinger, p. 308), for Socoh (v.[10], cf. also Jos 15[35. 48], 2 Ch 11[7] 28[18], 1 S 17[1]) was up the vale of Elah in the Shephelah of Judah. Of the places mentioned with it in 1 K 4[10] Hepher is unknown, and also Arubboth (but see Dr. C. Schick in PEFSt, Oct. 1898, p. 238. Josephus, ed. Niese, Ant. VIII. ii. 3, omits all ref. to v.[10] [against Smith's DB[2] i. 250]), though this possibly is to be identified with Arab, mentioned in Jos 15[52] (Socoh, v.[48] is in the next group), and also in the Shephelah, not far apparently from Dumah, which was near Eleutheropolis (see ARAB and DUMAH). But evidently Jerusalem and the part immediately round it is omitted in Solomon's twelve districts. This is explicable by the fact that being so near to the seat of government it would necessarily be more easily mulcted for provisioning troops, etc., and also may have come under the special care of one of the other officials named, e.g. the governor of the city (see below).

(B.C. 63), and by Herod the Great from B.C. 40 to B.C. 4. See separate articles on these names.

LITERATURE.—Besides the ordinary Histories of the Jewish People, and Dictionaries, may be mentioned Benzinger, Hebräische Archäologie (Leipzig, 1894); Nowack, Lehrbuch der Hebräischen Archäologie (Leipzig, 1894); McCurdy, HPM (1894–96, §§ 27–63, 511–538). A. LUKYN WILLIAMS.

KINGDOM OF GOD, OF HEAVEN (βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ, τῶν οὐρανῶν).—The importance of the place which this idea of the kingdom of God holds in Scripture, and especially in the teaching of Jesus; the new prominence it has come to assume in recent years in theology (since Kant and Schleiermacher, particularly in the school of A. Ritschl, but also among theologians generally, e.g. Lipsius, Oosterzee, Maurice); and the attempts which have been made to find in it the supreme and controlling notion of Christian dogmatics, as well as of Christian ethics,—all render it desirable that full and careful consideration should be given to this leading thought of the Christian religion, and that the attempt should be made to present its biblical aspects in as complete a form as possible, in their relations to each other, and to the other elements of Christian truth. Little inquiry is necessary to convince us that this idea enters vitally into the whole texture of revelation, has its root in the fundamental ideas of the OT, is paramount in the earthly teaching of our Lord, receives further development—with special reference, however, to its eschatological side—in the apostolic writings, and presents points of deepest interest to students both of doctrine and morals at the present day. Our task, then, in this article will be—following the natural biblical development of the subject—to exhibit first the general features of the OT preparation for the Christian doctrine of the kingdom of God; then to set forth the teaching of Jesus on this vital topic; and, finally, to compare with this the doctrine of the Epistles and other NT writings. By pursuing this course we may hope to arrive at a notion which shall be helpful in enabling us to judge of the place and value of this doctrine in theology and ethics, and to form a correct estimate of past and current misapprehensions and mutilations of the idea.

I. OT DOCTRINE OF THE KINGDOM OF GOD.—1. To reach the true idea of the kingdom of God in OT we must go farther back than the point from which a start is usually made—the theocratic constitution at Sinai. As in all the spheres of the Divine operation, grace invariably presupposes nature, so is it in this. The real basis for the idea of the kingdom of God is already laid in the Creation history. The doctrine of Scripture, in its oldest as well as in its later parts, is here entirely uniform. The one God—the God who afterwards entered into covenant with the patriarchs, and as J" brought Isr. out of Egypt, and formed it into a people for Himself—is the Almighty Maker of heaven and earth, the Creator, Lord, and Ruler of all things, animate and inanimate. The Creation narrative in Gn 1, with its delegation to man of 'dominion' over the creatures (cf. Ps 8), already lays down this doctrine, and the second history of Creation (Gn $2^{4ff.}$) is equally explicit. No limit is set in these creation histories to the absolute power of God. As H. Schultz says: 'When God, the possessor of heaven and earth (Gn 14^{19-22}), can make everything good, that is to say, finds nowhere any hindrance in anything already in existence, which, having its origin in some other being, is antagonistic to Him (Gn 1^{31}); and when to His word 'Be' comes the willing 'And it was'; in other words, when matter obeys the Divine command like a willing servant, it is assuredly taken for granted that everything, even this chaotic matter which obeys the creative word of God, is included within the will of God, and called forth by Him' (OT Theol. ii. 186, Eng. trans.). On this conception of God as Creator rests the doctrine which pervades the whole OT of His unlimited dominion or rule in nature and providence. The ethical or spiritual kingdom of God rests on a basis of natural dominion. This is expressed in the clearest way in psalmists and prophets. God is King of all the earth (Ps 47^{7}); His kingdom ruleth over all, and angels, His hosts, and all His works in all places of His dominion, are exhorted to bless Him (Ps 103^{19-22}); natural agents are His ministers (Ps 104^{4}), and continue according to His ordinances as serving Him (Ps 119^{89-91}); He is the God, even He alone, of all the kingdoms of the earth, for He made heaven and earth (Is 37^{16}); 'all that is in the heaven and in the earth is thine: thine is the kingdom, O Lord, and thou art exalted as head above all' (1 Ch 29^{11}). This natural dominion or kingdom of God embraces all beings and events—the affairs of men as well as the agencies and powers of nature, which He disposes at His will. Nothing is withdrawn from His providential government, which takes in events great and small, remote and near, of nations and of individuals, the thoughts of men as well as their outward actions, the army of heaven as well as the inhabitants of the earth (cf. Gn 18^{25} 45^{5-9}, Ex 9^{13-16}, Dt 32^{9}, Pr 21^{1}, 2 Ch 16^{9}, 2 K 19^{28}, Is 10^{15}, Dn 4^{35} etc.). The disobedience of men does not withdraw them from the range of the Divine control. If men will not serve the purposes of God willingly, they are made to serve the Divine ends unwillingly (Ex 9^{16}). They are the clay: God is the potter; they cannot escape from the potter's hands; and if they will not be made vessels of honour, they are turned to other uses as vessels of dishonour (Jer 18^{6}; cf. Ro 9^{21-23}). Their very wrath is made to praise Him, and the remainder of wrath He restrains (Ps 76^{10}).

There is therefore recognized in Scripture—OT and NT alike—a natural and universal kingdom or dominion of God, embracing all objects, persons, and events, all doings of individuals and nations, all operations and changes of nature and history, absolutely without exception, which is the basis on which a higher kind of kingdom—a moral and spiritual kingdom—is built up. The natural creation obeys God undeviatingly by an inherent law of its constitution (Ps 119^{91}, Is $1^{2.3}$); to man alone belongs the possibility of entering into personal relations with his Maker, and of rendering Him a free and intelligent obedience. We have seen that God's ordinary providential rule in the worlds of matter and mind is never for a moment suspended, even in the case of wicked men; but altogether higher in quality is a moral rule,—a rule in the minds and hearts of men, a rule by moral means over willing and obedient subjects. For man is not a mere natural existence; in Kant's famous phrase, he is a member of a kingdom of ends; is capable of entering into the will of his Creator, and of rendering Him a spontaneous and willing obedience. Here, then, is the idea of a kingdom of God of a higher kind—a realm of free, personal spirits, yielding voluntary obedience to the known will of their Creator,—and it lies in the nature of the case, and is already implied in the narrative of the creation of man, and of God's dealings with him, that the production of such an ethical kingdom in humanity was God's end in creation from the first (Gn 1. 2). 'How would it now look to you,' says the philosophic Saxon king Alfred, 'if there were any very powerful king, and he had no freemen in all his kingdom, but that all were slaves? Then, said I, it would not be thought by me right nor reasonable if men in such a servile condition only should attend upon him.

Then, quoth he, it would be more unnatural if God, in all His kingdom, had no free creature under His power. Therefore, He made two rational creatures, free angels and men, and gave them the great gift of freedom. Hence, they could do evil as well as good, whichever they would. He gave this very free gift, and a very fixed law to every man unto this end.' We have here, therefore, a higher type of dominion, one in which God's will is freely accepted by rational and moral intelligences; and had this been realized on the lines originally laid down, there would have been, even on a creation basis, a kingdom of God in humanity.

2. But this brings us to the next cardinal point in the OT doctrine. The kingdom of God on the basis of creation just indicated was not realized. The narrative of creation is immediately succeeded in our oldest history by the record of the Fall—of a turning aside of man from his primitive innocence—which frustrated (speaking humanly) the original designs of the Creator, and introduced sin, death, and multiplied penal evils into the world (Gn 3). It is usual for biblical theologians to make somewhat light of this narrative, which stands at the gateway of the history of revelation, as if it did not enter deeply into the religious conceptions of the people of Israel. 'It will hardly be maintained,' says Schultz, 'that any other OT writer even hints at such an idea' as that man possessed an aboriginal dignity which was afterwards lost (OT Theol. ii. p. 258 ff.). It may be affirmed with some confidence, on the other hand, that, apart from explicit references to the narrative of the Fall (which, however, could not be unknown to any writer of the prophetic period), the background of the whole picture in OT is that of a world in revolt, turned aside from God, sunk, and ever sinking deeper, in unrighteousness, abandoned to idolatry and to the lusts and corruptions which are the natural fruit of apostasy from the Creator,—a world in contrariety to the divine holiness, and judged as guilty, and justly exposed to the Divine anger (Gn $6^{5.6}$ 8^{21} 13^{13} $19^{20.21}$, Lv 18^{24-30}, Dt 9^{4-6}, 1 K 8^{46}, Ps 14. 51^{5} 143^{2}, Pr 20^{9}, Ec 7^{20}, Is 1, Hos 4, etc. Cf. Dillmann, Alttest. Theol. pp. 376–88). This representation of the condition of humanity as universally under sin has for its consequence a proposition of the utmost importance for the right apprehension of our subject, viz., that if God is to have a moral kingdom in the world, it must be a kingdom brought into existence through grace,—it must be produced through redemption and regeneration as the result of a divine supernatural economy of salvation. This note of grace is already struck with unmistakable clearness in the Protevangelium, where the first sin is met by the promise of a final complete victory, not without suffering, of the 'seed of the woman' over 'the seed of the serpent' (Gn 3^{15}); and the history of revelation ever after is but the history of this developing purpose of God for the complete overthrow of evil, and the final establishment, through a mingled operation of mercy and judgment, of the kingdom of God upon earth. As entering into covenant with His people Israel for the realization of this end, God is known peculiarly by His name J" (Ex 6^{1-8}),—a name which specially denotes Him as the self-identical and changeless One, the Being who is eternally what He is (Ex 3^{14}), who is and remains one with Himself in all He thinks, purposes, and does (Mal 3^{6}), who possesses, together with immutability, the attribute of self-determining freedom and unlimited rule (Dt 4^{39}, Ps 130^{6}); who, therefore, in the relation of the covenant, would display His might, demonstrate His supremacy as Moral Ruler, magnify His covenant-keeping faithfulness, and reveal Himself as the Living, Personal God, working freely in history in pursuance of gracious purposes, and in spite of all human opposition bringing them to pass (cf. Dillmann, pp. 217, 218). The history of OT revelation, therefore, is simply, as said, the history of the developing kingdom of God in its earlier, preparatory, inchoate form, yet from the first a kingdom of grace and salvation. Herein, from the biblical point of view, lies the key to all historical developments, the explanation of all arrangements and movements of Divine providence. Israel's position brought it into contact, not only with petty neighbouring states, but with the mightiest empires of East and West. But these appear in OT only as they affect the chosen race, and it is there made manifest that the centre of God's purposes is always Israel, as, in truth, the centre of interest must always be that portion of the race with which for the time being the kingdom of God is identified. 'Just as,' in the striking words of Trench, 'in tracing the course of a stream, not the huge morasses nor the vast stagnant pools on either side would delay us; we should not, because of their extent, count them the river, but recognize that as such, though it were the slenderest thread, in which an onward movement might be discerned; so is it here. Egypt and Assyria and Babylon were but the vast stagnant morasses on either side of the river; the Man in whose seed the whole earth should be blessed, he and his family were the little stream in which the life and onward movement of the world were to be treated. . . . They belong not to history, least of all to sacred history, those Babels, those cities of confusion, those huge pens into which by force and fraud the early hunters of men, the Nimrods and Sesostrises, drove and compelled their fellows . . . where no faith existed, but in the blind powers of nature, and the brute forces of the natural man' (Hulsean Lectures, 1845, Lect. II.).

The stadia in the development of this OT idea of the kingdom of God are those of the history of the chosen people itself. For Israel was, in the root conception of its history, a people of God, a people whom God had chosen, and called, and formed into a nation for His own praise (Ex 19^{3-6}, Is 43^{21}). The name 'theocracy,' therefore, is properly given to its constitution, as Josephus perceived, when he framed this title for it (c. Ap. ii. 16). W. R. Smith, indeed, in his able work on The Prophets of Israel (pp. 51–53), is of opinion that so far from this title bringing out the distinctive feature of the religion of Israel, it rather denotes that which Israel had in common with all other nations of that time,—for these nations also had their supreme gods, whom they worshipped, and under whose protection they placed themselves in their national undertakings (Chemosh, e.g. in Moab). This, however, hardly meets the point, for certainly no other nation ever rested its whole life as Israel did on the consciousness of a redemption and covenant with God, and found the whole reason of its existence in the calling to love and serve Him, and to be a witness for Him in the midst of the earth; nor had any other nation such a story to tell of its origin, even in legend, as Israel (Dt 4^{32-38}; cf. Schultz, OT Theology, i. pp. 136–138, ii. pp. 7–9). Within its national theocratic form, besides, Israel cherished, as we shall immediately see, the consciousness of a universalistic destiny, and this consciousness goes back to the very foundation of the nation's life. For the national form was not the first thing in the history of Israel. It had been preceded by an earlier form—the patriarchal—the days of the covenants with the fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (cf. Schultz, ii. pp. 6, 7). And there already we find the clear expression of the idea that Israel was a people called with a view to the ultimate blessing of the whole world (וְנִבְרְכוּ in Gn 12^{3} 18^{18} 28^{14}; הִתְבָּרְכוּ in Gn 22^{18} 26^{4}).

3. It is now incumbent on us to mark the chief steps in the historical development of this idea in OT more exactly; and here in a general view we readily distinguish as successive the patriarchal, the Mosaic, the royal, and the prophetic periods in the growth of this conception. (a) The early records trace for us with careful particularity the narrowing down of the line of salvation from the posterity of Seth (Gn $4^{25.\ 26}$) to that of Shem (Gn $9^{26.\ 27}$; cf. Schultz, ii. pp. 346, 347), then to the family of Terah (Gn $11^{27\text{-}32}$), till, finally, it concentrates itself in one world-historical figure — that of Abraham. Looming through the mists of the past, the personality of Abraham arrests our attention as one of the great creative origins of time. With Abraham strictly historical revelation may be said to begin. Alike on the Divine and on the human side, the transactions with him are unsurpassed in OT in interest and importance. He is the founder of the Heb. nation, — 'the religiously-elect nation of antiquity,' as Volkmar calls it; the fountain-head of the three great monotheistic religions of the world; to him in a special sense belonged the covenants and the promises; out of his loins Christ came; in him at this hour all families of the earth are being blessed. The call of Abraham—the covenants made with him — constitute, therefore, a new era in the religious history of mankind. As men multiplied and spread in the earth, they fell farther away from the true God, and there seems little doubt that, left to themselves, they would soon have lost altogether the knowledge of God which they possessed (Jos 24^{2}). This catastrophe was averted by the choice of Abraham. Separated from his kindred, he was to be a witness for the truth which the world was suffering to be quenched in universal idolatry. The covenant was at first with the individual, but its ultimate scope was the blessing of the human race (Gn $12^{1\text{-}3}$ etc.). Neither did it stop with simple declaration, but provided for the fulfilment of the promise by granting to him an heir, through whose descendants, multiplied into a great nation, the promise should be realized (Gn $15^{4.\ 5}$ etc.). A special part of this promise was that kings should come out of him (Gn 17^{6}). The line of promise was defined more exactly to lie through Isaac and subsequently Jacob (to the exclusion of Ishmael and Esau), with both of whom the covenant was renewed (Gn $26^{2\text{-}4}$ $28^{11\text{-}15}$ etc.); then by a succession of remarkable providences the descendants of Jacob were taken down to Egypt, where, first in prosperity, afterwards under the sterner discipline of oppression, they grew to be a nation such as God required for the fulfilment of His purpose. We are aware of the boldness of the criticism which would dissipate the whole of this history into unsubstantial myth and legend. Against this revolutionary treatment we enter our respectful protest. What legend can do for the life of Abraham is sufficiently evidenced by the fables and stories in the Bk. of Jubilees, and in other Jewish, Mohammedan, and Persian accounts. The history of Abraham in the Bible stands, from internal evidence alone, on an entirely different footing from these. In its simple, coherent, divinely-elevated character, its organic unity with the rest of the history of revelation, its absolute freedom from the puerility and extravagance which mark the products of the myth-forming spirit, it approves itself as a grave, serious record of important events, the knowledge of which had been carefully preserved by family tradition, or even from an early date by written documents (cf. Dillmann, Alttest. Theol. pp. 77, 78; and art. by Köhler on 'Abraham' in third ed. of Herzog's RE).

(b) Hitherto, while the foundations are being laid strong and deep, there has been no specific mention of a kingdom of God, such as we meet with in the transactions of Sinai next to be adverted to. A kingdom of God in the only form in which mankind at that time was able to apprehend it could not be created until a body of people had been called into existence out of whom it could be constituted. With the revival of the national faith under Moses, the marvellous deliverance of the Exodus, and the consolidation of the fugitive Hebrews into a nation pledged in covenant to J″ at Sinai, and receiving at His hand laws and institutions for their use, the requisite conditions were fulfilled and a kingdom of God, or true theocracy, starts for the first time into visible existence. Already in the exaltation of religious feeling J″ is hailed as King in Moses' Song at the crossing of the Red Sea (Ex 15^{18}); but it is in the covenant at Sinai, with its attendant solemnities and sacrifices, that the theocratic constitution is formally established. There God proposes to take the people to Himself as a peculiar treasure above all people, that they may be to Him a kingdom of priests (consecrated), and a holy (separated) nation; and the people, in accepting the terms of this covenant, and pledging themselves to obedience, enter by the sprinkling of blood into the gracious relation thus proposed (Ex $19^{3\text{-}6}$ $24^{4\text{-}8}$). Thenceforth they are a people of God, and J″ is formally their Lawgiver and King (Is 33^{22}). The covenant is based on grace, yet the continuance of its blessings is made to depend on the fulfilment of statutory conditions (cf. Ro 10^{5}); it is a covenant of law, yet God appears in it as 'merciful and gracious . . . forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin' (Ex $34^{6.\ 7}$), and provision is made in sacrifices and purifications for the removal of the guilt and uncleanness by which the fellowship with God would otherwise be continually interrupted, if not entirely broken off. The people, on their part, have it set before them as an aim, to be holy because God is holy (Lv 19^{2}), and to realize righteousness by diligent observance of all God's statutes and ordinances, from the central motive of love (Dt $4^{1\text{-}5}$). Such, apart from doubtful details of Levitical ritual, was the general constitution under which Israel was placed, and it separated that people absolutely from their heathen neighbours (Nu 23^{9}). It is easy to see, however, that notwithstanding this limitation of the covenant to a particular people, and even its obvious design to seclude this people for a time from contact with other nations, it had in it germs of universality which were certain ultimately to burst the limits of the national form, and expand into a religion for the whole world. In the words of Riehm: 'By divine revelation ideas were planted in the minds of the people of Israel, so lofty, and rich, and deep, that in the existing religious condition they could never see their perfect realization; ideas which, with every step in the development of the religious life and knowledge, only more fully disclosed their own depth and fulness, and which must therefore necessarily have led them to look to the future for their fulfilment' (Mess. Prophecy, 1867, p. 33). How much, e.g., lay in the simple fact that J″, the God of Isr., was yet the God of the whole earth (Ex 19^{5}); that to Him alone belonged honour and glory; that it was due to Him that all nations should serve Him and keep His commandments. 'On the ground of his knowledge of J″ must the Israelite claim the whole earth for the kingdom of his God' (Riehm). The ideas at the root of the covenant, in short, were larger than could be permanently embodied in an exclusively national form, and from the first these larger ideas are seen shining through, and heralding the wider fulfilment (e.g. Nu 11^{29} 14^{21} 24^{17-19}).

(c) The disparity between the Divine idea and the existing reality of the kingdom of God, which was manifest from the outset in the constant unfaithfulness and repeated rebellions of the people (Ex 32, Nu 11, etc.), was further accentuated in the tribal jealousies and divisions, the lawless turbulence and the gross declensions, alternating with revivals of the spirit of faith and heroism, of the periods of the Conquest and the Judges (Jos 22, Jg 2. 7. 21^{25} etc.), and led in the time of Samuel to the demand for a king (1 S 8), and to the establishment of the monarchy under Saul (1 S 10), and then under David (1 S 16^{1-10}, 2 S 5^{1-9}). The sin of the people, as the event showed, did not lie simply in their desire for a king, for this it lay in the purpose of God to give them (Dt 17^{14-20}), but in the spirit of self-will and insubordination out of which the desire came, and the ideal of a king they had set before them—one like those of the nations around, who would judge them, and lead them to battle, and give them distinction and military glory (1 S $8^{7-9.}$ $^{19-22}$). We thus arrive at another transition period in the history of the kingdom of God—the end of the judgeship and the beginning of the monarchy. It was a change which in the nature of things was bound to come. Already in Eli's days we see on every side the evidence of decay, of break-up, of failure. Under Samuel's rule there is a revival of the religion and prestige of the nation, but only for a time. The prophets do not live for ever, and the nation could not always be held together by the bond of Samuel's personality. He grew old, and his sons did not walk in his steps. Then came the clamour for a change—for a trial of a new system. Instead of the prophet, we have the royal Saul—a king after the people's hearts, but yet not after God's heart. In all this, none the less, is to be distinguished an onward movement,—a step to the great goal God always had in view—the bringing in of His own anointed. When Saul's reign had ended in ruin and disaster to himself and to the land (1 S 31), the way was open for God to set upon the throne His king—a man after His own heart, who should fulfil all His will (cf. Ac 13^{22}). The Davidic era thus became, despite the deep later shadows in David's personal character and career, a typical one for the history of the kingdom of God. It introduced a new abiding element into the conception of the theocracy, for we have not now simply the single, invisible Ruler, J″, but the visible representative of this unseen Sovereign reigning in His name on earth. The fundamental outlines of the theocratic kingdom in this new form are laid down in the promises to David (2 S 7), in whose house the kingdom is established (vv.$^{12, 16}$, Ps 89. 132); and this yields the ideal of the theocratic ruler as it henceforth appears in the history, and in the loftier strains of psalm and prophecy—one who would feel that his sole function was to be the instrument and visible representative of the great invisible King, and would rule the kingdom in strict subordination to the will and law of God; who would know that his authority was a deputed, delegated authority, and would seek at every step to be guided by God's wishes; who would have unity of will with God—would be in sympathy with God in His ends; a truly pious king, therefore, ruling the kingdom, not from worldly motives, or in a worldly spirit, or for self-aggrandizement, but for God's glory, to whom God would be a 'Father,' and he would be God's 'son' (2 S 7. 23^{1-5}, Ps 2. 20. 45. 72. 89. 110. 132, etc., Is 32, etc.). Only approximately, and with sad defections, was this ideal realized even under David; or amidst the external splendours of the reign of Solomon; or under the most pious of Judah's princes after the division of the kingdom; but the manifest failure of the visible theocracy only made the light of prophecy burn brighter in the hope of a future day and a greater Personage (cf. Is 7^{14-16} $9^{6.7}$ etc.), in whom, under happier conditions, the ideal would be realized.

(d) This brings us to the last stage in the OT development of the idea of the kingdom of God—the prophetic, with which must be conjoined the enlarged ideals and anticipations of the psalms. All the germs of previous revelation now blossom into an incomparable fulness of conception of the future glorious triumph of God's kingdom in Isr. and over the earth, but with a clearer apprehension, wrought by the unspeakably bitter disappointments and humiliations of the nation, of the conditions under which alone such a consummation could be wrought out. It is a marvellous fact that it was not because Isr. was succeeding in fulfilling its mission, but because it was failing in it, that the spirit of prophecy wrought so powerfully in the development of these germs, which lay hidden in the nation's life, to a universal form. Now at least, with unmistakable clearness, we have the full consciousness that J″ is the God of the whole earth; that His providence rules over all; that His purpose has an aspect to the Gentiles as well as to the Jews; that Isr. is His servant, with a mission to become a light to the Gentiles and a blessing to the whole of mankind (Am 4^{13} 5^{8}, Mic 4^{1-3}, Is 40. 42. 60, etc.). The more evident it became that the existing form of the theocracy would not endure, the stronger became the conviction that God's kingdom would not perish, but that there would be a restoration of the theocracy on a grander and more spiritual basis, accompanied with the promulgation to the nations of the world of the worship of the living God, and the pouring out of the Spirit on all flesh (Jer 31^{31-34}, Ezk 17^{22-24} 36^{25-27}, Jl 2^{28-32}). A similar development of this consciousness of the universal mission of Isr. meets us in the Psalms—the highest point, perhaps, being reached in the 87th Psalm, which foretells the future inclusion of the most distant peoples, the greatest world-powers, even the most inveterate enemies of J″, in the future city or kingdom of God (RV, cf. Ps 2. 67. 98, etc.). On no idea, accordingly, is the influence of the development in psalm and prophecy more marked than on that of the theocratic King—the coming Personage in whom the hopes of the spiritual part of Israel increasingly centred. The clearer it became that the restoration and perfection of the theocracy were not to be looked for from pious kings like Hezekiah and Josiah, and the higher and more spiritual the conceptions became of the 'new covenant' which God would have to make with His people, or the remnant of them, after judgment had done its work (Is 6^{9-13}, Jer 31^{31-34}, Ezk 36^{25-27}, Hos 14, etc.), the more imperative was it felt to be that the Deliverer and Ruler of the seed of David should stand in a relation of nearness and unity to J″ transcending the limits of ordinary humanity—that the perfect union between Him and J″ should be realized on the basis of an exceptional dignity of nature, raising Him to a superhuman level of character and authority (Ps 110, Is 9^{6-7}, Jer 31^{22}, Mic 5^{2}, Dn $7^{13.14}$, Zec 3^{8}, Mal 3^{1} etc.). Along another line—though not without manifest relation to the former (cf. Is 52^{15} 53^{12} $55^{3.4}$ etc.)—is the development of the conception of the 'Servant of J″,' which, rising from the basis of the national calling of Isr., narrowing itself after to the spiritual portion of the people (St. Paul's 'election of grace'), culminates in the majestic portraiture of the individual Suffering Servant (ch. 52^{13}–53) whom the Church rightly identifies with her Messiah. Pre-ludes to this representation are found in the psalms which depict the sufferings that fall upon the godly (Ps 5–14. 22, etc.), and in the historical examples which show it to be a universal law that the righteous must suffer at the hands of the wicked, as well as with and for them (e.g. Joseph, Moses, David); but the Isaianic conception goes beyond all others in attributing to these sufferings of the Servant an expiatory character, and connecting them with the sin-offering (Is 53^{10-12}; cf. Zec $13^{1.\ 7}$). As respects the future form of the kingdom of God, it is always represented, in characteristically OT fashion, as reaching its triumph in conjunction with a restoration of Isr. or the remnant of it (Is 6^{13}, Am 9^{7-10} etc.), purified by judgment, converted and reunited (e.g. Ezk 37, Hos 1^{11}), and with a revival of the earlier institutions (Is 1^{25-27}, 4); while the nations, brought to the knowledge of the true God by the displays of His power and mercy, are either incorporated with the chosen people as sharers of their privileges (Ps 87), or become worshippers and tributaries of J″ (Ps $72^{10.\ 11.\ 17}$, Is 60, Mal 1^{11} etc.). But the sense of the surpassing greatness of the reality constantly tends to break through the literalism of these forms, and to mould them into new shapes (Is $2^{2.\ 3}$, Jl 3^{18-21}, Ezk 47, etc.). The one thing sure on the verge of every horizon is—'The kingdom shall be J″s' (Ob ^{21}).

There is, however, one other respect in which we can see, in this prophetic period, a distinct preparation for the NT idea of the kingdom of God. In the earlier stages of the theocracy, nation and Church—if we may so speak—were one. The Israelite was a member of the theocracy in virtue of birth and circumcision. The religious consciousness and the national consciousness were part of the same inseparable whole. But in the progress of Isr. history we observe a development which forms the necessary transition to the more spiritual idea of the kingdom in NT. It is the idea of the Church within the Church—of the true and spiritual Isr. in the midst of the natural Isr., who form a distinct, or at least distinguishable, body by themselves. There are earlier intimations, but in the form we have here especially in view, the growth of this idea belongs more particularly to the last dark days of the national history, when it became clear to prophetic eyes that Isr. as a people was doomed to destruction, and the efforts of the prophets were directed to gather out a remnant who might maintain the witness to God till better times came. A marked stage in this transition is seen in the ministry of Isaiah, who, when his message was rejected, gathered round him the little band of his own disciples, and sealed up the testimony in their midst (Is 8^{16-18}; cf. Mal 3^{16}). It is this 'ecclesia invisiblis of the Old Covenant,' as Oehler calls it,—this 'ecclesiola in ecclesia,' as Delitzsch names it,—which may be regarded as the germ of the Church-idea proper. W. R. Smith perhaps states it better than any. 'The formation of this little community,' he says, 'was a new thing in the history of religion. Till then, no one had dreamed of a fellowship of faith dissociated from all national forms, maintained without the exercise of ritual services, bound together by faith in the divine word alone. It was the birth of a new era in OT religion, for it was the birth of the conception of the Church, the first step in the emancipation of spiritual religion from the forms of political life—a step not less significant that all its consequences were not seen till centuries had passed away' (Prophets of Israel, pp. 274–75).

The collapse of the Jewish state in Isr. and Judah seemed to have laid the hope of the kingdom of God in ruins; but events proved that this hope was now strong enough to live on its own account, and the Babylonian Exile only tended to its further enlargement and strengthening. Torn from their roots in their own land, without holy city, temple, sacrifices, the people were taught that the acceptable worship of J″ was not tied to any one place, or dependent on a fixed priesthood or ritual; brought into contact with the world, in a geographical respect, to an extent they had never been before, they gained a new view of the extension of the world in space, which carried with it an extension of their idea of the time involved in the Divine plans. A new element entered the thoughts of the Jews at this period which never afterwards left it—an enlarged sense of the scale of things in space and time, the effect of which is seen in the enlarged scale of vision of the Bk. of Daniel (whatever its date), and even of the reveries in such apocalyptic compositions as the Bk. of Enoch. More than any book of OT the prophecy of Daniel gave definite shape and direction to the conception of a kingdom of the God of heaven, granted by the Ancient of Days to one like unto a son of man, who comes to receive it with the clouds of heaven, which kingdom was an everlasting dominion that could not be destroyed (Dn 7^{13-15}, cf. ch. 2^{44}; 'son of man' as opposed to 'beasts'; human, not bestial). The interpretation of this symbol as referring to a kingdom 'given to the saints of the Most High' ($7^{22.\ 27}$) need not exclude a Messianic reference; this, at least, is most generally held to be the source of the title 'Son of Man' as used by our Lord (found also in the Bk. of Enoch 46^{2} 48^{2} etc., both references probably of Christian origin). This kingdom of God in Dn which is to succeed the last of the four world kingdoms, and break in pieces all the others ($2^{34.\ 35.\ 44.\ 45}$; cf. $7^{14.\ 27}$), is of supernatural origin, of holy character, strictly universal in its scope, and endures for ever. The other writings of post-ex. Judaism (Bar, Ps.-Sol, 1 Mac, pseudo-Sibyllines, etc.) never rise to the height of these older representations, and mostly fall far below them into tame generalities, borrowed from passages in psalms and prophets, without any outlook towards the saving of the Gentiles, or discernment of the need of a spiritual conversion of the people. The Messiah, so far as He is brought into view at all, appears only to destroy the wicked, and establish His kingdom with the righteous (cf. Candlish, Kingdom of God, pp. 88–117; Stanton, Jewish and Christian Messiah, passim). We are thus taken back to the return from exile under Zerub. and the outburst of genuine prophecy connected therewith (Hag, Zec), and to the strains of Mal a century later, as the period of the last great utterances on the kingdom of God in OT. These add little to the features already sketched, beyond the note of warning and expectation of the coming of the Messenger of the Covenant to His temple, preceded by the sending of Elijah, with which Malachi closes (3^{1} 4^{5}). It is difficult not to feel, though centuries intervene, in passing from OT to NT, as if the evangelist had taken up his pen precisely where Malachi laid his down. The chief phenomena of these intervening centuries—so far as they are not absolutely a blank to us—the rise of scribism, of the synagogue worship, of the Jewish sects, the Maccabæan struggle, the dispersion, the fusion of Greek and Jewish thought in Alexandria,—yield little directly for the development of the idea of the kingdom of God, though in many indirect ways their influence was profound, sometimes in narrowing and despiritualizing the conception, and giving it a Pharisaic and political complexion, and again, through the synagogues and contact with Hellenic culture, preparing the way for a freer and more universal religion. The one fact which stands out clear is that in the time of our Lord neither Pharisee, nor Sadducee, nor Essene, had any hold of a conception of the kingdom which answered to the deep, spiritual, vital import of the idea in OT. The few who cherished more worthy views were to be sought for in the private circles of the pious who talked of these things (Mal 3^{16}), and 'looked for redemption in Jerusalem' (Lk $2^{25.\ 38}$). The idea of the kingdom of God in its spiritual meaning had to be *re*covered, or more properly *dis*covered, in a worldly, legalistic, Sadducean age. To bring it again, with the force of a new revelation, before the minds of men, in union with the call to repentance, was the task of John the Baptist. Then, when the time was fulfilled, Jesus came, preaching the gospel of the kingdom (Mk 1^{15}).

II. The Teaching of Jesus on the Kingdom of God.—1. Here we may first glance at the relation of Jesus to His forerunner. St. Matthew informs us that John came preaching in the wilderness of Judæa, and saying, 'Repent ye: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand' (Mt 3^2). Elsewhere this expression is not put in the mouth of the Baptist; but there is no doubt from the tenor of his message, and from the declarations of Jesus regarding him (Mt 11^{10-14}), that the kingdom was the burden of his preaching. Through him a revivification of the idea took place in the minds and consciences of the people, and the greatest commotion was created by his proclamation that the kingdom was just at hand (Mt $3^{5.\ 6}$, Mk 1^5). But the kingdom announced by John was something very different from the political kingdom of Pharisaic expectation. He revived the terrors, warnings, and predictions of the later OT prophecy, and gave them a forcible and immediate application to his own times. He struck at the root of the delusion that mere descent from Abraham would avail for entrance to the kingdom; proclaimed the need of repentance and changed conduct as the condition of forgiveness, declared the imminence of judgment, and a sifting of good from bad at Messiah's appearance (Mt 3^{7-10}, Lk 3^{7-9}). The kingdom he announced was ethical in its demands (Lk 3^{10-14}), was connected with the person of a Coming One, who should execute the work of judgment, and also baptize with the Holy Spirit and with fire (Mt, Mk, Lk), and was immediately to be expected. John was fully conscious of his own inferiority, and of the impotence of his water-baptism to effect a real change of heart in the multitudes who resorted to him, and his hope was therefore placed in this Greater One, who had the baptism of the Spirit (Jn 1^{19-27}). The question, then, arises: Was Jesus from the first conscious that He was this Greater One whom John had proclaimed, or did He begin His ministry, as some have contended (e.g. Colani and Renan), only as a disciple and imitator of the Baptist? That the former view is the correct one would be, of course, put beyond doubt, if the intimations of the Fourth Gospel were accepted (Jn $1^{30-34.\ 40-51}$ 3. 4^{26} etc.); but the Synoptics, also, in their narratives of the relations of John and Jesus at the baptism (Mt 3^{13-17} and parallels), of the temptations (Mt 4^{1-11} and parallels), which would have no meaning unless Jesus was consciously entering on His work as Messiah, of the early use by Jesus of the title 'Son of Man' (Mk 2^{10} etc.), and by many other indications, show plainly that this is the right view to take. (Baldensperger can only get over the use of 'Son of Man,' which he also accepts as a Messianic title, by arbitrarily assuming that all the incidents in which this name occurs took place after Peter's confession—a violent and unwarrantable hypothesis, Selbstbewusstsein Jesu^{2}, p. 252). How this consciousness of His Messiahship was developed in Jesus is a question which lies beyond our present limits. It was plainly there from the period of the baptism, and we have earlier indications of its presence (Lk 2^{49}, see below). We take it, therefore, as a datum to start from, that when Jesus began to preach the gospel of the kingdom He already knew His vocation to be its Founder and its Lord.

2. The relation of the Baptist to OT prophecy (Mt $11^{13.\ 14}$), and the historical connexion of Jesus with John, make it evident that, in announcing the approaching advent of 'the kingdom of heaven,' Jesus had in view the very kingdom which the prophets had foretold. We have already seen that this precise expression is not met with in OT (most nearly in Dn $7^{14.\ 18.\ 22}$), but Jesus in many places unmistakably takes over the OT theocratic idea (Mt $8^{11.\ 12}$ 21^{43} 22^{41-46} etc.). This suggests the further question as to our Lord's own customary designation for this divine kingdom. In Mt, with but four exceptions (ch. 6^{33} is an incorrect reading), the phrase employed is always 'the kingdom of heaven'; whereas the other Gospels and the remaining books of NT have uniformly 'the kingdom of God.' Which was Christ's own expression, or did He use both? (so Bruce). The contrast between Mt and the other Gospels, even in parallel passages, compels us to suppose that one is more original than the other, and the question is which. Some (as Weiss) prefer 'kingdom of God,' but preponderating reasons seem to be in favour of the form in Mt. There is reason to believe that the phrase מַלְכוּת שָׁמַיִם (rule [Dalm. Worte Jesu, 77 ff.] of the heavens) was a current expression in Rabbinical circles (see passages in Lightfoot and Wetstein on Mt 3^2; and especially Schoettgen on Mt 11^{29}); and there is probability in the conjecture that this may have been the form employed by our Lord in His ordinary Aramaic preaching (not necessarily to the exclusion of an occasional use of the other), and that, in translating into Gr., the evangelists may either, as in our existing Mt, have retained this Heb. formula, or have (as in Mk, Lk, etc.) rendered it by its equivalent, more suitable to Gentiles — 'the kingdom of God.' This is further supported by comparison with the language of the Lord's Prayer (Mt $6^{9.\ 10}$, Lk 11^2). No distinction in meaning of any importance can fairly be established between the two expressions, which denote the kingdom as, on the one hand, God's, and, on the other, heavenly in its origin, aims, and end. 'The kingdom of heaven, as appears from the prophecies of Daniel, is the kingdom of the Messiah; while the Lord's Prayer teaches us that it is the kingdom of God's Spirit, in which the will of man is made conformable to the will of God—a kingdom which comes from heaven, is heaven on earth, and ends in heaven' (Lange on Mt 3^2).

3. In examining the teaching of Jesus on the nature of this kingdom, we do well to start from the point already established—the connexion of the kingdom with His own Person. Nothing is plainer than that, in His own view, Jesus is not simply the Founder of this kingdom, but it is His kingdom as well as the Father's, and He is Lord and King over it (Mt 13^{41} 16^{28} 20^{21} $25^{34.\ 40}$ etc.). The idea here is moulded by that of the OT theocracy, in which God was at once the King of the chosen nation, and exercised His functions through a visible representative. This relation, only brokenly and typically illustrated in the descendants of David, is now, in accordance with prophecy, perfectly realized in the Messianic King, whose solidarity with God in heart and will is complete (Mt 11^{27}, Jn 4^{34} 5^{30} 6^{38} etc.). But the connexion of the kingdom with the Person of Jesus is more intimate even than this. Jesus is not only the Founder and Lord of the new theocracy, but is Himself the vital germ of it,—the living embodiment and representative of its principle,—the actual type of the new relation of sonship to God into which men are invited to enter through Him,—so that the kingdom of God may truly be said to have existed on earth in His Person from the first moment of His manifestation. It is through vital relation to Him, as the Synoptics, and still more clearly the Fourth Gospel, show,—through reception of His Person and message, through faith in Him, surrender to Him, submission to His rule, keeping His commandments, which is synonymous with doing the will of the Father, through union with Him as the branches and the vine, etc.,—that the kingdom is constituted (Mt 7^{21-23} 8^{10} 11^{28-30} $16^{24.25}$, Jn 15^{1-8} etc.). With all this goes a profoundly modified conception of the nature of the sovereignty in this new kingdom of God, which, as founded, not by worldly means of conquest and violence, but by humility, by service, by deeds of mercy, by suffering, by witness for the truth (Mt $11^{4-6.29}$ 13^{19} $18^{3.4}$ 20^{25-28}, Jn $18^{36.37}$), is ruled in like manner, not by force or tyranny, but by the suasive influences of love over freely surrendered hearts (Mt 11^{28-30} 22^{37-40}, Jn 14^{15} 15^{15}).

4. In light of this essential relation of Jesus to His kingdom, we are now prepared to consider the two great titles by which this relation was expressed by Jesus Himself—'Son of Man,' and 'Son of God.' The second of these titles, to which we return below, is, in the Synoptics at least, more frequently given to Jesus by others than assumed by Jesus Himself (Mt 3^{17} $4^{3.6}$ 14^{33} $27^{40.54}$, Mk 3^{11} 15^{39} etc.), but it is constantly implied, even in the earlier Gospels, in His mode of speaking of His Father, and is sometimes emphatically expressed (e.g. Mt 11^{27} $16^{16.17}$ $26^{63.64}$). In Jn it is the more common. It is otherwise with the title 'Son of Man,' which is the favourite designation of Jesus for Himself, but is never used by His disciples, or by the evangelists, in speaking of Him (only once outside the Gospels by Stephen, Ac 7^{56}). It occurs also in a singularly impressive and weighty form, with the definite article to both nouns, ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου.* It was plainly on His own lips a Messianic title (Mk 2^{10}, Mt 16^{28} 26^{64}, Jn 5^{27} etc.), yet there is no evidence, apart from the doubtful Bk. of Enoch, that it was a current title for the Messiah in that time. The usage in the Gospels shows decisively it was not. It was not the wish of Jesus to make a public avowal of His Messiahship in His early ministry, but we find Him freely using this enigmatic title (Mk 2^{10}). The Jews evidently were perplexed as to its meaning (Jn 12^{34}). The phrase 'Son of Man' in Mt 16^{13} is manifestly not synonymous with 'Christ,' either in popular acceptation or in the minds of the disciples. We must therefore hold it for certain that the expression was one welling up from the depths of the original consciousness of Jesus, and expressing some profound conception of His mission. What precisely this is, is a point on which there is wide difference of opinion (see the various views well stated in Lietzmann's Der Menschensohn, 1896). Wendt will have it (Die Lehre Jesu, ii. pp. 442, 443) that the title is meant to designate its possessor as a weak, creaturely being—member, Messiah though He was, of the weak, creaturely race of humanity. But this theory cannot be carried through without doing violence to many passages in which this name is evidently used as a title of dignity; the highest functions being claimed by Jesus, not, as Wendt's argument would require, despite of His being Son of Man, but because He is Son of Man (Mk 2^{28}, Jn 5^{27} etc.). More probable is the generally accepted view which connects this title with the language of Dn 7^{13} already alluded to—'there came with the clouds of heaven one like unto a Son of Man,' etc. (cf. Mt 26^{64}). Whatever view be taken of this expression,—whether it be supposed to denote an individual (so Beyschlag), or only to symbolize the humanness of the new kingdom in contrast with the kingdoms of the beasts which had preceded,—there lies in it at least the notion that the kingdom of God, not resting like the others on brute force, would be the first in which the divine ideal of humanity would be realized; so that our Lord, in taking this title, may well have expressed the consciousness that there had appeared in Him the New Man of the race—the type and representative of a new humanity—one who, because of this perfection of His humanity, stood in a relation to all men, and was their natural ruler and Lord in the kingdom He had come to found. There lay thus, in the use of the title by Jesus, at once the idea of the reality and truth of His humanity, the consciousness of His unique perfection as man, the sense of His universal relation to the race, and the knowledge of His calling and function to be the Messianic King.* He was Son of Man, as embodying in Himself the divine idea of a godlike humanity—the Son of Man, as the unique individual of the race who sustained this character—the Son of Man in the universal sense, as representing in His Person, not the seed of Abraham alone, but the whole of mankind. This title, accordingly, already expresses the principle of universality of the new religion in its contrast with the national limitation of Judaism, and the current conception of the Messiah. Baldensperger is therefore only partially correct when he rejects the 'ideal man' theory of this title, and ridicules it as an attempt to carry back our nineteenth-century notions into a period to which they were quite strange (2nd ed. p. 178). There lies behind it, certainly, no such abstract conception as 'the ideal man,' yet the reality which that phrase expresses is undoubtedly present from the beginning as an element in the consciousness from which the title springs.

We return to the more particular consideration of the second title, 'Son of God,' which, on the face of it, expresses the consciousness which Jesus had of His relation to God, just as the previous title expressed His consciousness of the relation He sustained to men. Those are undoubtedly right who warn us off from seeking, in the first instance, a metaphysical interpretation of this title. We shall not reach Christ's own meaning in the use of it, or the fact it represents in His consciousness, by starting with the definitions of the Nicene Creed; but must seek our clue rather in the line of the OT conceptions through which originally it came also to Him. As J" was the Father of His nation Isr. (Ex $4^{22.23}$, Hos 11^{1}), so was He peculiarly the Father of the theocratic King, 'I will be his Father, and he shall be my Son' (2 S 7^{14}, Ps 89^{20}). We have seen already what the relation imported in the theocratic ruler—a perfect unity with God in will and aim; such a solidarity between God and His visible representative that the purposes of the former, and those only, were perfectly executed by the latter. We saw, too, how entirely this ideal failed to be realized on the purely human basis of the OT theocracy, and

* Lietzmann in his tractate, Der Menschensohn (1896), seeks to break the force of this by going back from the Gr. to the Aram., in which ברנשא means simply 'man' (unemphatic). But the emphatic force of the expression cannot be erased from the Gospel usage. Lietzmann stands almost alone in holding that the term was not used by Jesus, but found its way into the Gospels from a Christian misconception.

* This is, in substance, Neander's view (Life of Christ), and a better has not yet been found.

how manifest it became, that if ever it was to be realized, the King in whom this was done must stand in a relation of nearness and unity to J″ transcending the limits of ordinary humanity—that he must possess an exceptional dignity of nature, raising him to a superhuman rank of character and authority (Isa $9^{6.7}$ etc.). When, now, we turn to the Gospels, we cannot but notice that the same ideas prevail. 'Son of God' is there also a Messianic title (Mt 16^{16} $26^{63.64}$, Jn 1^{49} 10^{36} etc.); and it connotes, with whatever else, a perfect oneness of thought, will, aim, sentiment, purpose, between the Father and the Son—entire moral and spiritual unity, reciprocal and exclusive knowledge, the perfect adoption by the Son of the divine ends as His own, and absolute fidelity and devotion in the execution of them (Mt 11^{27}, Jn 5^{20} $10^{15.30}$ etc.). And this is not less clearly associated in Jesus with the consciousness that this unbroken oneness in spirit with God is connected with some peculiar distinction in nature—that His relation to God as Son is not that of other men, but that He is the Son par excellence—the Son of God in a special and solitary relation of life and affection. It is observable, accordingly, that even while He recognizes the divine affinity in every human soul, invites men to sonship in His kingdom, and teaches His disciples to address God, and to love and trust Him as their Father, He never places Himself as Son in the same category with them, but always carefully distinguishes His own relation to the Father from theirs (e.g. Jn 20^{17}). Here, then, we come on that in the consciousness of Jesus which, while it cannot be properly spoken of as a metaphysical conception of His Person, yet legitimately lays the basis for those metaphysical, or at least transcendental, predications regarding Him which are found in the creeds, and even earlier in the Epistles, and the Johannine Prologue. What this transcendental element in the consciousness of Jesus implied, can only be inferred from His various utterances respecting Himself in the Gospels, from the claims He makes, the prerogatives He assumes, the works He does, His promise of His perpetual presence with His Church, and of His return in glory, His glimpses even into a previous state of pre-existence, etc. (Mt 7^{21-23} 18^{20} 25. 26^{64} 28^{18-20}, Jn 8^{58} 17^{5} etc.)—all matters which we cannot discuss here. One thing, however, is at once implied in what has just been said, namely, that whereas in the OT conception the official sense of the phrase 'Son of God' overshadows the personal, in the case of Jesus it is precisely the other way—the official relation is grounded in the personal. He is the Son of God as Messianic King, because He is first Son of God by nature. He is 'the Son' simpliciter; and this consciousness of a personal peculiarity in His relation to the Father, springing as it no doubt did from His sense of entire spiritual oneness, may be presumed to go back in some form to the earliest dawn of His reflective life (cf. Lk 2^{49}). There was no period of His life in which He did not know God as His Father; was not conscious of an untroubled relation of union with Him; did not find in His soul the reflection of His character; and did not yield to Him His entire love, trust, and obedience. We cannot err, therefore, in finding the root of Christ's conception of His kingdom in His own perfect consciousness of His filial relation to His Father, together with the new views of religion, of righteousness, of duty, and of blessedness, which this implied. The consciousness he had of Himself as Son, with the correlative idea of God as Father, leads to the designation of the kingdom as 'the kingdom of the Father' (Mt 13^{43}); just as St. Paul also speaks of it as 'the kingdom of the Son of His love,' into which the Father has translated us (Col $1^{12.13}$). The kingdom, in this view, is the sphere of God's fatherly love and rule in hearts truthfully submitted to Him through His Son; of His gracious, unbounded self-communication for the blessing and enrichment of His people. This doctrine of Jesus as to the divine Fatherhood, however, is not offhand to be identified, as it so often is, with the doctrine of the paternal love of God to all men, which has for its correlate the doctrine of a universal natural sonship of man. It is surprising how little basis is found for this doctrine of a universal Fatherhood and sonship in the recorded sayings of Jesus. It is doubtful if it is to be found anywhere, except by implication in the parable of the Prodigal (Lk 15^{11-32}). That Christ recognizes a natural kinship of every human soul with God (cf. Gn $1^{26.27}$), and a calling and destination of every individual to be a son of God in His kingdom, is indeed most true; but Fatherhood and sonship in His ordinary speech is a relation within His kingdom, not a relation of mere nature, but (so throughout the whole NT) the result of a divine act of grace placing man in this relation (the Pauline υἱοθεσία; cf. Jn $1^{12.13}$), and of a supernatural impartation of a new nature and life (Jn $3^{5.6}$). In comparison with this higher, divine relation, the natural sinks, as it were, into the background. We gain, indeed, the right point of view for understanding this doctrine of Jesus on the divine Fatherhood, only when we observe that it takes its origin, not from the general relation of God to the world, or even from the relation of God to believers in His kingdom, but primarily from the relation of the Father to Himself. It does not begin at the circumference—the general relation of God to mankind, but at the centre—the special, unique, incomparable relation of the Father to the Son. It is in the relation to the Son that we have, so to speak, the spring of Fatherhood in the heart of God. This relation, which in its fulness none other can share, is then in its measure extended to those who are the members of His kingdom; and, finally, extends itself even as a blessed possibility to all mankind, in harmony with man's original destination (parable of Prodigal).

5. With the help of this clue afforded us by the personal consciousness of Jesus, we are able to advance to some nearer determination on the subject of His kingdom. If Jesus was indeed sure of Himself from the first as the Son of God,—if He had this perfect filial consciousness from the beginning,—there falls away every ground for assuming that His views fluctuated and varied regarding this kingdom He came to found, or that He did not clearly grasp it from the outset in its essential nature, laws, and conditions of success. The Gospels give us no warrant for supposing that such fluctuation took place; the only point which can with plausibility be raised being that discussed below: whether from the first He apprehended the necessity of His death. If the essential feature in His kingdom was the admission of men through grace into a relation of sonship akin to His own, He could not have varied in His conception of it, of its righteousness, or of the general conditions of entrance into it, unless His own self-consciousness had varied. A second weighty result we reach is, that if Jesus was fully conscious of Himself as Son of God, and Founder of this kingdom, from the first, this kingdom in His view could not have been a merely future thing, but must have been conceived of as already existing. This, again, is a point on which much discussion has been raised: whether, namely, the kingdom of God, in the teaching of Jesus, has only an eschatological significance (thus Kaftan, Schmoller, etc.), or whether it denotes an already existing reality (Ritschl, Wendt, etc.). The true view, surely, is that it is not either exclusively. It both has a present being upon earth, and has a perfect, glorified form in eternity. The existence of the kingdom as a present, developing reality is implied in the parables of growth (mustard seed, leaven, seed growing secretly, Mt 13, Mk 4^{26-32}); in the representations of it, in its earthly form, as a mixture of good and bad (wheat and tares, the net of fishes, Mt 13); in the description of the righteousness of the kingdom (Sermon on the Mount) which is to be realized in the ordinary human relations; as well as in many special sayings (e.g. Mt 12^{28}, Lk 16^{16} 17^{21}, whether 'within' or 'among' makes no difference). But, apart from specific declarations, the truth is implied in the simple fact that Jesus Himself was present in the full consciousness of His Sonship and calling to be the Founder of the kingdom, gathering disciples to Himself as the nucleus of a future society. We have formerly observed that in the Person of Jesus, even had there been no other, the kingdom of God was already present in humanity. In Him lay the vital germ of that kingdom; He was the bearer and representative of its principle of Sonship; in Him its powers and grace were made manifest (Mt 12^{28}). When, as the result of His activity, a band of disciples were drawn around Him, the members of which were introduced by Him into a new fellowship with God, and in whose hearts the principle of a divine rule was manifestly established, it was more than ever evident that the kingdom of God had begun on earth.

Still endeavouring to keep in view the inward and essential nature of this kingdom, or reign of God among men, which Jesus came to introduce, we are led by the representations of the Gospels to form such conceptions of it as the following. In what is said under these heads, the connexion of the kingdom with its Founder, and the teaching of Jesus on God, man, righteousness, salvation, will receive further illustration.

(a) The kingdom is in its beginnings, as just stated, the introduction of a new principle of divine rule into the hearts of men, through the word (Mt 13^{19}), the truth (Jn 18^{37}), the Spirit (Jn $3^{5.6}$), in virtue of which, changed in disposition (Mt 18^{3}), they become doers of the will of the Father in heaven (Mt 7^{21} etc.). It is therefore, in its principle, something inward, vital, invisible (Lk $17^{20.21}$). It is not the idea of Jesus, however, that this kingdom should be confined solely to the inward life. It is rather a principle working from within outwards for the renewal and transformation of every department of our earthly existence (marriage, the family, the state, social life, etc., Mt 19^{3-9}, Jn 2^{1-11}, Mt 22^{21} etc.). It is thus a growing, developing thing—as it is represented in the parables (Mt 13). The kingdom is not fully come till everything in human life, and in the relations of man in society, is brought into complete harmony with the will of God (Mt 6^{10}; cf. Neander, Life of Christ, p. 89, Eng. tr.). While, however, Jesus gives us many incidental indications of the true relation of His kingdom to society, it is the spiritual or directly religious and ethical aspect of the kingdom which alone is more prominent in His teaching. 'The whole weight is rested on the inward disposition, on the new relation to God, on the new life of the Spirit, on the new righteousness proceeding from that life, on the new hopes and privileges of the sons of God. Everything is looked at in the light of the spiritual, the eternal. We read nothing in Christ of the effects of His religion on art, on culture, on philosophy, on politics, on commerce, on education, on science, on literature, on economical or social reform' (Christian View of God and the World, p. 406). So also with the apostles. Yet a regenerating spirit has gone forth from the gospel of the kingdom in all these departments.

(b) On the other side, the kingdom of God is viewed as a sphere of privilege and blessing into which the disciple is admitted, in which he receives the forgiveness of his sins, attains the satisfaction of his spiritual wants, is filled with righteousness, and inherits the felicity of the eternal life (Mt 5^{3-10} 6^{14} 19^{29} $25^{34.46}$, Lk 4^{18}, Jn $6^{27.35.40}$ 10^{28} etc.). It is the summum bonum for man—the good to be desired above all others, and for which everything else should be sacrificed (Mt 6^{33} 13^{44-46}, parables of Treasure and Pearl 19^{29}, Lk 10^{42}, Jn 17^{3} etc.). The kingdom of God is thus emphatically with Jesus, as throughout the whole of Scripture, a kingdom of grace, the message of it 'good tidings' (Mt 4^{23}, Lk $2^{10.11}$ 4^{22}). Its proclamation is a gospel, and it brings to man at once the fullest provision for his needs as a sinner, the highest satisfaction of his moral life, and the noblest end for his practical realization. God's royalty in His kingdom is shown not less by gift than by rule; it is gracious, unstinted giving which is the foundation of the whole (Mt 7^{7-11}, Jn 5^{14} 6^{32-35} $10^{11.28}$ etc.). It is thus the sphere of 'salvation,' though this term (σωτηρία) is still seldom used (Lk 19^{9}, Jn 4^{22}; cf. Lk 1^{69-72}, Mt $16^{25.26}$ 19^{25}, Lk 19^{10}, Jn 3^{14-17} 5^{34} 12^{47} etc.). The all-embracing expression for its good is 'eternal life'; yet in the Synoptics this term is always applied to the future consummation of that good (e.g. Mk 10^{30}), whereas in Jn it is used also to denote the present possession of the life of God by believers (Jn 5^{24}). Wendt justly points out, however, that even in Jn this is done only in occasional passages (Die Lehre Jesu, ii. p. 193), and the Synoptics also recognize in fact the present reception and enjoyment by believers of those blessings of the kingdom which Jn designates by 'eternal life' (Mt 5^{3-10} etc.).

(c) The kingdom of God is inseparably associated with character in its members. The conditions of entrance into it are repentance and faith (Mk 1^{15}, Lk 7^{50} $13^{3.5}$ etc.); its blessings require for their reception such moral dispositions as poverty of spirit, humility, meekness, and lowliness of heart, spiritual hungering and thirsting (Mt $5^{3.6}$ $11^{28.29}$ $18^{3.4}$, Jn 4^{14} 6^{35}); as a kingdom of the truth, those only that are of the truth (Jn 18^{37}), of an honest and good heart (Lk 8^{15}), will receive it; to know its doctrine, there must be a willingness to do the will of God (Jn 7^{17}); a desire for the honour of men is fatal to seeking the honour that comes from God (Jn 5^{44}). These states of mind are not the product of nature, but the result of a new spiritual birth (Jn $3^{3.5}$). Within the kingdom, the rule of God takes the form of the realization of a new and spiritual righteousness in the hearts of the members, and in their relations with each other and with the world. This righteousness is of the essence of the kingdom (Mt 6^{33}), and a great part of the teaching of Jesus relates to it (notably the Sermon on the Mount). It is at once part of the blessing of the kingdom (Mt 5^{6}), and a moral task set before the members for their accomplishment (Mt 5^{13-16} 7^{21}). Its norm is the perfection of the Father Himself (Mt 5^{48})—the absolutely Good One (Mk 10^{18}). Like everything else in the kingdom, it is the product of a divinely given life, and develops from within outwards, from heart to conduct, as a good tree brings forth fruit (Mt 7^{17}). It differs from the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees in motive and in aim,—being spontaneous, where theirs was formal and mechanical; spiritual, where theirs had regard only to the letter of the precept; done with a sole respect to God, where theirs was man-pleasing (Mt 5^{17}–6^{18}). Its supreme principle is love (Mt 7^{12}, Mk 12^{28-34}). In relation to God, it takes the form of a spirit of dependence, and trust in His fatherly providence, which relieves from earthly care (Mt 6^{25-34} 7^{6-11}); in its estimate of goods, it sets supreme store on the kingdom and its righteousness, and seeks these beyond all material blessings (Mt $6^{19-23.\ 31-33}$); in its relation to man, it shows itself in mercy, forbearance, forgiveness of injuries, active beneficence, and in the bright shining of a holy example (Mt $5^{5.\ 7.\ 38-48}$ 7^{12}). Its standards of judgment are the direct inversion of most of those which prevail in the world. It inverts, e.g., the world's standards of blessedness in calling the poor in spirit, the mourning, the meek, the persecuted, etc., blessed (Mt 5^{3-12}; cf. Mal 3^{14}); the world's standards of greatness in pronouncing that true greatness lies in humility and service (Mt $18^{3.\ 4}$, Mk 10^{44}, Jn $13^{14.\ 15}$); the world's standards of wisdom in pronouncing the typical wise man of the world a fool (Lk 12^{16-21}); the world's standards of the chief good in making that consist in the kingdom and its righteousness (Mt 6^{33}), etc. Yet, in His doctrine of the righteousness of the kingdom, Jesus declares that He is not introducing anything absolutely new, but only unfolding the deepest spirit and teaching of law and prophets (Mt $5^{17.\ 18}$ 22^{36-39}).

(d) It follows from the nature of the kingdom, as just described, that it is a kingdom entirely spiritual and unworldly in its nature (Jn 18^{36}, cf. Mk $10^{42.\ 43}$)—supernatural and heavenly in its origin, powers, blessings, aims, and ends,—a kingdom free alike from national and ceremonial limitations, working by its own laws, and destined in the end to embrace all peoples. There is thus given us from another side what we saw to lie already in the Lord's designation of Himself as 'Son of Man'—the universality of the kingdom of God. Jesus already hints at this in Mt 8^{11} 'They shall come from the east and from the west, and shall sit down with Abraham,' etc.; it is implied in His parables (Mt 13 'the field is the world,' v.^{38}; parable of Mustard Seed, etc.); is declared elsewhere (Mt 21^{43} 'The kingdom of God shall be taken from you,' etc.); and is announced in several sayings of Jn (e.g. Jn 12^{32} 'I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me,' etc.). It comes out distinctly in the commission after the resurrection (Mt 28^{19}, Mk 16^{15}). It must also have been given to the consciousness of Jesus from the first by the prophecy in Dn ($2^{35.\ 44}$ $7^{14.\ 27}$). Equally clear is it from the attitude of Jesus to mere ceremonial observances (Mt 15^{1-20}), and the critical, discretionary position He assumed to the whole Mosaic Law (e.g. the Sabbath, Mk 2^{28}; marriage, Mt 19^{6-9}), that, while Himself observing the ordinances of His nation, He did not bind these on the members of His kingdom, but claimed the right as Son of Man—i.e. the Messiah—to alter, change, and abrogate them. His relation to the Jewish law He lays down in the principle that He came, not to destroy, but to fulfil (Mt 5^{17}). But this fulfilment was of a nature which meant in part destruction. His aim throughout was to judge the details of the law by reference to its underlying principle, and to the highest needs of men (Mk 2^{27}),—to go back at every point clearly from commands to principles, from outward conduct to dispositions of the heart, from forms of worship to spirit of worship—and this led to the dropping away of everything that was of mere provisional or temporary value. In the Sermon on the Mount, accordingly, and in all the Gospels, the whole stress is laid on the spiritual, the ethical, the eternal, and no reference is made to the ceremonial law at all. Nay, in the two similitudes of the Patch on the Old Garment, and the New Wine in Old Bottles (Mt $9^{16.\ 17}$), Jesus indicates in the clearest way His consciousness that His kingdom was something radically new, and not simply a reformed and purified Judaism, and that the old forms were utterly inadequate to contain the spirit of the new religion—that the latter would indeed burst and rend them, if it were put into them.

(e) The kingdom thus introduced into time and history has two stadia—an earthly and an eternal. The consideration of this point involves, finally, some investigations to which we proceed.

(a) A question of much importance here is as to the connexion which Jesus conceived to subsist between the founding of His kingdom and His death. The question is twofold: whether from the beginning of His ministry He clearly recognized the necessity of His death; and, if He did, or even if this knowledge came later, what significance He attributed to His death for the founding of His kingdom? The first point is not to be settled on a priori grounds, but from an impartial consideration of the history. We cannot, however, doubt, from a review of all the circumstances, that Jesus did, from the commencement of His Messianic career, recognize the fate in store for Him—whether the precise mode of His death is another question (but cf. Jn $3^{14.\ 16}$). It is true that it was not till after the memorable confession at Cæsarea Philippi that Jesus began to speak plainly to His disciples of His approaching sufferings and death (Mt 16^{21} etc.), but it does not follow that this was the beginning of His own knowledge on the subject. On the contrary, it is evident from the clearness, fulness, and decision with which He then announces His death and resurrection, that these topics had long occupied His own thoughts, and were already settled convictions in His mind. But we are not left entirely to conjecture. It is, on the face of it, in the highest degree improbable that one who from the outset grasped so clearly the essential nature of His kingdom in its contrast with the world, who had rejected the temptations to give it another shape (Mt 4^{1-11}), who predicted so accurately in His parables the stadia of its development in history (Mt 13), who forewarned His disciples of the certain persecutions which awaited them for His sake (Mt $5^{10.\ 11}$ 10^{16-24}), could have been ignorant of the inevitable collision which must occur between Himself and the Jewish authorities, and which He must have foreseen could not but issue in His death. That He did anticipate it is expressly implied in His saying, 'The disciple is not above his Master,' etc. (Mt 10^{24}), and in His allusion to the bridegroom being taken away from them (Mt 9^{15}). More definitely, Jesus had deeply studied the prophecies, and in the very beginning of His ministry announced that those relating to the Servant of J″ in Is were fulfilled in Himself (Lk 4^{21}). But He could not be unaware of what was written of the death of this Servant in Is 53; and the recorde d greeting of the Baptist, 'Behold the Lamb of God,' etc. (Jn 1^{29}), would recall that passage. There are other sayings in Jn—those to Nicodemus (Jn $3^{14.\ 16}$), and especially the enigmatic utterances about giving His flesh for the life of the world (Jn 6^{51-56})—which point in the same direction. But if Jesus foresaw His death, it was impossible that He should not have regarded His temporary submission to it as in some way necessary for the ends of His kingdom—for, that His subjection to death was, and could be, only temporary, He never, in the strength of His Messianic consciousness, doubted. His announcement of His death is always conjoined with the declaration of His rising again (Mt 16^{21} 20^{19} etc.); and the shadow of the Cross never clouds for a moment His assurance of His final coming in glory to judge the world (Mt 7^{22} 10^{23} 13^{41} 16^{27}, Lk 12^{8} etc.). If, accordingly, we ask, What was the significance which Jesus attached to His death in connexion with the establishment of His kingdom? we are driven, by the passages already cited, to see in it more than the mere illustration of a general law of sacrifice (Jn 12^{24-26}), or a proof of fidelity in His vocation. We must take an incidental saying like Mk 10^{45} 'For even the Son of Man came . . . to give his life a ransom for many,' not as if it stood alone, but with the depth and seriousness of meaning supplied by a context of similar utterances. The great passage on the expiatory sufferings of the Servant of J" (Is 53) must probably be our clue here also. We recall the word of the Baptist, 'The Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world' (Jn 1^{29}); the saying in which His death is connected with salvation in the conversation with Nicodemus ('as Moses lifted up the serpent,' etc., Jn 3^{14}; for though the lifting up' is a term of exaltation, we can hardly fail to associate it with His death); the 'giving his flesh for the life of the world' in Jn 6^{51}; but, above all, the solemn and explicit words at the institution of the Supper, 'My blood of the covenant, which is shed for many unto the remission of sins' (Mt 26^{28}; cf. Mk 14^{24}, Lk 22^{20}, 1 Co 11^{25}). In keeping with this connexion of His death in the consciousness of Jesus with the remission of sins, we are told how, after the resurrection, the disciples were enjoined to make this a fundamental article of their preaching (Lk 24^{47}). The death of Jesus, followed by His rising again, was evidently, in the Lord's own view, a decisive turning-point in the history of His kingdom, and in the spiritual history of the world; and not till that event had taken place, and the spirit had been given as the sequel to it, had the kingdom been fully constituted (Lk 24^{49}, Ac 1^5 2^{33}).

(β) It remains that we glance at the eschatological declarations of Jesus respecting His kingdom, for that its earthly phase is to be succeeded by a heavenly, in which the separation of good and bad shall be finally effected, and the ripened results of its long development shall be garnered up under new and glorious conditions, is a constant element in His teaching (Mt 13^{40-43} $19^{28.\ 29}$ $22^{29.\ 30}$ $25^{34.\ 46}$, Jn $14^{1.\ 2}$ 17^{24} etc.). This higher and eternal state, described as 'the regeneration' (παλιγγενεσία), or 'the resurrection' (ut supra), is introduced by the coming (παρουσία) of the Son of Man in glory, the resurrection of the dead, and a judgment which takes account of the conduct alike of the professed members of the kingdom, and of the nations of mankind (Mt 24, Jn $5^{28.\ 29}$, Mt 7^{21-23} 25, etc.). The principles on which this judgment proceeds are essential character, with its fruits in word and deed; faithfulness or unfaithfulness in duty; watchfulness; boldness in confessing Christ, or sin in denying Him; the presence or absence of love, etc. The separation which the judgment effects is, so far as appears, final (Mt 13^{40-43} 25^{46} etc.). In thus carrying the consummation of the kingdom into a future life, and connecting it with His personal return, Jesus goes entirely beyond OT limits; though there also the doctrines of a future life in the blessed enjoyment of God, and of a resurrection of the dead, are in process of formation (Ps 17^{15} $49^{14.\ 15}$ 73^{23-26}, Is 25^8 26^{19}, Hos 6^3 13^{14}, Dn 12^2 etc.). The doctrine of the resurrection was a cardinal one with the Pharisees; but it had its deep roots in the OT doctrines of man, of God, of sin, of death, and of salvation (Mt 22^{29-33}), and, as connected by Jesus with the redemption and new life of His kingdom, is an essential part of His religion. The question, nevertheless, is one of some difficulty, how far the undoubtedly largely symbolical and figurative character of these discourses of Jesus on the last things entitles us to rely on them as real representations of the future? They assuredly do not give us a scientific, or perfectly objective, knowledge of the nature, the course, and relative order of these events, such as we can turn with precision into a theological system. Yet they are too definite and circumstantial to permit of our supposing that to the consciousness of Jesus they were mere figures, or were not intended to convey to us some real knowledge on the subjects of which they treat. This question presses especially in regard to the Parousia. Did Jesus, e.g., anticipate for His kingdom a long period of development in the world before the end came; or was His Parousia regarded by Himself as immediate, or, at least, as not long to be delayed? Mt 24^{29}, with certain other passages (Mt 10^{23} 16^{28}), might seem to teach the latter, and we know that the times and the seasons were not within the human knowledge of the Son (Mk 13^{32}, Ac 1^6); but a careful consideration of the whole teaching of Jesus will lead us to modify this first impression. We cannot mistake that the picture of the kingdom given us in the parables is that of a slowly developing reality, bound to a law of rhythm—'first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear' (Mk 4^{28})—with the world and humanity as its sphere of manifestation, and good and evil growing side by side in it till both are fully ripe (Mt 13); and other passages suggest the like idea of a prolonged world-development, and a diffusion of the gospel among all nations before the end come (Mt 8^{11} 21^{43} 24^{4-14}, Lk $19^{11.\ 12.\ 15}$; cf. also the post-resurrection commissions, Mt $28^{19.\ 20}$, Mk 16^{15} etc.). Against these numerous indications the εὐθέως of Mt 24^{29} (which may be variously accounted for) cannot be allowed to tell; especially as there are not wanting signs in the discourse itself of a nearer and a remoter horizon ('these things,' 'that day and hour,' vv.$^{34.\ 36}$). The truth would seem to be that Jesus does not always speak of His Parousia (any more than of His kingdom) in the same sense; that it is to Him rather a process in which many elements flow together into a single image, than a single definite event, always looked at in the same light. Thus he says to the high priest, with obvious reference to the prophecy in Dn, 'Henceforth,' that is, from this time on, 'ye shall see the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of power, and coming on the clouds of heaven' (Mt 26^{64}). He came in His resurrection; in the mission of the Comforter; in the power and spread of His kingdom, especially after the removal of the limitations created by the existing Jewish polity (which seems to be the meaning in Mt 16^{28}); He comes in every great day of the Lord in the history of His Church; He will yet come more conspicuously in the events of the future; and, last of all, He will personally come to judge the quick and the dead. The kingdom advances to its goal, not peacefully or suddenly, but by a succession of great crises (Mt 24), and each of these is in a sense the coming of the Son of Man (cf. Reuss' Hist. of Christ. Theol. i. pp. 217, 218; Bruce's Kingdom of God, ch. 12; Christian View of God and the World, p. 384).

7. One topic more, of considerable importance, we must allude to before leaving this part of our subject. It is the much canvassed question of the relation of the idea of the kingdom of God to that of the Church. If our previous exposition is correct, these ideas are not quite identical, as they have frequently been taken to be. The kingdom of God is a wider conception than that of the Church. On the other hand, these ideas do not stand so far apart as they are sometimes represented. In some cases, e.g. in Mt $16^{18.\ 19}$, the phrase 'kingdom of heaven' is practically synonymous with the Church. The Church is, as a society, the visible expression of this kingdom in the world; is indeed the only society which does formally profess (very imperfectly often) to represent it. Yet the Church is not the outward embodiment of this kingdom in all its aspects, but only in its directly religious and ethical, i.e. in its purely spiritual, aspect. The direct business of the Church, e.g., is not to take to do with art, science, politics, literature, etc., but to bear witness for God and His truth to men, to preach and spread the gospel of the kingdom, to maintain God's worship, to administer the sacraments, to provide for the self-edification and religious fellowship of believers (cf. Christian View of God and the World, pp. 409, 410). That Jesus contemplated the union of the members of His kingdom into such a visible society—or Church—is evident from direct statements, as in Mt 16^{18} ('on this rock I will build my Church'); from the institution of the apostolate (Mt 10^{1-5}); from the instructions about baptism (Mt $28^{19, 20}$); from the rules of discipline He lays down (Mt 18^{15-18}), etc.: while the important functions which He intrusts to this society are seen from the terms in which He speaks of it; the promises He gives to it (Mt 16^{18-20} 18^{20}); the authority He confers upon it (Mt 16^{19} 18^{18}, Jn 20^{23}); the sacraments He leaves with it; and the assurances of His perpetual presence, which are among His last words to it (Mt 28^{20}). In Jn the deeper root of the Church idea is manifest in the conception of the living union of the branches with the vine (Jn 15^{1-7}).

III. The Teaching of the Epistles and other Books of NT on the Kingdom of God.—In passing from the Gospels, and especially the Synoptics, to the remaining writings of NT, we are sensible at once of a great difference in the use made of this conception of the kingdom of God. It is no longer the central and all-comprehending notion which it was in the popular teaching of Jesus, but sinks comparatively into the background, where it does not altogether disappear, and is employed, so far as retained, in an almost exclusively eschatological sense. The difference is accounted for by the altered circumstances of the Christian community. It was no longer the Jesus of the earthly ministry, but the Risen Lord, that was the centre of the faith and hope of the Christian believers. The Christ had died, had risen again, was exalted to heaven, had poured out the Spirit, was expected speedily to return to judgment; and interest was concentrated on the meaning and bearings of these great facts on salvation. The gospel had passed over from Jews to Gentiles, and Churches were everywhere being formed and organized. Under these changed conditions it was inevitable also that nomenclature should change, and that the higher stage on which the kingdom of God had entered in history should evolve a speech, and forms of conception for itself, adapted to its new wants. And this is what actually happened. Instead of the kingdom, it is now Christ Himself who is the centre of preaching; in speaking to Gentiles, His work, the blessings of His salvation, the nature and fruits of the new life of the Spirit, the hopes connected with His appearing, are naturally dwelt on without reference to the theocratic conception; as respects the earthly form, the idea of the Church necessarily displaces every other. The one sphere which these altered conditions did not touch was the eschatological, and here accordingly we find the idea of the kingdom, as one among other forms of conception, retained.

The phenomenon which here confronts us has, of course, struck every careful student of the NT. Harnack notices it in his Dogmengeschichte: 'It is not wonderful,' he says, 'that in the oldest Christian preaching "Jesus Christ" meets us as frequently as, in the preaching of Jesus, the kingdom of God itself' (i. p. 70; cf. Ritschl, Rechtfertigung, ii. p. 293 ff.; Kaftan, Das Wesen, p. 229, etc.). In Ac there are a few references which show that 'the kingdom of God' was still the general formula for the substance of Christian preaching (8^{12} 14^{22} 19^{8} 20^{25} $28^{23, 31}$). But in the Epistles the term recedes decidedly into the background, and, as just stated, is generally used in an eschatological sense. 1 P does not use the expression; Ja only once (βασιλεία alone, Ja 2^{5}). The Pauline theology is developed from its own basis, without any systematic attempt to fit it to this conception. In He it is other ideas that rule. The term 'kingdom' occurs only once, with a future reference (12^{28}). In the Johannine writings, the only occurrences are in two places in the Gospel, and denote (on Christ's lips) the present spiritual kingdom ($3^{3, 5}$ 18^{36}—in the latter passage 'my kingdom'). Generally, in this Gospel, as in the Epistles, the idea of the kingdom recedes behind that of 'life.' The case of Rev requires consideration by itself. Here, clearly, the idea of the kingdom is a governing one. Believers are made a kingdom unto God, and have the hope of reigning with Christ (1^{6} 3^{21} 5^{10}); the Lamb is 'Lord of lords, and King of kings' (17^{14} 19^{16}, cf. 1^{5}); and the climax of His conflict with His enemies is that 'the kingdom of the world is become the kingdom of our Lord, and of His Christ; and He shall reign for ever and ever' (11^{15-17}). The peculiarity in the apocalyptic representation, however, is the interpolation before the general judgment of 1000 years' reign of Christ with His saints on earth, following upon a binding of Satan, and a first resurrection (20^{1-8}). The picture stands alone in NT, though the idea involved in it—that of a 'pre-eminent blossoming time' for the Church before the final consummation—'a time in which the Church shall celebrate her Sabbath eve,—the eve before the Sabbath' (Martensen)—stands in no contradiction with the teaching of Jesus, is in every way probable, and is not unfamiliar to OT prophecy (Is 11^{6} 35, etc.).

At first sight the contrast between the apostolic gospel and the teaching of Jesus in the Synoptics, as respects the use made of this idea of the kingdom, is sufficiently marked; but when we consider the subject a little more carefully—looking rather to the essence of the doctrine than to the language employed—a substantial harmony is apparent. It is plain, from the notices in the Ac above cited, and from the incidental references, that 'the kingdom of God' was still a recognized formula to cover all the contents of Christian preaching; though, for the reasons already assigned, it had no longer the same prominence as at an earlier period; and, while the prevailing tendency was to limit this title to the kingdom of the future, and to connect it with the Parousia (e.g. 2 Th 1^{5}, 2 Ti $4^{1, 8}$, where ἐπιφάνεια), there are still a few cases which show that it was also applied to the present experience and state of privilege of Christians. Such, e.g., are Ro 14^{17}, where the kingdom of God is declared to consist, not in meat and drink, but in 'righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost'; and Col 1^{13}, where believers are spoken of as already 'translated' into 'the kingdom of the Son of his love.' Apart, however, from the mere use of the term,—which is a secondary matter,—we cannot fail to see that everything that Christ meant by the present being of His kingdom is fully recognized and insisted on by the apostolic writers; Christ Himself is 'the Lord' (ὁ Κύριος); He is exalted to the place of universal dominion at God's right hand (Ac 2^{33-36}, 1 Co $15^{24, 25}$, Eph 1^{20-23}, Ph 2^{9-11}, He 1^{8} 2^{9}, Ja 2^{1}, 1 P 3^{22} etc.); the kingdom is that of God and of Christ (Eph 5^{5}, Col 1^{13}); He exercises, therefore, a present unlimited sway in and over His people, and over all things for their sake (Eph 1^{22}). Believers, again, are 'sons of God'; are, like Isr., 'an elect race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people of God's own possession,' called 'out of darkness into his marvellous light,' 'a people of God' (1 P $2^{9.10}$); they are renewed and dwelt in by His Spirit, which gives them the victory over sin in their members (Ro 7^{25} 8^{1-9}); grace 'reigns' in them (Ro 5^{21} $6^{12.13.19}$);—in short, everything that can constitute a present kingdom of God on earth is acknowledged as existing in their case. If, therefore, there is any contrast with the teaching of Christ, it is in the advance to a higher, richer conception of the spiritual life than was possible at an elementary stage of instruction.

As respects the peculiarities of the doctrine of the kingdom of God in the Pauline Epistles, it is not necessary to add much to what has been said. The kingdom, in the apostle's view, as in Christ's own teaching, is connected with 'a redemption (ἀπολύτρωσις) through his blood,' and with forgiveness of sins (Col 1^{14}, cf. Eph 1^{7}). In its form of glory it awaits the appearing of Christ (2 Th 1^{5-10}, 2 Ti $4^{1.8}$). But as in Rev we have the millennial doctrine, so in St. Paul we have the doctrine of the development of the man of sin and of the apostasy prior to the advent (2 Th 2^{3-10}, cf. Mt $24^{11.12}$). It is still a moot question how far this doctrine is moulded upon current representations of Antichrist, and how far it is original (cf. references in Stanton's Jewish and Christian Messiah, p. 310). In St. John's Epistles the idea is more generalized (1 Jn $2^{18.22}$ 4^{3}); while in the Apocalypse it assumes the threefold form of the Beast, the False Prophet, and the Woman (Rev 13. 17). Finally, St. Paul alone gives us the sublime idea of an ultimate rendering up of the mediatorial kingdom by the Son to the Father, 'that God may be all in all' (1 Co 15^{28}).

It lies beyond the scope of this article to discuss the various shapes which this great scriptural idea of the kingdom of God has assumed in its course down the ages. The chief are the Patristic Chiliastic idea; the Mediæval or Catholic idea (as in Augustine, who, however, has glimpses of a wider truth in his City of God); the Reformation idea, which still identifies the kingdom too exclusively with the Church; and the various modern forms of conception in the Church and schools from Kant downwards. A great impulse has been given to the study of this notion by the later Ritschlian theologians, who have done much to restore it to its just importance. It must however, always remain doubtful—and the diversities in the apostolic teaching give additional force to the doubt—how far this single idea of the kingdom of God is fitted to serve as the principle of an exhaustive system of theology. Its proper place would seem to be within the system as defining the end in the light of which God's whole purpose in Christ is to be read; and in this way it is fitted to render essential service as the bond of union between dogmatic theology and Christian ethics — two departments which have hitherto stood too far apart. It does this service by introducing the idea of an end which is at the same time an aim—in setting before the individual as his life-task the realization of that kingdom of God which is God's own end in creation and redemption. The social tendencies of our age give this idea of the kingdom of God a special value for our own time; and we may expect that its importance will be increasingly recognized,—on the one hand, in its ennobling effect on the conception of Christian work, and the higher spirit of unity it tends to engender in those engaged in it; and, on the other, in broadening the conception of Christian duty as embracing the obligation to labour for the supremacy of God's will in all the departments of private, social, and public life. It may be that the time has come for a resuscitation of this idea of Jesus which the exigencies of the apostolic age threw somewhat into the background; and that new applications and triumphs await it in the complexities of our modern social life, which even inspired men of the first generation could not reasonably foresee.

1. TITLE, SCOPE, AND PLACE IN CANON.—The title in AV, RV is 'The first (second) Book of the Kings.' Heb. (ב) מלכים א 'Kings I. II.'; LXX ΒΑΣΙΛΕΙΩΝ Γ (Δ). The use of the definite article in the English Version, 'the Kings,' is therefore unwarranted. The narrative of Kings, like those of Samuel and Chronicles, is continuous, and the division into two books is clearly a later device, and no part of the scheme of the original editor.

The division of the Hebrew text of Kings into two books is not found in the MSS or in the early printed editions. It first occurs in the great Rabbinic Bible of Daniel Bomberg, published at Venice 1516–17, where an asterisk between 1 K 32^{54} and 2 K 1^{1} calls attention to a note in the margin:—כאן מתחילים הלועזים ספר מלכי' רביעי. 'Here the non-Jews (i.e. Christians) begin the fourth Book of Kings.' A similar note is found between 1 and 2 S. Cf. Ginsburg, Introd. to the Massoretico-critical Edit. of the Heb. Bible, pp. 45, 930 f. Thus the division in MT seems to have been an innovation from LXX, Vulg. While in LXX no known MS presents an undivided text of 1. 2 K, 3. 4 K, 1. 2 Ch, it is interesting to note that in B the first verse of each second book appears also at the close of each first book respectively—a fact which shows that the divider of the books was desirous of indicating the inner connexion existing between the first and second divisions in each case. Cf. the manner in which in MT Ezr 1^{1-3a} (to ויעל) repeats 2 Ch $36^{22.23}$, of which it originally formed the unbroken continuation.

Kings takes up the history of the kingdom of Israel at the point which has been reached by the narrative of Samuel, viz. the last days of David's reign, and the appointment of Solomon as his successor. Passing from Solomon to an account of the circumstances which led to the disruption of the kingdom, the editor from this point gives a parallel history of the divided kingdoms of Israel and Judah. The fall of the northern kingdom having been recorded (2 K 17), the narrative continues with an account of the fortunes of the southern kingdom until its destruction by Nebuchadrezzar and the final deportation of the Judæans to Babylon, B.C. 586. The concluding section of the work carries the history down to the release of king Jehoiachin from prison in the 37th year of his captivity (B.C. 561), under Evil-Merodach, the successor of Nebuchadrezzar.

Kings belongs to the second of the three divisions of the Hebrew Canon—the Nĕbhî'îm (נביאים) or Prophets. In this division the book forms, with Joshua, Judges, and Samuel, the earlier section, styled Nebhî'îm rîshônîm (נביאים ראשונים), the Former Prophets, as distinct from the Latter Prophets—Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Twelve minor prophets. The justification of this nomenclature as it applies to Kings is to be gathered from consideration of the purpose which the writer of the book appears to have had in view.

2. PURPOSE.—Kings may accurately be described as a history of the period of the monarchy of Israel and Judah; and indeed, on account of the excellence of the sources employed for the composition of the work, takes first rank among the historical documents of the OT. But the mere compilation of a history is not the sole, or main, purpose of the writer. This may rather be characterized as religious and admonitory. History is employed as the vehicle of certain special religious lessons, drawn from the past, which the writer desires to inculcate upon his own age, and upon future generations. Thus an exhaustive employment of the historical sources which lay at his disposal is no part of his plan. So far from claiming to have utilized to the full his sources of information, he definitely and repeatedly refers to them as containing further details of fact likely to be of interest to the curious (I 11^{41} $14^{19.\ 29}$ al. See below). His special purpose is consistent with a selection from his materials; and this selection he carries out with such skill that the simple narration of the facts of history generally suffices to convey the lesson which the writer has at heart, even apart from his own comment and application.

The religious standpoint of the writer of Kings is that of the Book of Deuteronomy. He is deeply imbued with the spirit of this book, and his language is strongly coloured by its phraseology (see below).

Thus his aim is to apply to the past history of his race, from the time of Solomon and onward to his own day, the Deuteronomic standard, and to exemplify the view that prosperity is to be traced to a faithful regard for this standard, failure and catastrophe to its deliberate repudiation. The leading principles of Deut. upon which the writer of Kings desires to lay stress may be said, in the main, to be two: (i.) Whole-hearted devotion to J″ as Israel's only God, an obligation based upon the fact that J″ has made choice of Israel from among the nations as His special possession. (ii.) Sacrificial worship of J″ to be conducted only at one centre, viz. at the temple at Jerusalem, the place which J″ has chosen to set His name there. Conformity to these two principles is made the test to which the deeds of individual kings are brought, and in accordance with which a verdict is pronounced upon their characters.

The writer's ideal of kingship is David, the faithful worshipper and servant of J″. The piety of David is repeatedly the norm to which the action of his descendants is referred, and, when the times are darkest and apostasy most rampant, it is for David's sake that J″ still keeps a 'lamp' alight for him at Jerusalem.

Accordingly, the marked prosperity of the earlier part of Solomon's reign is due to the fact that he 'loved J″, walking in the statutes of David his father' (I 3^{3}). It is true that a qualification has to be added,—'only he sacrificed and burnt incense in the high places,' a mode of action alien to the enactment of Deut. with regard to the central sanctuary (Dt $12^{5ff.}$ al.). This, however, can be lightly passed over, in view of the fact that the temple at Jerusalem was not yet built—a point in excuse which is expressly cited (v.^{2}), apparently by some later reviser of the text (see below on ch. 3). The building of the temple by Solomon, as the sanctuary of J″'s choice, receives specially detailed treatment (5–7); its dedication affords scope for the utmost emphasis which can be laid upon its importance as the centre of J″'s manifestation to His people (ch. 8), and is the occasion of a renewal of the promises made to Solomon upon the condition of his faithful adherence to the spirit of the Deuteronomic code (ch. $9^{1ff.}$).

The decay of Solomon's power is traced (ch. 11) to his marriage alliances with foreign women in deliberate infringement of J″'s command (Dt 7^{1-4}, Ex $34^{12.\ 16}$ J; cf. Jos 23^{7} D^{2}), and the consequent introduction of their idolatrous cults. This leads directly to the division of the kingdom, and the irrevocable loss of ten tribes to the house of David.

Jeroboam, the first monarch of the new kingdom of Israel, though J″'s appointed agent in bringing about the disruption (ch. $11^{29ff.}$), yet no sooner succeeds to power than he sows the seeds of the ruin of the Northern Kingdom. The introduction of the calf-worship (ch. $12^{25ff.}$) is regarded by the writer as the great blot upon Israel's history; and that not only as the worship of J″ under an outward symbol in contravention of the second commandment, but also as being, so far as the kingdom of the ten tribes was concerned, a fatal blow aimed against the centralization of worship at the temple in Jerusalem. It is on account of the maintenance of this cult of the calves up to the fall of the N. Kingdom that a uniformly unfavourable verdict is passed by the writer upon every king of Israel, even upon Jehu, who was most zealous as an eradicator of the foreign cult of Ba'al-Melḳart (II $10^{29.\ 31}$). II $17^{7-18.\ 21-23}$ presents us with the writer's reflections upon the causes which brought about the destruction of the kingdom of Israel, and, among other forms of idolatry cited as instances of unfaithfulness to J″, the 'great sin' of Jeroboam occupies the crowning position (vv.$^{21-23}$).

The kingdom of Judah, as the heritage of the house of David and the seat of J″'s sanctuary at Jerusalem, is regarded by the writer with more favourable eyes. Certain of its kings—Asa, Jehoshaphat, Jehoash, Amaziah, Azariah, and Jotham—have a more or less favourable estimate taken of their characters, though in every case it is mentioned to their disadvantage that 'the high places were not removed,' i.e. that the sacrificial worship of J″ was conducted elsewhere than at the central sanctuary only. In the cases of Hezekiah and Josiah the writer's verdict is one of unqualified approval. This is because Hezekiah appears as the initiator of a religious reformation which aims at the removal of the high places (II $18^{3ff.}$)—a policy which, after the idolatrous reaction under Manasseh and his son Amon, is fully carried out by Josiah upon the lines of the Deuteronomic code, which was discovered in the temple during the 18th year of his reign (II $22^{3ff.}$; see DEUTERONOMY).

It is this Deuteronomic reformation which, according to Kings as it stands in its present form, avails to delay the doom pronounced upon the kingdom of Judah on account of the apostasy of Manasseh (II 21^{10-15} 22^{15-20}). Perhaps, in the view of the first editor of the book, it might have availed to save the kingdom and to restore it to its pristine glory. This is a question which depends mainly upon consideration of the date which is to be assigned for the editing of Kings, and the character and extent of the additions which the book has received in later times.

3. METHOD AND CHARACTERISTICS OF THE EDITOR.—The editor of Kings, in dealing with a period of about 400 years in length, naturally makes use of earlier written documents for the purpose which he has in view. These documents, which form his sources of information, are in some cases expressly named. We have mention of 'the book of the acts of Solomon' (סֵפֶר דִּבְרֵי שְׁלֹמֹה; I 11^{41}), and of 'the book of the annals' (דִּבְרֵי הַיָּמִים 'acts of days,' i.e. 'daily record of events') of the kings of Israel

(I 14^{19} al.), and also 'of the kings of Judah' (I 14^{29} al.).*

An official 'recorder' (הַמַּזְכִּיר, lit. 'the man who brings to remembrance'; LXX ὁ ὑπομιμνήσκων, ὁ ὑπομνηματογράφος, ὁ ἐπὶ τῶν ὑπομνημάτων) is mentioned among the ministers of David (2 S 8^{16} 20^{25}), Solomon (1 K 4^{3}), Hezekiah (2 K $18^{18.37}$), and Josiah (2 Ch 34^{8}), and it may be assumed that the same office existed in the northern as in the southern kingdom. Probably, the work of this 'recorder' was that of state-annalist, whose duty consisted in taking note in writing of the important events of his time (cf. Est 2^{23} 6^{1}). It is not clear whether the editor of Kings had access to the annals of both kingdoms at first-hand, or whether his 'books of the annals' were not rather continuous histories based mainly upon the annals, and thus rather of a literary than an official character. The latter view is most generally adopted (cf. especially Kuenen, Onderzoek, § 24^{8}; Cornill, Einleitung, p. 111 f.).

Besides these state records, the editor employs other nameless sources, which will be noticed in dealing in detail with the composition of Kings. At this point it should be observed that, as in the cases of the Hexateuch and of Judges and Samuel, so in the case of Kings, the editor's work is rather that of a compiler or redactor than that of an author strictly so termed. In giving a summary of the events of any particular reign, he appears, it is true, often to epitomize in his own language information which was contained at greater length in the 'Annals.' In other cases, however, he incorporates whole narratives, or sections of narratives, so far as they suit his purpose, in their original form, merely welding the sources together so as to construct a continuous history.

The proof that such was the method of the editor is to be found chiefly in the variations in style and language between different portions of Kings. Lengthy prophetical narratives stand side by side with brief political and statistical notices. Different sections are marked by dialectical peculiarities. Thus the great group of narratives which, commencing with I 17 and running on into the middle of II, relate the affairs of the kingdom of Israel, shows traces of a peculiar diction which may be supposed to be North Palestinian (see below on I 17 ff.). Later sections, again, exhibit a decadence of style, e.g. the use of the perfect with weak ו in place of ו consecutive with the imperfect—II $18^{4.36}$ 19^{18} $21^{4.6}$ $23^{4.5.8.10.13.14.15}$. There are variations between section and section in the form of proper names:—II 12^{1-17a} is peculiar among the Elijah narratives in using the form אֵלִיָּה beside the ordinary אֵלִיָּהוּ; II 18^{14-16} employs the form חִזְקִיָּה instead of חִזְקִיָּהוּ, which is used uniformly in II $18^{13.17-20}$ end. And especially, as we shall proceed to notice, the editor himself is characterized by the use of a phraseology which serves as a clear indication of the portions of his book which are to be traced to his own pen. Another mark of the composite nature of Kings is the existence of a small number of discrepancies in detail: e.g. I $5^{13ff.}$ (Heb. $27^{ff.}$) 11^{28} are inconsistent with I 9^{22}; I 12^{22-24} disagrees with I 14^{30}.

To the editor is due the stereotyped form into which the introduction and conclusion of a reign is thrown, and which constitutes, as it were, the framework upon which the narrative as a whole is built. The regularity of the editor's method in the construction of this framework is worthy of special notice. The form in which the account of a reign is introduced is as follows. For kings of Judah:—1. A synchronism of the year of accession with the corresponding reigning year of the contemporary king of Israel, probably calculated by the editor himself. This, commencing with Abijah, naturally ceases with Hezekiah, upon the fall of the N. Kingdom. 2. Age of the king at accession. 3. Length of his reign. 4. Name of the queen-mother. This, together with 2, 3, is drawn from the 'Annals.' 5. A brief verdict upon the king's character, framed in accordance with the Deuteronomic standard. For kings of Israel:—1. A synchronism of the year of accession with the corresponding reigning year of the contemporary king of Judah. 2. Length of the king's reign. 3. A brief verdict as to his character, always unfavourable, and generally consisting of two parts: a. Statement of the general fact that he did evil in the sight of J"; b. More special mention of his following the sins of Jeroboam. The conclusion of the account of a reign takes the following form:—

1. An indication of the editor's principal source, containing further details as to the king in question. Usually we read—

'And the rest of the acts of M. and all that he did, are they } of the Acts of Solomon?' not written } of the Annals of the kings of Judah?' in the book } of the Annals of the kings of Israel?'

וְיֶתֶר דִּבְרֵי פ׳ וְכָל־אֲשֶׁר עָשָׂה הֲלֹא הֵם (הֵמָּה) { דִּבְרֵי שְׁלֹמֹה / דִּבְרֵי הַיָּמִים לְמַלְכֵי יְהוּדָה / דִּבְרֵי הַיָּמִים לְמַלְכֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל } כְּתוּבִים עַל סֵפֶר

When further details, general or special, are mentioned as existing in the source, these usually stand immediately after 'and all that he did,' e.g. I 11^{41} 'and his wisdom' An exception is I 15^{23} (Asa), where 'and all his might' precedes.

Slight variations of this stereotyped form are—

A. 'And the rest of all the acts,' etc. וְיֶתֶר כָּל־דִּבְרֵי וגו׳ I 15^{23} (Asa).

B. Total omission of 'and all that he did'; without further details 5 times, viz. I 14^{19} (Jeroboam) 16^{20} (Zimri), II 14^{18} (Amaziah) 15^{11} (Zechariah) 15^{15} (Shallum); with further details II 20^{20} (Hezekiah).

Reading 'which he did' אֲשֶׁר עָשָׂה, 5 times, viz. I 16^{27} (Omri), II 1^{18} (Ahaziah of Israel) 14^{15} (Jehoash of Israel) 16^{19} (Ahaz) 21^{25} (Amon); 'and what he did' וַאֲשֶׁר עָשָׂה I 16^{5} (Baasha); 'and his might which he did' וּגְבוּרָתוֹ אֲשֶׁר עָשָׂה, I 22^{45} (^{46} Heb. Jehoshaphat).

C. 'Behold, they are' הֵם, in place of 'are they not?' הֲלֹא הֵם 5 times, viz. I 14^{19} (Jeroboam), II $15^{11.15.26.31}$ (Zechariah, Shallum, Pekahiah, Pekah).

2. Mention of the king's death and burial—

(a) 'And M. slept with his fathers,
(b) and was buried } (with his fathers) in X.' and they buried him }

וַיִּשְׁכַּב פ׳ עִם־אֲבֹתָיו { וַיִּקָּבֵר / וַיִּקְבְּרוּ אֹתוֹ } (עִם־אֲבֹתָיו) ב׳*

3. Notice of the due succession of the king's son—

'And N. his son reigned in his stead.'

וַיִּמְלֹךְ פ׳ בְּנוֹ תַּחְתָּיו

The following table exhibits the regularity with which this system is carried out. When any fact above mentioned as belonging to the introduction is omitted in that position, but added subsequently in the narrative of the reign or in the summary, this is indicated by the sign +:—

In the body of the narrative there are certain formulæ which are employed for the introduction of an historical notice, to indicate that it is more or less contemporaneous with the events of the narrative immediately preceding. The frequency with which these formulæ recur, especially in the citation of brief facts from the 'Annals,' renders the inference fair that they are due to the hand of the editor, and represent his methods of piecing together the extracts derived from his sources. Of such expressions the most usual is 'Then' (אָז), I 3[16] 8[1. 12] 9[11b. 24b] 11[7] 16[21] 22[49] (Heb.[50]); II 8[22b] 12[17] (Heb.[18]) 14[8] 15[16] 16[5].

When greater definiteness seemed desirable, other phrases are employed. These are: 'In those days' (בַּיָּמִים הָהֵם), II 10[32] 15[37] 20[1]; 'In his days' (בְּיָמָיו), I 16[34], II 8[20] 23[29] 24[1] and 15[19] (emend after LXX); 'At that time' (בָּעֵת הַהִיא), I 14[1], II 16[6] 18[16] 20[12] 24[10]; cf. I 8[65] 11[29], II 8[22].

Besides the construction of the framework of the book and the welding of the material, the editor is also responsible for a number of passages of greater or less length, which point and enforce the religious purpose of his composition. These passages generally take the form of a commentary upon the causes which operated in bringing about the developments of history, framed in accordance with the Deuteronomic model. Very frequently, also, the editor allows himself considerable latitude in the expansion and adaptation of the speeches contained in his narrative, in illustration of the same standpoint. In passages of this character the editor's hand may readily be distinguished. They exhibit a constant recurrence of strongly marked phrases, to be found elsewhere for the most part only in Deuteronomy or in books which exhibit the influence of Deuteronomy, and therefore presumably derived from that source. Other expressions stand alongside of these Deuteronomistic expressions, and are of a part with the thoughts of which they are the vehicle; and these possess an individuality of their own, and are peculiar (or nearly so) to Kings. To the former class the following phrases may be assigned: *—

1. שָׁמַר יי׳ Keep the charge of J″: I 2[3], Dt 11[1]; cf. Jos 22[3] (D[2]).

2. חָלַךְ בִּדְרָכֵי יי׳ Walk in the ways of J″: I 2[3] 3[14] 8[58] 11[33. 38], Dt 8[6] 10[12] 11[22] 19[9] 26[17] 28[9] 30[16], Jos 22[5] (D[2]), Zec 3[7], Is 42[24], 2 Ch 6[31], Ps 81[13] (14 Heb.) 119[3] 128[1]; cf. Hos 14[9] (10 Heb.).

3. שָׁמַר חֻקֹּתָיו וּמִצְוֹתָיו וּמִשְׁפָּטָיו וְעֵדוֹתָיו Keep his statutes, and his commandments, and his judgments, and his testimonies (generally one or more of these terms is omitted): I 2[3] 3[14] 6[12] 8[58. 61] 9[4. 6] 11[34. 38] 14[8], II 17[13. 19. 37] 18[6] 23[3]. The phrase is of constant occurrence in Dt 4[2. 40] 5[29] (26 Heb.) 6[2] al.

4. לְמַעַן תַּשְׂכִּיל אֵת כָּל־אֲשֶׁר תֵּעָשֶׂה That thou mayest prosper in (or cause to prosper) all that thou doest: I 2[3], Dt 29[9] (8 Heb.).

5. לְמַעַן יָקִים (הֲקִים) יי׳ אֶת־דְּבָרוֹ That J″ may (might) establish his word: I 2[24] 12[15] (‖ 2 Ch 10[15]), Dt 9[5]; cf. I 6[12], 1 S 1[23], Jer 33[14], Dn 9[12].

6. בְּכָל־לֵבָב (לְבָבָם), וּבְכָל־נֶפֶשׁ (נַפְשָׁם, נַפְשׁוֹ) בְּכָל־לְבָבוֹ With all the (his, their) heart, and with all the (his, their) soul: I 2[4] 8[48] (‖ 2 Ch 6[38]), II 23[3] (‖ 2 Ch 34[31])[25], Dt 4[29] 6[5] 10[12] 11[13] 13[3] (4 Heb.) 26[16] 30[2. 6. 10], Jos 22[5] 23[14] (both D[2]), 2 Ch 15[12]. II 23[25] adds וּבְכָל־מְאֹדוֹ and with all his might, a use of the substantive מְאֹד only to be paralleled by Dt 6[5].

(בְּכָל־לְבָבוֹ (לִבָּם) With all his (their) heart: I 8[23] 14[8], II 10[31].

7. שָׁמַר לְ׳ אֶת־הַבְּרִית וְאֶת־הַחֶסֶד Keep for him (etc.) the covenant and the kindness (J″ as subject): I 8[23] (‖ 2 Ch 6[14]), Dt 7[9. 12], Neh 1[5] 9[32], Ps 89[28] (29 Heb.), Dn 9[4]; cf. I 3[6] hast kept for him this great kindness.

8. כַּיּוֹם הַזֶּה As it is this day (the phrase calls attention to the fulfilment of a promise or threat): I 3[6] 8[24] (‖ 2 Ch 6[15])[61], Dt 2[30] 4[20. 38] 8[18] 10[15] 29[28] (27 Heb.), Jer 11[5] 25[18] 32[20] 44[6. 23], 1 Ch 28[7], Dn 9[7. 15]; כְּהַיּוֹם הַזֶּה Dt 6[24], Jer 44[22], Ezr 9[7. 15], Neh 9[10]. In pre-Deut. writings the only occurrences are Gn 50[20] (E), 1 S 22[8. 13]†. Gn 39[11] (J) is different.

9. עַמְּךָ אֲשֶׁר בָּחַרְתָּ Thy people, which thou hast chosen: I 3[8] a reminiscence of Dt 7[6] 14[2]; cf. 4[37].

10. הֵנִיחַ יי׳ אֱלֹהַי לִי מִסָּבִיב J″ my God hath given me rest on every side: I 5[4] (18 Heb.), 2 S 7[1. 11], Dt 12[10] 25[19], Jos 21[42] 23[1] (both D[2]); cf. Dt 3[20], Jos 1[13. 15] 22[4] (both D[2]).

11. Reference to J″'s choosing (בָּחַר) of Jerusalem as the seat of his sanctuary: I 8[16. 44. 48] 11[13. 32. 36] 14[21], II 21[7] 23[27]. The allusion is to Dt 12[5. 11. 18. 21. 26] 14[23. 24. 25] 15[20] 16[2. 6. 7. 11. 15. 16] 17[8. 10] 18[6] 26[2] 31[11].

יי׳ אֱלֹהֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל אֵין־כָּמוֹךָ אֱלֹהִים בַּשָּׁמַיִם מִמַּעַל וְעַל הָאָרֶץ כַּתַּחַת J″ God of Israel, there is no God like thee, in heaven above, or on earth beneath: I 8[23] a reminiscence of Dt 4[39]; cf. Jos 2[11b] (D[2]).

13. אֲשֶׁר נָתַתָּ (נָתַן, נָתַתִּי) לַאֲבוֹתָם Which thou gavest (he, I gave) to their fathers: I 8[34. 40. 48] 14[15], II 21[8]; cf. Dt 26[15], and the common phrase of Dt which J″ our (your, etc.) God is about to give us (you, etc.), 1[20. 25] 2[29] 3[20] 4[40] 5[16] al.

14. בְּאַחַד שְׁעָרָיו In any of his gates: I 8[37] (upon the authority of LXX, Pesh., in place of the impossible בְּאֶרֶץ שְׁעָרָיו, MT), Dt 15[7] 16[5] 17[2] 23[16] (17 Heb.); cf. 18[6]†.

15. כָּל־הַיָּמִים אֲשֶׁר הֵמָּה חַיִּים עַל־פְּנֵי הָאֲדָמָה All the days that they live upon the land: I 8[40] (‖ 2 Ch 6[31]), Dt 4[10] 12[1] 31[13]†.

16. יָדְךָ הַחֲזָקָה וּזְרֹעֲךָ הַנְּטוּיָה Thy mighty hand and thy stretched out arm: I 8[42] (‖ 2 Ch 6[32]), Dt 4[34] 5[15] 7[19] 11[2] 26[8], Jer 21[5] (different order) 32[21] (אוֹת) Ezk 20[33. 34], Ps 136[12]†. Mighty hand alone, Dt 3[24] 6[21] 7[8] 9[26] 34[12], Ex 3[19] 6[1] 32[11] (all JE) 13[9] (E), Nu 20[20] (JE, referring to Edom), Neh 1[10], Dn 9[15]†; cf. Jos 4[24] (D[2]). Stretched out arm alone, II 17[36], Dt 9[29], Jer 27[5] 32[17], Ex 6[6] (P)†.

17. כָּל־עַמֵּי הָאָרֶץ All the peoples of the earth: I 8[43] (‖ 2 Ch 6[33])[53. 60], Dt 28[10], Jos 4[24] (D[2]), Ezk 31[12], Zeph 3[20]†.

18. נָתַן לִפְנֵי Deliver over to (lit. set before): I 8[46] (‖ 2 Ch 6[36]), Dt 1[8. 21] 2[31. 33. 36] 7[2. 23] 23[14] (15 Heb.) 28[7. 25] 31[5], Jos 10[12] 11[6] (both D[2]), Jg 11[9] Is 41[2], all the occurrences of the phrase in this special sense.

19. Shall bethink themselves (lit. bring back to their heart וַהֲשִׁיבוּ אֶל־לִבָּם) in the land whither they are carried captive: I 8[47] a reminiscence of Dt 30[1].

20. Return unto thee with all their heart, etc.: I 8[48], II 23[25], Dt 30[10]; cf. Jer 3[10].

21. For they be thy people and thine inheritance, which thou broughtest forth out of Egypt: I 8[51] a reminiscence of Dt 9[26. 29].

22. כּוּר הַבַּרְזֶל The furnace of iron: I 8[51], Dt 4[20], Jer 11[4]†.

23. Hath given rest (מְנוּחָה) unto his people Israel: I 8[56], probably with reference to Dt 12[9]; cf. Ps 95[11].

24. There hath not failed (lit. fallen נָפַל) one word of all his good promise which he promised: I 8[56], Jos 21[43] 23[14] (both D[2]).

25. That all the people of the earth may know, etc.: I 8[60]. Jos 4[24] (D[2]).

* The sign † indicates that all occurrences of any particular phrase are cited. The sign RD denotes the Deuteronomic Redactor, i.e. the prime editor of Kings.

26. That J″ he is God (lit. the God הָאֱלֹהִים) ; there is none else : I 8^{60}, Dt $4^{35.\ 39}$.

27. לָשׂוּם שְׁמִי שָׁם To put my name there : I 9^{3} 11^{36} 14^{21}, II $21^{4.\ 7}$ (referring to I 9^{3}), Dt $12^{5.\ 21}$ 14^{24}. In Dt the more ordinary phrase is to cause his name to dwell there לְשַׁכֵּן עָמוֹ שָׁם, 12^{11} 14^{23} $16^{2.\ 6.\ 11}$ 26^{2} ; cf. No. 64.

28. כָּל־הַיָּמִים All the days (i.e. for ever) : I 9^{3} $11^{36.\ 39}$, II 8^{19} 17^{37}, Dt 4^{40} 5^{29} (^{26} Heb.) 6^{24} 11^{1} 14^{23} 18^{5} 19^{9} $28^{29.\ 33}$, Jos 4^{24} (D²), I S $2^{32.\ 35}$ (Redactor), Jer 31^{36} (Heb.^{35}) 32^{39} 33^{18} 35^{19}. Thus the expression used absolutely * appears to be purely Deuteronomic. In I 8^{40} Dt 4^{10} 12^{1} 31^{13} it is defined, and to some extent limited, by the added words, that they (ye) live upon the land.

29. Shall go and serve other gods, and worship them : I 9^{6} (‖ 2 Ch 7^{19}), Jos 23^{16} (D²) ; cf. Dt 11^{16} 17^{3}. The phrase עָבַר אֱלֹהִים אֲחֵרִים serve other gods, occurs also Dt 7^{4} $13^{6.\ 13}$ ($^{7.\ 14}$ Heb.) $28^{36.\ 64}$, Jer 16^{13}, Jg 10^{13} (Deut. compiler), Jos $24^{2.\ 16}$ (E), I S 8^{8} 26^{19} ; cf. Jer 44^{3}. Other gods, with serve not preceding as governing verb, but closely following with suffix in reference, is found I 9^{9} (‖ 2 Ch 7^{22}), II 17^{35}, Dt 8^{19} 13^{2} (Heb.^{3}) 28^{14} 30^{17} 31^{20}, Jer 11^{10} 13^{10} 16^{11} 22^{9} 25^{6} 35^{15}, Jg 2^{19} (Deut. compiler). Other gods, without serve : I $11^{4.\ 10}$ 14^{9}, II $17^{7.\ 37.\ 38}$ 22^{17} (‖ 2 Ch 34^{25}), all R^{D}, II 5^{17}, Dt 5^{7} 6^{14} 11^{28} 18^{20} 31^{18}, Jer 1^{16} $7^{6.\ 9.\ 18}$ $19^{4.\ 13}$ 32^{29} $44^{5.\ 8.\ 15}$, Jg $2^{12.\ 17}$ (Deut. compiler), Ex 20^{3} (E) 23^{13} (J), Hos 3^{1}, 2 Ch 28^{25}†.

30. לְמָשָׁל וְלִשְׁנִינָה For a proverb and for a byword : I 9^{7} (‖ 2 Ch 7^{20}), Dt 28^{37}, Jer 24^{9}†.

31. דָּבַק בְּ Cleave to ; of strange wives, I 11^{2} ; of sins of Jeroboam, II 3^{3} ; of cleaving to J″, II 18^{6}, Dt 4^{4} 10^{20} 11^{22} 13^{4} (^{5} Heb.) 30^{20}, Jos 22^{5} 23^{8} (both D²)—all the occurrences in this special moral sense.

32. הָלַךְ אַחֲרֵי Go after ; a false god, I $11^{5.\ 10}$ 21^{26}, II 17^{15} (all R^{D}), I $18^{18.\ 21}$, Dt 4^{3} 6^{14} 8^{19} 11^{28} 13^{2} (^{3} Heb.) 28^{14}, Jg $2^{12.\ 19}$ (Deut. compiler), Jer $2^{5.\ 23}$ 7^{9} 11^{10} 13^{10} 16^{11} 25^{6} 35^{15}, Ezk 20^{16} ; cf. Hos $2^{5.\ 13}$ ($^{7.\ 15}$ Heb.). Of following J″ : I 14^{8} (R^{D}) 18^{21}, Dt 13^{4} (^{5} Heb.), 2 Ch 34^{31}, Hos 11^{10}†.

33. עָשָׂה הָרַע בְּעֵינֵי Do that which is evil in the sight of J″ : I 11^{6} 14^{22} $15^{26.\ 34}$ $16^{19.\ 25.\ 30}$ $21^{20.\ 25}$ 22^{52} (^{53} Heb.), II 3^{2} 8^{18} (‖ 2 Ch 21^{6}) ^{27} (‖ 2 Ch 22^{4}) $13^{2.\ 11}$ 14^{24} $15^{9.\ 18.\ 24.\ 28}$ $17^{2.\ 17}$ $21^{2.\ 6}$ (‖ 2 Ch $33^{2.\ 6}$) $^{15.\ 16.\ 20}$ (‖ 2 Ch 33^{22}) $23^{32.\ 37}$ (‖ 2 Ch 36^{5}) $24^{9.\ 19}$ (‖ 2 Ch $36^{9.\ 12}$), 2 Ch 29^{6}, Dt 4^{25} 9^{18} 17^{2} 31^{29}, Jg 2^{11} $3^{7.\ 12}$ 4^{1} 6^{1} 10^{6} 13^{1} (all Deut. compiler), Nu 32^{13} (JE), I S 15^{19}, Jer 52^{2}†. Cf. 2 S 12^{9}, Is 65^{12} 66^{4}, Jer 32^{30}, Ps 51^{4} (^{6} Heb.).

34. עָשָׂה הַיָּשָׁר בְּעֵינֵי Do that which is right in the sight of J″ : I $11^{33.\ 38}$ 14^{8} $15^{5.\ 11}$ 22^{43} (‖ 2 Ch 20^{32}), II 10^{30} 12^{2} (^{3} Heb.) (‖ 2 Ch 24^{2}) 14^{3} (‖ 2 Ch 25^{2}) $15^{3.\ 34}$ (‖ 2 Ch 26^{4} 27^{2}) 16^{2} (‖ 2 Ch 28^{1}) 18^{3} (‖ 2 Ch 29^{2}) 22^{2} (‖ 2 Ch 34^{2}), Dt 12^{25} 13^{18} (^{19} Heb.) 21^{9}, and with the addition of הַטּוֹב that which is good, 6^{18} 12^{28}. Elsewhere only Ex 15^{26} (JE or D ?), Jer 34^{15}.

35. מָלֵא אַחֲרֵי Go fully after J″ : I 11^{6}, Dt 1^{36}, Jos $14^{8.\ 9.\ 14}$ (JE recast by D²), Nu $32^{11.\ 12}$ (JE)†.

36. הִתְאַנַּף Be angry : I 11^{9}, II 17^{18}, Dt 1^{37} 4^{21} $9^{8.\ 20}$†.

37. וְהָיָה אִם־שָׁמוֹעַ And it shall be, if thou wilt hearken : I 11^{38}, Dt $28^{1.\ 15}$; with pl. תִּשְׁמְעוּ 11^{13} ; cf. 15^{5} 11^{28}. In the same way (obedience the condition of a promise) כִּי תִשְׁמַע Dt 13^{18} (^{19} Heb.) $28^{2.\ 13}$ 30^{10}, אֲשֶׁר תִּשְׁמְעוּ 11^{27}.

38. הִשְׁמִיד מֵעַל פְּנֵי הָאֲדָמָה Destroy from off the face of the earth : I 13^{34}, Dt 6^{15}, Am 9^{8}† ; cf. Jos 23^{15} (D²). הִשְׁמִיד destroy, passive נִשְׁמַד, is very frequent in Dt (27 times) ; cf. Driver on Dt 1^{27}.

39. הִכְעִים Vex (J″, by treatment wholly undeserved. RV 'provoke to anger' is inaccurate) : I $14^{9.\ 15}$ 15^{30} $16^{2.\ 7.\ 13.\ 26.\ 33}$ 21^{22} 22^{53} (^{54} Heb.), II $17^{11.\ 17}$ 21^{6} (‖ 2 Ch 33^{6}) ^{15} 22^{17} (‖ 2 Ch 34^{25}) $23^{19.\ 26}$, 2 Ch 28^{25}, Dt 4^{25} 9^{18} 31^{29} 32^{16}, Jer $7^{18.\ 19}$ 8^{19} 11^{17} $25^{6.\ 7}$ $32^{29.\ 30.\ 32}$ $44^{3.\ 8}$. Elsewhere, with J″ as object, only six times. With Pi'el (כָּעַסְתָּנִי), Dt 32^{21}.

40. מֵעַל הָאֲדָמָה הַטּוֹבָה הַזֹּאת From upon this good land : I 14^{15}, Jos $23^{13.\ 15}$ (D²)†. The usual phrase in Dt of the land of Canaan is הָאָרֶץ הַטּוֹבָה the good land ; cf. Driver, Deuteronomy, p. lxxxi.

41. עַל כָּל־גִּבְעָה גְבֹהָה וְתַחַת כָּל־עֵץ רַעֲנָן On every high hill, and under every green (or spreading) tree : I 14^{23}, II 17^{10}, Jer 2^{20}. With the variation עַל הַגְּבָעוֹת on the hills, II 16^{4} (‖ 2 Ch 28^{4}), Dt 12^{2}. Cf. Ezk 6^{13} Jer $3^{6.\ 13}$ 17^{2}, Is 57^{5}.

42. בְּכֹל־תּוֹעֲבֹת (תּוֹעֲבַת) הַגּוֹיִם According to (all) the abominations of the nations : I 14^{24}, II 16^{3} (‖ 2 Ch 28^{3}) 21^{2} (‖ 2 Ch 33^{2}), 2 Ch 36^{14}, Dt 18^{9}.

43. הוֹרִישׁ Drive out (used of the expulsion of the nations of Canaan by J″) : I 14^{24} 21^{26}, II 16^{3} (‖ 2 Ch 28^{3}) 17^{8} 21^{2} (‖ 2 Ch 33^{2}), Dt 4^{38} $9^{4.\ 5}$ 11^{23} 18^{12}, Jos 13^{6} $23^{5.\ 9.\ 13}$ (all D²), Jg $2^{21.\ 23}$ (Deut. compiler), Ps 44^{2} (^{3} Heb.). Elsewhere only Ex 34^{24}, Nu 32^{21}, Jos 3^{10} (all JE).

44. גִּלּוּלִים Idol-blocks (a term of opprobrium) : I 15^{12} 21^{26}, II 17^{12} $21^{11.\ 21}$ 23^{24}, Dt 29^{17} (^{16} Heb.), Lv 26^{30} (H), and 39 times in Ezk.†

45. כָּל־נְשָׁמָה Anything breathing (lit. any breath) : I 15^{29}, Dt 20^{16}, Jos $11^{11.\ 14}$ (D²) ; כָּל־הַנְּשָׁמָה Jos 10^{40} (D²), Ps 150^{6}†.

46. הֲבָלִים Vain things (applied to idolatrous symbols) : I $16^{13.\ 26}$,* Dt 32^{21} ; cf. Jer 8^{19} 14^{22}. So with cognate verb, וַיֵּלְכוּ אַחֲרֵי הַהֶבֶל וַיֶּהְבָּלוּ they followed vanity and became vain, II 17^{15}, Jer 2^{5}.

47. לֹא אָבָה (לְ)הַשְׁחִית Would not destroy : II 8^{19} 13^{23}, Dt 10^{10}.

48. כִּחָה שֵׁם פ׳ כִּפְּחַת הַשָּׁמַיִם Blot out the name from under heaven : II 14^{27}, Dt 9^{14} 29^{-0} (^{19} Heb.), the only occurrences of the exact phrase.

49. שָׁכַר לַעֲשׂוֹת Observe to do : II 17^{37} 21^{8} (‖ 2 Ch 33^{8}), 1 Ch 22^{13} (^{12} Heb.), Dt $5^{1.\ 32}$ (^{29} Heb.) $6^{3.\ 25}$ 7^{11} 8^{1} $11^{22.\ 32}$ $12^{1.\ 32}$ (^{13} Heb.) 15^{5} 17^{10} 19^{9} 24^{8} $28^{1.\ 15.\ 58}$ 31^{12} 32^{46}, Jos $1^{7.\ 8}$ 22^{5} (D²).

The following phrases, though not derived directly from Deuteronomy, are characteristic of the editor of Kings in common with Jeremiah, whose writings exhibit strong Deuteronomic affinities :—

50. כִּי שִׁמְךָ נִקְרָא עַל־הַבַּיִת הַזֶּה That thy name is called over this house (in token of ownership) : I 8^{43} (‖ 2 Ch 6^{33}), Jer $7^{10.\ 11.\ 14.\ 30}$ 32^{34} 34^{15}. The phrase is also used of the chosen people, Dt 28^{10}, Jer 14^{9}, Is 63^{19}, 2 Ch 7^{14} ; of Jerusalem, Jer 25^{29} ; of Jerusalem and the chosen people, Dn $9^{18.\ 19}$; of Jeremiah, 15^{16} ; of the nations, Am 9^{12}.

51. שִׁלַּח מֵעַל פָּנַי (פָּנָיו) Dismiss from before my (his) face : I 9^{7}, Jer 15^{1}. So, but with a different verb, הִלְקִיד cast away, II 13^{23} 17^{20} (כֵּן in place of מֵעַל), Jer 7^{15} ; הֵסִיר remove, II $17^{18.\ 23}$ 23^{27} 24^{3}, Jer 32^{31}.

52. כָּל־עֹבֵר עָלָיו יִשֹּׁם וְשָׁרַק Every one that passeth by it shall be astonished and shall hiss : I 9^{8}, Jer 19^{8} 49^{17} 50^{13} ; cf. Jer 18^{16}, La 2^{15}, Zeph 2^{15}.

53. שָׁב מֵדַּרְכּוֹ הָרָעָה Return from his evil way : I 13^{33}, Jer 18^{11} 25^{5} 26^{3} 35^{15} $36^{3.\ 7}$. Elsewhere Jon $3^{8.\ 10}$, Ezk 13^{22} (מִדַּרְכּוֹ הָרָע) †. With pl. their evil ways, II 17^{13}, 2 Ch 7^{14}, Zec 1^{4}†. Cf. Jer 23^{22}, Ezk 3^{19} 33^{11}.

54. הִנְנִי מֵבִיא רָעָה אֶל (עַל) Behold, I will bring evil upon : I 14^{10} 21^{21}, II 21^{12} 22^{16} (‖ 2 Ch 34^{24}), Jer 6^{19} 11^{11} $19^{3.\ 15}$ 35^{17} 45^{5}†.

55. עַבְדִּי (עֲבָדַי) הַנְּבִיאִים My (his) servants the prophets : II 9^{7} $17^{13.\ 23}$ 21^{10} 24^{2}, Jer 7^{25} 25^{4} 26^{5} 29^{19} 35^{15} 44^{4}. Elsewhere Am 3^{7}, Zec 1^{6}, Ezr 9^{11}, Dn 9^{10}.

Other resemblances with Jeremiah, from the later chs. of 2 K, are given by Driver, LOT p. 193 (^{6} 203).

Phrases and modes of expression wholly or nearly peculiar to the editor of Kings are as follow :—

56. Reference to the sins of Jeroboam, i.e. his institution of the calf-worship. So, as causing the destruction of his own house, I 14[16] 15[30]. In the summary of the character of kings of Israel a regular formula appears—

* The same phrase כָּל־הַיָּמִים all the days, used in a strictly limited sense of the lifetime of an individual (for all his, thy, etc., days) is non-Deuteronomic. Cf. the writer's note on 1 K 5^{16}.

he did not depart from he walked after (in) he clave to he walked in the way of J. and in his sin (sins) } the sins of J. } which he caused Israel to sin.

So I 15[26.] (Nadab) [34] (Baasha) 16[26] (Omri), II 3[3] (Jehoram) 10[31], cf. [29] (Jehu) 13[2] (Jehoahaz) [11] (Jehoash) 14[24] (Jeroboam II.) 15[9] (Zechariah) [18] (Menahem) [24] (Pekahiah) [28] (Pekah). Of the people of Israel, II 13[6]. In all these cases the antecedent of the relative אֲשֶׁר הֶחֱטִיא is not יָרָבְעָם but חַטֹּאות יר׳; cf. II 17[21]. I 16[30] (Ahab), II 17[22] חַטֹּאות יר׳ the sins of J. without אֲשֶׁר הֶחֱטִיא וגו׳ which he caused, etc.: I 22[52] ([53] Heb.] Ahaziah), II 23[15] אֲשֶׁר הֶחֱטִיא אֶת־יִשְׂרָאֵל, referring not to חַטֹּאות (omitted), but to יָרָבְעָם J., who made Israel to sin. In I 16[13] the sins of Baasha and Elah, and in II 21[11] of Manasseh (אֲשֶׁר הֶחֱטִיא אֶת־יְהוּדָה), are spoken of in the same terms.

57. Reference to David as the ideal standard of a righteous king: I 3[3. 6. 14] 9[4] 11[4. 6. 33. 38] 14[8] 15[3. 5. 11], II 14[3] 16[2] 18[3] 22[2].

58. לְמַעַן דָּוִד אָבִיךָ (עַבְדִּי) For David thy father's (my or his servant's) sake: I 11[12. 13. 32. 34], II 8[19] 19[34] 20[6]; cf. I 15[4]†.

59. A lamp (נִיר) for David (figurative of a lasting posterity): I 11[36] 15[4], II 8[19] (‖2 Ch 21[7]); cf. Ps 132[17].

60. הָלַךְ לְפָנַי י׳ Walk before J″: I 2[4] 3[6] 8[23. 25] (‖2 Ch 6[14. 16]) 9[4] (‖2 Ch 7[17]). Elsewhere the Hithpa'el is used הִתְהַלֵּךְ לְפָנַי י׳, II 20[3] (‖Is 38[3]), 1 S 2[30], Gn 17[1] (P) 24[40] (J) 48[15] (JE), Ps 56[13] ([14] Heb.) 116[9].

61. לֹא יִכָּרֵת לְךָ אִישׁ מֵעַל כִּסֵּא יִשְׂרָאֵל There shall not fail thee (lit. be cut off to thee) a man on the throne of Israel: I 2[4] 8[25] (‖2 Ch 6[16]) 9[5] (‖2 Ch 7[18]); cf. Jer 33[17].

62. בָּנָה בַיִת לְשֵׁם י׳ Build a house to the name of J″: I 3[2] 5[3. 5] ([17. 19] Heb.) 8[17. 20. 44. 48]. The original is 2 S 7[13] He shall build a house to my name, quoted in I 5[5] ([19] Heb.) 8[19].

63. There hath been (was) none like thee (him) before thee (him), etc.: I 3[12], II 18[5] 23[25].

64. לִהְיוֹת שְׁמִי שָׁם That my name might be there: I 8[16. 29], II 23[27]. Cf. No. 27.

65. Heart perfect (שָׁלֵם) with J″: I 8[61] 11[4] 15[3. 14]; cf. II 20[3] (‖Is 38[3]). The adj. is thus used in application to the heart, elsewhere only eight times in Ch.

66. דָּרַע (לַעֲשׂוֹת) מִכֹּל־אֲשֶׁר (הָיוּ) לְפָנָיו Did (hast done) evil above all that were before him (thee): I 14[9] 16[25. 30.* 33]; cf. II 17[2] 21[11].

67. מַשְׁתִּין בְּקִיר Every man child (lit. mingens ad parietem): I 14[10] 16[11] 21[21], II 9[8]. Only besides 1 S 25[22. 34].

68. עָצוּר וְעָזוּב Shut up and left at large (i.e. all; every one being supposed to fall under one of the two categories †): I 14[10] 21[21], II 9[8] 14[26], Dt 32[36] †.

69. וּבִעַרְתִּי אַחֲרֵי I will utterly sweep away: I 14[10] 21[21] †; הִנְנִי כֹּבֵעַר אַחֲרֵי I 16[3] †.

70. Him that dieth to M. in the city shall the dogs eat; and him that dieth in the field shall the fowls of the air eat: I 14[11] 16[4] 21[24] †.

71. הִתְמַכֵּר לַעֲשׂוֹת הָרַע בְּעֵינֵי י׳ Sold himself (themselves) to do that which is evil in the sight of J″: I 21[20. 25], II 17[17] †.

72. לֹא סָר מִן־ Turned not aside from: I 15[5] 22[43], II 3[3] 13[2. 6. 11] 14[24] 15[9. 24. 28] 17[22]; with מֵאַחֲרֵי from after, II 10[29] 18[6]; with מֵעַל lit. from upon, II 10[31] 15[18].

73. רַק הַבָּמוֹת לֹא סָרוּ עוֹד הָעָם מְזַבְּחִים וּמְקַטְּרִים בַּבָּמוֹת However, the high places were not taken away; the people still sacrificed and burnt incense in the high places: I 22[43] ([44] Heb.; אַךְ for רַק), II 12[3] ([4] Heb.) 14[4] 15[4. 35]; cf. I 3[2. 3] 15[14], II 16[4].

The extent and limits of the passages which are due to the editor's hand are noticed below in dealing with the composition of Kings.

4. DATE OF THE EDITOR.—As Kings now stands, the earliest possible terminus a quo for the composition of the book is the date of the latest event related, viz. Jehoiachin's release from prison in the 37th year of his captivity, i.e. B.C. 561, some 25 years after the fall of Jerusalem. As, however, the writer states that the privileges granted by the Babylonian king to Jehoiachin were continued 'all the days of his life' (II 25[30]), the strong presumption is created that the words were not penned so early as B.C. 561, but some time later, viz. subsequently to the death of Jehoiachin, whenever that may have taken place.

Agreeable to such an exilic date as is implied by the last two chs. of 2 K are certain passages in the body of the work which seem to presuppose the captivity of Judah. These are I 11[39] II 17[19. 20] 23[26. 27], and perhaps, though not so clearly, I 9[7-9] II 20[17. 18] 21[11-15] 22[15-20]. To these we may add the reference in I 4[24] (Heb. 5[4]) to Solomon's dominion as extending over all the kings 'beyond the River,' a statement which, as referring to the country W. of the Euphrates, implies that the writer is living in Babylonia on the E. side of the river.*

On the other hand, however, there are certain indications which show that the first editing of Kings must have taken place prior to the final decay and fall of the Judæan monarchy.

Chief among these is the use of the phrase 'unto this day' (עַד־הַיּוֹם הַזֶּה) in the statement that the condition of affairs which the writer is describing still continues to exist up to the time of writing. If this phrase always or most frequently occurred in the course of lengthy narratives excerpted by the editor from his sources, there might then be room for the theory that a statement which was true as it stood in the old pre-exilic narratives had, through oversight on the part of an exilic editor, been allowed to stand after, through changed conditions, it had lost its force, or rather had become untrue and misleading. But, as a matter of fact, the expression is employed in connexion with terse statements of facts derived from the 'annals,' and in such cases can be due to no other hand than that of the editor himself, who, in using the phrase, either formulates his own statement, or intelligently admits a statement which he is able to verify.

The cases of the use of 'unto this day,' which ought to be noticed as implying the continued existence of the kingdom of Judah, are the following:—I 8[3] (the ends of the staves of the ark still to be seen projecting from the Adytum into the Holy place †); 9[21] (the Canaanites still subjected by Israel to forced labour, as they had been under Solomon); 12[19] (the division between the ten tribes and the house of David still in existence); II 8[22] (Edom still successful in shaking off the yoke of Judah); 16[6] (the Edomites still hold Elath, from which the Judæans were expelled by Rezin, king of Syria ‡). The other occurrences of 'unto this day' do not necessarily presuppose pre-exilic times, but may be cited to prove the frequency of the formula as employed by the editor of Kings:—I 9[13] 10[12], II 14[7] 17[23. 34. 41.] §

* LXX (B, Luc.) prefixes (Luc. καὶ ἐτονηρεύσατο, i.e. וַיָּרַע, before מכל וג׳, probably correctly.

† The most plausible explanation of the phrase is that of Ewald, Antiquities, 170, 'kept in (by legal defilement) and exempt.' For this use of עָצוּר cf. Jer 36[5]; Niph'al נֶעֱצַר 1 S 21[8]. Other explanations are quoted by Driver on Deut. l.c.

* The phrase עֵבֶר הַנָּהָר, implying an exilic standpoint, is found again in Ezr 4[10. 11. 16. 17. 20] 5[3. 6] 6[6. 8. 13] 7[21. 25] 8[36], Neh 2[7. 9] 3[7]. The rendering of RV text in 1 K 4[24] 'on this side the River,' is quite impermissible, this being a direct violation of the constant meaning of עֵבֶר—country lying across or on the other side of a river.

† It is noticeable that in LXX of this passage the words 'unto this day' have disappeared, the excision being doubtless due to some later scribe who knew that in his own time their purport had ceased to be true.

‡ Reading אֲרוֹמִים, in place of אֲרָם, ארומים.

§ In II 10[27] עַד־הַיּוֹם, occurring in a lengthy narrative, must have been written prior to the destruction of Samaria (Kuenen, Ond. § 25[34]), and is thus due to the source and not to the editor.

Again, it seems to be clear that, at the time when the editor is writing, the Davidic dynasty still possesses a monarch reigning in Jerusalem. David has, and is still to have, a lamp before J″ at Jerusalem continually (see above, No. 59 of the editor's phrases). The expression 'before J″ at Jerusalem' of I 11^{36} implies further that the temple is still standing intact, a point which is also assumed in the dedication prayer of I $8^{15\text{-}53}$ which owes its present form to the Deuteronomic editor. Throughout this prayer the leading petition is that supplication made in or towards J″s temple built by Solomon may meet with a favourable answer (vv.$^{29.\ 30.\ 31f.\ 33.\ 35.\ 38.\ 42.\ 44.\ 48}$). We may notice also I 9^{3} which likewise occurs in a section in which the editor's hand is prominent: 'I have hallowed this house which thou hast built, to put my name there for ever; and mine eyes and my heart shall be there perpetually.'

Upon these grounds it may be concluded that the main editing of Kings must have taken place prior to the destruction of the Judæan kingdom, and that such sections of the book as imply an exilic standpoint are therefore of the nature of later redactional additions and interpolations.

For the work of this principal editor, influenced as we have seen him to be by the spirit and language of Deut., the terminus a quo is the discovery of Deut. in the year B.C. 621, the terminus ad quem the destruction of Jerusalem B.C. 586. And since the editor's standpoint seems to indicate that he wrote before the glamour of Josiah's reformation had wholly or nearly faded during the latter days of the Judæan monarchy, the assumption is fair that he undertook and completed his book not later than B.C. 600.*

5. Later Editors. — From the preceding examination and conclusion as to the date of the main redaction of Kings it is clear that the pre-exilic book must have received certain additions at the hands of a later editor or editors before it attained the form in which we possess it. The chief of these additions is the appendix, which carries the history down to the year B.C. 561. To this appendix belongs certainly II 24^{10}–25^{30}, and, presumably, 23^{31}–24^{9}. The conclusion of the pre-exilic book has, however, probably been worked over by the second editor, and so adapted to receive his addition that it is now impossible exactly to discover its position.

Any of the vv.$^{25.\ 28}$ or even 30^{a} of ch. 23 might have formed a conclusion scarcely more abrupt than the present conclusion ch. 24^{30}. Ch. 23^{29a}, if it is not exactly imitated in style in ch. 24^{1a}, must be by the same hand, i.e., presumably, the hand of the second editor. But, again, it is unlikely that the first editor should have appended the usual summary of a reign in v.^{28} without mentioning the manner of the king's death. The statement of v.^{25b} seems at first sight to presuppose the writer's acquaintance with the characters of all the succeeding kings of Judah, but need not necessarily do so. Cf. the somewhat stereotyped formula of I 14^{29a} with reference to Jeroboam.

Upon the other passages above mentioned as implying an exilic standpoint see below (Composition). It is noticeable that, apart from the difference of standpoint involved in the destruction of the Judæan kingdom and the Exile, the mould of mind of the second editor is essentially the same as that of the first editor. The same Deuteronomic mode of thought is couched in the same phraseology, while in the appendix the structural method of the first editor is faithfully imitated. Thus, if the main Deuteronomic editor or redactor be cited under the sign R^{D}, it is reasonable to employ the sign R^{D2} in referring to the second editor of the same school of thought.†

* So Kuenen, Onderzoek, § 26; Wellhausen, Composition, p. 298 ff., etc. König, on the contrary, holds that the editor of Kings compiled his work not earlier than B.C. 588, i.e. during the Exile (Einleitung, § 53^{3}).

† In speaking of a second Deuteronomic editor (R^{D2}) it is not, of course, intended dogmatically to assert that all passages assigned to such a writer must have flowed from the same pen, since it is obvious that more than one Deuteronomist may have had a hand in the revision of Kings. R^{D2} denotes a Deuteronomic redactor or redactors of the Bk. of Kings who lived in exilic or post-exilic times.

Kings, as it stands in the Hebrew Bible, has, again, undergone still later revision than that of R^{D2}. This is clear from certain variations in form and order between the MT and the recension of the text which is represented by the LXX. While in some cases the condition of the LXX text is greatly inferior to that of MT, yet, on the other hand, it is clear that in a number of sections LXX preserves a superior arrangement in order, or a simpler form, of narrative which points to the fact that MT has suffered dislocation and interpolation at the hands of a reviser or revisers of a date later than the separation of the two recensions. As instances of this we may notice I $4^{20\text{-}34}$ (Heb. 4^{20}–5^{14}) 5–7 (Heb. 5^{15}–7) in the main, $8^{1\text{-}13}$ $11^{1\text{-}13}$, and the position of MT 21 after 19, so that 22 succeeds 20 without a break in the narrative. Consideration of such points as must here be raised is best reserved for a sectional criticism of the composition of the book.

6. Sources and Composition of Kings considered in detail.* — I 1^{1}–2^{46}. Narrative of the events which led to the establishment of Solomon as the successor of David. It is generally assumed, and with great probability, that this section originally formed part of the document 2 S 9–20, which gives a history of David. $2^{2.\ 3}$ is due to R^{D} (see above, phrases of R^{D}, Nos. 1–6, 60, 61).

A point of interest in connexion with the homogeneity of the narrative is the fact that after 2^{35a} LXX (B, Luc.) inserts καὶ ἡ βασιλεία κατορθοῦτο ἐν Ἰερουσαλήμ, i.e. MT 2^{46b} with the reading ביר שלמה for בירשלם. The correct position of the sentence seems to be at the end of v.^{35}, from which in MT it was separated by the insertion of the Shimei section. Solomon's establishment in the kingdom resulted from the death of his powerful adversaries, Adonijah and Joab, and could not have been much enhanced by the death of Shimei some three years later. The fact that in LXX these words precede v.^{35b} suggests that this latter may be a later insertion made to complete the information supplied by v.^{35a}.

3^{1}–11^{43}. History of Solomon's reign. The narrative follows a well-defined plan. The kernel is 5^{1}–7^{51} (Heb. 5^{15}–7^{51}), the description of Solomon's building operations, with its sequel, ch. 8. Around this are grouped (chs. 4. 9. 10) a series of notices, for the most part brief, illustrative of the king's wisdom, magnificence, and prosperity. Ch. 3 forms an introduction to the whole, detailing Solomon's request for wisdom, with a signal instance of its exercise: ch. 11, as a conclusion, gives a description of the circumstances which paved the way for the disruption of the kingdom.

3^{1}, as it stands in MT, is out of place. There can be little doubt that, together with $9^{16.\ 17a}$, it originally formed part of the document embodied in ch. $4^{20ff.}$. See ad loc.

$3^{2.\ 3}$ expresses disapprobation of Bāmā worship, based upon the law of Deut. which restricts sacrifice to the central sanctuary. Similar notices by R^{D} are found elsewhere in Kings (see phrases, No. 73). The old narrative treats Bāmā worship as a matter of course; cf. v.^{4} 18^{30} 19^{10} etc.

Though vv.$^{2.\ 3}$ of 3 both exhibit the influence of Deut., it is scarcely possible to assign both to one author RD. In v.^{3} the subject, as in vv.$^{1.\ 4}$, is Solomon, while in v.^{2} the people are specified. V.^{3} simply places two facts side by side without any attempt at correlation:—Solomon loved J″, only he sacrificed and burned incense on the high places; v.^{2} supplies an explanation:—This Bāmā worship was a popular custom, due to the fact that the house of J″ was not yet built. Hence v.^{3} is the work of RD, and opens the account of Solomon's reign by introducing the narrative of the vision at Gibeon; v.^{2} proceeds from a later editor, who, with a view to explaining Solomon's conduct, inserted the phrase, which he found to be frequent elsewhere, v.^{2a}, together with the explanation which follows, v.^{2b}, and, in order to illustrate this latter, probably moved v.^{1}, which mentions the fact of the house of J″ being not yet built, from the position which it properly occupies in ch. 4 LXX. In LXX of ch. 3, v.[1] is wanting and v.[2] fragmentary.

3^{4-15} is an ancient narrative, to some extent revised by R^D, whose hand may be traced in vv.[6. 8a. 12. 14] (phrases Nos. 2. 3. 8. 9. 57. 60. 63). Probably also v.[15], at least in its present form, is due to R^D, since if according to v.[4] 'the great high place' was at Gibeon, it is difficult to understand why Solomon should have returned to Jerusalem to offer sacrifice, except from the Deuteronomic standpoint. The phrase 'ark of the covenant of J″' is mainly a D expression. 3^{16-28} is an old narrative in its original form.

4^{1-19}, which gives a list of Solomon's officers of state, may be supposed to be derived from 'the book of the annals of Solomon.'

The list has received one later addition, viz. v.[4b]. The statement that 'Zadok and Abiathar were priests' is no part of the register in its original form as an official state document. This naturally headed the list with the name of the high priest of the time, Azariah, the son of Zadok. The insertion was made by R^D or by someone still earlier, who wished, as a matter of historical interest, to notice that Zadok and Abiathar were priests at the commencement of the reign. It is noticeable that in this case only is there omission of the name of the father of any official. The sentence at the end of v.[19] should be emended, after Klostermann, וְנָצִיב אֶחָד עַל כָּל־הַנִּצָּבִים אֲשֶׁר בָּאָרֶץ 'and one officer was over all the officers who were in the land,' the allusion being to Azariah of v.[5].

4^{20-34} (Heb. 4^{20}–5^{14}) appears in LXX (B, Luc.) in a form somewhat different from MT. $4^{20. 21. 25. 26}$ and part of v.[24] ('from Tiphsah . . . the river') do not appear, but are to be found in the addition at the end of ch. 2^{46}. At the close of 4^{19} the text continues in the following order:—vv.[27. 28. 22-24. 29-34], after which follow ch. 3^{1}, ch. $9^{16. 17a}$. Thus the commencement of v.[27] 'And these officers provided,' etc. (וְכִלְכְּלוּ הַנִּצָּבִים הָאֵלֶּה וגו׳), not, as RV, 'and those officers,' etc.), hinges directly on to the section 4^{7-19}, which enumerates the officers and their respective districts. This explains הָאֵלֶּה 'these' of v.[27], which is otherwise anomalous. There can be no question that the text of the section as preserved by LXX is complete in itself, and bears the stamp of originality rather than the somewhat confused account of MT.

The disturbing factors in MT appear to have been vv.[20. 21. 25.]* These, which contain no very precise information, were added probably not from a written source, but from oral tradition, by a post-exilic scribe, who desired reference to the happy times under Solomon's golden age. The insertion led to the dislocation of vv.[27. 28], causing them to be placed after vv.[22. 23. 24]. Probably the same hand excerpted the notice about Pharaoh's daughter and her dowry from its true position after v.[34], dividing it and placing part at the beginning of ch. 3 (for the reason given above, $3^{2. 3}$), and part as a sequel to the mention of Gezer in ch. 9^{15}.

5^{1}–7^{51} (Heb. 5^{15}–7^{51}).† The main document, represented by chs. 6. 7, appears to have been one, and was probably derived from the temple archives. 5^{3-5} has been amplified by R^D upon the lines of 2 S 7 (phrases, Nos. 10, 62). In 5^{12} the idea and phrase 'as he promised him' (כַּאֲשֶׁר דִּבֶּר־לוֹ) are Deuteronomic,‡ and thus the first half of this verse ought probably to be assigned to R^D.

In 5^{15-18} the relationship of the 70,000 + 80,000 workmen to the 30,000 of $5^{13. 14}$ is obscure,§ and probably points to a difference of source. So Ewald and Stade; the latter noticing that הלבנון 'the Lebanon,' of v.[14], is in v.[15] called ההר 'the mountain.'

The narrative of 6. 7 has been much worked over in post-exilic times. In 6^{1} the exact coincidence in length of the period of 480 years from the Exodus to the commencement of Solomon's temple, with the period which extends from this latter point to the return from the Exile, is scarcely accidental, and marks the verse as a post-exilic insertion. LXX places 6^{1} between vv.[16. 17a] of 5, into which position it has probably crept from the margin. In its place we have $6^{37. 38a}$, which give the date of laying the foundation of the temple and of its completion. This position for these latter verses is accepted by Wellhausen (Composition, p. 267), though not by Stade. 6^{7} intrudes itself very awkwardly into the midst of the account of the side chambers, and, if forming a part of the original description, must, at any rate, be out of place. In 6^{8a} read, with LXX (B, Luc.), Targ. הַתַּחְתּוֹנָה 'the lowest,' in place of הַתִּיכוֹנָה 'the middle.' 6^{9} (omitting גבים ושדרת, with B, Luc.) ought to follow 6^{10}.

6^{11-14}, which is omitted by LXX, is not, as is generally assumed by critics, the work of R^D, but is due to a post-exilic editor, who shows acquaintance with the Law of Holiness (H) and the Priestly code (P). The section contains some D phrases, such as could, and did, pass from D into P, but other expressions belong solely to P or to H. V.[14] is by the same hand as vv.[11-13], v.[9a] being repeated in order to round off the interpolation and attach it to the preceding narrative. The following special marks of authorship should be noticed:—

V.[12] אִם־תֵּלֵךְ בְּחֻקַּתַי If thou wilt walk in my statutes. Never in Dt; twice in Jer $44^{10. 23}$. In H, Lv 26^{3} (cf. 18^{4}), and constantly in Ezk (whose connexion with H is well ascertained; Driver, LOT[6] p. 49 ff.) $5^{6. 7}$ 11^{20} $18^{9. 17}$ $20^{13. 16. 19. 21}$.† Cf. the phrase בְּחֻקּוֹת הַגּוֹיִם walk in the statutes of the nations, Lv 18^{3} 20^{23} (H).

וְאֶת־מִשְׁפָּטַי תַּעֲשֶׂה and wilt execute my judgments. The exact phrase (with J″ as spokesman—my judgments) belongs to H; Lv 18^{4}, Ezk 5^{7} 11^{12} 18^{17} 20^{24}, 1 Ch 28^{7}. In 1 K 11^{33b} the passage belongs to R^D, but the words וְחֻקַּתַי וּמִשְׁפָּטַי are an exilic insertion, as is shown by their omission in LXX. Even with מִשְׁפָּטָיו his judgments, הַמִּשְׁפָּטִים the judgments, the phrase is not specially characteristic of Dt;* 26^{16} 33^{21} (blessing of Moses in Appendix); elsewhere Neh 10^{30}. Similar H phrases are found in Lv 18^{5}, Ezk $20^{11. 13. 21}$, Lv 19^{37} 20^{22} 25^{18}, Ezk 11^{20} 20^{19} 36^{27}.

לָלֶכֶת בָּהֶם to walk in them (the judgments). So exactly only in Lv 18^{4} (H). D's phrase is לָלֶכֶת בִּדְרָכָיו 'to walk in the ways of J″.'

V.[13] וְשָׁכַנְתִּי בְתוֹךְ בְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל And I will dwell in the midst of the children of Israel. Very distinctive of P; Ex 25^{8} 29^{45}, Nu 5^{3} 35^{34}, Ezk 43^{9} No occurrences in D. With the whole verse cf. Lv $26^{11. 12}$ (H$_L$).

6^{15-22}, which gives an account of the interior of the building, has been much corrupted by later glosses. Thus in v.[16] לְקֹדֶשׁ הַקֳּדָשִׁים 'for the most holy place,' a phrase which belongs to P, has been added to explain לִדְבִר 'for an adytum.' Other more serious interpolations (omitted in LXX) are הוּא הַהֵיכָל, 'that is, the temple,' in v.[17], vv.[18. 21] (except last 4 words in Heb.) [22b]. In vv.[15. 16] emend קוֹרוֹת חֲסָקֵן 'rafters of the ceiling,' הַקּוֹרוֹת 'the rafters,' with LXX (B, Luc.), Vulg., Pesh. in place of הקירות, הכסן. הקירות. V.[19] is probably due to R^D (notice the phrase 'ark of the covenant of J″'). By its omission we are able, with a slight emendation, to plausibly restore the original statement of vv.[17. 20a] 'And 40 cubits was the house before the adytum. And the adytum was 20 cubits long, and 20 cubits broad, and 20 cubits high; and he overlaid it with pure gold.' In v.[20b] we may emend (with LXX, B, Luc.) וַיַּעַשׂ for וַיְצַף, and thus, with the last 4 words of v.[21], we read, 'and he made an altar of cedar wood before the adytum, and overlaid it with gold.' Stade would omit all references to the use of gold-plating or gilding in Solomon's temple, but in so doing he appears to go further than is warranted by the state of the text.†

4^{26} properly belongs to ch. 10, where it occurs in LXX (B, Luc.) in connexion with v.[25].

† Upon the text of this section Stade's article, 'Der Text des Berichtes über Salomos Bauten,' ZATW, 1883, p. 129 ff., is most invaluable.

‡ Cf. Dt 1^{21} 6^{3} 9^{3} al. Driver (Comm. on Deut. lxxxi) cites from D fifteen occurrences of (ל)אשר דבר יי׳, besides instances from the compiler of Judges and Joshua.

§ According to 2 Ch $2^{16. 17}$ the former consisted of 'the strangers that were in the land of Israel.' Of this difference, however, there is no hint in the text of Kings.

* D's usual phrases are שָׁמַר מִשְׁפָּטִים לַעֲשׂוֹת observe judgments to do them; 5^{1} 7^{11} 11^{32} 12^{1}, 2 K 17^{37} לִמֵּד מִשְׁפָּטִים לַעֲשׂוֹת teach (someone else) judgments to do them; $4^{1. 5. 14}$ 6^{1}.

† Cf. the writer's Notes on the Hebrew Text of Kings, p. 73 f.

6^{23-28} runs smoothly when, following the clever suggestion of Stade, v.[26] is inserted between v.[23a] and v.[23b].

$6^{29.\ 30}$ (omitted in LXX) is a gloss. V.[29] is clearly by the same hand as v.[18], and v.[30] is redundant after [22a], and also out of place.

$6^{32.\ 35}$ may also readily be recognized as due to the author of vv.[18.\ 29]. Notice the late usage of the perf. with weak ו, וְנִבְלַע, וְנִצְּפָה.

6^{35b} is rendered intelligible by the emendation קְוִוֹת רְבֵעוֹת 'doorposts standing foursquare,' after LXX (B, Luc.)

7^{1-12}, the account of Solomon's further activity as a builder, appears to be free from later interpolation, doubtless because it did not possess so great an interest for post-exilic times as did the description of the first temple.

In v.[2b] read 'three' (B, Luc.) for 'four,' in agreement with the statement of v.[3]; * v.[5b] וּמִגֹּל פֶּתַח אֶל־פֶּתַח 'and door was over against door' (partly following B, Luc.), instead of 'and light was over against light,' a statement already made in v.[4b]; v.[7b] עַרֹ־הַקְּרֹוֹת 'to the rafters' (Vulg., Pesh.), in place of עַרֹ־הַקָּרָקַע; v.[9b] וּמֵחָצֵר בַּיִת י' 'and from the court of the house of J"' (cf. v.[12]), for וּמֵחוּץ rendered by RV 'and so on the outside.'

7^{15-22} has been much mutilated and obscured by glosses. These were added for the purpose of describing the 'wreaths of chain-work' (גְּדִלִים כְּמַעֲשֵׂה שַׁרְשְׁרוֹת) and the 'lily work' (כְּמַעֲשֵׂה שׁוּשָׁן), of which there appears to have been no mention in the original account; cf. the summary vv.[41. 42]. The glosses are v.[17a] (down to שַׁרְשְׁרוֹת) in its present form, vv.[19. 20a. 22]. The original description may be restored by the aid of LXX.

In 7^{24} read שְׁלֹשִׁים בָּאַמָּה 'for 30 cubits,' in place of 'for 10 cubits.'

7^{27-37} is in a very disordered condition, and but little help in reconstruction can be obtained from the Versions. Stade's rearrangement and emendation is well worthy of notice. He distinguishes between two parts of the carriages of the lavers: the מְכוֹנָה the movable base 4 cubits in height, mounted upon wheels of $1\frac{1}{2}$ cubits in diameter, and the מַעֲשֵׂה־כֵן the pedestal, $1\frac{1}{2}$ cubits high, fitted on to the top of the מְכוֹנָה and containing the socket in which the laver was placed.

7^{38-45} is substantially correct as it stands in MT (read הַסִּירוֹת 'the pots,' in v.[40a] after LXX, Vulg., in place of הַכִּיֹּרוֹת 'the lavers').

7^{46-51} is somewhat disordered. The vv.[48b-50], which describe, or rather summarize, the making of golden vessels by Ḥiram, are to be regarded as a later gloss. The remainder should take the following order: v.[47] (emending the first half verse, after LXX B, אֵין מִשְׁקָל לַנְּחֹשֶׁת אֲשֶׁר עָשָׂה אֶת־כָּל־הַכֵּלִים הָאֵלֶּה כֹּל מְאֹד כָּאֹד 'There was no weight to the brass wherewith he made all these vessels, because it was exceeding much'), v.[46], v.[48a] (emending, with LXX, Luc., וַיִּנַּח ש' 'and S. placed,' instead of וַיַּעַשׂ ש' 'and S. made'), v.[51].

8^{1-13}, the dedication of the temple, is an old narrative revised by later hands under the influence of P. In LXX vv.[1-5] appear in a much shorter form, which shows no trace of abridgment, and certainly presents substantially the original account as it left the hand of RD.

The phrases of P to be noticed are—v.[1] 'all the heads of the tribes, the princes of the fathers'; v.[4b] the distinction between the priests and the Levites (contrast in the original account vv.[3. 6. 10. 11] where the priests alone are mentioned); v.[5] עֲדַת יִשְׂרָאֵל 'the congregation of Israel,' and the verb הַנּוֹעָדִים 'that were assembled,' used in a ceremonial connexion. Beside these we find, in LXX as in MT, v.[4a] the phrase אֹהֶל מוֹעֵד 'the tent of meeting,' mainly characteristic of P, and perhaps here substituted for an original הָאֹהֶל 'the tent' (cf. ch 1^{39}); v.[6] קֹדֶשׁ הַקָּדָשִׁים 'the most holy place' (cf. above on 6^{16}); and vv.[8. 10] הַקֹּדֶשׁ 'the holy place,' i.e. the outer room of the temple, called הַהֵיכָל in $6^{17.\ 33}$ 7^{21}. The hand of RD may be seen in the phrase 'ark of the covenant of J"' vv.[1. 6], in v.[8b] (see above, date), and probably in v.[9b].

The two vv.[12. 13] are found in LXX (after the section vv.[14-53]) in a fuller form than in MT, which, as is shown by Wellhausen (Composition, p. 271), presupposes, after the correction of a few translator's errors, a text substantially superior to MT. The addition at the close, which points to an original text, 'is it not written in the Book of the Upright,' must also be regarded as genuine.

8^{14-66} presents throughout clear indications that it owes its present form to RD (phrases, Nos. 2, 3, 6–8, 11–26, 28, 50, 60–62, 64, 65). The final portion (vv.[62-66]) may perhaps exhibit an older narrative into which Deuteronomic additions have been incorporated, but the remainder, and especially the central prayer of dedication, has been so thoroughly amplified by the editor that it is impossible to discover any older kernel upon which he may have based his work. The choice of subjects in the successive divisions of the prayer seems for the most part to have been suggested by the catalogue of curses contained in Dt 28^{15-68};—cf. v.[33] 'When thy people Israel be smitten down before the enemy,' with Dt 28^{25}; v.[35] 'When heaven is shut up, and there is no rain,' with $28^{23.\ 24}$; v.[37] 'pestilence,' with 28^{21}; 'blasting, mildew,' with 28^{22}; 'locust, caterpillar,' with $28^{38.\ 39.\ 42}$; 'if the enemy besiege,' etc., with $28^{49ff.}$ (especially v.[52]); 'whatsoever plague, whatsoever sickness,' with $28^{22.\ 27.\ 35.\ 59-61}$; v.[46] 'If they sin against thee . . . and thou deliver them to the enemy, so that they carry them captive,' etc., with $28^{36.\ 37.\ 64-68}$.

The division of the prayer vv.[46-49], which brings forward the possibility of a general captivity of Israel in punishment for sins, is considered by Wellhausen (Composition, p. 270), Stade (Geschichte, i. p. 74), Kamphausen (in Kautzsch, Die Heilige Schrift) to be marked by its contents as not earlier than the Exile, and therefore later than RD.* Against this view may justly be cited the vagueness of the terms of v.[46] 'so that they carry them away captive unto the land of the enemy, far off or near,' and the fact that the writer (v.[48]) appears to regard the temple as still standing during the period of the Exile: 'and pray unto thee towards their land . . . the city which thou hast chosen, and the house which I have built for thy name.' But the chief argument for the pre-exilic date of the passage is to be derived from comparison of Dt 28, which, as has been noticed, forms to some extent the model of the prayer. This ch. 28 is regarded by all critics as being, if not an integral portion of D (chs. 5–26),† at least closely akin to D in standpoint and date, and thus certainly pre-exilic. Yet, notwithstanding, vv.[36. 37. 64 68] threaten a captivity of the nation in language decidedly more definite than that of the passage of the prayer which has been called in question. We may therefore be content to regard these verses as containing nothing necessarily opposed to the supposition of a pre-exilic authorship, and so, as of one piece with the whole, vv.[22-53].‡

9^{1-9}, the account of Solomon's second vision, is coloured throughout by the phraseology of RD (phrases, Nos. 3, 28, 29, 30, 51, 52, 57, 60, 61). Owing to the terms in which this section speaks of the exile of Israel and the destruction of the temple (vv.[7-9] §), it is regarded by Kuenen, Wellhausen, Stade, and Kamphausen as the work of RD[2] in exilic times. Such a conclusion, however, is by no means inevitable. The terms of v.[3] (see above, date) go quite as far to prove a pre-exilic position as do the words of vv.[6-9] to argue a post-exilic point of view; nor are the terms of these latter verses so definite as to preclude the opinion that they were penned by RD cir. B.C. 600 (see above on 8^{46-49}). If vv.[7-9] do imply an exilic standpoint, vv.6-9 (and not the whole section) will belong to R^{D2}, vv.1-5 to R^{D}.

* Wellhausen and Stade seem to regard these verses as determining the exilic date of the whole section, vv.[19-66]. Kamphausen assigns vv.[44-53] to D[2].

9^{10}–10^{29} consists mainly of a series of short notices drawn from the same sources as chs. 4. 5 (Heb. 4–5^{14}). The originals appear to have been cut up and pieced together with no great skill; but whether the arrangement throughout is due to R^{D}, or later hands have employed themselves in altering the sequence of the narrative, is not clear. In LXX (B, Luc.) the arrangement is somewhat different, but scarcely superior, to that of MT.

One single original document appears to be represented by 9.10.17.18.19.15.20.21.22.23, and these verses may very well have originally taken this order, the completion of Solomon's building operations being first narrated, and then followed by an account of the forced levy raised to carry out these works. After v.23 there probably followed in the original a list of the names of the chief officers (שָׂרֵי הַנִּצָּבִים). The statement of v.24b connected by R^{D} to v.24b by the particle אָז 'then,' is probably from the same document. Next to the account of the king's building activity—his most important work, there would naturally follow mention of his achievement next in importance—the provision of an efficient shipping for the increase of his wealth from external sources. This succeeds in 9.26-28 10.11. But reference to the ships naturally leads up to mention of the imports introduced by their means, as we see in 9.28 10.11, and the use to which these rare and valuable materials were put. Thus there follows 10.12.14-22. The general subject of imports suggests allusion to a specially important item—horses from Egypt, apparently first introduced into the kingdom in any considerable numbers by Solomon, 10.26.* 28. 29.

Thus the disturbing factors introduced into this main account are seen to be 9.11-13.14.16.24a.25, 10.1-10.13.23-25.27. Notice in 9.11.16.24 the awkward pluperfects pointed by the order—subject preceding verb, פַּרְעֹה כָּלַךְ־מִצְרַיִם עָלָה, חִירָם כָּלַךְ־צֹר נָתַן אֶת־ש׳, אַךְ בַּת־פַּרְעֹה עָלְתָה, and marking the passages as mere excerpts from sources which, in describing a regular sequence of events, must have read וַיַּעַל פַּרְעֹה, וַיִּתֵּן חִירָם וַיִּעַל בַּת־פַּרְעֹה. In v.11b אָז יִתֵּן וג׳ cannot represent the apodosis of v.10, since אָז used in this connexion (in place of ו consecutive) would be quite without analogy. Moreover, even if v.11b could form the apodosis, the parenthesis v.11a would come in with very great awkwardness. V.16 has already, with 3.1, been referred to its true position after 4.34 (Heb. 5.14). From the same source would seem to be derived v.24a, while v.25, though clearly alien to its immediate context, cannot definitely be assigned to any special source. 10.1-10.13 is an ancient narrative introduced at this point to illustrate Solomon's wealth and wisdom, much in the same way as 3.16-28 serves to depict his discernment in judgment; and the two stories may very possibly be derived from the same source. Finally, 10.23-25.27, couched in vague and generalizing language, are probably relatively late in origin, and are here introduced to give the finishing touch to the picture of Solomon's prosperity.

11^{1-13}, in its present form, is coloured by the hand of R^{D} (phrases, Nos. 3, 27, 29, 31–33, 35, 36, 57, 58, 65). The view that the latter portion of this section is not earlier than the Exile (R^{D2}; so Kuenen vv.9-13, Kamphausen, vv.9. 10) is based upon the words of v.9 'who had appeared unto him twice,' and presupposes that the narrative of the second vision, ch. 9^{1-9}, comes from the hand of R^{D2}; but upon this opinion see ad loc. On the other hand, the fact that vv.11-13 speak of a division of the kingdom but make no mention of an exile, favours their pre-exilic authorship. 11^{1-8} appears in LXX in a somewhat differently arranged and briefer form, which is, in the main, correct.†

11^{14-22} seems, as it now stands, to be somewhat confused. Hadad, though but 'a little lad' at the time of his flight into Egypt, at once finds favour with Pharaoh, and receives from him a house, an allowance, and land. He then, in spite of his extreme youth, marries the sister of Pharaoh's queen, Tahpenes, and his son Genubath is brought up in the palace with Pharaoh's sons. The form Adad (אַדַד) of v.17a, as a variation of Hadad (הֲדַד), creates further suspicion as to the integrity of the narrative.

* This verse originally stood in combination with 4.23 (Heb. 5.6); see on 4.20-34.

† Notice especially in v.8b the text of Luc. ἐθυμία καὶ ἔθυε, i.e. מְקַטְּרוֹת וּמְזַבְּחוֹת in place of מְקַטֵּר וּמְזַבֵּחַ וג׳. Solomon himself burnt incense and sacrificed to the strange gods, but this fact has been toned down by some later hand into the statement of MT. Syntax, however, has suffered in the process (we should expect at least הַמְקַטְּרוֹת וְהַמְזַבְּחוֹת).

H. Winckler (Alttest. Untersuchungen, 1–6) very skilfully distinguishes and reconstructs two narratives which have been interwoven. The one speaks of an Edomite Hadad, who, as a child, is carried into Egypt by his father's servant, and brought up by Pharaoh's queen. The other makes Adad a Midianite prince, who flees with his adherents into Egypt, taking with him certain Edomites from Paran, and is well received by Pharaoh, who gives him for wife the sister of his queen. A son, Genubath, is born to him, but of his fate we are not informed.

In 11^{23-25} of MT the short account of Rezon appears to have assumed its present position at the hands of a later reviser of the text. LXX (B, Luc.) omits vv.23-25a (down to 'all the days of Solomon'), and then, in place of the impossible MT, presupposes a text וְאֵת הָרָעָה אֲשֶׁר עָשָׂה הֲדַד וַיָּקָץ בְּיִשְׂרָאֵל וַיִּמְלֹךְ עַל־אֱדֹם 'This is the evil which Hadad did; and he abhorred Israel, and reigned over Edom.' This seems to be correct both in reading and position, referring as it does the latter part of v.25 to Hadad, and adding the necessary summary as to his relationship to Solomon. The definiteness, however, of the statement, 'This is the evil,' suggests that in the original narrative some explicit account of Hadad's aggressions must have intervened after v.22.

The short reference to Rezon, thus omitted by LXX, has been inserted between v.14a and v.14b; but clearly by a later hand. So placed, it breaks the connexion of the Hadad story, and necessitates the resumption καὶ Ἀδὲρ ὁ Ἰδουμαῖος, v.14b, repeated from v.14a. The notice is ancient and genuine, but its original position cannot now be accurately determined.

11^{26-40} seems to have originally formed part of a history of Jeroboam, and perhaps belongs to the same source as 12^{1-19} 14^{1-18}. As the narrative stands in Kings it has probably undergone some abbreviation at the commencement, in order to fit it on to the preceding account of Solomon's 'adversaries.' Notice the summary form of the introduction v.26 and the phrase of R^{D} 'at that time' (בָּעֵת הַהִיא) v.29. Vv.31-39 show signs of expansion at the hands of the editor (phrases, Nos. 2, 3, 11, 27, 28, 34, 38, 57–59).

Not improbably the speech has received some few later additions. In v.33 וְחֻקַּתַי וּמִשְׁפָּטַי 'and my statutes and my judgments,' is wanting in LXX, and the use of these terms after לַעֲשׂוֹת 'to execute' rather than לִשְׁכֹּר 'to keep' being characteristic of H (see on 6^{12}), the two words may reasonably be suspected to be a later insertion. LXX also omits אֲשֶׁר שָׁכַר מִצְוֹתַי וְחֻקַּתַי 'who kept my commandments and my statutes,' at the end of v.34, and, though the phrase is Deuteronomic, yet the repeated אֲשֶׁר has something of the awkward ring of an interpolation. The omission of the close of the speech by LXX (end of v.38 'and I will give thee Israel'; v.39), taken in connexion with the reference of v.39—the affliction of the seed of David, but not for ever—suggests that this also may be an addition of exilic or post-exilic times; though, as Kuenen points out, the statement of v.39 need not imply an exilic standpoint; cf. 2 S 7^{14b}. The use of the imperfect with weak ו (וְאֶעֱנֶה) is perhaps another mark of the late hand.

After the account of the disruption of the kingdom (1 K 12), the composition of the narrative takes the form indicated above in dealing with the editor's method. Into the framework of the history, constructed by the editor, are embedded—

(i.) Short notices which give an epitome of historical events. These have reference to both the N. and S. kingdoms, and were no doubt generally, if not in every case, extracted by R^{D} from the two books of 'Annals' to which he so constantly makes reference. From the character of this narrative it is to be inferred that R^{D} made use of just so much of his sources as was necessary to form an outline sketch of the history, often summarizing in a few words matter which lay before him in greater detail; cf. the recurring phrase 'and there was war between M. and N. continually,' I 14^{30} $15^{6.16.32}$, and also the brief passing reference to wars in I 14^{19} 22^{5} (^{46} Heb.), II 13^{12} $14^{15.28}$.

To this epitome are to be assigned I 14^{21}–16^{34} 22^{41-53}, II 8^{16-29} 10^{32-36} 12^{17} (Heb. ^{18})–13^{13} 13^{22}–17^{6} (except 14^{8-14} 16^{10-16}).

(ii.) Lengthy narratives, generally incorporated in their original form, and exhibiting only here and there the marks of R^D's hand, chiefly in the expansion of speeches. These are in most cases, as is clear from their religious tone, the work of prophetical writers. In some cases, however, the narratives have to do with the affairs of the temple and its priesthood, and exhibit such a minuteness and apparent accuracy of detail that they must be regarded as due to priestly hands, and were probably derived from the temple archives. These are II $11^{1\text{-}20}$ $12^{4\text{-}16}$ ($^{5\text{-}17}$ Heb.) $16^{10\text{-}16}$ 22^{3}–23^{24}.

$12^{1\text{-}24}$. In this narrative vv.$^{15.\ 17.\ 21\text{-}24}$ appear to be additions of a later hand. V.^{15}, with its reference to the prediction of Ahijah, probably presupposes $11^{31\text{ff.}}$ in its present form, and must in this case be due to R^D. Vv.$^{21\text{-}24}$, standing in close connexion with v.^{15} (cf. v.^{15} 'for it was a thing brought about of J",' v.^{24} 'for this thing is of me'), give a Judaic turn to the originally impartial narrative of vv.$^{1\text{-}20}$, and are scarcely consistent with the statement of 14^{30}, which is based upon the contemporary 'Annals.' Notice further, that while v.^{20} speaks only of the tribe of Judah, vv.$^{21.\ 23}$ are careful to make reference also to the tribe of Benjamin. V.^{17}, which stands in an awkward position, and is absent from LXX, is probably a later gloss, though not by the same hand as vv.$^{15.\ 21\text{-}24}$, since it makes no reference to Benjamin.

$12^{26\text{-}33}$. Judging by the stress which R^D lays upon Jeroboam's cult of the calves as the cause of all subsequent deflection of Israel from the pure worship of J" (phrases, No. 56), it is probable that this narrative has obtained its present casting at his hands, though there is no reason hence to infer that any detail of fact is underived from the older source. Kuenen (Onderzoek, § 25[4]) observes justly, 'Jeroboam's measures with reference to the worship must already have been related in older narratives, but it is only natural that the Redactor, when dealing with a matter which so specially excited his interest, should not fail to set before us his own construction and his own verdict.' Vv.$^{32.\ 33}$ serve to introduce the story of ch. 13.

$13^{1\text{-}32}$. The style of the language in this narrative shows traces of decadence:—cf. וְנָתַן perf. with weak ו v.^{3}, אֲשֶׁר דִּבֶּר לִי, צִוָּה אֹתִי vv.$^{9.\ 17}$, apparently first written as passives דֻּבַּר לִי, צֻוֵּיתִי (cf. Wellhausen, Comp. p. 280), and perhaps כַּמָּה v.^{7}—and this fact, together with the anachronism 'in the cities of Samaria' v.^{32} (cf. II $17^{24.\ 26}$ 23^{19}), and the non-mention of the names of the principal actors, marks the narrative as being of comparatively late origin. It may be thought to have been a story previously current in the form of oral tradition, and to have assumed a literary form shortly after the event predicted—the destruction of the altar at Bethel—had come about. Notice the precision of the statement 'Josiah by name' v.^{2}. The style is about contemporary with that of the annals of Josiah's reformation, II $23^{1\text{-}15.\ 19\text{-}24}$, where the perf. with weak ו is used with some frequency: vv.$^{5.\ 8.\ 10.\ 12.\ 14.\ 15}$.

It is, however, by no means to be hence inferred that the story is of the character of a vaticinium post eventum. Such a view presupposes that it, together with the notice of II $23^{16\text{-}18}$, was inserted into Kings subsequently to the redaction of R^D (Wellhausen, Comp. p. 280; Kuenen, Ond. § 25[4]); whereas, on the contrary, ch. $12^{26\text{ff.}}$ appears to have been carefully edited by R^D so as to lead up to the story, and the resumption of the main narrative in $13^{33.\ 34}$, forming a link to $14^{1\text{-}20}$, constructs of the history a harmonious whole. If the story be merely a very late Judæan fiction, the point of the details as to the disobedience and punishment of the Judæan prophet seems to be quite inexplicable.

The narrative of $14^{1\text{-}18}$ * exhibits very clear traces of the hand of R^D in Ahijah's prophecy vv.$^{7\text{-}16}$

* Upon the LXX version of this narrative in its relationship to MT, see Winckler, Alttest. Untersuchungen, p. 12 ff.; Kittel, History of the Hebrews, ii. p. 206 ff.; and the writer's Notes on (phrases, Nos. 3, 8, 13, 29, 32, 34, 39, 54, 56, 57, 66–70), with which should be compared the prophecies of Jehu son of Hanani against Baasha $16^{1\text{-}4}$, of Elijah against Ahab $21^{20\text{-}24}$, and of the young prophet against the house of Ahab II $9^{6\text{-}10}$.

Narratives of the Northern Kingdom.—I 17–19 20. 21. $22^{1\text{-}38}$, II $1^{2\text{-}17a\alpha}$ $2^{1\text{-}18.\ 19\text{-}22.\ 23\text{-}25}$ $3^{4\text{-}27}$ $4^{1\text{-}7.\ 8\text{-}37.\ 38\text{-}41\ 42\text{-}44}$ 5. $6^{1\text{-}7.\ 8\text{-}23.\ 24\text{-}33}$ 7. $8^{1\text{-}6.\ 7\text{-}15}$ 9^{1}–10^{28} $13^{14\text{-}19.\ 20.\ 2}$ ($14^{8\text{-}14}$). This great group consists of narratives dealing with the affairs of the kingdom of Israel. The stories are in most cases of some length, their high descriptive power and sympathetic feeling indicating that they have their origin in the kingdom to which they relate; and this conclusion is substantiated by such touches as 'Beer-sheba which belongeth to Judah' I 19^{3}, 'at Beth-shemesh which belongeth to Judah' II 14^{11}. No blame is anywhere attached to the calf-worship of Bethel and Dan, the efforts of Elijah and his successor being wholly directed to the rooting out of the foreign cult of the Tyrian Ba'al.

Certain peculiarities of diction probably belong to the dialect of North Palestine.

The following may be noticed:—

Suffix 2 f. sing. כִּי־, pl. יְכִי־; Kĕthîbh II 4^{2} לָכִי, ^{3} שָׁכְנִכִי, ^{7} נְגָנֵכִי, נְשָׁיְכִי. Elsewhere sing. Ca 2^{3}, Ps $103^{3.\ 4}$, Jer 11^{15} (text corrupt), pl. Ps $103^{3.\ 4.\ 5}$ 116^{7}. Cf. Syriac suff. 2 f. sing. ܟ֫, pl. ܟܝ֫.

Personal pronoun 2 f. sing. Kĕthîbh אַתִּי:—II $4^{16.\ 23}$ 8^{1}. Elsewhere Jg 17^{2}, Jer 4^{30}, Ezk 36^{13} †. Cf. Syriac ܐܢܬ. So probably Kĕthîbh הֹלַכְתִּי II 4^{23} stands for הֹלֶכֶת אַתִּי, as in Syr. ܗܠܟܬ ܐܢܬ for ܗܠܟ ܐܢܬ (Duval, Gramm. Syr. p. 174 f.).

Demonstrative pronoun f. זוֹ II 6^{19}. Cf. Aramaic דָּא.

Infin. constr. verb ל"ה with suff. בְּהִשְׁתַּחֲוָיְתִי II 5^{18}, perhaps presupposing form without suff. הִשְׁתַּחֲוָיָה with termination as in Aram. (cf. Dalman, Gramm. Jüd.-Pal. Aram. p. 289 f.).

Relative שֶׁל in מִשֶּׁלּוֹ (if not a textual error) II 6^{11}. So Jg 57 (N. Palestine) 6^{17} 7^{12} 8^{26} (probably Ephraimitic), and uniformly in Ca (exc. title 1^{1}). Elsewhere only in exilic or post-exilic writings. In Phœnician the relative is אש with prosthetic א.

Preservation of ה of article after prep. ב: II 7^{12} בְּהַשָּׂדֶה.

Kĕthîbh אֵיכָה=where? II 6^{13}. Elsewhere only Ca 1^{7}bis. Cf. Aram. אֵיכָא, ܐܝܟܐ.

עֹרְאֵלֹתָם, עֹרְאֵיהֶם II $9^{18.\ 20}$.

Construction with the suff. pronoun anticipating object (akin to Syr.): I 19^{21} בַּשָּׁלֶם הֲבָשָׂר, 21^{13} אֶת־נָבוֹת . . . וַיִּרְגְּמֻהוּ.

Indefinite use of אֶחָד a certain: I $19^{4.\ 5}$ 20^{13} 22^{9} (cf. v.^{8}) II 4^{1} 8^{6}; add I 21^{1} after LXX (B, Luc.). Elsewhere only I 13^{11} (perhaps for אַחֵר another), Jg 9^{53} 13^{2}, 1 S 1^{1}, 2 S 18^{10}, and late Ezk 1^{15} $8^{7.\ 8}$ etc.

To these may be added a few roots which betray the influence of Aramaic: שָׁפַק I 20^{10}, מְרִינוֹת $20^{14.\ 15.\ 17.\ 19}$ (elsewhere only very late), חֹרִים $21^{8.\ 11}$, הִשְׁלָה II 4^{28}.

There is also a fair number of ἅπαξ λεγόμενα, some of which take the place of ordinary words, and thus may be dialectical: e.g. שְׁגָם gird, I 18^{46} (for חָגַר, אֲגִירָה food, 19^{8} (for אָכְלָה, אֹכֶל, מַאֲכָל); but of others nothing can be affirmed.

The narratives are clearly not all by one author. (i.) Some are histories of Elijah and Elisha, or of movements which they initiated in the direction of religious reform. (ii.) In others the fate of the kingdom is regarded from a political standpoint, and this as determined mainly by the action of the king; though here also prophets play an important part as advisers and announcers of the oracle of J". Thus both classes have a religious colouring or motive, and may equally be regarded as the work of men of prophetic training, perhaps members of the guilds which we see coming into prominence in some of the Elisha stories.

(i.) To the former class belong I 17–19. 21, the Heb. Text of Kings, where the whole question of the interrelationship of the two forms of the history of Jeroboam (11^{40}–14^{20}) is discussed at length, pp. 163–169.

II $1^{2-17a\alpha}$ $2^{1-18.\ 19-22.\ 23-25}$ $4^{1-7.\ 8-37.\ 38-41.\ 42-44}$ 5. 6^{1-7} $8^{1-6.\ 7-15}$ 9^{1}–10^{28} $13^{14-19.\ 20.\ 21}$.

Of these I 17–19 forms a continuous narrative. From the abruptness of v.[1], no reason being assigned for Elijah's threat, and no point of connexion existing for 'hence' (מָזֶּה), v.[3], it may be inferred that the commencement of the story has been omitted or abbreviated by R^D, and the specification 'Elijah the Tishbite, etc.,' thus represents his summary introduction. The sequel also, in strict accordance with $19^{15.\ 16}$, is lacking, only one part of J''s commission being fulfilled, vv.[19-21].

I 21 is clearly out of place in MT, breaking the connexion between ch. 20 and its sequel ch. 22, and LXX is no doubt correct in placing this narrative immediately after ch. 19. The dislocation may have been due to the desire to bring the prophecy of Ahab's death (21^{19}) nearer to the account of its occurrence ($22^{35ff.}$), and perhaps in a minor degree to the description of the king's mood as 'chafing and sullen' (סַר וְזָעֵף) in 20^{43} as in 21^{4}. Most critics (Wellhausen, Driver, Kamphausen, Kittel; but Kuenen is uncertain, Ond. § 25[7]) assign I 21 to the same author as I 17–19. Thus Wellhausen cites as points of contact the central position occupied by Elijah, his eagle-like swoop upon Ahab at the right moment, and the formulæ וַיְהִי אַחַר הַדְּבָרִים הָאֵלֶּה 'and it came to pass after these things' 21^{1} (but cf. LXX) as 17^{17}, וַיְהִי דְבַר יְ׳ אֶל־א׳ 'And the word of J'' came to E.' 21^{17} as וַיְהִי דְבַר יְ׳ אֶל־א׳ 18^{1}.

On the other hand, it may be maintained that Elijah is not really the central figure as in I 17–19. He does not appear upon the scene until v.[17], and then takes scarcely a more conspicuous position than Micaiah in $22^{8ff.}$. The king and his action form the centre of interest both at the beginning and end of the narrative. Further, Kuenen notices the absence of any reference in 21 to 17–19, and vice versâ, the murder of Naboth forming the single crime of Ahab and Jezebel in the one story, while in the other the sole pivot is the struggle between J'' and Ba'al. This, however, is a point of slight moment, and no definite conclusion can be reached as to the relative authorship of the two sections.

More important is the question of the connexion of I 21 with its natural sequel II 9^{1}–10^{28}. Critics generally argue or assume that the latter section is by a different author from the former, and most (Wellhausen, Driver, Kamphausen, Kittel) assign II 9 f. to the writer of I 20. 22, II 3^{4-27} etc. (see below). The argument against identity of authorship of I 21 and II 9 f., as stated by Wellhausen, is based upon the supposed discrepancy in detail. While in I 21 it is the vineyard of Naboth which is mentioned, and this is described in v.[1] as 'hard by the palace of Ahab' (אֵצֶל הֵיכַל אַחְאָב), II 9^{21-26} alludes to the חֶלְקַת נָבוֹת, i.e. the portion or estate of Naboth, which lay outside the city. Again, I 21^{13} records only the death of Naboth, while II 9^{26} speaks also of the blood of his sons as calling for vengeance.

On the other hand, the following considerations clearly make for the unity of the two narratives:—

II 9^{21b}, the meeting of Joram son of Ahab with Jehu actually upon the estate of Naboth is a touch of high dramatic power which demands that the writer should not merely have known the story of Naboth (proved by vv.[25. 26]), but should actually have written it down himself as an introduction to the sequel II 9 f. Hence a presumption is created in favour of our Naboth narrative being the story thus written.

The parallels between the prediction I $21^{19.\ 23}$ and the fulfilment II $9^{25.\ 26.\ 36}$ cannot be insisted upon, because I $21^{19ff.}$ has been largely amplified by R^D (phrases, Nos. 32, 39, 43, 44, 54, 67–71), and it is not now possible certainly to determine the original kernel of Elijah's prediction. It should, however, be noticed that the usual method of R^D is to expand rather than to excise, and, if this plan has here prevailed, the original speech must be contained in vv.[19. 20. 23b]. The disagreement in points of fact between I 21 and II 9 proves upon examination to be non-existent. Ahab's dispute with Naboth arose in the first instance about a vineyard adjoining the palace; but this was only a portion of Naboth's estate (חֶלְקָה), the whole of which would lapse to the king, supposing that the family of Naboth became extinct. And I 21^{15}, where Jezebel tells Ahab to go down and take possession of the vineyard, clearly implies the extirpation of the whole family; in the statement 'for Naboth is not alive, but dead,' the name Naboth means Naboth and his sons, just as much as in v.[15] 'thy blood, even thine,' means the blood of Ahab and his son.

More decisive, however, is the question of the supposed unity of II 9^{1}–10^{28} with I 20. 22, II 3^{4-27} 6^{8}–7^{20}. If this be granted, the diverse authorship of I 21 and II 9f. seems necessarily to follow, since I 21 can scarcely be regarded as of one piece with I 20. 22. The place where the dogs lick the blood of Ahab, 22^{38}, is discordant with 21^{19}, and in general the interest of the writer of 20. 22—mainly, if not wholly, political—and his sympathetic feeling for the king of Israel, preclude the supposition that he is also the author of the Naboth story.

Wellhausen cites the following coincidences in phraseology of II 9 f. with I 20. 22, etc.:—חֶדֶר בְּחֶדֶר 'a chamber within a chamber,' II 9^{2}, I 20^{30} 22^{25}; חָגָה 'tarry,' II 9^{3} 7^{9}; רֹכֵב סוּסִים 'horseman,' 9^{18} 7^{14}; * תָּפַשׂ חַי; תָּפַשׂ יָדַיִם 'turn the hands,' II 9^{23}, I 22^{34}; 'take alive,' II 10^{14} 7^{12}, I 20^{18}; and the root חרא II 10^{27} 6^{25}. The importance of this collection is, however, open to doubt, since it contains no striking phrase, but only such as might be expected to occur in narratives nearly contemporaneous, and having, in the main, the same subjects in common.

On the other hand, a point of phraseology, apparently hitherto overlooked, sharply separates between II 9 f. and I 20. 22, etc., and seems absolutely to preclude the theory of a common authorship. This is the title which is ordinarily applied to the king in the course of the narrative.

I 20. 22, II 3^{4-27} 6^{8}–7^{20} are bound together by the use of a common title. In all, the writer's phrase is 'king of Israel,' and the proper name of the king, if it occurs at all, is in nearly every case reserved for the necessary specification at the commencement of a section.

II 9, on the other hand, agrees with I 21 in exhibiting a regular preference for the proper name simply, without further title.

The facts are as follow:—

I 20. Ahab king of Israel, vv.[2. 13]; king of Israel 11 times, viz. vv.[4. 7. 11. 21. 22. 28. 31. 32. 40. 41. 43]; the king, vv.[38. 39 bis]; Ahab simply, v.[14].

I 22. King of Israel 17 times, viz. vv.[2. 3. 4. 5. 6. 8. 9. 10. 18. 26. 29. 30 bis. 31. 32. 33. 34]; the king, vv.[15 bis. 16. 35. 37b].

II 3^{4-27}. King of Israel 8 times, viz. vv.[4. 5. 9. 10. 11. 12. 13 bis]; Ahab simply, v.[5] (probably from another source); the king Joram, v.[6].

II 6^{8}–7^{20}. King of Israel 7 times, viz. 6^{8}. [9. 10. 11. 12; 21. 26]; the king 10 times, viz. $6^{28.\ 30}$ $7^{2.\ 6.\ 12.\ 14.\ 15.\ 17\ bis.\ 18}$.

II 9. Joram or Jehoram simply 9 times, viz. vv.[14 bis. 16 bis. 17. 21. 22. 23. 24]; once Jehoram the king, v.[15]; and once Jehoram king of Israel in direct distinction from 'Ahaziah king of Judah,' v.[21]; never king of Israel simply. The double occurrence of Joram in v.[16] is specially to be noticed, since, on account of the proximity of 'Ahaziah king of Judah,' the specification king of Israel might have been expected.

Similarly, in I 21 Ahab simply is usual; 9 times (omitting the prophecy vv.[21-26]), viz. vv.[2. 3. 4. 8. 15. 16. 20. 27. 29]. Ahab king of Samaria, v.[1]; Ahab king of Israel, v.[18].

Now though this agreement in form of reference cannot be pressed to prove identity of authorship

* In 7^{14} MT vocalizes רֹכֵב סוּסִים, but LXX renders B ἀναβάτας, Luc. ἀναβάτας, i.e. לֹכֵב (or לֹכְבֵי) for רֹכֵב.

for I 21 and II 9, any more than can the fact that I 17–19 always speaks of Ahab simply, be used to connect this section with I 21, because different writers may easily have employed the same obvious citation of the proper name; yet the fact of the disagreement in form of reference between I 21 and I 20. 22, etc., ought to be emphasized as demonstrating diversity of authorship. It is true that in I 20. 22, etc., the general use of king of Israel may be explained as prompted to a large extent by contrast to 'king of Syria'; but this does not sufficiently account for the almost total omission of the king's proper name, which would certainly have occurred far more frequently had the author of II 9 been the writer of these narratives. Contrast especially I 22, II 3^{4-27}, where (excepting 3^{6}) the names of Ahab and Joram are never mentioned in spite of the close connexion with 'Jehoshaphat king of Judah,' with II 9, where in connexion with 'Ahaziah king of Judah' the usual form of citation is Joram, Jehoram simply. And, again, notice the use of the king simply 5 times in I 22, 10 times in II 6^{8}–7^{20}, where the desire for distinction from 'the king of Syria' cannot have been in the writer's mind, and the occasion might have been suitable for the use of the king's proper name.

By this point, therefore, the diverse authorship of I 20. 22, etc. and II 9 seems to be proved, and this dissociation adds weight to the arguments which have been put forward above in favour of the unity of II 9^{1}–10^{27} with I 21.

II 1^{2}–$^{17a\alpha}$ is out of a different source from the preceding Elijah narratives. This fact is marked by the form of the name אֲחַזְיָה vv.[3. 4. 8. 12], peculiar to this section, and generally by the inferior literary merit of the composition. The story is probably much later than I 17–19, II 21 and its sequel.

II 2^{1-18}, Elijah's translation, links itself closely on to some of the longer Elisha narratives which follow, as their introduction; but also might have formed a suitable close to the Elijah history, of which we possess a fragment in I 17–19, if this can be thought to have gone on to embody also a history of Elisha. The following coincidences between the narratives are worthy of notice, and suggest that I 17–19, II 2^{1-18} 4^{1-37}, to which we may add II 5, may be the work of one author. In the case of II 8^{7-15} 13^{14-19} the evidence is too slight to build upon.

* The verb נהר is not elsewhere found.

The short Elisha stories are probably popular tales handed down orally at first, and not put into writing until some considerable time after the longer narratives.

(ii.) The second class includes I 20. 22^{1-38}, II 3^{4-27} $6^{8-23.\ 24-33}$ 7 (14^{8-14}).

All these, with the exception of 14^{8-14}, deal in the same style with the same subject—Israel's relations with Syria, and may not improbably flow from one hand. Notice especially the close bond of connexion between I $22^{4.\ 7}$ and II $3^{7.\ 11}$.

II 14^{8-14}, which stands apart from the other narratives, is marked as probably N. Palestinian by its tone, and especially by the reference of v.[11] 'in Beth-shemesh, which belongeth unto Judah.'

It does not appear that any of the group of N. Palestinian narratives has undergone important editorial revision. The fact that the speech of Elijah in I $21^{19ff.}$ has been amplified by R^{D} has already been noticed. This is also true of the speech of the young prophet who was deputed by Elisha to anoint Jehu, II 9^{7-10}. II $3^{4.\ 5}$, which serves summarily to introduce the succeeding narrative, is probably not of one piece with this latter, but is rather to be assigned to the 'Annals' (cf. II 1^{1}). II 9^{29} belongs to the scheme of R^{D}.

Traces of later interpolation are not numerous. In I 18 the reference to the 400 prophets of the Asherah is probably to be regarded, with Wellhausen, as a later insertion. Notice the absence of את before נְבִיאֵי הָאֲשֵׁרָה, and the omission of all mention of such prophets in vv.[22. 40]. The insertion seems to exhibit a late confusion of the Asherah with the goddess Ashtoreth (see ASHERAH).

The statement of v.[31b] in the same narrative looks like a quotation of the exact words of P in Gn 35^{10}; and, if this be the case, vv.[31. 32a], which appear to describe the building of a new altar, will form a later addition to the statement of v.[30b] which speaks merely of the repair (וַיִּרְפָּא) of the old altar of J". It should not, however, be overlooked that the giving of the name of Israel to Jacob is related also in J (Gn 32^{29}), and that the relationship of I K 18^{31b} to the passage of P may be nothing more than an easy verbal coincidence. In this case vv.[31. 32a] may represent a detailed description of that which is first summarily stated in v.[30b], much in the same way as Gn 27^{24-29} stands related to Gn 27^{23}.

In the narrative of I 20 the grounds upon which Wellhausen regards the reference to the parts played by anonymous prophets (vv.[13. 14. 22. 28. 35-43]) as later additions are inconclusive.*

I 22^{28b}, which is omitted in LXX (B, Luc.), is certainly an interpolation, derived from Mic 1^{1} for the purpose of identifying Micaiah with Micah the Morashtite. The plural עַמִּים regularly denotes 'peoples,' i.e. foreign nations generally, and is seldom or never used of Israel.

Very possibly also vv.[35bβ] (from וַיֵּצֶא 'and the blood ran out,' etc.)[38] may not have formed part of the original narrative of Ahab's last battle. In LXX (B, Luc.) v.[35bβ] precedes v.[35bα] 'and he died in the evening.' V[38], for which v.[35bβ] prepares the way, hinges awkwardly on to the apparent close of the narrative in v.[34], and seems to be intended to satisfy the prophecy as to Ahab's death in 21^{19b}, though the scene of the event differs from that of the prediction.

II $17^{7-18.\ 21-24}$ is the commentary of R^{D} (phrases, Nos. 3, 29, 32, 33, 36, 39, 41, 43, 44, 46, 51, 53, 55, 56, 71, 72, and cf. Driver, LOT[6] p. 203) upon the short historical notice 17^{3-6}.† Vv.[19. 20] are certainly a later insertion, subsequent to the commence-

* Kuenen (Ond. § 25[10]) agrees with Wellhausen's verdict upon vv.[13. 14. 22. 28], but inclines to regard vv.[35-43] as of much greater antiquity, and of a piece with the narrative of ch. 20.

† Possibly composite. Cf. Winckler, AT Untersuchungen, 15–25.

ment of the Judæan exile, and due to R^{D2}. The opening of v.[21] כִּי קֶרַע וגו' 'For he rent,' etc., clearly refers immediately to the statement of v.[18] וַיִּתְאַנַּף . . . וַיְסָרֵם '. . . was very angry . . . and removed them,' but the sequence is destroyed by the interpolation, כִּי v.[21] being deprived of all point. The whole reference of the section is to the causes which brought about the rejection of the kingdom of Israel, no reference being elsewhere made to Judah except in v.[13], where וּבִיהוּדָה 'and unto Judah,' is probably by the same hand as vv.[19. 20].

Stade (ZATW vi. 163 f.) regards 17^{7-17} as an exilic addition, later than R^{D}, upon the grounds that the writer of these verses ascribes Molech-worship (v.[17a]) and Assyrian star-worship (v.[16b]) to the Northern kingdom—the abuses which later on were rife in the Southern kingdom under Manasseh (II $21^{3.\ 6}$), and also because certain phrases appear to exhibit the influence of Jeremiah; cf. v.[13] 'Turn ye from your evil ways,' with Jer 18^{11} 25^{5} 35^{15} $36^{3.\ 7}$; 'J" testified,' etc., with Jer $7^{25ff.}$, $11^{7ff.}$; v.[15b] 'and they followed vanity,' etc., with Jer 3^{5}. The reflections embodied in these verses are, however, in strict accordance with R^{D}'s plan which runs throughout his work, as the number of phrases above cited as characteristic of his hand sufficiently shows, nor is it at all unnatural that the editor who worked not many years after Josiah had removed from the kingdom of Judah the foreign abuses of Manasseh's reign, should ascribe the same kind of religious abuses to the kingdom of Israel, side by side with the worship of J" under the form of a calf. Nor, again, need the phrases above mentioned imply dependence upon the written prophecies of Jeremiah, any more than need other phrases used by R^{D} elsewhere (Nos. 50–55) in common with Jeremiah go to prove that R^{D} and Jeremiah were one and the same person. All that clearly emerges from the fact of such resemblances is that the two writers were members of one prophetic school of thought, i.e. the Deuteronomic (cf. Driver, LOT[6] p. 203 at end).

The narrative of II 17^{24-41} is certainly composite. Vv.[32. 41], in speaking of the races which were settled by the Assyrian king in the cities of Samaria, say that they 'feared J",' while retaining the worship of their own national deities. In v.[34], on the contrary, it is stated with great emphasis that they 'feared not J".' Again, while vv.[24ff.] refer exclusively to the foreign settlers, and only mention the introduction into their midst of a single priest of Israelitish nationality (v.[28] אֶחָד מֵהַכֹּהֲנִים), to whom was due their instruction in the worship of J"; vv.[34b-40] are couched in such terms as can refer only to Israelites as such, of however mixed and renegade a strain. Notice especially vv.[35. 38] the reference to the Deuteronomic covenant; v.[36] 'J", who brought you up out of the land of Egypt.'

Thus this latter section must be regarded as a later addition to the narrative of Kings (R^{D2}; phrases, Nos. 3, 16, 28, 29, 49), referring probably to the Samaritans of post-exilic times. V.[40b] rounds off the interpolation by the repetition of v.[34a], the statement of the older narrative to which the later writer attaches his addition. Vv.[24-34b. 41], on the other hand, form, in part at least, an ancient narrative embodied by R^{D}.

Stade (ZATW vi. 167 ff.) regards vv.[24-28. 41] as the original kernel which has received the later extension vv.[29-34a]. Possibly this latter may be assigned to R^{D} himself; v.[32b] resembles I 12^{31}, and in v.[34a] עַד־הַיּוֹם הַזֶּה 'unto this day,' is an expression commonly employed by R^{D}.

II 18^{1-8} is mainly the work of R^{D} (phrases, Nos. 3, 31, 63, 72), based upon the notices of vv.[4. 7b. 8]. Vv.[7b. 8] are probably drawn in substance from the 'Annals.' With regard to v.[4] this is not so clear. The verse shows marks of a late style (perf. with weak ו, as in $21^{4.\ 6}$ $23^{5ff.}$), and sketches the outline of a religious reformation which appears in all essentials to have resembled and anticipated the reformation of Josiah. Hence some critics regard the notice as a late and unhistorical interpolation (cf. Stade, Geschichte, i. 607 f., ZATW iii. 8 ff., vi. 170 ff.; Wellhausen, Comp. 291).

The occurrence of a reformation under Hezekiah is supported by 18^{22} (which must, with the rejection of 18^{4}, be likewise branded as a later misconception), and perhaps also by the statement of Jer 26^{17-19a}, which speaks of the influence exercised upon Hezekiah and all Judah by the preaching of Micah the Morashtite. Micah 1^{5b} MT mentions the Bāmôth of Jerusalem for reprobation; but this passage must not be pressed, because LXX, Pesh., Targ. presuppose a different reading.*

Certainly Isaiah does not appear to have had in view any centralization of J"s cultus, such as was prominent in Josiah's reformation, but his attacks upon the idol-worship ($2^{8.\ 18.\ 20}$ 31^{7}; cf. $10^{10.\ 11}$), tree-worship (1^{29}), and necromancy (8^{19}), which seem to have been rife in the kingdom of Judah, are in agreement with such a movement in the direction of the pure worship of J". Probably, therefore, as is allowed by Stade (Ges. loc. cit.), the statement of v.[4b] is based upon authentic information as to such a reform, and this has been later on expanded in v.[4a], under the influence of the accomplished fact of Josiah's reformation.

II 18^{9-12} is a notice from the 'Annals,' introduced by the synchronism of R^{D} v.[9a], and closed by his comment v.[12]. The notice is identical with $17^{5.\ 6}$.

II 18^{13}–20^{19} = Is 36^{1}–39^{8}.†

II 18^{14-16}, which is not found in Is, is distinguished from $18^{13.\ 17ff.}$ by the form of the name חִזְקִיָּה Ḥizkiyyah (instead of חִזְקִיָּהוּ Ḥizkiyyahu), which occurs also in $18^{1.\ 10}$ ('Annals'). 18^{14-16} appears to be in strict agreement with the Assyrian record (Taylor Cylinder, col. iii.; cf. COT i. p. 286, ii. p. 1), and is probably a genuine excerpt from the 'Annals.'

It is generally agreed that the narrative of Is 36^{1}–39^{8} cannot be traced to Isaiah himself, but must be of a considerably later date. Notice the mention of Sennacherib's death (Is 37^{38} = 2 K 19^{37}), which did not happen until B.C. 681, twenty years after the campaign against Jerusalem, and certainly later than the death of Isaiah. Again, it seems to be clear that the Isaiah section (except 38^{9-20} from another source) must have been extracted from our Book of Kings by the editor of Is 1–39.

Certain phrases which are due to R^{D} in the Kings narrative appear also in Is; cf. 'for David my servant's sake' II 19^{34} ‖ Is 37^{35}; 'How I have walked before thee in truth and with a perfect heart, and have done that which is good in thy sight' II 20^{3} ‖ Is 38^{3}; and the redactional phrases 'In those days' II 20^{1} ‖ Is 38^{1}, 'At that time' II 20^{12} ‖ Is 39^{1}. Kings is also superior to Is in the account of Hezekiah's sickness. Is 38^{4-8} has been abbreviated; $38^{21.\ 22}$ is misplaced.

The Kings narrative II $18^{13.\ 17}$–20^{19} seems to represent a combination of three sources. Stade (ZATW vi. 174) notices that Isaiah's threat against Sennacherib occurs three times in similar terms: 19^{7} 19^{28b} 19^{33}. The contents of Sennacherib's letter (19^{10-13}) merely repeat in brief that which has already been said by the Rabshakeh (18^{28-35}). Again, it is highly improbable that Sennacherib, after hearing the news with regard to Tirhakah (19^{9a}), should have imagined that the mere dispatch of a letter would be likely to compel Hezekiah's submission, after the failure of previous verbal negotiations. The true sequel to 19^{9a} seems to be $19^{36f.}$; upon receiving information of Tirhakah's hostile movement, Sennacherib raises the siege of Jerusalem and returns to Assyria. We have, then, two separate accounts of the Assyrian campaign, $18^{13.\ 17}$–$19^{9a.\ 36f.}$; 19^{9b-35} 19^{9b} having probably been slightly modified by the redactor. Further, the section 19^{9b-35} itself appears to be composite in character. The taunt song vv.[21-28], with its accompanying sign vv.[29-31], stands apart from the prosaic statement vv.[32-34]. לָכֵן, 'therefore,' of v.[32] answers, not to anything in the prophecy preceding, but to v.[20bβ] אֲשֶׁר הִתְפַּלַּלְתָּ שָׁמַעְתִּי 'Whereas thou hast prayed . . . I have heard,' and, as has been noticed above, vv.[28b. 33] are duplicates of the same statement. Thus vv.[21-31], generally regarded by critics as an authentic prophecy of Isaiah, appear to have been inserted into the midst of the prophetical history 19[9b-20. 32-34], v.[21a] representing the redactor's link.

* חַטָּאת 'sin,' parallel to פֶּשַׁע transgression, as in v.[4a]. The reading of MT is, however, accepted by Kittel, who regards the rendering of the Versions as merely a simplification (History, ii. 357).

† In addition to the authorities cited at the end of this article, cf. the Literature given under ISAIAH, especially Dillmann, Jesaia, 1890, p. 310 ff.; Cheyne, Introduction to the Book of Isaiah, 1895, p. 212 ff. (where, however, the writer proceeds upon the assumption that Kings was not compiled until after B.C. 588).

The narrative of 20[1-19] probably belongs to the author of one of the two preceding narrative sections. Cheyne, following Duhm, selects the second narrative 19[9bff.] Notice, as a point of connexion, the occurrence of a prayer of Hezekiah in each section: 19[15ff.] 20[2f.]. Very possibly the chronological notice at the beginning of 18[13], 'In the 14th year of king Hezekiah,' properly refers to the events of 20[1-19], and occupies its present position upon the false assumption that Sennacherib's invasion took place in the same year as Hezekiah's sickness and recovery. This arrangement is probably due to R[D], who removed the note of time from its true position at the head of the narrative of 20[1ff.], replacing it by his synchronistic phrase 'In those days.' Notice the reference to Assyria in 20[6]. The whole verse from וּמִכַּף 'and from the hand,' etc.,' must be due to the author of the mistaken synchronism. Cf. the latter half with 19[34].

The 6th year of Hezekiah for the fall of Samaria, B.C. 722 (18[10]), cannot be reconciled with the 14th year for Sennacherib's campaign, B.C. 701 (18[13]), and it seems the best course to regard this latter date as true for the sickness of Hezekiah and the embassy of Merodach-Baladan, which will then fall cir. B.C. 714. Thus Hezekiah's reign may be supposed to have closed B.C. 699, i.e. some 15 years after B.C. 714 (20[6a]).

The short prophecy of 20[17. 18] has probably been worked over by R[D2] in post-exilic times, when Babylon, and not Assyria, was the oppressor.

II 21 is throughout the work of R[D] (phrases, Nos. 11, 13, 27, 42–44, 49, 54, 55, 66; and cf. Driver, LOT[6] p. 203) based upon very brief notices (vv.[3. 4a. 5. 6a. 7a. 16a]), derived, presumably, from the 'Annals.' Vv.[10-15] appear to presuppose the captivity of Judah, and must therefore, in their present form, be assigned to R[D2].

II 22[3]–23[25] is a continuous narrative, probably drawn from the temple archives. Deuteronomic phrases are found in 23[3. 19. 25] (phrases, Nos. 3, 6, 20, 39, 63), and in the speech of Huldah 22[15-20] (phrases, Nos. 29, 39, 54; and cf. Driver, LOT[6] p. 203), which seems to show signs of revision by R[D2] in exilic times. Certainly this later editor is responsible for the addition at the close of the narrative 23[26. 27] (phrases, Nos. 11, 39, 51), which strikes a note strangely alien to the enthusiasm of the pre-exilic author in view of Josiah's reformation (cf. especially vv.[22. 25]).

Upon II 23[29]–25[30] see above (Later editors). 25[22-26] is a much abbreviated account of the events described in Jer 40[7]–43[6], to which source R[D2] clearly owes his information. Jer 52, on the other hand, seems to be a later addition to the prophet's book (notice the closing words of ch. 51, 'Thus far are the words of Jeremiah'), excerpted from 2 K 24[18]–25[30], naturally with omission of 25[22-26], as having been already related in fuller detail.

KING'S POOL.—See POOL.

KING'S VALE, THE (עֵמֶק הַמֶּלֶךְ, AV the king's dale).—The place where the king of Sodom met Abram, Gn 14[17] (τὸ πέδιον βασιλέως). Here also the childless Absalom erected in his lifetime a monument to himself, 2 S 18[18] (ἡ κοιλὰς τοῦ βασιλέως). See HINNOM (VALE OF), p. 388[a]; SHAVEH (VALE OF), and JERUSALEM, p. 584[a].

KINSFOLK.—Although 'kinsfolk' is itself plural (see FOLK), and is so treated in Job 19[14] 'My kinsfolk have failed,' and Lk 2[44] 'They sought him among their kinsfolk' (ἐν τοῖς συγγενέσι), it is also found with an s added, giving the irregular plural 'kinsfolks,' in 1 K 16[11] 'Neither of his kinsfolks, nor of his friends'; 2 K 10[11], 2 Mac 8[1] 15[18] Lk 21[16]. The NT Revisers have dropped the s in Lk 21[16], and the Apocr. Revisers in 2 Mac, but in 1 K 16[11] the OT Revisers have kept it. In 2 K 10[11] RV prefers 'familiar friends,' the Heb. expressing no reference to kinship (cf. LXX γνωστούς, the same word as is rendered 'acquaintance' in Lk 2[44]). For the form 'kinsfolks' cf. Strype, Life of Archbp. Whitgift, 1597, '[Geta] asked him, if those whom he had put to death had no parents, kinsfolks, nor friends'; and Bacon, Essays, 'Of Parents and Children' (Gold. Treas. ed. p. 24), 'The Italians make little difference betweene Children and Nephewes or neere Kinsfolkes.' J. HASTINGS.

KINSMAN.—This is the proper singular form of 'kinsfolk,' with the fem. form 'kinswoman.' 'Kinsman' is the tr[n] in OT mostly of גֹּאֵל gô'ēl (see GOEL), and in NT of συγγενής. In Apocr. συγγενής is so tr[d] twice, Sir 41[21], 2 Mac 12[39], and ἀδελφός twice, To 3[15] 7[1] (RV 'brother'). In Ru 2[20] AV gives 'next kinsman' as the tr. of gô'ēl; RV changes this into 'near kinsman,' and gives 'near kinsman' instead of the simple 'kinsman' for all the other occurrences of gô'ēl in Ruth. In Ru 2[1] the Heb. means no more than 'acquaintance,' but RV retains the AV translation.

Kinswoman occurs Lv 18[12. 13. 17], Pr 7[4]; and RV adds Lk 1[36] 'Elisabeth thy kinswoman,' for AV 'thy cousin Elisabeth,' the word 'cousin' (wh. see) having become contracted in application since 1611. The Greek of TR is συγγενής, but the weight of authority is in favour of the late fem. form συγγενίς, which edd. (except Tr.) adopt.
